This money, $17 billion, or $2,000 per taxpayer, means that the total debt endured by each taxpayer in Canada will be $10,000. Each and every taxpayer in this country will be in debt to the tune of $10,000. The interest on that debt is about 8 per cent. That means from now on each taxpayer in this country will pay $800 a year for interest on that debt. That is not paying off principle. That is just interest on the debt, $800 per taxpayer per year forever into the future, unless we find some way of paying off the debt.

We must remind ourselves that this money is not being used for capital expenditures. It is not an investment in a capital project which will yield some dividends and allow us to repay the debt over a period of time. It is operating funds. This is like going to the bank and borrowing money to buy groceries. Household Finance would laugh in your face if you tried to borrow money in order to purchase groceries or pay rent, without offering a plausible story as to how you are going to repay the money.

That is what this government is asking this House to do. We do not know how this will be paid back. We do not know what growth it has planned for Canada next year and the year after. There is no indication of what tax rates will be in place or by what rate they expect revenues to grow.

We are told the government needs $17 billion to spend on operating expenditures. This is most irresponsible for any kind of operation that you can consider. As I say, if a family operated in that way, it would soon be bankrupt. Any business would certainly be bankrupt. Any banker approached to finance that kind of operation would laugh in your face.

To compound the insult to this House and the country, of the government asking for this $17 billion without any indication as to how it will be paid back, on March 16 last the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) came to this House and asked for authority to borrow $5 billion. He said, and I quote from page 3859 of Hansard:

> The authority in this bill to borrow a further $5 billion, together with the unused portion of the $16 billion authority granted in March and December of 1977, should provide the government with sufficient borrowing powers to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-79, and provide a margin as usual for contingencies.

In March the minister assured the House that an extra $5 billion in borrowing would look after everything for 1978-79, with a significant margin for contingencies. Now he produces a bill which calls for an extra $7 million of borrowing for fiscal year 1978-79—$10 billion is for fiscal 1979-80. There are only two possible explanations. One is that the minister misled the House last March and that the $5 million extra borrowing power called for at that time was not enough to look after the whole of the fiscal year 1978-79, and he knew it. The other is he was so widely out in his projection for cash requirements that he needed another $7 billion.

There are only two possible conclusions to be reached. The first is that the government was being dishonest, a possibility which has to be entertained because at that time it was looking for an election in June, or maybe in October at the latest, and if ministers' statements were not completely honest they probably would not be called upon to account for them. The second possibility, equally damaging, is that the minister was incompetent. Mr. Speaker, can you imagine estimates being so far out as to call for an additional $7 billion, a sum equivalent to half the total income tax collected? It means that the deficit for this year will be wildly in excess of the minister's earlier prediction of $11 billion, huge though that is in itself; it will be much greater than that if he really needs this extra $7 billion.

Things have got to the stage of being tragic. It is not just a question of being angered by this misrepresentation or incompetence on the part of the government. The people of Canada are facing a critical situation as a result of the kind of direction and management they are getting. It is truly a frightening thing to reflect that we have been misled by the Minister of Finance or, in the alternative, that the government is so incompetent in its estimates of its cash requirements and the economy as to require on extra $7 billion. Clearly, all this has to stop. It is essential that changes be made and be made quickly. Unless they are, we shall find ourselves in an indescribable economic mess.

The word "depression" is not too extreme to describe what might happen unless the situation is brought under control. The government must do something about the excessive spending habits which have been built up over the last ten years. The fact of the matter is that taxpayers are simply unwilling to pay the taxes necessary to sustain that kind of spending. This is not just a subjective evaluation; it is an assessment which can be backed up logically and analytically. The evidence that people have reached their limit in their willingness to pay taxes is everywhere.

Recently I read an article describing the growth in cash economy here in Canada. What is happening increasingly is that the cash economy as opposed to the monetary economy is growing rapidly. This shows that an awful lot of people have taken to using, in their business and personal transactions, cold cash which cannot be traced or taxed. It is estimated that the proportion of the economy directly affected is upwards of 35 per cent. In other words, 35 per cent of the economy is effectively beyond the tax system. The assessment is relatively simple to make because the Bank of Canada knows how much cash is in circulation and the amount is growing far more rapidly than would be dictated by normal economic growth. So there is widespread tax evasion by millions of Canadians who now prefer to deal in cash as opposed to taking part in transactions which can be traced and taxed. This is of enormous consequence. Millions of Canadians are saying, "I am paying too much, and rather than pay more I am willing to resort to the inconvenience of a 'sock under the bed' instead of following normal accounting procedures which the tax man can trace".

In addition, there is evidence everywhere of the growth of the barter economy. A dentist attends to the teeth of the carpenter's children and, in exchange, gets a new bar built in his rumpus room; the lawyer, in exchange for helping draw up a will, accepts a leg of beef from the farmer. Indeed, there are firms which have set themselves up in the barter business and which bring together people who have something to trade and who would like some other commodity or service in exchange. These firms are making a lot of money from people who want to take part in barter arrangements of this sort. And the customers are saying quite clearly, "We are paying too much in taxes and refuse to pay any more."

All this has serious consequences for Canadian society. There is only one recourse and it is to cut expenditure. Governments cannot raise taxes beyond the willingness of people to pay them; all they can do is run deficits, as has been the case for so many years. But there is a limit to the amount we can borrow without bringing chaos to the capital market. One way out is for the government to borrow from the Bank of Canada, which gets the funds through printing money. Printing money leads to inflation; it is in essence a process of taxation since it debases the value of the money Canadians hold. And we all know the consequences of inflation, the damage it does to the economy. As I say, there is no alternative to these huge deficits than to cut expenditures.

We must also cut taxes. We must cut taxes because we are at the point at which a reduction in taxation would lead to the receipt of more revenue than would an increase in taxation. This may sound like a contradiction, but it is not. If we accept the premise that a tax rate of 100 per cent yields zero revenue to government because no one would produce anything which would be subject to taxation, then at some point there must be a point in the relationship between revenues and taxation at which revenues begin to decline, that is, at which a higher tax rate will serve only to reduce revenue. This thesis is a very elementary one but I do not think it is assailable from a logical point of view; it may be argued we are not yet at that point of the curve, but I believe the empirical evidence is that we are, and that a reduction in the tax rate will result in an increase in government revenue.

Anyone who claims that deducting mortgage interest, as proposed by my leader and my party, would reduce government revenues, is dead wrong. That would increase government revenues, but we cannot rely just on reduction of taxes to raise revenues. There has to be a reduction in expenditures as well, because spending has gone beyond what an economy can or is willing to support in a non-wartime period. The people of Canada have sent this message to the government. They sent this message loudly and clearly via Martin Goldfarb and Associates.

The government responded with its so-called expenditure cuts announced September 8 of this year. Were those cuts or were they not? A couple of things which stand out must be mentioned. One is that the cuts of $2.5 billion proposed were cuts from projected expenditures of $54.6 billion, or a 12 per cent increase. In other words, the projected increase in spending for next year, before these so-called cuts were announced, was to be 12 per cent, yet last February or March the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) presented spending estimates for this year which showed a 9 per cent increase, and he said the government would do better next year.

In February or March the President of the Treasury Board said that spending for next year would increase by less than 9 per cent. Later he said he would cut $2.5 billion from projected expenditure increases of 12 per cent. What are we supposed to believe?

Does the President of the Treasury Board think that we have short memories or that we will not go back and look at what he said last February or March? Or was he anticipating that an election would come along and bail him out so that he would not have to account? He was either deceiving us last February or March, or these cuts are pure fiction, simply a rearrangement which has nothing to do with reality. I suspect that there is probably a little of each, although this is not the first time this minister has attempted to deceive the House with regard to the spending plans of the government. This afternoon in question period, when asked about cuts regarding the Farm Credit Corporation, the minister indicated that they are not cuts at all but just a bookkeeping change. He said that the Farm Credit Corporation will not get its cash from the government any more. He said it will go directly to the market place.

It makes no difference whether the money comes directly from the market place or from the government; that is still government spending. To call it anything else is pure, unadulterated flim-flam. Exactly the same thing was done with regard to the Export Development Corporation, the Federal Business Development Bank, and CMHC. If we add on the amount of money borrowed by these Crown corporations, spending would be in the vicinity of $1 billion more. The government claims to be spending $1 billion less when in fact only bookkeeping changes are taking place. All the government is doing is rearranging the books in such a way that, if a business were to do the same, the securities exchange commission would de-list that business's stock. Any self-respecting auditor would refuse to sign the books, yet the government does it time after time. That is incredibly irresponsible behaviour. The sooner we turf these rascals out, the better chance we have of turning the economy of this country around.

The first and most important thing in bringing spending under control is to be honest about the spending process. That was the advice of the C. D. Howe Research Institute in its 1975 policy review. Three years ago that institute recognized that one of the reasons government spending has grown at the rate it has—and it has been allowed to grow at that rate—is fundamental dishonesty on the part of governments in presenting their spending plans.

First and foremost, there has to be more honesty about spending programs. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) should not be allowed to claim that he has cut the expenditures of the unemployment insurance program when in fact he has simply put some of the expenditures on the backs of employees and employers as they make their contributions. That is not a cut in government spending. It is movement of taxes from one place to another. The Minister of Employment and Immigration is not the only one who does that. Every ministry is doing the same thing. There has to be honesty about the spending process, as well as a willingness to make genuine cuts.

Is there a business, individual, or corporation which cannot find flab amounting to 5 per cent? Of course 5 per cent of fat could be cut without doing any harm. A cut of 5 per cent in government expenditures—a very small amount—would reduce expenditures by over $2.5 billion. The cost of sustaining that kind of debt is about $200 million a year. A 5 per cent cut in the fat—not the muscle, the bone or the gristle—would reduce government spending by $2.5 billion and the amount Canadians have to pay in terms of interest on the national debt by $200 million a year.

Anyone with any degree of competence can find that kind of excess spending which can be cut. We were told earlier this year that a spot-check of civil service positions showed that 16 per cent of civil service positions was over-classified, that is, 16 per cent of civil servants are getting paid for jobs of a higher level than the jobs they are actually doing. The cost of that alone was estimated to be in the order of $175 million. Our economy is as bad today as it has been in recent history, certainly since the depression.

Mr. Martin: Nonsense.

Mr. Andre: That is what the world is telling us. That is why our dollar is valued at 84 cents American. The world financial community is giving us the same message it gave New York city a few years ago. We are being told to bring our spending under control and to bring our revenue figures closer to our expenditure figures or else the world financial community will have to charge us much more in our dealings and loans. That is why the Canadian dollar is discounted to 84 cents American. If we had the healthy economy which we have the potential to have, our dollar would be worth much more than 84 cents American. That is the clear message.

We cannot bring our economy into line without first cutting expenditures. We must cut back on the horrendous growth in spending on the part of this government. We must cut that fat, not just because we cannot afford it but, in addition, people are becoming unwilling to pay taxes. We see growth in the cash economy to avoid taxes and growth in the barter economy to avoid taxes.

We see an increase in plain, ordinary tax evasion because the public sees how this government spends money. Any taxpayer who might feel a little bit of conscience or a little guilt about employing a tax-evasion scheme certainly loses that guilt when he finds out that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) spent $8,000 of that taxpayer's money flying his friends to a Grey Cup game, and that the Minister of Transport sent his nanny back to England on a government aircraft, and when he sees profligate waste and abuse of his money by this government. If anybody feels guilty about avoiding taxes, they will certainly lose their guilt quickly when they see the kinds of examples of abuse of trust placed in the government.

It is absolutely essential that government spending be reduced, that the tremendous waste be stopped. My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie), last Thursday ran through a litany of examples of the government's abuse of the trust placed in it and the waste of our tax dollars. Those are not just little problems that are brought up for political advantage on a short-term basis. Those are very serious problems which have serious consequences on the attitudes of Canadians, their attitude towards paying taxes, the ability of this government to collect sufficient revenue to provide those services which are essential and to be able to close this gap between revenues and expenditures. Only when that is done, only when we have evidence that this government will be fiscally responsible, that it will treat taxpayers' money with the respect it deserves, should the House be asked to vote on whether this government should be given extended borrowing privileges. It is an insult to the House and to the country for the government to come to us now and ask us to authorize $17 billion in further borrowing, giving us absolutely no indication of what the money will be used for and where it is coming from. I, for one, will not abuse the trust of the people of Canada by approving of that kind of irresponsible behaviour.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, there are several significant things about this debate today. In the first place there is the fact that we are having the debate today. On Friday this party suppressed its natural anxiety to contribute to the debate and we sat and listened with disbelief to five members of the government party who, one after another, occupied the time of the House from about 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. I think it was an extraordinary example of members of the government party talking out their own legislation, because there is no doubt in my mind that since we had nothing to say and the NDP put up one speaker, and after the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) we did not make any further contribution, the government was talking out its own bill.

We had made what I thought, from a disinterested and objective point of view, was a very spirited attack on this legislation. I think we could have had a vote and given second reading to the bill on Friday and, as my friend, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) said, brought the bill to the House for committee of the whole. I say that in passing—

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It seems to me that some of the comments that are being made by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) are out of order because indeed a number of members on this side had been speaking for the purpose of putting positive facts on the record in the course of the debate, and I think it is very important that that be noted. Members on this side were bringing out extremely important statistics which were very positive—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. This may be a point of debate or argument, but it is not a point of order.

Since I have the floor may I, at this time, read the proceedings on the adjournment motion.

Borrowing Authority Act

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—War Veterans Allowance Act—Legislation to amend—Level of pension for widows of disabled veterans; the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Finance—Grants in lieu of taxes; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—Transport—Request for continuation of Esquimalt and Nanaimo rail passenger service.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I will not continue speaking on this other than simply to say that what we listened to on Friday from members on the government side was two hours of concentrated bilge, twaddle and nonsense. I think my friend, the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), in describing the speech made by the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais), expressed a very harsh criticism of the Solicitor General who, he said, knew as little about economics as he did about law. I consider that to be exceedingly harsh criticism and I hope that if, in the few remaining months during which this government is in power, it becomes necessary, as it probably will be, to have a new minister of finance, we are not inflicted with the disaster of the present Solicitor General becoming minister of finance, in light of the very reasonable assessment of his knowledge of economics made by the hon. member for Calgary Centre.

Another thing about this debate is the fact that there is such a bill. I think it has been mentioned by several members who participated in the debate that until November of 1977 the general attitude of this government was to tack on borrowing power to the supply bill, thereby depriving members of the House of the opportunity to debate this important issue. Last November, because we were debating income tax legislation, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) tacked borrowing authority on to that legislation thereby enabling the House, at second reading and committee of the whole, to have discussion on the matter.

At the time the Minister of Finance admitted that what had been the practice heretofore was not a good practice because it deprived members of the House of the opportunity to discuss the question of borrowing authority, which is a very important privilege. It is not the granting of supply—we all admit that—but it connotes the granting of supply and it puts the government in the position—I intend to demonstrate this later—with the use of other powers, to be virtually given what is in effect supply. We had that debate and the Minister of Finance said in November of 1977 that he recognized the government had been depriving members of the House of the right, which they should have, to discuss the question of borrowing authority, and he would do something about it.

Then we come to March 1978. Because of a special agreement made among the House leaders to give effect to the urgent need of the government to borrow more money, a special order was made. We had two days of supply set back to back and in the second day—or the first day, I am not sure which it was—we had a bill with regard to supply and the question was debated with a time limit put on it. As has been said by my friend, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, by the hon. member for Calgary Centre and others, when we had that debate last March, the minister said—and I am simply quoting what has been put on record already, but it needs to be said over and over again, as reported at page 3859 of Hansard of March 16, 1978:

> The authority in this bill to borrow a further $5 billion together with the unused portion of the $16 billion authority granted in March and December of 1977, should provide the government with sufficient borrowing powers to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-79, and provide a margin as usual for contingencies.

Later on in the same speech, as reported at page 3860 of Hansard, the minister again said:

> The unused part of the existing borrowing rights, and the new $5 billion authority requested will cover our domestic cash requirements in 1978-79, and will be used to draw on the $1.5 billion U.S. credit opening and the $750 million U.S. loan which is being negotiated.

I call the attention of the House to those statements which are clear, categorical assertions of fact. This parliament acts on behalf of the people and the taxpayers to grant supply and authority for borrowing to the government. There is a contractual relationship. When the government asks for supply, or indicates that it requires the authority to borrow money in order to implement supply, then certain categorical facts should be set before the House.

All of us are entitled to rely on the statements of the Minister of Finance as being accurate and factual. When the contract is broken, we must say to ourselves, "What will be the situation in the future? What about the requests for borrowing authority being made now? To what extent may we rely upon those?" This is far more important to the millions of taxpayers outside the House, which taxpayers bear the burden of finding the money to pay the taxes needed to cover the borrowed moneys. They look to us to demand from the government the facts upon which the legislation is passed.

The reasons for the bill before us are very clear and simple. The hon. parliamentary secretary made a rather ridiculous point of order a little while ago. I admire him very much. Eventually he will learn what points of order are proper and what are not. I should like to refer to the comments of the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) as reported at page 281 of Hansard dated October 19, 1978. He was referring to the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) when he made the following comment:

> The hon. member knows this. He knows authority is being obtained now to cover the government's needs not only for the balance of the present fiscal year but for the next fiscal year so as to avoid our having to come back to parliament time and time again for the necessary legislation . . .

That is the motto of hon. members opposite. They do not want to come back to parliament. They want us to grant wide powers respecting expenditures and borrowing money. They dislike parliament; it is alien to their method of government. They come here only because the constitution compels them.

The granting of a borrowing authority for the ensuing fiscal year would place us in a very dangerous situation. Together with the other powers the government possesses, and without bringing forward estimates or supply, the government is requesting a $10 billion borrowing power to cover estimates which have not been brought down. Apparently these funds are for certain programs which might be brought in next year. They are asking for a blank cheque.

The hon. member for Calgary Centre put his finger on it when he said that we are losing control of the opportunity and the power of challenging government spending, authority to borrow, authority respecting estimates, to act through orders in council and so on. That demonstrates the imperative, urgent and pressing need. There is no mechanism to make government appear before us to be challenged, of making it provide truthful information, or making the government justify its spending programs. That is the basis upon which this bill is being presented. Parliament, individuals, organizations, and the media do not have this power. In fact it is not within the four corners of the public service.

Once again I should like to refer to a rather fascinating story which I put on the record at the end of the last session. It concerns a very senior public servant in England who wrote a book entitled, "Your Disobedient Servant". Mr. Leslie Chapman wrote his book after resigning from the public service. He had been the regional director of the property services agency for the five southern countries in England. I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) will read my speech today, because he is interested in saving taxpayers' money. If he does not listen, at least he can read it later on.

This gentleman was able to institute savings within the four corners of his particular area of jurisdiction which amounted to 35 per cent. He had a spending program for property maintenance of 10.5 million pounds sterling. Approximately two or three years after the insitution of his program, he was able to show a reduction of 35 per cent of 3.5 million pounds. One would have thought that the senior officers of his department, the ministers and his colleagues, who were also regional directors, would have been interested in finding out how this reduction was accomplished. They should have been interested in what marvels this man exercised in order to save such an amount of money, without drawing blood and with the full approval of the involved unions. During the period of these reforms, he undertook consultation with the concerned unions.

They should have allowed him an opportunity to explain his program for the benefit of other departments. Instead of that, his colleagues disagreed and pooh-poohed it because they felt that the circumstances within his department did not exist in others. The permanent secretary, who is the equivalent of our deputy prime minister, said that he would take it under advisement, which is the usual guise. Nothing was done about it at all, and ultimately their public accounts committee got wind of the situation. That committee called a number of people before it, including the permanent secretary, for the purposes of obtaining evidence as to why no reasonable savings were possible within other departments. Subsequently, in approximately six months, the permanent secretary reappeared before the committee and admitted that he was wrong, that his previous statements were incorrect. By that time Mr. Chapman had resigned and had written his book. He explained thoroughly his experiences in the book. It should be required reading for all ministers of the government. I recommend it to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) as well as others. In fact I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will bring his mind down from the high, high clouds of constitutional problems and direct his attention to the simple, ordinary concerns of Canadians.

People are concerned with government expenditures and realize that there is a need for savings. The sequel to the story is that Mr. Chapman attempted to give evidence before the public accounts committee. But he was told that if he gave his story as an ex-employee or an ex-senior public servant of the government of England, he would be prosecuted under their Official Secrets Act.

● (1702)

That is what has happened, and that is why I said a little while ago it is useless to look within the four corners of the civil service for the kinds of savings that are possible, and I mean the simple, ordinary, homely savings which you and I, Mr. Speaker, realize in respect of our own households and our own businesses. A government adopting to its own use practices of this kind could successfully save lots of money without the necessity of decisions coming from the top that there will be a 20 per cent cut here, a 30 per cent cut there, and some 5,000 employees laid off. I am not talking about the merits of this, I am just talking about the way the government approaches it. I do not believe any of this in any event, and I do not think anybody else does.

To conclude this sad story of Leslie Chapman, "Your Disobedient Servant," I should just like to read two additional quotations from the book. The first appears at page 157, and is as follows:

> There can be no shadow of doubt that the Official Secrets Act as it is at present worded and used contributes to the continuance of waste and extravagance on a massive scale in the public sector, and protects those who are responsible from the consequences of inefficiency, error and downright negligence.

That could be applied so aptly, so well, and so truthfully to this poor, shivering, frightened, weary and inefficient government.

Finally, the other quotation which appears at page 159 of the book, is as follows:

> This book is concerned only with the financial consequences of unnecessary secrecy in the public sector, and there should be no room for misunderstanding on this point: while the Official Secrets Act is used as it is in this country, bungling and incompetence of all kinds can flourish undetected and the taxpayer will pay dearly for this.

That is the situation which exists in this government, and I know it as do you, Mr. Speaker, although you are in a neutral position and cannot make any comment. The ministers sitting opposite know, and the public at long last is beginning to know and to realize this, and will act accordingly as it did at the by-elections of a week ago. This is the situation and it is expressed in that particular act. We must find some better way of protecting the public in this regard.

Let us consider the period which led up to the situation bringing about this simple demand by the Minister of Finance in casually seeking authority to extend the government's borrowing power by $17 billion. During this period we saw program after program put together by government economists, political scientists and pseudo-experts, who all believe they really know better than the public itself what is best for the rest of us. Most of these programs were accepted gratefully by the executive as election bait, and with the massive propaganda machinery at the disposal of the government they were sold to the voters who were in fact being bribed with taxpayers' money, not realizing that they are one and the same person.

The result was inevitable. We were led to expect the impossible, and in doing so we bypassed the attainable. The grand masters of the Trudeau government, which manipulated this conspiracy of vast expenditures, now tell us that it was really the public which made these demands and the public will simply have to pay for them by massive use of the printing presses, which is what this bill is all about. We are told bluntly there is nothing we can do about it, particularly in parliament, except acquiesce.

As the rules stand now, that is the case. There is nothing we can do. We can make a few speeches, and government members are compelled by the rules to stay and listen to them. Members will blindly support the government when the bill comes to second reading, through committee, and third reading. The bill will go through, but there are other ways of dealing with this, and I referred to the by-elections as one.

In other parts of the world there have been attempts made by other governments to obtain the powers and authorities such as those this government is seeking. I am talking about proposition 13 in California. We have a parliamentary system. The question of referendum will likely be employed, or the government would like to employ it for its own purposes in connection with constitutional issues. For my own part I do not believe in it and I do not think it will work.

However, I just want to say through you, Mr. Speaker, to hon. members opposite who sit there smiling, and I understand why they sit there and do not worry about this, that all over this continent there is a growing feeling of irritation, anger, discontent and challenge, not only in respect of governments but in respect of the whole machinery and process of governing, which includes legislatures, parliaments, and perhaps extending even to the media, so far as I know. This whole process is under challenge. I suggest very sincerely to my hon. friends that if measures of this kind and extravagant expenditures with no accounting, no truthfulness and no facts, continue by this and other governments, the public will seek and find other ways of dealing with the situation.

I agree with the late Sir Winston Churchill, that while there are defects in the system under which we operate, there has still been no better way yet found of bringing about an improvement over the parliamentary system. We can change and reform the system, but it is still the best system. I would like to see a solution.

I have been in this House perhaps too long, as some of my friends would say, during which time I have seen this happen over and over again. As I travel around this country I am convinced that the public, the taxpayers, the consumers, and the property owners will no longer tolerate, without some form of challenge, the situation that has been brought about.

Surely an example of this is the situation we are facing in respect of the postal strike, and the impunity with which, so far, the strikers have resisted this legislation. I am not on their side, and I am not going into the question of the law. We have passed this law and we cannot deal with it now, but when we pass a law there must be obedience to that law. If it is not a good law the remedy lies elsewhere in having it changed. However, the fact that there exists throughout this country now what is in fact a challenge to the power of this parliament and this government is a sure indication of how the people feel about parliament and about government.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance when speaking to this bill said that this House had approved the estimates and now had a responsibility to give the minister the power to borrow to cover the bill of payment. This, of course, is wrong so far as the fiscal year 1979-80 is concerned. I imagine the parliamentary secretary would now admit he was perhaps a little too enthusiastic in his statement and should have made a distinction.

As far as the fiscal year 1979-80 is concerned, we do not have the estimates as yet. The Treasury Board is probably dealing with those estimates now, trying to cut them down or add to them, as the case may be. We will know what they are to be a little later on. This was pointed out by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe. In fact he is absolutely right in the sense that this parliament, this House, which is presumed to be the caretaker of the public purse, is absolutely impotent to check or challenge the use of that purse, yet the minister comes before this House casually, almost in an impertinent way, with a short speech saying he wants this bill put through right away, "Hurry up, give me this borrowing power so I can take it to the Senate and get the money." In that way he is acting in accordance with the actual state of affairs in that this parliament in general, and this House in particular, are powerless to challenge the government's right in this regard.

We are impotent, not only because of the increase in tightening of party discipline, particularly on the government side, and a general unwillingness to challenge spending decisions made by government bureaucrats, who are not accountable to this House, but, as well, by reason of the extent to which this House in particular, and government in general, have given up all means of meeting this challenge. A very substantial part of the moneys which are spent, and which this borrowing power will be used to cover, ultimately is in the so-called statutory items which are held to be outside of our scope. I think it is a doubtful proposition, but it was a ruling from the Chair here in the past. I think that each vote in the estimates is a separate bill and can be challenged, but the rules are such that we cannot do it, and they are strictly enforced against us.

There are the debt charges and, the way the government is going with its borrowing, these are going to steadily escalate as taking a greater part of the tax dollar. That leaves approximately 30 per cent of the government spending, which may well be $53 billion this year, which lies within the competence of parliament and the right of the House to challenge. But even with that comparatively small percentage we have now powers to do it. By fiat, precedent and ruling in this House, coupled with the utterly hopeless system of examining estimates amounting to billions of dollars over the last decade or so, parliament has become a farce which, in fact, is a prologue to a tragedy. This is neither the time nor place to document this contention.

I do not think that there is a member of this House on either side who can stand up and honestly deny that public spending is and has been for years out of control, and this House can do nothing about it. The Auditor General has said that for a number of years. The last Auditor General has said that, and so has Mr. Lambert who heads the royal commission on accountability. It has been said by many people, and it was even said by a former minister on the government side, the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell), while participating at the end of the debate on March 16, 1978, on the bill to which I have already made reference.

The hon. member said at page 3867 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to share in this expression of concern about the means at our disposal for the control of expenditures. I think it is a part of a general concern that has arisen over the complexity of legislation, the growth of the regulatory process, the growth and difficulty of managing expenditures. Along with the hon. member—

That is my colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who had the floor ahead of him.

> —I want to say I share the expression of concern raised by the hon. member and hope that the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and his colleagues will give very serious thoughts to the concern we all feel, regardless of where we sit in this House.

I am awaiting hopefully for the Lambert commission to make a report. I hope and believe, from what was said by Mr. Lambert and his commission in the interim report, that they will deal with the question of accountability of the government to the House for its spending, or making known the information which this House needs to deal with those expenditures, and that they will make some very useful recommendations. However, it cannot stop there. I am hoping that this House will have the courage, determination, and grit to take hold of this issue and lay down some very strong recommendations so that the parliament which succeeds us will have an opportunity on behalf of the public to come to grips with this problem which, as my hon. friend from Calgary Centre has said, is on the verge of swallowing us.

No one can go on. If we were a private corporation we would be declared bankrupt and put in the hands of the receiver, but because we have the capacity to reach out and put our hands in the pockets of the taxpayer and come up with enough money, and enough bank credit by way of borrowing authority, we are not bankrupt. That is the only reason. It will not be the government that goes bankrupt; it will be the taxpayers of this country.

I hope that this parliament, now in its declining days, will render no greater service to the parliament which will succeed us than to call attention to this situation and make certain concrete, specific proposals that will permit that parliament, as trustees for the taxpayers and on behalf of the public, to challenge and properly scrutinize payment proposals and expenditures, so governments planning those payments will know that they will have to come and face a knowledgeable, determined House of Commons and Senate on both sides, and that their expenditures will be based accordingly.

There are two more short points I would like to make. I said earlier that I was concerned about the fact that the Minister of Finance had come to us on March 16 of this year and made a categorical assertion to the effect that the $5 billion borrowing authority then sought would be adequate, with a residue left over from the previous fiscal year, to complete all of the borrowing requirements for the fiscal year 1978-1979. That has not been the case, nor has there been an explanation for it. This is why I would hope, and I would think that it would be to the credit of this House and the government, that the government will provide that this bill, after second reading, would come into this House and committee of the whole, so there would be an opportunity for us to ask questions. Then the Minister of Finance, in full view of this House and the public, will come forth with reasons why, having made this statement in March, 1978, he is now coming before this House again in October, 1978, and saying, "Sorry, boys, I made a little slip. I was $7 billion short of my borrowing authority."

Mr. Paproski: Shame, shame!

Mr. Baldwin: The other thing which concerns me, Mr. Speaker, is the question of granting in advance the borrowing authority of $10 billion for the fiscal year 1979-1980. I would suggest as a possible scenario, especially to a government headed by a man who has not hesitated to use the War Measures Act and has indicated his willingness to take other unusual powers, that the right given by this parliament to the government to borrow $10 billion, coupled with the right which exists under the Financial Administration Act to govern by Governor General's warrants, would permit the government, for example, in December of this year or, better still, in March of next year, not to dissolve this House, but to adjourn it and govern for ten or 11 months without calling parliament together. That is the scenario which that particular authorization would permit.

I do not say that the government is intending to do such a thing. But we would be derelict in our duty to our constituents in asking them to vote for us as members of parliament with the responsibility to hold government accountable, if we had to admit to them shamefacedly that we gave the government authority to govern this country without the benefit of parliament for ten months. Once parliament has adjourned, it could use Governor General's warrants. I think this is an utterly impossible situation. I would vote against the bill in any event. Under no circumstances could I vote for it, and I hope that no hon. member will vote for a bill that would give this kind of blank cheque to this government. If one does, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that he deserves the confidence of his constituents.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): My intervention, Mr. Speaker, in the debate on Bill C-7 will not be too lengthy, but there are a number of points I would like to place on the public record. It was but ten sitting days ago today that this parliament was assembled for its fourth session to listen to a new Speech from the Throne. Canadians expected that throne speech to give a new thrust to a very tired government. They expected it would put forward the government's economic plans for the next six months, and that those economic plans would, first of all, bring some order into Canada's accounts and, second, would give us the economic thrust that all Canadians so desperately sought.

This throne speech came after a 100-day recess of this parliament. There was a president of the United States in the memory of all of us, Mr. Speaker, who talked about "100 days of decision". I thought that maybe during these 100 days of recess the government, not having to face parliament, would use the time to put forward an economic package that could be presented to this House, and through this House to the people of Canada, that would get the economy moving again. During that period, however, the economic picture in this country dimmed substantially. It was during that period, and immediately after this House resumed sitting, that we saw the prime rate of the Bank of Canada raised for the fifth time in one year to an all time high, since the inception of the Bank of Canada of 10¼ per cent. The spin-off effects of crisis management of this proportion will be serious to the home buyer, to young Canadians attempting to get established, to small businessmen trying to make investments, and to the farmer trying to operate an economic unit. I suggest that no one in this House and no economist in the country can assess the effect such mismanagement will have on the plans of all Canadians.

During that time we also saw our dollar slide, or should I use the word sink, to 83 or 84 cents, whilst the government kept saying it was allowing the dollar to find its own level—allowing the dollar to float. When we looked at the reserve account we saw the massive expenditures made in an effort to bolster the dollar at the 83 cent or 84 cent level. Although during that time and into the fall of this year inflation abated somewhat, it is still at a level that is unacceptable and well beyond any figures in any forecast that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has given to the House. Unemployment is still unacceptably high, especially among Canada's young people. To give you a sign of what is happening—

Mr. Pinard: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I told him in advance of this possibility. I have talked to the representatives of each party in the House and there is unanimous consent that we revert to the introduction of bills before I state something else.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is there unanimous consent that we revert to the introduction of bills?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

SHIPPING CONTINUATION ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RESUMPTION AND CONTINUATION OF SHIPPING SERVICES

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism) for Mr. Ouellet) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-11, to provide for the resumption and continuation of shipping on the Great Lakes and certain other waters.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, before six o'clock I hope we may obtain unanimous consent to proceed with second reading at eight o'clock, and that the motion would include reference to committee of the whole.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, of course we are prepared to give consent, now or later, to the proposal put by the parliament secretary (Mr. Pinard). Naturally, we have not seen the bill but I hope it is more effective than that introduced with respect to the Post Office dispute which has run on for many days after parliament acted. We are prepared to give the necessary consent when convenient to the government. It might be helpful if the government could indicate its intention with respect to this bill—how quickly it wants to proceed with it—to be assured of the co-operation of the opposition.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is correct that we are prepared to give consent for the introduction of the bill today, as has now been done. We are also prepared to respond favourably to the request of the parliamentary secretary that later this afternoon we give an answer on the question of proceeding to second reading at eight o'clock. That is, we are prepared to give an answer by six o'clock on the question of proceeding at eight o'clock. With the House leader of the Progressive Conservatives I, too, express the hope that the government was a little wiser in drafting this bill than the one we had to deal with last week.

[Translation]

Mr. Allard: Mr. Speaker, we also agree on the understanding that the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) be adhered to. We can examine the bill before eight o'clock tonight.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. When shall the bill be read for the second time? Later today, by unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No. Your Honour did not understand. What we are agreeing to is to revert to this order at six o'clock at which time the question you have just put will be answered.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Therefore we revert to government orders at six o'clock. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreed and so ordered.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, just prior to the parliamentary secretary (Mr. Pinard) rising to bring in another back-to-work bill, the second in this session—

Miss Campbell: You have been asking for it for days.

Mr. Epp: The hon. member for South Western Nova (Miss Campbell) frequently contributes from the back row, not standing up to make a speech. We expected for some time that this legislation would be forthcoming. It has cost the western grains business, which means the western Canadian farmer, some $10 million per day in lost sales. It is hoped we will be able to get shipping resumed on the Great Lakes in a day or two and that the government will be more successful in this respect than on the return of postal workers to their jobs.

As I was saying at the time of the intervention, just to give a symbol of the crisis management position the government is in I refer to what happened last week with the Canada Savings Bonds. Canada Savings Bonds, which is a major effort of the government to raise its capital needs, had an interest rate of 8.90 per cent. When the Bank of Canada raised the prime rate to 10¼ per cent, the government was forced to change the rate on Canada Savings Bonds to 9.25 per cent. That is just a symbol of this government's having to react on a day by day basis in order to keep the banker from locking the door on the Government of Canada. That is the stage to which we have come.

There was a general consensus in this House that the eight day throne speech debate should be suspended so we could proceed to economic legislation. That consensus seemed to carry right through the House. For two reasons the throne speech debate has been suspended: the first time was to pass legislation ordering postal workers back to work; the other time is this bill, C-7.

Canadians have the right to expect an economic package which would get the economic health of this country back to normal. Instead, what is the government's economic proposal? The economic proposal of this government in this time of crisis has been outlined by various speakers. It is an additional borrowing authority of $17 billion, $7 billion to be applied toward fiscal year 1978-79, and $10 billion for fiscal year 1979-80.

In 1946, immediately after World War II, this country had been through a period of great crisis, the war having followed immediately on the great depression. The accumulated national debt in 1946 was the same amount that the government is asking us to approve in Bill C-7. With the heritage we have received from those who have gone before us, those who built this country, this government is now asking for an additional $17 billion.

That is a mind-boggling figure that I am not able to comprehend. This government asks for that amount of money without giving any explanation. Just this afternoon this government defeated an amendment moved by the official opposition which called for disclosure of the financial facts on the accounts of Canada prior to passage of second reading of this bill. We wanted to know why this money is needed, but what did this government do? It voted against an amendment which called for the facts.

This government continually postures that it is in favour of freedom of information. Every time the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) and others like him bring forward legislation on freedom of information, the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) and his superiors rise to their feet and say that they are in favour of freedom of information. Once having said that, what do they do? They vote against it. They are in favour of freedom of information, but they want to be free to release to the Canadian people only that information which they feel is necessary. That is the kind of freedom of information in which they are interested.

What is this money to be used for? National debts can be accumulated generally for two reasons. Once, and it is valid, is to create a debt at periods of time when the nation's economy needs stimulus. The money is put into investments which will create jobs and long-term economic activity, not the short, stop-gap measures of which we see so many. Every member in this House in his private dealings has made those kinds of investments where moneys were borrowed and interest, paid to make an investment in order to enhance that individual's or his family's future. That is valid. However, what is this money for? This money is to pay for the ongoing operations of government. It is like asking your banker to give you a loan to pay for your groceries at a time when your bank account is in an overdraft position. That is what this government is asking.

This follows on the heels of a statement of March 1978 when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) in this House on another borrowing authority bill asked for $5 billion for fiscal 1978-79. Others have placed this matter on the record prior to my speaking. He said that $5 billion would be all that he needed to carry the Government of Canada through to the end of fiscal 1978-79 and that it would take care of contingencies. That was in March 1978. Here we are, some scant ten days after this house has been recalled, and the government is asking for another $7 billion. Whom are we to believe? Are the people of Canada not to accept the words of the Minister of Finance?

I do not know if members if this House can grasp the meaning of $1 billion, much less $17 billion. In order to grasp what a billion dollars is, I did a bit of calculating. I want to show the magnitude of $1 billion. If from the day that Christ was born you had spent $1,000 every day, seven days a week, every month of every year—and I think most Canadians can visualize $1,000—you would have spent $722 million. By the end of this century, you would have spent $730 million.

If you had had a billion dollars on the day that Christ was born and you spent $1,000 every day from that day forward, it would be well into the twenty-first century before you spent the billion dollars. I have given the government the benefit of the doubt and have not charged interest on the $1 billion for over 2,000 years. If you charge interest, it would be a fund that you would never spend at $1,000 a day.

This government is asking for an additional $17 billion, but we are not to ask any questions as to how they are going to spend it. It is not our right to know. Mr. Speaker, we are members of parliament who represent the people, and we have a right to know. Does the government maintain that the people, through us, have no right to know? Does any member on that side want to go to the electorate and say: Vote for us but do not ask how we are spending the money? If anyone dares get up and make such a statement I will yield the floor immediately and allow him to do so.

To illustrate the seriousness of the situation in which we find ourselves, let me remind the House that on the basis of the minister's own figures the government deficit amounts to a billion dollars a month. It would take 200,000 years spending $1,000 a day to dispose of that amount of money, yet the hon. gentleman is able to show a deficit of that magnitude every month.

Canada may not be unique in the situation which has been created. Writing in the Washington Review, Richard Whelan outlined what, in his view, is the reason for the decline of the American dollar against other world currencies. According to him, when all is said and done you get down to one word, and that word is "confidence". The investment community, he says, has no confidence in the policies of the government so we have witnessed a slide of the U.S. dollar as against other world currencies. Mr. Speaker, if that is a slide, the Canadian dollar has been plummeting. Mr. Whelan writes:

> The crisis the western democracies are facing is due to the fact that the governments of the west have not clearly told their electorates that the expectations which were coming forward could not be reached . . . The result has been the accumulation of deficits at a rate which few of us can comprehend.

All the manipulations of the Bank of Canada will not make up for the lack of that one ingredient—confidence. No matter who is governor of the Bank of Canada, no matter who is Minister of Finance, until the people of Canada have confidence in their government again we shall not be able to extricate ourselves from the economic morass in which we are floundering.

I believe there is another symptom of our present economic ills, and maybe many who sit in this House are not aware of it. But surely we are all conscious of the barrage of advertisements which come to our attention with respect to lotteries, whether regional, provincial or national. Lotteries have been set up as a supposedly painless method of taxation. All the statistics indicate that the people who buy lottery tickets most, as a proportion of the total population, are those in the lower income groups. These people, far from investing money which they can afford—if one could ever call lotteries an investment—are using money which should be going to provide essentials for their families. I know we cannot legislate ways in which people should spend their money and I am not suggesting we should. What I am pointing out is that governments now look upon lotteries as a method of raising substantial amounts of revenue.

This is a further illustration of the serious economic state in which we find ourselves—governments resorting to schemes of this kind to pay for projects which should be legitimate objects of expenditure. Governments of all stripes and at all levels are beginning to think of lotteries as a painless way of raising money. I say this is a reflection of moral weakness. It is not my intention to create a straw man—

An hon. Member: That is not a straw man; that is a villain.

Mr. Epp: My hon. friend is correct. It is time for all of us to face hard facts. We must realize we cannot continue to carry on as we have been doing. It is not only the economists who are warning us, it is the so-called little people who have been saying to us: you had better be listening because we are fed up. Perhaps members on the government side did not get that message this summer, but as I went through my riding people were saying to me time after time: You fellows in Ottawa had better get your house in order. They know about proposition 13 and while they do not, perhaps, understand all the implications they do understand that the ordinary people in California had said "Enough". Indeed, in one of my smaller municipalities the people passed a petition based on proposition 13 calling on the municipal council and the school board to give account of their spending. After that, the taxpayers got the facts and went home. But here in this chamber we do not get the facts. We expect them from municipal bodies and school boards but we cannot get them from a government which states publicly that it is in favour of freedom of information and open administration.

There is one other aspect upon which I should like to comment briefly. The present situation has been described by some political scientists, philosophers and economists as a crisis of governability. While previous western democracies and their people had political differences, they had common goals, and while they might have had differences in terms of degree with regard to direction, they agreed on where they wanted to take their countries.

Theoreticians have started taking note of the present situation, as have many practising politicians who are eminently more qualified to speak on this topic than I am. For instance, Senator Moynihan from New York, who is not considered a conservative, argues that narrow interest groups in society have become so powerful and so self-serving and their own interests have become so dominant that they have lost sight of the common will and the common good. These special interest groups demand special treatment, and in their desire to win re-election, governments in western democracies accede to their demands. The only desire of this government is to cling to power by its fingernails, toenails and, as somebody said, its hangnails.

Western democracies are becoming a little more than cheque-writing states. In other words, we come to the government and ask for more money, and we have the false notion that that will not cost us anything and that we will be ahead of the game. Even if that were true and not a myth, it would cost our children, grandchildren and great grandchildren. It goes well beyond the Biblical injunction that God would seek the sins of the fathers to the third and fourth generation. This sin goes much beyond that. When will it be repaid?

The result of contemporary states becoming cheque-writing institutions must be deficit budgeting because we must meet people's expectations. We cannot say no. Saying no is difficult. Saying no to our children is often difficult, but I submit that it is necessary, and it is time that we said no to this government until such time as it comes forward with information. The people of Canada should say no to this government until such time as they are given the information which they are entitled to expect. They should be given that information before they are asked to put on their children and future generations further debt amounting to $17 billion.

Small groups such as those I have described practise but another form of blackmail. That takes me directly back, in my closing remarks, to the blackmail perpetrated by this government. There is a form of blackmail inherent in Bill C-7. Hon. members on the government side might scoff at that, but how long will it take before some government spokesman will get up and say that we had better pass Bill C-7, because if we do not the government will not be able to pay for unemployment insurance cheques, the rightful pensions of senior citizens, family allowances and a myriad of other programs? That is blackmail of the worst kind. I am convinced that before too many days have passed this government will use that argument, because it has not been above using it before.

When I go to my banker hat in hand asking for a loan, he is gracious to me—at least he has been in the past—but he asks for certain facts. He wants to know if what I have in mind is a good investment, not only for the bank but also for me as a customer, because he wants to continue serving me as a customer. He wants to keep me in business. He is a builder and an investor. What does this government do? It tells the Canadian people that it will give no facts or information but that it wants authority to borrow $17 billion. If the government went to a banker with that attitude and with the debt portfolio it has, I wonder if, as the banker threw the government out the door, he would open the door first.

That is but half the story. The other half is that the government is asking for authority to borrow another $10 billion in 1979-80, without giving any information. We are not even being given information regarding 1978-79. The government is asking for borrowing authority for the future. Is that responsible? Can hon. members in this House responsibly support that kind of action? I say that it is time this government accepted the responsibility it has. If it does not, the fate which awaits it at the polls, of which it is so frightened, will surely come to pass.

Business of the House

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to revert to motions.

Mr. Speaker: The House having earlier this day given its consent to the introduction of a bill, and having agreed that at six o'clock the question about reverting to motions would be put, does the House give its unanimous consent to revert to motions, presumably for the purpose of determining whether there is consent to put a motion with respect to a bill introduced regarding the resumption of work on the Great Lakes? In order to revert to motions for that purpose at this time there would have to be unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the House leaders of every party we have agreed to proceed tonight at eight o'clock with the second reading stage of Bill C-11, the bill to which Your Honour just referred, and that the motion include a provision to refer that bill to the committee of the whole.

Mr. Speaker: It might be appropriate to be certain about that proceeding. If the motion for second reading were to be put at this time, the House should understand that the debate which is now before the House would have to be adjourned. Otherwise it would not be in order to switch from the order we are now discussing to the subject to be discussed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before you put the motion, perhaps you could ascertain whether there is the consent which was referred to by the parliamentary secretary. I am happy to say on behalf of my party that there is that consent, but I should like to make it clear that, having seen the bill, we feel there are some serious questions we must ask, and there may even be some amendments we may wish to make. But we are prepared to proceed this evening with the debate on second reading of the bill, and we are prepared for the reference to be to committee of the whole House.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As I indicated earlier, we are prepared to proceed, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker. Also, I have told the House leaders of the possibility of amendments being put forward during the committee of the whole stage to two clauses of the bill.

Mr. Speaker: Consent having been given, first, to reverting to motions, and second, as was now indicated, that the motion be put before the house that this bill be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole House, that order will be taken up at eight o'clock. It was also agreed and so ordered that the debate on the measure before the House until six o'clock this afternoon be now adjourned. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, when you went on to another subject matter, I was seeking the floor. I think that should be noted.

Mr. Speaker: It is noted that the next member to be recognized in the debate that was adjourned just now is the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton).

SHIPPING CONTINUATION ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RESUMPTION AND CONTINUATION OF SHIPPING SERVICES

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-11, to provide for the resumption and continuation of shipping on the Great Lakes and certain other waters, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At 6.05 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to say a few words on behalf of the hon. Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet). He is necessarily somewhere else at this moment, but of course will join us as soon as possible.

The Bill is a very important one. The House has known that this situation was an important problem for some little time. I want to speak only briefly about it because I hope we have the spirit to move it forward as quickly as possible, yet, a few things need to be said about the bill.

Hon. members will not need to be told that I was very much aware, throughout the beginning of the strike and into its first days, that a strike such as this on the Great Lakes, involving the movement of shipping on our important inland waterway, could have very serious impact upon the economy of the country. I was troubled by that from the first, as many members of the House were. Yet there were other interests and questions at stake.

We have a legal system and understanding in which parties involved in collective bargaining have the right and obligation to attempt to arrive at an agreement between themselves. That legal system allows for some help to be applied on their behalf through particularly the Department of Labour and its minister. That assistance was applied at various stages. In particular a conciliator was appointed. In due course he brought down his report, one which was not the basis for a settlement in the opinion of the parties. Thus, a breakdown occurred which led to the possibility of a strike.

I am sure Your Honour knows the law. We have collective bargaining. We have parties attempting to reach an agreement. When they fail to do so, the Minister of Labour may appoint a conciliator. When his report is in, it may be acceptable to the parties or not. If it is, clearly it is the basis of a settlement. If it is not, then after seven days the parties have the legal right to strike, to lock-out, to enter into a confrontation which is hurtful to them and unfortunately harmful to many other parties. Because it is harmful to many other parties, very often it is easy to ask immediately that the process be interrupted at the very beginning and that the strike be ended.

In this country, as in so many others, we have the right to strike. It was developed by labour unions forming and working together in the early days in conditions when it was a fight against oppression which led them to seek the right to strike and to fight. In those early days, typically the strike was illegal. In its beginnings it was by nature illegal, but it was resorted to because of the strong feelings of individuals that their rights were being overrun within our broad legal system.

In recent days I have had occasion to say a number of times that our democratic system depends not on sanctions and the power of the law so much as it depends upon the willingness of individuals, all citizens, to obey that law. That is a state of mind, a view and an attitude on the part of people which we must guard very zealously over time. The strike, illegal in its historic inception, became a legal weapon when it was recognized that alternatives were not easy to find. To this very day we have not yet found fully adequate alternatives to the weapon of the strike. Thus, we have maintained in our law, until such day as parliament assembled finds another way, collective bargaining, and the possibility of strike and lock-out if that bargaining fails.

In this particular case the bargaining failed; the assistance of the minister in the form of a conciliation report did not achieve an agreement; the parties stood apart and began a strike. Once again, the Minister of Labour intervened to bring mediation to bear and to recommence talks between the parties. Initially there were two unions involved in this matter and a single employer, and bargaining was ongoing with both. It was not easy bargaining. In the beginning, after the Minister of Labour brought them together one of the unions did not show up for the discussions. On the other hand, the Canadian Lake Carriers Association and the deck officers began their bargaining, and after a few days in fact did reach an agreement. Bargaining continued with the engineers who are involved in this particular legislation. As long as there was a chance of agreement without drastic harm being done to the country, it seemed correct in the public interest to let the bargaining continue in the hope of a solution being arrived at between the parties.

Of course, the problem and the danger to the country was growing. A short strike has less danger inherent in it because with the reserves of supplies, stockpiling, etc., the lack of movement of iron ore and other products would not immediately cause drastic unemployment and economic repercussions in the various industries. Even in the case of grain there is an advantage as long as the strike is short, so that grain could continue to move into Thunder Bay, our great terminal location for export to the east, and in its usual volume. Thunder Bay had been very low in stocks, and in the next few months we might have seen some problems in having enough stocks there to meet the exports we were trying to achieve. But as long as these stocks could arrive, we would have some catch-up potential, and the stocks would be there.

However, the day was coming when this situation would change. I was given the word today that this could happen in another day or so, and the movement of grain into Thunder Bay could not have continued as quickly as before. That we would have lost some movement into export temporarily is beyond a doubt. That is a price we pay for the collective bargaining process, with strike as a weapon in it. That is also undoubted.

Even today during the course of the question period the Acting Minister of Labour said that bargaining was continuing, and as long as it was, and he and I both knew that meant with any realistic hope of settlement, it was wise to wait a little longer. But an hour or two later we got word that the negotiations had, indeed, broken off, and that it now looked as though settlement was impossible. We immediately decided that the time had come to introduce legislation into the House and to seek approval of the House as quickly as possible in respect of that legislation. Once this step is taken, once a move in the House of Commons is chosen as the technique for settlement of the strike in place of the collective bargaining process, then surely the more quickly we act the better it must be.

We have presented to the House a bill which proposes a system for the ending of this strike immediately, and a manner of developing the collective bargaining agreement, the final agreement, between the parties. I urge members to support that bill. We will, indeed, in the course of the deliberations concerning the bill be proposing some amendments. I should say that some are simply clarifications, but others are to be proposed simply because the printed form of the bill could not contain them in light of the most recent developments which have occurred.

The one in particular to which I would refer hon. members is a proposal in connection with the clause concerning the term of the collective bargaining agreement, clause 4(1), in which the present term is indicated as continuing an agreement expiring on May 31, 1979. In light of the settlement between the same employer and the deck officers, it seems more appropriate to give the arbitrator the flexibility to take into account that settlement in full, including its term. Therefore, we will propose at the appropriate point to move an amendment which will allow the arbitrator to extend that term from June 1, 1979, to May 31, 1980. That is the term which is contained in the deck officers' agreement with the same employer. I think hon. members will appreciate the advantage of allowing that option to the arbitrator instead of confining him to the original straightforward year which was set out in the bill, and which had been developed, if not drafted in final form, before these latest developments had occurred.

It is not with gladness that we ever ask parliament in this way to end a strike, but with the feeling that the public interest will be served, recognizing the harm that might befall the economy if this strike continues—and some members will say too much harm has already befallen it—and recognizing also the importance of the collective bargaining vehicle and the need generally to have people in our society accepting that the law is moving when it ought to move and in a manner in which it ought to move.

I believe the very restraint in allowing the collective bargaining process to develop tends to assure that there will be compliance with this expression of parliament's will. That is extremely important. We know that in the face of another situation which demonstrates that, although people may all too easily think that the law can be a mechanism for causing certain things to happen, the law has its own limitations based upon our constant desire to respect the liberties of individuals and to assure that we move in a careful and guarded manner.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, with this indication of an intention to move an amendment in regard to term—and there will be a couple of others, but only in regard to language and the like—on behalf of the Acting Minister of Labour I am pleased to move second reading of this bill. I ask the House to consider it now, in all its stages if possible, as quickly as possible, so that since parliament has been asked to intervene we move quickly to put an end to this dispute.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in rising tonight to answer the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), and minister of other portfolios as well in the place of the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet), I must say—and I am sorry I have to say this—I have never in my life listened to a pack of sententious baloney such as we have just listened to tonight with the introduction of this piece of legislation. It may well be that the Acting Minister of Labour is late and is tied up somewhere else, and that does not surprise me a bit; but surely we should not have to listen to a professorial lecture on the collective bargaining system and why we now have to move, why nothing was done before, the fact that we do not have the structures in place to do anything better than what we are doing.

In this regard I would point to the fact that over the last decade there have been the recommendations of the Woods committee, recommendations that the Acting Minister of Labour told the Senate the other night are under active consideration, which the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) later in this House of Commons denied. These have been things advocated by the official opposition for many years. For the minister to come into this House and tell us there is no better way, that this is the way we have to do it, is just too much for hon. members to have to listen to with any patience.

If I lose my patience at the beginning of my speech it is only because this long night, and it may be a long one, is going to require all of the rest of my patience—and I have a great deal—in order to see this bill through.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fraser: I hear some noise from the government side.

• (2022)

An hon. Member: Make your speech.

Mr. Fraser: That is all it is. The government does not have anything to be very proud of tonight. We come here tonight less than one week after we passed a piece of legislation that has not been obeyed. We asked the government when they would appoint a mediator-arbitrator and we were told it would be within hours, but it was done only today. We were asked to pass this other piece of legislation because the public was entitled to mail service, but nearly everybody in the country knows that something much more substantive, intelligent and sophisticated should have been done many months ago.

Tonight we are suddenly asked to pass this legislation. We have listened to a lecture from the Minister of Justice, who is also the Minister of Transport and is speaking for the Acting Minister of Labour. We are asked to pass this legislation when the government does not even have a Minister of Labour. There is nothing personal in saying this, because the Acting Minister of Labour is working hard, but there is no permanent Minister of Labour. We are asked to go along with the government against a backdrop of back to work legislation that is being openly defied. The Minister of Justice has told us for several days that there are certain remedies available as against the postal workers, but he cannot seem to define what they are in terms of back to work steps or disciplinary action.

Against this entire backdrop, Mr. Speaker, we listened to this speech by the Minister of Justice, who told us that this is the only way things can be done. The fact is that if this is the only way things can be done, this House is going to become nothing but a tribunal for settling labour disputes. That is the very thing that all hon. members, if they are honest with each other, would say this House is incapable of being.

I and my party recognize that the situation we are in tonight is very serious. Winter is coming. When the minister said that action had to be taken, there is concurrence for that on this side of the House. Just the other day, however, in asking the minister why he was getting excited only now, if he had known for three months what the effect of a breakdown in the negotiations would be, he had no answer except to say that the government had been monitoring the situation closely and was fully aware of what the economic consequences would be. Yet the government says this is the only way we can proceed. It rejects out of hand the recommendations of the Woods royal commission which years ago recognized that there has to be a better method.

In situations in which these disputes go down to the final crunch, as this one has tonight, hon. members are completely and utterly dependent on the information which the government gives them. It was obvious less than a week ago that the information hon. members were given upon which Bill C-8 was put through to reinstate postal service in this country was somewhat less than the calibre of accuracy that is demanded in this House.

We are in agreement with one thing the minister has said, and that is that we are facing serious economic loss. Some of the figures are worth relating. The Canadian Wheat Board is now behind over 3.5 to four million tonnes of grain which must be shipped before December 15. There is nearly $500 million in costs, and it has been estimated that if this grain does not go through before freeze-up the economic cost to the country will be approximately $1 billion. Producers are losing $10 million a day, and some ship owners say that they are facing losses of more than $200,000 a day.

It is not just a matter of economic loss. There are approximately 2,100 seamen who face being laid off. With an unemployment level of nearly one million in this country, this is not the time to be laying off another 2,100 people who have to support their families. The economic impact of this withdrawal of service is obvious to everyone, but what is hard to understand is why it has taken so long for the government of the day, a government that has been in power for over a decade, to recognize that this ad hoc method of dealing with such situations is not satisfactory, and, as we are finding out with the legislation we passed a week ago, it does not even work very well.

There are certain questions which must be asked tonight. My party will want to know before this legislation passes—and the minister cannot quarrel with us for asking these questions—if they actually have an arbitrator, a person who is prepared to act or who has given an undertaking to the government that he or she will act in this capacity. We will want to know whether there has been any discussion with the union involved as to whether or not the union executive and the rank and file of that union are prepared to obey the law. This country cannot tolerate two pieces of back to work legislation passed within the space of one week which are not going to be obeyed.

We would also like to know, Mr. Speaker, what is the assessment of damage which the minister referred to when I directed a question in this regard to him the other day. We want to hear more about this because one of the things that is essential for the public and the labour movement to understand is the economic assessment of the damages, information which the minister has said the government has.

We do not intend to throw procedural roadblocks in the way of this bill. It is too important to too many people and to the economy of Canada. But it is very strange to listen to the minister tell us tonight that when the government was asked in question period today whether they were going to introduce legislation, the answer was, "Not as long as negotiations are continuing." One would wonder whether the government in giving that answer was being somewhat less than frank with the opposition and with the public of Canada. The speed with which this bill was brought before the House makes us ask whether or not the government knew prior to question period today that there was no hope of negotiations continuing.

I want to emphasize that we will want satisfaction from the minister when it comes to committee of the whole. I know the minister will not object when I say that we want to be satisfied that there was no possibility of the negotiations continuing, that in fact there have been some commitments to the government that the law will be obeyed and that—and this is very important in view of the fact that the same is not happening in the postal strike—the government is in a position to back up the legislation.

Tonight the minister made much of the fact that the law must be accepted. That is true. In the long run, in a free community that is the only kind of law that will last. One of the things that decides whether the law is accepted is whether anybody can be sure it will be obeyed. We will want to be sure that this is not a toothless bill.

We intend to ask a lot of questions at committee of the whole, Mr. Speaker. We will not throw any procedural roadblocks in the way of the bill but we cannot help commenting that the present system of dealing with disputes of this kind is not satisfactory. We have advocated a better way but until the last few days the government, despite the fact they say they have been examining it, have rejected it. The proposals we put forward have the backing of a royal commission on labour-management relations in Canada.

We have had a decade of experience which indicates that this ad hoc method of dealing with matters is not satisfactory and does nothing to enhance labour relations. Indeed, every speech made by members of this government before they bring in legislation rescinding the right to withdraw services is preceded by the pious statement that the government believes in the right to free collective bargaining and the right to strike.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, what the government proposes in this bill tonight is not simply to order some workers on the Great Lakes ships back to work. In effect, what the government is doing tonight and what it did a week ago is to destroy the fundamental principle of collective bargaining which has existed in this country for almost 50 years.

Back in the 1920s when that great Liberal leader, former prime minister, former friend and co-worker of the Rockefellers in the United States, and one of the original instigators of the notorious company unions, Mr. Mackenzie King, gave workers in Canada in the private sector the right to strike, it was more hedged around with rules, regulations and procedures than is the case with any other country in the democratic world.

It should be remembered that workers in the private sector of the economy who want to go on strike have to follow a very carefully constructed and elaborate set of procedures. They have to try to negotiate with their employers. If they cannot reach an agreement they have to ask for a conciliator appointed by the government. If the conciliator cannot bring the parties together, the government appoints a conciliation board with one representative of the union, one representative of the employers and a chairman who is either agreed upon by both parties or, if they cannot agree, is appointed by the government. Only after the conciliation board has made a report and recommendations, and only if members of the unions do not believe that the recommendations are adequate or if the company will not accept the report, can the workers decide on a legal strike. That has been the procedure for many, many years.

It was only in 1967 that workers in the private sector were given the right to collective bargaining. That right is embodied in the Public Service Staff Relations Act which had the approval of almost all the members of the political parties represented in the parliament of that time. The bill provided that government employees had the right to belong to unions of their choice, the right to bargain with their employer, the government, on many important issues, although it excluded some, and that they could in the course of their negotiations choose to reach a final settlement either by arbitration or by exercising their right to strike. In most cases the unions opted for arbitration as the final way of settling disputes with the government.

In the case of the postal workers, they opted for the right to strike. Last week we saw the postal workers, having bargained for some 18 months without reaching an agreement—indeed, having dozens if not hundreds of clauses in their agreement not settled—opting for the right to strike. I am not discussing whether their demands were exorbitant, but they were exercising the right the parliament of Canada had given them if they could not reach an agreement. On the first day of their strike the government introduced a bill and passed legislation ordering them back to work.

I am not going to discuss the sorry results of the government's decision, Mr. Speaker. I am not going to discuss whether the government should have known that the postal workers would not obey the law immediately and go back to work. Whether the government gave consideration to that, I do not know, but on the first day the workers in the post office went on strike the government brought in legislation to end it.

I said on that day, and I repeat, that if a government believes there is any group of workers whose service is so important they cannot be permitted to strike, then the government should pass legislation along that line. Workers have the same rights as other citizens to know what the rules of the game are; they ought not to have the rules changed in the middle of the game.

[Mr. Orlikow.]

The bill before us tonight flows from a dispute between two unions of workers and the companies, the Canadian Lake Carriers Association. They went through the process of collective bargaining and could not reach an agreement, so the government appointed a conciliator who made a recommendation that the workers should receive an increase of 10½ per cent in the first year, and that in the second year they should get an increase of 2 per cent plus whatever the cost of living increase is in that year.

I suggest to members of the House that this is not an exorbitant amount. After all, the cost of living in the past year has gone up by almost 10 per cent. There is no indication that the increase in the cost of living will lessen in the next year. The only people arguing that are those on the Anti-Inflation Board who have consistently been wrong for the last two years. That being the case, the workers and their unions were not asking for too much when they asked for this kind of increase over the next two years. The conciliator was not being overly generous when he made that recommendation.

What happened? Did the Lake Carriers Association reject that proposal because they could not afford it, their customers could not afford it or their profits were too low? No. The Lake Carriers Association clothed themselves in a cloak of virtue and said they would not agree to the conciliator's recommendation because it would be inflationary.

I have never heard of a company stating that it would not increase the price of its product because to do so would be inflationary. Bank profits went up all through the period in which we had the so-called anti-inflation program. In fact, they went up between 20 per cent and 25 per cent a year. The paper companies are reaping unprecedented profits, thanks in large part to the devalued Canadian dollar. Their profits are enormous. Have they decided to hold their price because they are already making enough money? No, Mr. Speaker, they increased their price very substantially. At the same time, their workers were forced to accept a relatively low increase in wages because the anti-inflation guidelines would not permit a larger increase.

I want to point out an interesting fact. One paper company that is showing remarkable profits is Consolidated Bathurst. It has reaped the benefits of increased prices. This has resulted in a very large increase in their profits. Consolidated Bathurst is controlled by Power Corporation, the president of which is Paul Desmarais. Wearing his hat as head of Consolidated Bathurst, Mr. Desmarais does not hesitate to raise the price of paper. However, wearing his hat as head of Canada Steamship Lines, he says they cannot agree to the increase which the conciliator has recommended because it would be inflationary. That is a very specious argument.

I am not surprised that we are having the difficulties we are. I do not have any inside information. However, it should be obvious that in the next year or two this country will have a series of strikes the likes of which we have never seen before. The workers of this country will not agree to a 6 per cent increase, which is what the government proposes, while the cost of living is going up by between 9 per cent and 10 per cent.

To do that voluntarily would be agreeing in advance to a reduction in their standard of living. The workers of Canada will not make that sacrifice voluntarily if they are the only group in this country to do so. They are watching very carefully while corporation after corporation increases its prices and its profits and their standard of living is reduced.

We in principle do not like this kind of legislation. We believe that as part of the democratic system workers have the right to belong to unions and to bargain collectively. There has not as yet been devised a system which works better than the one in which workers have, as a last resort, the right to go on strike if they cannot settle their differences with their employers amicably.

The spokesman for the official opposition again today, as he has done on other occasions, said that there must be better ways. There are better ways. Other countries have tried other ways. Australia and New Zealand had a system of compulsory arbitration 50 years ago. It did not work too badly when the economy was relatively prosperous, when both employees and employers could agree on how to divide the benefits of the industry in which they were involved. However, that system broke down very seriously as soon as the economy went into a recession and it became obvious there were real differences between employer and employee.

We are therefore skeptical of any proposals made either in parliament or outside by academics or industrial relations experts with regard to systems which would supposedly work better than the one we have. Every citizen of Canada knows that when there is a strike, either in the private or the public sector, it hurts somebody. Workers do not go on strike easily. Like everyone else, they must earn a living. They need their weekly pay cheque to pay their bills.

Even when there is strike pay, and there usually is not, it is substantially less than a worker receives while on the job. Therefore, they do not go on strike frivolously. The proof is that more than 95 per cent of the negotiations which go on between union and employers result in a settlement without resorting to a strike.

We are opposed to legislation laying down procedures which prohibit a strike before it takes place. We are less than enthused about legislation which orders workers in the public or private sector back to work. I may disagree with the minister about whether or not he should bring in a bill. However, I am surprised when he brings in a bill which leaves the arbitrator to decide on the terms.

I do not know why the minister did not include the proposals of the conciliator in the bill. I believe they were reasonable. Possibly they are not acceptable to the companies. If the terms had been acceptable to the companies but not the union, I wonder whether they would have been included in the bill. With this minister, I believe they would have been. The reason they are not is that they are relatively favourable to the union.

In the last week we have witnessed the beginning of a very serious trend in this country. We have witnessed the end of collective bargaining as we have known it. Some members will undoubtedly say that collective bargaining as we have known it does not work. I say it has worked in an overwhelming majority of cases. Those who say it is not working have yet to come up with a better system.

The government has known for months that there could be trouble in the post office, in the shipping industry and, I suppose, in other industries. Yet nothing was done; no effort was made to work out a policy which would be acceptable to the unions.

Let me say a word about what I take to be the implications of the speech of the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) on behalf of the official opposition. I do not believe for a moment one could get the co-operation of labour by setting up some sort of board or commission comprising some representatives of labour in the hope it would remove the necessity for strike action. Observers outside parliament who have discussed this question and compared Canada's record in the field of strikes and labour relations unfavourably with that of Sweden or Germany point to those countries and say that that is the way in which things should be done. But they take into consideration only one of the aspects having to do with strikes and labour-management negotiations. What they forget, or carefully omit to point out, is that in Sweden and Germany governments consult with the labour movement on all questions of economic and social concern to the ordinary people in those countries. They consult with the people with regard to obtaining full employment, measures dealing with inflation, the pension system and the social security system. They make labour a partner in the way government is run. In a similar fashion, they consult with industry.

This is never done in Canada. The only time labour is ever consulted is during a crisis when a group of workers in an industry to which the public is sensitive attempts to exercise its right under the law to go on strike. When that happens, the government gets into a panic and runs to labour with the plea: do something to stop this strike because it may be disastrous. Mr. Speaker, it may be disastrous in the short-run but it is a symptom of a deep-seated sickness which should have been dealt with much earlier. The government has never attempted to do this. It has never consulted with the workers or their unions with regard to any of the important questions which concern ordinary people.

Today, for the second time in a week we are presented with a bill ordering a group of workers to return to work though they are engaged in a legal strike. I do not know whether, when this legislation is passed, the government will have more success than it has experienced with the postal workers. I do not know what discussions are going on now, not only concerning this particular issue but concerning other and broader issues which affect workers in the shipping industry. I am not hopeful, because I see that the track record of the government is not good. They have gone to bat twice and they have struck out once and I am not at all sure they will not strike out a second time.

One of my hon. friends says the party opposite is an anti-labour party, and I am inclined to agree with him. I had always thought it was an anti-labour party but hon. members over there succeeded in disguising the fact. They are now showing themselves in their true colours. As they see it, the people who will be asked to bear the burdens of the ruinous economic policies they have followed for the last half a dozen or more years are the one million unemployed and the several million organized workers who do have jobs but who will be forced by legislation, or by whatever means the government can work out, to accept reductions in their real standard of living. That being the case I have no great hopes for the legislation before us.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments on the bill the government introduced at six o'clock tonight. Hon. members are all fully aware of the fact that this House has repeatedly had to deal with bills of that type. As recently as last week, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) introduced a bill to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

Mr. Speaker, introduction of such a bill surely proves one thing: that our labour legislation does not, by far, meet our current needs. It is unfortunate that the government has to resort to such procedures especially when it granted them the right to strike. Mr. Speaker, the introduction of this bill means that the government has recognized at last the urgency of the situation and the need to intervene to settle that problem which is as serious as the postal strike for all Canadians, especially the heavy losses that the Canadian economy could suffer in such conflict. However, as in the past, the government is unable to enforce the necessary measures.

In rising to speak on that bill, Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to blame the worker, on the contrary. We must blame the present economic system which is responsible for such problems. We only have to look around to note that strikes are increasing at a frightening speed. There was the recent strike of Air Canada flight personnel, we now have the postal conflict as well as the one we are discussing this evening and we will surely have others in a few weeks. I sincerely believe the government must take a stand in order to put an end to this dispute and take measures to avoid such situations in the future.

Mr. Speaker, it is no wonder that such strikes cause considerable losses to the Canadian economy, but do the workers have to take the blame for it? No, Mr. Speaker, that would be too simple. It would not solve the problem anyway because this is not the first time such things occur. On the contrary, we have been the victims of such breakdowns for years. The step the government has just taken by introducing this bill is likely to allow our economy to function, more or less, for some time. I must also say the government should not limit itself to playing the part of a fire squad getting to the scene of a fire too late. The government must also be preventive. It must pass measures likely to eliminate the possibility of such situations.

Mr. Speaker, at this stage of the debate, I wonder if passing this bill will solve the problem we are facing now. As for me, I say no. Will that make the workers concerned go back to work? I doubt it. That, Mr. Speaker, will definitely not improve the situation, on the contrary it will only aggravate it. Let us take for example the acute problem in the Post Office after the passage of the legislation brought in last week by the the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, a bill to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services. The union chose to challenge the law. Injunctions are being resorted to. We are witnessing civil disobedience, disorder, confusion, in short, anarchy!

I feel it is high time that the government take its responsibilities and see that the solutions advocated by my party for many years are adopted. Indeed, we the Social Credit Party of Canada are convinced that with our solutions the government would ensure greater co-operation between labour and management since in most cases workers resort to strike in order to get more purchasing power. When we realize that our government is now unable to control inflation, that inflation and salaries increase considerably while workers salaries increase slowly, there is no doubt about it. Strikes are the logical consequence of that situation. Mr. Speaker, before concluding, I would like to make three suggestions to the present government. First of all, I have a suggestion which would contribute to establish better relationships between employers and employees. It is a formula whereby the workers would share in the profits of the company, thus, enabling them to participate in the development of Canadian businesses.

Here is my second solution. For years, our party has been asking for the establishment of a permanent arbitration board with a power to make decisions without appeal. This board would consist of three arbitrators, the first being appointed by the employer, the second by the unions and the third by public authorities. Thanks to that regular and permanent mechanism it would be possible to achieve social peace in an orderly way, through the prevention of such conflicts even before they arise. That would eliminate the necessity of going before Parliament each time to pass a special legislation, which makes the right to strike inefficient and inoperative, and which leads to bandage solutions, as in the present case, when there are strikes and no settlements in sight; this only serves to widen the gap between workers and employer, which tomorrow maybe too wide to fill.

I would therefore offer a third solution, Mr. Speaker. I seriously believe that the guaranteed minimum income and compensated discount formula, put forth and defended by my party for many years, would greatly help in solving such problems because that formula would allow workers in general to increase their wages without influencing prices, since we live in a vicious circle where inflation forces workers to resort to strike action if they are denied the increases asked for through normal channels.

I therefore believe, Mr. Speaker, that the present government should take its responsibilities and react as a good government should. It should apply the theories of the Social Credit Party of Canada as regards the cost of living and labor management relations and that would certainly restore social peace among our people.

[English]

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a very brief point of order. I would like to indicate to the House that in speaking about the amendment which I propose to move at line four of page three I concluded my words with the date 1980 when I meant the date 1981, to bring it into line with the settlement with the lakers. I wanted to give the House notice of that error on my part.

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to say a few words about the bill which has been brought into the House tonight. I can understand the absence of the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet).

Some hon. Members: Here he is now.

Mr. Rodriguez: Oh, he is back. I know that he is a busy minister because this is the second time in less than a week that we have this kind of legislation before us, which tells us that the government is incapable of dealing with the collective bargaining process, whether it be in the public sector or in the private sector. I do not know if I should say I am happy because it means a cost to taxpayers, but I see bureaucrats from the Department of Labour here tonight making all kinds of overtime.

It is interesting that once again we are dealing with back to work legislation. This time it is not in the public sector but in the private sector, and I wonder how this government will handle some of the problems which will arise after putting this kind of legislation into effect.

Even now as I stand here the government has its injunctions in the postal dispute in Halifax and Montreal, but the police forces in those places are refusing to serve them. I wonder how the government will solve that kind of problem once it has passed this back to work legislation. It seems to me that there are shades of 1919 all over again. I suppose we will have to get the RCMP to get out their horses. The RCMP will now enforce the law. The lawbreakers will enforce the law. Over the next couple of weeks there will be an interesting kettle of fish to observe.

I cannot help but comment on the sanctimonious and phony attitude of members of the official opposition. They talk much about bringing in the Woods committee report. The Woods committee report is nothing but a dressed up compulsory arbitration program. It certainly is not a recognition of free collective bargaining.

Here we are tonight putting marine engineers back to work, and we wonder who will be next. What will be the next thing to be declared an essential operation? Who is going to be declared essential? I suspect that every occupational group could be considered essential. After two days of a garbage strike garbage collection is very essential. If certain services are essential, then it seems to me there should be some process of free collective bargaining long before parliament puts workers back on the job.

It seems to me that this habit is becoming very regular. It is the second time in a week. Surely the whole question of free collective bargaining, the notion of bargaining in good faith, will be thrown out the window by employers in the private sector if they get the impression that parliament is prepared to step in and put workers back to work the minute they set off on a strike. There is not an evening that I turn on the TV set to watch the news that I do not hear of a strike here and a strike there. It shows the irresponsibility of the media, both print and electronic, when all that is ever reported is strikes. They never report the fact that 95 per cent of all collective bargaining ends in an amicable solution, that in effect only a small number of processes end by way of the strike route.

The question must be raised, and it must be raised squarely. Here are workers who two and a half years ago were accused of putting Canada into an uncompetitive position with respect to trade in the world. Workers were dumped on in this country and blamed for causing inflation. We were all aware of Gallup polls and all sorts of other polls which said that the problem with the economy of Canada is big trade unions, then big government, and somewhere after Idi Amin came big corporations. There was a bias, catered to by the two big parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, at both the federal and provincial levels, which dumped on labour, dumped on the working class in this country, so that even workers started blaming each other for the economic mess in which we find ourselves.

Under this guise the government brought in wage controls and for two years they controlled the workers' wages. While they controlled wages and held them to an average increase of 6 per cent, when corporate profits were increasing at an average of 16 per cent, they did not do a very good job of controlling corporate profits. But they sure as hell controlled workers' wages. So whom do they blame now because the inflation rate is as high as it was at the time when the controls were brought in? They blame the public sector employees. They are not going to be the lead dogs. We saw a great program launched by this government saying in effect that the government would not allow public sector employees in this country to be the lead dogs for increases in the private sector. But when you examine the facts, you find that in comparing positions in the public sector with those in the private sector, in every single instance—we are not talking about the level of deputy ministers—in the private sector wages are higher than in the public sector.

These are the facts, and yet this government continues to allow the public servants of this country to take it on the chin. It continues to treat them as scapegoats, which leads me to suspect that there is a Machiavellian plot in existence between the Bay Street boys, the corporate boys, and the front benches of this government, that somehow or other they will start an attack on the trade union movement, an attack on the collective bargaining process, and an attack on public sector employees.

The question then must be raised—and it is a legitimate one in my opinion—who will be next? Will it be the Inco workers? Will they be deprived of the right to free collective bargaining? That question has to be answered.

I must say that I find the official opposition to be very phony on this issue. They are trying to play super crotch on this issue. They are all for collective bargaining, but they are also for compulsory arbitration. It is like the definition of a lady of the night; she works both sides of the street. That is the kind of game they want to play; they want to work both sides of the street.

I heard the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) give a speech in Toronto in which he said we should remove the right to strike from the public sector. Yet all parties in the House, may I remind hon. members, voted to give public servants the right to strike. There was not a "nay" from the official opposition or from the government. They all agreed that the public sector should have that right. But the minute that the public service exercises the right to strike, lo and behold, after CUPW is on strike for only one day, this government shows how tough it is. It puts the workers back to work after only one day of strike.

It seems to me that the government has lost any rapport it had with the trade union movement in this country, and the official opposition is in no position, given the kinds of phony positions they take on labour issues in the House and in committees of the House, to engender in the trade union movement any sort of confidence that they are sensitive to the problems of the working class in this country. For example, they can never enter into a social contact with them, and that is one thing that distinguishes the group on this side of the House from groups on other sides of the House. They have no rapport with the working class.

Just last week I was in Windsor speaking to 500 members of the United Auto Workers, and I listened to the concerns those workers were expressing at the convention. They were concerned about plant closings, about technological change, about how it affected their employment, about the mobility of capital which could move them from a highly industrialized northern state to a southern state where right to work legislation and other kinds of anti-labour legislation are practised. Our workers were expressing the same concerns as well regarding the mobility of capital which permitted the moving of part plants from Canada to the southern United States and other countries abroad.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

These are the concerns of our workers, but does the government come to grips with these concerns? Does it try in its legislation to give workers the right to negotiate technological change? No, it uses all sorts of little flimflam excuses and says: You cannot discuss technological change because you are under the PSSRA. These are concerns with which they have not come to grips. That we have the kind of mess that exists in terms of industrial relations in this country is because they do not understand and they are not sensitive to workers. The cabinet, the whole front bench, reads like a who's who from Bay Street.

When I look at those who want to replace them—one has just been elected in Ottawa Centre—we find that in that one case he was an adviser to Richard Nixon. I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that that should give every worker a chill right up the back of his spine. These are the people who expect to be sensitive to labour in this country. No, sir, they will say to labour: "That is your place, boy. If you do not stay in your place, parliament will put you back to work."

I think they have embarked on a dangerous path. Tonight the government is faced with the situation of police forces in this country not carrying out the injunctions they have been told to carry out. So you have a law abiding group of citizens, 23,000 of them, who feel in their heart of hearts that they have to resort to civil disobedience. Why? Because the government has failed completely to deal effectively with the situation long before the strike took place. The government had 18 months in which to deal effectively with the problem in the post office, but it left it to the last minute. Then after one day of strike, the government turned around and brought in back to work legislation.

I cannot support in principle compulsory arbitration. It is a band-aid approach. It is a principle which will never be accepted by my party. It does not solve the problems down the road. In fact, we took the same position regarding the CUPW legislation. It takes away the right of workers to negotiate a solution to a particular problem. If parliament is prepared to jump in at the first sign that negotiations are breaking down, then free collective bargaining will be destroyed for the forseeable future in Canada. It is a principle which is against the beliefs of the New Democratic Party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters).

Mr. Pinard: Inadvertently Your Honour did not see me rise and seek the floor. I suggest that it should be the turn of a member of this side, if Your Honour does not mind. May I be recognized, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I saw no one rise on the Liberal side of the House, so I recognized the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters). If the hon. parliamentary secretary is seeking the floor, I will recognize him.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 6(5)(a), I move that the sitting be extended after normal hours to consider the various stages of this bill, according to the rules.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It has been moved by the hon. parliamentary secretary that the sitting be prolonged in order to study the remaining stages of the legislation under the rules. Standing Order 6(5)(a) reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker is in the chair, a member may propose a motion, without notice, to continue a sitting through a lunch or dinner hour or beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment for the purpose of considering a specified item of business or a stage or stages thereof subject to the following conditions:

Standing Order 6(5)(b) reads as follows:

When Mr. Speaker puts the question on such motion, he shall ask those members who object to rise in their places. If ten or more members then rise, the motion shall be deemed to have been withdrawn, otherwise, the motion shall have been adopted.

Is there any objection?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that under Standing Order 74 we are allowed to proceed only with the reading before us and an additional reading because of the major conflict which has been pointed out by Your Honour before. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) might have been better advised to follow the fairly satisfactory practice of asking for unanimous consent, rather than using Standing Order 6.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that the hon. member read the motion. The chosen wording indicates that we want to proceed with all stages according to the rules. If there is a later discussion as to whether we can or cannot proceed with third reading, then we can look at the rules, and if it is a matter of emergency, according to the rules we can proceed. This should be discussed later on. The motion was to deal with all stages allowed by the Standing Orders, and there is nothing wrong with that.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that the House has extended the hour because it provides me with an opportunity to talk an additional 40 minutes which otherwise would not have been possible tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peters: If this type of legislation is used more often than absolutely essential, then it is not an exception to the rule but rather becomes the rule. In that event, all of those who are affected or involved in labour situations will have in the back of their minds that parliament will legislate their problems if agreement cannot be reached. The Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) has found a niche for which he is highly adapted. He should agree that this is an exception and not necessarily the rule.

We are plagued with the legislation which was passed a few days ago affecting the public service of Canada and the post office. Undoubtedly, Canadians are concerned about this. It has resulted in a bad situation because nothing was done except to force the workers back to work, thus removing the rights they would have under any other circumstances.

The situation before us here is a different one. I listened with interest to the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) who indicated that not much difficulty has resulted because of the short duration of the seaway strike, that shipments have been made to ports. No one will argue that this is not a critical situation; it is one which will have disastrous effects on the economy of the country. We depend on the export of raw materials, certainly wheat. Difficulties will develop in the entire agricultural industry if these elevators are not filled with grain, moved by water transportation instead of waiting for the winter months to fill them by rail transportation.

There is no argument about the fact that this is a critical situation that warrants consideration. It is my understanding that two unions were involved in this situation in the Great Lakes. Both unions went to conciliation. One union continued negotiations under the auspices of the Department of Labour; the other has arrived at a settlement. I would be interested in knowing why the second union has not been able to arrive at the same or a similar settlement. Our Acting Minister of Labour was involved in the negotiations concerning both these unions, but he has not bothered to tell parliament why there was a breakdown in negotiations on the part of one union or whether a similar type of agreement was offered to both. He has not given us the reason why the second union failed to come to an agreement.

The Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice told us earlier tonight that he wanted parliament to extend the term of the collective agreement for a period of approximately one year. A few minutes ago he said he wanted the term extended for two years, until 1981. I can only conclude that the agreement signed with one union was signed on the basis of a three-year term and we are now being asked to provide an agreement in terms of a three-year period for the other union.

If we extend the length of the contract we will obviously be saying to the members of that union, whatever the settlement may be, that it will not be for the period for which the union originally negotiated but will be extended an additional two years. That may have no appeal to hon. members of this House. I have listened to some of their speeches in the last couple of days, often with a great deal of disgust, and I am sure that most want to settle this strike, as they did a previous strike, and as they will probably want to settle a strike tomorrow by employees of Nordair, if such takes place, and the next day a strike by Air Canada and perhaps will want to settle every strike by legislation, not really caring what are the terms of the settlement.

If that happens labour may decide that parliament is not being fair. Quite frankly parliament should not only be fair under the circumstances, it should be extremely generous. How many of us remember with some amazement the time when Lester B. Pearson was prime minister of this country and settled a strike by giving the union involved something like three times what that union anticipated getting? It was a number of years before another contract came back to this House for settlement because management decided this was a pretty dangerous way of settling labour disputes. That particular dispute also involved the seaway, and the settlement then was generous enough that we were not faced with this kind of legislation for a long time.

In the case of the postal workers we provided the basis and the framework for an agreement that extended the package for a period of one year, and then extended that for a period of two and a half years, without any added inducements. In fact, we allowed a participant to that dispute to go before the arbitrator and remove some of the things the union had already gained through an agreement it had negotiated. This was not covered in the Public Service Staff Relations Act. We allowed the government to go before its own arbitrator and take these things away.

The judge who has been appointed, as I understand the situation as a result of listening to the radio, has asked for a copy of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. He apparently had never seen it before. When he reads it and compares it with what we are now being asked to do, he will understand the reason for the government's intervention. He will understand why the government insisted on a strike in the postal workers case. The government would not agree with its employees on matters that really did not involve money. That judge may well make the decision that this parliament did not have the guts to make.

We are again being asked to negotiate an agreement, but not in respect of people in the public service, employees of Canada, but in respect of the employees of private industry, an industry which is not controlled in any way by parliament, except through regulation.

I am told that Mr. Desmarais has dinner at least once a week with the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), and perhaps as well with the Minister of Transport and others. Mr. Desmarais controls the Power Corporation and Great Lakes Shipping, or St. Lawrence Shipping or one of the other big shipping companies which carries out a large shipping operation through the seaway. I am not suggesting this has any bearing on the matter because maybe they do not talk about shipping at all.

In any event, we are now making a decision very much against the interests of the employees.

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Peters: Yes, it is very much against the interests of the employees. The strike resulted in a lock-out because the company would not agree to the conciliation board report, and it was a majority report. The report did not recommend any great shake for the workers. It gave them a cost of living allowance for a period of one year, and suggested an increase of 2 per cent in the second year. That is not an extravagant package. I do not know the exact terms as the Acting Minister of Labour did not give them to us. He should have told us what they are as we are really negotiating this contract on behalf of a private industry and a union outside our control.

If we pass this bill we will have played a great role in this agreement because we will have extended it. The contract will run out in May, 1979, eight or nine months from now. The Minister of Transport originally wanted to extend this term until May, 1980. Now he wants it extended to 1981. So in effect we will be negotiating the term of that contract, and the length of any contract is a damned important thing. We should think about this. Do we really not care about the fact that we are forcing people to accept a contract even though they feel they have the right to strike? Do we really think these people should not have the right to strike simply because a strike will hurt the Canadian people and damage the nation's economy? Should we ask them to give up this right to strike because of that fact?

We are not asking them to do this, but rather we are imposing a limitation on their right to strike. In return for that lost right we should give these employees something worthwhile. We should be negotiating in their favour. Instead we are negotiating against them. The minister did not tell us what the original negotiation package included. He took part in the negotiations during the last few days so he must be aware of the contents. He should tell us what the negotiation package contained in order that we can be fully aware of what we are being asked to do in this arbitrary way. He did not do that.

We can only draw the conclusion that management caused this strike simply by saying that they would not agree to the majority report of the conciliation board. We take away from the company the right to lock the workers out. On the other hand, we stop the workers from getting the benefit of a collective agreement that is to their satisfaction by bringing in this legislation. It is very easy to change the date from 1978 to 1979 or from 1980 to 1981, but it means that those workers in this union will be dissatisfied in 1979, 1980 and 1981 because we have imposed on them our will and have not given them anything to lighten their burden.

We were told in the debate on Bill C-8 about all the merits of a mediator-arbitrator. In this piece of legislation—and this bothers me to no end—we are not passing a stereotype bill but a different one. Is it going to be different for every union we have to put back to work? I do not know how the government will word the legislation for Nordair next week when it decides that they have to fly. I am not sure whether it will fly as Air Canada or as an independent company, but just as sure as shooting, my friend from Hamilton will be asked by these two ministers to do something about solving the terrible transportation problem in Nordair.

It is very hard to know what the government will do in that case. Perhaps they will appoint a mediator or an administrator, which is a method that has not been used for some time. I remember when we put dockworkers back to work under the authority of an administrator. The government took over the workers, the docks and put an army in to run the industry. If the minister thinks that he will have trouble finding an arbitrator, he will have even more trouble finding an administrator who will look after financial responsibilities, the responsibilities of operating a union as well as a company, and the responsibility of overseeing all the people he will need to operate his office.

On several occasions I had the opportunity to have dinner with some of the administrators. Charlie Millard was one of the administrators of the docks or the seaway. Somebody was required to travel with the marine workers and pilots at all times under this system. It will be very difficult if we ever have to go to that level.

There is no argument with the fact that this situation has an influence on the economy of the country, but surely if you take away from a segment of the workers in this country the privileges they normally have and adopt new legislation because it is in the public interest, then you have an obligation to compensate those workers in some way. In this case we are not looking to compensate but to punish. What was done recently with the postal workers is, in my opinion, going to backfire very badly on the government and the administration of justice in this country. As my colleague has mentioned, if it results in the police being unwilling to enforce an injunction which is granted on an emergency basis, then we are in pretty bad shape.

Every member should be concerned about such legislation. It is all right to say that the socialists stand behind labour anyway whether they are right or wrong, but in this case hon. members as individuals, if they pass this bill, are passing judgment on what will happen to this union. If hon. members have any knowledge at all of collective agreements they will see that the extension by two years of the date of termination of this contract must play an important role in the outcome of this dispute.

I am not familiar with all the problems and difficulties involved in the discussions which were held with the Minister of Labour, but I think that he has an obligation to tell parliament what the outstanding differences are. It may well be that this House in its wisdom would see fit to implement some of those requests and deny others, but it would give to the workers a contract that would be for the period they anticipated. Then the workers can get back to moving wheat in the few weeks that are available before freeze-up.

We are not only making a settlement for that period in which we would like to ship the maximum amount of grain through the seaway to the terminal points, but we are making a decision that will be binding for the next three years. If the workers do not agree then it will lead to a great deal of conflict in the seaway over the next three years, Mr. Speaker. If you are going to take what people are asking for in a reasonable way—and this is a reasonable union which has not been involved in labour disputes over the years, one which has undoubtedly weighed very seriously its reasons for going on strike—plus the solutions already given to them by the conciliation board, water them down by establishing a mediator and expect it to carry in a labour agreement for a period of two or three years, you are all nuts.

The last point that I wish to mention is the matter of a mediator. We do not use the American arbitration system which has a panel of prominent Americans and Canadians who are available to unions which sign agreements providing that they accept at the conclusion of their contract compulsory arbitration or agreed arbitration. The panel is chosen from a group of Canadians or Americans who are available and who are agreed upon by both parties. We do not have such a panel. Arbitration in Canada is a very difficult and tedious task which quite often involves people who are not entirely familiar with the law. It is unfair that there has not been consultation between both parties as to the choice of an arbitrator-mediator, or whatever the person will be called. If the government were to indicate who they had in mind, both parties could provide input as to their choice. We may have legislated about ten or 12 cases in the past 20 years, but it seems to me that we have been very fortunate in most of the instances in providing a solution that was reasonable and acceptable and not particularly opposed by either side.

Because of the haste of the decision on the post office workers, I suggest we have developed the mental attitude in this place that we believe it is our responsibility and right at any time to impose on the workers of this country, whether in the public service or the private sector, the kind of settlement we believe to be in our interests while completely disregarding the interests of management and organized labour. If we carry that attitude to any degree of irresponsibility, we will reap in great measure the abuses we are heaping on the labour movement in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Ouellet) which was agreed to on the following division:

● (2222)

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Ethier in the chair.

On clause 2—Definitions.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, there are a number of questions I should like to put. I wonder whether the first question ought to be, to which minister should I direct the questions? We have a multiminister and an acting minister. I do not mind asking both of them these questions, but I hope they both will not answer at the same time.

I will start by asking the Acting Minister of Labour to tell us what discussions have taken place between himself, on behalf of the government, and the union involved with respect to compliance or otherwise with this bill. I would also like to know whether the terms of the bill have been discussed and considered by the members of the union, and whether they have particular or specific objections to it which have been brought to the minister's attention.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, replying to a question put to him yesterday by a journalist, the union leader went on record as saying that if parliament passes a law, he will indeed obey it and he will accept the law of the land. I have not talked to him personally since the breakdown of the negotiations today, but I believe that what he said publicly was said to officials of the department today, that if parliament passes a law, he will obey the law. I am told that this message by the union leader was on radio news tonight at ten o'clock.

Mr. Fraser: Has the minister had any assurances from the management side? This bill affects the obligations and duties of management as well, and I would like the minister's assurance that there is no suggestion that we will be faced with a refusal on the part of management to go along with the law.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, this was checked in previous consultations when we felt it would be difficult to arrive at a settlement and we were given to understand by both sides, union and management, that if parliament saw fit to pass a law imposing some conditions on the settlement, they would obey the law and follow the will of parliament.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, may I ask the minister whether, on behalf of the government, he is prepared to advise the House—I am not asking him necessarily to specify who would be the arbitrator—that he has the commitment of one or more people who, if requested, are prepared to act?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, it would have been improper for me to make preliminary inquiries of people who could act if parliament were to pass such legislation. Legislation has to be approved, first of all, and passed by parliament.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Ouellet: But I can assure members of the House that the Department of Labour has a list of well-qualified people who could be contacted tomorrow and whom we could appoint. That is my own feeling. I think that upon passage of this legislation we could appoint someone.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I marvel at the constant optimism of the minister, because those were his words on Tuesday night. However, I think we are dealing with a different situation. I would ask the minister why this bill does not include the word "forthwith" with reference to the appointment of the arbitrator, as was the case in the legislation wich was before us on Tuesday evening. Can the minister give a response to that question?

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member noticed the absence of the word "forthwith."

Mr. Alexander: You are not putting anything over on us.

Mr. Ouellet: At my request, the obligation put on my shoulders by parliament will not be the straitjacket that I felt was the case with the previous legislation. I believe that in the best interest of everyone, some leeway should be given to the minister in dealing with the appointment of an appropriate person in the present case.

Mr. Fraser: Has the minister an understanding with the union and with management that there will be consultations before the arbitrator is appointed?

Mr. Ouellet: As you have probably noticed, Mr. Chairman, the current situation is different from that of the postal workers, in the sense that in this case there were extensive negotiations on the day preceding this legislation. In this respect, we will not have a mediator-arbitrator, but solely an arbitrator. This means that the person we appoint will have responsibility, as an arbitrator, of drafting a collective agreement; therefore, will not have to deal extensively with the two parties, as was the case with the previous bill which we studied in parliament.

Therefore, my responsibility is not the same this time as it was in relation to the bill dealing with CUPW. I will appoint someone in the coming hours without necessarily having extensive consultations.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I am sure it is appropriate to mention the fact that as recently as a few minutes ago, as reported on the news, CUPW said that under no circumstances will they even meet with the mediator-arbitrator whom the minister was able to appoint today.

I would like the minister's assurance that we will not face some such difficulty, and ask him to assure the House that there has been no indication that that is the difficulty in which the House might find itself. I would also like to know whether the union and management have any idea as to some of the people who might be on the minister's short list.

Mr. Ouellet: I hope that the CUPW leadership is unique and that we will not face the same type of difficulties. Indeed, the reactions of the leader of the union of postal workers is amazing, to say the least. Frankly, I hope that after the second instance they will realize that, in the interests of their membership and in the interests of the Post Office, they should sit down and deal with the mediator-arbitrator.

With relation to this bill, I have every confidence that the arbitrator will be in a position to do his work and to achieve a settlement.

Mr. Fraser: The minister touched on the fact that this will be an arbitrator, not a mediator-arbitrator. Can the minister enlarge for a moment on why, in the minister's opinion, there was no need in this case to have a mediator-arbitrator? I would like to know whether in any discussions with either of the parties there was a request for a mediator-arbitrator, as opposed to an arbitrator; that is, assuming they were going to face legislation.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, this message was not conveyed to the Department of Labour at the time the department was assisting in the negotiations. I want to assure hon. members that every avenue of negotiation has been exhausted; that, indeed, intensive negotiations took place in the last few days and it was felt that the mediation course had been explored to the fullest extent and that it was time to stop prolonging mediation and to turn to arbitration. This is why we decided to take that route.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise just what assessment the government has made of the economic damage to the country at this time, or the possible damage in the ensuing weeks if this withdrawal of service and/or lock-out were to continue? I ask this question because in questions to the Minister of Justice, either on Thursday or on Friday, I asked if any assessment had been made in advance as to what would be the economic damage to or impact on the country, and the Minister of Justice answered yes, an assessment had been made.

Could we have some report as to what that assessment is; and even if it is in written form, could it be tabled with the committee?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman—

Mr. Clark: Order.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not in order, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Lang: The reference to an assessment was to a descriptive account about the kind of damages which would occur and which would include the exact problem which exists for the Wheat Board in a tight movement of grain. It involves an assessment of various industries which might have had other sources of transportation available to them, some of which have transportation by shippers not involved directly in this strike. It involves a fairly long description of the whole range of situations, rather than any precise figures.

It is always difficult to assess in any precise way what is lost irredeemably. As I indicated, with regard to grain no doubt there have been some difficulties in terms of the postponement of shipments but, on the other hand, with Thunder Bay now full instead of relatively empty, there is a better chance of catching up and doing better in the remaining part of the season than would have been the case if the terminal had not been so full.

● (2242)

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, there has been some suggestion that the hon. minister is out of order in answering this question, but I have no personal objection to his doing so. While there was an ongoing appreciation of what the effect of this withdrawal of service would result in, there was never any formal assessment drawn up in written form which could be filed at this time. Months ago there was a preliminary review as to the amount of damage. That estimate was upgraded after several weeks, and we received a forecast as to the damage if services were withdrawn until freeze-up. Are there any formal documents which could be filed before the committee?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, there were briefing notes which were descriptive of the situation. It was important for the government to have a picture of the situation so as to assess the over-all impact, rather than an attempt at a precise measure which is impossible in any case. The picture was painted accurately in the information supplied to us. It was adequate for our purposes, but it was not information which was researched to the degree to determine what every supplier would do in all circumstances. Because of that, I would not table it. It has not been fully researched, and it is not totally accurate.

Mr. Fraser: I asked that question because we have heard a great deal tonight from the New Democratic Party indicating that this is the wrong route to take. When legislation such as this is brought suddenly before us, a relatively independent assessment of the damage has not been made available to the public beforehand. Perhaps in the future some thought might be given to making public an assessment of the damage, in order for the public to be able to measure whether the legislation is appropriate and necessary at the time it is brought before us. One must keep in mind that the New Democratic Party has indicated that this is a wrong measure. I understand that the premier of Saskatchewan requested that some quick and strong action be taken by the minister or one of his colleagues. Can the minister confirm that?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I can. There was little doubt about the understanding in western Canada, particularly in the prairies, regarding the damage which even a relatively short strike might cause. Certainly Premier Blakeney of Saskatchewan and many others sent telexes and other messages demanding that we move very quickly. They wanted to have the strike ended even before it began. That was the view of the Saskatchewan New Democratic Party.

[Mr. Lang.]

The fact of the matter is that it was not just the damage done to date, much of which is recoverable. Of course some of the damage is serious. If the strike continues much longer, the situation will become very serious. Some of the participants indicated that if a settlement was not reached soon, the season would terminate, causing irreparable damage. The catching up could be done regarding grain, assuming that there is six or seven weeks of free movement. If that does not happen, the damage will total $450 million of lost sales in that area alone.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up on the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver South. My question is directed to the Acting Minister of Labour. He is very sensitive about the word "forthwith". In fact, he was quite insistent upon that word being included in Bill C-8, resulting in the mediator-arbitrator being appointed "forthwith". Has he received a definition from the Minister of Justice of the word "forthwith"? Once a precedent has been set in terms of appointing forthwith, one must assume that it has been dealt with at some length.

The minister will have to come up with something better than suggesting that he was boxed in. This bill indicates that an arbitrator can be appointed within hours, as did Bill C-8. What is the government's definition of "forthwith"? Is there flexibility within that definition? Will the minister accept an amendment to the bill to include the word "forthwith"? I think we should be consistent.

Mr. Ouellet: If I am allowed, I should like to answer the hon. member in my mother tongue in order better to express my view on the definition of that word.

The word "forthwith" is defined in French as "immédiatement" which means that, in fact, the Minister of Labour is obliged by law to appoint, as soon as possible, that is, immediately, a mediator-arbitrator, which is what I did in the case of the act requesting all postal employees to go back to work. As the definition and scope of the word can lead to confusion, it seemed preferable to me, in this bill, not to use the word and so allow the Minister of Labour to use his discretion that there might be no constraints or erroneous interpretation.

That is why, in the bill now before us, the word "forthwith" or "immediately" does not appear, which means that I have more latitude than in the previous bill, without it meaning however that I am allowed to shirk my responsibilities. On the contrary, I intend to use my prerogative as soon as possible.

[English]

Mr. Alexander: That is one great story which I do not accept. Perhaps the Acting Minister of Labour is playing it cute right now. Bill C-8 was drawn up by the law officers of the Crown, and they found the word "forthwith" acceptable. If the minister wants to be consistent, that word should be included in the bill before us. Otherwise, it would mean that Bill C-8 is faulty.

There have been three proposed amendments already, and I think another one is coming from the Minister of Justice. Will the bill be perfect after the next amendment is introduced? Apparently bills such as this one are drafted in a hurry, and we do not know what the government is doing. It is the old knee jerk reaction. I am not attempting to be facetious. Do hon. members opposite actually know what they are doing? Will the next amendment be the final one, or must we wait until the wee hours of the morning for the law officers of the Crown to look at the bill in order to see if it is correct?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, as was indicated by the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council at six o'clock, there will be one amendment and a few consequential amendments to the bill before us. Obviously the opposition has to realize that the government, believing in collective bargaining and hoping that through honest and hardworking negotiation a settlement could be reached, did play a double role in trying to prepare legislation in advance. The legislation has been prepared, but because it was felt that the normal collective agreement process had expired we came forward with this piece of legislation. Indeed, we had to deal with this legislation quickly, and obviously there were a few things that escaped us at the moment. The hon. member should realize that the government, and perhaps this is not the point of view of the opposition, felt the collective bargaining process should go to the limit before adopting any other course of action.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I would not deny the conclusion the minister has just put before us. The Leader of the Opposition and other members have asked either the Acting Minister of Labour or the Minister of Justice about legislation. May I ask the minister how long he has had this legislation on his desk, or how long it has been on the desk of the Minister of Justice? I understand the point about not releasing the contents of proposed legislation, as that might be considered intimidation. The Leader of the Opposition and others have asked the government to move quickly in terms of legislation. The acting minister and others have talked about the collective bargaining process, and suggested that no move should be made until the process the minister has talked about had been exhausted. The minister has also talked about this legislation. I am asking how long the minister has had this legislation on his desk, or how long it has been on the desk of the Minister of Justice.

Mr. Ouellet: This legislation was prepared and finalized only today, because we realized only today it was impossible to arrive at a negotiated settlement. It would have been incorrect for us to proceed in advance with a piece of legislation until the negotiation process had been exhausted.

In order to be sure that this is the procedure followed by previous administrations, I asked officials of the Department of Labour to submit a list of major work stoppages under federal jurisdiction in previous years, and the number of days. I found out that under a previous Conservative administration there had been long strikes before any legislation was contemplated. I am not saying this in order to suggest it was wrong to act in this way. I think it is correct to allow the full process of collective bargaining to be pursued before moving to the extreme recourse of legislation by parliament. I have figures which indicate that under previous administrations the collective bargaining process was exhausted before legislative measures were contemplated. That is exactly what this government has done.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I really did not want a lecture from the Acting Minister of Labour. The minister and the government are confused in respect of the involvement of esential aspects of public service while being concerned about the collective bargaining process. Speaking personally, I think what should take precedence and be of first concern to the minister is the public interest. It is for this reason that we find ourselves in a box today. The government has not found a solution to labour-management disputes. We have suggested the Public Interest Disputes Commission. This government allowed the post office strike to carry on for some 43 days. The Prime Minister said he could not care less if the strike continued until Christmas, and a former postmaster general, the Hon. Bryce Mackasey, said the employees could stay out until Easter.

There is another important matter here and I do not understand why it is not referred to in this bill. In Bill C-8 there was provision for the mediator-arbitrator to report to the Minister of Labour. Under this bill there is no indication, as far as I can determine, of any reporting procedure. Under Bill C-8 a report is to be made to the minister within 90 days. Why was that particular provision left out of this measure, or is there any reason for that?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes. We could deal with this when we reach our consideration of clause 6. Basically the reason a mediator-arbitrator was prescribed in the bill in relation to the postal workers was that we felt the government ought to allow mediation and consultation to take place before an arbitrator came forward with a collective agreement. The argument put forward by postal employees has been that negotiations have not taken place to their satisfaction.

In relation to this case, the negotiations were extensive. In fact, negotiations were exhaustive. Mediation was carried on during the last four or five days, and it was felt, therefore, that mediation had been taken to its limit and that the only other process to be followed was arbitration. That is why in this bill we deal exclusively with arbitration. This means that the person we appoint as the arbitrator will have only one responsibility, and that is to draft a new collective agreement for the marine engineers.

Mr. Alexander: I noticed that in Bill C-8 there was reference to the Anti-Inflation Act. The minister must be aware of the obvious ramifications and complexities following that insertion, yet in this bill, unless this has escaped me, there is no such reference to the Anti-Inflation Act. Would the minister clear that matter up for us? In Bill C-8 we have gone even further than we on this side would like to talk about, and that is the dictating of terms. To be consistent, this bill might have followed that precedent, unless the minister has a pretty good reason for leaving it out of this bill yet including the reference in Bill C-8.

Mr. Ouellet: There is an excellent reason, and that is that there is no period governed by this collective agreement we are considering tonight that falls under the Anti-Inflation Act. When we were discussing the other bill we were considering a lengthy period governed by that act, and that is why in the previous measure we had to take this into account.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, assuming that the legislation is passed tonight, and assuming that the workers obey the order, would the minister give us an indication when we might expect the 122 ships now tied up to resume normal operations?

Mr. Ouellet: My understanding is that because of the agreement which took place between the employers and the deck officers over the weekend some movement is already under way. Hopefully, if parliament is able to pass this legislation in a very short time this evening it will allow the other place to deal with this bill and some operations could be resumed by tomorrow afternoon and normal activity in the few days following.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, I have a press report here which indicates that the deck officers have not as yet ratified their tentative agreement, and I believe that that is correct. Assuming the worst in this particular case, in the event the deck officers do not ratify the tentative agreement, is there anything in this legislation that would cover a back to work order for the deck officers?

Also, while the minister is considering that question, the press report indicates that while the deck officers are prepared to go back to work prior to the ratification, there seems to be an indication that they are not prepared to go back to work until the marine engineers settle. Perhaps the hon. minister may wish to comment on that as well.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member in his second remark almost answered his first question, and that is that the deck officers are ready to go back to work in advance of ratifying their agreement. They have also indicated that as soon as the marine engineers go back all problems will be solved. We believe that if this legislation could be passed within a half hour or so, possibly the other place could deal with it in time to have this bill in effect no later than tomorrow and have operations on the lakes resume within a couple of hours.

[Mr. Alexander.]

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, the minister is assuming that the deck officers are going to ratify their tentative contract. What happens in the event that this is not forthcoming?

Mr. Ouellet: The ballots will not be counted before the month of December, according to my information. By that time I suspect that the seaway will be closed and it will no longer be the same problem we are facing tonight.

Mr. Mazankowski: In the event that a settlement is arbitrated for the engineers and it is higher than what is being proposed in the tentative settlement for the deck officers, we may have another issue on our hands; am I not correct?

Mr. Ouellet: I appreciate the question of the hon. member, Mr. Chairman, but he must realize that it is very hypothetical and that I cannot answer it at this time.

Mr. Mazankowski: That is consistent with the kind of answers we have been getting on this side of the House to the questions we have been posing to the minister. Every question we pose seems to be hypothetical, but it is quite obvious that our hypothesis has come true.

I would like to ask another question, Mr. Chairman, which has to do with another matter. It concerns the union and the fact that they are wanting written guarantees that there will be no reprisals or actions against union leaders for strike related incidents. I notice in the postal bill that there is provision for this particular matter, but I do not see it in the bill that is before us right now. Is the minister concerned about that, and is he aware that this is one of the issues? We have heard a lot about money being the big issue, but this particular written assurance seems to be a matter which is concerning the union as well.

Mr. Ouellet: I think there is a clause dealing with this. We are trying to find it. Indeed, it is a clause which ought automatically to be there.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Chairman, if I might help the minister, it would be similar to clause 4 in the Post Office bill.

Mr. Ouellet: I think it is on page 2, subclauses 4 and 5, at the bottom.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, I am seeking some clarification. The hon. member for Vegreville was concerned about the protection of the employees, but the minister referred to a section in the proposed bill, subsection (5) of section 3:

> No person shall in any manner impede or prevent any person to whom subsection (4) applies from complying with that subsection.

Mr. Peters: You're out of order. We are not dealing with that yet.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, we are asking general questions in order to expedite this matter so that when we do reach this clause we can go right through it. The hon. member has made his speech, Mr. Chairman, and nobody interrupted him.

Mr. Woolliams: And voted against ending the strike.

Mr. Alexander: I did not want to say that, but I think it is quite obvious.

In the postal bill there was a section which provided as follows:

> No person acting on behalf of the employer shall
> (a) refuse to permit, authorize, or direct or authorize another person to refuse to permit or authorize, an employee who went on strike before the coming into force of this act to resume the duties of his employment forthwith; or
> (b) discharge or in any other manner discipline, or authorize or direct another person to discharge or in any other manner discipline, such an employee by reason of his having been on strike before the coming into force of this act.

Can the minister clarify why there is a difference in the wording of clause 4 of Bill C-8 and clause 5(3) of Bill C-11? We do not want to make any mistakes now, and this is a puzzle to us on this side; but knowing the minister, he will have an answer for us.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has forgotten that Bill C-8 deals with government employees who fell under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, whereas here we are dealing with employees of the private sector who fall under the Canada Labour Code. Thus the wording is not exactly the same. There are two acts which apply, and in the sections concerned they are already protected under the Canada Labour Code. It was not felt necessary that it be included in this bill.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Chairman, can the minister assure me that under the provisions of this bill the employees will acquire and receive the same protection, not more or less, as was provided in the terms of Bill C-8?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the Acting Minister of Labour could think this committee would complete dealing with this bill within a half hour and that the Senate could deal with it tonight. That is physically impossible. I have a number of matters that I want to raise, and I would like to raise them now so that the officials of the department may consider them in the hope constructive amendments may be made to a bill which I consider to be singularly deficient.

I am rather surprised at the NDP who seem to have abandoned ship, except for one caretaker over there. I guess that attitude was engendered after it was pointed out that the premier of Saskatchewan specifically asked for this type of legislation. Now they are silent.

There are several areas in the bill where the rights of workers are in jeopardy. It may have been sheer oversight because of the haste in which the legislation was drawn up, or it may display an attitude on the part of this government, namely that, notwithstanding their sanctimonious words about believing in collective bargaining and the rights of labour, they do not really believe in that at all.

It may display an attitude on the part of this government that, notwithstanding their sanctimonious words about believing in collective bargaining and the rights of labour, they really do not believe it.

I point out to the government that, contrasted with the manner in which matters of this nature were dealt with by the government of the right hon. member for Prince Albert, this legislation and the legislation for the Post Office completely negates any collective bargaining such as was, for instance, displayed in a bill introduced in December, 1960, which required the CNR to continue operating but at the same time required collective bargaining to continue. The caretaker here tonight for the New Democratic Party will remember that bill. Parliament dealt with the situation by continuing the collective bargaining process.

The Acting Minister of Labour has said that under this legislation the arbitrator will have to draft a collective agreement. He said that twice. But that is not my understanding of the legislation. I understand that matters in dispute between the parties are to be referred to the arbitrator, who then has to make a decision and that decision will constitute amendments to the existing agreement. There is no question of drafting a new agreement; all the arbitrator will do is amend.

One of the most disturbing features of the bill—and I hope the government will consider amendments in this area—is that the arbitrator is not required, by the legislation, to consult with labour or management either to determine the matters in issue between the parties or to hear from them with respect to how those issues are to be resolved. My understanding of the Post Office bill is that that process is followed and there is a right to be heard. In essence, this denial to both sides to be heard is a denial of the rules of natural justice, with which I am sure the Minister of Justice will be familiar although there have been occasions in the past when I doubted that. One of those was with reference to the prairie grain assistance act, where the statute used a term about paying the farmers, but the minister interpreted that as meaning no obligation to give those farmers any advance payment for wheat. There is a denial of natural justice here.

I suggest that the government examine clause 6. Surely, there should be incorporated in this clause the right of the parties to be heard before the arbitrator decides on the matter at issue. Clause 6(1)(a), under which the minister appoints an arbitrator, gives that arbitrator power to decide what matters are to be decided by him. It makes no provision for input by the union or by management. It may be that there are issues not covered by the conciliation report that should be determined under this legislation. Input from both sides should be considered, and there should be input from both sides—within a strict time limit, if you will—providing the parties the right to be heard on those issues. Anything less than that is, surely, a denial of the rule of natural justice. It may be said that if we have that, it will lengthen the process and delay action under the bill. I suggest not, because clause 3 is quite explicit in requiring the shippers to ship and the workers to work until the decisions are made.

I agree with my colleagues who have raised the point about imposing a time limit within which the arbitrator is to be appointed. Whether the word "forthwith" is used, or "immediately", I say a far more serious objection to imposing no time limit has been raised by my colleagues, because if one looks at clause 6(3) it appears that the arbitrator must make his decision on the matters at issue within 60 days after the date of the reference to him. It seems to me that any delay in appointing the arbitrator will reverberate all down the line. The postal bill used a 90-day term. I suggest a limitation period be laid down in this respect.

One does not have to use the word "forthwith". It could be two days, or five days, but a limitation should be placed on the appointment because that appointment triggers subclause 3 of clause 6.

The hon. member for Vegreville raised the point about reporting. That is clearly set out in the postal bill. In my opinion, this is one of the weakest clauses of the bill. Subclause 3 of clause 6 reads in part as follows:

—the arbitrator shall be required to decide all matters referred to him under this act within 60 days of his appointment.

My first observation concerns the words "be required". Required by whom? Does it require the minister's request before the arbitrator has to report? If not, why are those words there? Why could not it read, the arbitrator "shall decide all matters referred under this act within 60 days of his appointment"? Are the words superfluous, or do they require expanded explanation, placing an obligation on some minister to require that report?

With regard to clause 7(1), Mr. Chairman, one of the rules of natural justice respecting tribunals such as this—this might strike a chord in the memory of the Acting Minister of Labour—is that the report is in writing. There is no such requirement here. Another is that the report is made to a particular body and communicated to the parties. In this bill, we give power to the arbitrator to make decisions on matters that he deems to be at issue between the parties, without hearing the parties, and then a provision in the bill might require him to report. But even if he is required to report, to whom is the report to be made? Is it to the minister? There is no mention of that in the bill. Surely the arbitrator should be required to report to both union and management as a matter of course. I suggest it is the right of the parties to be informed of the decisions in writing.

A far more serious defect in the legislation occurs in the closing lines of subclause (1) of clause 7. If the whole of the clause is read, it will be seen that when the arbitrator decides all matters referred to him by the minister, the collective agreement to which this act applies is deemed to be amended by the incorporation of those decisions in the agreement and all such other amendments as are agreed upon by the parties prior to the decision of the arbitrator, and the collective agreement as so amended constitutes a new collective agreement. By clause 4 the agreement is extended to 1981. Subclause (2) of clause 4 makes it a collective agreement not capable of future amendment if read in conjuction with subclause (1) of clause 7.

There is no way, even if the parties mutually agree, after the arbitrator's report that that collective agreement can be amended because the provisions of the Canada Labour Code are suspended by reading clause 4 and clause 7 together. That should be made clear so that the union and management are not denied the right to come to mutually agreed upon amendments after the arbitrator makes his decision. That is certainly not in the legislation now. Again, that is a very serious deficiency in the bill.

We on this side of the House are in full accord with the expression of the laws contained in clause 3. We have to get shipping moving and the workers back to work. However, when one looks at clause 8 and clause 9 and compares them with the law on injunctions, a subject matter about which the minister may still remember a few principles, one will see that there are very serious deficiencies indeed.

First, it is my submission to the government that clause 8(1) divests the court of any discretion in the matter of granting an injunction. As a personal viewpoint, I will concur with the approach that the Federal Court, upon a proper application being made, shall be required to issue an injunction. However, surely the terms upon which the court issues that injunction are still a matter of discretion for the court. Not so by clause 8 of this legislation. The injunction shall—and that is a mandatory term—be granted, and it shall direct any company or union to comply with the provisions of this act. That is all.

It shall also be a provision that they may be cited for contempt of the injunction and punished as contempts are usually punished. Surely there should be a provision in that clause that the court shall issue an injunction upon such terms as the court may deem just. That discretion should reside in the judicial bodies that we have set up throughout the country for the purpose of safeguarding the rights and liberties of all.

By permitting the legislation to remain in these terms, you take that discretion away from the court. I see the minister shaking his head, indicating that that is not the intention. I am not accusing the government of saying that it was their intention, but that is the effect of that clause. The jurisdiction is mandatory in the sense that the court may grant an injunction only in the terms set out in clause 8, and none other.

Mr. Benjamin: Are you going to rewrite the bill?

Mr. Nielsen: I am just making the suggestion. I see the champions of the workers are back in their seats, the hon. member for Nickel Belt and the hon. member for Regina-Lake Centre. We now have more; we have five. The emergency was declared. The bells rang.

An hon. Member: You voted for it.

Mr. Nielsen: I will vote for this kind of legislation, but it certainly should be cleaned up in the interest of protecting the working man. I am sure the New Democratic Party will agree with that. They have not spoken in the detail I have this evening. I think that is an oversight on their part.

I submit to the government that there should be an appeal prior to the citation and contempt proceedings. That appeal now exists in the law of injunctions. A person against whom an injunction is issued can appeal the injunction. The liberty is always there to apply to have the terms of the injunction carried before the imposition of any punishment or citation. That should be retained.

There is a serious deficiency in clause 8. I sometimes think that even those speaking in detail on matters important do not have the courtesy of listening, and one is just a voice in the wilderness in this institution. I am waiting for the attention of the Acting Minister of Labour; I am sure he is interested. I am sure the government members will be courteous enough to allow me to speak so that I can be heard. I thank the Lord and others that the Acting Minister of Justice is back in his seat. I refer to subclause (2) of clause 8, line 5, and here I direct my remarks to a lawyer, the Acting Minister of Justice. I quote:

> Any company or union cited and punished for contempt of court under subsection (1) may appeal from the conviction, or against the punishment imposed, to the Federal Court of Appeal in accordance with such directions,—

What directions? The only possible reference that that phrase can have appears in the previous subclause where the word is used on the bottom line of the page. I will quote the full sentence:

> —the court shall issue an injunction directing any company or union named or described therein that has failed or refused to comply with any provision of this act forthwith to comply with that provision and any company or union that fails or refuses to comply with any injunction issued by the court under this section that is directed to it—

Therefore that phrase in clause 8(2) does not refer to any directions at all. I hope the Minister of Justice takes note of that point. Because there are no directions, that subclause should be amended.

I do not know how the government can make any sense out of clause 9(3). Clause 9(1) reads:

> For the purposes of section 8 and this section, a union shall be deemed to be a person.

If you try to read in the word "pension" in substitution for the word "union" in subclause (3), the clause makes no sense whatsoever.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please. I regret I must interrupt the hon. member for Yukon but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Justice to be kind to two people. The first is the hon. member who just resumed his seat who will obviously be here for some time making the proposals he has mentioned. Further, I would ask the minister to be kind to those who sit in the other place and tell them that tomorrow will probably be soon enough. I say this so that we shall not repeat the procedure we followed the other night. I am impressed by their new found interest on behalf of the working people of this country.

I am not surprised that Premier Blakeney should have got in touch with the Minister of Transport to urge that something be done to get wheat moving through the seaway. He is no doubt well aware that members of the House of Commons will look after the proposition that this be done properly and fairly no matter what the legislation says.

The point I am making is this. If we are to send everyone back to work through legislation, we should develop legislation of a formal kind. I am impressed by the acting minister's knowledge of collective agreements and the difference between the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the Canada Labour Code. They do contain distinctions which a number of hon. members to my right have missed. The next case we shall be considering will perhaps be that of Nordair. Members of parliament and others who fly Nordair, as distinct from those who travel to the south, will no doubt feel that this essential service ought to be maintained. As I say, we should be developing a more sensible piece of legislation.

An important part of the bill before us concerns the signing of an agreement by the first mates and deck officers; there is really no great hurry about this since it is not likely that the vote on the decision they are making will take place before freeze-up.

There is another point which occurs to me. Will the union itself have a role to play in the recall of the officers should this legislation be passed? According to one of the clauses it seems we have limited the right of the union to take part in the orderly recall of its members, though the company is requested to recall its officers, presumably in some order, under a provision which seems to be contrary to what is contained in clause 5.

I understand the minister and his advisers took part in mediation efforts on the basis of the report of the arbitration board. Were any negotiations conducted on the basis of relating the two contracts so as to arrive at this date of 1981? We find here a two and a half year contract where there was really only a six months contract left to be negotiated. I am, of course, interested in the appointment of the arbitrator.

The minister has indicated that the department is in the possession of a list of some kind and that there are qualified people who may be available for this task. His work is likely to be easier in this case than in the case of other disputes in which the House has been dealing. As hon. members know, the parties have already carried out a process of negotiation and a conciliation board has come up with a report, probably a majority report. Was any attempt made to implement that majority report—I assume it was in favour of the workers—rather than go the route proposed by this legislation? The parties have followed the due process of the law and the facts which were available to the conciliation board are the only facts which will be available to the arbitrator. So we are really taking two kicks at the same cat and the result will probably be the same.

Was any consideration given to bringing down legislation with a simple back to work clause in accordance with the majority decision of the conciliation board, the price being a three-year contract rather than a one-year contract? Why was not such a bill introduced rather than the legislation before us, which recalls the type of law we passed with application to the postal service in a totally different field? In my view the case could be served by a few clauses inserted into the Canada Labour Code to cover this dispute.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, I should like to withdraw a suggestion I made with respect to subclause (2) of clause 8. I misread the clause.

Mr. Ouellet: I am glad the hon. member for Yukon has had a chance to read the bill more thoroughly. In the circumstances it is not necessary now for me to reply to him.

In answer to the hon. member for Timiskaming, I would like to say that indeed the employees have the full protection of the Canada Labour Code, and by the extension of the collective agreement the employees will still be protected to the fullest extent. I am told that many of the employees are still on ships, and as soon as the union withdraws its strike call or as soon as this legislation is passed, those who are not already on ships will, I expect, report back to their respective ships immediately.

With relation to the extension of the collective agreement, I must say that the collective agreement was the same for the marine engineers as it was for the deck officers. During the course of the extensive negotiations the deck officers, along with the employers—following the conciliation board report—decided to extend the collective agreement a third year. It was agreed between the parties that the collective agreement be extended a third year. That is why we would like to include in this legislation the provision that the arbitrator, after having discussions with the parties, has the option to extend this collective agreement to coincide with the agreement which has just been signed by the employers and the deck officers for a three-year contract.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, this legislation will extend it. There is a clause which says that that is fixed and it cannot be changed. We have had other back-to-work legislation before us. The question really has been resolved because the price paid for having the company accept the conciliation board report was the extension of the contract. I do not see why we do not just implement the conciliation board report. The extension would be the same, and the problem could be solved tonight.

This method has been used before. It was not necessary to go through protracted negotiations, because anything can happen if we take this route. Almost anything can happen, and usually does, and conflict is caused every time. In the other case one question would be facing the workers. The question would be whether to accept it or not; but there would not be any additional friction. The simpler we make our back-to-work legislation, the better; but it should be fair. I see very little role for the arbitrator in this case, with the exception of the implementation of the conciliation board report. We will have extended the contract, and for that reason I do not know why we have added things such as preventing the union from counselling workers not to return to work. We have written things into this legislation which the minister indicates are really not necessary.

Mr. Ouellet: I must say that events took place after the tabling of the conciliation board report which had to be taken into consideration by the government in presenting this legislation. If nothing had taken place since the time of the presentation of the conciliation board report, perhaps the suggestion of the hon. member could be entertained. But the fact is that in the meantime a collective agreement was signed by the deck officers and the employers and this collective agreement is beyond the terms of the collective agreement which was foreseen, studied and reported by the conciliation board.

Therefore, it is a new ball game. There is a different perspective and we have to take this into account because we do not want to take one side or the other. We feel that the fair approach is to appoint an arbitrator who will decide.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Chairman, my question is to the Minister of Transport. I would like to ask the minister what contingency plans he has, or whether he has any, in the event that grain is not moving on the Great Lakes within a very short time.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I do not have at hand the plans of the Canadian Wheat Board in this regard, but I can certainly inquire and obtain details for hon. members. The Canadian Wheat Board is always very alert to the challenge which a situation like this places before it, and it will be trying to do everything possible to maximize the through-put of grain to the east in order to make up for any delay which has been caused.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): I would like to ask the minister to make one suggestion to the Canadian Wheat Board. That suggestion is to direct the Sir John A. Macdonald icebreaker to keep the port of Churchill open for an indefinite period this winter. The studies which have been done so far have proved that the port can be a viable operation if an icebreaker is in attendance to accompany ships in and out of the harbour of Churchill.

Let us keep in mind that the port of Churchill can be very efficient during the winter and that the rail line to Churchill is maintained and capable of moving grain out of Saskatchewan to that port. I would be grateful if that contingency plan could be forwarded by the minister to the Canadian Wheat Board.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I see two difficulties. There is no indication that any vessel owner would want to send a vessel on that route, even if an icebreaker were provided. Second, our icebreaking fleet is fairly occupied with other duties throughout any given winter. We are acquiring additional icebreaker strength. Another day may dawn in that regard, but it would not be practical this year.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask just one question of the Acting Minister of Labour, and one question of the Minister of Justice. I have not had much time to read the bill, but I have listened to the questions and answers. Is either minister satisfied that this bill contains enough sanctions to ensure that whatever labour group is involved, produce and goods—grain in particular—will move?

In my second question I will come right to the point. It has to do with the process of collective bargaining and the arbitrator so that labour is protected. Forgetting about all the nit-picking, can we in the opposition be satisfied on those two points?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I very much appreciate the concern of the hon. member and I think I can answer both his questions. There is a clause in the bill to which I want to draw his attention. It is on page 4, and it has to do with the powers of the arbitrator. Clause 6(2) reads in part as follows:

—all the powers and duties of an arbitrator under section 157 of the Canada Labour Code.

Part of section 157 of the Canada Labour Code provides:

An arbitrator or arbitration board

(a) shall determine his or its own procedure, but shall give full opportunity to the parties to the proceeding to present evidence and make submissions to him or it—

Mr. Woolliams: After assent, assuming this bill is passed by this House and the other place tonight, how long will it be before the workers are back to work moving grain and other produce, which is so important to the economy of the nation? The minister has left the impression that the law will be obeyed.

Mr. Ouellet: As you can see, sir, it is approaching midnight. Because of that, and because of the intention of this House to proceed tonight and to have this legislation come into force as soon as possible, when we come to clause 10 we intend to bring in an amendment which will allow the legislation to come into force eight hours after royal assent.

Mr. Ritchie: I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It would appear that management quickly threw in the towel at a time when they have six weeks of very good shipping and the most profitable portion of the year ahead of them. Apparently they regard the proposed settlement as being too rich. Will it be necessary to raise the rates? Will they be squeezed by this settlement? What consideration has the government given to this aspect?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I would want to comment on what the terms of the settlement may be as it is eventually developed by the arbitration process under this bill. Obviously the shipowners will have to take into account the settlements they have achieved with their other unions, and that will be a part of their over-all costs. I have not obtained from them, nor even from the Wheat Board, any estimate of what that will mean with regard to the over-all cost of the movement of goods.

Mr. Ritchie: Would the minister then hazard a guess or give an opinion as to whether this will not be fairly expensive and will result in substantially increased tariffs in the next year or two?

Mr. Lang: I cannot really comment on this bill and its impact because, after all, the arbitrator will have to do his work. I would need some calculations from either the shipowners or the Wheat Board of the impact of the other settlements which are now apparently in place and certainly agreed upon. Perhaps that would be helpful to the hon. member.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I will be very brief. What really concerns me this evening, as we are going late into the night, is that on many occasions in the last seven or eight years that I have been a member of the House we have had to deal with major labour disputes in the country, and thus we have essentially turned this legislative assembly into a labour court. I think it is about time that the government realized that this is not a labour court—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blackburn: —that this is not the place to waste time talking about specific labour disputes relating to national problems. Until the government on the other side realizes that it cannot fob off its responsibility to resolve labour disputes on us on this side of the House, until it realizes it is its responsibility to settle these disputes, we will not be any further ahead. Why should the government waste our time and the time of the House of Commons?

I would like to make one suggestion to the Minister of Transport and the Acting Minister of Labour and ask them when both of them will bring in a bill to debate in the House the establishment of a labour court in the country outside of the House of Commons which will resolve problems relating—

Mr. Rodriguez: No, no way.

Mr. Blackburn: Yes. When will the ministers bring in a bill to the House which all parties can debate, one which will establish a labour court in this country to deal with federal interprovincial and national labour disputes, so we can take this nonsense out of the House? It is almost midnight now. We are not here tonight acting as members of parliament; we are acting as labour arbitrators, and we are not in that position. How many members in the House tonight are experts in labour negotiations? I suppose we could find seven, eight or ten at the most out of the 264 of us. When will we get federal labour problems out of the House and into a labour court in this country which will deal with major labour problems, whether it is a mail strike, a railway strike, a grain handling strike or a Great Lakes shipping strike? That is what I am concerned about and that is what people in my riding are concerned about.

I worked on the Great Lakes as a short-order cook 23 years ago. When will we get this damned thing out of the House and before a labour court where it belongs? We are wasting the country's time sitting here tonight until midnight. I ask the minister: What is he prepared to do specifically to change this stupid, archaic, partisan system, so that we can get rid of this kind of nonsense and get it somewhere where it makes sense?

Mr. Ouellet: I think it should be put on record that in any industrial society there will be strikes, whether or not legislation provides for the right to strike. The hon. member indicated—

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I am not opposed to the right to strike.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order, please.

Mr. Ouellet: The hon. member indicated he would like to see these disputes referred to a labour tribunal rather than be dealt with in the House of Commons. I want to remind members who are here tonight, as well as those who are watching us—if there are still people watching us at this time—that the news media, and consequently the public, are not interested in the record of over 90 per cent of labour disputes that have been referred to the Department of Labour after an impasse had been reached and that have been dealt with successfully through mediation and with the assistance of the Department of Labour. All of these cases are not referred to the House of Commons. It is only some specific and particular cases which are referred to parliament.

It has been the philosophy of the current government that when an individual right becomes a public wrong, the government faces its responsibility squarely. It does not hide behind any labour tribunal or public interest dispute tribunal that might be proposed. Parliament is asked to accept its responsibilities and terminate this dispute. That is what we are doing here, and I think it is our responsibility as members of parliament to do it.

However, I agree with the hon. member that this recourse should not be abused. Unfortunately, I must say that mass hysteria concerning strikes and the belief that permanent legislation could end strikes is completely out of order. I think it is illogical to believe that some group, some tribunal or some public interest dispute tribunal could solve the problem. I do not think we can consider such a solution. I think that basically we must believe in the due process of collective bargaining, and only on special occasions should we ask parliament to intervene, as we are forced to do today. It is regrettable that we must do it, but sometimes we must.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I do not disagree totally with what the minister said. What positive suggestion does the minister have to facilitate this type of bargaining? How can we eventually reduce confrontation in this country? Would the minister elaborate at this time as to exactly what is proposed to overcome using this chamber as a labour court? Can the minister propose something better? I am ready to listen to the minister for the next hour.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I should not like to abuse the time of the House, even though I appreciate the offer of the hon. member. I will have other occasions to make my thoughts known by the House and the public. Indeed I will assure the hon. member of copies of my comments.

Mr. Blackburn: Will the minister provide this side of the House with two minutes to elaborate on his answer concerning a solution to these very, very difficult problems in Canada? I am not asking for the minister to continue for an hour, as I said facetiously a few minutes ago. Will he indicate in what direction the government is going?

Mr. Ouellet: The direction of the government is very well known. The Department of Labour has promoted a series of meetings between management and labour in order for both parties to better understand each other. We advocated a series of seminars to analyse the situation and arrive at solutions to the problems. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce today referred to a recently published report of his department. The Department of Labour, union representatives and the representatives of management have been involved in bringing about these studies. Because of the joint effort directed toward bringing the parties together, much progress has been made. The Department of Labour will continue in that direction.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Labour. One must recall the previous back to work legislation which was passed by the House. The first time I participated was in 1973 when the railway workers were put back to work. That legislation contained a clause which provided a money award, and arbitration was to follow on other issues. There were amendments from all sides of the floor to increase the amount, and the argument was raised that we were not here to conduct a collective bargaining process. The air traffic controllers strike followed, which resulted in legislation that was actually a collective bargaining agreement. We dealt with the classification of workers, rates of pay and overtime.

I agree with the minister, that we should not be dealing with collective bargaining at this level, except on the odd occasion. Since we are dealing with the private sector at this time under the Canada Labour Code, perhaps a clause should have been included within the back to work legislation to provide a cash settlement for the workers. Perhaps that cash settlement would be turned down by the employer, but we must remember that the dispute concerns money. Why was no cash settlement included in the legislation? Would it not be a disincentive to employers? Perhaps they would not want to come before parliament again if we were not their stoolie.

Mr. Ouellet: Obviously there are two ways of looking at this question. In some instances a conciliation board report is looked at by some people as being very interesting. In other instances, such a report can be looked at as a very discouraging one. Sometimes it is good, sometimes it is bad. Obviously we are following the general approach. Perhaps it is wiser to follow our course, rather than refer the matter to arbitration.

Mr. Rodriguez: In this particular case, the conciliation board recommended a settlement which was rejected by the employer. Then the employer proceeded to lock out the workers. In effect, the legislation was precipitated by the employer. Therefore, I find it rather passing strange that the minister did not include a cash settlement in the legislation before us. If the workers had precipitated the legislation, then benefit would have accrued to the other side. I see the minister nodding. Why was there no cash settlement?

Mr. Ouellet: According to my information, both parties rejected the conciliation board report. The employer as well as the employees was not satisfied. Obviously the employer thought that it was too much and the employees thought that it was not enough. This piece of legislation provides both parties with an opportunity to present their points of view, and an arbitrator to evaluate their representations.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Chairman, I should like to continue on the theme I embarked upon a few moments ago. In Canada we are faced with problems related to the grain handlers, engineers and skippers on the Great Lakes, and to the general work force. My question is directed to the Minister of Transport and the Acting Minister of Labour. We have reached a point where we are creating in Canada today a growing number of terribly dissatisfied male and female workers. For example, millions of dollars can be put into job creation, but millions of dollars cannot be put into job happiness.

Usually, we in this House can enjoy our job, work five days a week here and then go home and do the things we want to do on weekends. We look after the things under our control as members of parliament while we are here, and we assume that the people who have to fill the ships, fill the hopper cars and look after the transportation system are able to do the same thing.

What is really fundamental is that we in this chamber, which is the most powerful legislative chamber in this country, do everything we can to make work more meaningful for the people of this country. Perhaps I am saying the wrong thing, and maybe I am even out of order.

An hon. Member: You are.

Mr. Blackburn: The point is that neglect in this regard comes back to haunt us, and will haunt us for the next decade and perhaps even the next generation. We have an opportunity tonight, and every day, to humanize the work of the working force in this country. Unless we, as the elected members of parliament, attempt once again to humanize work, we will be failing in our responsibilities.

Many members, over there, as well as on this side, did all kinds of jobs when we were young; and unless we do something to humanize those kinds of jobs, we will be in trouble. Let me give a few examples. You can go to the assembly line at Massey-Ferguson in Brantford and see the kind of work I have in mind. I worked for a steamship line for a number of years as a short-order cook. That was a human job at that time, but today it is not. I worked on a section gang for the CNR. That was a very important job in those days. We are losing the demand for and the responsibility involved in that kind of a job, and we are losing respect for an honest day's work.

What are hon. members on the other side of the House doing to rehumanize the idea of a good day's work? What are hon. members over there trying to do, in real terms, to bring humanity back to the work force? What they are doing is buying more computers, more mechanical aids and more machines. This is what we are talking about tonight. We are talking about people; we are not talking about a bill. Bills come and go, but we are talking about human beings. It is about time the Minister of Transport and the Acting Minister of Labour, wherever he is now, started to think in terms of human beings in this country, rather than numbers. We should be talking in terms of human beings, rather than social insurance numbers and income tax numbers. We are talking about people, and it is about time we in this House started to think in terms of human beings, rather than in terms of numbers. I do not know whether I have asked a question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blackburn: You can laugh at me all you want, but I ask the Minister of Transport to stand up right now and give a human answer to a human question.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, tempting as it would be to get into that very important subject—and it is much broader in scope than this bill—I suggest that the Minister of Labour would like on another occasion to deal with it at greater length in order that he might do justice to the important points that have been made.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On clause 4—Term of collective agreement extended.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move an amendment to clause 4. I would move:

That Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 4 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"1978, and expiring on May 31, 1979, and may be further extended by the arbitrator to include the period beginning on June 1, 1979, and expiring on a day not later than May 31, 1981."

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the proposed amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: All those in favour will please rise. All those opposed will please rise.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to: Yeas, 65; Nays 5.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment carried.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I have several amendments to clause 4. The next amendment is a technical one to the French version. I move:

That the French version of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 6 on page 3 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"fiée par la présente loi ou en vertu de cette dernière, prennent effet et lient"

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said amendment?

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I would move:

That Bill C-11 be amended

(a) by striking out line 9 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"for the period by which the collective agreement is extended by subsection 4(1) and, if the arbitrator further extends that period pursuant to that subsection, for that further period"; and

(b) by striking out line 15 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"by or pursuant to this act where the term of the"—

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Hon. members have heard the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the said amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, those are the consequential amendments.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 4 as amended carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: On division.

Clause 4 as amended agreed to.

On clause 5—Strikes and lock-outs prohibited.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, again I would move a consequential amendment as follows:

That Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 19 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"by or pursuant to subsection 4(1),"—

● (0022)

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Does the committee agree to accept the amendment as presented?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

[The Assistant Deputy Chairman.]

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Arbitration.

Mr. Lang: I move:

(a) by striking out line 37 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"(a) appoint an arbitrator and refer to him the further extension of the term of the collective agreement to which this act applies to include the period referred to in subsection 4(1) and"; and

(b) by striking out lines 39 to 42 on page 3 and substituting the following:

"of the collective agreement that in the opinion of the arbitrator,"

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 6, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 7—Incorporation in agreement of decisions of arbitrator.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, I have a technical amendment to the French version which is identical in effect to the amendment moved earlier. I move:

That the French version of Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 29 on page 4 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"présente loi ou en vertu de cette dernière, sauf les clauses qui portent sur"

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 7, as amended, carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 agreed to.

On Clause 9—"Union".

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, we discussed this previously, but in relation to clause 9(2) and (3), what is the reason for all this verbiage? What does it do?

Mr. Ouellet: Basically, Mr. Chairman, it is in relation to the injunctions against the company and the union which will expedite and simplify the procedures.

Mr. Peters: If this section was not written in, would not the Canada Labour Code provisions, which make possible the issuing of injunctions under the code and also the penalties, not apply? I see no particular reason for this.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, if I may, it is related to a technical legal question. It is true that injunctions can lie without the specific provision, but there are some significant and technical problems in injunction procedures, and these sections in our view may allow for injunctions to be obtained without those technical problems arising.

Mr. Peters: Is this punitive in that it is something which has arisen out of the previous bill and we are now covering all bases? In other words, are we in effect working out an amendment for the Canada Labour Code because of a failure in a section of Bill C-8 that would warrant the introduction of this clause?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, it is not a result of the episode after Bill C-8. A clause along these lines has been included twice before in strike legislation, both times in the private sector as in the case here.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 9 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 10—Coming into force.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Chairman, the hour has passed twelve o'clock, and there is an interest to see this law effected as early as possible. It is designed to give the parties time to have notice of the law and is designed to have the effect of bringing the law into force eight hours after royal assent. I therefore move:

That Bill C-11 be amended by striking out line 7 on page 6 and substituting the following:

"day and eight hours after the time at which"

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Lang) agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 10 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the minister, as we are completing this bill, if any draft bill has been contemplated for the other national strike which will be taking place at Nordair?

The Deputy Chairman: Shall the bill carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Bill reported.

Mr. Ouellet moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: The question is that this bill be read the third time and so pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Ouellet), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, it seems that the Senate is prepared to study this bill immediately, and with unanimous consent, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Bussières), that we suspend the sitting until the call of the Chair.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to that. However, before we do that, I wonder if I might ask the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader what the House will be dealing with tomorrow.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, later today we will be resuming debate on second reading of the bill we were considering before we moved to the bill now before us.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have no objection to the proposal. However, I understood that the "late show" was on. Since we are here anyway, we might as well have it.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House gives its consent that we stand by to the call of the Chair. We can immediately occupy ourselves with proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 4, it being the understanding of the House that at the conclusion of those proceedings the House will rise to the call of the Chair.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT—LEGISLATION TO AMEND—LEVEL OF PENSION FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not blame those members who are leaving, since it is now 12.47 a.m. However, I want to express my pleasure that the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) is here. He agreed to stay tonight to whatever hour it might be to answer the question that I put down for this adjournment debate.

My question arises from a two-part inquiry that I put to the Minister of Veterans Affairs on Tuesday, October 17, 1978, as recorded in Hansard for that date at page 165. The first part of my question had to do with the announced review of the War Veterans Allowance Act. The second part had to do with the question of pensions for widows of disabled veterans, those pensions coming under the Pension Act.

With regard to the War Veterans Allowance Act, I can say that all of us who are interested in veterans pensions welcomed the announcement the minister made during the last session that this act was being reviewed.

It can be said that in the last number of years we have made a good many amendments to the Pension Act and, in effect, we have made many improvements in the provisions under that legislation. While we have been doing that, not much has been done to the War Veterans Allowance Act.

I could remind hon. members that the War Veterans Allowance Act was brought before parliament in the early 1930s. Its purpose at that time was to provide for veterans who did not qualify under the Pension Act under which pensions for disability are paid, something a little better than was available to the civilian population under the then old age pensions act.

I should remind the minister and others that over the years—we are talking about a period of 47 or 48 years—a great many changes have been made in pension legislation, especially for the population generally. The result is that the provisions for veterans and their survivors under the War Veterans Allowance Act are no longer much better than are available to civilians generally. One of the main differences, of course, is that the means test which applied to the old age pension back in the thirties and which was therefore carried over to the War Veterans Allowance Act no longer applies to the basic amount of the pension under the Old Age Security Act. This is one aspect which it seems to me should be looked into. I feel strongly that the time has come, so many years after the wars in which our veterans have participated, for there to be a form of guaranteed annual income for veterans at a certain age and that we would be doing a service both to veterans and to our pension legislation by abolishing a good deal of the red tape and the obstacles that are now in place.

These are just a few thoughts I offer about the War Veterans Allowance Act. I appreciate the minister's answer that when he gets the result of the review he will make suggestions about what should be done. I hope his decision will result in legislation this session, or, if action is not possible right away, in a reference to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs.

The other part of my question referred to the remaining issue in the Pension Act, the fact that when a veteran dies, if his disability pension was below 48 per cent there is no pension for his widow. We have been over this back and forth. I know all the arguments the minister can use in defence of the present position, but he knows too, particularly as the veterans of World War II are getting older, that this becomes more and more a matter of deep concern to them, and I do not think that our so-called veterans' legislation, our so-called veterans' charter, will be what it ought to be until we resolve this issue, at least to the extent of providing pro rata pensions for widows where the veteran's pension was below 48 per cent.

We have done well in getting the pension rate attached to a standard of wage in the public service. We have done well in getting a certain amount of compensation for prisoners of war both in World War II and World War I. We have done well in many of the things we have achieved with respect to veterans' legislation, and I refer now in particular to the Pension Act. However, this shortcoming still exists, and while I appreciate the fact that the other day the minister's answer seemed to imply some active consideration of the review of the War Veterans Allowance Act, he did not seem very hopeful that he would be bringing in something in this session to provide these pro rata pensions for widows where the veteran's disability pension was below 48 per cent.

I suggest to the minister that this parliament still has a number of months to go, probably into next spring or next summer, and when that time comes, it will not be good enough for the minister or for those on his side of the House to talk about what was done for veterans in the last few years. The question will be what was done in this session.

To sum up these remarks tonight, I say to the minister that what ought to be done, what the veterans would appreciate, would be to make a substantial improvement in the War Veterans Allowance Act and to amend the Pension Act to provide pro rata pensions for widows where the veteran's pension was below 48 per cent.

I hope the minister can say something encouraging. I do not expect him to announce tonight that something will be brought in tomorrow, but I hope he will tell us that these two matters will be given serious attention and consideration during this session.

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, staff of the Department of Veterans Affairs have over the past year been conducting a fundamental review of the War Veterans Allowance Act and part XI of the Civilian War Pensions and Allowances Act. During the review a detailed evaluation is to be carried out on how well the legislation meets its objectives, both in the nature and level of benefits provided to the veteran, dependants and survivors, as well as in the ways and means of determining and delivering the benefits. The examination was undertaken as a result of our recognizing, first, that the age and circumstances of the veteran and family today are very different from 1930 when the legislation was created, and second, that the methods used to administer the legislation might no longer be the most appropriate. The review is to focus on identifying opportunities for improving benefits to recipients and streamlining the administration of such benefits.

The review is reaching the stage where a report on the evaluation findings and a preliminary identification of alternative methods of achieving the objective of the legislation is due. This will not be a final document; rather, it will be a progress report permitting guidance to be given on the general direction the study should take during its concluding phases.

The question of paying pro rata pensions to widows of pensioned veterans has been raised by the hon. member many times. It has been suggested that a widow should receive a pro rata pension if her husband had been in receipt of a disability pension assessed at the rate of 47 per cent or less. Had his pension been assessed at the rate of 48 per cent or more, the surviving dependants would be pensionable. It should be remembered that a widow will be pensioned if her husband's death was attributable to service or occurred during wartime, regardless of the degree of the assessment of the disability.

I can assure the hon. member that when I have something specific to report on either of these subjects, I shall be pleased to do so.

TRANSPORT—REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, it is rather a shock for me to find myself speaking on an adjournment debate at two minutes to 1 a.m., but the subject is important. It arises out of a question I asked the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) on October 20 about the Esquimalt-Nanaimo railway. I asked him if he could assure Vancouver Islanders that this popular, and now profitable, rail service will continue beyond December 13. The minister gave me more than the usual favourable answer and told me he presumed that the remarkable increase in the number of people using the services will be taken into account in the various steps which have to be taken with regard to the future of the rail service.

This story goes back a considerable distance. It is a long story of the CPR attempting to abandon a railway that is providing passenger service, and I am sure it has happened in other cases in the country. In this case the Canadian Transport Commission in 1970 and 1973 denied the railway the petition to abandon service and ordered some improvements to take place in the promotion of the service, station improvements and provision of sufficient equipment so that they could avoid carrying passengers in the baggage section.

These ordered improvements were given no attention or minimal attention by the railway, and in fact the line deteriorated so much that the northern section had to be closed in 1975. The railway attempted to avoid necessary repairs for reopening the line. The Canadian Transport Commission ordered that the line be repaired, and it was reopened in December, 1977.

From then on it was the story of the railway trying to give such poor service that nobody would use it and the railway could use that as an excuse to close down the line. Fares were prohibitively high, much higher than bus fares and CPR fares in other places, such as from Calgary to Red Deer. The only promotional effort was the printing of a few time cards. The stations were in disrepair, often locked. Passenger inquiries had no local phone number on the island to phone for information. No food service was available, not even vending machines in either the train or in the stations. The Victoria terminal was relocated away from the city in an inaccessible suburban location. Permanent slow orders were in effect, delaying the train on every trip, without any public notification of the later schedule; thus trains were chronically and permanently behind time. No Sunday service was available, a day which has proven to be one on which there is heavy demand for service.

Predictably, the number of passengers was reduced to the very few who somehow discovered the existence of the service and could afford the exorbitant rate. The railway was given permission to discontinue service, although a one year extension of the order was granted to allow for appeal. This period expires on December 13 this year.

Local residents aware of the significant need and market demand for the service which existed have realized that they must use the service, despite the existing glaring deficiencies. Since December, 1977, thanks to an ad hoc committee which was formed by Mr. John Cooper and Mr. Win Moss to support the railway, loadings have climbed steadily to become impressive indeed. By May, loadings were regularly exceeding the capacity of the single unit available. By June the average daily loadings for the month exceeded 100 per cent of the seating capacity.

In summary, instead of the previous 8,000 to 12,000 passengers per year of recent years, this year saw loadings of over 40,000, and this in spite of the deficiencies in the service.

CPR has responded to the increased demand for service in a minimal way. The CPR action to fight against this ad hoc committee increasing the number of passengers carried has been as follows. No timetables have been available for over four months. Since this is the only company promotion for the service, it does not seem unreasonable to expect timetables, especially in view of changes in the service and fares. Slow orders keeping the train at 30 miles per hour were lifted only after public pressure. Stations have been unlocked after public pressure. Extra equipment has been added only after intense public pressure and the offer to help from B.C. rail.

Sunday service has been added but only after public pressure. After six weeks it was retained because of additional public pressure. Timetables and posters printed by an island daily and by private subscription were removed from the stations and train by order of the company, even though no timetable exists. The Canadian Pacific Railway feels no obligation toward persons who cannot board trains due to overloads, except on occasion to post signs in stations of high-use days warning potential passengers against using the train.

The new, substantially cheaper VIA fares were introduced only after they had been introduced throughout the rest of Canada first, and then only after public pressure. VIA excursion fares were not introduced until some six weeks later, when public pressure brought the matter to light. Amenities are minimal: stations have no phones; the on-board ash trays are used salmon tins; the disposal kit is an old bucket; the toilets are consistently out of order; and no on-board food service of any kind is available.

These items stress two facts. The CPR has provided service grudgingly, poorly, and only when subject to public pressure and scrutiny on a constant basis. The public response to the service, in light of the foregoing facts, underlines the very real need for the service. Certainly no one is riding because it offers luxury accommodation.

The present schedule is not adequate. It would be much more efficient to use a two-car train which each day would travel from Victoria to the north end of the island and back. One car at each end could be started at the same time. They are self-propelled. They could cater to northern Vancouver Island citizens, as well as the citizens of Victoria and its environs.

At the present time it is not possible for the railway to take this on, because there is an outstanding appeal by the British Columbia provincial government and the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas). But it is my understanding that the minister can authorize an extension of the present extension for another five years, and I ask him to do that. It would give VIA Rail time to get firm control of the passenger service on that railway. Also it would provide the time necessary to continue developing the services on the island. If the minister gives the additional five years, we are confident that the railway will be made permanent and profitable.

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just raised a problem that several members of this House have experienced in the past and will probably experience in the future. It concerns the fact that our railroads, whether Canadian National or Canadian Pacific, have too often in the past neglected passenger services for more profitable services. In fact, this is why the government established VIA Rail so as to put some order in passenger services and attempt to serve the Canadians who need these services to travel from place to place as they deserve.

[English]

As the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) points out, patronage has increased on this service over the past years as a result of the publicity generated about the service and the introduction of fare reductions this past summer. In June and July, patronage was up 130 per cent over the same period last year, and average loads during this period were around 78 persons per trip. Accordingly, on July 28, 1978, Canadian Pacific added an additional car to the train, thereby increasing capacity from 71 seats to 161 seats each way. Canadian Pacific reports that overloads have occurred only on a few weekends due to groups arriving at the station which are larger than had been indicated earlier to agents. September 30 and October 9 were two dates cited.

I should note that the president of VIA Rail inspected the facilities personally last week in order to assess problems with the current service. The Canadian Transport Commission, in its evaluation of this service, determined that it is uneconomic, and a good quality road network and bus service parallels the railway between Victoria and Courtenay. These reasons contributed to the CTC decision to allow the discontinuance.

As stated earlier, there are a number of complex legal and procedural questions relating to the commission's earlier decision and the subsequent appeal by the province of British Columbia which have a bearing on the final decision relating to this service. As the House may be aware, the matter of the B.C. appeal is still before the courts. The commission is, however, reviewing its earlier decision as a result of two applications for review. The commission will be reporting prior to December 13. This review is currently under way and the Department of Transport is assessing the matter in detail at this time.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the minister is well aware of the importance of these services, but it is obvious that the minister cannot take any action as long as the Canadian Transport Commission has not given its ruling following a review of its previous decision concerning this service. I therefore believe that the hon. member for Victoria should raise this issue again, certainly before December 13, and when the commission has given its ruling on that date, make other representations to the minister if the ruling is not favourable so that a study can be made to see what are the possibilities of maintaining this service.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: I am sure hon. members are aware that a number of successful candidates in the recent by-elections will be introduced into the House today in the usual manner. I cannot believe there could be anything more important for the House to turn its attention to; therefore, we ought to proceed to that as a matter of priority.

I will, of course, respect the time which is usually set aside for the question period and I ask for the co-operation of hon. members if they have applications pursuant to Standing Order 43. I ask them to exercise some discretion in that regard. Obviously, we ought to call those motions. If they are absolutely essential in nature, we will take them; but if certain matters can wait another day, I ask for the co-operation of hon. members because I expect it will take some minutes to introduce the new members.

I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Bob Corbett, Esq., member for the electoral district of Fundy-Royal.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of David Crombie, Esq., member for the electoral district of Rosedale.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Robert de Cotret, Esq., member for the electoral district of Ottawa Centre.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Donald J. Johnston, Esq., member for the electoral district of Westmount.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Marcel Ostiguy, Esq., member for the electoral district of Saint-Hyacinthe.

Also, I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Rob Parker, Esq., member for the electoral district of Eglinton.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Yuri Shymko, Esq., member for the electoral district of Parkdale.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Geoff Scott, Esq., member for the electoral district of Hamilton-Wentworth.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUESTED AMENDMENT TO PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on a very urgent matter, namely eligibility for unemployment insurance.

Considering that clause 57 of the regulations derived from the Unemployment Insurance Act reads as follows, and I quote:

The employment of a person in agriculture, horticulture, forestry and harvesting by an employer who

(a) pays the employee a remuneration that is less than two hundred and fifty dollars in cash in a year, or

(b) employs the employee for a period of less than twenty-five working days in a year is excepted from insurable employment.

Considering that such a rule is detrimental to the farmer who has difficulty finding labour and discriminatory to the agricultural worker who does not enjoy the same status as the industrial worker; considering that because of this unfair piece of regulation hundreds of fruit and vegetable pickers in Quebec who worked in Ontario will be deprived of unemployment insurance benefits, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay) lose no time in having clause 57 of the regulation removed so that all workers in Canada are put on an equal footing and are dealt with in a fair manner.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

ENFORCEMENT OF LAW VIS-À-VIS CUPW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I refer to the fact that the acting president of CUPW in St. John's, one Ted Rice, has stated, as quoted in the St. John's Daily News with respect to injunctions:

If they are obtained they will be defied just as the back-to-work legislation has been. Twenty-three thousand workers stayed out on strike in the face of the legislation and injunctions are even a little milder.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Rice has questioned whether a judge will award an injunction, since the big question a judge will ask is whether the Post Office can guarantee that the injunction will be obeyed; and, since there can be no guarantee, he is doubtful that any will be obtained, and since the Newfoundland Federation of Labour has pledged full co-operation and support in defying the legislation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the government explain in detail on motions how the government will ensure that any injunction is obeyed and how the government intends to enforce the law and to obtain respect for the law as a result of this massive and unprecedented defiance of the law in the courts by CUPW and the Newfoundland Federation of Labour.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity pertaining to testimony just given to the McDonald commission by former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt, investigating activities of the RCMP, testimony of the most serious nature alleging that three successive solicitors general were given both oral and written communications by Commissioner Higgitt concerning certain unusual police activities and that these cabinet ministers and the government failed to act in any way whatsoever.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick):

That the Prime Minister and the government be ordered to make available immediately to the McDonald commission all details of such oral and written communications referred to by Commissioner Higgitt; further, that the Prime Minister explain this gross negligence on the part of the government in failing to act on the former commissioner's information and completely and utterly neglecting its obvious duty to reply to the commissioner for what must be interpreted as direct requests for instructions from the political level as to how the RCMP should proceed with its various activities.

REQUEST FOR STATEMENT ON EVIDENCE GIVEN BEFORE McDONALD INQUIRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion to make under Standing Order 43 similar to that made by the hon. member for Leeds, but since this has to do with the privileges of members in the House I think it should be made in this form.

The testimony of Commissioner Higgitt of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police before the McDonald inquiry this morning raises matters, which affect the privileges of all members of the House. I would, therefore, move:

That the Prime Minister make an immediate statement on motions explaining the direct contradiction between the sworn testimony of the commissioner and previous statements made by himself and his ministers in this House, and that the Prime Minister table all written policy documents relating to this matter and referred to by the commissioner this morning.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

NEGOTIATION OF LABOUR DISPUTE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to ask the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that an impasse has been reached between CUPW and the federal government which is without foreseeable resolution, and in view of the fact that this impasse has resulted in defiance of the law by 23,000 Canadian citizens who have reason to believe that this government is out to destroy their union, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House instructs the Prime Minister to insert himself into the dispute directly by calling both parties together, without preconditions, to negotiate a solution to the outstanding differences between CUPW and the Post Office.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ACTION TO END ILLEGAL STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Whereas the Canadian Union of Postal Workers is still defying the will of Canadians as expressed by parliament, and whereas the irresponsible leadership is continuing to advise its members to defy the law of the land, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas):

That the government act forthwith to decertify the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and that all the members of the national executive of that union who have counselled sedition be charged with that crime and fired from the public payroll.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES FOR SOCIAL SERVICES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and distressing necessity.

In light of the fact that the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), who has been appointed a parliamentary secretary and, therefore, occasionally answers for government policy in the House, yesterday moved a motion directing the government to discontinue federal transfer payments to the provinces for health, welfare and social services, payments which are the very linchpin of confederation, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn):

That the House direct the Minister of Finance to make a statement on motions as to whether or not the motion by the parliamentary secretary is government policy, and whether or not the government condones such irresponsible action by a parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In my view, the question period should continue until 15 minutes after three o'clock.

Oral Questions

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EVIDENCE GIVEN BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister has to do with the testimony given this morning to the McDonald royal commission by former RCMP Commissioner Higgitt who is reported as having said that he told three previous solicitors general that members of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police security service were breaking the law in carrying out their duties.

The Prime Minister will recall that on June 21, 1977, in this House, on a question of privilege, the Minister of Supply and Services said:

Not once, in my 23 months as Solicitor General, did any RCMP official suggest to me that the RCMP engage in illegal activities in the pursuit of its duties.

Clearly, there is an absolute and complete contradiction between the statement made by Mr. Higgitt this morning and the statement made by the present Minister of Supply and Services relative to his responsibilities in the period when he was solicitor general.

In light of that conflict, I wonder if the Prime Minister could tell us whether he has consulted the Minister of Supply and Services to determine whether the statement uttered in this House on privilege by that minister now stands. If he has not done that, can the Prime Minister tell us whether it is his intention to put that question to the present Minister of Supply and Services and whether he will give this House of Commons a complete report on the response of the Minister of Supply and Services?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the minister has stated publicly and privately to me that he is not only willing, but anxious to testify before the royal commission. That is also the case with the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. They have said they are willing to testify. I think the least we could do would be to hear what their testimony will put before the commission.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, it does underline one of the difficulties of the present procedure in the commission whereby one testimony is made, it is picked up by the media, it is picked up by members opposite in the standing orders—as they did today—and based on allegations from one side which may well be dissipated in further examinations or cross-examinations and which certainly may be put in contradiction by further testimonies. I think this shows the wisdom of the government in saying, "Let us wait for the commission to make its report before jumping to conclusions."

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what we are dealing with here is a direct contradiction of a statement made by a former commissioner of the RCMP before the royal commission. Also, we are dealing with a statement made deliberately, after preparation on a question of privilege by a minister of this government. There is a certain obligation of leadership of the Prime Minister.

My question has to do with whether or not the Prime Minister, in light of his obligation of leadership and in light of the testimony this morning by former Commissioner Higgitt, has done his duty and has spoken with the present Minister of Supply and Services to verify the accuracy or otherwise of the statement given by that minister to this House of Commons.

If the Prime Minister has not exercised his leadership relative to a statement given to this House of Commons, will he do that and report to the House of Commons fully upon the results of that conversation between himself and the minister of his government?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it does happen to be the fact that not only have I exercised my leadership in this matter, but I have done this many, many months ago in talking to former solicitors general. I think it ill behoves the Leader of the Opposition to talk about leadership when he did not dare talk to the hon. member for Leeds when the RCMP wanted—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition makes a strong point of the fact that we are dealing with a direct contradiction. Indeed we are, Mr. Speaker, and we will be very anxious to find who in this contradiction is giving the proper interpretation of the facts. It just so happens that my information and my memory is, subject to verification, that former Commissioner Higgitt is in direct contradiction with himself who, if I am informed correctly, said before the Keable commission in Quebec not so many months ago that he had no recollection of having informed the former ministers of any such thing.

I urge the Leader of the Opposition to look up his files and to find out whether the former commissioner has or has not contradicted himself before, suggesting he has been contradicted by the former minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I regret to find that the Prime Minister is behaving as usual.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Instead of doing his duty, he is attempting to attack me and former Commissioner Higgitt.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: What is clear so far is that the Prime Minister, with the knowledge this morning of this quite remarkable testimony by former Commissioner Higgitt, has not so far, nor has he shown any indication of an intention to do his duty, in regard to verifying the accuracy of the statements made by the now Minister of Supply and Services to the House of Commons.

I have a question, sir, that relates to an undertaking given by the Prime Minister of Canada to the House of Commons. It is germane in relation to the statement made this morning by former Commissioner Higgitt. The Prime Minister said in this House in answer to two questions on June 22, 1977 the following:

I have had repeated assurances from the commissioner of the RCMP and from the Director General of Security that this —was an isolated incident and it was in no way a general or special practice of the RCMP to have break-ins.

The word "this" relates to an illegal act. The Prime Minister went on to say:

Can the Prime Minister tell us whether he stands by that statement made on June 22, 1977?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, yes, I stand by it absolutely. As a matter of fact, the statement was cleared with people in my office and in the RCMP who were working on this particular matter. In so far as doing my duty, it seems to me that I made it clear that I had talked to the former solicitor general in previous circumstances. So far as having done it today, I learned of this testimony over the lunch break. I had time to talk to the former solicitor general, who is now Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and he assured me that former Commissioner Higgitt's testimony is not in conformity with what he has said on previous occasions. I have not had time to talk with the previous one.

I find it a little strange that the Leader of the Opposition stands up indignantly and says that I am attempting to attack him and former Commissioner Higgitt. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the question period is a place where the opposition attacks the government. They have done nothing else in their question, and they did nothing else under the Standing Order. But I am not supposed to answer, because if I answer that it is seen as an attack on the poor Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the question period is supposed to be a place where members of parliament can elicit information from the government. That has not been the case for the last ten years with this government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The question that the Prime Minister should be putting to his long list of solicitors general does not deal with the consistency of Commissioner Higgitt's testimony, but deals with the question as to whether the testimony given today to the best of their knowledge is true. I wait to have an assurance from this Prime Minister that there will be a full revelation to this House of Commons of all the details of the efforts he has made to verify the record with the Minister of Supply and Services.

My question now relates to the invitation by former Commissioner Higgitt today that his advice to former solicitors general was in both oral and written form. May we have an unequivocal undertaking by the Prime Minister, now, that any written recommendations that are still extant will not be destroyed and will, instead, be made public to this House of Commons?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we have given the undertaking that we would turn everything we have over to the royal commission. It has asked for many documents. It has had all it has asked for. We have given them more than that to introduce them to new facts. I think it is a very despicable slur to suggest that we would destroy information—

An hon. Member: You sure would.

Mr. Trudeau: Who said that we sure would? I will kick his ass.

Mr. Paproski: Shame.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PUBLIC ACCESS TO EVIDENCIARY DOCUMENTS

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice, in the absence of the Solicitor General. The Minister of Justice will be aware of the arguments advanced by council for the cabinet—I am not sure that council was acting for the Attorney General, because he would not tell us—to the effect that certain classes of government documents would only be made public at the option of the government. This argument was, of course, rejected by the commission. Would the Minister of Justice give an undertaking that the documentary material referred to this morning by former Commissioner Higgitt will be permitted to be made public and that the government will not seek any remedies to prevent such material being made public?

Would he also confirm that no argument will be advanced by cabinet before the commission in an effort to prevent the former commissioner testifying in public?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): The hon. member, along with other hon. members, will be aware that we have taken a straightforward position that the material in our possession is available to the commission. That is a broad statement of our willingness to make available all that possibly could be of use to the commission. In addition, we have made it clear that we would expect the commission, obviously, to have regard for the public interest more broadly, that is, recognize the fact that there are certain classes of documents which deserve continued confidentiality in order that our national system may continue to operate well. That is our position and it is a position we shall continue to take before the commission.

I shall not engage in hypothetical, theoretical discussion about whether or not at some point we might get into some kind of confrontation. I do not foresee it. I foresee our making statements to the commission when the commission wants advice on issues of confidentiality. The decision will then be taken by the commission. As I see it, that approach has worked well up to this point. Of course, the opposition, which does not care about responsible investigating but only about partisan attacks, does not appreciate the fact. We continue to expect that approach to work well and I shall not engage in hypothetical alternatives.

Mr. Jarvis: It is very hard to imagine what is hypothetical about a vast number of documents already delivered to the McDonald commission. The question is not whether the government will make them available—they are already available—but whether the government will attempt to invoke or bring down a shroud of secrecy through the argument of its lawyers. I ask the minister for an assurance that the documentary material referred to by former Commissioner Higgitt will be made public without objection on the part of the government. Second, I ask for an assurance that the government will not invoke the infamous provisions of the Federal Courts Act, section 41, to prevent these documents being subject to public scrutiny.

Mr. Lang: I have made the position very clear and I invite the hon. member to read what I said, if he has not understood it. We shall make such arguments before the commission with regard to confidentiality as the public interest requires. I expect the commission to take its responsibility at that point with regard to the public interest and I do not propose to engage in further hypothetical discussion beyond that as to what might happen. Why not wait to see whether such a case ever arises, and then we can discuss the matter?

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to ask a question about the evidence of ex-Commissioner Higgitt. The ex-commissioner further testified before the inquiry that none of the solicitors-general—referring to Mr. Goyer, Mr. McIlraith and Mr. Allmand—advised him at any time that the law should not be broken. The Minister of Justice is presently engaged in an effort to have the postal workers obey the rule of law and go back to work.

Given the evidence before the McDonald inquiry and the minister's stated objective of seeing that everyone in this country respects the rule of law, will the hon. gentleman now give an undertaking to the House that he will see that charges are laid forthwith against those who have violated the law as indicated by evidence before the McDonald inquiry, meaning both RCMP officers and cabinet ministers? Will that evidence be placed immediately before the attorneys general in the respective provinces so that appropriate charges may be laid?

[Mr. Lang.]

Mr. Lang: Of course, if anything arising out of the commission's inquiry deserves the attention of a provincial attorney general by showing any indication of a breach of the law, that information will be placed before him. But if we talk about observing the law and the spirit of the law, I would think it equally important for the hon. member from New Westminster and the Leader of the Opposition not to engage in conviction upon first glimpse of a suggestion of evidence, but to wait for due process of that very law.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: I was referring, of course, to specific evidence, known for a long time, of mail openings, break-ins, barn burning, you name it. There is enough evidence for charges to be laid. If we expect the postal workers to go back to work, they want to see that there is not one law for them and another for the cabinet and the RCMP.

My supplementary question is a specific one with regard to the letters which were referred to ex-Commissioner Higgitt. Would the Minister of Justice agree to table those letters before the House so that we could examine the evidence? The minister is talking about prejudging: we will not prejudge them.

Mr. Lang: I would remind the hon. members, again, that the very reason the commission was set up, at the strong urging of the loyal and official opposition at least, was that all the material might be made available to the commission for an independent judgment. There was a very important point involved in that process. It was that a complete study might take place before conclusions were reached. We now find the hon. member for New Westminster arriving at conclusions on the basis of his glimpse of what must be at very best a tiny bit of evidence or suggestion. On that basis, the hon. member is not only weighing the evidence and reaching a conclusion, but he has so convicted some of my colleagues that he has used it as an argument for postal workers and CUPW to disobey the law, and that is outrageous.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: My position has never been any different, and it is that everyone in this country should obey the law. And that includes postal workers. Can the minister at least make a commitment that he would not use the Federal Courts Act to suppress evidence concerning cabinet ministers, so that we may know publicly what the relationship is between those former cabinet ministers and the RCMP?

Mr. Lang: I have explained the situation. The commission has the matter in its hands. If it would help hon. members further, let me say this: I can conceive of no circumstances in which the commission, seeing that there is some suggestion of impropriety or illegality in a document or in testimony and, therefore, a need for it to be made public—I can conceive of no circumstances in which that decision of the commission would not be honoured and the documents made public.

FISHERIES

ACCESS OF SMALL COMPANIES TO FINDINGS OF LARGE COMPANIES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Following the announcement that in future the private sector will have to conduct its own research in the field of fisheries, can the minister tell the House if small and medium fishing outfits, as well as fishermen, will have access to the information and knowledge acquired through scientific research by the large companies in this field?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, first I must specify that there is no scientific research involved among other things in determining the quantity of fish that can be taken. This research will be aimed at developing new fish products. We feel that the industry is sufficiently strong in this area to fend for itself. I have said it clearly, we will in no way reduce our scientific research nor our research aimed at improving the fishermen's equipment and increasing their catch.

Mr. Allard: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. As a supplementary question, I would like to ask the minister if, at that level, the small and medium outfits as well as the individual fisherman will be protected?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, no doubt that as small outfits band together to form associations, as they are already doing, they can take advantage of the information which may result from ongoing research.

TESTIMONY GIVEN BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question with respect to the evidence adduced before the McDonald commission this morning. My question is directed to the Prime Minister and it concerns the sworn testimony with respect to its being the general policy of the RCMP to engage in activities which are the subject matter of the inquiry.

My concern has to do with the direct contradiction which exists between statements, not only of previous solicitors general but also the Prime Minister's own statement made in the House in 1977 which is recorded at page 6988 of Hansard. The Prime Minister left the House with the impression that the matter was discussed. He said:

—very clearly with them—

Presumably, the security officials of the RCMP.

—in my office in the spring of last year . . . We had these specific assurances.

That is, that there were no specific break-ins. In view of that apparent contradiction, and in the interest of getting to the bottom of things and getting all the facts and the truth, will the Prime Minister be appearing before the McDonald commission to make known the facts within his knowledge with respect to the degree to which his previous ministers were aware of the general policy of the RCMP in this area?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to a page in Hansard. I cannot remember the exact context of that quotation, but if my memory is right, I was reporting on a conversation which took place in my office between the commissioner of the RCMP, the then solicitor general, and perhaps one other member of the security service. The assurance I received then in my office, which I believe was quoted by the hon. member, had to do with the question of whether the one presumed illegal act which had been brought to light had been isolated or whether there had been many others.

At that time we were discussing the question of whether we should set up a royal commission of inquiry into the RCMP, and I was assured by the RCMP that this was an isolated act. They argued that there was no need, because of that, to set up a commission of inquiry, that it was an isolated act, that it had been uncovered and that the matter was before the courts. We wanted to set up a commission of inquiry.

Mr. Leggatt: No, we asked for it.

Mr. Trudeau: You had not even heard about it then. At that time the police were saying it was not necessary because this was an isolated act.

The hon. member went on to ask whether specific cases had been brought to our attention. I repeat that the only specific case which was brought to our attention was the one which had been made known then. It was, I believe, a break-in at offices in Montreal. I have before me the testimony of the commissioner at the Keable inquiry. I think this is public. Before the Keable inquiry, while referring to the interception of the private mail of citizens of Canada, Commissioner Higgitt said, in so many words, "No, I do not recall any such conversation". So this rather substantiates the fact that he had not raised such a matter with the then solicitor general.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have one further supplementary question. For the benefit of the Prime Minister's recollection, the exchange took place on June 22 with the leader of the New Democratic Party. The Prime Minister is quite correct in his summary of his recollection, but I am not concerned here about a specific instance. In his testimony before the Keable inquiry, the commissioner was referring to a specific incident. The Prime Minister is referring to a specific incident, but I am referring to general policy.

It is inconceivable to me that, as chairman of the cabinet committee on security, the Prime Minister would not be aware of the general policy of the RCMP. As Commissioner Higgitt testified under oath, today, the general policy was to condone not only these specific incidents but also several others. That is the clear purport of his testimony.

In view of the fact that the Prime Minister and his former solicitors general should be, if they are not, fully aware of the general policy in this area, does the Prime Minister not think, in the interest of getting all the facts, that he should testify before the McDonald commission with respect to the policy areas which were testified to this morning?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I repeat that I do not have the testimony of Commissioner Higgitt. I doubt very much that he was saying what the hon. member quotes him as saying, that there is a general policy on the part of the government to support the RCMP in its breaking of the law. If the commissioner says that, that is flatly denied by his own testimony before the Keable commission. It is flatly denied by the solicitors general under which he has served, and certainly no such conversation ever came up in my presence or with him.

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister, not only in his capacity as Prime Minister but also as chairman of the cabinet committee on security matters. Can the Prime Minister tell us whether the letters, documents and memoranda referred to this morning by former Commissioner Higgitt have actually been turned over by the government to the royal commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of any such documents. The former solicitor general says he has no recollection of any such documents. I do not think Commissioner Higgitt has produced any such documents. The government has made all its material available to the royal commission of inquiry, and I suggest that the advice of the Minister of Justice is the best. Let the commission do its work. Let us at least have the elementary fairness not to condemn one side until we have heard the other side. This is a rule which the opposition should keep in mind once in a while.

ACTION BY GOVERNMENT TO END STRIKE

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice: it has to do with the Post Office fiasco. We are now seeing the rule of law versus the rule of power with regard to the injunctions which the minister has been seeking. We find now that CUPW is not going to respect them. Police chiefs and police in general are reluctant to move. They say that perhaps there might be a breach of the peace if they did.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

The minister must be in touch with the attorneys general across the country in order to see that the situation is brought to their attention and that they move and give directions, rather than several chiefs of police. Has the minister been in touch with the attorneys general across this country in order to put the position of the government before them so that the proper action can be taken?

● (1502)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, in cases where it is relevant, my deputies or other officials have been in touch with their counterparts in the various provinces. It is true that because we are applying the rule of the law rather than some rule of arbitrary power, the matter must necessarily take some time and some careful consideration and deliberation. That is true, but I still ask hon. members to join in the basic argument that what we must have is obedience of the law, we must have due process, no doubt moving slowly but moving inexorably just the same.

So let us not make it sound in the House as if it were some sort of confrontation between government and a particular group. This is confrontation against the law of this land itself and we will continue to apply that law slowly, carefully and properly, because in applying it—the hon. member for New Westminster says "very slowly"—very slowly, deliberately and properly, as we would in every case, we would not want in any way to be open to any feeling of disrespect of the law and the legal system which is being defied in this flagrant way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: I am glad the minister understands the situation, because the people of Canada are looking to the House for leadership in this regard. The minister indicated he was gathering the evidence, all the facts, in order that prosecutions can be laid. Can the minister rise in his place now and tell us whether he has the facts to enable prosecutions to be laid, and what type of prosecutions he is referring to? After all, this is the second or third day that has gone by in the gathering of facts in order to prosecute. Has the minister prosecuted—and to what extent?

Mr. Trudeau: Thirsty for blood, Linc?

Mr. Lang: We have obtained injunctions in a number of locations and those injunctions have been served. We are continuing to seek injunctions in other cases in order to remove the biggest obstacle which inhibits those in the union who would want to return to work. We are, indeed, preparing the material for charges of a variety of sorts, and those will be against a variety of people involved in breaking the law.

While it would be very tempting, politically, for me to make broad statements about whom we will charge and what kind of charges those will be, I will not fall into that political trap against the obligations I have as Attorney General to, first, assess evidence carefully laid before me and, second, lay the charges and then be able to say that those charges have been laid.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Labour. There were reports yesterday that the leader of CUPW had said categorically that he would refuse to meet with the hon. Lucien Tremblay whom the minister appointed yesterday as mediator-arbitrator. Today, however, there is a press release—and I am quoting from it—put out by the leader of CUPW which says:

However, we wish to reiterate that we are ready to meet any person appointed by the government with a view to resolving the issues that gave rise to the present dispute.

I know that the acting minister understands that if there is an absolute refusal to meet with the hon. Lucien Tremblay, then the whole nexus of the legislation falls apart. Can the minister tell us what the situation is?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in this regard the course of action which ought to be followed by the union is quite clear. It has been decided by parliament that the mediator-arbitrator would be appointed and that he will try, in the first instance, to bring the parties together to try to arrive at a negotiated settlement, and if he is not successful in achieving this, he will turn into an arbitrator, a responsibility which has been given to him by parliament; and he will draft a collective agreement which will have force and effect on both parties, on the government on one hand and on the union on the other hand. That collective agreement will be in force until the end of 1979.

Mr. Fraser: I have a final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. Has the Acting Minister of Labour any information which can clarify what are, not apparently but clearly, conflicting statements made by the leader of CUPW, one of them yesterday, in which he is reported to have said that he would not meet with the mediator-arbitrator, and the second statement today that while he is critical of the choice of that particular person, nonetheless he will meet with anybody appointed by the government.

Can the minister clarify for the House just what is going on, because it is obvious to all of us that it would be preferable to have the union meet with the mediator-arbitrator?

Mr. Ouellet: It is very difficult indeed for me to give an interpretation of two different statements made by the president of CUPW. But I am glad to see in his second statement that he is now starting to understand the fact that parliament has established a course of action which he ought to follow, that if he wants to present his point of view in order to have, for his own sake and that of his members, a better collective agreement, he should sit down with the mediator-arbitrator and present his point of view, because the course of action of the mediator-arbitrator has been set by parliament and within 90 days he will have to draft a new collective agreement. I am sure he will do it. This agreement will be imposed, I repeat, not only on the union but on the government.

SUGGESTED DECERTIFICATION OF CUPW

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Postmaster General. In view of the continuing defiance by CUPW and the counselling of its executive that members defy the law, has the Postmaster General asked the government to start proceedings to decertify the union, and will the government take steps to fire those public servants who counsel defiance of the law?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): In answer to the hon. member's question, I should like to advise him and members of the House that this morning a memorandum was sent by the Deputy Postmaster General to the CUPW bargaining unit, and in that memorandum the deputy minister advised members of CUPW that, under the Public Service Employment Act, any employee who failed to report for normal duties during the seven days ending at 12.01 a.m. on October 26, 1978, may be declared to have abandoned the position he or she had occupied.

This could lead to the termination of employment with the Post Office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

URBAN AFFAIRS

BUILDING PERMITS FOR MONTREAL CONSTRUCTORS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

On August 31 last, the minister announced to the residents of Place Frontenac in Montreal that as a pilot project, he wanted to set up a management committee for those buildings. Considering that the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation stated recently that it wished to set up a non-profit company to manage those apartments, is the minister in a position to say why he does not extend the 12-month mandate which included a clause providing for its extension?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, indeed the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation which was the owner of Place Frontenac in Montreal decided to make a rather special experiment with that housing complex by setting up a joint management under which the tenants of those apartments met with the directors of the corporation to organize the joint management of that complex. We then said that if the experience was successful we would be prepared to offer the apartment for sale to the tenants who through a non-profit company would become owners of that complex. We are now negotiating the sale of Place Frontenac to tenants who have set up a non-profit company which will become the owner of the building.

Mr. La Salle: I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the fact that this morning, in Montreal I think, the president of the management committee expressed deep concern and regretted and complained about not receiving from the corporation the information they should provide him, can the minister give the required information, is the minister prepared to meet with the tenants and in particular with the responsible management committee in order to settle this question in the best interests of the tenants?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I did meet with this management committee in the past. Obviously, I will be happy to meet them again if there are some points to be clarified.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CN STRIKE AT THUNDER BAY, ONT.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice. In view of the decision by Canadian National to prosecute individually 137 members of the United Transportation Union, local 913, in Thunder Bay, for a wildcat strike caused by CN demanding that train crews work longer than the hours stipulated in the collective agreement, in the interest of industrial peace, will the minister talk to CN management in an attempt to convince them that there is no useful purpose in prosecuting these employees now that a compromise has been worked out for a trial period?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would be glad to have that representation made known to the management of Canadian National. As hon. members know, it is not my ordinary practice to interfere in the day to day operations of CN. However, in referring to the action as a prosecution, perhaps the hon. member has misstated the situation. I believe it may involve civil actions.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Minister of Labour. Will he have his officials investigate the situation with the United Transportation Union and Canadian National in Thunder Bay, to determine if the company is acting illegally or contrary to the intent of the collective agreement, and to see if, through his good offices, the dispute can be resolved?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

GRAIN

PRICE OF WHEAT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I will not ask any questions about the retired commissioner, because I have been always under the impression that there should be no threats in parliament. But after the eloquent description of the kind of treatment that certain members of the opposition will receive, as expressed by the Prime Minister a few moments ago, I will not ask the questions I had in mind, because I would not want him to start into some other fuddle-duddle words!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: My question is directed to the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice, as the minister reporting for the Wheat Board. In the last few days there was a meeting in Washington in connection with the price of wheat. Among other things, the discussions were leading up to an international wheat agreement. The Canadian participants in the Canada and American Senate wheat talks came to the conclusion that until farmers received $4 a bushel, they would not have sufficient money to pay their cost of production and receive any return. Will he give consideration to bringing before the Wheat Board the need of action in this regard?

It would not mean any particular increase in the cost of living, but it would place hundreds of thousands—tens of thousands—of western farmers in a position which they are not in today.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I presume the right hon. member is not suggesting the destruction of the Wheat Board system and the initial payment system. Therefore, he should take note of the fact that the farmer receives part of his return by way of initial price, and the rest by way of final payment.

While the price of the elevator does not reflect the fact that wheat is being sold by the Wheat Board for over $4 a bushel, I would have thought the right hon. member for Prince Albert would have known that for some number of months now the Wheat Board has in fact sold wheat at prices ranging between $4.30 and $4.70 a bushel. At the present time at least the returns for our grain are above the minimum to which he referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of what the minister is saying. Whenever he expresses himself on any subject, naturally I give the greatest attention to it. I should like to ask him the simplest question. Having regard to the market as it now is, why can the farmer not receive $4 a bushel at the time of sale? Because the minister has said that the sales ahead indicate a price beyond that, that is a pertinent question to ask. Even his constituents in Saskatoon-Humboldt might be interested in learning whether the minister is interested in their prosperity.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think the grain farmer realizes, in setting the initial price, that we often take the recommendations of the Canadian Wheat Board into account. In March of this year we set it at $3 for this year. We did so in March, 1977, for the past crop year. In both cases the government was taking significant risk regarding the possible deficit in those pools and was not advised by the Canadian Wheat Board to reach for so high a price. Prices have moved upward and are at a higher level now. I am glad about that. We will make every effort we can in the international negotiations under way to assure fair returns for our farmers from the international marketplace. That is where the farmer would most like to achieve it.

However, in the alternative we have available such things as the grain stabilization plan, for which the Conservatives fought so bitterly for so many years, and which this year has paid out $115 million to prairie farmers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the grain stabilization plan is concerned, the minister and those connected with him gave farmers a ride. The Minister of Agriculture said that the farmers would secure a further payment from $110 million to $140 million. When the payment was made, it was $55 million. In other words, farmers were taken for a ride, and the last thing the minister should do is boast about the success of that particular plan.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, earlier it was made clear in the House that any reference by the Minister of Agriculture to the final payment under the scheme which farmers would receive was to the total payment they would receive.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No.

Mr. Lang: I made that clear, and that was very clear in everything said. Once again, it is quite wrong for the right hon. member for Prince Albert to attempt to perpetrate or put forward the notion that somehow an unfairness is being done to a sector of our economy. That is not so.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is so.

Mr. Lang: The House and the government, through the grain stabilization plan, hopper cars and railway rehabilitation, have done things such as the right hon. member never dreamed of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

PRIVILEGE

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, earlier in the question period there was an exchange between the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), and the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). It involves an apparent contradiction in what was said to the House by the Prime Minister, what was said through him today by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer), what was said on former occasions by the Minister of Supply and Services, and alleged testimony given before the McDonald commission today. This raises very serious questions affecting the privileges of members of the House. In order to watch the universe unfold, I should like to reserve the right to raise this question of privilege at a later time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It cannot be done now because the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has left.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not sure the nature of the question raised by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) is sufficiently clear to warrant it being classified as a question of privilege. In any case, if it relates to contradiction in testimony now before a commission or in answers given in the House, or something of that sort, the matter can be raised when the hon. member has been provided with an opportunity to examine the record. If there is any argument about procedural matters, in terms of raising it at the first opportunity, the hon. member certainly can refer to his remarks today.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—ANSWER GIVEN BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. From time to time questions have been raised in the House concerning the role, authority, and responsibility of parliamentary secretaries.

For the most part we accept answers given by parliamentary secretaries as being the answers of their ministers. But today we received an answer from a parliamentary secretary which has very serious implications. Even the parliamentary secretary said that he was answering on behalf of the deputy minister, the Deputy Postmaster General in this instance. The suggestion was that a threat of wholesale dismissal was hanging over postal workers. How can we know, Mr. Speaker, in light of the concern that has been expressed in the past about the authority of parliamentary secretaries, whether that announcement was just a departmental answer or whether it represents the deliberate policy of the government?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I did not convey this properly in the answer, but this is government policy. The minister made the announcement in his speech in Toronto at lunch today. Under the Public Service Employment Act, it must be the Deputy Postmaster General who notifies, in writing, the Public Service Commission of any intention to deem jobs abandoned within the employ of the public service.

Point of Order—Mr. Hnatyshyn

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Essentially, we are extending the question period as though two further supplementary questions had been put to the hon. parliamentary secretary, and this is really no different than if the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) had been here and had had further supplementary questions put to him. I can understand the concern of the House over the nature of this procedure, but, nevertheless, it is not a point of order. It is really an extension of the question period, but there is a limit as to how far we can go.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I accept the judgment which you just made. However, it seems to me that a matter of this seriousness ought to have been stated in the House by a minister of the Crown.

MR. HNATYSHYN—ROLE OF PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARIES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the point raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) underlines the point which I wanted to raise and which was raised earlier in a motion under Standing Order 43 by my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), relating to the role, function, and position of parliamentary secretaries in this House.

Yesterday we had the situation where the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Miss Nicholson) stood in this House with respect to suggested anticipated policy concerning equalization payments. My understanding is that when a parliamentary secretary stands in this House and states a policy of the government, that it is attributable to the government. Yet we have the situation now where we have no explanation, and there has been no attempt to make a statement on motions as to whether or not the position put forward by the hon. member for Vaudreuil, (Mr. Herbert) is in fact the position of the government with respect to the abolition of the principles of equalization.

If we are going to have a system of parliamentary secretaries in this House, we have to know whether they are speaking for the government or whether they are speaking ex cathedra on some other basis, through some inspiration that we have no basis upon which to attach any method of attribution to the government. I suggest to you, sir, that if you think that the parliamentary secretaries are answering for the government, then we should be entitled to an explanation, particularly in the case of the matter raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil with respect to the motion he placed yesterday, which apparently is government policy.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Naturally I am only prepared to accept that thesis when the hon. member is prepared to tell me that every application put by a member of his party, pursuant to Standing Order 43, is the policy of his party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: That is nonsense, Mr. Speaker!

[Mr. Collenette.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There are rules of this House which give to every member the opportunity, as a privately elected member of this House, to intervene, put forward motions, notices of motions, bills or other matters. Those rights all operate to the benefit of a private member of the House. Whether or not a member in this particular instance is taking advantage of that rule in one way or another is a matter which can be debated. If and when the matter comes to a debate, it can be discussed, but, in fact, it does not constitute a matter of order in this House.

The point was raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) as a point of order. I think that he will recognize that he is perfectly entitled to make the conjecture that he has, as is the hon. member for Kingston and The Islands (Miss MacDonald) entitled to make that conjecture. It is not a matter of disorder for any member to take advantage of Standing Order 43 in any way, and I cannot find that any disorder or point of order now attaches to the point raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Very briefly, sir—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Clark: I heard order being called from across the floor. It is not yet the prerogative of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to set rules of this House. I think it may well be, in light of your remarks in response to the points raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), that there is perhaps not a complete understanding of the points that the member for Saskatoon-Biggar was making. The difficulty posed for us here is that at one moment a parliamentary secretary is wearing the guise of a spokesman for the government, and at another moment—and there is no way by which we can distinguish what hat he is wearing—he stands in the guise of a private member.

It is well established practice in this House, honoured particularly on this side, that members of parliament are free to speak their views and to raise points that are of concern to them. The question relates to when is a member of parliament, who is also a parliamentary secretary, speaking not for himself or herself but for the Government of Canada. That is the difficulty that we have when, as today in the case of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Postmaster General (Mr. Collenette), a statement was made that is apparently government policy, and yesterday in the case of the hon. member for Vaudreuil, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Herbert), a statement of devasting consequences to this confederation—made apparently in a private capacity.

I suggest to you, sir, with all respect, that this is a very difficult question for this House, the question as to whether or not these people, who at one moment are private members and at another moment are spokesmen for the government, are, when they make those statements, speaking for the government or for themselves. That, I suggest, is a matter which should be considered with the utmost care by the Chair and the table.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think we can finish this discussion. I do not disagree with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the slightest, or with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar. Indeed, it is a matter of concern, but it is raised by way of a point of order that a member of the House put forward a motion yesterday pursuant to Standing Order 43. There is no disorder or a point of order in that.

If there is any concern that the member was speaking for the government, then a question should be put to the leader of the government in the question period as to whether or not that member was speaking on government policy, or to his minister if he or she is a parliamentary secretary. This is a very direct vehicle for determining his performance.

Similarly, when the parliamentary secretary spoke today he did not make it clear if he was answering for his minister, and that was clarified by a point of order at the end of the question period. The question could be put quite directly as to whether or not the parliamentary secretary in that case, or any case for that matter, is speaking for himself or his party in the circumstances. I think that this is a perfectly legitimate proceeding.

MISS NICHOLSON—INCORRECT ATTRIBUTION BY MR. HNATYSHYN

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of clarification. I am sure that when the member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) spoke that it was an unintentional error, but he did attribute to me, as the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the remarks which were made by my colleague. Perhaps the hon. member would like to correct that, as I do not share those views.

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I apologize. I know how anxious the hon. member would be to dissociate herself from the motion put by her seatmate.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 67

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order to express my concern that the parliamentary secretary continues to allow many questions to sit on the order paper. Many members who did not have their questions answered, and who left them on the order paper for several months in the last session, reinstated the questions at the beginning of this session in exactly the same form. Therefore, any work done by the government in preparing answers over the months could be used immediately.

I have already drawn to the attention of the parliamentary secretary my question No. 67 which was first put on the order paper about eight months ago. It inquired about a week end trip on government aircraft to western Canada by the then minister of labour, on the week end of February 3, 4, and 5. Surely the parliamentary secretary cannot continue saying he has done a brilliant job in answering 90 per cent of the questions when in eight months he is incapable of eliciting the cost of this visit to the taxpayer, whether it was official business, and who the people were who accompanied the then minister of labour.

If the vehicle of questions on the order paper is to continue to be of use to members it is necessary that the parliamentary secretary take them seriously and at least make some effort to prod recalcitrant departments into giving answers to questions legitimately asked, and which deserve legitimate answers.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is giving a very poor example to his new colleagues. Had he been in the House yesterday he would have heard the answer I gave to his colleague, the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), to whom I said that at the beginning of the session last year we had started to answer questions on the tenth day after the Speech from the Throne. Today is the ninth day. The House would not have to waste its time listening such a fallacious point as this,

Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member had attended the sitting yesterday. I refer him to page 353 of yesterday's Hansard where he will find the answer to his question.

MR. JONES—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTION NO. 69

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have a question, No. 69, on the order paper, which has been there since July 12, 1977, all last spring and last fall. I had promises in this House from the parliamentary secretary that I would receive an answer within a few days, a few days, a few weeks, but another 16 months have passed. I would ask that the parliamentary secretary do everything to get that answer within the next week.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry. Could the hon. member repeat the number of the question, please?

Mr. Jones: Question No. 69. I do not know what the number was on July 12, 1977, and I do not know what the number was when the House started in the fall for that third session, but this is the fourth session.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Orders of the day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Monday, October 23, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the remarks I had intended to make yesterday have long since passed from my mind in view of the circumstances today. My first words today are words of welcome to the new members.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): I hope, if they get an opportunity to sit and ponder, that they will learn the first rule of this House is a bad one, namely, that every member who comes here thinks that all history starts from that moment. It takes us most of our lifetimes to realize that it actually started before that.

The second thing is that they come here on a day that I think is very typical of the last several years of this parliament and the type of exchange that goes on between the opposition and the government side regarding a very critical matter on which this whole nation's integrity depends. When they ponder the questions and answers and the attitudes, I think they will have learned a good lesson with which to start. This was a good day.

When he spoke in this debate yesterday I believe the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) touched on something that has been overlooked almost entirely in this whole discussion of the economic situation in Canada. He made it very clear that the real sufferers in this type of action by the government over the last ten years are not only this generation but the generations that will follow. By this type of bill we are transferring the financial obligations of our country to the next and succeeding generations. The hon. member pointed out yesterday that the real culprit and the fundamental danger to our country are this attack on our sons and grandsons who will have to pay for the mistakes we have been making for the last ten years.

Put into perspective, Canada is not alone in this mess; Canada is part of a worldwide revolution which really began on the North American continent about 50 years ago. It started in Europe 50 years before that. This social revolution was supported by all parties in varying degrees. There is not a party in Canada that would say, "Turn back the clock on what we are trying to do on behalf of bringing social equity to all levels of our people." This social revolution has come so fast and at such a cost in the last ten or 15 years, and there was so much waste in the last ten or 15 years, that we are finding it hard to pay for it at all levels of government. This is not only true in Canada but is true in all western countries.

A huge proportion of the wealth of the nation each year has to go for the payment of services that we all want and that we intend to keep if at all possible, but we have got into the habit and the fatal blunder, destructive blunder, of more and more of these costs of what we are taking for ourselves today being left as a debt for our sons, grandsons, and great-grandsons to pay. I think the thanks of all Canadians should go to the hon. member for Provencher for putting his finger right on the sin we are all committing.

This bill is just one of the sins. It calls on us to approve or authorize the government to borrow up to $17 billion in this one year to carry out the services we want, to keep on carrying this place, to keep on carrying the incompetence of this government, not charging it to ourselves today but charging it to the future.

If one looks at what the demographic charts are showing it is that in ten, 20, 30, 40 or 50 years there will not be enough young people coming along in western nations to carry this ever-increasing load we are laying on them 20, 30 or 40 years in advance. As a nation we are deliberately planning a geriatric society, and the statement made by the hon. member for Provencher yesterday should strike home to all of us that passing this bill, or not passing it, is not just a routine of this parliament; we are nailing a major nail into the bodies of our sons, grandsons and great-grandsons by loading this debt on them without sufficient examination of what went wrong with our financing.

There is no question that because of the costs, legitimate and otherwise of this social revolution, we and other nations have forced on our countries a cost-push type of inflation. It is not a demand-pull type where people are asking for more goods than we can produce; it is a cost-push type of inflation almost entirely.

As has been stated in this House on many occasions, and as almost everyone agrees, the first villain in that cost-push inflation is the cost of government, forcing up taxes, forcing up prices and reducing the living standard of our people. Rather than force prices up any faster or force taxes up any faster, we immediately pass it all over to the next generation.

The second villain in the piece is the misuse of our money supply over the last 25 years. That did not start with this government; it started with a group of nitwits who accepted the philosophy that all our problems could be resolved by pouring money into circulation or withdrawing it from circulation. There was a lot of good in this monetary theory, but it does not solve our problems. This distribution of the money supply has to be put down as the No. 2 villain of the piece.

The third villain of the piece is interest rates. Almost everything one looks at today is capital intensive. Almost every project, no matter whether it is a big pipeline or the building of a building, it is capital intensive. In a capital intensive world of high technology we have interest rates over and over again being 75 per cent of the cost of anything we do. When a person of normal means tries to buy a home in our cities today that person will find he has to take out a mortgage of $50,000 to finance an ordinary $75,000 home, because that is the ordinary price today. Over a 30-year mortgage that person pays four times the cost of his home, 75 per cent of it in interest. That is how the arithmetic works out. The precise figures I have put on the record many times. This same analogy respecting home ownership applies equally to every large enterprise. For example, the cost of extracting oil from the big oil sands project in Alberta means 75 per cent interest in the way it is being financed. Interest costs are a large component of the cost-push inflation. We have sat here in parliament, and as well during the summer when we were away, and watched interest rates being raised a total of five times this year.

You understand why I have to use the word "nitwits", Mr. Speaker, to describe this type of madness. Here we are cursed and burdened with interest taking up three-quarters of the cost of capital intensive enterprise, and we have a government following the practice of an equal group of nitwits in the United States, because if they raise interest rates, we raise them. I would like to spend more time on that subject but that is not the main purpose of my speaking today.

The fourth item on my list is the land cost near our cities. If we look at the experience in Europe in the last century, and now North America in the last ten years, we see the sudden escalation of land costs around our cities which shows where the large costs of inflation are coming from. Frankly, I put it fourth on the list.

Fifth, what we have witnessed in this House this last two weeks is the heavy, heavy cost on everybody of the labour-management confrontations. Because we refuse, as union leaders, and we refuse, as businessmen, and we refuse, as governments, to face the fact that this ritual rhumba of a so-called collective bargaining procedure has developed into a professional "Maintain the battle", we see businessmen paying huge sums of money to hire the brighest young fellows they can get to take on personnel management. We find labour unions buying the ablest people they can to be the other part of the equation. As long as these people can keep a fight going, the more money they make. This ritualistic rhumba, as I call it, of obsolete techniques of labour-management is costing this country heavily, and the workers are the chief sufferers.

We have witnessed, as a result of what we have been forced to do in the last two weeks of parliament, this institution being made into a court of decision when it should not be, except in grave, grave emergencies.

The sixth item on my list is the misuse of the floating dollar. The floating dollar makes it possible for any government to resolve its own inflation at home. But when there is a pegged dollar we become part of worldwide inflation. The minute currency runs free, the domestic fiscal policy can cope with inflation. It is on that last point that I want to extend a little bit with general remarks.

In Canada today we are witnessing a ten-year phenomenon. It started under the late Lester Pearson, rushing into social programs without considering all the things that could have been done to deliver those services that we all want in a way that was prudent.

I recall the setting up of the Hall commission on medical matters and saying to Mr. Justice Hall via the terms of reference, "Look at what happened in Russia, in Sweden, in China, in Europe, in fact all over the world, and bring back a way of having medicare in Canada so that we avoid the mistakes made in the United Kingdom after 1945; and the mistakes made in Saskatchewan in 1946 and 1960." "Let us have social medicine but let us not do it in such a way that you set up a system that destroys itself with abuses."

Over half the costs in the systems are nothing but abuses. Every one of us here knows that to be true. We went hog-wild in pushing these programs under the present administration. Now we sit and look at them. After doing these things to us all in the name of carrying out a social revolution, we see a government sitting there, frantic and frozen at the same time, with fear of being defeated at the next election. It is too fat to fight and too frightened to run. Because their trauma is at that stage, they are not seeking the answers they should be seeking.

The answers are not difficult. They can be put into two words. The key necessity at this moment is to build an economic base which can carry the weight of our social needs without destroying our country. I spoke of two words. Those two words are productivity and savings. Every piece of economic policy placed before the House should be based upon the philosophy and the principles therein. How can we get greater productivity from our people, from our resources, out of our capital? How can we create more savings on which to base productivity? It is not possible to get those savings if we spend all our time trying to eliminate the middle class and get rid of the upper class or moneyed class altogether—they are so few in number anyway that they do not count that much.

My advice to the government is this: get off the backs of the workers of this country. Look what ministers opposite have done to the Post Office in the last three or four years. They have deliberately allowed their management to force workers into a strike so as to pose as strong defenders of the law. Let them get off the backs of the businessmen. I am not talking only of regulations but of the countless changes of policy—no one knows whether they are going this way or that way, or straight down. Most important of all I say to the government: get off the backs of the workhorses—let's call them what they are, the middle class of this country, and that comprises 90 per cent of us. Get off their backs. Get these taxes off their backs and give them back the incentive to go to work, to earn some money, and to put that money at the service of the development of this country.

I should like to refer at this point to a proposal which was made during a by-election campaign by my party leader. He put forward a program which has been the policy of the official opposition since 1965. He suggested there should be equality of tax levels with other countries. He asserted, for example, that home ownership was something Canadians accepted and wanted. They want the possibility of raising a family with some dignity and away from the rat nests, of the highrises, and he knew that they should get equal treatment with the tenants of this country. The tenants have always been able, through their rent, to get tax deductions, not only on interest on the money spent on the mortgage to build their highrise but also on all municipal taxes.

When my leader suggested that program, in harmony with the Conservative philosophy of the family home, we all know the extent of the attack by so-called economists who all felt they had to honour the conformist role economists have always assumed, namely, always to think alike. I am simply pointing out that such a program has been long overdue. That program would not only help on the social side but it would help combat the lack of law and order which comes from crowding people together in highrise developments.

That policy is economically sound. At this moment in time, with one of the largest unemployment indexes being in the construction industry, what could be better than to put people to work doing something productive, building individual homes? Nothing will be lost by way of taxes. There are many precedents to show that by reducing a tax, when you have an unused labour supply and unused material at hand, you increase the tax take. These precedents go back in North American history to a time after the First World War, 50 years ago.

Practical politicians discovered that if productivity was maximized, tax revenues rose. Every member of the House who has been here for the last 15 years has heard me tell the story of how this was done by the Kennedy administration in 1964. A huge reduction in the balance of ways and means, approximately $10 billion, brought in $19 billion of new revenue which made the Americans think they could carry on not only their social programs but the Vietnam war as well. When you have unused labour supply together with available materials, it is fighting inflation to put people to work to produce more, because you get more revenue and at the same time you reduce the cost of maintaining people who are unemployed. This is called potential budgeting.

This proposal was made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and it was received well by the people of Toronto—I think it would be received well in all our towns and villages, and I hope it will apply equally to the farmers. What we have seen from the government in the last few years, in spite of our warnings in 1975, is this: the government deliberately brought in a measure which legislated inflation. I refer to price and wage control. One does not even need to be a grade one economist to know that this is the case. Ministers wanted to control the workers and they wanted to control business profits. All they did was force up costs and bring all these inflationary pressures to bear on us.

This government has no moral principles. It is intellectually dishonest, and philosophically confused. And the most confused man over there is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). He does not know whether he believes in private entreprise or socialism. He goes this way and that way, depending on public opinion, and because he has no clearcut philosophy—he is still at second year university thinking—there is confusion in the government. Nor is there any help for the government in the civil service.

The civil service was at its peak 30 years ago when it produced that brilliant white paper in 1946. It has been dying ever since. All you have there now are a few mandarins who make certain they tell every other civil servant they must conform to their opinions and climb up the pyramid they have erected, before expressing opinions of their own.

These guys began to die 30 years ago, and today they are only walking around to save funeral expenses. The government cannot get any help from them. They are finished. And what I say about the civil service in Ottawa at higher levels applies equally to the United States. They just follow each other. It is a case of the blind leading the blind.

I have seen many a minister destroyed in this House. I remember the well-known name of John Turner, with all his promise, with all his charm, well liked in all quarters of the House, coming here in 1974 with two budgets in one year and placing double taxation on the resource industries, a move which flattened out one of the most important segments of our economy. And all because the civil servants at the federal level were mad at civil servants at the provincial level and said, "If you guys are going to tax too much, we shall make the tax non-deductible." Turner destroyed politically not only himself but the party to which he belonged by yielding to this type of nonsense from the civil service.

There was another man I recall, one of the fastest readers in this House. He had been briefed and he regurgitated that brief sounding like a high speed phonograph. He brought into this House, in 1974, the Petroleum Administration Act, and got it passed after a long, long debate in this chamber. That act was the first major attack by the government on the rights of the provinces to own, control, and use their own resources. It began a confrontation between the federal government and the provinces which is far more serious than the so-called fight over language.

I put it to you bluntly, Mr. Speaker, that the sins of the government have not all been committed within the last six months. It is a lame duck government, and if members do not know what a lame duck is, I invite them to look at American history. The minute the people know that a government is no longer effective, no more attention is paid to it. Over the years I have noticed this, and I have tried to be helpful.

I do admit that there are certain things governments cannot discuss in public. Matters of security and matters of finance have to be kept within the confines of the Privy Council and the senior civil service. I do not relish the position of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) when he cannot divulge certain things. It is his right and his duty to keep certain things to himself. However, at the same time certain things happen, and it would be helpful to be able to talk them over with somebody besides our own advisers. Walter Gordon, once a minister of finance, recognized this, and he brought in outsiders from the business world. His only mistake was that he did not get rid of them soon enough before he brought in his budgets.

I have thought over and over again that as these difficult decisions have to be made by a minister of finance—and one cannot in all honesty and efficiency tell the country what is being done until it has been done—it would be awfully nice if he could discuss some of these problems with his counterparts in the Privy Council outside his own party. Some of these problems are not political. The interest of the country is at stake, and I suggested in a press release over a year ago that it would be smart, and good common sense if the Prime Minister would take advantage of the Queen's coming to Canada, name the Leader of the Opposition as a Privy Councillor, and use him.

I went further and pointed out that because of the vast experience of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas) and of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and because of their long service, they should be given the Privy Council oath, and then the government could discuss with them some of the problems it is facing but cannot tell us about in the House. The government at least knows what the problems are, and these men would be bound by the Privy Council oath to keep quiet about what they are told until the proper time. This system is used in times of emergency in the United Kingdom and in other Commonwealth countries. We are not exactly in an emergency situation now, but we are very close to it in this lame duck period.

I use the example here of the floating dollar. When dealing with our country's exchange, we cannot tip our hand on what we are doing. The Minister of Finance was quite right in saying that Canada's interest demanded a floating dollar. The minute he said that, he told the world that it could judge us and our economic health by buying and selling our dollars as it thought wise for its own good, but as far as we were concerned the dollar was floating, period. Then the speculators were working one against the other, and they would have given us a stable dollar, but when civil servants monkey around and use hundreds of millions of dollars to interfere with a floating dollar, it is called a dirty float. Every speculator in the world then knows he has a pigeon on the stove, and world speculators roast that pigeon.

Neither Canada nor the United States has enough money to buck international speculators. Not only are tens of billions of Eurodollars looking around for a quick buck, but now there are tens of billions of oil dollars trying to make a quick profit, and any government in the world, bar none, should be smart enough not to tangle with international financial speculators. They have too much money in this floating crap game.

We have taken a beating, and we have tried to get around this by doing the worst thing possible, going abroad to borrow money to speculate in our own currency. The new generation will have to pay for the debts which will cost us heavily not only in interest payments each year but also because of the fact that those debts did not achieve anything. World speculators were told that they had a pigeon on the stove and that they should really take that pigeon to the cleaners. We were cleaned thoroughly, to the extent of several billions of dollars.

The reason I speak today about the floating dollar is that the same thing happened to the Canadian government in 1962. We decided to float our dollar. We did not know where it was going to go, but we did not interfere with it until the spring of 1962 when civil servants in the Department of Finance began to play the same game on our minister of finance which the present group is playing on the present Minister of Finance. We did not last very long in that game. We did not have enough money, and we had to bow on our knees to the International Monetary Fund. We had to bow to the Americans and to the British, and we accepted a pegged dollar. Fortunately for us we pegged it at about the right level and stopped speculation for a number of years, but when I see the same mistake being repeated by a government 15 years later, I wonder what amount of study and reading it does.

No one can tell me that this business of stabilizing the dollar by pouring hundreds of millions into it was the policy of the minister. He is too sensible a man ever to agree to that, but he is surrounded by officials who tell him what to do, and there is no other counter advice. He is helpless. It would have been nice if he could have spoken to some of the fellows who went through the same thing and who would have to honour their Privy Councillor oaths. It would have been good if they could have told him about the experiences they went through. That may have prevented this horrible mistake, for which we will have to pay for many generations to come.

I say this because the minister has been receptive to other proposals I have put forward. Last fall I suggested that with his shortage of money he would have to do things which would not cost him anything but which would make a lot of money for him. I suggested potential budgeting to him, and I gave only one example having to do with the field of renewable energy hardware.

It is very obvious that in the next six to ten years almost every individual home in this country, and certainly all big buildings, will be heated in a new way which will cost one quarter of present heating costs. We will use our oil and gas for more useful things than heating homes. With the knowledge we already have, why should individuals who live in this country not take advantage of the fact that we can heat our homes at one quarter of the present cost? I gave the minister figures, and he was impressed by them, but the civil service answer which came back was that we could not do a thing like that because we would be giving individuals the same break we give to businesses. We were told that we should not want to give a sucker any kind of break.

I know the attitude of the people in the Department of National Revenue. That is why I hope that the new man who came into the House today will back up his reputation, go in there, clean house, and get these people to realize that this money belongs to the Canadian people and not to them. These are the kinds of procedures which do not cost any money but which save us a lot of money.

If the Minister of Finance could have got his civil servants to accept that idea, and if he had brought in a whole series of things this summer when the Prime Minister came back from Bonn, things which would have been economically helpful to this country, we could have turned this country around.

When we look at the government's economic program, we realize what a roaring farce it is. Bill C-2 deals with the Resources Fund Act. What would that do to build up productivity and increase savings? Bill C-3 introduces new regulations under the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act, which is just information legislation. Bill C-5 would allow $20 more per month for the needy aged. Good, but that does not produce any more productivity. It makes the lot of the needy aged a little easier, but it certainly is not an economic program to build up our economic base. Bill C-6 on conflict of interest of senators and members of parliament—what does it do to build up productivity and savings?

Bill C-9 is on a referendum on the constitution. We have enough guys running around with referendums now, not only in Quebec but in Saskatchewan. Everything is going to be referendums—it is the new philosophy of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang). Bill C-10 is on income tax. Very good, they will cut down on family allowances and add a little bit more for children in poorer families. That is good, but where in that whole program do you get the sense that there is somebody driving the car?

This nation is like a big, powerful car going down the road at 90 miles per hour, but there is no wheel on the driving equipment. All these guys are out there waving, shouting and yelling, "What will we do now?" When you have a car without a wheel to hold on to, it is a damn risky period for the country. These people are going along like this, and I plead with them: for Canada's sake, admit your failures; for Canada's sake, beg for help, you need it; for Canada's sake, no more of these interest rate increases; for Canada's sake, no more foreign borrowing to enter a gambling game; for Canada's sake, recall that this country is strong; we must get it turned around and we do not have to wait until after the election.

Just because we are called Conservatives and are in the opposition most of the time, it does not mean that we are all bad. Some of these ideas do have some merit. Certainly with the complicated evidence of what the government has been doing for the last 13 or 14 years, there is no fate awful enough for people opposite. I am simply saying that they will be here for the next six months, whether they like it or not, because it is too cold to campaign in the winter in Canada. So we are stuck with this lame duck government. For God's sake, let us pull together for a few months, get some economic policy through this parliament, and turn this country around so we do not have so many unemployed and so we have some hope for the future.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, while I have the opportunity to speak on this piece of legislation, which is a bill on borrowing authority, let me remind the House that I am from Newfoundland and I remember well the time when I was minister of finance in Newfoundland, from 1972 to 1975, and how the finger of caution was waved at us, when we came to Ottawa, by the minister of finance in Ottawa and the officials of the Department of Finance who told us how terrible it was that down in Newfoundland we were borrowing amounts of up to $200 million a year, that we were borrowing too much and that this little province of Newfoundland was going to flounder, that it would have to go to the bond market some day to borrow money if it kept up with this disgraceful, profligate attitude.

I remember when the deputy minister of finance of Canada actually called on the premier of the province—who was then Mr. Smallwood—to tell him officially from the Government of Canada, to give him an official warning that if he continued his profligate ways, if he continued borrowing down in that province which was so far behind every other province, down in that part of the country which is 100 years behind the rest and which has to try to catch up, that if he continued their terrible, terrible record of borrowing $100 million every year, the province would go under. That was the message from these great mandarins here in Ottawa.

When I became minister of finance, I got the same message. You were tut-tutted at when you came up here and had to confess that you had no choice, that you had to borrow a couple of hundred million dollars for Newfoundland that year because, if you did not, there would be no highway program and no capital program whatsoever, there would be no progress, you would not be able to do anything. The people would have to continue to put up with substandard services and substandard programs, so that was the minimum you had to borrow.

I remember how we cut and slashed. I was not the Mr. Nice Guy that I am here, Mr. Speaker. Down in Newfoundland in those days when I was minister of finance and president of the treasury board I was Mr. Public Enemy No. 1 because we were trying to keep ourselves solvent and there was a limited amount we could do, and because old Uncle Ottawa was making ferocious noises at us, and frowning severely at us because of the way we were borrowing.

Here we are, just three years later, and what do we have before us but a bill which asks us to authorize the group opposite to borrow $17 billion. Are the taxpayers of Canada listening to us at all? Unfortunately, the answer is no. If they were listening to us, they would be rioting outside this building to put a stop to this. It is money that will have to be repaid by them and their descendants through taxes. There would be riots out there. They would be trying to hang the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) by his heels. They would be trying to catch "ol' slippery heels" and get him up if they realized what was happening.

When the Minister of Finance came to the House to ask for authority to borrow this money, did he come in all humbleness and supplication to ask us, to take us into his confidence, to lay his soul bare, to give us the facts? He came in arrogance, and in ten minutes told us next to nothing.

Now I will read a selection of the musings of the lugubrious Minister of Finance in his introduction of this bill, as reported in Hansard of October 19 at page 264. The minister first recapitulated:

> In March, 1977, borrowing authority of $7 billion was provided to meet anticipated cash requirements for fiscal year 1977-78. A further $9 billion borrowing authority was sought and provided as part of the income tax bill passed in December, 1977. Finally, on March 22, 1978—

What was it? April, May, June, July, August, September and October—just seven months ago. We poor Newfoundlanders have to count on our fingers. Just seven months ago we authorized a further additional borrowing of $5 billion. The minister went on to say:

> —additional borrowing authority of $5 billion was granted.
> This makes a two-year total borrowing authority of $21 billion—

You would think $21 billion was fantastic, but he goes on to say:

> —which is not sufficient to meet the combination of domestic borrowings for the $20.1 billion in cash requirements for the two fiscal years ending next March 31, and our foreign borrowings to date of about $4.5 billion. Nor does it allow a margin to bring our borrowing authority in line with the amounts available under our already negotiated stand-by credit facilities.

We authorized $21 billion for two fiscal years between March, 1977, and November, 1978, a period of one year and seven months, not even two years, not three years, not five years, not ten years, not 20 years, as you might think, but for a period of 19 months we have authorized the hon. gentlemen opposite to borrow $21 billion, and that is not enough. They want to borrow $1 billion for every minister in the cabinet. How much is that? It must be $34 billion that we are headed for.

We authorized $21 billion in 17 months; now they want another $17 billion. If we add $17 billion to the $21 billion, that will make $38 billion which will be authorized in 19 months. So we are asked to authorize another $17 billion over a 19 months period.

The minister went on to say, as reported at page 265 of Hansard:

> The bill also provides borrowing authority of $10 billion for the new fiscal year beginning next April 1. We have previously indicated that cash requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions, are expected to be $9.7 billion for fiscal year 1979-80. The government's cash balances at the beginning of the next fiscal year—

He goes on to say what it is, that is excluding foreign exchange. The minister is already admitting that the government will need $9.7 billion for the next fiscal year, which is only a small down payment on what they really need. Should we do this? As our finance critic pointed out, this will make the Canadian debt, once the money is borrowed, amount to a total of $74 billion.

The people who are so happy to give advice to poor little Newfoundland, who shook their finger at us and said how bad we were to borrow this couple of hundred millions of dollars, have themselves borrowed $21 billion over the last 17 months. This has not been sufficient for their hungry mob. They want another $17 billion.

I suggest we should rename the dollar and call it the beaver, because that might stop the government. If the people of Canada had a picture of 17 billion beavers all knocking their tails on a pond, and if they heard the sound that would make, they would have some idea of what the government is doing. Let us change it from dollars to beavers. The government is trying to borrow 17 billion beavers. I know what they would do with those beavers if they borrowed them, or what they would attempt to do with them. That would give Canadians a picture. Billions of dollars are nothing now, but can Your Honour picture 17 billion beavers lined up? It would be quite a picture.

The government has brought this bill before us. The debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne was interrupted for this fantastic bill, this piece of economic miracle. What does this have to do with the government's economic and industrial program? Beans all, Mr. Speaker. Why has the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne been interrupted for this borrowing bill?

Why are we being asked to authorize $17 billion before we have even had a budget from the hon. lugubrious Minister of Finance? He said that he will bring a budget down in November. He wants us to authorize $10 billion in borrowing for next year without seeing the estimates. Why? What does this have to do with the television appearance of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last August? What does this have to do with not having an election? Supposedly we were not having an election so that we could get on with our economic business and the government's fantastic program for economic and industrial development, but we have seen nothing. All we have seen is CALURA. If the government did not have CALURA brought in by the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott) every session, there would be no legislation before us. Does anything express more fittingly the state of this government than the fact that it has the gall to bring the CALURA bill before the House again? The Minister of State for Small Business should resign in protest because he has to bring this before the House.

Does anyone care what all this does to interest rates? Hon. members opposite have the most shameful record in our history. Last March 8 the central bank rate was 7.5 per cent. That was the bank rate just seven months ago. That is what the central Bank of Canada charged, and probably the banks charged one half, three quarters or 1 per cent more. Let us call it 1 per cent. So, it was 8.5 per cent. Now we have had five increases, and in seven months it is up to 10¼ per cent. How does this correspond with the Prime Minister's great program of industrial and economic expansion and growth which was brought back by him from Bonn via Morocco? The Prime Minister cannot explain. He throws his hands up and says, "Look, we have to do whatever the United States Central Bank does. If they go to 8¼ per cent or 8½ per cent, we go to 10¼ per cent."

If the Americans increase their interest rates once again, which they may well do—and it is being forecast down there right now—the central bank rate in Canada will go up again, and the interest rate at banks will go up to 12 per cent, 13 per cent or 14 per cent. Where will it end? Where will it stop? How can we have economic expansion in light of these interest rates? What will the small businessman do? Supposedly the Minister of State for Small Business is concerned about them. What will they do to meet these heavy, additional expenses?

Is it not correct that one of the factors which make us uncompetitive compared to the United States is the much higher interest rates in Canada? Who is considering all this? Who cares? What will our merchandise trade balance be? All we have is wild speculation by the Minister of Finance and his ally, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). They do not even take the figures and give you low estimates, so that when the figures come out it will be that much more encouraging for the analysts. No, instead of that they exaggerate. When the lower figures come out, then everyone reacts, the Canadian dollar goes down, and all the rest happens.

In June, July and August of last year, our merchandise trade balance was $542 million. In June, July and August of this year, the year of miraculous expansion which the two ministers spoke about, the amount of our merchandise trade surplus was $101 million. The total for the first eight months of 1978 was $2,084 million. If we extend that for 12 months, it would be a $3.1 billion surplus, if it is extended at the same rate. The most optimistic analysts say that it might be $3.5 billion. Everyone who buys the Canadian dollar knows that we will have a deficit of $8 billion or $9 billion apart from the merchandise trade balance, tourism account, interest, dividends, services, shipping, insurance and the rest. So, there will be another deficit balance in the international current account of approximately $4 billion or $5 billion again this year. We do not know how much.

Canada is living beyond its means. That is why our dollar keeps going down. What will we hear the government discuss? I get sick of hearing about all these troubled things. I get sick of hearing myself talk about them. I would like to hear the government get up and tell us what steps will be taken to overcome them, and not the old pat answers which the ministers come up with, not the old rationalizations which they come up with. They should give us something to get our teeth into. For example, the merchandise trade balance in manufactured end products, fully manufactured products, which the former hon. member from our side talks about all the time, and rightly so, was a deficit last year. There was a deficit in fully manufactured products of $11,096 million. That is a fact. The year before it was $10,210 million.

What does the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce do? He puts out a study indicating that the picture is brighter than assumed. Another 177-page study detailing our trade performance in 1960 was presented. It showed that things were much brighter than we thought. We cannot dispute that the deficit last year in fully manufactured end products was $11 billion. The figures are there. He wants to show that it was not as bad as it was in 1960, and in 1960 proportionately it was better. Who does that comfort? Who does that help? How does that deal with the problem we have in the form of a deficit now? That is what we are interested in hearing about.

What about the GATT negotiations? We are asked to authorize $17 billion in borrowing. What about GATT? When will we have a minister of this government, a deputy prime minister, a minister of industry, trade and commerce, or a minister of finance, who will tell us what is happening at GATT? We do not know exactly what is happening at GATT. The only ones who seem to know are the people at the Globe and Mail. I should like to refer to an article which appeared in that newspaper approximately two weeks ago. It is entitled, "Canada Seeking More Concessions In Talks On Trade", by James Rusk. In part it reads as follows:

> Two of Canada's key trading partners in the developed world must improve their offers if the current round of world trade talks in Geneva is to come up with a package acceptable to Canadian negotiators, report on business interviews with trade officials in Ottawa indicate.

Both the European Economic Community and Japan still have a way to go to make their offers acceptable to Canada—

The shortfalls in the Japanese package are in fish and farm products,—

Non-ferrous minerals and paper products are the main areas of difficulty, and there has been minimal movement in fisheries products and nothing significant in agricultural products.

This is the kind of thing we want to hear discussed. What is really happening at GATT? What can we expect of GATT? The people involved in fisheries are dependent upon the United States market. They would like to know what is happening at GATT. We on the opposition side would like to know, and I am sure Liberal members opposite would like to know. Rather than a bill to borrow $17 billion, a minister should come in and spend some time tracing out the negotiations at GATT, what is really happening there, and what our prospects are. That is what our manufacturing industry is waiting to hear. That is what our fishermen are waiting to hear. That is what our agricultural organizations are waiting to hear. They do not want to hear the government asking for $17 billion before it has produced a straight, new, economic investment and financial program. Give us the programs first. Then we will authorize the dollars afterward, if we think the programs are worth something.

What is happening at GATT? Never has a government been more anxious not to give information as this government is with reference to GATT and everything else. This is why we came here two weeks ago. We came to hear about GATT. We want the government to rat on GATT. We want information as to what is happening, what Canada's future is in trading, and not nonsensical studies produced by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to show that there is nothing wrong with our deficit in fully manufactured end products, even though it is $11 billion.

I could talk all day, Mr. Speaker, and I intend to unless you stop me. Let the government come in and give us some answers. What about our investment hemorrhage? We are hemorrhaging in Canada in the dollar sense. In the first half of 1978 Canadians made direct investments abroad totalling $910 million, principally in the U.S. This is the largest six-month outflow of dollars in Canadian history. The outflow in the first six months of 1978 was greater than the yearly outflow in all our previous history, with the exception of 1975. Now what about the counterbalance of foreign direct investment into Canada, Mr. Speaker? That inflow in the first half of the year was only $185 million. Foreigners invested $185 million in Canada, and Canadians invested $910 million outside. We had a net outflow of $725 million in six months, greater than any yearly outflow, with the exception of one year.

Why is this happening, Mr. Speaker, and what does the government propose to do to change it? Surely to God we cannot afford to have, in six months, such an outflow, and if it continues it would put us in very dire straits, a $725 million outflow of capital more than is coming into the country. We are a country which still needs capital to develop all kinds of our resources. Canadians apparently have no faith in their own country, and they are investing outside more than others are investing here. What does the government think of that? Can or will ministers do anything about it? What do they think about it? What is the bright side about it? This is what we would like to hear. We came here to hear the government's new economic, industrial and financial proposals, not to authorize billions of dollars in borrowing. It will be $38 billion that we will have authorized in 17 months if we pass this bill. Let us hear something on this problem of investment before the government asks us on this side to approve this bill.

One gets sick of even thinking of the statistics on every side. A person cannot find a bright corner anywhere, and it is not the opposition's role either to look on the bright side. It is our role to point out what the government is doing wrong and what it needs to correct it. The professional, bright-eyed optimist should be on the government side, but they are getting more doleful every day. They are Pinnochios, as I said the other day. What we want to hear, is what we came here to discuss.

The Minister of Finance announced in September a $750 million loan from the U.S., the second bond issue this country had in the United States. This amounts to $1¼ billion. Then we had a 1.5 billion deutschmark loan in West Germany, which at that time amounted to something like $705 million. The total foreign credit in loans that this country has arranged this year is $7.7 billion in money which was borrowed outside of Canada or arranged. The spendthrift crew opposite does not know how to do anything except to borrow, this crowd that had the gall to criticize the province of Newfoundland because it was borrowing a couple of hundred million per year.

How do they propose to pay for that, Mr. Speaker? The interest costs alone are more than $100,000 daily, finance department estimates indicate. We are selling off our international reserve holdings at a rapid rate. So far this year we have sold $3.2 billion U.S. of our international reserve holdings. Prior to this year the government had not borrowed outside the country in ten years. These are things which we want to hear about, but we are treated with contempt, as are the Canadian people, by the Minister of Finance, who comes into this chamber and asks us, in a ten-minute cursory speech, to authorize the borrowing of $17 billion. He will have some job borrowing it if I have anything to do with it, Mr. Speaker.

When the minister comes before the House in this way—and I have pointed out some of the things which the government is telling us nothing about—it is time for us to bring forward some grievances. There are something like $11 million to $12 million that the government would not have to borrow if it had administered the income tax laws of this country honestly and efficiently. I have mentioned before in this House, and I am going to keep mentioning it until we get to the bottom of the matter, the dealings of that one individual, Mr. John Christopher Doyle, a great friend of the government, and who owes the government not only what I reported last June but more than that.

I have some more information, Mr. Speaker, to bring up to date the tax saga of John C. Doyle and why the government could borrow $11 million less if it had collected the taxes owed it by that great friend of the Liberal party, John C. Doyle. Just to refresh minds opposite I would point out to them that for the 1950 tax year this gentleman was reassessed in 1955, and he had income tax added to his income tax. He appealed to the Income Tax Appeal Board, and was heard in 1967, 12 years after the tax year in question. He then appealed to the exchequer court, and that was not heard until 1970, three years later. He lost there again before Mr. Justice Gibson, whereupon he put in a notice of appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada, which was not heard until October 24, 1977. It was heard then only because I brought it up in this House and peppered the then minister of justice, the Minister of Finance and the minister of national revenue with letters about this scandalous situation.

The government allowed the appeal to drag on for seven years. In the 1954 tax year Mr. Doyle was reassessed on June 11, 1959, but it did not go to the Tax Appeal Board until 1967. It was not heard in the exchequer court until 1970, and his appeal to the Supreme Court was not heard until May 3 and 4, 1978; heard only because I had pressed and exposed this nefarious dodge in this House and outside it. I am glad that there is approval opposite because there has not been much approved in the ministry.

I then pointed out to the House, Mr. Speaker, that the government received no adequate security for the amount they were owed, that this was the one taxpayer in Canada who did not have to pay the tax as most of us do and who did not have to put up a bond or bank guarantee. He was allowed all those years to go free, with no adequate security in the hands of the government at all. The government eventually took over about 55,000 shares of Canadian Javelin Limited. When it finally received a judgment, the government could not collect because Mr. Doyle had left Canada. This Canadian had become a Panamanian citizen. He bolted from Canada in 1974 and now lives in Panama City.

What is the amount owing for those three tax years which were involved in those cases, Mr. Speaker? According to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Guay), as at June 23, 1978—I was given this information in the committee—Mr. John C. Doyle owed the Government of Canada a total amount of $5,014,281.13. I am just recapitulating what I said in this House before. He owed $211,000 for 1950, $276,000 for 1953, and $4,526,000 for 1954.

If you are like the ordinary taxpayer who has to pay, or be reassessed, dragooned, have an attachment placed on your bank account or have your assessments seized and sold, you might get a little irritated when you hear that one taxpayer has had that kind of treatment for 27 years. He has now left the country, and the government cannot collect the money.

By the way, the appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada were dismissed from the bench. They were so involved with great matters of law and fact that they were dismissed from the bench.

Mr. Speaker, you might think that that is something, $5,014,000 lost, but during the summer I discovered that the gentleman owed another $6 million. I wrote to the Prime Minister on May 18 or 19 of this year, bringing all this and a lot more to his attention in connection with the Doyle case. I asked him to appoint a commission of inquiry. After writing that letter I discovered that there was another case involving Mr. Doyle. He was involved in a case called the Minister of National Revenue versus Javelin Foundries Machine Works Limited and Mr. John C. Doyle with seven appeals. I discovered that Javelin Foundries Machine Works Limited was wholly owned by Mr. Doyle, and I discovered that there are $6 million owing for the years 1950 to 1956 to the Government of Canada by Javelin Foundries Machine Works Limited.

I discovered that this tax delinquent, this fugitive from justice in the United States since 1965, this fugitive from Canada since 1974, made an application to the Federal Court of Canada, to Mr. Justice Addy asking to have a commission take his evidence in this matter down there in Panama because he did not want to come back to Canada because he might be arrested for all the other charges against him.

Mr. Abbott: Would be.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, he would be. So he asked the court—imagine the audacity and the gall—he asked the court to come down to Panama and take his evidence because, "if I come up there I will be arrested for fraud and stockmarketing offences, 406 of them, stockmarket transactions and I do not want to do that. Although I owe $6 million which I am disputing, I want you to take my evidence down here." Two million dollars in income tax was levied for the years 1953 to 1956 which, with interest and penalties, now totals over $6 million. The company ceased business in 1956—the company has not existed since 1956 except with this one-man shareholder.

The matter has not gone to trial yet, Mr. Speaker. We are talking of the tax years 1953 to 1956. If the previous cases I cited in this House were not bad enough, these cases of another $6 million not adequately secured have not yet gone to trial.

The resumé of all of this should go to every Canadian taxpayer so they can decide what to do about their own taxes next year. I got a notice for $950 a couple of months ago. I fought it like a good Canadian, and they are withdrawing it now. I won. Four constituents got on to me. One owed $250 and had his salary attached. Another one owed $500 or $600, another one $50,000. They dragooned him and they did everything under the sun with the poor devil. But here is this man who for 27 years has had the most tender treatment that any taxpayer could ever ask. This stinks and cries out for an answer. It cries out for justice. Mr. Speaker, that is $6 million and it has not gone yet to trial. From 1953 to now is 25 years, from 1956 to now is 22 years. In 22 years we were not able to get this matter to trial, so what does Mr. Trudeau reply to me after I write him again?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I would ask the hon. member to refer to a member of this House by his title and not by name.

Mr. Crosbie: What does the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) respond? I have the Prime Minister's letter of October 2, which is his answer to my letter of May 19 and September 7. He regretted the delay in replying to me and said:

The issues you have raised are serious and substantial. I have consequently had a careful study made of this matter by officials of the Privy Council office in consultation with the Departments of Justice, National Revenue and Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I am advised that no indication has been found that partial or preferential treatment has been given to Mr. Doyle.

Imagine a prime minister putting that down on a paper. The bare recital of facts shows partial and preferential treatment.

The Prime Minister goes on:

While I am inclined to agree that, on the face of it, the proceedings in respect of Mr. Doyle's tax assessments for the years 1950, 1953 and 1954 have taken an inordinate amount of time.

That is some admission.

—the study that has been made indicates that the substantial delays that have arisen are largely the result of unfruitful settlement negotiations entered into in good faith by the government, the appointment of new counsel at frequent intervals as the court cases have proceeded, and complex procedural questions that have continued to arise.

How are they going to deal with the Post Office, Mr. Speaker, if they could not deal with one taxpayer in 27 years and they are going to give such thin excuses as this?

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question?

Mr. Crosbie: "Unfruitful settlement negotiations". They do not have to have a—

Mr. Abbott: On a point of order—

Mr. Crosbie: That is not what happens to us ordinary Canadians.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) on a point of order.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. member would permit a question.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes.

Mr. Abbott: I would just like to ask if he is asserting that the shortfall in taxes, that the government has failed to get from Mr. Doyle, is what is giving rise to the borrowing requirements. Is that the linkage to this particular bill? Could he explain what remote connection this case that he has been pursuing for two years has with today's debate?

Mr. Crosbie: The minister has put his finger right on the leakage. There has been a leakage in tax collection. There has been dishonesty, maladministration, misfeasance, and corruption in the collection of taxes in this country. That is my charge. I make the charge again. Because of that they are borrowing $11 million more than they need borrow if they had collected this money from Mr. John C. Doyle.

I come back to the Prime Minister's letter now, Mr. Speaker. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said once, when you are on the hunt do not be distracted by rabbit tracks. The letter continues:

With regard to the question of the security held by the government, it appears from the study that the security originally taken by the Crown was adequate to secure the indebtedness. However, as a matter of law, it has not been possible to realize on the security while appeals from the assessments have remained outstanding and the market value of the security has in the meantime decreased.

What he means is that Canadian Javelin shares traded at $17 a few years ago and today they are trading at $1.50 or $1.75.

The letter goes on:

Nevertheless, all legal means of utilizing the Crown's position to obtain recovery of the amounts owing are being vigorously pursued.

He goes on to admit that they only have security for part of the amount owed them by Javelin Foundries and that efforts to obtain payment are continuing. I am only giving a short recital of the facts—the facts that impugn the whole administration of the tax laws of this country.

The Prime Minister concluded by saying:

I believe that all possible steps are now being taken to conclude the matters to which you have referred.

They sure are. I am the burr on their tail, Mr. Speaker, and they are certainly taking all possible steps.

He goes on to say:

In the circumstances, a public inquiry into these matters, as suggested by you, would not appear to me to be necessary or desirable.

In the matter of collection of taxes we have had several immense scandals in the last couple of years, Mr. Speaker. One is the matter to which I am referring now. It shakes your faith in the collection of revenue in this country and how fairly and equitably it is administered, or whether friends of the government, people who have done the Liberal party favours in Quebec and outside, are to get treatment so that they do not have to pay their taxes, so that they do not have to put up adequate security, so that they can do what they like, living right here in the nation's capital for years and getting away with this. We only know about the years 1952 and 1953 to 1956. The minister will not answer my questions about other years.

We know that the government permitted Canadian Javelin Limited to ignore attachments placed with it in 1964 directing them to pay any moneys they owed to the government on this tax plan. They ignored that, and Javelin paid out $1,444,000 to Doyle through a company in the Bahamas, and ignored the attachment. The government only started to sue Canadian Javelin for that last fall as a result of my constant chasing of them. It is another example of negligence and misfeasance in the administration of tax laws.

We know from other evidence given at a royal commission in Alberta that the minister has disregarded the laws of this country and that the Department of National Revenue has given the RCMP information from people's tax returns whenever the RCMP asked for it. If that is not enough to topple the government, I do not know what you need to topple a government in Canada today. This is a topless government because it is a government that needs to be topless out of office as soon as the Canadian people can get at them.

Miss Bégin: How can we be topless and cover up too?

Mr. Crosbie: They should not open their mouths because they are cowering and quavering in their lairs, afraid to go out and face the people of Canada. The only one who has a chance, in my opinion, is the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo). I think she has a real chance, but I would not put any money on any of the rest of them.

I just wanted to bring this to the attention of the House hoping that the consciences of some of those opposite would be pricked and they start a public inquiry into these tax matters to which I have referred.

There is also the question of PUITA, the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. The government has announced it is going to abrogate that act unilaterally through legislation before this House. It was passed in 1965 at the time Newfoundland was entering into the Brinco deal with the government of Quebec of not so happy memory. It was introduced in this House by the then minister of finance, Mr. Mitchell Sharp, in July, 1965. It involved the agreement of the Government of Canada to pay back to the provinces 95 per cent of the federal corporation tax paid by utility companies which distribute and sell electrical energy, steam or gas. The three provinces most affected by this are Alberta, Newfoundland, and Prince Edward Island, where we still have some major publicly-owned utilities engaged in the sale of electrical energy, steam and gas.

This has been in effect since 1965, and yet unilaterally the government has announced it is going to do away with this act and stop transferring this 95 per cent corporation tax. It was entered into originally because it was recognized that if something like this were not done, each province would be encouraged to nationalize its privately-owned public utilities so that they would all be on the same basis and none would be—

Mr. Martin: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Martin: I wonder if the hon. member could in some way demonstrate to the House how it is legitimate to be speaking at this time, when we are dealing with Bill C-7, on another bill that is before the House. I do not see any relationship whatsoever, and I wonder if you could rule on that matter, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest that the hon. member keep his remarks to the bill under discussion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Crosbie.]

Mr. Crosbie: As always, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. If the bill I am talking about is not enacted we will have to borrow more money. That is the relevance of this matter I am discussing. If PUITA is not done away with, we will have to borrow more. In one case we have to borrow less and in the other case we have to borrow more.

• (1652)

I am not going to speak at too much length because my time is going fast. The finance critic has given me permission to take my time, Mr. Speaker. Let me just say I will not go into any more detail on that. What I want to speak about is how can we trust ministers to borrow $17 billion who answer questions like this—and I refer to Hansard of October 13 where the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was asked a question by the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden) about PUITA—first he asked a question of the Minister of Finance, and then he asked the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce: "If the minister is aware of the government's proposal to repeal this act." As reported at page 65 of Hansard the minister answered:

> Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the arguments put forward at that time and now. I have made my representations to the cabinet and to the Minister of Finance, and my colleague has assured me he will discuss this matter fully with his counterparts in the provinces.

I would not loan one dollar to a minister that made that answer. A minister in the Government of Canada is responsible for every act of the government. In September an announcement was made by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) outside the House that the government was going to ask this House to repeal the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce comes to this House and pretends he did not know about this, that he is not just as responsible for it as the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance. He has made his representations to the cabinet. Yes, he made them. The cabinet ignored them. That is how much influence the cabinet minister from Alberta has. He is nothing but a laughing stock from here to his district.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier)—Public Service—Reduction of personnel—Effect on service to public; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Canadian National Railways—Proposed strike by Nordair pilots—Air Canada control of Nordair; the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty)—Post Office—Alleged lock-out of returning strikers.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed Consideration of the Motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide Supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I feel I have to speak in French at the outset of my remarks this afternoon to remind certain hon. members, more particularly certain members of the press media, be it the written press, radio or television, that the province of Quebec does not have a monopoly on French in Canada and the parliament of Canada. Recently I heard certain commentators say that the Progressive Conservative party had tried to show they had French-speaking spokesmen because they had used certain members, particularly those from western Canada, to speak in French in the House. Mr. Speaker, members of the media who made those remarks are outright ignorants, and I say so in all sincerity.

Just today I was reminded that I have been serving in this House in my capacity as member for Edmonton West for 21 years and 135 days. That beats the record of any other member from the province of Alberta, except my former colleague, the Hon. Douglas Harkness, who served his riding of Calgary for 27 years. I just want to say that we, from western Canada, are of bilingual origin; we speak French—

An hon. Member: I beg your pardon?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): —and I can speak English just as well as anybody else——and we have nothing to apologize for to anyone in this House and if I happen to be speaking to a French-speaking minister, since we are in a bilingual country and we know the two official languages are English and French, I will be putting my question to him in French—simple courtesy.

It is quite simple, and if on the other hand he did not speak French, I would speak to him in English. So I hope that we will develop this habit in this House.

In my 21 years in this House we have witnessed progress because before we had simultaneous interpretation—and just this week I was invited to a dinner to celebrate the twentieth anniversary of simultaneous interpretation in this House; I want to point out that fact to the newer members in this House who accept that as a simple matter of fact, just like the sunrise every morning. Indeed, simultaneous interpretation was for us—

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, we are discussing Bill C-7 concerning the possibility for the government to borrow certain sums. The hon. member is making very interesting remarks about bilingualism in this country and his freedom to use the language of his choice, which I entirely respect. But I think it would be more advisable to stick to the rules of the House and not only express oneself in the language of one's choice but also to discuss the matter of the debate. I would urge the Chair to call the hon. member to order and ask him to discuss the bill before us, Bill C-7.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would suggest to the hon. member that he return to the bill under discussion.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I agree to be patient with the hon. member who is one of the youngest in the House. He forges straight ahead probably hoping for a promotion as there are interesting vacancies to fill. I have known him for a long time and when it comes to our rules I would hope he will show just as much eagerness in calling members of his own party to order as he does for the members of the opposition. This is a forum where we can express our ideas. I am going to express my views on Bill C-7. The hon. parliamentary secretary might then decide to draw my attention to something else.

Bill C-7 is very simple and asks us a very simple authority, a blank cheque allowing the federal government to borrow an additional $17 billion by 1980. The hon. secretary who is rather young has a poor memory, he did not look into the records of the administration to see what are the limits and the borrowing needs of the federal government. Ten years ago, the man who is now thumping on his desk in support of the Prime Minister—I remember perfectly when the Prime Minister arrived as a lion and promised to solve the problems of our country, not only our linguistic and cultural problems but also the inflation we had at that time.

● (1702)

[English]

"We shall wrestle inflation to the ground," said the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). Later on he said he had wrestled it to the ground. Nonsense, Mr. Speaker. Never has there been a greater misrepresentation to the Canadian public than by the present Prime Minister over the years. Yet the parliamentary secretary has the gall to say that I should limit myself to this paltry bill.

Some hon. Members: Order!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I think the hon. member—who has been sitting here for over 20 years, as he pointed out so well, and whom I respect very much—is mixed up. I was not here ten years ago, Mr. Speaker. I was elected for the first time in 1974. So, either he is mistaken, or he is speaking of someone else; but I should like him to be more specific, to stick to Bill C-7, and stop chiding me for having called him to order, what Your Honour confirmed by asking him to speak strictly to Bill C-7. The hon. member says he knows me very well, that I am young and have no memory: there is nothing repugnant about young people having a good memory. But, as the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said so well recently to the leader of the official opposition: 'Tis better to have good brains than good memory. On the other hand, I would point out that the hon. member would be well advised to speak to the bill instead of making personal remarks. If, however, he is in earnest about making of this institution a place where problems and not individuals are discussed, then he should limit himself to the bill before the House; he should respect our Standing Orders, for this institution, so that it can work efficiently.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest to both hon. members that they stay with Bill C-7. I find we are getting into debate.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): God forbid that we should get into debate in this House, Mr. Speaker. I will debate with the hon. member. I will debate side issues or any issues he likes having to do with this bill. He should have been here on Friday afternoon to hear his hon. friends; they debated everything but the baseball scores that afternoon to keep the House from voting on the amendment put forward by my hon. friend from York-Simcoe.

I want to remind the hon. member that this bill has to be considered in the context of the quality of the administration. After all, that illustrious colleague of his, the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet), is forever trying to bootleg into the record things that happened prior to 1963 when there was a Conservative administration. I want to tell the hon. member about what happened prior to 1974, before he was conscious of the political process. I want to call attention to what the government was doing at that time and to the pattern which we could see developing. I have been connected with finance since 1963. I do not know how many speeches I have made on the subject. I do know that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) used to wonder whether my needle had got stuck in the record when I talked about inflation and its pernicious effects.

We look back to 1963 when the present administration took office. Those were the hey-days. The total budget brought down in 1963 amounted to $6.3 billion. Today we are looking at a deficit which is going to exceed $12 billion in the present fiscal year. That is the deficit, let alone the total. By the end of 1978-79 the total is going to be in the neighbourhood of $50 billion. There is the pattern of inflation.

I recall some years ago looking at an appropriation bill—in 1973 or 1974, I think it was. It was an appropriation bill dealing with supplementary estimates. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), who was then the leader of the opposition, asked me whether there was anything objectionable about it. I looked at it and said, "Of course, there is. We are being asked, out of the blue, without previous notice, in a bill upon which there can be no debate, to give authority to borrow something like $5 billion." Of course, when the matter came up, we blew the whistle. I raised an objection, and Mr. Speaker held that I was right. The clause was struck out of the appropriation bill and the government had to come back to the House with another measure.

There are two ways in which we can deal with the Financial Administration Act and the authority to borrow. One is the method used in the bill before us, the regular way of doing it through an amendment to the act indicating clearly what changes in borrowing limits are being proposed. As long as the minister can explain why—I note that the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) mouths the word "why"? What he is doing is epitomizing the attitude of the official opposition toward this bill. In particular, we are directing that question to the proposal regarding 1980.

Is this 1980 figure, $10 billion, a symbolic one chosen from thin air? It does not sound too bad. From $7 billion to $10 billion to $15 billion—the way inflation is going, $10 billion seems to fit the pattern. It is instructive that the parliamentary secretary, who was so interested a while ago in what I had to say, should no longer be here. But to return to my theme, that is the essence of our questioning this bill and that is why I shall oppose it.

Why should we want authority to borrow at that level? Even should the present administration, by some unknown miracle, manage to survive beyond 1979, why should there be authority to borrow an additional $10 billion? I would think enough has been said in the standing committee and in committee of the whole to have made the government wiser and more readily prepared to share confidences with its backbenchers and the opposition.

When we in the opposition ask for more information, we do not do so entirely for our benefit. In the standing committees I have seen representatives of the governing party asking the same kinds of questions I ask, and I have wondered why those men and women have to do that. The reason is that information is not shared. It is not put out. Why does the government think it has a special, private preserve, that it has gone to a higher ground, and that "so help me, Hannah," it shall be forbidden for the government to disclose to man, woman or child in this country the information the government has? I admit that administrations I have seen and of which I have been a supporter have sinned in this regard just as much as anyone else. God only knows that in the 1950s and 1960s "mum" was the word. Nothing was said. I have seen great administrations with great potential go down because the membership knew nothing. The membership was not given anything, and it became frustrated.

Many backbench members on the government side have been here almost as many years as I have, and—

Mr. Béchard: Don't look at me.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): The hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) says I should not look at him, but I have heard him asking questions in committees. He should have had the information he was requesting before he came to the committees, but it was not given to him, and he did not get it in those committees. He was rebuffed in the same way members of the opposition were rebuffed. The treatment of government backbenchers is no different from the treatment given to members of the opposition regarding access to information. This bill is a classic example.

I have known the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) since 1962 when he came into this House. He has done a good job. I like him as an individual. I think he is was out of his depth as Minister of Finance, but that is beside the point. He won his spurs in other departments. However, when it comes to explaining this bill—and when it came to explaining other bills earlier this year—I am afraid that our hon. friend, the Minister of Finance, is seized by the attitude, "Don't tell them anything". He does not want to tell anyone anything for fear of being criticized, or that there might be another opinion.

Many factors have led to this bill. One of them is greater government reliance on Canada Savings Bonds sales. There is a great dependency on the part of people to be able to convert their immediate demands into cash. After all, Canada Savings Bonds are their cash. Last week the minister had to increase interest rates on Canada Savings Bonds by three-quarters of 1 per cent. Today several leading banks in the United States increased their prime rates by another quarter of 1 per cent. What will rates be a fortnight from now? If the American prime rate goes up another one-half per cent a fortnight from now so that the rate will have risen three-quarters of 1 per cent, the Bank of Canada will have to increase its prime rate. Then what will happen to the balance of sales of Canada Savings Bonds? What will happen to those people who have bought Canada Savings Bonds?

Has anyone looked at the stock market quotations in the last few days and seen how equity stocks have dropped in exact balance with the increase in the interest rate on Canada Savings Bonds and others? We have seen a drop in mutual funds, which are a mix of both Canadian and American stocks, but the interest rate in the United States is climbing too, and now we are talking about seeing some major banks in the United States charging almost 10 per cent as a prime rate. I caution hon. members that they should put their hats squarely on their heads and hang on because the wind which will blow this winter, if this should continue, will be of super hurricane force, and we will see interest rates we have never seen before. If that is to be the case this bill, particularly the anterior portions of it, will be seriously questioned.

The minister must tell us about this. This bill will be going to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs. The minister has been very reticent in telling us anything here, and I suggest to him that his tactics have been totally erroneous in this regard. The more open the minister is now, the better it will be in committee because I know that I, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), and others in the opposition, will have questions to ask in the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Incidentally, the standing committee has not yet been organized. If this bill had been passed earlier, we would not have been able to consider it in committee. We cannot do any preliminary work on the amendments to the Bank Act because somebody on the government side is asleep at the switch. This House has been sitting almost two weeks, and the first notice to go out regarding a committee meeting has been in connection with the Standing Committee on Management and Members' Services. It is shameful that that should be the first committee to sit. For a week now we have asked that the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs be set up and that there be a reference, but that request has fallen on deaf ears. Therefore, what is lost to the government if we debate this bill in extenso? The Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs could not sit even if the bill passed second reading stage tonight because there has been no notice sent out to organize the committee. There is no reference, nothing. That is just another indication of this administration's loss of control and lack of direction. I have seen it before, and the rot is very apparent.

I will not repeat the figures which were put on the record by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and others. We have them all from national finance figures. I could refer to the percentage of gross national product which has been taken by federal governments, provincial governments, and municipal governments, over the years. I could give a breakdown of percentages and of absolute figures regarding government revenues over the years. I could demonstrate how personal income taxes have risen over the last decade, ever since the so-called income tax reform of 1971. God forbid that the Canadian public should ever have such a philosophy in such a law inflicted upon it again.

Is it any wonder that Canadians are investing abroad, that they do not want to invest in Canada at this time because of the incidence of tax? Look at our real estate development companies. Hundreds of millions of dollars are going to the United States. If you ask their principals why, they tell you that we have developed in Canada the greatest municipal bureaucracy, when it comes to land development, that man could devise. That is where we have to start reforms as well, right down at the municipal level, and then at the provincial level. There should be an intermix between municipal and provincial bodies. They exist for their own self-perpetuation and they serve no useful purpose.

Why is it that in Dallas, in Denver, and in Minneapolis it takes less than three years to put together a big package and get it into building? Here in Canada it takes over five years. Why is it that Canadian development companies—I will not name them but they are both in eastern and western Canada—are moving into the development centres in the U.S.? First, because it is easier to get things moving, and second, because the tax return there is much healthier and there is a reasonable profit for those people who are prepared to take the risk to develop the ulcers and suffer the high blood pressure of being a mover and a doer. This country was developed by people who are movers and doers.

It seems to me that the government's philosophy is that, first, in far too many administrations, in far too many halls of academe, according to far too many columns in our daily newspapers, he who dares to move and make a profit, he who dares to move and give jobs, should be the first to be hit on the head. That is the philosophy that has crept in and it is all too rampant in Canada. Was it the consequence of the 1960s and the early 1970s? I do not know.

If someone should say that there is something irrelevant in what I have to say, I must be fair and say that in the end the deficiency in development, the deficiency in the Canadian economy meeting the demands that are put on it through our levels of social service—I am not criticizing the level—is that we went to the welfare state too quickly. The cost of our medicare, our hospital care, our care for the aged, is not met by plucking the money tree. It is met by the efforts of the hon. members sitting across from me, of our constituents, of Canadian corporations working in Canada and abroad, the big operators and the little two man operations running a couple of trucks. It depends upon the willingness of the Canadian people to spit on their hands and get on with the job. The more they can do, the wider the economic base, the greater is the facility of the Canadian economy to support that level of social services to which we aspire.

There are many things that must be corrected yet in the Canadian society, but let us be sure that we can afford all those things and that we do not set up incentives that become disincentives. There are some industries today which face the impossible task of getting people to work for them and to give an honest day's work for an honest day's pay because there is an alternative means of getting by. This is the sickness that has afflicted far too many Canadians. Why do I say this? Because it all accumulates in this type of bill.

This is the sort of bill that accompanies the little statement that was supposed to have been on Harry Truman's desk. It read, "The buck stops here." In Canada, the buck stops right here. The Minister of Finance is the man at the end of the line. You can have activity by the provinces, some of them richer, some of them poorer, some good administrators, and others which should never have started out in the business. But here we have the ultimate in the requirements of the Minister of Finance. This is residual bank account.

What does the Government of Canada have to borrow to pay its bill? There are no two ways about it. Can we say in this day and age that we will balance the budget? No, not particularly when on one side the government is fighting a losing battle with regard to the foreign exchange account. That is a many-holed rice bag. There is no way that the government can pour enough money into that holey rice bag and say that they can balance their cash requirements with their cash resources. Therefore, there has to be this particular authority to borrow.

What contributes to the condition of the Canadian dollar? It is worth less than 85 cents on the best of markets, and if you have currency and want to exchange it in an hotel, if you are a foreign traveller, you get only around 82, 83 cents. I have had this unfortunate experience this summer. This summer's experience in September in Europe has been, in over 40 years of travel, the first time that I, as a Canadian, felt like a beggar. I must say that prior to World War II I went overseas for the first time and the Canadian dollar was at 86 cents. It had been at 86 cents for a long time, but one did not have that sense that we have today. In a matter of three weeks I saw the pound climb 8 cents on the dollar, I saw the Austrian schilling and the German mark climb. My goodness, the climb was astronomical. It is a good thing that we did not go to Switzerland.

There is no real reason why this should be happening, other than that approximately two years ago, when we were at an artificially high rate, there was a lot of so-called hot money in Canada. There are pools of hot money around the world. Many people do not recognize the importance of investor confidence. If something is done which upsets the confidence of investors, then they do not have to invest in our country because there are many other places in which to invest. They have been chased away. Goodness only knows that the useless institution FIRA has scared away more foreign investment in this country than any other organization. There are different ways of controlling the situation other than setting up a cosmetic institution which scares foreign investors into diversifying their portfolios in Canada.

We are taxed too much. We are over-taxed. We have no incentives to save or invest. Canadian taxpayers are laid out by the many carcasses of beef which are carved up by federal and provincial governments. To the maximum shall he bleed, to the maximum shall he yield a pound of flesh! Then we tell people to invest in Canadian enterprises, that they have money so to invest. Our tax system penalizes people for investing. Gradually a patchwork of minor incentives is being built up, but they are meaningless.

We must shake our tax system and thinking fundamentally so that Canadians are interested in investing in Canada. In the past several years Canada has invested more abroad than foreigners have invested here. What is the reason for this? What a commentary upon our tax laws and philosophies! We live in a fool's paradise. We are similar to ostriches which have found a bed of soft sand; they shove their heads so far down that practically only their tails are showing. That is the reaction when it comes to considering what can be done for our economy. If Canadians were given a potential in resource development, the situation would improve. Is there any incentive for Canadians to invest in resource development? None at all.

Canada has some antiquated nineteenth century thoughts on capital gains which were imported from Britain for another purpose. We sock it to investors. I am ashamed. It all boils down to the bottom line when the government indicates that it has to borrow an additional $7 billion for 1979 and another $10 billion for 1980. That is the way of mendicants and bankrupts.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I have nothing more to say. I have given my reasons for voting against this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the same issue after my colleague from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) because I feel this bill is very alarming and I would like to explain why. I can state several reasons, Mr. Speaker, to justify my concern. First I would like to detail them and then elaborate. To begin with, Mr. Speaker I find that the procedure followed to introduce this bill is disquieting. The throne speech debate was suspended without notice nor consultation to consider Bill C-7. That is the first reason for my concern.

Then, Mr. Speaker, this is the third time in the last ten months that the government has been seeking authority to borrow. In December last, we passed a bill empowering the government to borrow $9 billion—I repeat, $9 billion because we must keep that figure in mind while last March, three months later, we were asked for another $5 billion. All told, $14 billion in three months. And this after having sought authority to borrow $7 billion in March last year, that is in 1977. Mr. Speaker, this amounts to a total of $21 billion for the period from March 1977 to March 1978—nearly $2 billion a month. Authority has been requested to borrow $2 billion a month and now an additional $17 billion, including $7 billion for the current fiscal year for expenses and spendings already provided for in the estimates, but $10 billion for the coming year without even offering us and the Canadian people a budget or the blue book which contains the estimates, all that without any explanations. Some $10 billion without explanations. This is more like blackmail than a request to raise by $17 billion the national debt of Canada which already amounted to $71 billion in 1976.

I want to list the other reasons for my concern. So here is a third reason: the short-term effect of the implementation of this bill on our debt. The fourth reason is even more important: It is the long-term effect of this increase in our national debt, a burden imposed by this government on future generations, those generations represented in this House by these young students who serve in the House as pages. Mr. Speaker, they are the ones who will have to pay back the debt which we are asked to contract today.

I would have liked to offer an explanation of what exactly is $1 billion. My colleague the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) offered a very simple illustration of that amount. He did so yesterday in his speech. I am referring to page 364 of Hansard dated October 23. So with your permission I would like to quote it because it is interesting to see exactly what is $1 billion, not $17 billion but just $1 billion. My colleague wondered if hon. members can grasp the meaning of $1 billion. I have often thought that if they did not, they can hardly have any idea at all about what $17 billion is. In order to grasp what a billion dollars is, and I quote the member for Provencher, I did a bit of calculating. I want to show the magnitude of $1 billion. Here is his illustration, and I quote: If from the day that Christ was born a man had spent $1,000 every day, seven days a week, every month of every year and had done so regularly, by the end of this century he would have spent $730 million. There would still be $300 million left out of the $1 billion. And now under this bill, this government is asking us the right to borrow an additional 17 billion dollars.

[English]

As I said, there are a number of reasons. I have explained some of them in French, and I wish to go on with the explanation in English of the reasons for my disquiet at the introduction of this bill. The first one is the manner of its introduction. It was done without any consultation in the middle of a traditional debate which permits members to explain their problems and uncertainties as to where this country is going. It is one of the two debates in this House which is free and open to all members to discuss matters which are on their minds, whether they be constituency, provincial, national or international in nature. This opportunity has been thrown away and we have been asked to concentrate on this bill, without being given any explanation. There has been no explanation of what the $10 billion is for.

The urgency puzzles me. Here we are, not quite seven months through the fiscal year, and having been conned last March before the fiscal year started into believing that the $5 billion being borrowed at that time would meet the needs of the government, we are now being asked to approve an additional $7 billion. Why is $12 billion needed in a planned expenditure of $42 billion? Maybe it is $49 billion; I get lost with the immensity of our budgets these days. I will stay with $42 billion, a good round sum which came up at one time and has probably been added to at some time. But do we need $12 billion to help meet the planned expenditures of $42 billion?

This government on the other hand is talking about cutting back. The Canadian public is being conned, and we are being asked to share in the con game. Our revenue is down, not just for this year but for next year, because an extra $10 billion is being sought for next year. What assurances do we have that this is going to be the last request by this government in this fiscal year or the next? We have no assurances.

Why do I say we have no assurances? I would like to go back to the earlier loans, back to November, 1977 when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), in talking about Bill C-45, said the following, as reported at page 646 of Hansard:

The increase in borrowing authority sought at present is to cover estimated financial requirements into the next fiscal year and to provide a substantial margin for contingencies.

A little further on he says:

The size of the request for additional borrowing authority requires some explanation. Earlier this year, this House approved $7 billion of new borrowing authority.

I should say it does. I jump now to the end of that paragraph, where the minister says:

The increase in the borrowing authority will serve to cover our financial requirements well into the next fiscal year and will provide a cushion for contingencies.

Just four months later, on March 16, the Minister said, as reported at page 3860 of Hansard:

—our treasury totalled $5.2 billion, a fairly high level; the borrowing authority asked for should allow the government to plan and efficiently carry out management of the public debt. The unused part of the existing borrowing rights, and the new $5 billion authority requested will cover our domestic cash requirements in 1978-79, and will be used to draw on the $1.5 billion U.S. credit opening and the $750 million U.S. loan which is being negotiated.

That was intended to cover our domestic cash requirements for 1978-1979, but what do we see in this bill? Section 2 of the bill calls for the authority to borrow $7 billion any time before April 1, 1979. It provides:

—such sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole, the sum of $7 billion, as many be required for public works and general purposes.

That is within the present fiscal year. We have now been assured twice. First of all, they said there would be something left over from the previous year, and now they are asking for another $7 billion for this year.

Let me go now to section 3—and this is why I have some hesitation in saying that I will vote for this bill, because I do not know when the government is going to come back at it again. It provides:

—at any time after March 31, 1979—

They are getting into the next fiscal year now.

—and before April 1, 1980, borrow . . . such separate sums . . . not exceeding in the whole, the sum of $10 billion, as may be required for public works and general purposes.

We have already started into the next fiscal year, and that is why I am deeply concerned, not just for today but for the future. What we are being asked to do today is to load upon future generations, those who will be paying the taxes and sitting in these places in the next ten, 12, or 15 years, an extra burden of debt.

I admit that some of these funds—although we have not received any explanation—are probably intended to retire some of the debt. We do not know how much debt is going to be retired, but some of this is going to be added to the debt as well. Before agreeing to go that deep into debt I want to know the purpose for which the funds are to be increased and whether proper controls are to be applied to their use. That is a perfectly legitimate request. I think some members of the government should be asking exactly the same questions, unless they have been told in caucus why this extra money is required. But I doubt that very much.

The hon. member for Edmonton West explained that it does happen and the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) had trouble finding out in committee what certain funds were used for. He was not told but he should have known before. Why were they not asking, as it is their duty to ask, why these funds were being requested?

Mr. Martin: It is quite clear why they are being requested.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I am assured by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) that it is quite clear. The bill says they are required "for public works and general purposes." That is a pretty broad statement. I wonder about these public works and I think we ought to be a little more specific than that. I should like to figure out a way of needling either the parliamentary secretary or preferably the Minister of Finance into giving us some explanation of what the public works are. I think the best thing the minister could do is to bring down a budget and tell us what he wants to spend the money on.

There are times, however, when I wonder how a budget is worked out. I got a glimpse of it the other day when listening to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras). He was boasting about how well they managed the economy and how much they had been saving, but he was not very convincing. At page 187 of Hansard for October 17, he is reported as saying:

I often hear that our expenditures have gone from $16 billion to $50 billion—'Isn't that shocking'? and 'Indeed that is startling.' But nobody adds to that that next year the gross national product of this country will be $250 billion. It has to have a form of relativity—

Why did he bring that notion forward? Is it because the government's expenditures are decided upon by either estimate of what the gross national product is going to be? I wish I could do that in my own domestic financing. I have to know what my revenue is going to be and I have to budget with a margin of safety within my domestic arrangements in order to do it properly.

There are only two things that I think any good housekeeper does in the matter of overspending and casting beyond his revenues. One is buying a house and the other may be buying a car, particularly with the price of cars these days. He realizes he can use so much of his current revenue for a mortgage or to make a loan—although mortgage rates are pretty frightening these days. But that is not the way the government does things. It estimates in advance what the gross national product will be and says, "We are going to take x per cent as our chunk of the gross national product, because that is the revenue-producing part and we are going to levy taxes against that." Sometimes they make mistakes. What any good manager should know is what the revenue is going to be and keep within that.

I wonder why the government does not deal more with what its revenues are this year and what its forecast of revenues is next year, not in terms of the gross national product but in terms of an addition because of greater employment or expanded business activity, and then work out on a percentage basis if it has to increase its expenditures. Now it is finding it has to pull back. I have to convince myself and my wife that we can afford carrying charges, whether it be for a house or for a car. I cannot understand why the government cannot work that way.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8.00 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in my remarks before the dinner hour I mentioned the many reasons why I am disquieted by this bill, worried and deeply concerned. I had reached my fourth reason, that is the contribution the proposed borrowing will make to our national debt. Now I want to look at the growth in that debt.

Let us look at the record of this government in debt accumulation. I put that forward as something that we ought to examine closely when we are being asked to add to that debt by several billion dollars. I repeat what I said earlier several times, that what we are doing is adding to a debt which is going to be assumed by those who follow us, by those serving in this chamber today and who may very well be sitting here ten years from now. Those are the people for whom we should be concerned.

Let us look at the record of the government, which says today that on the road to Bonn the Prime Minister saw the light of restraint. We can think of another road, the one to Damascus. However, a different light fell then. This time the Prime Minister talks about the light of restraint. Can we believe him, Mr. Speaker? You may; I cannot. I will come to the matter of expenditures in due course. What concerns me at the moment is debt and the actual, eventual debt charges.

I have extracted from a reputable publication put out by the Canadian Tax Foundation called "The National Finances" some very interesting statistics about the debt of Canada over the last several years. These statistics are from the latest edition. I have chosen selective years over the past 30 odd to give us a perspective of the growth of the debt in this country. The first date is 1946, just after the war, when the total growth debt was only $18.9 billion. Some 20 years later in 1968 the debt had grown to $32.9 billion. By 1977, the last year for which we have figures, the debt has grown to $80.5 billion. That is $80.5 billion compared to $32.9 billion ten years earlier. Over ten years, the ten years of this government, this is an increase in excess of 150 per cent. That is gross debt.

Let us now look at net debt. There is a distinction which is drawn very carefully here. Time unfortunately does not permit me to delve into it, but I advise those who are interested to have a look at this particular publication. The net debt is when all the earnings have been taken away. In 1946 it was $13 billion. In 1968 it was $16.7 billion, a modest increase in 20 years. I repeat, in 1968 the figure was $16.7 billion. In 1977 the figure was $29.5 billion. As hon. members can see, that figure has almost doubled in ten years. In 20 years there was an increase of $3 billion, while in ten years there was an increase of $13 billion. That is what bills like this have done to our debt.

Mr. Martin: The GNP went up at that time.

● (2012)

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That is what bills like this have done.

Mr. Martin: Tell us how much the GNP has gone up in that time.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will come to that. I can tell the hon. member that I do not see why government debt should increase in line with the gross national product. How much is this costing every Canadian in this country, man, woman and child, in terms of net debt? In 1946 Canada's net debt was $1,000 per capita. Just after four years of war, it was precisely $1,091. By 1968 it had fallen somewhat to $842. Ten years later it had gone up to $1,273, a 50 per cent increase.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, there has been a war going on, a war on your pocket and my pocket.

Who were the ministers of finance in those years? I remember a certain gentleman who is now the commissioner for the northern pipeline, Mr. Sharp. I remember Mr. Turner. Now we have another minister. I am waiting with bated breath to learn what the debt per capita is likely to be in 1978.

What is the cost of this debt per capita? This is of importance because debt carries interest. In 1946 it amounted to $367 for every man, woman and child in Canada. In 1968 it was $688. In 1977, almost ten years later, it had risen to $2,228, having almost quadrupled in ten years.

Mr. Martin: What did the gross national product do?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): You are having trouble with the gross national product.

Mr. Robinson: You are the one who is having trouble.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I intend to give the House an idea of what it costs to carry that debt. At the beginning of the war it was $10 per man, woman and child. In 1946 it was $30—the cost had trebled during a great war. In 1968 it was $33 and in 1977, $95. These are just interest charges; these figures have nothing to do with amortization of debt. One might wonder in these circumstances why we have to go back to the moneylenders again.

I suggest it is time we looked at the expenditures on government operations during this period. I see that the hon. member who was talking about the growth of the gross national product has left the chamber.

An hon. Member: He will be back.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In 1946, according to this valuable study by the Canadian Tax Foundation, total expenditures were of the order of $2,800 million. By 1968 they had risen to $12 billion, by 1976 to $38 billion and by 1977 to $42 billion. The 1978 figure is around $50 billion. So in those ten years expenditures had risen from $12 billion to almost $50 billion. Is it any wonder I am worried and that the Canadian people are worried?

Before hon. members opposite point out that the gross national product has also increased, let me turn to the argument that so large a part of government expenditure is dictated by statutes and cannot be reduced. What was said by the President of the Treasury Board when he spoke on this subject during debate on the address? He got in his speech before the government House leader interrupted the debate to bring down this bill about borrowing. On October 17, as reported in Hansard at page 188, the hon. gentleman stated:

> On April 1 of this year, the April problem I call it, my people did a tally for me about the inexorable and inevitable growth of spending for next year. As I said publicly, my hair went white. It was far too high. It would have broken through the commitment to stay within the GNP trend line.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

We are back with this GNP again. To continue:

> Something significant had to be done . . . We took $500 million off this year to cut our ceiling to $48,300 million. We have taken $2 billion off for next year to get from $54,600 million to $52,600 million.

I see I was modest in my estimate when earlier I mentioned $50 billion. The amount is more than $52 billion. That is the sum which is to be spent next year and this, I suppose, has something to do with the extra $10 billion which is to be borrowed. I still do not understand why the government insists that the amount of expenditure has to be tied to the g.n.p. and not to revenue.

Mr. Robinson: It is the same thing.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I do not see that. If the revenue of the government is the GNP, I think we are all in trouble.

The history of the growth of the public service should also be told. It is staggering. I choose as a starting point the year 1964 when there were about 200,000 public servants. By 1968 the figure was 234,000—I suppose the GNP grew during the same period. By 1976 it was 321,000. In ten years the number had risen from 234,000 to 320,000, a growth of about 33 per cent in ten years. We see in the Speech from the Throne that the government is dedicated to the proposition that there should be cuts in the expenditure. Ministers claim to have made them. They say planned expenditures have been cut by $2 billion.

It is easy to plan an expenditure and then to cut back, because the figure they are cutting back to is $52 billion, the figure I mentioned just now. If I were to go back again to the speech of the President of the Treasury Board, I would find that he made a public commitment to reduce the growth of spending to something below the growth of our gross national product. The government has no regard for what it can collect in revenue. In 1976 the minister said that the government met that commitment. I draw the attention of the House to that year. There was growth up until 1976, and I recollect that a minister of finance decided to get out of the government in 1975. It was just after that that the government decided it should cut back on its commitments. The government claims it met its commitment in 1977-78, and it claims it will meet it again in 1979. How growth from $42 billion to $52 billion in one year, 1978-79, is a reduction in the growth of expenditures I find difficult to understand. The absolute figures could be quoted.

With that indication of the extent to which this government has been committed to expanding expenditures and increasing the national debt, I will rest my case and say that it will be impossible for me to support this bill.

Mr. Rob Parker (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: —perhaps I should begin by pointing out that I am the newly elected member for Eglinton which, as I am sure most hon. members of this House realize, is located in the city of Toronto. Some years ago when I had the privilege of living in Newfoundland and first becoming acquainted with my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), we used to refer to Toronto as one of the more pleasant mid-western cities in Canada. I think that continues to describe Toronto accurately.

The riding of Eglinton in that mid-western city is an historic one. At one time it lay entirely within the boundaries of the city of Toronto at the north end of the city and stretched across the boundary, much like a cap on Toronto. Since then the boundaries have been altered somewhat. The riding is now vertical in shape. Its eastern boundary runs straight north along Yonge Street. Its western boundary curves out and back into the borough of North York, while the southern tip of the riding is rooted in the city of Toronto. I think the riding might now more properly be described as a feather in the cap of Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: Eglinton riding was represented with distinction in this House by the Hon. Donald Fleming from 1945 until his retirement in 1963. For the first 60 years of this century the riding remained Conservative virtually without a break. In 1963 it fell slightly from grace, and during that period in the wilderness it was represented here by the Hon. Mitchell Sharp. It is now 1978, and I am pleased to stand on this side of the House and say that the prodigal son has returned.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: During the past six months of compaigning for the by-election which was held last week I was fortunate to get the know the riding of Eglinton well, and it is, with some statistical variations, urban Canada in microcosm. In the riding of Eglinton live businessmen, labourers, academics, office workers, professionals, shopkeepers and many hundreds of unemployed. In the riding of Eglinton there is much religious diversification: Protestants, Catholics and, on October 16, a large number of effectively disenfranchised Jews. In the riding of Eglinton there are widows, pensioners, disabled people and others on fixed incomes whose quality of life has been ravaged by inflation running out of control.

The riding of Eglinton is ethnically diverse. There are Canadians from foreign lands as well as Canadians who were born here. It is a constituency interested in national unity and dedicated to a country where people may live together in a spirit of consensus rather than confrontation.

Finally, in the riding of Eglinton there is a diversity of generations stretching even beyond what might be found in this House. There are those in the riding who are old and nearing retirement, like the right hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau). There are those who are young and on the threshold of their careers, like the hon. member for Rocky Mountain (Mr. Clark).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: That briefly is the riding of Eglinton. Eight days ago the people of that riding went to the polls. They faced decisions on two major issues. The first was representation in this chamber, which they have not had for some months. They have made their choice, and I intend—indeed, I am honoured—to provide that representation to the best of my ability.

The second issue was an opportunity for the people who live in Eglinton to pass judgment on what this government has done to Canada during the past four and one half years. For those who believed that this government has done as well as possible under the circumstances, for those who believed, as my opponent believed and stated publicly, that the state of the economy is a red herring, and for those who believed, as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) apparently believes and has said publicly after complaining about his breakfast and before ordering his lunch in Washington, that Canada is a country of two cars in every garage and citizens just returned from a trip to Europe, October 16 offered a clear opportunity to vote for the government.

For people who lived in Eglinton and who believed that government priorities in recent years have been properly ordered, who approved of a government which, until the miraculous conversion of August 1, referred to a few moments ago by my hon. colleague, talked almost exclusively of constitutional reform and national unity—we have all noted that our Prime Minister was, shall we say, "Schmitten" in Bonn, enlightened in Morocco and unbelievable in Ottawa—and which looked around and saw one million people out of work and tried to fire the Queen—

Mr. Martin: Shame.

Mr. Gillespie: Shame.

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, if hon. members opposite have something to be ashamed about, I would be happy to give them a chance to apologize.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: For all of the people to whom I have just referred, October 16 was a chance to vote for the government.

Finally, for those who believed that the government's approach to the powers of parliament and secrecy was justified and for those who approved of a government which makes Richard Nixon on Watergate look like Chatty Cathy, October 16 provided an opportunity to express that approval.

However, the fact is that despite that opportunity the people of Eglinton chose to vote against that kind of government. They chose to vote for credibility, for making the economy the first priority, for the rights of parliament and for efficiency, honesty and integrity.

On October 16 the people of Eglinton chose to send a message to Ottawa and, given the state of the mails, I have opted to deliver it in person.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: I am aware of the tradition that a member's first speech in this chamber should be non-partisan in nature. I trust that so far I have fulfilled that obligation.

I would like now to refer specifically to the bill before this House. Although I am a new member of less than ten hours' formal standing, I have had some opportunity to become acquainted with this debate. It seems clear to me that the principles expressed at the polls in Eglinton eight days ago are directly contradicted by Bill C-7.

This bill asks basically four things of the House. First, it asks for authority to increase government borrowing by $7 billion during this fiscal year; second, authority to increase government borrowing by an additional $10 billion in the next fiscal year; third, explicit authority to place all or part of that borrowing in foreign markets; and fourth, explicit authority to maintain all previously authorized borrowings in perpetuity, if the government chooses, as a charge against the people of Canada.

On the issue of credibility, on March 16 of this year, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) acknowledged that $21 billion of borrowing authority obtained in three separate instalments was sufficient to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1977-78 and the fiscal year 1978-79, plus a margin for contingencies. Seven months and three days later, the minister informs the House of the need for an additional $7 billion—a 33 per cent increase over the total cash needs he forecast for two years.

The same minister, while steadfastly refusing to discuss his projected budgetary deficit beyond the figure of $10.9 billion, admitted in the spring, some six months ago, and reluctantly confessed, to a $300 million increase in cash needs. Presumably that $300 million is covered by this request, but in addition he suddenly discovered a need for an additional $6.7 billion. He still refuses to give budgetary deficit forecasts when the most conservative figures—and I use that adjective deliberately—indicate a minimum $13 billion deficit which could soar to $15 billion to $16 billion. This government has a credibility problem, and it need look no further than this sort of behaviour for the reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: Mr. Speaker, I feel it strikes at the rights of parliament for this House to be asked to approve borrowing authority in the amount of $10 billion for the next fiscal year, without estimates, without detailed spending and revenue projections, and to be asked for that approval in the face of massive inconsistencies and errors on the part of the Minister of Finance in presenting previous numbers, forecasts and figures. This time they do not even present the inconsistencies.

According to the record of proceedings of October 19, the minister said simply that the government requires the authority to borrow $10 billion to meet next year's cash needs, including that ever present margin for contingencies. That $10 billion is over 90 per cent of this year's entire deficit, or at least that part of it which the minister is so far willing to admit publicly exists. They want the authority five months before the fiscal year begins and they justify it with two phrases: cash needs and margin for contingencies. Ten billion dollars! Some margin! Some contingency!

An hon. Member: Some government!

Mr. Parker: While the minister was silent on further reasons for this borrowing, his loyal parliamentary secretary, the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin), was not. This hon. member must have felt a cold breeze around 9.30 p.m. on October 16. He presented the following reason: "The authority is needed now", he said, "to avoid our having to come back to parliament time and time again."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Parker: As I acknowledged earlier, Mr. Speaker, I am a new member, a babe in the woods compared to most members in the House, but even I know that parliament is here in the first place to be referred to time and time again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: I am sure I speak not only for my colleagues but for myself when I say I am willing to sit here as long as necessary to listen to debate, to hear justification, to study estimates and projections, and to vote for or against such bills as this, based on what the hon. member referred to as positive facts. Given the record of spending of this government, any facts they bring forward are highly unlikely to be positive, or even accurate for that matter, but at least he might do this House the courtesy of providing a semblance of justification for these outrageous figures.

I think it strikes again at the rights of parliament and at the issue of control over spending that this bill contains a clause authorizing every dime of borrowing authority virtually in perpetuity. It removes any last possibility that any borrowing authority, once obtained, would ever have to be submitted for review. Instead of sunset laws, this government is asking for perpetual sunshine.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: Finally, it strikes at the expressed desire of the public in these election results to place the economy first on our list of priorities when the introduction of and justification for this bill mentions no major measures related to reducing unemployment, no steps to put Canada back to work, just spending, spending, and more spending.

The same government that made so much noise two months ago about cutbacks—$2 billion of illusory reductions next year—now asks for $10 billion of real money—$2 billion of soft cuts versus $10 billion of hard cash. That they define as restraint. This government is like a dog surrounded by four trees; it does not have a leg to stand on.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: This bill is bad in principle. It is bad in practice. It is disastrous in precedent. It is an arrogant request for unnecessary authority. It is clearly timed to lessen the impact of criticism as we approach a general election. It is the kind of bill, and the kind of approach to government and financial management, that I came to Ottawa to defeat, and I urge all members of the House to vote no when the time comes.

A few minutes ago I mentioned representation and sending a message to Ottawa. This is the first instalment of that message, and I am sure my colleagues in the freshman class of 1978 will have additional chapters. In the months ahead, to the best of my ability, Mr. Speaker, I will be providing that representation on issues that matter to my constituents. I hope to see changes in the Canada Elections Act so that never again will Canadian citizens be deprived of the right to vote because of their religious observances. I am preparing a private member's bill to that effect.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Parker: I hope to see changes in our regulatory procedures and practices, making them administratively simpler and less costly. I hope to see the delivery of government services reformed, made leaner and more businesslike. I hope to see stimulation of the economy in a real and meaningful way as we begin the long, complicated and much overdue process of putting Canada back to work.

May I say in closing, Mr. Speaker, that I am proud to have been elected by the people of Eglington, I am very proud to be a member of the House, and I am particularly proud to be a member of this caucus.

• (2042)

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker) for his contribution. Perhaps some of my colleagues will find themselves equipped with a number of new first liners which may bring some joviality to this staid and sombre chamber.

In Bill C-7 the government is requesting an additional $7 billion of borrowing power. Others who have participated in this debate have indicated that the government has been borrowing itself almost out of business. My generation was taught that it was good to pay one's bills and live within one's means. Certainly the present generation of finance ministers are not the least bit concerned about that. They are leaving a very large debt for generations to come.

In 1978 borrowings amounting to $38 billion have been authorized. Bill C-45 requested $7 billion, Bill C-11 requested $9 billion, Bill C-31 requested $5 billion, and now Bill C-7 is requesting $17 billion. This total of $38 billion means that each one of us is paying interest on over $7,000. Through the produce of this nation, every citizen will have to pay 10 per cent or in excess of $700. In many instances people in Canada are living on annual income of $3,000, and that $700 is a very large amount of money for them to shoulder.

Those members who were involved in the recent by-elections are aware that the average citizen is now concerned about the amount of money borrowed, and the difficulties faced in an attempt to retain stability in our money. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was involved in borrowing to sustain the dollar years ago when he was a cabinet minister in the government of the day. That government decided to borrow in order to sustain the Canadian dollar. Canada was faced with extreme financial difficulties because of that measure. It turned out to be totally unsuccessful in the end. In an attempt to maintain the Canadian dollar at 85 cents, an awful lot of money has come out of the pockets of Canadians which has not brought much in return.

I am no financial expert. I have not studied the financial structure to the extent that I know all the answers. In fact, I am not sure whether the new economists will be able to say any more than I. I consider their knowledge to be zero as well. Not long ago I read a newsletter which indicated the United States borrowed so much money a few years ago that it is having a great deal of difficulty making the repayment which is now due. Apparently the money was borrowed in Europe, on terms that it would be repaid in one of two currencies when the term expired, either gold or Swiss francs. Also the newsletter indicated that United States treasury representatives went to Switzerland in an attempt to persuade the Swiss to devalue their money and print more so that there would be enough francs to go around. Rightly so, the Swiss told the Americans there was no deal. There is not enough money in the American treasury at Fort Knox to pay off that loan in gold, particularly with the price of gold today.

Apparently our dollar is worth approximately 84 cents compared to the American currency. One must remember that the Americans are bankrupt. They may not be able to pay the debt incurred in Europe because they will have to pay it in a currency which they do not have. When the deal was made, gold was worth $35 an ounce; today it is worth considerably over $200 an ounce in the United States. They paid large interest payments over the years for that loan, and it will be necessary to pay off the remaining debt at a rate five times what it was incurred at. The United States is not in a very good position, yet we weigh our dollar at 84 cents against the American dollar.

Another government newsletter indicated that three years ago $1 Canadian bought 300 Japanese yen; now it buys 162 Japanese yen. That means our money is worth approximately 50 or 51 cents on the Japanese exchange market. We are in serious difficulty, as is the United States. Even countries which find their currencies rising rapidly are in trouble, because eventually they will not be able to make their payments, as was the case in Canada at one time.

I am glad to see the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) present in the chamber this evening. I am sure the minister is not a collective enterpriser. Surely he is not interested in establishing a Crown corporation in order to operate Syncrude or to raise money to put into the Syncrude operation because it would not happen otherwise. Aside from being responsible for mines, he is also responsible for energy. If we must buy all our energy offshore, we cannot exist as we do today. At one time his friends in the seven sisters told him that there was no future in oil, that the end was in sight. Even so, he saw fit to put taxpayers' money into the development of Syncrude. I congratulate him for that, particularly since the situation has changed marginally in the last few years. But why did he not put all of it into Syncrude? Why did he allow the oil companies to become involved? Perhaps they are smarter than us. They have been robbing people for years and years.

Mr. Dick: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Apparently the hon. member does not believe that. At one time the seven sisters put lead into their gasoline, which resulted in a five-cent increase in price. Then that lead was taken out, which resulted in another five-cent increase. That little exercise cost an additional ten cents. Now they are pushing leadless gasoline, which is apparently anti-knock. Of course, there will be another five-cent increase because of that. The hon. member is entitled to believe that the oil companies are not crooked, but I consider them to be crooks. At least, I do not consider them to be reasonable and legitimate businessmen.

● (2052)

There is still a valuable commodity out there under the minister's jurisdiction, and that is gold. We are not unaware of this. One of the minister's own colleagues has authorized a publication which indicates that the government has 200,000 gold coins containing half an ounce of pure gold for sale at $150 each. That is a good bargain because gold is going to go up to $300 an ounce, and as the value of the dollar goes down the value of the gold goes up. I suggest the value will go to $300 an ounce by early March. It is now selling on trade markets at from $262 to $267 Canadian funds. We are selling these coins for $150 and the government is going to make some money.

When we have talked about putting out a bullion coin containing one true ounce of .999 fine 22-carat, we have found that we do not have enough gold in this country to produce them. We are somewhat like the United States which found that when it had to pay off its debt in gold it did not have a sufficient amount.

In my part of the country there is still a lot of gold. I suppose there are two or three thousand mines there which operated when gold was selling at $35 an ounce. When I started to work underground in a gold mine I received 58 cents an hour. Things have improved since then. I think my highest hourly wage was $1.19 as a raiseman, which is a skilled position in a mine.

Let us assume that the same man receives $10 an hour today. It is hard to look back and find that you were making less in a day than a man doing the same job now makes per hour. Gold has increased in price proportionately more. Obviously wages are not going to represent the major portion of the cost of developing gold mining operations. Perhaps the minister should sit down and put together a consortium to pick up some of the gold mining claims throughout northern Ontario, northern Quebec, the maritimes and British Columbia. I imagine that in each of those areas the consortium could operate 500 or 600 mines. These mines would not have to be big producers.

An hon. Member: But they must have gold.

Mr. Peters: Sure, they must have gold, but the minister and his department knows exactly how much gold there is in every cut on every face in every mine that has operated over the last 50 years. He knows what the projection is in respect of the tonnage in each one of those holes in the ground. He could get that information from his computers in a matter of a few weeks. I am sure he would find there is a very large amount of gold-bearing ore still available producing gold valued today at $265 an ounce.

When we abandoned emergency gold mine assistance some 15 years ago gold production was supported by the government to a maximum of less than $50 an ounce. I know the minister is not interested in government corporations, but he has had to take some interest in Syncrude for the production of petroleum. When things were tough under a Conservative government—and maybe things are always tough under Conservative governments—most of the Crown corporations or national corporations were established. This was not in the Diefenbaker years because those years turned out to be a financial disaster as well.

In a previous Conservative regime the government established railway companies, airlines and banks as well as radio services, and many of these things were considered to be totally acceptable. No one wants to change them even today. My point is that just because one is not in favour of government ownership it does not mean the government should not support something that can be of tremendous value. It is my guess that we would be able to put more people back to work for every dollar used in the redevelopment of these gold mines than for every dollar invested in any other industry we might consider.

When we were considering the manufacture and sale of gold bullion coins we were told we would have to double the production of gold in Canada to meet the projected demand of coin distributors in New York, London and other international marketplaces. Canada has a great advantage over large foreign coin manufacturers in the world today, and specifically over the largest, South Africa, which produces the Kruger rand. The United States does not want to buy South African coins or gold from South Africa. Many countries are looking for a hedge against inflation and one of the best obvious hedges can be found in gold bullion, gold coins or gold in any of its purer forms.

I think it is safe to say that in my area there are 30 or 40 mines which could be put into operation within a matter of 12 months. Gold mining is a very highly labour-intensive industry, one that would not require a great deal of money to put into operation. This would require some leadership, and one other thing that is not in existence at the present time. This industry would have to be given some assurance that the tax structure would remain stable for a period of at least four or five years. The industry would have to be assured that the federal and provincial governments involved would be willing to guarantee stability in their tax structures.

One reason it is difficult to raise money or venture capital today is that no one is sure the tax structure will remain the same for even one year. There would also have to be some supervision on the part of the government of the penny or dollar market, whatever might be involved in respect of gold. There would also have to be an assurance that the return for those who invested privately in these sponsored mining operations was more than 10.25 per cent, because that is an interest rate you can get at the bank today.

It is interesting to note that many large corporations are today making more from their investment portfolios than from their operations. I remember suggesting not long ago to an individual in a large corporation of the Weston chain that they should expand operations. He asked me if I knew what the profit was from their plant the previous year. I suggested it was 4.5 per cent on a very large volume, and he said they could make more money than that by putting their money in the bank, and suggested the corporation was not too interested in putting capital into risk ventures.

If the minister would provide more leadership, we could make more money than that by putting it in the bank, but we are not the least bit interested in venture capital. The minister could solve many of the problems that Canada has today. I figured it out roughly. I am no good at arithmetic so I may be out a million or a billion or so—but that does not really make a difference when you are playing around with the national debt—

Mr. Stevens: You are sounding like a Liberal now.

Mr. Peters: The Liberals do not care. They merely print some more money. If I divide $7 billion roughly by 265, I get $26 million, and that means that 26 million ounces of gold would pay for this loan. This would be better than borrowing it in the market where we will pay twice as much in seven years. We could take gold out of the ground and sell it and we would be able to use it for our balance of trade. It would certainly prop up our dollar and we would not need to go on the market to borrow money to stabilize it.

In a very short period of time this country could put into operation a number of gold mines if the government would give the leadership.

An hon. Member: That's hard.

Mr. Peters: One of the members has said that that is hard, and this is certainly true. It is easier to come to parliament and take the flak for two or three days and then borrow another $7 billion. In three years we have doubled our national debt in just four or five easy jumps. The government has said that this time will be the last time.

Why do we not start producing our own wealth, Mr. Speaker? At $265 an ounce for gold, we could produce more new wealth in this country than we do with the wheat and pulp industries and probably the manufacturing industry as well.

An hon. Member: We could sell a lot of tobacco.

Mr. Peters: Yes, you would have to sell a lot of tobacco to cover that kind of production. The gold is there, and we know where it is. Anybody could go to the department of mines and trace every mine that has ever operated within the last 50 years. They have the information as to their location, depth, size of vein, etc. If the minister is at all interested, there are companies I am sure who would go into a consortium, companies such as Lakeshore, Hollinger, Kerr Addison and Noranda. All these companies have operated gold mines and are knowledgeable about the mining industry. Most of them quit operating gold mines when the price was at $35 an ounce. At $265 an ounce, if they were given the assurance that they would not get hosed over the next four or five years through the tax structure of this country, I am sure they would be very willing to become involved in a deal with the government.

I had occasion to speak to some representatives from the mining industry at the last meeting of the gold mining committee, and I asked them if they had any objection to going into partnership with the government. They said they had none. They could see many problems, but I guess the government sees lots of problems in the event they were to go together with some of the gold mining companies as well, because they are certainly no patsies or pushovers. Unlike the postal workers who are on strike against an inefficient government, it would find that these gold miners are not inefficient and that they are the kind of people who know how to bargain. They are certainly capable of looking after their interests on anybody's market, and I know that from personal experience.

I am not the least bit surprised to hear that the Supreme Court has issued injunctions against meetings, or injunctions of any kind, because I personally remember when the riot act was read, and all the rest of it, when the coal mines were involved in a similar situation. So, I consider them no patsies. I am sure that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources will give the miners full credit for knowing how to run their operation efficiently. If there is participation on the part of the government it will get as good a break as ever, better than dealing with the shysters, the seven sisters in the oil consortium at Syncrude.

I cannot understand why the minister is not interested in mining gold. I do not understand why he does not ask some of his people about it, such as his deputy minister, who is very familiar with the gold mining industry. I am sure that if he sat down and discussed it with him he would find that what I am saying is true. He would find that mining is a very large employer of labour and that the labour is fairly easily trained. The labour force consists of many young people who are not particularly interested in working underground but are interested in the money they can earn, which is one hell of a lot better than what they would get on welfare or unemployment insurance.

If we would quit playing these games, we could start producing gold again as a hedge against inflation and against our dollar. Indeed, perhaps it would put us in a position to be able to help the United States do something about their huge debt, which may sink them if nothing is done about it. I do not think that the minister is doing his job if he does not give some consideration to how to get the gold mining industry back on its feet.

There are probably 30,000 small mines in Canada, and of those I would guess that 50 per cent could be put into operation with the price of gold being what it is today. Every time the price of gold goes up there is that much more incentive to mine gold in this country. I honestly believe that, and I am not trying to persuade the government to go back to the gold standard, though it might be a good idea. I would like to hear a good discussion as to why we should not. The reason why we cannot is that we do not have any gold reserves and are probably scared of the fact that Russia has a considerable amount of gold which it has not put on the market. It would probably do something for South Africa as well.

We have a former minister of mines from a provincial government sitting here. I am sure he is well aware of the areas of gold deposits like Kirkland Lake, Matachewan, Timmins, Geraldton and that whole area of northwestern Ontario which I am not very familiar with. Other such examples would be Snow Lake and Pickle Crow, areas which have produced gold in some quantity. It is a commodity which is Canadian and which is available. I see no reason for leaving it in the ground for our children or grandchildren. We should take it out and use it. It is a lot better than cutting down our forests, not planting trees to replace those we have cut, and leaving blueberry bushes and raspberry bushes for future generations. This gold could be used to build up our currency.

The reason we are not in a good position in the world today is because we have no manufacturing industry. What we have is the tail end of the American economy. There is no research or development.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: Well, we do have a couple of scientists in some of our plants. The hon. member probably knows where there are one or two good ones. I know there are good scientists in the research and development station at Petawawa, but what the hell are we doing with them? It is the government's intention to get rid of them, and that is what the ministers have done with almost every company in Canada. If they get a good patent here, they will take it home and maybe even take the inventor as well or perhaps leave him on the unemployment rolls in Canada. We have a long way to go before we can develop the research and development that will establish a viable manufacturing industry in Canada.

We also have a long way to go to establish a country that others will look at and see that it is financially stable and sound. All we are doing is balancing our trade with our raw resources. We can sell off the last of our timber in British Columbia, in northern Ontario or in Quebec; we can give away our raw materials in our mining industries. Nickel is a valuable commodity, not just to establish currency with, but it is a commodity used in almost all manufacturing throughout the world. We do not sell it as a manufactured commodity, however, but as a raw material. This generation is giving away the last of our birthright in order to try to balance our trade and retain our position in the world.

We will grow more trees if we are lucky and we will grow more wheat if we are lucky, but there comes an end to the amount of land available for trees and cereal grains. We do not even pick peaches, pears and grapes in Canada; we buy them from the United States. I was in the Niagara Peninsula in the last fruit season and you could buy Canadian grapes or Canadian pears and peaches there, but in Toronto I found most of them had come from the United States, not from Niagara. We are destroying whatever heritage we have of natural resources.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Andres: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member should be a little more correct in the statements he makes. I happen to be from the fruit growing area and I am a fruit grower myself. Every pound of fruit that was grown in Canada was sold to Canadians and was supplemented by American imports.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly the point I was making. We used all we had in Canada but we did not have enough even for the Canadian market and had to import fruit from the United States. I said that by the time you got to Toronto, which is 50 or 60 miles from the hon. member's area, you found that commodities in the supermarkets were American. We do not have enough fruit. We make wine out of our grapes. We do not sell grapes here; we import them from California.

We can go into any little confectionery store in Toronto, Ottawa, Winnipeg, or Vancouver and on the shelves there will be commodities from 50 countries. You would have to search very hard to find any Canadian commodity. At Moosonee, a tourist trap in my part of the country, you can pick up a souvenir like a totem pole or a little bear supposed to be carved from soapstone. When you turn it over you find it was manufactured in Japan. We are not going to compete in that field, Mr. Speaker.

We are giving away our basic resources in order to try to float our economy. It is one hell of an expense. When we borrow money, that is a hell of an expense too when every man, woman and child, and every old age pensioner in Canada, owes over $7,000 and we pay 10 per cent on that debt. There are very few countries with the resources to make that possible.

We have some resources, Mr. Speaker, so why are we not in the market? I am talking about bringing gold to a stage where it is .999 per cent pure—I am not suggesting we fabricate it, and I am not suggesting we ask people to go into the jewellery business. I am suggesting that we treat gold as a natural resource and start producing it to balance our payments. It would not be hard to raise $7 billion if we started to mine.

In my area there are several mills. One in particular is now operating at some capacity and is making considerable money. It is interesting that the miners with that company receive one cent per dollar every time the price of gold goes up. It does not amount to very much because they started at $50 or $60, which was considered to be the top. But now each of those miners gets well over $125 because of that one cent per dollar every time Canadian gold goes up. That mine is doing very well.

Kerr Addison has been closing for years. It is one of the largest mines in North America. Not long ago a newspaper article indicated that the life of the mine had been extended for another two years. I suggest they could have extended it for ten years if they had been sure of any stability in the price of gold. That company could mill 5,000 tons per day but it is now milling less than 700 tons per day. If the minister put some money into a consortium he could pick up the other 4,000 tons at a number of small mines in the area which we would operate. He could lease them and pay the owners a royalty per ton. If he did this on a large enough scale we could then afford to repair and rebuild for an increased milling capacity.

Then there is the mine known as the Upper Canada. God only knows who owns it, but the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources should be interested in it because he was one of the people who shut it down when he set up the petroleum corporation. He had a couple of partners and one was the main shareholder. When that partner needed money he took the money that was necessary to operate that mine and bought more stock in the petroleum company. He is dead now and I guess it does not make any difference to the petroleum industry, but it made a difference to the 300 or 400 people who were laid off. That mine is still in operating condition and if we had a consortium we could pick up that mine.

Mr. Corriveau: Oh, oh!

Mr. Peters: My friend over there is making a lot of noise. He should not laugh about mining in Quebec because the situation there is identical with the situation in my area. I know his part of Quebec quite well. Throughout the whole shield there is mining potential and possibilities. It is considered that there are ten or 12 mines in the Val d'Or area that could be operated if a consortium was put together with a management team. There are a lot of unemployed people in the hon. member's area who used to work at Noranda and Val d'Or and they would go back there again if they were given the opportunity.

The government can ignore this if they want, and I can tell you why they do. A few years ago they were totally blinded by the United States. The United States said to the International Monetary Fund, "We are no longer going to need gold; gold is not going to be considered a commodity." The United States removed the right to redeem paper for an equal amount of gold, so gold was downgraded and everybody was terrified. I am not suggesting it should not be but I am suggesting that there are very few countries in the world who want that, including those poorer countries that we are now selling gold to out of the International Monetary Fund in order to provide them with the means for development. They do not want United States dollars for that gold, nor do they want the gold to be sold; they want the actual gold to take home and put in their treasury so that money can be issued against it. Even the underdeveloped countries are not stupid. The United States always thought they were but they are not stupid. We are certainly finding that when we deal with them in the manufacturing field. In many cases they are quite right.

I honestly believe that we could have a gold mine industry with 3,000 or 4,000 people working in it within a matter of six months if the government gave the necessary leadership. This will involve the provincial governments because it involves leases and—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: There is consent.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order please. I definitely heard a no on the right hand side.

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the new member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker). Earlier I was pleased to accede to the request of his leader and allow him to make his first speech in the House on the day of his first sitting. I wish him a long and successful career in federal politics and I am convinced that the entire country will derive benefit from his talents.

Having said that, I would like to comment on Bill C-7 even if in the past some members have accused the members of the Social Credit Party of Canada, to which I belong, of often referring to money in their comments. Heaven knows we have been hearing about it for some time. Heaven knows that this small Bill C-7 which may appear insignificant—it has two pages at most—is deemed by the public as being of very minor importance.

However, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-7 includes a request by the government to the Parliament of Canada to increase its borrowing authority by the fairly large sum of $7 billion for the current fiscal year. This is a small bill but it has serious consequences. The estimates for the current fiscal year already provided for a deficit amounting to something like $11.5 billion; moreover, through Bill C-7, the government is asking parliament to give them an additional borrowing authority of $10 billion for the period beginning March 31, 1979 and ending April 1, 1980.

In both cases, it is stipulated in the bill that such loans will be used for public works and general purposes. However, Mr. Speaker, we are not told what are those general purposes. Is it to extend the Old Age Security Act to cover people who are between 60 and 65 years old? Is it to offer financial aid to the provinces so that in turn they can help municipalities where the property tax is too heavy for homeowners who can hardly finance the construction of roads, water works and sewers? Is it to increase funds for RRAP and the Canada Works program? There is no mention about it in the bill. But, in a question I put last week to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), I pointed out that the program was good but that it did not provide enough money for the provinces and the owners of homes in need of repair, so that in the end the program does not give the results we had hoped for. With regard to the Canada Works program whose budget was slashed by 20 per cent to 30 per cent, the situation is really deplorable at a time like this when unemployment stands at an extremely high level.

I know of municipalities in my riding where the rate of unemployment is something like 58 per cent. Those are not my figures but those of people who were hired to make surveys and collect them; the manpower centres supply them to us.

Mr. Speaker, adding the figures in clauses 2 and 3 of the bill, we find that we are dealing with loans totalling $17 billion. That is why I said a moment ago that the bill is indeed very heavy, though it does not cover much paper. The interest on the increase in the national debt is roughly $18 million a day, which represents $6.5 billion for the current fiscal year. With these recent borrowings, we might have to pay even larger sums of money in interests, which will further increase the financial burden of the taxpayers.

Mr. Speaker, when an individual, a family or a corporation makes debts larger than he or it should, he or it goes straight to bankruptcy, and the same can be said of governments. How could it be otherwise? Mr. Speaker, I would like to quote some figures so that the Canadian public, who have a right to know what is going on, can think about it and help parliament change what has to be changed if we are to improve the situation.

Has Canada's debt gone up or down in the last few years? Has the burden of our net national debt increased or decreased? We have to ask these questions and we have to get answers.

If so, would it not be urgent to change the way we finance the public sector? Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I believe it is the duty of this parliament to examine closely the alarming progression of the national debt. At the time the confederation was formed, on July 1, 1867, the national debt stood at about $75 million. Later on there was the cost of Canada's involvement in World War I as well as various other small undertakings that had occurred in the meantime, and also the economic crisis which lasted for ten years and was brought about by the crash at the New York stock exchange on October 24, 1929, exactly 49 years ago today, which is a sad anniversary but still an anniversary. The crisis was not triggered by Providence but by human beings, because the stock exchange is controlled by human beings, it is manipulated for one's own profit, it is operated by human beings, Mr. Speaker, and those who have a memory for facts must recall that during these ten years our country was poverty stricken, a great many Canadians experienced very serious difficulties, and this in an affluent society. I have known farmers in my area who did not have enough income to pay their debts, yet their stables were full of animals, their fields were producing bumper crops, but they were unable to pay, despite all the things they could sell, despite this plentifulness, there was nothing they could do, trade was paralysed, while in the cities, my God, people were dying of hunger because of a lack of distribution.

Afterwards, Mr. Speaker, our country's debt grew. Over 72 years our debt amounted to $3 billion, for 72 years, until 1939. By March 31, 1968, Canada's debt had reached $33 billion, and during that period there was World War II and other smaller conflicts like those in Viet Nam and in Korea where Canada participated, and we had to pay.

As of March 31, 1977, Mr. Speaker, nine years later, the national debt, as published in Hansard following a question I asked and which was answered on June 5, 1978, the net debt is estimated at about $67 billion and the way things go, I expect that by March 31, 1979 it will have soared to approximately $80 billion.

Mr. Speaker, we will not be able to continue to finance the public sector by this method without running the risk of leaving the next generation with a legacy of debts whose interest charge will paralyse economic progress and cause division between the various provincial and federal governments. That is not the way to ensure harmony in Canada. I have already said it in this House: it is the difficulties that governments have to find the money they need to meet their obligations and carry out their responsibilities toward their people that divide Canadians; that is the heart of the problem.

Mr. Speaker, it is written in Bill C-7 that the borrowed Funds will be used for public works. I am in favour of that because public works are likely to boost the economy, provided they are financed the right way—that is not the way it is done now as we have to pay five times the value of the work done to get it done once. I happened to have in hand a letter from the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation about a housing construction program in my constituency.

We, as members of parliament, are the ones who approve the funds needed by the CMHC to administer a housing program. And from time to time the CMHC enters into agreements with the Quebec Housing Corporation and as late as January 1977, the CMHC loaned $960,000 to the Quebec Housing Corporation for the construction of 40 housing units. But what is wrong with the system is that the Quebec Housing Corporation, through the provincial government, will have to tax Quebeckers at a rate of $4.93 for every dollar paid, which means that those people, who are Quebeckers, will have to pay for 200 housing units whereas only 40 units will be made available to the public.

Mr. Speaker, this is only an example of what is going on, and the same thing happens when the federal government builds, let us say, the Bank of Canada building across the street, the bank of all Canadians. Let us say the government will get the $50 million from chartered banks, either in bonds or otherwise, in order to put up that building, and will agree to reimburse $50 million over a 50-year period, and this at 10 per cent or 12 per cent interest rates. In other words, we would pay the cost of five of those buildings in order to get only one.

No doubt, Mr. Speaker, that I will be asked: What then is the solution you would suggest? The solution is this: to provide financing for the public sector, the federal government should use the services of the Bank of Canada. Some will say: But you will create inflation! You will put a lot of money into circulation regardless of the reality.

But, Mr. Speaker, what difference is there between putting $50 million into circulation after having borrowed it from financial institutions and putting that same amount into circulation after having borrowed it from the Bank of Canada? What difference does it make in terms of inflation? None whatsoever. But there would be a difference, for instance, in the public debt for, instead of paying 10 per cent or even 12 per cent interest the government would pay administration charges and that would not deprive the banks of their privilege to serve the private sector; on the contrary, they could better serve it and make the advance payments it needs to continue operating.

Mr. Speaker, that financing method must absolutely be changed, otherwise we are heading towards ruination. Public works! But they are necessary, and at the same time they would distribute money to the consumers; they will not buy out the Bank of Canada, but will have the money to buy consumer goods.

The Minister of Finance sitting on my right knows full well what I mean: He is the one who introduced a bill last spring inviting the provinces to cut their sales tax and give consumers more purchasing power. He did recognize at the time that Canadian consumers needed were purchasing power to buy more goods produced in Canada, to stimulate the economy of our country.

Mr. Speaker, there are also many things to be done all along the St. Lawrence, on both shores of the river. There are wharves going to ruin, others that must be preserved and others that cannot be maintained, depending on their future usefulness. When the municipalities come with their requests, the government says: We do not have any money for that. Retaining walls have also been built along the river. There are wharves like that in my riding everywhere. They are left to go to ruin. Private lands are in danger of being swamped over by the waves and when you ask the federal government to repair those works which cost Canadians a lot of money, there again they find all sorts of excuses to say that it is not the responsibilities of the federal government, go and see the provincial government. And when you do just that you are told to go and see the municipal government. Away you go to see the municipal government. They say: Well, we would like to but we do not have any money to finance that project. So everything goes to ruin because of a shortage of funds. Mr. Speaker, are we short of materials to provide those public services? Are we short of machinery? Are we short of workers to put the necessary materials together for those public utilities people could use? No. We have all that. What is missing? The dollar sign. The authorization to be able to carry out the work.

The Government of Canada just made a loan of $35 million to Cameroun for the extension of a wharf in the port of Douala. That is quite recent. That is a news published in today's Le Devoir. I have nothing against lending money to countries to improve their situation. The government made a 50-year interest-free loan with ten years of grace. About that, I once heard the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) answer a question put by my colleague and say: It is not interest-free, Canadians are paying the interest. That takes the cake, not only do we pay interest on our own borrowings but we have to pay interest on the handouts we make to foreign countries. That is nonsense! The government's classical answer is that those countries to which we are lending money will be buying Canadian products. Well, that is the least they can do.

I remember that during World War II I was a candidate in some by-elections and one general election. I heard such statements as: Canada lends money interest-free to England. Then, the ministers told us: Yes, but they buy our eggs, they buy our agricultural products. If a salesman were rich enough to advance enough money to his customers to empty his shop they would come and empty it, of course. But once the war was over, when we stopped lending money to England, they stopped buying our products. I hope that the countries which take advantage of our generosity will not play the same trick on us so that one day we will be stuck with the debt without having the market.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a long list of the loans made to different countries which was issued on June 28, 1978. If you look up Hansard for June 28, on page 6830, you will see that with the exception of a single country, all these loans were granted interest free and provide for repayment in 50 years and seven or ten years of grace. For all practical purposes, this is nothing else but a gift.

You will say, Mr. Speaker, that we have to be human and understand that others have urgent needs. I agree, but I would like to emphasize the fact that money is considered as the true source of wealth and that it is given more rewards than the work of man. The construction worker employed on the site of the bank of Canada will be paid only once for having installed a tile and the necessary fittings and for having put some parts together. On the other hand, the capital borrowed to build this project will be rewarded five times. Dollar capital is rewarded five times and human capital or work capital is rewarded only once.

Mr. Speaker, this reminds me that one day not too long ago I had a discussion in a public service with a colleague who is familiar with financial matters and who argued that money is the true source of wealth. For my part, I argued that true wealth is in possessions. I gave him the following example: Two men go on a hunting expedition; one of them is an expert in financial matters, his wife loves him and believes that he is right; the other is a worker, perhaps a farmer or an industrial worker. The wife of the financial expert does not forget to go to the vault and to take two $100 bills to put in his wallet, while the wife of the worker takes two loaves of bread, a pound of butter and a few fruits and put them in a packsack. The two men leave for their hunting expedition in great humour. They do not have a very good sense of orientation. They do not have a compass. Night falls and they have to sleep in the forest. The next day is cloudy and foggy, and as they do not have the sun to guide them, they spend that day and the next one in the forest. I therefore asked my friend which one of the two was the wealthier? Was it the one who had two $100 bills in his pocket or the one who had bread and butter in his bag? He admitted that it was the one who had bread. I told him: "Sir, you are intelligent. Why is it that when you are in the woods, you can reason sensibly, and that as soon as you leave, you are unable to reason and lose all sense of proportion?

Mr. Speaker, in our country we have organized our society like this: the constitution provides for three levels of power, the legislative power which we represent in this House, the executive power which is the cabinet, the Minister of Finance, all his colleagues and the Prime Minister, and the judiciary or the judges who examine our acts when taxpayers are not satisfied, who scrutinize our legislation and decide who is right and who is wrong. Above all this, Mr. Speaker, there is another level of power, about which the public knows generally nothing, least of all how it operates. It is the monetary power, the power to mint the credit of the nation, the power to influence the circulation of money and credit, the power to establish the duration of the circulation of financial credit, the power to require the repayment on terms fixed in advance failing which the product of your work will be seized. It is also the power to submit governments themselves by spelling out repayment and demanding as a guarantee the power that all governments have, that of taxing the citizens.

And, Mr. Speaker, this situation does not prevail only in Canada but every hon. member should have the time to read about this. I find it very interesting.

It was published in France, and I quote:

In France, money is where it is not needed and not where it is needed.

We could say that conditions are exactly the same in Canada. In the review dealing with monetary power, the following comment appears, and I quote:

The government and the banker of course are old pals. The government needs the banker who can provide his own credit. The banker needs the government because he must be under the cover of law and order.

Mr. Speaker, it is exactly like that in Canada. There is no difference. Things happen exactly like that and the article is entitled The real counterfeiters. Let us speak of the loan that the government would like to obtain. Bonds will be issued. Some of them will be bought by our chartered banks and under the law, it is legal. The bankers who will purchase those bonds will merely create the necessary money. Why is the government unable to do such an operation through the Bank of Canada? We should have good accountants in that institution! This is why the government is in a quandary and finds it difficult to do precisely what it wants to ensure the proper development of our society. Mr. Speaker, that situation is not news. In 1931, His Holiness Pope Pius XI denounced the power in the hands of private institutions. He said that this power is particularly noticeable among those who are the absolute masters and keepers of the money and mint the nation's credit as they see fit. He added that they control the economic blood of the nation to the extent that, without their permission, no one can even breathe. Nothing has changed since then because governments and parliaments, including ours, do not take the necessary steps to put some order in this field of activity.

Mr. Speaker, I want to catch the attention of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). When we were considering Bill C-56, I promised him I would give him a copy of a bill which was studied by the American Congress and which gave the American government full power to control the money supply. I kept my word. I gave the bill to the President of Privy Council and asked him to pass it on to the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance promised me he would consider it very seriously. I know he is a busy man, I know he is an overburdened man, but I still hope he will at least have enough time to take a look at it and that he will draw his inspiration from it when he will prepare his budget speech which he is supposed to table in the House in the near future.

Mr. Speaker, these are proposals which I consider serious and useful. I would just like to give the House an idea of what is the very substance of that bill of which I already gave a copy to the Minister of Finance. Here is what its introduction says:

> To give Congress the constitutional power to issue money and control its value; to guarantee a minimum income to every American based on a stable and equitable assessment of the dollar whose value should always be high enough to allow the public to buy at will the goods and services that American industries and businesses can make available to them; put an end to the practice by which certain groups of individuals use and create bank deposits with fractional reserves.

This is exactly what is happening in Canada under the Bank Act, and specifically section 72. That is the basis of our system. I would like to reassure bankers, who may be watching us on television, that I am not personally attacking them. I respect them, they are human beings. They inevitably do great service to society, but it is the very system which the act of parliament grants them that I am attacking, because it gives bad results. We know what those results are, I just enumerated them: doubling our debt in nine years and increasing it from $33 billion to $67 billion. That is not a normal system. That a government be forced to go down on its hands and knees before financial institutions in order to obtain the funds necessary to administer the country, that is not normal. An individual or a company may be forced to accept such conditions because that is the private sector, it is the pressures of supply and demand, the pressure of competition. Mr. Speaker, I see that it is getting late, but I would like to quote the comments of a taxpayer published in the Wednesday, October 11, 1978, issue of the Journal de Montréal. Sometimes we think that people do not observe us, that they are indifferent to what leaders do, but here is what this man says in an article entitled "The world is heading toward disaster," and I quote:

> Yes, you, our leaders, open your eyes, look around you and what do you see? Only depravation. The world is literally heading toward disaster. Animals and plants are disappearing, and you only think of wars and elections. For Heaven's sake, wake up! I think Canada, and indeed the whole world, should invest to save animals and trees. Look at the baby seals, the geese, the whales, make an assessment of the situation and you will see it is disastrous. Wake up and save the world! Be proud of being human beings, but show it. I hope that I have opened your eyes and that you are going to take the steps which are necessary.

It is signed by Christian Beauclair of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, of course we have in our society leftists and rightists, and we have people who claim to belong to the centre right, and so on. But those who claim to belong to the centre right should examine their conscience.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I wish to rise on a point of order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege.

Mr. Gillespie: Pursuant to Standing Order 75C, I wish to ask the House—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a question of privilege—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

[Translation]

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recognized the minister who seeks the floor on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: No, we have privilege here.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillespie: Pursuant to Standing Order 75C I wish to advise the House—

Some hon. Members: Question of privilege.

Mr. Dick: The question of privilege is on this side.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gillespie: I have the floor, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I understood the minister to have sought the floor on a question of privilege. I am informed now that he rose on a point of order. Since questions of privilege take precedence over points of order, I recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn).

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I am quite prepared to rise on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: You don't have a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Each hon. member will be recognized in turn. I recognize the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar first.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HNATYSHYN—CHANGE MADE TO OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): The question of privilege on which I rose at the earliest possible opportunity before ten o'clock—I see the clock is moving now to that point in time—relates to what I understand to be some question about the "blues" which have been changed with respect to the comments made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) this afternoon, a statement he made in the House.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, we in this House should observe the integrity of our record, Hansard.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar might have a very valid point of argument, but I think it should be presented at the proper time. Perhaps he could give notice now that he will raise a question of privilege at the proper time later.

[Translation]

Is the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) rising on a question of privilege?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, most respectfully on a point of order. I was still entitled to—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. Is the hon. member rising on a point of order or on a question of privilege?

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): First I would like to raise a question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Bellechasse on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): I had the privilege to continue my remarks, Mr. Speaker, because the time allotted to me had not expired yet. I had only a few minutes left and I hoped to conclude by ten o'clock but given the circumstances, I must call it ten o'clock and I will continue tomorrow.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. I said before I recognized the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the hon. member for Bellechasse who wanted to rise on a question of privilege that I would also recognize the three hon. members who asked for the floor. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

Mr. Gillespie: Pursuant to Standing Order 75C—

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Question of privilege.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I will recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) on a question of privilege.

MR. KNOWLES (WINNIPEG NORTH CENTRE)—IMPROPER USE OF STANDING ORDERS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege related to the rights of members of the House. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) was trying to get the floor while a member of the House still had the floor. He had no right to do that. It is against the privileges of the members of this House. Now he is trying to give notice of a motion after ten o'clock, notice of which can be given only during the regular sittings of the House. It is now after ten o'clock, and it is Your Honour's duty to call for the debate on the adjournment motion.

● (2202)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same question of privilege as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I call your attention to Standing Order 40(4) from which we can infer that even after ten o'clock business of the House may be dealt with, even before the "late show" has started.

Mr. Speaker, when the minister asked to be recognized on a point of order, he was perfectly entitled to do so, since he did not mean to present a motion but to make an announcement. There is nothing in the rules, on the contrary, which prevents a minister from rising from his seat before ten o'clock on a point of order to make an announcement. That is exactly what the minister was trying to do. It was not yet ten o'clock then, and even if it is now past ten o'clock, this is due to delaying tactics by some opposition members, Mr. Speaker. Under, I repeat, Standing Order 40(4), business of the House may be discussed at this stage, and what the minister wants to do is make an announcement which happens to deal with that very subject. In view of the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I ask that he be heard in keeping with the rules and his own right.

[English]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I point out that I had something to do with Standing Order 40. The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) quoted Standing Order 40(4). It does not give authority to present a notice of motion. All that Standing Order 40(4) permits is that after ten o'clock, during the late show period, there can be questions and answers concerning the future business of the House.

Mr. Pinard: That is the hon. member's interpretation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the minister wants to announce that tomorrow he will give notice of a motion to be put the next day, he can do so. But to stand up and try to give notice after ten o'clock, and thereby assume that he has the right to present that motion tomorrow, is a complete and utter violation of the rules.

Mr. Stevens: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the government wanted to do this, it should have done it on motions earlier today. It could have been done any time today when it had the right to get the floor. But the minister cannot do this after ten o'clock. The argument that he was on the floor at ten o'clock is completely invalid because the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) had the floor, and his time was not exhausted. The minister rose on a point of order. What point of order? What has my friend done wrong? Nothing at all. This is a complete violation not only of the spirit but of the letter of the rule under Standing Order 75C. I think Your Honour should now call it ten o'clock.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Ministre of Finance): I rise on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Minister of Finance.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I believe the minister was quite right. He had obtained the agreement of the Chair who had given the floor to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The opposition uses tactics not to recognize this. The Chair had decided to give him the floor before ten o'clock, and ever since that ruling opposition members have been trying to prevent the minister from exercising his right to speak on a point of order and to give a notice as provided under Standing Order 75C. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that he had the floor, that he has the right to put his question, because it is assumed it is not yet ten o'clock. His right to speak was taken away from him in a way not provided for in the Standing Orders.

[English]

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on this same point of order simply to reinforce and support the position put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Anyone in this House who rose under the guise of a point of order in order to move a new item of business or present a motion in the House, would provide Your Honour with all sorts of problems in the future.

• (2207)

I have personally at various times attempted to move a motion which I felt was legitimate and might receive the unanimous consent of the House, and the Chair has ruled that I could not obtain the floor for that purpose under the guise of a point of order. The fact of the matter is that the minister cannot do this unless he gains the floor in the normal course of the debate. I think that is the essential ingredient. If the minister has the floor in the normal course of a debate, he is then entitled to say what he wants and may move a motion that is appropriate. However, it is my understanding that it is completely contrary to the rules for a minister to attempt to pirate in a motion under the guise of a point of order.

An hon. Member: Trickery.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I agree that the word "trickery" covers what the minister has attempted to do. He is attempting to pirate a motion in to terminate this debate, and I think that is unacceptable under our rules.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have received some guidance from my advisers in respect of the rules. Just before ten o'clock the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert) was interrupted. Had the minister waited until that hon. member had completed his remarks he might have been recognized. However, the minister rose on a point of order and the hon. member for Bellechasse was interrupted. I returned to the hon. member who had the floor and he then requested that we call it ten o'clock. As a result, I have no alternative but to now proceed to the adjournment motion.

In accordance with Standing Order 40, a motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been moved. Therefore, the question is that this House do now adjourn.

Mr. Harquail: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. After the motion to adjourn is taken the Chair cannot recognize another member on a question of privilege or a point of order. I recognize the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier).

PUBLIC SERVICE—REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL—EFFECT ON SERVICE TO PUBLIC

● (2212)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on February 7, 1978, the Leader of the Official Opposition in a speech to the Junior Chamber of Commerce in Toronto proudly announced a startling policy concerning the personnel of the Public Service of Canada. It will be remembered that Mr. Clark announced that a Progressive Conservative government would enforce an absolute freeze on the hiring of civil servants and that his objective would be to reduce the Public Service of Canada by at least 60,000 jobs in the next three years by not replacing employees leaving their jobs for the many reasons we know, namely retirement, death, departures, and so on.

That freeze coupled with a major cutback are certainly drastic measures, Mr. Speaker, designed to boost the popularity of the Progressive Conservative party by rejecting the odious nature of their economic measures on the public sector and more particularly civil servants. So in the few minutes I have I will be trying to show the danger of such a proposal and caution those who for partisan purposes would like to have Canadian taxpayers believe that if they were in power they would know how to show leadership and come down hard on the backs of federal civil servants by arbitrarily reducing their numbers.

Mr. Speaker, we cannot accept that concept of political machiavelism that the end justifies the means. They are not telling the whole truth when they are spreading this dangerous myth that by reducing the number of government employees through an absolute freeze and not replacing those who resign they will come up with savings big enough to finance a major reduction leading to substantial cuts in taxes. That is just not true.

Among the many questions which will need to be asked and which we are entitled to have answered, the leader of the Progressive Conservative party will have to say which government services will be cut. Does he have in mind the inspectors of the Department of Labour, or perhaps the scientists at the Department of Environment, or even worse, the professional analysts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion? He will have to tell us which services will be discontinued or reduced. If he is suggesting he is thinking in terms of better manpower utilization, I would remind him that since 1975 there has been a significant decrease in the number of employees, and government managers are now working with a reduced staff that must meet the challenge and go on serving the Canadian people despite their reduced numbers. Moreover, it should be remembered that there is a competitive private sector, and if the workload of federal civil servants keeps growing without pay increases, they may prefer to find better jobs in the private sector. The impact would create problems at the hiring end, with the danger eventually of depriving the public service of competent and hardworking personnel.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, if the Progressive Conservative leader came to power, does he want us to believe he can govern this country without government programs? Will such a potential government be a janitorial government leaving to the private sector the leadership in ideas and services in the eighties, or will they simply be the foreman of the status quo? That government will certainly wish to leave their mark and that of important ministers, put forward government programs, perhaps improve and even better explain, research, expand with the help of civil servants the whole range of existing services, and indeed create new ones.

It is intriguing at this point, at this time of serious disputes between labour and employers, to hear the opposition leader suggest he would replace the right to strike in the public service by a tribunal empowered to deal with disputes bearing on the public interest, his so-called Public Interest Disputes Tribunal which he would charge with solving disputes between labour and management. Is he proposing an agency without civil servants, one administered by computers?

When Mr. Clark talks about increasing employment counselling services to make it easier for the unemployed to find a job, is he trying to suggest that he will not hire qualified counselling personnel to provide this essential service? And finally, when he speaks about taking away the right to strike of federal public servants, is Mr. Clark suggesting that in his relations with federal employee unions, these workers will remain silent and not take part in the debate? This is obviously a proposal that can only incite to illegality, Mr. Speaker, because taking away the right to strike of federal public servants will not solve normal conflicts between employees and employer.

I understand, Mr. Speaker, that as serious and fraught with consequences as these issues may be, they can be considered hypothetical because, in my opinion, even if the Progressive Conservatives came to power they could not implement such a disastrous policy. An analysis of both proposals, that is the freeze and the non-replacement of public servants, shows the ambiguity and the cynicism of the Progressive Conservative leader since he did not explain to the Canadian people how he would implement such a policy. Mr. Clark speaks about the federal bureaucracy. We should know if this definition includes all government services and if it covers not only the employees under the jurisdiction of the Treasury Board, but also all others under federal jurisdiction, that is those employed by Crown corporations such as Air Canada which are responsible to the federal government.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I submit—and I asked the minister about this in the House last week—that it is impossible to administer Canada and provide Canadians with the services to which they are entitled under the laws passed by this House if there is a complete freeze of hiring in the public service and an arbitrary decision to reduce the staff of the public service by 60,000. This proposal is dangerous for the public interest, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I must congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), who has shown once again his continuing concern for his electors, especially those who belong to the Public Service of Canada.

I cannot understand how anyone could pretend to serve the public interest by freezing hiring and simply letting the number of public servants go down haphazardly. The public service must implement the policy and the programs deemed necessary to provide for certain needs of the Canadian people. The number, the qualifications and the competence of the civil servants meet the criteria required to implement this policy and these programs. By allowing random cutbacks in the civil service, we would undoubtedly sacrifice essential tasks which are now being carried out. Since all such activities are linked to certain programs and certain services, these could no longer be maintained and the population would thereby be deprived of program or service which did meet their needs until then.

For instance must Canadian taxpayers accept cutbacks in medical services, in meat inspections, in food and drugs control or air traffic control? Should we let prison guards leave one by one or even all at the same time without ever thinking of replacing them? So the decisions related to the method and the speed with which to carry these cutbacks in programs and services would depend on the unpredictable decisions of civil servants to take their retirement or quit the public service.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this would be like putting the plough before the oxen. Those who leave the public service are not always those which it should be desirable to let go and those who stay are not necessarily the most indispensable elements. It is far better first to take the decision regarding the programs in a more rational matter and then readjust the size and the composition of the public service.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—PROPOSED STRIKE BY NORDAIR PILOTS—AIR CANADA CONTROL OF NORDAIR

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to follow up a question that I asked in the House yesterday. I put to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) the question whether the government has reconsidered its position with regard to Air Canada acquiring control of Nordair, or does the government intend to take the position that Air Canada should pursue that application? The minister replied in his usual studied and tortuous style, which consists not only of saying two hundred words when one of the words "yes" or "no" would satisfy, but which also conceals any hope for a reasonable answer.

In view of the answer given, which seemed to imply that the cabinet had not yet reached a decision on a matter which has been before it since June 29, 1978, I would like to ask the following question: Why has the government not taken a decision on this matter as yet? Even for this ridiculously inert and tardy government a decision should have been taken. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I think this government acts as slowly as it thinks, which is below the speed limit in most provinces. It has often been said, Mr. Speaker, that silence is golden and patience is a virtue, but since the members opposite are hardly a gaggle of mutes, I suggest strongly that they finally act like a government and show some leadership. Since it is the government, it surely must face the inevitable task, no doubt unpleasant for them, of taking a decision.

In the proposed Air Canada takeover the facts are quite simple and a decision should have been reached by now. Air Canada proposes to buy Nordair for $25 million. The agreement in principle was the culmination of a number of conversations between the two companies in which Air Canada agreed to buy shares at $11.50 each. It is reported that Air Canada regarded the acquisition of Nordair as a sound business investment.

To argue that the deal would not be good for Air Canada would be senseless since Nordair is a very profitable company with a consistent record of profits and a sound financial position. However, while the acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada may be good for that Crown corporation, it is certainly not good for the Canadian consumer.

My party is against the acquisition of Nordair for many reasons. Firstly, this acquisition would harm air transport competition in Canada. As it stands today, Air Canada controls something like 60 per cent of air travel in Canada mainly due to restrictions placed on other airlines by the Canadian Transport Commission. Since 1970, for example, Canadian Pacific Airlines has been limited to 25 per cent of all transcontinental seats in this country. Its dominant market position and strong financial position of something like $20 million in profit last year enables Air Canada to ignore the consequences of competition. Last year, for example, the airline was able to ground itself for ten days at the mere rumour of a strike without even having to glance a nervous eye at the balance sheet. They knew that people in Saskatchewan—and I have a particular interest there—people in the maritimes—and people in the northern Ontario had no other alternative but Air Canada. Thus, neither strikes nor lockouts or whatever can drive passengers away from Air Canada, and the management knows it. The Conservative party does not intend to further strengthen this dominant position but to open the airways to more competition.

A second argument against the proposed acquisition is that it goes against stated government policy of preserving the essentially regional airlines to service local routes. Air Canada's takeover would introduce it to regional routes when its purpose should be national and international. Our party has stated that it would ensure that regional routes of less than 500 miles would be left to the regional carriers.

Thirdly, as the former minister of consumer and corporate affairs has noted, the proposed acquisition might violate provisions of the Combines Investigation Act and those of the National Transportation Act. Of course, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that this government will be overly impressed with this argument as its previous attitude toward the participation of other Crown corporations in unsavoury affairs, such as the uranium cartel situation and the sale of nuclear reactors, has already demonstrated.

A fourth reason for our opposition to the proposed acquisition lies in a suspicion of the motives of Air Canada. Air Canada has stated that its "acquisition of Nordair's highly successful charter organization would be of particular interest to Air Canada, because of the national airline's determination to become more active in the significant and growing area of operations and marketing". It must be remembered, however, that it was Air Canada that opposed the introduction of advance booking charters.

Finally, in times of supposed government spending restraints, and remembering the government's often repeated assertion, more often than not straight from the horse's mouth of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), that it wants to encourage the private sector, it does appear ridiculous to permit this government body to purchase a profitable public firm.

Our party has not been afraid to give leadership. I have outlined our position on the Nordair takeover this evening. In view of the continuing procrastination and monumental indecision on the other side as evidenced by the answers which I received the other day, I would strongly suggest to this House that it is not for the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to come as he did into the House today and suggest that he is going to kick anyone in the slats, as he so eloquently put it, but for us to do exactly that to awaken this slumbering government.

Mr. Thomas H. Lefebvre (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): In reply to the hon. member who raised this question, it might be valuable to put on record once again the main reasons why the Canadian Transport Commission did not turn down the application by Air Canada to buy out Nordair. They are as follows:

1. Pacific Western Airlines acquisition of controlling interest in Transair gave western Canada strong regional carriers under common management and with common objectives. This created a need for strong regional carriers in eastern Canada operating from Montreal to Winnipeg. Nordair is profitable but the level of cash available has limited its dividends. The controlling shareholders wish to dispose of their interest in Nordair.

2. Air Canada intends to operate Nordair as a separate entity and as a regional carrier under the regional air carrier policy, the Aeronautics Act and the air carrier regulations. The act and the regulations would require the commission to approve any future merger of Air Canada and Nordair.

3. It is not in the public interest that Nordair fail or not be able to replace equipment. Nordair's cash flow had not been acceptable to its shareholders and the only alternative acceptable to the shareholders is the sale of Nordair. If sale of Nordair to Air Canada is not approved, then the result would be a period of insecurity and instability with respect to Nordair operations.

4. The acquisition of Nordair would not unduly restrict competition because there is little scheduled competition between regionals and there is limited competition between trunk carriers and regionals because of the regional air carrier policy. Financial results have not been satisfactory in spite of the limits on competition.

Points have been raised by nine petitioners, some of them very serious points. The government is giving close and careful consideration to all these matters. I can assure the hon. member there is no dragging of feet on this subject. The government is, as usual, taking a matter of such importance very seriously.

POST OFFICE—ALLEGED LOCK-OUT OF RETURNING STRIKERS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the reason I am rising tonight to take part in this adjournment debate is that Canada is in the midst of a postal strike which is causing serious disruption to our people. Delivery of family allowance cheques, social security cheques and accounts due to small businessmen and farmers is being withheld or delayed, and the over-all consequences for Canadians who are not involved in the strike in any way except as innocent third parties are tremendous.

The government used this situation as justification for asking parliament to legislate an end to this strike. Members of my party supported the government in this action. The post office provides an essential service; its activities are as important as those of any other single service throughout the economy and there is no way we can allow our people to continue to be victimized by these interruptions and stoppages. I urge the government to do its utmost to get the CUPW workers back on the job.

I hope the government will take full advantage of the provisions of the law which are available to ensure that members of the union who are on strike illegally return to work. If these measures fail, I believe that some of the 900,000 Canadians who are without jobs today should be given an opportunity to provide this essential service.

The reason I rise tonight to participate in this debate is that the government has spoken out of both sides of its mouth in this instance. In introducing legislation to legislate workers back to work last week, it indicated that the post office was an essential service and that Canadians could not afford to have this essential service disrupted. That is a position with which I agreed, and the people at the post offices at Fergus and Orangeville in my area of Canada agreed with that very directly. Indeed, in the case of Orangeville during the last great postal disruption the workers stayed on the job, kept the post office open and provided service to some 12,000 homes which were served by the Orangeville post office and by the various subpost offices which are fed through the Orangeville post office. For their efforts they found themselves blacklisted by the union, and it was only recently that the local in Orangeville was restored to full union participation.

Leading up to this strike the members of the local at Orangeville took a look at the situation. They decided that in the national interest it was essential that this public service be kept in operation. They felt they had an obligation to the communities they served to stay on the job and to keep the mail flowing, and they voted in a very responsible way. They decided to stay on the job. In addition to that, they decided to write to some 94 different locals across the country to urge their workers to stay on the job. They signed the letter "from proud Canadians" and gave their names. In response to those 94 letters they received some 19 replies, of which only four were not favourable. It was clear from the responses that there was a strong sentiment in favour of keeping the post office open and working for Canadians.

Post office workers in Orangeville and Fergus reported for work on Monday and Tuesday of last week, and they kept service going for members of the communities served by those post offices. However, what was their reward for doing so? Their reward was to be told on Tuesday afternoon that they were not to report for work on Wednesday.

The Post Office Department denies that those workers were locked out, but there is only one word which applies when postal management, as a result of a labour dispute, decides not to allow people who want to work to report for work. Management locks them out. Management locked the doors of the post office and told its workers that they could not come in and that they could not keep the service going. Having crawled out on a limb to provide an essential service to Canadians, these dedicated and patriotic Canadians found that post office management decided to saw that limb off. I referred to that in the House of Commons last week as a disgraceful betrayal by post office management of those dedicated workers. If anything, those words are too generous to postal management, who decided to lock its workers out.

What were the results? The first was that, having jeopardized their relationship with their union, having run the risk of retaliation from people who were unhappy with the stand they took, and having decided to keep service going for the many thousands of homes in the communities they served, they found that the doors were locked by Post Office management, that they were refused work and that they were told to go home without pay.

Surely these workers deserve better. Surely Canadians deserve better. If there is one lesson to be learned from this, it is that if postal management and the government decide in the future that they want to ask dedicated public servants to put themselves on the line, to make sacrifices in the national interest and to set an example for the rest of Canadians—the type of behaviour necessary if we are to deal with our pressing economic and social problems—then it is incumbent upon the post office and the government to ensure that these people are not left alone out in the cold. These workers and Canadians as a whole deserve much better.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to point out that on October 19 last the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) misled the House. Knowing the hon. member, I am sure he would not do so intentionally. He said then and he said tonight that postal employees in Orangeville, Ontario were locked out and sent home without pay. Similar allegations were made by his colleagues, the hon. member from Oakville and the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall).

Mr. Beatty: He will not be the hon. member for Oakville until after the election.

Mr. Collenette: In misleading the House I think the hon. member is demonstrating a trait of Conservative members in recent weeks. They have been taking extreme licence with the facts and contributing to the climate of apprehension throughout the country regarding this urgent matter.

With some patience the minister explained in the House that there had been no lock-out as this term is understood in labour relations circles. Perhaps the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo does not fully understand the term "lock-out" as it pertains to management-labour relations. The minister said that employees were sent home for lack of work. Such action is known universally as a "lay-off", not a "lock-out".

I hasten to explain that lay-offs are general practice when there is no work for employees to perform. The post office has laid off employees when there have been legal strikes, but it is not the practice of the department to lay its employees off when some members are on an illegal strike. Before the passage of Bill C-8, the strike of CUPW workers was legal. After the passage of Bill C-8 it was no longer legal and employees who wished to work were encouraged to do so. Even though, I am sure, the distinction is quite clear to the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo, he persisted in referring to what he called the disgraceful policy of lock-out, and he reiterated that comment tonight.

Later, in response to a question from the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), the minister further clarified the situation. Having consulted with his deputy minister and been assured that no cases of lock-out had occurred, the minister said:

There have been no "lock-outs" anywhere in the country, and therefore any employee who comes to work will be received and paid.

The minister went on to say that all post offices had been instructed to inform employees that they are welcome to come back to work and they would be paid. This statement has been repeated by the minister and by the department many times since. It has appeared in newspapers across the country and has had nationwide radio coverage.

Lest there be any doubt left in the minds of any members of the House, lest there be any doubt left in the minds of any postal workers, let me state again: the post offices are open to receive their employees. Employees who wish to return will be welcomed and they will be paid.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.35 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

NEW MEMBERS

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. As was the case yesterday, today there are five successful candidates from the recent by-elections to be introduced, and I will follow the same practice as yesterday regarding the time for motions pursuant to Standing Order 43, and questions.

I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Howard Crosby, Esq., member for the electoral district of Halifax-East Hants.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Jack Hare, Esq., member for the electoral district of St. Boniface.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Richard Janelle, Esq., member for the electoral district of Lotbinière.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Bob Rae, Esq., member for the electoral district of Broadview.

I also have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has received from the Chief Electoral Officer a certificate of the election and return of Tom Siddon, Esq., member for the electoral district of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta.

NEW MEMBERS INTRODUCED

Howard Crosby, Esq., member for the electoral district of Halifax-East Hants, introduced by Mr. Joe Clark and Mr. Robert C. Coates.

Jack Hare, Esq., member for the electoral district of St. Boniface, introduced by Mr. Joe Clark and the hon. W. G. Dinsdale.

Richard Janelle, Esq., member for the electoral district of Lotbinière, introduced by Mr. C. A. Gauthier and Mr. Adrien Lambert.

• (1412)

Bob Rae, Esq., member for the electoral district of Broadview, introduced by Mr. Edward Broadbent and Mr. Andrew Brewin.

Tom Siddon, Esq., member for the electoral district of Burnaby-Richmond-Delta, introduced by Mr. Joe Clark and Mr. John A. Fraser.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR POLICY STATEMENT ON DISARMAMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under Standing Order 43, arising out of the fact that this week has been declared by the United Nations to be a week devoted to fostering the objectives of disarmament.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be asked to make a statement in the House on the government's plans on the area of disarmament and, particularly, on the transfer of expenditures from the production and purchase of weapons of destruction to development so as to meet basic and human needs within Canada as well as throughout the world.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRADE

REQUEST THAT TRADE CONFERENCES BE HELD IN EACH PROVINCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As it is essential that this country start immediately to overcome our yearly trade deficit in fully manufactured products, the ones that produce the jobs, which is at present running at a record annual rate of more than $12 billion a year, and as one of the first important steps that must be taken is to have small and medium-sized producers become familiar with the assistance which the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce can give them to get into the export market and expand their sales of these very important products, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halton-Wentworth (Mr. Kempling):

That the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce be directed to organize large trade conferences in each of the provinces, the purpose of which would be to advise Canadian producers how they can expand their present operations by getting into the export market and, in this way, make available the additional jobs our people need.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

CRITICISM OF SENTENCE IMPOSED ON KEITH RICHARDS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to propose the following motion:

In view of the fact that the drug problem is increasing, particularly in this nation, the appropriate ministers of the government should give immediate consideration to appealing the preposterous and more than lenient suspended sentence imposed yesterday in Toronto on Keith Richards, of the Rolling Stones, on the charge to which he pleaded guilty, the possession of drugs, which sentence, among other things, provides that he and his associates should undertake to give a musical concert, a sentence which will be an encouragement to potential wrongdoers all over this nation.

I make no apology for proposing this motion, but I must say, as a member of four provincial Bar associations in this country, that I regard this as a very serious encouragement to drug users.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

PROTESTED SALE OF ELEVATORS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter that is urgent and pressing. In view of the fact that the federal government wishes to sell five grain terminals in western Canada and lease two other terminals in central Canada, even though these elevators are making money, since the sale of the western elevators could result in foreign multinational corporations using the facilities to undermine the Canadian Wheat Board and the farmer-owned country elevator system, and since Mr. Justice Emmett Hall termed their planned sale "a very retrograde step", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Yorkton- Melville (Mr. Nystrom):

That this House direct the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Transport to reconsider their decision to turn the federal elevators over to private interests, and in no case shall lease or sale of federal elevators be made to foreign multinational corporations.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an urgent matter of national interest.

In view of difficult conditions in the furniture and textile industries during the past few years, conditions which have somewhat improved especially in the furniture industry through the abolishment of the Quebec sales tax, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House remove the 12 per cent tax on Canadian manufactured products to reduce inflation, provide an economic stimulus and allow competitive prices which would boost employment in our country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

CALL FOR RESTRICTION ON FOREIGN OWNERSHIP IN CANADA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the statement the Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) made in a speech yesterday, that Canada lags far behind other industrialized countries in research and development, causing Canada to lose out on employment and trade opportunities, and that the minister puts much of the blame on the private sector, which provides only one-third of Canada's R and D effort, and points out that our branch plant system causes us to import 80 per cent of our technology, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House instruct the minister to convince his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, to stop using the Foreign Investment Review Agency as a "welcome wagon" and begin to restrict foreign ownership and its growth in Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The oral question period will continue until ten minutes past three.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

INDEMNIFICATION OF COURT COSTS OF MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. Is it the policy of the government that RCMP officers acting with the expressed or tacit approval of their superiors be protected or indemnified in the event that in the course of their duties they transgress the criminal law, civil law or common law, such indemnification to take the form of such things as payment of fines, legal fees, assurances of continued employment, and so on? Is that the policy of the government?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman undoubtedly is referring to matters that came out of the McDonald inquiry yesterday. The matters which he is addressing have been dealt with in that context. I can assure the hon. gentleman that this government has indicated in the past, and will continue to indicate, that it will not condone or tolerate any illegal act on the part of the RCMP, and it follows from that policy that indemnification is not forthcoming.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, in view of his answer that that is not the policy of his government, would the minister indicate to the House the date upon which that policy ceased to be effective, and which of the minister's predecessors was responsible; or did it cease since the hon. member became Solicitor General? Also, would the minister undertake to table in the House the directive by the Solicitor General ordering the cessation of that particular policy?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge, that has never been the policy of this government.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, the Solicitor General has referred to the events of the past 24 hours or more. Is the minister saying that he has not consulted with one or more of his predecessors, particularly in the last 24 hours, to determine the nature of that policy, who was aware of it, who approved it and who approved its continuance as government policy since 1970? Is the Solicitor General saying that he has had no consultation with either the Prime Minister or his predecessors to determine when that policy ceased to exist?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I find it most unfair for the hon. gentleman to imply by his questions that any policy of this nature has been one of this government. I indicated to him, and my predecessor indicated previously, that there was not to be any carrying on of any illegal activity by the RCMP or any of its branches. That has been clearly defined, Mr. Speaker.

When there was any indication of questionable conduct on the part of the RCMP, those matters were raised and referred to an inquiry which is studying those matters at the present time. That is quite categorical, and we hold by what has been advanced in this House previously.

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Allan Lawrence (Northumberland-Durham): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister. I am sure that all members of the House were under the misapprehension when I asked a question yesterday about documentation relating to ex-Commissioner Higgitt's testimony yesterday—all of us, including the Prime Minister, were under the misapprehension that no such documentation had been forthcoming. In actual fact, a memorandum was filed yesterday which reads in part:

You will be aware that certain tasks performed by SIB or CIB personnel require that the law be transgressed, whether it be federal, provincial or municipal law, in order that the purpose of the undertaking may be fulfilled.

There is no question there that members of the force would have to transgress the law. My question to the Prime Minister is simply this: because of ex-Commissioner Higgitt's very definite declaration that the principles and policies emanating from that memorandum were discussed by him with one minister, Mr. George McIlraith, with one Mr. John Turner who was then a minister, with the Minister of Supply and Services and the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, would he reiterate, or state again for us that each of these ministers has denied to him that they had knowledge of or any discussion relating to the need for this policy?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did not know yesterday, and I did not know today until this moment, that such a document was tabled by the commission yesterday. If such a document was tabled by the former commissioner of the RCMP, it just proves the wisdom of my suggestion yesterday that we should not embark on a running commentary on what is happening before the commission, that being unfair to a lot of people including those just named by the hon. member. No doubt if Messrs. McIlraith, Turner and the others had been informed that their names would be produced in this way and would be repeated in the media and by the opposition, they would have wanted to instruct counsel and have their point of view exposed and presented to the commission as I am sure they will now.

Therefore, I think the conclusion is quite evident that we are doing great unfairness to a lot of Canadians by just listening to one version of a particular set of facts and not hearing the other side. The commission itself must be aware, of course, of this unfairness which results not from its procedures but from the way in which they are constantly being interpreted in this House and repeated by the media.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, of course, I hope the Prime Minister was aware that I was not talking about a defence which I am sure will be forthcoming by these particular individuals. I was asking the Prime Minister if he would indicate that, to the best of his knowledge, each of these ministers has indicated to him or has denied to him that this topic was discussed. But because this memorandum reached right into the Prime Minister's own committee on security matters and, as a matter of fact, was endorsed and sent along by the secretary of the Prime Minister's own committee, and because I have seen no indication yet that the Prime Minister is going to appear before the McDonald commission, may I ask the Prime Minister if he denies that he had any knowledge of the principles, or discussion or need for the policy enunciated and reiterated by people who are on his cabinet committee?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I said I did not know until a moment ago that this document existed and had been produced. Therefore, how could the hon. gentleman ask me if I had discussed this testimony with any of the people mentioned by the hon. member? I did not know it existed. Therefore, surely I could not phone them and say, "Were you aware of this? Did you know about this?" I just said I did not know it had been deposited in testimony. I have no recollection of the existence of such a document.

Mr. Lawrence: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I do not intentionally mean to mislead the Prime Minister or the House. I am not talking about the document; I am talking about the principles and the policies which were enunciated and which obviously flowed from the document, and the document talks about the need for illegal acts. I am talking about the policy, the principles and the discussion relating to that, not necessarily the document.

I ask the Prime Minister again: is he denying to the country at large that there was any discussion of the need within the government for such a policy? I am not talking about the document.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman is not talking about the document, but he is talking about principles and policies which flow from a document of which I have no knowledge and which I have no recollection of ever having seen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I suggest that the hon. member is indeed mischievous in his questions.

TESTIMONY OF FORMER RCMP COMMISSIONER BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, agreeing with the Prime Minister's expressed concern about fairness to all the people whose names have been mentioned particularly in the last 24 hours before the McDonald inquiry, I would like to ask him in a most serious way concerning the fact that the former commissioner has said that the acts of illegality were, and I quote, "discussed with the ministers from time to time, orally and in written form".

Given the gravity of this accusation about ministers of the Crown which has been made by a former commissioner of the RCMP, in order for the public to see that fairness is being done will the Prime Minister now give the House unequivocal assurance that when the minister so named gives testimony before the inquiry, the government lawyer will not be instructed to urge the discussion related specifically to these illegal matters be held in an in-camera session?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the New Democratic Party talks about the gravity of the accusations made by former Commissioner Higgitt. I do not believe former Commissioner Higgitt made accusations about anything yesterday. He was stating to the best of his recollection what he thinks took place. I indicated that the best of his recollections may have been contradicted by himself on some other occasion. But in a sense that is secondary. I think the important point is that he is not making any accusations. I could not say as much for people on the other side of this House; they are obviously making accusations and entertaining suspicions about a set of testimonies which have shown one very partial aspect of the whole question.

The government has set up this commission and has said repeatedly that ministers would testify as called upon, that we would produce and have produced every document asked for. I just continue to make the plea, let's hear every side of the question before making any decision on this and casting any aspersions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister took a minute and a half not to answer the question. The question was an attempt to get fairness for the ministers involved, fairness that would be perceived by the public. The Prime Minister may not consider the statements made by Mr. Higgitt to be grave, but I can assure him that all Canadians interested in the principle of the rule of law do indeed consider them to be grave, if accurate. So I would like to ask him a question, and I hope he will give a straightforward answer. When these accusations or statements made by Mr. Higgitt, namely, that ministers were informed both orally and in writing about the illegal activities that were undertaken or about to be undertaken by the RCMP, are discussed before the McDonald inquiry, will the Prime Minister assure the House that counsel for the government will not request that those hearings be held in camera but, in fact, will do the opposite: request that they be held openly so the people of Canada can hear all that ought to be heard?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member corrects me and says that the matter is grave. Of course it is grave, and it is because it is grave that I have urged members on the other side and members of the media to report this in a way that does not suggest that there is any guilty person involved. We will see. That is the job of the commission to find if indeed—and they, I believe, are the first two items of the terms of reference—there has been any breaking of the law by police officers, by ministers of the Crown or by anybody in between.

We believe that if the commission made such a report, we would not hesitate to refer the subject matter to the attorneys general of the provinces where the alleged misdeed would have been committed. The Minister of Justice said this a few days ago. I said it a couple of weeks ago in this House. We even went on to say that in matters where confidentiality and secrecy were involved, we would bend over backwards to make sure that no privilege or secrecy was invoked if it were a matter of attempting to hide some guilty person. But this being said, I leave it to the commission to decide if a hearing of any minister or of any commissioner or former RCMP officer of whatever rank be in camera or in public. I think that when the hon. gentleman is suggesting that if something happens in camera, the people of the country, Canadians, and members of the House can have no confidence, I am suggesting they are casting very serious aspersions on the commission itself.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It is not the credibility of the commission which should be attacked here. I understand the credibility of the government is attacked. We have said to the commission "okay, you hear the matter". But surely we have to trust somebody. If we are taking as a definite position that the commission cannot be trusted when it operates in camera, then let's abolish the commission.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I am tempted to suggest that the Prime Minister needs a little lift in the lower part of his anatomy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: He took almost two minutes, again, Mr. Speaker, not to answer the question, which is very serious.

This morning before the commission, Mr. Nuss, acting on behalf of the government, once again intervened, once again requested a certain matter not be discussed, and in fact he was following the general request made earlier by the government, acting under the old cabinet secrecy provision that could undermine the credibility of this whole commission. I ask the Prime Minister: will he give a clear answer this time? When the matter of whether or not the ministers were informed, orally or in writing, is discussed before the commission by the ministers themselves, will he make sure that counsel does not request an in-camera session at that point but urges that the session be in public?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, we are, again, discussing some testimony before the commission of which I have no knowledge. I do not know under what circumstances—

An hon. Member: Check with your staff which was there this morning.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, if the opposition would shut up a little bit, I could—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know under what circumstances the lawyers of the commission made that representation. It may have had to do with some Privy Council secrets; I do not know. That is why I say it is unwise to ask me or any minister, day by day, to comment on the ongoings before the commission, whether it be testimony by a witness or whether it be actions by a lawyer. I do not instruct them daily and I do not follow daily what is happening, nor should I. I trust the commission.

• (1442)

When the hon. member is suggesting that the course pursued by this lawyer undermines the credibility of the commission—I think his words were—he is precisely showing that I had answered his question. I had even anticipated his very feeling that somehow when the commission goes in camera, its credibility is being undermined. That is what the Leader of the New Democratic Party says. I say that is not the view of the commission: we trust the commission whether it operates in camera or publicly.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR REMOVAL OF TAX ON MANUFACTURED PRODUCTS

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance who, by the way, had a rough time when he came to my riding. I wish him more luck with his next budget.

Given the fact that the abolition of the sales tax on clothing and furniture in the province of Quebec has proven profitable, does the minister intend to follow the example set by the government of Quebec and abolish the 12 per cent sales tax on manufactured goods, which is a federal tax?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to the hon. member that he has made a good start, but also that he shows some partisan spirit. I would also like to remind him, about the sales tax in Quebec, that in January of last year, the Quebec finance minister, who had received representations from the footwear industry, said the abolition of the sales tax was totally out of the question. He changed his mind only after the federal government and myself had taken that initiative in our budget. It goes without saying that I consider all proposals in that field and I will provide in my budget what is in the best interests of all Canadians since I represent all Canadians and not only a part of Canada.

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT PROPOSES BUDGETARY CUTS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Richard Janelle (Lotbinière): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of Finance seems more inclined to reduce provincial sales taxes rather than his own under the guise of economic recovery, would he tell the House why he is making budgetary cuts, supposedly to sustain such a recovery, and lets the Bank of Canada increase its prime rate to 9.25 per cent, a policy which goes against his decisions?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member is going to learn that monetary matters go far beyond the Creditiste theory and that there are national and international realities which have to be accounted for. As to what I am going to do with my budget, I will be glad to announce it to all members in the House when I introduce it in a few weeks.

[Mr. Trudeau.]

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. It would appear from a reading of the transcript of the proceedings yesterday before the McDonald commission that there was a practice to have weekly meetings, sometimes twice a week, with the Commissioner of the RCMP and the Director of Security and Intelligence in attendance with whoever might have been the minister at that time responsible for the Department of the Solicitor General, that the RCMP were very meticulous about informing the Solicitor General about such matters and actually required that he signed the documents relating thereto.

Was the Prime Minister aware of this practice of regular meetings with the Solicitor General? If so, was he aware as to whether policy matters were discussed at those meetings relative to those matters under inquiry by the McDonald commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): On the first part of the question, Mr. Speaker, the general answer is yes, of course. When I appointed ministers, one of the first pieces of advice I gave them was to meet very regularly with their staff and the various heads of agencies which came under their general authority. Therefore, I would have been surprised if the contrary had happened, that there had not been regular meetings between the Commissioner of the RCMP and the head of Security and Intelligence and either the minister or deputy minister according to the necessities of the day.

As to whether they discussed the matters which are before the McDonald commission—and I believe that is the question—I suppose they did. It was their job to discuss matters which are handled by the police on a day to day basis and as a policy basis. However, I do not know the details. I do not know if they signed documents on that occasion. How could I be expected to know?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, that raises an interesting apparent contradiction between the government's stance, that the Prime Minister and his respective solicitors general knew nothing of the policy referred to by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot and by the previous questioner on this side.

There were nine exhibits entered into the proceedings yesterday, all of them shot through with policy statements. In view of his answer that the government had no knowledge of the policy upon which he was questioned, is the Prime Minister saying that the RCMP made this policy and did not inform the solicitors general? If that is the case, it seems that the solicitors general were, respectively, very negligent in their duties by not requiring the disclosure of that kind of policy.

Mr. Trudeau: If that were the case, Mr. Speaker, not only the ministers would have been negligent; obviously, the police would have been usurping powers if they were determining policy. I have made it quite clear to this House on many occasions that the policy was determined by the government. It was enunciated in various ways. It had been enunciated in this House by the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes. He gave a very lengthy statement of policy when the whole subject matter became available to the government. Various committees, including the committee on security and intelligence, were set up by myself precisely to give policy guidance to the RCMP.

In policy matters it is, of course, obvious that the government should give the direction and the police should obey. I have said on other occasions that on the day to day operations, the detail of operative so-and-so at the end of the line, and the way he was collecting information or conducting an investigation, was not a matter of discussion in the committee which I chaired. I suppose, except in exceptional circumstances, when the police ask for guidance it probably would not be the business of the respective minister to every day find out all the day to day actions of the police in the ten provinces across the country.

Mr. Nielsen: A final supplementary, Mr. Speaker. In view of the exhibits that were introduced in evidence yesterday, and the fact that they dealt with the policy of indemnifying RCMP officers as described by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot, how then can the government now deny that they were aware of that kind of activity and policy? How can they deny it at this stage?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says, in view of the exhibits deposited yesterday. I said three times today—and I say it a fourth time—I have not seen those exhibits; I do not know what is in them.

If there is a general accusation, as I understand from one of the questions, that the government had decided to indemnify police who broke the law, the answer has been given by the present Solicitor General. There is no such policy. I know of no such policy. If there is such a policy, it will be up to the royal commission to find out where this policy originated, whether from the minister or the police, and what was its justification. However, that is the job of the commission, not of the hon. member nor myself.

POST OFFICE

RETURN TO WORK OF CUPW MEMBERS—JOB SECURITY

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Postmaster General. We all know that the Postmaster General has, by notice under date of October 24 from the desk of Postmaster General, advised the membership of CUPW that if they do not return to work by 12.01 a.m. tomorrow, they will be out of a job. Section 27 of this act reads as follows:

> An employee . . . may by an appropriate instrument in writing to the commission be declared by the deputy head to have abandoned the position he occupied and thereupon the employee ceases to be an employee.

Has the Postmaster General made up his mind as to whether he will instruct the deputy minister to follow the strict provisions of section 27? Has he made up his mind about whether the deputy minister should write to the Public Service Commission indicating that certain employees have abandoned their jobs and are no longer employees?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, section 27 of the act is very clear. I think we will have to act on that legislation the way it is written. However, I do not think it has ever been the intention of this government to penalize good, honest and law-abiding workers. Obviously, every case will be considered. All evidence regarding each worker will be considered and each case will be judged on its merits. The 14 district directors will review the facts presented to them, because some workers might have reasons for not coming back to work. I will give examples of those reasons in a few moments. Those 14 district directors will then report to the deputy minister, who will notify the Public Service Commission and then a decision will be taken.

I think it was very wise to allow our workers to be on notice that this section is in existence. Most of our workers did not know it was, so I think it was wise to make them aware of the position into which their leaders were putting them and the risk they were taking by listening to the counsel of their leaders not to abide by the law and to refuse to go back to work. I can inform the House that at one o'clock this afternoon, 34 per cent of CUPW membership was back to work and about 89 per cent of the membership of the LCUC.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Canadian people will be interested in the answer just given, but if my memory serves me correctly I do not think the Postmaster General actually answered my question. I asked the Postmaster General if he has made up his mind to instruct the deputy minister to follow the provisions of section 27 of the act. Has the minister instructed the deputy minister to follow those provisions or is this matter being held in abeyance?

Mr. Trudeau: What would you like, Linc?

Mr. Alexander: I would just like an answer, and I thank the Prime Minister for helping me. Would the minister kindly answer that question?

Mr. Trudeau: Whose side are you on?

Mr. Alexander: I am not on your side.

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think the answer is very simple: the section is there and it will be applied wisely and in fairness to the workers. It will be applied, but as I said before—and I do not want to repeat everything—I have many communications. I spoke to Vancouver this morning, and I have heard from many parts of the country about good, honest and law-abiding workers who want to go to work but because of intimidation, fear of picket lines and some of the acts of their leaders, they do not want to go back to work. I am not going to penalize all these people. This section will be applied, but in fairness to all workers. It will be applied justly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

INQUIRY AS TO NUMBER OF HERRING DRAW-NET FISHING LICENCES TO BE ISSUED IN QUEBEC

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, in the last few days hon. members of the opposition have been fishing around about the McDonald commission; I should therefore like to do the same with regard to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and Chaleur Bay. My question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. I should like to advise him that the people of Gaspé are happy to participate in the national program for the promotion of fish products. However, it is impossible to promote a product such as herring since the minister has yet to issue the licences to both the fishermen and the fishing boats in the province of Quebec. Does the minister feel that the riches of the Gulf of St. Lawrence belong as much to Quebeckers as to maritimers, and does he expect to announce soon the number of licences that will be issued in Quebec for herring draw-net fishing since Quebec fishermen would like to have their share of the Canadian quotas?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the representations of the hon. member and some of his colleagues in the last few weeks in this regard have led me to reassess completely herring fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence for the coming season. I trust we shall be able to make changes which, up to a point, will go against the proposed objectives. On the other hand, I must say to the hon. member that quotas are not at all allotted on the basis of geography, and provincial boundaries. On the contrary, it happens that some fisheries develop well in certain areas, for instance, tuna in Prince Edward Island, and very little in other parts of the maritimes. In the case of herring, we find considerable development in New Brunswick but rather little in the immediate vicinity. In the case of shrimps, there is much development in the Matane area but less elsewhere. We shall try to be fair with everyone but I must say to the hon. member that I shall resist allotting quotas on a strictly provincial basis.

TAX RECOMMENDATIONS OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: —I have a question for the Minister of Finance. In its annual report released this morning the Economic Council recommended a selective reduction in personal income taxes, a cut in the federal sales tax and a major federal-provincial capital works program, all of which this party has been recommending that the government bring in to deal with the serious problems of slow growth and high unemployment in the country. Does the minister agree with the recommendations of the Economic Council of Canada?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have a new adviser in the House today.

Mr. Gillies: You can use all the advice you can get.

Mr. Chrétien: I have read the recommendations of the Economic Council. I met with the Conference Board but the hon. member for Ottawa Centre was not there.

Mr. Alexander: He is here now.

Mr. Chrétien: I met with the C. D. Howe Institute, and I will meet with other advisers. That will help me to make up my mind for the budget next month, and I will also take note of the views of the hon. member.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I may be a new boy in town, but I think I can recognize when a question has not been answered.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: Since I have been appointed an adviser to the minister, I should like to draw his attention to the fact that the Economic Council has also stated that the federal government's austerity and cutback program would require a sustained increase in private spending which would be unprecedented in the last 50 years in Canada. If the minister does agree with the council's analysis, and if he does agree with my advice, will he reconsider and suspend the government's present policy of restraint and cutback which is only increasing unemployment insurance payments and welfare expenditures?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, one piece of advice I will not take from that corner of the House is that we should impose exchange controls in Canada at this time. I am glad that the hon. member now says he does not recommend that, but that is exactly what the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge is recommending all the time on television.

However, I will consider the advice of the Economic Council. I will make up my mind, and I am sure that whatever I do, the hon. member will be very quick to disagree on the night of the budget.

TRANSPORT

STRIKE OF NORDAIR PILOTS—PROPOSED ACQUISITION OF NORDAIR BY AIR CANADA

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport in connection with the strike of Nordair pilots, which is complicated to quite an extent by the pending acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada.

Since this proposed acquisition has already been partially responsible for two strikes involving pilots and will probably be a contributing factor in a third strike involving Nordair machinists, and since the delay by the cabinet in rendering a decision with respect to the appeal regarding the takeover is causing much confusion and uncertainty in the transportation industry in Canada, I wonder if the minister can explain to the House why the decision is taking so long, and will he tell the House when a decision will be reached and when it will be announced in this House?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, first I should say that it is surprising to me that the issue of Air Canada's acquisition of Nordair keeps being linked with various labour disputes, because the CTC has made it very clear that in its view the operations should be kept quite separate and independent.

Certainly, anything this government has said has indicated that we support that view at the very least. In addition, of course, the fact that in the case of Nordair an agreement might have been signed for one year, which would have avoided the problem, and negotiations could have included any such issue in the future, seems to be another reason why it should not have complicated the issue, notwithstanding that the government is very close to concluding its consideration of the issue, and I am optimistic that we will be able to make our views known on the various appeals of the CTC decision quite soon.

Mr. Mazankowski: The matter is indeed clouded by the fact that it is part of the negotiating parcel that the pilots are considering, and the fact that it is now being considered by the cabinet certainly adds to the confusion.

May I ask the minister whether the government is considering any other options or alternatives vis-à-vis the takeover, and may I also ask him, when the decision will be rendered, whether it will be accompanied by a statement on the domestic air policy in this country which would cover the operations of third-level regional and trunkline carriers so that we could get some stability and sanity and some degree of continuity in the application of an air carrier policy upon which such acquisitions could be based, with some clear understanding?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the possibility of resolving a good number of the questions to which the hon. member refers is among the reasons for the longer time that cabinet is taking in considering this matter. I cannot say, in advance of the final decision of the cabinet, how much of that we will be able to do at the time of the decision in relation to the Air Canada acquisition of Nordair shares.

PUBLIC WORKS

GOVERNMENT LEASING OF OFFICE SPACE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works regarding the $750,000 that was wasted last year in paying for empty office space under a lease agreement, and also another $3.5 million which will be wasted in the next six years if this nonsense keeps up. I want to ask the minister what action he or the government will take to stop this waste of money.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is referring to the building in Montreal which was leased about 15 years ago for ICAO, the United Nations' agency, which Canadians were most anxious to have established in this country in the period following the Second World War. It was a 20-year lease. Approximately 15 years into that lease, ICAO indicated they were not happy with those quarters, and they were relocated in other quarters. Unfortunately, we had to comply and assist them in finding alternate space.

What we are doing now is endeavouring to negotiate with the landlord a quit lease, and we expect to do so for substantially less than the $3.6 million to which the hon. member referred. In addition, we would save the operation costs which would normally be paid over the coming years, as well as the taxes.

Mr. McKinley: Why has the minister's department continued to build lavish new office space for the government, while the space I mentioned was available? I can think of many small post offices throughout different parts of the country, the building of which has been delayed because of the minister's program and because all this other waste of money has been going on.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, we were in the position of having a binding lease. Frankly, we looked at the option of revamping or bringing the building up to standard, which would cost approximately $11 million. Since we were a tenant, as opposed to being the owner, we felt that it would be a bad investment. We have been endeavouring, for the last year and a half, through calls for public tenders, through negotiations with developers and also through working with local realtors, to find tenants. Unfortunately, we were close to having one in the latter part of 1976 but this particular developer backed off after the election of the Parti Québécois government in the province of Quebec, and since that time we have not been successful in finding an alternate tenant.

OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

INQUIRY WHETHER BUDGETARY CUTS WILL AFFECT FUNDS FOR TEACHING OFFICIAL LANGUAGES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Secretary of State concerning the budgetary cuts and their potential effects on payments under federal-provincial agreements regarding official language teaching which end in March 1979.

My question concerns the use the provinces make of these federal funds and the lack of public information regarding the manner in which this money is allocated by the provinces.

Given the interest expressed by several members of the House and the concerns voiced by spokesmen for non-government organizations over the renewal of these programs for another five years, can the minister tell the House if a total freeze or a cutback will apply to these payments, and if the new agreements provide for an accountability procedure to make public the breakdown of federal funds spent by the provinces to help and encourage the learning and use of the country's two official languages?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, there is indeed a freeze on funds available for these payments, which means that another agreement is to be signed for 1979 to 1984. Such an agreement is being negotiated and if we are successful there will be a freeze of about $140 million on these payments.

The funds may be available if another agreement is signed. The issue raised by the hon. member that concerns the lack of accountability, specific objectives, evaluation of criteria, is precisely one of the aspects which greatly interests us. It must be discussed during the negotiations with the provinces for a new agreement.

TESTIMONY OF FORMER RCMP COMMISSIONER BEFORE McDONALD INQUIRY

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister a question. The reason and purpose of the question is the following. It is not in reference to what has been the evidence at the McDonald commission, and I agree with the Prime Minister that the commission must weigh the evidence, the pros and cons, and the credibility of witnesses.

My question arises because of the fact that the solicitors general have made statements in the House, in answer to questions asked in the House, which are diametrically opposed to the evidence contained in the depositions yesterday of Mr. Higgitt found at pages 13,757, 13,758 and 13,780. Has the Prime Minister read the evidence of Mr. Higgitt and, if he has, has he taken his responsibility as Prime Minister and discussed that evidence with the solicitors general to determine whether the credibility of those ministers in answering questions in this chamber is in question?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I did answer that question yesterday when it was asked of me and I indicated that although I had not read the testimony of Commissioner Higgitt, nor do I intend to read the testimony of the various witnesses before the commission, I had been informed of the particular allegation that he made.

In the short space of time after I learned this at lunch time and the opening of the question period, I asked one former solicitor general who happened to be around whether there was a contradiction. I indicated the answer to that yesterday. But I think it is important to add, because the hon. member used the words that ministers in the House have made statements which are diametrically opposed, and so on, that indeed they have made statements in the House, sometimes prepared statements, sometimes in answer to questions, and I suggest that, unless I am mistaken, it is the rule of the House that we must take a minister at his word—or, in fact, any member of the House at his word—when he makes a firm and clear statement. If members on the other side are claiming to do the contrary, let them stand up and say so and challenge the minister with having in some way made a misstatement or a false allegation. Then the due process of debate will follow. No doubt there will be a reference to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections or the committe on orders and regulations. Until that happens, I suggest that the hon. member for Calgary North and others should take members at their word.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the Prime Minister has set out the rule that we must accept the statements of ministers. Also, I appreciate his other statement that if we take the opposite view, that credibility is in question, we can challenge that question. But we have to get at the facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Woolliams: I am asking the Prime Minister, now, if he will read the depositions, then discuss it with the ministers and give us the facts so that we on this side, and parliament, can decide whether those ministers have told us the truth or not.

Mr. Trudeau: I suggest, Mr. Speaker—and perhaps we could appeal to Your Honour's ruling—that the member has no choice but to take the member's word.

Mr. Woolliams: That is not the question.

Mr. Trudeau: If he states clearly a matter on which he has personal knowledge, and states a certain thing to be the fact, we in this House have to accept his word. If we do not, it is not to cross-examine on further questions to challenge his word and then the regulation takes effect.

Mr. Clark: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Yukon on a question of privilege.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not take lightly any application by the hon. Leader of the Opposition to put a question. However, my hands are tied. The question period was to adjourn at three-ten o'clock. If I were to recognize the hon. Leader of the Opposition for a supplementary question now, I think I would be extending the question period too long. I am afraid my hands are tied.

MR. NIELSEN—OMISSION IN OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a very serious question of privilege to raise. It involves the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), so I hope he stays with us. My question of privilege has to do with a deletion in Hansard of a most gross nature. Throughout my comments, I want the minister involved to understand that I am not making any allegations that he made the deletion, because there is a possible second explanation.

To present the problem to Your Honour, I might refer to page 402 of Hansard of yesterday's date. At the top of the page, the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice was answering questions put to him by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis). The first full paragraph at the top of the page reads as follows:

> I shall not engage in theoretical discussion about whether or not at some point we might get into some kind of confrontation. I do not foresee it. I foresee our making statements to the commission when the commission wants advice on issues of confidentiality.

It is at that point that the deletion has occurred. Hansard goes on to read:

> As I see it, that approach has worked well up to this point.

Then it continues. I have examined the blues. I am not aware at this point whether the minister examined the blues personally yesterday. As we all know, the personal aides to ministers sometimes exercise that responsibility. At page K-2 of the blues, toward the bottom of the page—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I wonder whether the hon. member would want to consider putting his point in a different form. We are into a rather serious departure here by making reference to what are essentially galley proofs before the final print is made. Obviously there is no difficulty at all in any member indicating, having been in the House yesterday, or having in some way brought to his attention, that he recollects remarks by a minister which do not appear in Hansard. I think that is a perfectly proper way to put it. I am not sure that we ought to depart from our past practice and introduce into the record of the House what are essentially galley proofs for the purpose of the final edition of Hansard. I can understand, if a dispute were to arise, that they might be referred to, but I do not think that we ought to introduce them at this stage.

I have no objection to the hon. member saying, as I think he is developing, that it is his recollection that words were used by the minister which do not appear in Hansard. That may have been an editorial fault on the part of Hansard, or someone may have moved to delete them. But I am not sure, at this stage, that reference ought to be made to what are essentially preparatory copies to the final edition of Hansard.

Mr. Nielsen: I will certainly abide by your directions, sir. If you will tolerate my development of the circumstances, I think you may well come to the conclusion that the integrity of the electronic system in this place may be an explanation for the deletion. So I am afraid I must make such reference because of that fact.

At the foot of page K-2, the last word is "confidentiality". That is the last word in the printed Hansard. At page K-3, it goes on as follows:

> As I see it, that approach has worked well up to this point.

So much for the blues. But there was a whole phrase which was said by the minister yesterday that has been omitted. The Chief of Hansard has explained that it was a recording error, very unusual for this to happen, but nonetheless it happened. This is what the minister said. If he or you, Mr. Speaker, wish to listen to a tape of it, I have it on tape. I did not make the tape; it was provided to me. As you know well, sir, members of the press gallery are privileged to make tapes of our proceedings. What was actually said, taking it up with the word "theoretical"—the minister also said "hypothetical", but that was deleted and I take no quarrel with that—was:

> —about whether or not at some point we might get into some kind of confrontation. I do not foresee it.

So far, so good. The quote continues:

> I foresee us making submissions to the commission when the commission needs advice or wants advice on issues as to confidentiality.

Here is the deleted part:

> The decision will then be taken by the commission, and as far as I am concerned, what has worked well up to this—

And then the minister goes on. Those were the precise words which were said by the minister. I suggest to you, Sir, that the omission of those words very emphatically changes the whole sense of the minister's answer as recorded in Hansard, and indeed eliminates entirely one of the most important elements of that answer.

The words I speak of as being so important and which have been omitted are: "The decision will then be taken by the commission". There is no doubt that the minister uttered those words. He may even recollect them. It may well be that the minister or his aides had nothing to do with eliminating this from Hansard. That seems to me to be the probable, logical conclusion. But obviously there has been either a failure of the recording equipment in this age of electronic miracles in this place, or there may be other explanations. I prefer to believe the latter.

You dealt with this question, Mr. Speaker, when I raised it some time ago. In 1973 You reviewed the procedure with respect to alterations in Hansard, and said that suggested changes by members are normally confined to corrections of errors and essential minor alterations. Then, sir, you went on to explain the procedure which should be adopted with respect to revision of Hansard, at the suggestion of members. Your ruling will be found at page 613 of the Journals of this House, No. 162, November 1, 1973.

I do not want to make this a substantive question of privilege because of the possibility of several explanations for the omission, but certainly I leave the matter, for the moment, in your hands, sir. As I have said, if you or the minister wishes to listen to the tape, you are perfectly welcome to do so. Because of the grossness of the omission, certainly there should be a revision of Hansard with those words re-entered as part of our record, since there seems to be absolutely no doubt that they were uttered by the minister.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it is obvious even from the words used by the hon. member for the Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that he has explained the way in which Hansard has come to be as it is. I have no hesitation in saying that had he brought this matter to my attention I would have joined with him in trying to be sure that the record was as correct and as complete as possible. After a day or two one never is exactly sure what words one used, and I am glad now that we have both the electronic and Hansard records.

I may say though, to help the hon. member, that whether or not the words are shown on the record I have no trouble in telling him that I would be glad, in effect, to repeat the answer I gave with those words in it, because obviously if the commission is considering an issue before it, a decision of the commission will follow after that consideration. I think that is so obvious that the words are not as important as the hon. member seems to think.

Having said that, I now say the words; so I give it to him both ways. I do not necessarily look at all of these words myself, as the hon. member has suspected, but in this case I am quite sure from what he has said that it was not an error or a change on my part or of any of my staff in any case. I would say, Mr. Speaker, that I would leave the matter in your hands as to whether there is sufficient in the record or available to Hansard to make the correction.

I would appreciate if the correction which the hon. member brought to my attention in respect of the omission of the word "hypothetical" were to be made. My use of the words "theoretical" and "hypothetical" was intentional, and I do not consider them to be substitutes, one for the other, but very important additions. I would like to see that word restored, if that can be done, and if the record shows that I did, indeed, say both words.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, for your own consideration, sir, it somewhat alarms me, and I am sure all members, that Hansard would fail, with our recording system in the House here, to have recorded those words, yet they were picked up by the recording equipment above your chair, sir. Those words may be on the electronic recording equipment in this House. But if they are not, then a very serious question arises as to the integrity of that system.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I feel quite confident that the language which has been referred to and has now been ascribed to by the minister on both occasions, both the word "hypothetical" in conjunction with the word "theoretical" as described by the minister, and the words that were referred to by the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), were in fact spoken by the minister, as he has said today, or probably were, and that in any case the electronic recording devices will have them as part of yesterday's proceedings. Certainly the minister was giving an answer during the course of the question period, and we have the additional advantage of being able to examine the television tape of that question period yesterday, which I am sure will be a full and complete reproduction of the minister's words yesterday.

That being so, it leaves us with the problem of examining the breakdown in reporting or the editing of Hansard. Certainly that falls within my area of jurisdiction, and I will look into it at once and report to the House.

ALLOTMENT OF TIME FOR CONSIDERATION OF SECOND READING OF BILL C-7

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 75C, I wish to advise the House that the representatives of the parties have been unable to reach agreement under Standing Order 75A or 75B on the allotment of time on second reading of Bill C-7, an act to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act. Therefore I want to give notice that a minister will move, at the next sitting of the House, that another sitting day be allotted for consideration of the bill at second reading.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, questions Nos. 3 and 243 will be answered today.

[Text]

CAR ALLOWANCE FOR MINISTERS

Question No. 3—Mr. Cossitt:

1. For the past two years, what are the names of all Cabinet Ministers who have been paid an automobile allowance and, in each case (a) what was the amount (b) was it paid in one sum annually and, if not, on what basis was it paid?

2. Did all ministers accept payment and, if not, what are the names of those who did not accept or who returned the money to the Treasury after receipt, and on what date was the return made?

3. What are the names of all ministers who have made use of government owned vehicles at public expense from any government department, at any time, during the past two years?

4. Are there any ministers who have permanent government cars and chauffeurs at their disposal and, if so, what are their names?

5. What are the reasons justifying the continuance of such an allowance to Ministers who do not drive their personal cars on government business any more than other Members of Parliament?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. (a) See reply to question No. 4,126 answered June 11, 1976. Names of ministers available elsewhere (see Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, citation 171 (ff)). (b) $166.66 monthly.

2. Yes.

3, 4 and 5. Ministers make use of official cars in connection with their portfolio duties; ministers use their statutory motor car allowances for transportation in connection with their general role as ministers of the Crown.

MR. ROBERT REMPEL

Question No. 243—Mr. Epp:

1. Was Mr. Robert Rempel appointed to the Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism and, if so (a) on what date and for how long (b) what are the terms of reference of the position (c) what are his qualifications for the position?

2. Is Mr. Rempel receiving any remuneration for serving on the Council and, if so, how much annually?

3. Does Mr. Rempel receive an expense allotment annually and, if so, in what amount?

Motion for Papers

Hon. Norman A. Cafik (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Yes. (a) On May 25, 1978, until December 1979. (b) The council shall provide a source of consultation to the government directly through the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) on matters pertaining to the development of the multicultural policy and on such additional matters affecting multiculturalism as the minister may from time to time refer and may bring before the public matters of interest and concern on multiculturalism. The council will examine and keep under review the policies, programs, and services of government, and recommend improvements or new activities to accomplish its objectives. (c) Members shall be chosen on the basis of their ethnocultural heritage and for their expertise and knowledge of Canada's ethnocultural communities.

2. Members of the council do not receive an annual allotment but receive a $75 per diem allowance when participating in official council meetings.

3. Members of the council do not receive an annual expense allotment but are entitled to expenses encountered on council business as per Treasury Board travel directives.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 24, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, during the oral question period and while answering a question put by the newly elected member for Lotbinière (Mr. Janelle), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) seemed to be annoyed by the hon. member's remarks which had to do with the Social Credit monetary theory. However, the hon. member for Lotbinière can consider himself lucky because, to use a phrase that is becoming common in this House, the minister could very well have offered him to put his foot somewhere or to kick his ass.

Very seriously, Mr. Speaker, to come back to our subject when the incident occurred last night I was saying that it is not normal that a sovereign state not be courageous enough to draw credit corresponding to the real economic capacity of the nation, through its own bank, at least to finance the public sector. Again I repeat that when the government borrows money through the sale of bonds, the banks hold a special privilege when buying these bonds, as compared to individuals. Mr. Speaker, Canadian citizens who buy Canada Savings Bonds must use their own savings, their own income, whereas banks have the power to create money to buy such bonds. In support of my assertion, I will quote from pages 322-323 of the report of the inquiry on banking. It says:

The member of parliament, Mr. Spencer, is asking questions, and Mr. Wilsons, General Manager of the Royal Bank is answering.

and I quote:

MR. SPENCER: Bankers have the power to expand the money supply by creating circulating credit?

MR. WILSON: Yes.

MR. SPENCER: By granting loans?

MR. WILSON: Certainly, this is what is going on.

MR. SPENCER: By purchasing bonds?

MR. WILSON: This puts money in circulation.

MR. SPENCER: There are therefore the two means that I have suggested to create money?

MR. WILSON: Yes.

Mr. Speaker, there were only $286 million in currency minted under sovereign authority, but the ten Canadian banks had granted loans on long-term bonds totaling $1,426 million and $1,200 million on notes for a total of $2,626 million. In view of these revelations, the member of Parliament, Mr. Coote, asked Mr. Wilson:

MR. COOTE: How could the banks ever pay everyone in cash?

MR. WILSON: The whole banking theory is based on the assumption that everyone will not lose his head at the same time.

This answer is found on page 316 of the report on the banking inquiry.

This means, Mr. Speaker, that the banking system is supported only by public ignorance as concerns its operation and by public confidence, therefore by the credit of a society. By granting loans and purchasing Canadian bonds, banks issue credit money which the government uses to finance public works, which increases the amount of money in circulation and on which Canadians must pay interests, and this increases at the same time the amount of the national debt, which, in my opinion, is ridiculous.

Mr. Speaker, this process is now recognized by the banks. Experience has shown it, statistics prove it, legislation authorizes it, and this is the cancer grawing at our so-called sovereign governments. I say to the members of the majority party in this House, who claim to follow a right of center philosophy and who accept this monetary dictatorship, that they attack everything except the financial powers, that they act as though money were a God beyond the influence of men, as though the regulations established on the basis of money could not be changed for regulations established on the basis of the normal needs of man and existing possibilities. They come empty-handed to face all sorts of disasters in all areas, they are rightists, because they refuse to do anything about the major disorder which exists in the monetary system.

Mr. Speaker, when will the government which claims supremacy have the courage to call on parliament to check that dictatorship of monetary powers and force soulless money to serve human capital. Mr. Speaker, if you want to embarrass a big banker, all you have to do is ask him this question: What will you be doing in ten years? And to embarrass the young people in which I put all my hopes, again I ask: What will you be doing in ten years if the system of public financing which is currently burying you under debts to the tune of $50 million a day is allowed to continue? Young people of my country, I urge you to consider and get interested in the administration of this country and to challenge a financial system which allows the people to be exploited to the benefit of those who control the monetary levers and hence the economic blood of the nation.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I intend to take part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, only very briefly, and I do so because of the most recent and desperate act by the government of imposing closure on this bill. They have indicated in their behaviour last night and today that they cannot even impose closure efficiently in this House of Commons. I think that there has probably been rarely seen in this House a farce to equal the farce last night when the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) attempted, against the rules and practice of this House, to interrupt the Speech of my hon. friend, the member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert), and impose closure in a way which broke the rules of the House. He was prevented from doing that.

Today, however, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has come forward to give an indication that he intends to impose closure on a bill which only a few days ago the members of this government itself were actively filibustering. On Friday of last week the debate in this House saw five government members in a row, including three members of the Privy Council, three of their senior members, standing up and seeking to filibuster.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I am reluctant to interrupt the hon. Leader of the Official Opposition but he who wants to give us lectures on procedure is precisely making a speech that would belong much more in tomorrow's debate on the motion under Standing Order 75C. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to call him to order and urge him if he wants to participate in the debate on the motion for second reading, to deal with Bill C-7.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, it is impossible to talk about any aspect of the policy of the Liberal government without referring to their general incompetence because their general incompetence underlies their whole policy, and we just had another indication of that incompetence in the parliamentary secretary's intervention. I am now telling you, Mr. Speaker, why we in this House think the government is taking an extraordinary action. It is trying to break the established rules and practices to force parliament into accepting a proposed borrowing by the federal government without giving any details as to the expenditures being contemplated. That is unacceptable to the members of the opposition.

[English]

As I was saying, not only have they been incompetent in trying to impose closure, but they are here imposing closure on a bill the debate on which they themselves have extended by the very incredible performance of last Friday when five government members got up and filibustered a bill which was not urgent on Friday but is now so urgent that they have to impose closure to get it through.

What has been suggested by various ministers and spokesmen on the government side is that all we are dealing with here is a routine financial bill. This, sir, is not at all a routine financial bill. This is a very extraordinary activity. It is an attempt by the Government of Canada to seek an unprecedented borrowing authority in an unprecedented way.

The government is seeking here the authority to borrow $17 billion, much of that to cover spending regarding estimates which the House of Commons has never seen. To my knowledge, there is no precedent for that at all in the long history of the House of Commons of Canada. This is the first time that a government has come in here and asked for a blank cheque, a $10 billion blank cheque, without giving parliament any indication at all of the purposes to which they intend to put this money.

What makes this even more offensive and unusual is that this is the third time this year that this government has come back to this parliament to seek an increase in borrowing authority. Already since March, 1977, they have sought and received the authority to borrow $21 billion, and here they are back again asking for the authority to borrow $17 billion, $10 billion of that for expenditures that they will tell parliament and the people of Canada nothing at all about. It is unbelievable, it is unprecedented, and it is unacceptable to this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: There is the question why this measure is so urgent that we need it now. I have been trying to get from the Minister of Finance for a long time an indication of revenue forecast for this fiscal year of the Government of Canada. We know that the revenue forecasts that the minister gave some months ago are wrong. The only question is, we do not know how wrong they are, and he will not tell us. The Minister of Finance, with his absolute faith in keeping secret from the people of Canada information which they have a right to know, even though his officials are probably telling him, refuses to tell this House of Commons what revenues the Government of Canada expects in this fiscal year and, consequently, we do not know how deep the deficit will be. We do not know how much deeper into debt this country is going to be plunged by the incompetence of this government. All we know is that today they are seeking the authority to borrow an additional $17 billion. We do not know about the revenue projections, we do not know why it is so urgent, and we do not know why the government has rushed this bill in and interrupted the throne speech debate. Now, even though it filibustered its own debate, it is trying to force this matter through by closure. What is so urgent? Why is there such an urgent need on the part of the Government of Canada to gather unto itself an additional $17 billion in borrowing authority? What is going on? What is being kept secret? What is the urgency that leads them to introduce this bill in this form at this time?

● (1542)

We are told there is going to be a budget. They will not give us a date—they rarely give us dates—but some time in the middle of November there is going to be a new budget. Why is the Government of Canada rushing through this demand to increase its borrowing authority before it gives us a budget? A budget should contain a projection of spending estimates, it should contain a statement of the revenues, expected by the Government of Canada, and it should contain an indication of the priorities the government is going to follow. That is coming in three weeks, so why do we have this extraordinary request for an additional $17 billion borrowing authority right now?

Why not wait three weeks? What is so urgent? What is being hidden? Why can they not come forward now and give us the information that would be part of a budget or, if they are not prepared to do that, why do they not let this matter wait until after the budget is before the House of Commons?

A very real question for the people of Canada to ask is: Why is the first piece of legislation that this government introduces a borrowing bill? Why is it the first priority of the Government of Canada to borrow $17 billion? What does that say about the state of our economy? What does that say about the state of our future? The most urgent action they turn their attention to when they come back here is a determination and an attempt to borrow an additional $17 billion, in many cases without giving us any reason for seeking that extra amount of money.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, there are two factors in the bill now under consideration. First, a proposal or a request for the authority to borrow $7 billion for this fiscal year. This is perhaps normal but what is not at all normal is that the government is now trying to borrow another $10 billion for the next fiscal year without indicating what are the anticipated expenditures or for what purposes the borrowed money will be used.

[English]

We have these two distinct elements, Mr. Speaker. We have $7 billion for this fiscal year ending March 31, 1979; then we have this mysterious $10 billion for the next fiscal year ending March 31, 1980. We are particularly concerned about that because this government is asking to borrow $10 billion without giving us any estimates, without giving us any forecasts, without giving us any indication of its spending plans and, indeed, without in any sensible, concrete way giving us any indication at all of its restraint plans. As I said earlier, they are asking for a $10 billion blank cheque, and that is something that this House and the people of Canada should not be prepared to let slip by easily.

There are some implications here that are quite important and one of them relates to the public debt. The total borrowing authorities requested for the fiscal years 1978, 1979 and 1980 are $38 billion. If these authorities are fully utilized, the unmatured debt of Canada will be 90 per cent higher in 1980 than it was in 1977—90 per cent higher in three years, Mr. Speaker. That rate of public debt expansion is unprecedented in Canadian peacetime history. The interest costs of serving the public debt are skyrocketing. Debt charges will be 80 per cent higher in 1979 than they were the year before. These new borrowing authorities will guarantee that the debt interest spiral in which Canada is caught will continue at great cost to the country, and as so many of my colleagues have said in this debate, at great cost to the future of the country.

The other element of particular concern to us here is that this attempt by the government is particularly dangerous because it is coming from a government that has demonstrated time and time again its incapacity to deal effectively with the economic requirements and realities of this country. It is bad enough that a government is so incapable that it has to come back for increased borrowing authority three times in a single fiscal year, but it is totally unacceptable for it to seek a blank cheque for spending before the estimates have even been considered by this House of Commons. That is an abuse of parliament—not the first, and so long as this government stays in power for the brief eight months it has left, not the last, I am sure. It is clearly an abuse of parliament; it is an attempt, as we have seen so often, to operate in secrecy and keep from the people of Canada the facts about the public accounts and the future of Canada. It is a disastrous, deepening debt placed on Canada, a disastrous imposition upon future generations of the heavy, heavy burden of the improvidence and incapacity of this government.

The government is incompetent if it has to come back so often to borrow. This is the point I rise to make: it is absolutely improper, and I use the word deliberately, to seek authority for this kind of spending, $10 billion of spending, with no indication how that money will be spent.

There has been a long, long practice by this government of trying to use omnibus bills to push through objectionable matters. They tack on to something that might be accepted something that is absolutely unacceptable. That is what they have done here. It might have been justifiable for them to come and ask for borrowing authority of $7 billion to cover this fiscal year, particularly if they could show a projection or if they had told us the truth about the revenue projections of the Government of Canada this year. What is absolutely unacceptable is to tack on to that $7 billion borrowing request the demand for a $10 billion blank cheque.

We are operating under closure. The government has the power to limit debate. They use it with a regularity that is almost a reflex. That, too, is dangerous in terms of its impact upon the right of free debate, the right of full discussion, the right of knowledge of the facts on the part of Canadians. But they have done it, and we are faced with that demand as it relates to this stage of debate.

There are some very real technical devices that could be used to try to split this bill and we have looked at them. It is not impossible but it is going to be difficult. I see the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) in the House as well as some members of the Privy Council. Perhaps if there is need for a filibuster they will join in. That seems to be the role of Privy Councillors in this government these days.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There are only two.

Mr. Clark: There are only two, but then I am only the Leader of the Opposition speaking.

An hon. Member: You said it.

Mr. Clark: I should say I am only the Leader of the Opposition for another six, seven or eight months, and then one of the several candidates for leadership of the Liberal party that we have seen asking questions these days to embarrass their own government will have the opportunity to aspire to the chair I now occupy in this House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The point I rise to make is that the House leader of the official opposition will initiate discussions today or tomorrow—as quickly as we can get a meeting with the government House leader or the Minister of Finance and his representatives—to get agreement from the government to split this bill. This is necessary so that we can deal with a measure that might be a proper attempt to increase the borrowing authority by $7 billion, and so that we will not be forced to deal at the same time with a proposal that is obviously improper—a proposal to try to tack on, to piggyback, a demand for a $10 billion blank cheque for which the government has not specified their reasons.

We think that this is a way out of a dilemma which the government has imposed. It is at least within the practices of parliament, within our customs and traditions, that government can come forward and ask for increases in spending authority in relation to expenditures whose nature is known. But what is new and being tried here, and what has to be resisted, is an attempt to obtain a $10 billion blank cheque. The House leader of this party will seek to enter into discussions with representatives of the other side to try to achieve a splitting of this bill so we can deal with what might be proper and parliament will not be forced to digest, or have forced through it by closure, a proposal which is deeply improper and quite dangerous to the country.

We are dealing here with a government that in recent months has tried to change basic Canadian institutions, and change them unilaterally in the first constitutional proposal that came through. We are dealing with a government that delayed a national election after its regular four-year term because it wanted to deal with the problems of the economy. And how does it deal with the problems of the economy? It starts by seeking authority to borrow $17 billion more. We are dealing with a government that is deliberately attacking former commissioners of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police and calling into question the accuracy of testimony that they make before the McDonald royal commission. It is led by a Prime Minister who not long ago, speaking at Glebe collegiate, uttered a clear menace, a clear threat, to the royal commission relative to its power as set out in its terms of reference to establish its own rules as to the revelation of material that is brought before it.

We are dealing with a government that has consistently refused to state its tax revenues, the revenues expected this fiscal year, and consequently has kept Canadians in the dark about the degree of our deficit, that is, about how much in debt this country is. We are now dealing with a government that seeks a $10 billion blank cheque and asks parliament to approve that $10 billion blank cheque without any knowledge of the spending plans of the government. That, sir, is absolutely unacceptable.

I hope that some reason will prevail on the other side and that they will cease this attempt to violate the traditions of parliament and break trust with the Canadian people. I hope they will entertain very seriously the proposal that we will be putting forward informally to split this bill so that we may deal with the part of it that might be proper and in order that parliament will not be forced to have smuggled through it a most improper proposal to give this government, this government of all governments, a $10 billion blank cheque.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, this is my first speech in the House of Commons and in my opening remarks I would like to convey a tribute to my predecessor who is now a county court judge for the judicial district of York. I am fully aware, as I am sure all hon. members are aware on both sides of the House, that I have very large shoes to fill. I will do my best to do so. However, I have to follow a difficult act, that of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

I would like to agree with him in one respect concerning one of the issues raised by this bill, that of the question of the accountability of the government to this parliament. If I went to a bank and asked for a loan, that bank would want to know what I was going to do with the money. As a member of parliament I think I am entitled to that kind of knowledge, as would be any banker in the city of Toronto, the city of New York or for that matter anywhere else.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Or Saskatoon.

Mr. Rae: Or Saskatoon, yes. It is a source of concern to me as a member of this House that the government is seeking the authorization to borrow such an amazing amount of money for such a long period in advance without specifying precisely what its program or its intentions are. As members of parliament I think we are entitled to a much better system of accounting than the one being provided in this two page bill.

An hon. Member: A two-bit bill.

Mr. Rae: A two-bit bill, but two pages which authorize the borrowing of some $17 billion. However, it is not with the details of the legislation that I want to deal in this speech because the bill is so short. It seems to me the question of why the government has borrowed the money that it has and the fact that it intends to borrow more is of far greater importance than a line by line reading of a request for a blank cheque. Why is it that the government is in the position of having to return to this House time and time again to borrow money? Why is it that the deficit which the government has built up over the years has not resulted in what we could call productive spending, but rather spending which will have no long term economic benefits?

I think that members of the Progressive Conservative party to my right—and I might add that in Broadview they were so far to the right they fell into the Don Valley, which was to my benefit—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: —have been attacking and criticizing the government because of the size of the deficit. They have been saying that the days of deficit spending have to end. In a speech given by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) which I read this morning, he brought forward countless examples of misspending and mismanagement by the government. But, Mr. Speaker, we have to say to the members of the party to our right that they cannot have it both ways. They cannot criticize the government for deficit spending and at the same time make a proposal with respect to income tax benefits to be given on mortgage payments. This would result in a fiscal deficit far larger than the one which is currently being undertaken by the government of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: So I say that the criticism coming from the hon. member for York-Simcoe and indeed from the Leader of the Opposition is hypocritical.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: And if it is not hypocritical, and if the members of the Conservative party to my right are serious about reducing government spending in the way they are talking about, let them go to the people of Canada and tell them what social programs will be cut, because Canadians will be interested in knowing what those cuts are. When the hon. member for York-Simcoe speaks about reducing spending and changing the whole philosophy and strategy of government spending, as a citizen of this country I want to know what they will cut next, because I think that is of concern to Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paproski: Now start on the Liberals.

Mr. Rae: Do not worry, everyone will get their turn.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rae: The fact of the matter is that it is pre-Keynesian economics coming from the Liberal party opposite and it is pre-Cambrian economics coming from the Conservative party to my right.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: This is no longer possible at a time when there are one million Canadians out of work, it is no longer possible at a time when our economy is working at far less than its capacity, and it is no longer time for a party to talk about balancing a budget within a year or two. That is fiscally ridiculous and economically irresponsible. It is talking out of both sides of one's mouth at once, and it will not work. The Canadian public wants to know. We have a right to ask the government, and we have a right to ask the opposition, about their income maintenance programs. Will they be cut? If so, which ones will be cut? Is it going to be unemployment insurance, the pension plan or old age security? These are the sources of expenditure that provide for the maintenance of income of a great many Canadians. If they are going to be cut, please let us know before the next election which ones it is intended to do away with.

We have to accept the fact that we have an economy where deficit spending will be with us for some time because of the fact that we have one million unemployed. We have to stimulate the economy. Therefore, we must look very carefully at what kinds of strategies and proposals a government or a potential government is putting forward.

The Canadian people are entitled to know that there has been no commitment from either of the larger parties to the concept of public spending. There has been no defence of the concept of public spending from any cabinet minister or any Conservative member to my right. It is time that someone had the courage to say that, unless we have a decently high level of public spending, we will have no pensions or unemployment insurance, and no government intervention in the economy to protect us from the malefactors of great wealth.

An hon. Member: No medicare.

Mr. Rae: As my friend points out, we will have no medicare. Canadians are entitled to know that. I would like to see one minister of the Crown with the courage to say to this House and the people of Canada that this is what they have done and they are proud of having done it, instead of having put it forward and then run away from it.

Mr. Paproski: Wait until your father hears this speech.

Mr. Rae: My father has heard this speech many times. It raises serious questions about the state of our economy and what strategy a government is going to put forward to deal with the economic problems faced by this country.

Cabinet ministers accuse the New Democratic Party of running down the country and having no confidence in the future of Canada. That is the opposite of the truth. We no longer have confidence, and we never did have confidence, in the Liberal party. However, we do not make the mistake of members opposite by identifying the future of Canada with the future of the Liberal party. If I could use technical language, we see there being a negative correlation between the two.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rae: It is because we as social democrats are optimistic about this country and its potential that we are so concerned with the tragedy of unemployment and the difficulties being faced by many Canadians.

I have had the opportunity of becoming closely acquainted with my constituency over the past year. Anyone who has been through an election campaign knows how well you get to know your area. We said to the people, as did many members elected in the recent by-elections, "Send a message to Ottawa". I do not know what message came from the Conservative party. I do not know their intentions.

Speaking for the people of Broadview, the message that comes from the working people in that part of Toronto is that they do not want to see a reduction in government spending. They do not want cutbacks in public and social services. They want a government that is compassionate, one that is prepared to be generous to its people, willing to plan for the future of this country rather than leave the economy to foreign investors and large private interests in this country.

There are three options for the future of our economy. One is to continue on the present path of the Liberal government. Of all the options, that is the least comprehensible. It is very difficult to know precisely on what they are running, what are their intentions and what is their program. The lack of information in this bill is one more example of that. They are leaderless in their economic policies. They are rudderless. They have no sense of direction. They are incapable of listening to the people when they speak.

Nothing has made this more clear than the fact that there were 15 by-elections held, not one. It was not people in one or two constituencies in this country that voted; it was over one million Canadians voicing their dissatisfaction with the economic and social policies of this government. However, there has not been one iota of an indication that this government intends to change its course in any way. That kind of arrogance has become the hallmark of this Liberal government, and it is certain to be the cause of its inevitable downfall.

The second option is the one proposed by my Conservative friends to the right. It is a very familiar option, that of private gain and public squalor. It is an option of reducing the role of government, the level of services and the standard of living for the people of this country.

Yesterday I obtained from Statistics Canada the figures on income distribution for the year 1977. Those who talk about Canada being an affluent society are entitled to know these figures. These figures indicate that in terms of purchasing power, the average income of the Canadian family decreased by about 5 per cent in 1977. An additional 66,000 families fell below the poverty line in 1977 over 1976.

That is the record of this government. That is the implication of cutbacks in unemployment insurance. It directly affects the level of income of tens of thousands of Canadians. When you reduce the level of spending for joint programs with the provinces by $220 million, it is the working people whose incomes and standard of living are affected. It does not affect those who are able to get what they want on the market, those who are able to provide for themselves. When you cut back on education, it does not affect those who attend private schools and intend to continue doing so. It affects those who rely on public spending for their benefits and future.

We say to the Conservative party that their program, with all of its implications, including this most recent mortgage scheme, will clearly mean that those who are able to provide and indeed make gain for themselves will be able to do so, but those who are not will not. That is the message. It is a message of meanness and of self-enrichment. It is not a message worthy of being taken to the Canadian people.

In the bad old days, the British Tories said to the people that they needed to have property before they could vote. There has now been a change. The Canadian Tories are saying to the people, that they need to have property before they can have an income tax benefit. This is just as unfair and discriminatory as the disenfranchisement of people in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. It is an economic equivalent of that disenfranchisement and the Canadian people are entitled to know that.

A speech made by the Leader of the Opposition a couple of months ago was reported in the Canadian press. He is quoted to have said that we should take the American tax system as our model in Canada. Does the Leader of the Opposition want us to have the same municipal services as they have in Cleveland, the same system of urban transportation as they have in Houston or the same system of medical care as they have in New York? Is this the model being put forward to the Canadian people? You cannot have lower taxes—and whether they are lower or not in the United States is debatable—and more services. If you have lower taxes, you have less services. If we are going to be giving less services, let us have the shopping list before the election.

I have spoken this afternoon about the programs of the Liberal party, which are pretty difficult to discern at the moment, and the programs of the Conservative party, which are becoming clearer and clearer as time goes on. I want to close my remarks by putting forward a third option which, I am proud to say, my party and my leader have been putting forward in this House and in the country for the past year. Some of the philosophical background to this option was provided in the very interesting remarks of my colleague, the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman), who spoke earlier in this debate.

Society is changing far more rapidly than we are prepared or willing to recognize. We can no longer talk seriously about government withdrawal from certain critical sectors of the economy because that would be politically and socially inequitable. If the government wants to withdraw from particular sectors of the economy, and if the government wants to sell off Petro-Canada and give all of the oil business back to those who are making tremendous profits at the expense of the people of Canada, the government can go ahead; but let us have no doubts as to what effect that would have on ordinary Canadians. Let us have no doubts about the political effect that would have on the sovereignty of this country.

We must recognize that in many ways Canada is an underdeveloped economy, yet we are not developing economic, social or political strategies to deal with this fact. We are not alone in the industrial world in having a difficult time dealing with multinational corporations and the effects huge private interests have on the public. Many other countries are in the same position, but no modern industrial country has done as little as Canada has done to deal with those effects. It is precisely because I am proud to be a Canadian and do not need to take lessons in patriotism from members of the Liberal party that I am ashamed of the performance of this government.

I see some Conservative hon. members to my right nodding. All I can say is that their policies would make matters even worse. If we increase reliance on foreign investment in this country, we will simply be digging a deeper hole. We are in a hole because we have a resource economy which is completely reliant on foreign investment for its survival, and unless we build up a secondary manufacturing sector which would allow Canada to take its place in the industrial world, we will simply go from pillar to post as other countries carry on their protectionist policies.

Canada is the only country in the world which is talking naively about free trade, as if this was the nineteenth century. This is not the nineteenth century. If we indiscriminately lower tariff barriers, the effect will be to destroy Canadian industry. Hon. members will be surprised to know that one of the first appeals to come to me as a member of parliament was from a company which has a factory in my riding. That company was concerned about the policies of the government with respect to fiscal and foreign investment problems and the effect those policies would have on it. That company was not talking about a free market. The president of that company, for all I know, might go home and talk privately about the fact that people on welfare are getting too much money, that some people are not working and that the government should not get involved in the economy, but I want to point out that when his company is in trouble, he knows where to turn because he knows the kind of economy he is living in and the problems with which he has to deal.

The government opposite has no industrial strategy. Hon. members to my right would make it even more difficult for the government to initiate such a strategy, and over the weeks and months ahead I look forward to the possibility of speaking in debates in which we will be able to make our proposals and options even clearer. We would be left with Hobson's choice, a choice between even more policies which would do nothing to solve the economic problems we have and the continued maladministration, incompetence and indifference of the government opposite, except that I am proud to say that I am doing everything I can as a member of the New Democratic Party to see that the Canadian people are not stuck with that choice.

There is a third possibility which provides for a recognition of the fact that we need to provide decent incomes for our people, that we need to redistribute income in favour of the poor and not in favour of those who have property, that we need to provide full employment in our economy, that we need to provide industrial jobs for our people, that we should not be solely dependent on a resource economy for the future and that 3,000 miners in Sudbury should not be told by an energy minister that they can always pack up and move 500 or 1,000 miles to another job. That may be very well for the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) to say, but I suspect that in six or eight months he will be packing up and moving 600 or 800 miles to another job.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has no right to give that message to people who have families, homes and commitments in the city in which they have made their homes. The Liberals and Conservatives would treat people as commodities, move them around as the market dictates, and would have towns and resources in certain areas of the country dry up and die because some large industrial firm somewhere decides to make a greater profit in Guatemala, Gabon or some other place.

The New Democratic Party is saying that that is not the only option for the Canadian people. It is possible for working people, through their institutions, parties and governments, to express the confidence they have in themselves by saying that they come first, that they come before profits and that they come before the interests of private enterprise. That is the message we will be taking to the Canadian people, and there is no doubt in my mind that when that message is sent clearly and cogently, the Canadian people will listen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege for me to speak today about what is probably one of the most ill-conceived pieces of government legislation brought before this House in the last decade.

I listened to an excellent speech last evening given by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Parker), a reasonable proposal put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) today, and, of course, the speech given by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae), who put forward the socialist message, much as if the campaign had not stopped on October 16.

Mr. Broadbent: It is just starting, brother.

Mr. Dick: Indeed the campaign may not have stopped for the hon. member for Broadview because he squeaked in by only about 400 votes. When he was castigating the Liberals for talking out of both sides of their mouths, I suppose he had some difficulty because he does not know whether to set his sights on the Liberals or the Conservatives. I can only presume he spent so much time on the Conservatives because he fears them most.

Bill C-7 epitomizes what has been going on over the last number of years. Through stealth, deception, falsehood and other fraudulent means the government has been trying to mislead Canadians into believing that it really does care about Canada. This government does not care about the people of Canada; it is concerned only about preserving the power it has.

I would like to put these comments into a certain perspective. We remember when the Liberal party changed the date of its annual convention from November of 1977 to February of 1978. It did so in order to have more television time prior to a spring election which never took place. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) appeared on television on a number of occasions in January, February and March. We find out now that he even requested television time on certain occasions.

We also found out how they tried to build a set of steps up to the podium, up to that level where they could launch an election campaign. But when they took a poll, they found the Canadian people had not bought it and the Liberals were in trouble. So what did they do on May 10? The Prime Minister came out and said: "We will not have an election either this spring or this summer. We will do what the Canadian people want us to do; we will get down to business in the House of Commons and we will get this economy going again". Then he promptly went on with the same legislation for the next six weeks, following which he adjourned the House for the longest recess in a decade.

Is that getting on with the work that Canadians want the government to get on with? We had no new initiatives or ideas from the government. So what happens now? The government, after the longest recess in a decade, has come up with a little bit of pap wrapped up and called it a throne speech. It covered the same ground which they tilled in August and early September when they did a slow striptease of a new economic era, which I suggest will not bring anything to Canada. For the first time since I have been a member, which is some six years, the government has interrupted the throne speech debate, as indeed they were requested to do by both this party and by the NDP if they were going to bring in some new economic measures or bring in a budget. However, they have not done that, but they have interrupted the debate anyhow.

What do they have listed on the order paper? Two of the bills deal with transfer payments; one is an amendment to the Income Tax Act, which will not be of any economic assistance to the country as a whole; and seven other bills deal with such important matters as an act to amend the Corporations and Labour Unions Returns Act and an act to appeal the Canada-France Trade Agreement Act. They have the usual fillers or housekeeping measures, but they do not have one legislative proposal before the House at this time to improve the econoic climate so that all Canadians can have a slightly higher standard of living.

The first bill they want passed, without indicating their intentions, is this bill to give them more money. They ask us to empower them, through Bill C-7 which we are debating here today, to borrow $17 billion, and they tell us, "We will not tell you what we will spend it on. It is not matched on the other side by revenues, and we cannot even raise it in Canada".

We are asked specifically to empower them to go overseas to raise the money. What will this do to our 85 cent dollar? Down we go again. I suppose that with some of the money he has borrowed, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will rush out to try to prop up the Canadian dollar and maybe he will spend another few hundreds of millions of dollars, as he had to do in the last few months, propping up a dollar which he had inflated by going overseas to borrow money. This act will drive up inflation in this country, and because it will put downward pressure on the dollar, it will increase interest rates in this country and will make it tougher for the average person to maintain what he or she thinks is an adequate standard of living.

They want $7 billion out of the $17 billion just to finish this fiscal year until the end of March, 1978. If we go back to March 16, only about six months ago, we find that the Minister of Finance stated the following as reported at page 3859 of Hansard, when he was speaking on another borrowing bill:

> The authority in this bill to borrow a further $5 billion, together with the unused portion of the $16 billion authority granted in March and December of 1977, should provide the government with sufficient borrowing powers to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-79, and provide a margin as usual for contingencies.

Six months ago the minister said he had all the money he needed. Now we find he made a $7 billion error, but he will not tell us where the error is. He will not tell us if his revenues are down, he will not tell us if he needs the money because he spent many extra billions of dollars defending the Canadian dollar, and he will not say if he will bring in supplementary estimates which will shoot up our estimates by another $2 billion or $3 billion. He has made a $7 billion error. He said he had all the money he needed six months ago, and now he needs $7 billion more. What a wasteful government this is, a government which does not have the slightest clue as to management. You are a family man, Mr. Speaker; just try and run your family that way and you will find out how long you will stay away from bankruptcy.

I want to point out also another part of the bill which was never been heard of before in Canadian history. My leader made reference to it earlier this afternoon. Not only do the government want to borrow $7 billion until the end of this year, although they said only six months ago they had enough money to finish this year, but they do not even wish to wait until next year. They want to borrow $10 billion for next year. They have not even tabled their estimates for next year. Estimates for next year will not be tabled until February or March of 1979. When we see what they are tabling and what their proposals are, and when they have the courtesy to come to parliament and say: "We are a little short on cash requirements, may we borrow a little money to try to do the things we think are important?" Parliament might then give them that authority.

But they are presenting us, as that former Liberal minister of finance used to say, with a pig in a poke. They want us to buy a gamble; they want us to give them a blank cheque. The sad thing is that it is the following generation who will have to pay that debt, and that debt is rolling over at the interest rate of 9.25 per cent, which is the rate this year, and every seven or eight years the amount doubles. It is the generations of the future which will have to pay this debt, and I do not have to repeat what my leader has already stated this afternoon and what has been said by speakers before about how we have tripled the debt since this Prime Minister took office.

The government wants to attempt to spend its way out of debt. Previously I had not heard of such an economic theory, yet it is being unravelled before my eyes. As I indicated, at one point the government thought it had enough money for this year, and now it is requesting $7 billion. It has made a $7 billion error, and now it needs a little more money. I am not too sure if we should accept that fact, but even if we did and gave the government $7 billion for this year, why should the government be given $10 billion starting on April 1, 1979, through to March 31, 1980, at which time this government will not be the government; government members will be sitting in opposition. The government is requesting a complete blank cheque, and I do not know how the money will be spent. Perhaps the entire $7 billion will be spent between April 1, 1979, and election day.

I must emphasize that never before in Canadian history has a government ever had the audacity to come before a legislative assembly requesting borrowing authority for a year in the future for which estimates have not been tabled. I beg the House to consider realistically the intelligent proposal of splitting this bill. We could deal with the money they require for this year, even though that is dubious, but definitely we should not give the government a blank cheque for a year, before the estimates are received. I do not care if it is the Liberals under the present Prime Minister, the New Democratic Party, the Progressive Conservative party, the Social Credit party, or any other party in any other legislature; no legislation should request a blank cheque before the estimates are tabled for a particular fiscal year. It has never been done in the past. No parliament should sanction this.

This situation demonstrates the arrogance of the government. It epitomizes how parliament is losing control over the purse, over how much money is spent. At the present time the estimates go through because of a rule which was rammed through by the Liberal majority in approximately 1968. The estimates are deemed to have passed committee stage when perhaps a vote on the estimates has not been held or perhaps the estimates have not been discussed. If the estimates are not discussed by a certain date, automatically they are passed, even though the committee has not looked at them in detail. In many cases that has been the situation. They are deemed to have been passed, so there is no control over government spending. The government is requesting a blank cheque for a coming fiscal year, even though the estimates have not come in. It is apparent that a deficit is anticipated.

What would happen to a person who went to his bank manager wanting to borrow $10,000 and giving no reason for such a loan? I will use the example of $10,000, because I am sure a bank manager would not understand $10 billion. We all know what the bank manager would tell such a person. Perhaps Parliament should tell the government the same thing, since it does not want to tell us what the $10 billion will be spent on.

The reason for some of the deficits and problems at the present time is the complete mismanagement and waste of the government in the spending of Canadian funds. I should like to refer to one small example in an attempt to explain the situation. In late May 1978, the Progressive Conservative government of Ontario and the Parti Québécois of Quebec made a joint request for proposals on a new lottery computer, a technological gaming device. The greedy old Liberals opposite on June 19, after that joint proposal had been made, granted a $24 million contract to an American firm without tenders.

I have had occasion to speak with the legal advisers of that firm in New York. Also I have spoken with its directors and officers who live in Maryland. These gentlemen are officers of the Canadian subsidiary. They told me that every screw, rivet, piece of metal and wire will be manufactured and assembled in their plant in Maryland. The government said that no Canadian company could perform this task; apparently no Canadian company could bring up these little computing machines in order to assemble the $1 gaming device for the new lottery. I did not buy that for a minute. I made inquiries and found out that the government was wrong.

On approximately July 15, the Ontario government awarded the very same contract to two Canadian firms. One of those Canadian firms is owned 66 per cent by the federal government, yet the federal government would not go to that company. The name of the company is Consolidated Computing Devices, and it is located in the east end of Ottawa. That firm will be doing the majority of the work under contract. The other firm is called Digital, and it is located approximately 14 miles outside of Ottawa. Digital will be doing the computer part of the work, and Consolidated Computing Devices will be doing the terminal work. The Ontario government has given the entire contract to two companies within a 15-mile radius of Parliament Hill at a cost which is less than that quoted by the American firms. The greedy old government said that no Canadian company could do the work, yet it did not even look around.

As part of that contract, the Quebec and Ontario governments held two meetings, one in Toronto and one in Montreal. Approximately 125 people from the computer industry of Ontario and Quebec attended the meeting in Toronto, and over 90 attended the one in Montreal in order to exchange ideas, make further inquiries and discuss computer technology, manufacturing and what was needed. We had been deceived. These things could be built in Canada.

Then the government came forward with a second line of attack. Apparently it was necessary for us to get into the field first and not have to worry about competition. It has been said that by November we will be into that field. We are looking forward to that. At the present time there has been a run on the Ontario government computing devices. They could have been in the field a week or ten days ago. They beat the federal government to the punch. I understand that General Instruments is 48 days late in delivery. That is the American firm, the only one capable of building this equipment. Yet Canadians are already there.

Realizing that it was beaten to the punch, the federal government ended up negotiating and agreeing with the provinces to get out of all lottery games of $9 and under if the provinces would in turn leave lottery games of $10 and over to the federal government. The point I want to make is that the federal government entered into a $23 million contract, and it has thrown away $5 million already spent. It has thrown away $300,000 on consultants' fees; it let a $2 million contract in early July in telecommunications services to effect the $23 million contract; and it had already incurred the cost for marketing in respect of the new game. It had already incurred costs in leasehold improvements on buildings for outlets it had leased or arranged for in order to instal the machinery. This amounts to some $5 million over and above the $23 million which has been thrown away or lost down the drain. The federal taxpayers will never see anything of that again. That is only $5 million and the Liberals are dealing in bigger figures than that, so it is just a small amount.

In addition, the government made such a rotten contract with General Instruments that it cannot get out of it, and if it does get out for less than the $23 million it will probably cost in excess of $10 million in penalty, simply because it negotiated a contract in which it had no rights. The government was just leasing and therefore cannot now even purchase the equipment and sell it to those running the western or Atlantic lotteries. The government cannot transfer the technology because it was all left with General Instruments.

This is a contract which is entirely different in principal than the contracts I understand were negotiated by the provinces in respect of their games. Those provinces have been more shrewd with their taxpayers' dollars. This government will perhaps incur a penalty, therefore, of $10 million, $12 million or, $15 million. The two provinces involved in order to get the federal government out of this mess, have said they will contribute 25 per cent each in respect of any penalty up to a maximum of $10 million. Even with that, if there is a $10 million penalty the federal government will have to pay at least $5 million, and anything over the $10 million will be paid by the federal government.

This government will have lost probably $10 million unless it gets hardnosed and asks General Instruments to deliver the goods. If that company cannot deliver the goods, or is 48 days late, for example, the government could then say it does not want the goods because they were not delivered on time. I am afraid that this bunch of softies over there are not capable of that kind of hardnosed bargaining. That is one small example of mismanagement, as a result of which the government will lose at least $10 million.

The frustrating and maddening thing is that the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo), the hon. member who comes from the riding of Skeena—I am sure her constituents will be embarrassed to hear of this but they should know the truth—held a meeting in Toronto following which she said to the reporters that the government did not really want to get into the game, and was just using this as a bargaining tool in order to gain access to a certain segment of the lottery business.

There is $23 million for the contract and an additional $5 million in taxpayers' money the government is using as a bargaining tool, all of which has been lost. Some $28 million of taxpayers' money has been used as a bargaining tool, even though the minister has said the government is not interested in this dollar game. That is one hell of a way to bargain.

I wanted to point out that one small example because I have followed this process from the beginning of the problem back in early June, through the summer and the fall. I was very interested in it, perhaps because one of the Canadian computer firms capable of handling this work is in my riding, but also, over and above that consideration, because of Canadian jobs and Canadian content. In spite of this situation this government is worrying about our trade deficit in manufactured goods. I suggest ministers over there do not know what is going on.

This is small example of how, within four months, this federal government, through one small ministry in a very small area, has thrown away millions of Canadian taxpayers' funds. this illustrates the mismanagement, the inability to govern, the inability to administer and the general inability of this government to take care of these funds.

In the first bill presented to this new session the government is asking us to give it $17 billion with no strings attached. They have to be lunatics, but I suppose with the majority over there they will vote this through. The taxpayers of today and the taxpayers for generations down the road will be the losers because of the greed of this government.

I hope this government will accept the very reasonable proposition put forward this afternoon by my leader. That is an intelligent and courteous proposition for any legislative body, whether it be a town council, a county council, a city council, a provincial legislature or whatever. My leader has suggested that the government does not ask for the $10 billion which it does not need until the next fiscal year until it has at least tabled the estimates showing how it intends to spend the money. Up until now this government has been getting away with what might be called theft, and certainly with the squandering of Canadian taxpayers' money and the future of Canadians as a whole. We must pay in the future for what we borrow now. That is the case according to my banker, at least, and probably according to your banker, Mr. Speaker, and everybody else's banker except the banker for those spendthrifts who presently occupy the government benches.

It is my hope that the people of Canada wisen up and send a message even stronger than the message which lies in the loss of 13 by-elections out of 15 about ten days ago. I hope before this bill is passed Canadians will write to their members suggesting that perhaps the government deserves the $7 billion, but not the $10 billion for the next fiscal year.

I hope this government will accept my leader's proposition and sever this bill.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, recently without further ado, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) introduced a very short bill, not all that thick, which will have such serious effects that Canadians are entitled to know the state of our national affairs. In the bill, the gouvernment is requesting a small amount of $7 billion to complete the current fiscal year and, as a cushion for the beginning of next year, a small additional amount of $10 billion. This is considered as an urgent and important measure by the government. Mr. Speaker, an emergency session has been going on since October 11, 1978, the opening date of this parliament. Since the beginning of our proceedings in the House, we have held emergency sittings on the postal service, we have considered an emergency bill about shipping on the Great Lakes and today we have before us an emergency legislation on the unquenchable thirst of a government that wants to borrow, a careless and inefficient government.

Mr. Speaker, this emergency bill comes as confirmation of the fact that our economy is in very bad shape and the government in totally incapable of a sound administration. The government announces last minute measures and tries to ram them through as quick as possible. We do not have any economic policy nor any economic incentive program; we only have last minute measures, which all in all means a policy of improvisation. We have before us a government which is exhausted and which proposes to contract an unprecedented debt, a perpetual debt, for what is left of the fiscal year. The government requires an additional borrowing authority for $7 billion. This is a fantastic sum, given the time period for which it is allocated. In other words, if all Canadians are to share this amount each family will end up with an additional debt of $1,000, and that is over a six-month period only. And these billions will not be transformed into special programs or improvements which the population has a right to expect. They will be used only to pay back old borrowings and the interests on them.

Mr. Speaker, the discount rate has been raised to 10.25 per cent, an unprecedented rate for the Bank of Canada, apparently to strengthen a dollar which nothing seems to stabilize. As a result, the prime rate for Canadian chartered banks went up to 11 per cent and we are led to believe that it will probably reach 11.25 per cent and even 11.5 per cent between now and next December.

This horrendous increase in the interest rate is really concerning. Has the government not been taken by surprise by its own policy? Has it not been forced to readjust its interest rate on new saving bonds issues? The day before yesterday newspapers referred to a third drop in one week at the Toronto Stock Exchange, the most important in Canada. And what is the reason for this drop according to analysts? Mostly the rising interest rate. The situation is therefore uncertain. When even our own financiers have no confidence in our economy, how can we expect foreign investors to regain confidence in our money? That staggering increase in interest rates will surely have a disastrous impact. We already see some examples of that. The impact is already obvious in the residential construction area.

During the last session, we have increased the Export Development Corporation's capital to allow them to make loans to many countries which are not always, as one would believe, poor countries. Those loans are made at very advantageous rates, much more advantageous than the rates we can get from various government loan programs within the country with the rates we have now. For the economic development of our great and beautiful country, for the development of our resources, we must call for huge capital investments.

Those funds will, of course, be supplied by the financial institutions and chartered banks which control that market. What will happen to those huge projects as a result of those consecutive increases in the rates of interest? Possible investors, especially small ones, will prefer to wait till the situation has again become normal before going ahead and investing their capital. Canadian businesses, already weak, will grow even weaker and will soon give under the weight of that new burden grown too heavy, while attemps are being made to help them, through all sorts of measures like those the minister responsible for small and medium businesses announced last spring.

That situation points out the fact that the monetary and fiscal policies of the government do not agree. They give to businesses with one hand and remove with the other. As our economy is in danger, this is no time to announce measures that smell of electoral promises. Nor is it the time to go deeper into debt. The burden of our national debt is already heavy enough to carry.

In short, that borrowing power adds substantially to our debt and, anyway, was not expected at the start of the year; it will mortgage us for years to come. How then can we remain financially solvent? When we think of the interest of $18 million we pay on our debt every day, and of our debt that increases visibly, we must of necessity think of future generations, of our childen and our children's children who will have to face tremendous difficulties. How can anyone explain this bill otherwise, Mr. Speaker, a few weeks before a budget is brought down? For we all know here that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will shortly be bringing down a budget for the current year.

How can we not be reticent when faced with the amount of interest the government will have to pay if parliament passes the bill which is before us? Just when will the Minister of Finance finally announce tax measures which will speed up our economic recovery instead of always increasing the burden of the national debt? Mr. Speaker, I will save you from all the statistics and economic indicators which only serve to prove how far our economy has slumped. They are too depressing. Let us remember that the last times the government borrowed it was from the United States and West Germany. Foreign countries are getting richer and profiting from our poverty. Our policy in that area is clear cut.

We, of the Social Credit party, believe that we have in this country all the monetary and fiscal means necessary to develop our resources on our own. First of all we have the Bank of Canada, which is not far, which is nearby in fact, this bank belongs to all Canadians, it is the government's bank. It should finance the public and parapublic sectors by issuing new funds. The means is there, why not use it? Why must we always count on others to get us out of trouble? This economic slump is certainly welcome by our lenders who profit, as I just said, from our distress, our poverty, our inability to turn the wealth of our country into money and provide all Canadians with a decent and fair income, a credit rather than a debt system, like the one we have now and which the government seems bent on perpetuating.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, nine days ago when we came back to the fourth session of the thirtieth parliament I little realized that the first opportunity I would have to speak in this House would be for the government to seek to borrow some $17 billion. It is with a very deep sense of sadness that I find myself in the position of having to debate a bill with the throne speech uncompleted, two acts passed to put labour unions back to work, and an emergency measure before as for the government to borrow another $17 billion, after three times already this year having come to parliament for power to borrow.

Ten years ago when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came to office he had a vision and a dream. When he came here he wanted for Canada a United States economy, a form of British government and a style of French culture. He has been here for ten years and what we have ended up with is United States culture, French government and a British economy. I submit that what we have in fact is literally the "Artful Dodger", pickpocketing from the Canadian people in the sense that he has overtaxed, overspent, overborrowed and overgoverned, and has done all of that under the sheets in the dark of the night, shrouded in secrecy.

It is audacious of this government to request authority for the borrowing of funds without submitting to parliament the reasons for such borrowing. This puts all economic sense aside, puts all sense of the judicial system aside and means that the government assumes that, by its election to power, it is given dictatorial authority over the nation. I think it is shameful that today the government should be placing before the citizens of this country a request to borrow money without exposing the purpose for which they need it.

Nothing more or less can be said about this government than that they have a crass disrespect for the Canadian people. They believe they can belligerently ask for money without telling how it is going to be spent. Like kings of the old days, they think that citizens are now subjects and that there is no longer a sense of democracy in the country.

I find it abhorrent that members on the other side could even think of sitting in this House at this moment believing they can support a government that has come to this parliament on three previous occasions asking to borrow money, and now comes a fourth time with its hands out but never indicating how the money is to be spent. No private person, no private institution and no business firm could function using such irresponsible ploys.

There are no words expressive enough to show how disappointed I am with this kind of tactic, Mr. Speaker. If you took all the ministers of finance that have served under the Prime Minister and laid them end to end, a simple conclusion would be, "So what?" What we have had in this country is a long succession of economic virgins, none having any common business sense. This government has earned the disrespect that the people of Canada hold for it now and which is so obvious from the Atlantic to the Pacific, from the north pole to the United States border. They have earned that disrespect because they themselves have had disrespect for citizens—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Abbott: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Malone: I would not permit a question from the Minister of State (Small Business), Mr. Speaker. If they cannot run a country, how can they possibly ask a question?

Some hon. Members: No, no.

An hon. Member: Chicken.

Mr. Malone: Chicken? If the hon. member wants to call people chicken, let him call an election. We will see who is chicken. I am sure—

Mr. Abbott: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I understand from one of my colleagues in the House that the hon. member made a scurrilous reflection on the French speaking members of this government and this House. I was going to ask him—because I did not hear it—whether he could say that again.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I did make a scurrilous reflection on the whole government, not an ethnic, not a religious reflection, but a reflection on that government. They earned that reflection and they are stuck with it. If they want to call people chicken, let them call the election. We know where the chickens will be roosting.

An hon. Member: What was the mention of the French government?

Mr. Malone: The hon. member is probably the one who thought it was scurrilous. Read the record.

To get back to Bill C-7, Mr. Speaker, the purpose of which is for the government to borrow $10 billion and not account for it, let us examine some of the hypotheses of how they might use that $10 billion. One of the things they might very well do is build a swimming pool at Stornoway. The Prime Minister could easily look forward to living in a home with a swimming pool and $10 billion could well build that. Hon. members on the other side might warm up to the fact that they are only about six months away from having a leader without a swimming pool. In their arrogance they refuse to let this parliament and therefore the country know why they want a blank cheque to spend any way they please.

The other more reasonable possibility is that they are borrowing this $10 billion without indicating how it is to be spent because they want to use it as an election ploy—to give money away through government programs. I submit that is the dangerous, crass, dictatorial kind of administration we have had for ten years and which this government is again trying to impose upon the people of this country. They have taken away the concept of citizenship; there is no respect for the people and, therefore, the people have no respect for the government.

In ten years there have been ten speeches from the throne and in every single one the government has underscored that the major issue will be the economy. Today, everything is in a worse situation than it was ten years ago, however. Our balance of payments situation is worse, our debt is worse, national unity is fragmented. The fact of the matter is that on every dimension this country is worse off than it was a decade ago.

The Prime Minister has underscored the economy as the most important issue facing the nation in every throne speech for the last decade. In 1969 he said we would be on the road to financial disaster if nothing was done to bring spending under control. Little did he know at the time that he was roaring down the road at one hundred kilometres per hour headed for disaster. Our spending has increased some 230 per cent in the period he has been Prime Minister. He has literally robbed the people of this nation and unfortunately the debt will fall upon our children and grandchildren. It is generations ahead who will have to pay off this enormous debt.

The only people working productively today are those at the Canadian Mint. The government likes to point to the increase in the gross national product, but it must be related to what we are borrowing. The only reason the gross national product has increased is that the Mint is working double or triple shifts printing money in order to keep this government from falling into complete disorder. But the economy of this nation is already in disorder. Our balance of payments would be even worse today but for the fact that we are selling off our raw and primary resources.

There is a tremendous shortfall in end product production in this country. We manufacture goods which create jobs and this puts money in Canadian bank accounts. This is a sector of industry which is very unproductive. If this government were running a 4-H club it would not know the difference between Herefords and heifers. If it was running a Boy Scout club it would give merit badges to the boy who could borrow and spend the most money. The truth of the matter is this government could not run either of those clubs, nor do they have the right or the prerogative to run this country.

This government over the past ten years has indicated three times that it would make significant cuts in its budget. While the government tells us about the cuts, each time a cut has been indicated without exception we have had an enormous increase. Frankly, I am scared when the government talks about cutting. When the government cuts, the increases are massive.

I have used words today which I used in all sincerity when talking about a dictatorial government. For example, during this past summer the Prime Minister went to Bonn where somehow he formulated an idea. He then travelled to Morocco where he consoled himself on the sands, finally to return to Canada. But within a few hours of his return he notified the national television networks of his intention to speak on the air in order to announce a $2 billion cut in government spending. He did this without consulting the people of Canada, without consulting business, without consulting labour, but, most important of all, without consulting parliament and his cabinet. That is one-man rule. Here is a decision made to slice $2 billion from government spending.

In my opinion this government never once intended to make cuts, because the Prime Minister has already attacked our party for suggesting some of the cuts should not have taken place. He is now saying: "Look, I have tried to make cuts and the opposition simply says we should not have made them there."

I believe that the cuts which the government made were made unilaterally by the Prime Minister, and he made them in the most popular sections of each of the departments of this government. It appears to me that the Prime Minister did this deliberately and for the precise reason of getting the opposition members and the country mad so that he could shrug his shoulders and say: "Look, I have tried to make cuts but it is the reverse they want". I say look where the cuts have been made. The Prime Minister did not do away with Petro-Can, as our party is advocating. We do not need an oil company run by the same mentality as the post office. Instead the Prime Minister cut CanFarm and research to the fisheries and forestry. The Prime Minister cut weather stations located off the Atlantic coast which are vital to the fishing industry.

Those cuts were made deliberately in order to anger the population, so that when that anger reared its head the Prime Minister could shrug his shoulders and say: "I tried to make cuts, the public are angry. Obviously they want more government spending." That was the most dictatorial act this country has ever seen, carried out by one man after his sojourn on the beaches of Morocco. He returned to Canada and announced on national television that there would be a cut of $2 billion. From what we hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) did not even know that CanFarm was to be cut until after he returned to Ottawa.

This government should be locked up. The Senate is not even good enough for them. It is high time that we recognized the country has been run by people of crass determination to stay in power rather than to govern, whose mentality it is to treat the people of the nation as subjects and not as citizens, a government that assumes that once it is in power it has total authority. Programs have been cut intentionally to make people angry. Programs have been cut without feeling and without feedback regardless of the need for some of those research programs which have been taken away.

This government claims to be cutting some $500 million from this year's budget. However, the fact of the matter is that the federal government has increased its spending by some $4 billion over last year. That is no cut at all, Mr. Speaker. That is growth like the growth of mushrooms in the dark fed by the kind of fodder this government gives. We all know what this is. That is the largest dollar increase since the restraint program was implemented in 1975. On the one hand we have a situation where the government is claiming to make cuts, while on the other hand it has the largest dollar increase and that in its restraint period.

The government is projecting another spending increase of $4.3 billion between now and 1980. I cannot think of anything more hypocritical than to suggest to the Canadian people that the government is holding back while it is in fact galloping forward with glee. The government and its members ought to be ashamed and embarrassed to sit on that side of the House. If they had any courage or integrity at all they would rise, leave their seats and sit as independents. Surely this nation deserves the right to have its citizens heard without the crass disregard we are exposed to from day to day here.

An increase spending rate of 8.7 per cent was promised for 1979. In the first three months of this year the spending rate was more than double that, at 17.3 per cent. Yet the government somehow leads people to believe that it will be in the ballpark of 6 per cent to 8 per cent by the end of the year. The government dishes out one set of facts knowing full well that it is simply not the case. It makes one wonder if there is an ounce of integrity left when one piece of information is given and they know that they have no hope of ever reaching the objectives set forward.

The government claims $71 million in savings and cuts in the CBC budget. It should be noted, however, that during the past three years the budget of the CBC has increased 48 per cent. By cutting $71 million the government is simply holding the CBC to the same level of spending as last year. Over the last three years the budget of the CBC has increased 48 per cent to something in excess of $500 million. Here again the government is trying to pull the wool over people's eyes in order to create some sort of an illusion that it is cutting back. That is what this government is, government by illusion, by disguise, men and women of many masks, people who simply do not have the courage to speak with straightforward honesty to the Canadian public. It is high time that the frustrations the Canadian electorate took out on this government on October 16 are allowed to express themselves nationally.

For the past two decades federal government spending has increased from $6.2 billion to $47 billion. Then there is a whimper on the other side that we are now going to cut back when we know that the rate will increase again by more than 8 per cent. That is government by disguise. As I mentioned earlier, the Trudeau years have been a period of increases in spending of some 230 per cent. Yet they choose to shroud their information, place themselves in darkness and fail to be open.

This government believes in secret courts. It will not be open to its commissioners and hides information from members of parliament and the House of Commons. In every way they have lost the right to govern. In every way that message will be told when the time comes and they dare call the next election.

Ten years ago the Post Office deficit was $67 million. Through the mismanagement of this government it has increased to $567 million. In ten years the Post Office deficit has increased $500 million.

Somehow this government still believes that because you can buy a five cent stamp for a nickel, inflation has not taken place. As we all know, the 14-cent stamp is no different than what it was in the Diefenbaker years. You can still mail a letter for five cents. The other nine cents is for storage.

The government is at fault. It has labour, business and the citizens of this country against them. Everyone is against this government except itself and its will to hang on. It is high time for that will to be tested.

In ten years the number of postal employees has increased from 26,000 to 72,000, an increase of 172 per cent. Even those with the dutiful job of analysing this government have made crass statements about it. The former Auditor General, Maxwell Henderson, when he addressed the Palliser Wheat Growers Association in Saskatoon on January 4, 1978, gave a litany of examples of gross government mismanagement. Maxwell Henderson spoke very plainly about the extreme dangers facing this country. In a fairly lengthy speech, he documented how this government is out of control. While I have that speech before me, I will not quote it at length. The bottom line states that this is a government which has lost control over spending in Canada.

If this were to happen in the United States, the government would be impeached. Because it has happened in Canada, they are afraid to call an election. The least we can say about this group of people is that silence may not be golden, just plain yellow. If they had any courage, they would ask their Prime Minister to test himself with a vote of confidence from the people of this country.

If the government have any love for Canada, they will not continue to sit in their seats, crassly letting the economy erode, watching national unity in our nation become more divided rather than united, watching our productivity decrease day by day. There is among Canadians a spirit of ill feeling about the country in which they live.

This is one of the saddest starts to any parliament that we could have. We hardly got started when the throne speech debate was interrupted in order to put two labour unions back to work. It was again interrupted so that the government, for the fourth time in one fiscal year, could come to parliament to ask to borrow more money which it does not know how it is going to spend. It has given no estimates to parliament and, therefore, to the people of Canada.

This has to be a sad day in Canadian history. It is a day of precedents. Never in the history of this country have legislators been asked to issue any government in any legislature any amount of money without some notion as to how it would be spent.

This government, with all the audacity it can muster, is asking for $10 billion. For what? We do not know. Perhaps it will be used to build a swimming pool at Stornoway for the Prime Minister's retirement. Perhaps it will be used for gifts to give away at the time of the next election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Malone: I hear the noise on the other side. As long as we are not told how it will be used, we have the right to guess. If the government will not expose how the $10 billion will be spent, we have the right to go before the media in this country and make wild guesses with no more responsibility than a government which asks for $10 billion without wanting the people to know why.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Malone: I hear them on the other side. Perhaps this is a good note on which to end. The shame is on those who think they have the right to ask the Canadian people for $10 billion without telling them how the government are going to spend it. The shame is a clear indication of the credibility of the source. I will resume my seat. We will let the Canadian people judge after the government have the courage to call the next election.

Mr. Duclos: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Will the hon. member who just spoke be courageous enough to indicate to the House what he meant in his preliminary remarks when he referred to this country as having a British economy and a French government?

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member read Hansard tomorrow. It is well explained in there. If he wants to draw conclusions that are erroneous, that is typical of this government. I never did and never would slur against my brother who is French. I hold him in great respect, as I do all ethnic groups.

There are those on the other side who may cause more division than unity in this country by doing as they have done. Whenever the words "French" or "English" come up in this House of Commons, they somehow try to reflect that it means something of a division. Surely the hon. member is of an age and has an education whereby he can interpret what he reads. If he wants to be suspicious, let him. However, if he has no facts, he should get some.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to both hon. members that is not a question of privilege.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of Bill C-7 is to permit the government to increase Canada's indebtedness by a further $7 billion in the current fiscal year ending March 31, 1979 from the debt level outstanding at March 31, 1979. It also permits the government to increase its indebtedness by an additional $10 billion in the fiscal year ending March 31, 1980. It confirms the authority of government to borrow funds in any currency. Also, it amends the Financial Administration Act to confirm that borrowing authorities are cumulative and do not lapse with the maturity of debt issues.

Before this bill was introduced, the government had obtained borrowing authorities totalling $2 billion in the current and previous fiscal years, 1979 and 1978. The $7 billion borrowing authority requested by Bill C-7 will raise the total to $28 billion. With this authority the government may increase the unmatured debt of Canada by 66 per cent in two years. What a disgraceful record! It clearly indicates that there is no control and no proper management. This government can be termed a blank cheque government headed by a lot of blanks.

This is the third time the government has requested an increase in the borrowing limit for the current fiscal year. That is hardly indicative of sound financial management. When the previous borrowing authority was requested in March of 1978, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) claimed that it would be sufficient to cover all cash requirements for the current year. The minister has now proved his own claim to be false. He has not offered a proper explanation of what happened. The government seeks borrowing authority amounting to $10 billion for 1980 without telling parliament or the Canadian people of its spending or revenue estimates and without specifying anything about the expected economic situation or the federal fiscal stance. The request for 1980 amounts to a request for the approval of a $10 billion cheque which specifies neither the payee nor the financial status of the payor.

We have objected in principle to Bill C-7 and attempted, through a second reading amendment, to have the legislation defeated and withdrawn, which it should be. It is an absolute disgrace. Instead of trying to eliminate waste and provide proper management in the country, the first thing this government does is borrow more money. One would think the least it could have done would have been to give the new Comptroller-

General a chance to clean up the unholy mess which has been created in this country over the last 15 years. This uncontrolled spending and this Liberal madness actually started in January 1963 under the Pearson government. It has accelerated since 1968, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) took over.

Mr. Rogers, the new Comptroller-General, pointed recently in Edmonton to the appointment of the Lambert royal commission to study the quality of financial management and accountability in the government and the recently completed reviews of Crown corporations by the Privy Council. He said that the challenge now is to maintain and extend these good management practices across the whole range of government operations. Why not give that a chance?

Why not try it out for a couple of years? Let us see if we can find this money internally, as is being done in the province of Manitoba. The Manitoba government has told all provincial institutions and government departments that they will not get a blank cheque or a big handout every year. They have been told that they will have to manage their affairs better and cut out waste, and that is what government departments in Manitoba are doing. I refer to one hospital alone which has reduced its operating costs by $3.7 million because the government asked it to clean up its act. That is just one example. Administrative costs in that hospital were reduced by $400,000. Why will this government not try a plan like that? We have an expert in Mr. Rogers. Let us give him a chance to work. Then perhaps later on we might consider authorizing more borrowing. But this government is not interested in cutting out waste and improving management. As far as this government is concerned the only solution to all our problems is to borrow more money, print more money and spend more money.

Mr. Rogers went on to say that there are three key changes which must occur: a reduction in communication delays between government departments and managerial sectors of government, better medium-term planning, and better evaluation and control of government programs. Mr. Rogers also said:

> What my office and the departments need is a comprehensive status report, across the whole spectrum of financial management and control, on where we are now, what plans are in place and what further we need to do, department by department.

That makes sense and it should have been done a long time ago. Let us find the money internally instead of borrowing, borrowing, borrowing. Mismanagement is highlighted almost daily, and a glaring example was revealed this week. We learned that the government is paying $750,000 for empty office space and that the Department of Public Works will shell out an additional $3.6 million for a vacant ten-storey structure through 1984 unless Treasury Board approves a leasebreaking plan which would carry a $2 million penalty. On and on it goes in the Department of Public Works as well as every other department.

I would like to cite another example which shows that this government is not really sincere when it talks about restraint and cutting back. This week I received in my office the document I have in my hand. I am sure it cost a lot of money to print. I placed questions on the order paper yesterday in an attempt to find out the cost of printing this document, how many are being distributed and so forth. It is entitled "Ojibway Language Course Outline", and the introduction says the following:

> This Ojibway Language Course Outline was prepared to assist teachers in instructing beginners, young and old, to speak the Ojibway language. Hopefully, it will fill a need and serve as a guide.

No one could object to that, but I have absolutely no use for this document. There is no need to distribute it to every member of parliament and to everybody else across the country. Our Indian affairs critic should probably receive a copy as well as perhaps PC research and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), but it is of absolutely no interest or concern to me. It is just a waste of taxpayers' money.

I referred to one hospital in Winnipeg and the new Manitoba government program of eliminating waste and mismanagement in government departments and all institutions. The president of the hospital to which I referred released an excellent report on how expenditures were reduced by $3.7 million. It was done by creating committees comprising nurses, medical staff and laboratory people. Teams were set up to review all operations of the hospital, and in one year costs were reduced by $3.7 million. It is unfortunate that the government is not giving Mr. Rogers and the Auditor General a chance to implement their plans to eliminate waste and mismanagement and to save hundreds of millions of dollars within the government. The government does not want to do that. That is not the way it wants to operate. It wants to borrow more money.

It is interesting to hear some Liberal backbenchers talk. The other day the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) defended the government and its record and told us of the wonderful job it is doing. He criticized us, saying that it is just terrible that we have the audacity to criticize this government's uncontrolled spending. The hon. member says one thing in the House of Commons and another thing when he is in his riding. I would like to quote from an article which reported what the hon. member said in Vancouver. This news report states:

> Federal Liberal backbencher Art Lee criticized his government Saturday for failing to restrain spending and inflation.
> Lee, MP from Vancouver East, told the party's B.C. convention that "this government has fallen short of handling the Canadian economy as well as it might have."

That is the understatement of the year.

> —"the federal government has lost control over its own bureaucracy and over it own purse strings."

That is what he said back home, but what does he say here? He defends this irresponsible government. The report went on to say the following:

> "The federal government must balance the budget and declare a moratorium on the growth of the public service," Lee told about 250 applauding Liberals.

That is probably all the Liberals there are left in British Columbia.

Mr. Lee: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If the hon. member would care to look, he would find that that speech was made in 1975.

What the hon. member quotes me as saying in 1975 is something I fully subscribed to at that time, but because of speeches of backbench members of the Liberal party, who have great influence on members on the Treasury benches, since 1975 the government has been reducing its expenditures below the level of the rate of growth of the gross national product. Last August the government announced a very sincere program with respect to government restraint. The government said it would curtail financial requirements by $500 million for the current fiscal year and projected a further curtailment of $2.5 billion for the next fiscal year. Because of the influence of members like myself, that is the kind of action this government takes. The hon. member deliberately did not tell us the date of the news report.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the date is at the bottom of the article. For the convenience of the hon. member for Vancouver East, I point out that the date is September 29, 1975. If his statements were relevant then, they are more relevent today. He speaks about a restraint program. If there is a restraint program, why is the government wanting to borrow $17 billion?

The hon. member went on to say that this was not only a necessity, it was a matter of paramount importance if we were to cope adequately with inflation, and the government was not doing enough to bring its expenditures into line with the economy. If that was the way he felt, I do not know how he can possibly sit over there now with that political party after that statement in 1975 and what is facing us here today.

We have had a series of finance ministers who have been complete failures. Probably the biggest failure of all was John Turner. Federal government spending more than doubled when he was finance minister. When he departed, Mr. Macdonald took over, but he could not straighten out the mess so he too resigned and departed. He did not do enough damage here, so now he is travelling around the country making a series of statements. Speaking in New York recently he said that personal attacks on the Prime Minister may polarize Canadian opinion and destroy confederation. Let me remind hon. members that the Prime Minister is responsible for introducing the rule changes in 1968; he is not the type of man who wants to be accountable to parliament or the Canadian people.

Also, officials, whether it is at the federal, provincial or municipal level, want to reduce the accounting system so there is no proper examination of the expenditures. Prior to 1968 there used to be approximately 450 votes with itemized accounts of every federal government department so you could see what was going on. That number was reduced to approximately 160 votes. Now when we look at the estimates of every department we see that "others" went up 43 million and "miscellaneous" went up $5 million, and this sort of nonsense.

The article to which I referred earlier goes on to read:

> Macdonald, who resigned from the Trudeau cabinet a little more than a year ago, blames what he calls "very substantial prejudice" in English speaking Canada against the Prime Minister because he is a French Canadian.

That is absolute nonsense. Our concern lies with the way the government has handled tax dollars and the economy of this country. The previous prime minister, Mr. Pearson, started all this in January of 1963. We criticized the government's record then, and Mr. Pearson was an Anglophone. So it has nothing to do with the nationality of the person running the government. What Mr. Macdonald said was a lot of nonsense and he will not kid anybody in western Canada or any place else with such statements.

Dennis Braithwaite said it very well in a recent article in the Toronto Star when he wrote about the Liberals clamouring to get rid of the present Prime Minister and wanting to bring back John Turner. I did not hear Mr. Macdonald, in his statement in New York, say anything about the Manitoba Liberal candidates who want to dump the Prime Minister. Do they want to dump him because he is a French Canadian? Why does Mr. Macdonald not raise that? They are having a squabble in Manitoba.

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. We are in the process of debating a bill which is before this parliament, namely, Bill C-7. I can find nothing in the remarks of the hon. member opposite in the last several minutes that has had any bearing whatsoever on the bill. I wonder if that might be drawn to his attention, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member revert to the terms of Bill C-7.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the terms of the bill cover the borrowing of large amounts of money, and if we had a responsible government, we would not be presented with such a bill in the first place. That is why I am highlighting all the squabbling within the Liberal party over their present leader and the confusion this is causing around the country. Apparently they are upset, and I can understand their being upset, with regard to the way the Prime Minister has allowed the government to get out of control and has handed a blank cheque to every cabinet minister to spend just as he likes. Of course, their main concern is to run the Liberal Party in western Canada in the next federal election. I think their candidates will not qualify under the Election Expenses Act, as was the case with the Liberal candidate in Burnaby-Richmond-Delta. He did not get 15 per cent of the votes; in fact, he got less than 10 per cent, and 51 Liberals lost their deposits in the provincial election in Saskatchewan. So I can understand why nobody wants to run for the Liberal party out in western Canada.

Here is another example of what is wrong with Canada and how this government mismanages the country. We want to encourage entrepreneurs in Canada and we want products to be manufactured in this country. I will read an article about a gentleman who resided in Saskatchewan but who is leaving Canada now because he cannot get anywhere here. He said he is fed up with Ottawa. The article is entitled, "Fed up with Ottawa, disgruntled inventor heads south". The gentleman resided in Ebenezer, Saskatchewan.

Add John Appelt's name to the long list of disgruntled Canadian inventors.

Earlier this month Mr. Appelt, his wife Molly and son Russell packed all they could carry in a converted bus and headed for the United States, frustrated at the treatment the Canadian government and industry gave his latest invention, a grasshopper harvester.

Mr. Appelt, 42, who also works as an upholsterer, said he doubts he will return to this village 120 kilometres east of Regina, or to Canada to stay.

"A year ago, I was a solid Canadian and I thought it was the best country to be in," he said.

He goes on to explain his invention.

Mr. Condon: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. May I ask the present speaker a question?

Mr. McKenzie: The hon. member may do so at the end of my speech, Mr. Speaker. The gentleman went on to say that he reserves his most scathing criticism for the federal Department of Agriculture which, he says, thwarted his attempts to get the grasshopper harvester recognized as a legitimate machine. The article goes on:

He believes the department discouraged him because his invention would use mechanical means, not chemical sprays, to control the prairie pests. "I solidly believe Agriculture Canada is bought and sold by the chemical companies," he said.

That is quite a charge, Mr. Speaker. The Montana Energy Research and Development Institute welcomed the gentleman down there and they will help him develop his new invention. This is another example of mismanagement and a very serious charge against a federal department's operation.

The Liberals are so anxious to replace the present Prime Minister that they want to have John Turner back. That is understandable. They would not want to look for a responsible person who has had a good record in office as minister of finance; they want somebody who was a total failure.

I would like to give some examples from the time when all this highly accelerated waste and mismanagement started. During the period in which the Hon. John Turner was minister of finance, spending by the federal government jumped by 99.8 per cent. To put it another way, it took us 105 years to reach a federal spending level of $17,004.4 million. Mr. Turner doubled that figure in 44 months, taking the level of governmental spending in his brief term to twice that reached by federal governments since confederation. He is the person they want to bring in to replace the present Prime Minister! That is jumping from the frying pan into the fire.

Under the budgets which Mr. Turner brought into parliament, $113 billion of taxpayers' money was spent, or at least borrowed. When Mr. Turner took over from Edgar Benson, inflation was running at 4.9 per cent. When he left, it was 10.6 per cent. Under the aegis of Mr. Turner, the cost of living jumped 38.5 per cent and the dollar, if one assumes it was worth 100 cents in January, 1972, was worth only 72 cents when he walked out to Bay Street. Is this the man who should replace the present Prime Minister?

At the time John Turner was given the mantle in January, 1972, there were 544,000 people out of work. When he left, 732,000 Canadians were unemployed. In spite of record spending and all the measures he took to promote employment in business, only 69,000 jobs were created in the manufacturing sector from December, 1971 to December, 1975.

In 1972 there was a surplus of $700 million in our current account balance, which is the equivalent of our country's checking account in international trade. In 1975 there was a deficit of almost $5 billion. In the aggregate, since Mr. Turner took over the nation has had a current account deficit every year. It goes on and on. It is a disgraceful and unbelievable record. Apparently Mr. Turner has charisma. We have seen that in the past, but it is not one of the qualifications for running the country in a sound and businesslike manner. This is not Hollywood show business. The charisma gimmick has outlived its usefulness. That is the only reason why they want to bring this man back, but he will not fool Canadians.

The devaluation of the Canadian dollar has been caused mostly by mismanagement of the nation's business and government borrowing. No longer are we an attractive country in which to invest money. We cannot even encourage Canadians to invest in Canada. The Canadian dollar was overvalued because the present administration damaged seriously the financial solvency of Canada. In the 1978 fiscal year, the government could raise less than 80 per cent of the revenues required to finance its wild spending habits. In 1979 the government will be able to raise only 75 per cent of the required revenues. The international investment community distrusts a government willing to live so far beyond its means. They are unwilling to buy a currency which the government persists in debasing through excessive deficit spending. When will it end? It goes on and on. It never stops. It is completely and totally irresponsible.

The Canadian dollar was overvalued because of the government's inability to cope with any of Canada's current economic problems. Low real growth, high unemployment and high inflation have prevailed in Canada for four years. There are no signs of improvement. Meanwhile the government continues to take actions which harm business and investor confidence. It continues to make policy changes regarding wage and price controls, foreign investment controls, and a harsher competition policy. There is an increasing burden of regulation and government interference. Also, we are faced with continuing threats by the Prime Minister regarding increasing federal intervention.

The fall of the dollar was triggered by the election of the Parti Québécois in November 1976. Between the two of them, they have done a great job of downgrading Canada.

An hon. Member: They supported you in the by-elections.

Mr. McKenzie: I should like to refer to a few of our proposals which are supported by the Economic Council of Canada.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKenzie: It is interesting to listen to the comments of backbenchers opposite. They criticize us and they criticize you. I will defy you—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order.

An hon. Member: Address the Speaker.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Address the Chair.

Mr. McKenzie: All right. Through you, Mr. Speaker, I defy them to find anyone in Canada who knows anything about economics and government and has anything good to say about the government, or will support anything it does.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Name one.

Mr. Beatty: Name 40.

Mr. Martin: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: The Canadian dollar—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The Chair recognizes the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, has the hon. member looked at any part of the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? Does he know where Canada stands in relation to the other 15 industrialized countries in the world?

Mr. Gillies: Thirteenth.

Mr. Martin: It is in first and second place in most cases. I am quite sure the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark)—

Mr. Paproski: Order, order!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: That is a point of argument.

Mr. Martin: —and the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens)—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. parliamentary secretary is getting into debate.

Mr. Paproski: That is correct.

Mr. Abbott: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McKenzie: In an attempt at continuing—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott) is recognized by the Chair.

Mr. Abbott: Mr. Speaker, I should like to point out that approximately two days ago Mr. John Bulloch, President of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, had high praise for the economy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Abbott: He felt that there was a considerable degree of hypocrisy about it, I would assume from his remarks.

Mr. Mazankowski: So does Eugene Whelan.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. McKenzie) has the floor.

Mr. McKenzie: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. There is a record number of small business bankruptcies. I am sure Mr. Bulloch was praising your records respecting small businesses.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order.

An hon. Member: Address the Chair.

Mr. McKenzie: There has never been so many bankruptcies in the country as there are today. If I want any statistics as to where this country stands, certainly I will not refer to the speech made by the Prime Minister. His speech—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I suggest the hon. member return to Bill C-7.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. Paproski: Call it six o'clock.

Mr. McKenzie: Your Honour allowed the intervention of the parliamentary secretary on statistics.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The parliamentary secretary rose on a point of order. I suggest the hon. member return to the terms of Bill C-7.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKenzie: May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REQUEST FOR McDONALD COMMISSION INTERIM REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity, inasmuch as the government has given terms of reference to the McDonald commission which include the question of ministerial involvement, knowledge or approval of Royal Canadian Mounted Police activities, but cannot absolve the House of its duty to consider the conduct of ministers of parliament I move:

That this House requests the Prime Minister to urge the commission to bring in an interim report dealing with this issue so that members can examine the accuracy of ministers' statements in that regard and decide if any action needs to be taken in parliament in the light of the evidence, findings and recommendations of the commission; and, further, requests that the interim report be presented in time so that it can be considered in this current parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REQUEST TODAY BE DECLARED ARTS DAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion which, because of prior consultation, I believe the House will find acceptable.

Considering that artists and members of the cultural community provide goods and services to the Canadian public in the form of entertainment, works of art and achievements of excellence; that these goods and services are provided at costs which are substantially less than their value in ensuring a Canadian identity; that 65,000 people are employed gainfully in the literary, visual and performing arts; that all Canadians benefit from the discipline and dedication which these people show toward their work; and because of the importance of culture and the arts in maintaining and promoting a sense of national identity and a common expression of national values, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe):

● (1412)

That this House declare its support for those involved in artistic and cultural activities by declaring today, Thursday, October 26, 1978, Arts Day across Canada.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is, therefore, moved by Mr. Symes, seconded by Mr. Lapointe:

That this House declare its support for those involved in artistic and cultural activities by declaring today, Thursday, October 26, 1978, Arts Day across Canada.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I want very much to speak on this motion: first of all, to welcome the initiative which has been taken by the arts group in coming to Ottawa today to present publicly their case as they have. We on this side of the House welcome it very strongly. We as a government provide support for the arts, something which we do out of firm conviction for a variety of reasons. Government support for the arts is not a response to some marginal interest of the public nor a mere frill in government expenditure: it is because these programs respond to deeply felt human needs which it is important for government to deal with.

Our second belief is that Canadian artists in their work, consciously—perhaps sometimes unconsciously—express Canadian response to the Canadian experience within their works. Their efforts are extremely important to this country because they help affirm for us all a sense of Canadian identity.

The third point—a point which, I think, is not often recognized by members of this House—is that support for the arts in Canada is support for an important industry in this country. The investments which we make as governments in this area come back to us in terms of the employment of Canadians and a multiple of economic benefits.

[Translation]

I want to indicate, Mr. Speaker, that to us it is not a figment of the imagination. People often talk about cuts in government programs in this area, and it is true that we were concerned about possible future cuts. I must say to the House that there was even an increase for the year 1979-80, a marginal one, I admit, to support the arts. As far as the government is concerned, it is essential that artists in this country are successful in their work, which is important both for the human mind and for us as Canadians. Mr. Speaker, the representatives who are sitting today in the galleries asked——for an inquiry, perhaps for a commission, into the future of the arts in this country. We have within the Department of the Secretary of State already begun an examination ourselves of what should be the long-term strategy for government funding in this area. We are determined that our efforts in this area should take place publicly. We will be involving this committee and the Canadian Conference of the Arts in discussing with us how we can most appropriately design an effective policy for the government in the future in this area.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question? There are a number of other members who seek the floor. I have no authority to give them the floor at this moment. The question period is to begin at this time, and Standing Orders make it clear that we must interrupt this debate to begin the question period.

An hon. Member: Come on; you gave the minister a chance.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. This matter is before the House. It is debatable, the debate has begun and it is my interpretation of the Standing Orders that we must now begin the question period, and then at three o'clock the subject matter is transferred, pursuant to Standing Orders, to government orders to be taken up at some other time.

If there are any other points to be raised with respect to the continuance of the debate, I will hear them at three o'clock. At the moment, I must begin the question period. I cannot put the question, because the debate is not concluded; there are other members who wish to participate.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

OVERPAYMENTS UNDER PROGRAM

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Yesterday, in the report of the minister's department, the Auditor General of Canada identified $142 million in overpayments under the UIC program. This, of course, is in addition to the $68 million already identified by the minister's department, for a total of $210 million in overpayments.

• (1417)

At a time when this government is supposed to be practising restraint, what does the minister intend to do about this intolerable situation? I can assure him that this kind of mismanagement and excess is unacceptable to the people of Canada.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the hon. member's question: it gives me an opportunity to put the facts into better perspective than heretofore. We are not just embarking now, but we embarked a year ago on seeking the assistance of the Auditor General with a view to indicating to us how we could best balance the service operation with the control mechanisms.

The Auditor General was good enough to put a team of experts into this field to examine something like 1,000 files out of the 2.3 million that were involved within a year. They spent about 4½ hours per file, where we only had the opportunity to spend about 20 minutes per file. On that basis, he gave us some indication of areas where there may be—and he cannot be positive about this—undetected overpayment. On that basis, not this year but last year we embarked upon a pilot project called Information on Hirings, from employers. We have put that in place in six regions of the country. We are improving our on-line computer system. I think it is important to realize that in any payment that is made directly to an individual or groups of individuals, invariably there are going to be overpayments. We have to determine how we can best balance the service with the overpayment and tighten up wherever possible in order to give this particular program the control it needs, as well as the service.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Last year the Auditor General identified $95 million in overpayments and made specific recommendations. He outlined the fact that existing control procedures were inadequate. Obviously, his recommendations were not acted upon because the total has now gone to over $200 million.

Why were the recommendations of the Auditor General not acted upon last year, and how does the minister explain the fact that we are faced with another $142 million overpayment?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, it was precisely because of the Auditor General's report that we took action in the pilot project known as Information on Hirings. As one of the steps we are improving the quantity and quality control. The increase the hon. member has thrown in is actual overpayments that we detected and most of which have been collected. He adds that on to the $142 million but, in fact, the two are not comparable. The supposed overpayment indicated by the Auditor General is the $142 million and, as I have indicated, we are working in four or five different areas to tighten up the control mechanism.

It must always be remembered that we have to balance this with service to something like 2.3 million people. We pay out close to $4 billion per year. I think this program stacks up well against OHIP, workmen's compensation or any payments in the private sector to large numbers of people.

Mr. McGrath: Obviously, Mr. Speaker, the minister is saying to us, "What's $142 million?"

Mr. Cullen: No, I am not.

Mr. McGrath: I can assure him that the House is entitled to an explanation. What steps did he take last year, when the Auditor General said that control procedures were inadequate? At that time there was $95 million in overpayments.

What steps did he take at that time, and will he now, through his House leader, make provision to have a report of his department containing this special audit by the Auditor General referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts, or does he subscribe to the view of the UIC director that the increase in overpayments is not major?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I met with the Auditor General both before and after his report last year to indicate that we would like to have stronger control mechanisms. We have to indicate to him how much money we are prepared to spend in addition to what we are spending now to put that control mechanism in place. We indicated to him that we were bringing forward a program on information on hirings which would be helpful. The computer programming that we are putting in place, the improvement in the quantity and quality control, all these mechanisms are directed to helping us in this particular area of control.

I am surprised the hon. member would suggest that I made the statement, "What's $142 million?" That statement was never made. I am very much concerned, not only as a result of this, but the UIC director indicated the increase from last year was something like $19 million. Given the increased number of claims, the increase in the amount of pay-out and the extended length of period that people are on particular claims, the difference was about $19 million. When he said $19 million, I suspect he was indicating that $19 million of a difference in a $3.9 billion payment is probably not a significant figure in that context.

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, we think that over $210 million is certainly very significant: it is major and it calls for action. I notice that the minister ignored one of the most important parts of the hon. member's question.

Will the minister now stand up and state that he will be prepared to recommend to the government House leader that this entire matter, particularly the Auditor General's report, be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts for study? Surely this sort of mismanagement and ineptness in connection with government restraint calls for this matter to be examined. Will you recommend that to the government House leader?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I never thought that in the House of Commons I would see the time when the hon. member for St. John's West would have to have his question pumped up and psyched up by the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: The fact of the matter is, and the hon. member for Hamilton West should know this, that we tabled our reports yesterday spelling out this particular statement made by the Auditor General, as well as several other positive things that have come about. The hon. member also knows that the Auditor General will, in fact, be making a report on this particular subject and that that will be referred to the public accounts committee.

I would challenge the hon. member to find any other program of this size, where direct payments have to be made to the public, where the error factor or the overpayment can be shown to be better than the one in this program.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I am used to this minister and his flim-flam. Now let me talk about the $210 million. Is this an entire loss to the Canadian people, through this government's incompetence, or is the minister prepared now to stand up and tell the Canadian people what steps he will take in order to try to recover some of this $210 million?

Mr. Jamieson: Including St. John's East.

Mr. Alexander: Let's hear from you on Namibia.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I do not know how long or short a time. I am rather accustomed to the hon. member's theatrical appearances here when he puts a question that I think he could put more seriously. The fact of the matter is that we have taken several actions in this particular area. We have indicated that we sought the help—we did not seek to hide this—of the Auditor General in this particular program. He was kind enough to give it. He was prepared to put personnel to work on 1,000 files that we have, spending something like 4½ hours on each file, whereas I have indicated that we spent something like 20 minutes.

We are prepared to go before the public accounts committee when the Auditor General's report comes out. In so far as the collections are concerned, we did embark on an advertising program indicating we were going to take that particular action. We thought it was appropriate to let people know we were going to tighten up. We moved the prosecutions up from 2,000 to 7,000. The administrative penalties have increased by something like 100,000 in the course of a year. So we are taking action. But that is not the answer to the overpayments, Mr. Speaker. The answer to that is to find some control mechanism that will make this as close to perfection as we can.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, now we are talking about control mechanism. I can recall when the minister downplayed the fraud squad. Can he advise this House and the people of Canada what steps he has taken to bring about a more effective fraud squad, or is he still prepared to let this go by the way and at the expense of the Canadian taxpayer? Can we have some information about the fraud squad, which I understand was quite effective?

Mr. McGrath: So effective they had to disband it.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, rather than decreasing the impact of the so-called fraud squad, we thought that rather than zero in on particular areas or regions of the country we should do this detection across the country. When we moved from the post-fraud squad era, we moved from 2,000 to 7,000 prosecutions; we moved from detecting 327,000 to detecting 447,000 violations of the act. So that to zoom in and suggest that the fraud squad is doing a job that would embarrass the government is just not in accordance with the facts.

Mr. Alexander: You said it, not me.

Mr. Cullen: I never said that, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member is misquoting me again.

POST OFFICE

ADDITIONAL PERSONS TO ASSIST MEDIATOR-ARBITRATOR IN SETTLING LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Acting Minister of Labour. Will the minister confirm that, following discussions which have taken place during the past 24 hours, the government has agreed to add two further persons to the mediator-arbitrator working on the postal dispute, one to be appointed by the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and one to be appointed by the Post Office?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have taken note of the very constructive suggestion that has been made by the Canadian Labour Congress. I discussed this suggestion with the mediator-arbitrator, who thinks it has great merit. Therefore, I am ready to appoint two assessors if the union representing the employees, and the employer, both want it, one to be recommended by each party, to assist the mediator-arbitrator in carrying out his duty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will direct my supplementary question to the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General confirm whether the government has agreed that, in dealing with a number of complex clauses in the agreement between the Post Office and CUPW as interpreted by Judge Tremblay and the two additional persons, it will give its unequivocal commitment that no existing benefits will be withdrawn from the union?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, first I should like to inform the House that our entire work force was back to work this morning and I hope that the mail will be delivered in the shortest possible time. In reply to the question put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I can say that he should rely on my co-operation for the appointment of an individual to assist the mediator-arbitrator appointed by the Department of Labour. Mr. Speaker, the Post Office Department does not usually withdraw acquired rights when negotiating with its employees. I can assure the House that if, for example, there are 56,000 grievances outstanding at present it is merely due to the fact that the terms of the collective agreement should be clarified and their meaning made more accurate. I think that the suggested appointment of two qualified persons to assist the mediator-arbitrator help clarify and specify the terms of the collective agreement is good.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: I would like to get the answer a little more clearly from the Postmaster General. In addition to suggesting that two people be added, one from CUPW and one from the Post Office, I also had in mind the fact that union members currently believe—reasonably so, in terms of the law that was passed—that existing rights might be taken away. Will the minister state unequivocally that this will not be the case?

I repeat the question: is the minister in agreement that Judge Tremblay and the two persons who will be interpreting the complex clauses will have, as a mandate from the government, the insistence that whatever decision they reach in such interpretations, no existing rights or benefits will be withdrawn?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, it seems clear from what the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby just said that the final decision will be made by the mediator-arbitrator. He will make his decision after discussing what must be clarified in the language of the collective agreement. I do not think there will be any question of a rollback, as it is called in a collective agreement. That was never our intention. The final decision will be made by these three persons.

INCOME TAX

MEMO FROM CHAMBER OF COMMERCE ASKING FOR REDUCTION IN INDIVIDUAL INCOME TAX—REACTION OF MINISTER

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Reports appeared in the morning papers that yesterday the Chamber of Commerce submitted a memo to the minister in which they suggest a reduction in individual income tax. Would the minister tell the House whether or not he is aware of the contents of that memo and what answer he intends to give in light of those recommendations?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am now receiving briefs from several organizations before presenting my budget. I have met with most of the finance ministers in Canada as well as businessmen and union leaders throughout the country. That is a process of consultations which I began last spring and which I intend to continue. I receive advice which does appear contradictory at times but I take it into consideration. All those consultations will help me draft a budget which will reflect the views I have received, but in the end it will be the government's responsibility to announce its own measures and I will take into account recommendations from the Chamber of Commerce when I will be preparing my budget.

EFFECT OF FOREIGN BORROWINGS ON CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that in the last six months there has been borrowing at all levels in Canada to the amount of something like $4.4 billion of foreign funds—well in excess of the present current account deficit—would the minister tell us why, in spite of this massive borrowing, our dollar is continuing to tumble, hanging, as it is now, within a rather wobbly 84-cent range?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have explained the policy with regard to the dollar almost every week since I became minister. The Canadian dollar is a floating currency and the governor of the bank intervenes only to make sure that the market operates in an orderly fashion. The rate of the Canadian dollar is determined by the market.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, since at a seminar in New York yesterday attended by many international bankers of the world it was widely reported that the Bank of Canada had lost still further reserves in the current month, defending the floating dollar in the way the Minister of Finance claims it is not doing, would the minister tell us, in addition to the $750 million, October 15 issue which now has a red herring out on it, what additional foreign borrowing he contemplates will be needed in the next six months?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when we decide to borrow abroad, or outside Canada, we make the announcement the day we take that decision. No such decision is being taken by the government at this time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, a further question to the Minister of Finance, who appears to want to continue the charade about a floating dollar. Would he indicate what, in his opinion, is a fair value for the Canadian dollar in relation to the U.S. dollar, bearing in mind that if he and the government are not willing to show what in their opinion is a fair value, one cannot expect world confidence to be restored in the dollar at any level?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member likes to make all sorts of statements. It is not for me to determine the value of the Canadian dollar: it is a floating currency and its value is determined by the market.

DEDUCTIBILITY OF MORTGAGE INTEREST PAYMENTS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The government has appointed 23 sectoral task forces to report on different phases of the Canadian economy, and now a two-tier committee representing business, labour and the academic world has reported. One of the recommendations is this, and they are proud that they are able to agree: they note that the deductibility of mortgage interest payments should be reviewed by the government and given careful consideration.

In the light of this recommendation, is the minister dropping his fanatic opposition to mortgage interest deductibility, and has he given thought to including such a provision in his budget and considering it as a possibility?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have explained that if at this time we were to introduce a program which would cost the treasury $3 billion in loss of revenue, at the time we are running a large deficit which the opposition does not like, I would almost certainly be criticized. This, in our view, would not be a fair program. There are better ways. Of course, when I prepare my budget I have to consider all the alternatives there are.

One of my big problems is this: I cannot understand the opposition. One day they complain about the size of the deficit, and another day they propose to cut $5 billion from taxes. It is pure irresponsibility.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I realize that the understanding shown by the Minister of Finance, of anything, is very limited. Has he read the review of the Economic Council of Canada and all the other reviews which indicate that stimulation is now needed?

My supplementary is this: in the report of the same task force we find the statement that continental free trade should not be pursued as a general policy, but only as a selective sectoral strategy where appropriate. The government had another report from the other place studying Canada-U.S. relations this summer, recommending that serious consideration be given to U.S.-Canadian free trade. Which of these recommendations, if either, is presently under study by the government? Does the government mean to adopt either one of them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have talked very often about this problem. Of course, everyone is making all sorts of recommendations—the hon. member illustrates this very clearly in his question—and we shall take the best course. In some instances we have negotiated free trade arrangements with the Americans which have been very good for Canada—for example, the auto pact—and if there are other agreements of that sort which could be devised, that is all right; but we are not planning to develop an economy fully integrated with that of the United States.

INDEMNIFICATION OF COURT COSTS OF MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General in an effort to elicit more detail with respect to the policy of protection and indemnification of members of the RCMP, referred to in the House yesterday. Has the minister been able to discover the extent of the practice? How widely was it implemented?

Specifically, did Chief Superintendent Donald Cobb enjoy the protection and indemnity provisions under the same theory, I presume, as that by which the former minister gets support in his litigation problems?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman will recall that yesterday, when this matter was brought up, I indicated that it was related to a document which had been circulated and made public by the commission. The hon. gentleman will also recall that it refers to a policy within the force itself, which policy is being reviewed by the McDonald inquiry. He will also recall that initially, when the inquiry began its deliberations and I assumed my responsibilities, I indicated it would not be my policy to deal with matters before the commission on a day to day basis.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the minister will not give such a straightforward question at least a semblance of an answer. I want to put a question to him on a related matter. Has he been briefed on the circumstances in which a prominent Canadian journalist, reportedly Peter C. Newman, at the request of an ex-member of the RCMP conveyed information to the then solicitor general relating to testimony given before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs in May of 1973? The minister was at that time a member of that committee.

Does he know what, if anything, resulted from the communication of information to the present Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, and what if anything, was done about it? Has he seen correspondence directed to the then solicitor general by this ex-member? Has he had the benefit of that information?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I recall being a member of the committee at the time but, of course, I was not exercising my present functions. I hope the hon. member will recognize that he has brought forward some specific facts with regard to which I cannot be expected to have knowledge at the tips of my fingers, as it were.

I am somewhat disappointed that in their two questions, hon. gentlemen opposite did not call attention to the amnesty recall program to which I have given some publicity and which will be receiving additional publicity in the immediate future.

SPORTS

FEDERAL ASSISTANCE TO PAN-AMERICAN GAMES

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In view of the announced intention of the B.C. minister of recreation and the mayor of Vancouver to submit an application on behalf of Vancouver to host the 1987 Pan-American Games, can the minister advise the House whether the federal government intends to assist in this worthwhile endeavour?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the B.C. minister and mayor of Vancouver seem to be engaging in a new and unusual form of consultation, since I have heard nothing of this from them.

● (1442)

I suppose this consultation may be forthcoming since I read a news report stating the revenue which could be forthcoming from the federal government would be that of Loto Canada. They seem to have a respect for Loto Canada, but not for the normal courtesies of consultation. If and when I receive notification, I will be pleased to answer it.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

FUNDING OF CULTURAL ORGANIZATIONS

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. I was delighted to hear the Secretary of State make his commitment on the arts today. I hope he has persuaded some of his cabinet colleagues, particularly the President of the Treasury Board.

Since I wrote to the Secretary of State on August 31 with respect to a proposal which, in line with the government's restraint program, would reduce its spending but increase its funding directly to the Canada Council by $2 million—a body which has had its budget frozen for nearly four years—and since the minister's only public response was to cut the budget of the Canada Council, that of the CBC, the National Film Board, the Film Development Corporation and other artistic and cultural institutions—which may have disastrous repercussions, as the minister well knows, for artistic communities in the country, the closing of art galleries and theatres, etc.—in view of this virtual freeze in constant dollars to the Canada Council and the crisis that is being created in the arts, what concrete action is the minister planning to take?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's question—

An hon. Member: I am not.

Mr. Roberts: —because usually he is more conscious of the facts than he seems to be today. The Canada Council's budget was not reduced; its base budget was increased by $3 million, or almost 8 per cent or 9 per cent. The budget of the CFDC was not cut, Mr. Speaker; it was increased.

It is true—now I regret it—that I did not reply to the hon. member's letter because I did not take it very seriously. He was suggesting that the budget for the Canadian Unity information office be wiped out—I am sorry Mr. Speaker; he suggested it be cut down by $9 million of $10 million—and this seemed to me to be an irresponsible suggestion, given the referendum which is to take place in Quebec in the coming year. He suggested that we should cut out the funds of the French and English national theatre companies at the National Arts Centre, which seemed to me to be an extraordinarily irresponsible suggestion.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Roberts: So I came to the conclusion that the letter was sent to me for no other purpose than to garner some newspaper publicity in what I consider to be an irresponsible way.

An hon. Member: Oh, David!

Mr. Roberts: The last point on which the hon. member is again incorrect is in his indication that this government is insensitive to the arts. The fact of the matter is, as I said, that the basic budgets of the arts organizations have been marginally increased. It is true that the budget for the CBC was frozen, but budgets over-all were increased rather than cut. In view of newspaper speculation that there were going to be cuts of something in the order of $60 million to $90 million, I would have thought he would have recognized the strong determination of this government, shared by my colleagues, including the President of the Treasury Board, to make sure that this area of activity continues to receive strong government support.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, there is a great line from Shakespeare which is appropriate to the occasion. It is, "methinks thou dost protest too much".

I wonder if the minister could refer to two specific matters that happen to be of great concern to the artistic community: that of the Disney report, which has been in circulation for some months now and has been on his desk since early this spring, having to do with the taxation situation of the arts in this country, and also the Keyes-Brunet report on copyright, which affects the publishing and recording industries in this country and on which there have been numerous submissions.

What action has he taken with his cabinet colleagues to accelerate real performance on matters of basic concern in the tax and copyright areas to the artistic and performing people in this country, which they desperately need?

Mr. Roberts: Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to see the interest which the hon. member is taking. Of course we are concerned. With regard to the recommendations in the Disney report, that is exactly why we financed it. It is we who promoted the funding of the Disney report because we wanted to have that assessment which was taken of the employment situation which artists in the country face. We have received the report and I have distributed it to my colleagues who are concerned, and active discussions have taken place and are under way now with my colleagues about it. I have also discussed that report with, for instance, representatives of Equity, and people on my staff have discussed it with other arts organizations. We attach great importance to the Disney report and we are actively pursuing discussions within the government.

In terms of copyright and other procedures, the hon. member will remember—if, for instance, he goes back earlier this year—the action which the government has taken to deal with the problem which authors have expressed to us over the dumping within Canada of books which are remaindered in the United States. We are concerned with the copyright situation and we have responded to the specific suggestions which have been made to us.

INQUIRY WHETHER STUDIES CONDUCTED ON EFFECT OF CUTBACKS IN FUNDING

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the minister's self-serving remarks earlier today prevented my motion declaring today as Arts Day from being passed.

I want to put a question to him in terms of real budget cuts that the artistic community knows have taken place. In view of the fact that as of 1971, 85 per cent of all Canadian visual artists earned less than $5,000 a year, and since the establishment of the Canadian art bank accounted for $1,300 of the annual income for over 600 artists from whom works were purchased last year and, further, considering that $800,000 will be indiscriminately slashed from the art bank program along with another $800,000 cut in the Public Works Department's fine arts program for a total of over $1 million can the minister tell the House if his department has conducted studies into the effects of these cuts on the income of Canadian artists?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member referred to my remarks being self-serving. They are not self-serving. What they serve to do is to express the interest which this government has in supporting the arts throughout this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roberts: I have been Secretary of State for two years and not once in that time have members of the opposition used an opposition day, or any other occasion, to raise the question of the arts policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Roberts: Finally, Mr. Speaker, now that there are people in the gallery, they show interest in this issue but today is the first time in two years that they have put such questions to me.

[English]

Good news travels slow, Mr. Speaker, but I am glad to see that, finally, members of the opposition realize this is a subject of importance and significance. The hon. member referred to the question of the arts bank—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie on a supplementary question.

Mr. Symes: That kind of empty rhetoric is so self-evident to the artistic community, as well as the lack of dollars from this government, that I think the minister is digging a deeper and deeper hole in which he will find himself together with the artistic community in this country. With regard to the non-answer which the minister gave me to the very precise question in real dollar reductions, I would like to put another example to counter his phony argument that there are no reductions.

In the light of the minister's statement which shows a reduction of over $1.1 million in assistance to literature and publication, a reduction which amounts to 16 per cent of the current budget, not accounting for inflation and increased costs, and given the fact that only 15 per cent of all books sold in Canada were authored by Canadians, has the minister's department conducted studies on the effects of these cuts and what effect they will have on Canadian publishers and authors, who are contributing much more than the minister to the preservation of Canadian culture?

Mr. Roberts: First of all, Mr. Speaker, in answer to the question on the art bank cuts, I want to assure the hon. gentleman that those cuts were made after our discussions with members of the Canada Council about them. They were undertaken in view of the extremely high administrative costs which were involved in the program and the belief, not simply on the part of the government but expressed to me by the director of Canada Council, that it would be useful to be able to reassess the administrative efficiency of that program.

In so far as the member's general question is concerned, it is true that I have had discussions with the various cultural agencies. Those discussions are continuing so that I might have the benefit of their advice as to what the effect will be of the restraint on expenditure within the arts community. I may say that I have found within the arts community general support for the government's restraint program—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: —because people in the arts community realize that the arts suffer more from the impact of inflation than almost any other sector of the economy, and they are most anxious to see that inflation brought under control. Naturally, there is concern about the impact of cuts upon them and I share that concern; but they are generally supportive of the need to bring government expenditure further under control.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NAMIBIA—UN SUPERVISED ELECTION ON INDEPENDENCE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs; given the fact that both sides of the House want a legal and peaceful settlement on the question of Namibia's independence, what assurances did the five western ministers receive in Pretoria last week that the election of a constituent assembly in Namibia in December—which we know will be declared null and void—will in fact be followed by a UN supervised election which will then be recognized by the world community?

• (1452)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I invite the hon. member to look at the joint communiqué, the first three paragraphs of which were agreed to by the Western Five and the government of South Africa. In that communiqué, it was indicated quite clearly that the South African government agrees to pursue a United Nations' solution to the Namibian problem. I think that is, at least on the surface, the assurance the hon. member has been asking about.

I would be less than candid if I did not say to him that, of course, we continue to have some reservations about the bona fides of South Africa regarding this. This is why we hope Mr. Ahtisaari, from the United Nations, will go to Namibia shortly. Then, within a matter of two or three weeks, it will be clear as to whether or not South Africa is genuine in its wish to have a United Nations' supervised peace settlement in Namibia.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, because this issue is very complex and has serious consequences for the international community—as have other recent major developments in the world news, such as the Middle East peace talks and the genocide in Cambodia—can the minister now assure the House that we will have a two-day debate on external affairs, such as we had last year, which gave members a full opportunity for airing Canada's foreign policy?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, yes, personally I would welcome this. Of course, it is not for me to decide on the business of the House. However, if the House leaders find that there is an appropriate time between now and the Christmas break—when I think it occurred last year—I will be glad to do it. May I also refer—and I do not think the hon. member will object to my saying it publicly—to the fact that I offered him an in-camera briefing, if he and other members of the House would wish, on the outcome of our discussions in South Africa. Barring an in-camera briefing, then I would be glad to meet with members of the committee in public and go as far as is considered appropriate in terms of the current developments at the United Nations.

FINANCE

PROPOSED POLICY ON TRANSFER AND EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES

Hon. Robert L. Stanfield (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to either the President of the Treasury Board or the Minister of Finance: it relates to the reallocation package of which they gave some information in a joint statement dated September 8. I am referring to the reallocation package, not to the items which make up the $2.5 billion cut.

The main thrust of the reallocation package was a reallocation of income in the country. Some $220 million was to come from transfer payments including equalization payments. Given that it is rather strange that one should go after equalization payments, which go to the poorer provinces, as well as reallocating income in the country, can either minister tell me how much the government proposes to ask the provinces to reduce the equalization payments?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, at that time we listed the transfer programs from which we wanted to have some money. In the case of transfer payments to the provinces in terms of equalization, of course, from time to time we have to review the formula because there is variation in the actual situation from year to year.

It is possible that we will review it at this time to make sure some of the developed problems are not disturbing the process of equalization payments. But there is no question of cutting down equalization payments; it is just making the necessary adjustments from time to time.

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, is the minister prepared to give me the assurance this afternoon that it was not the intention of the government, when it indicated that it was going to save part of the $220 million from equalization payments, to ask the provinces at this time to modify in any respect the equalization formula?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we regularly review our programs with the provinces, and we intend to discuss this problem with them at the finance ministers' meeting which will be held next Thursday, because some aspects of the formula have created problems. But I wish to reiterate that next year's equalization payments to the provinces will be increased over this year's. As for the exact amount of the increase, that is what we will discuss with the provinces.

[English]

Mr. Stanfield: Mr. Speaker, will the minister be a little forthcoming and indicate to the House in what manner the government intends to propose a change in the equalization formula? Never mind all the hocus-pocus and the vagueness: this is a program which has been established in this country for some 30 years and has been changed by agreement from time to time. What changes does the Minister of Finance intend to propose at this time?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to discuss that problem at this time. I have already consulted a few finance ministers on that issue. I will be meeting others early next week. We are now studying the problem. I trust that we will arrive at a simple solution when we meet with the finance ministers next week because, as I said, we do not intend to reduce the equalization payments. They must simply be adjusted, there will in effect be an increase in the amounts paid next year over this year's payments.

HOUSING

CMHC CAPITAL FUNDING TO ONTARIO

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs: in particular, it refers to senior citizens' housing in the Toronto area. Can the minister tell the House if he has reviewed CMHC capital funding to Ontario in order to assist the Metro Toronto Housing Corporation?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the allocation budget for the province of Ontario, under section 43, for public housing has been increased to $73.3 million. These additional funds should enable the province to assist the Metro Toronto Housing Corporation to realize its 1978 production goal, and it will be of particular assistance to senior citizens projects.

OVERPAYMENTS UNDER PROGRAM

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and gets back to the original questions asked in this hour. Regarding the $142 million overpayment, his director of unemployment insurance is quoted as having said the following, "It is not a major increase in the sense that the whole program is going crazy". This is just another example of overpayments. These have been audited before by the Auditor General. The minister has given us indications that the fraud squad will come back and that there are monitoring systems. Once all of this has been discussed, could the minister tell the House how he expects to get back the $142 million overpayment which has come out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, as we have indicated, our success ratio in collecting overpayments has been excellent. The area of detected overpayments has been approximately $65 million, in round figures, and we have collected all but approximately $5 million or $6 million of that to date. So the collection mechanism is fine, but that will not solve the undetected payments. The areas which I indicated, the four or five different avenues for a better control mechanism, are the sorts of things which the Auditor General sees as a good move in the right direction. He just wants to see it done more quickly and more efficiently.

REFERENCE OF UIC ANNUAL REPORT TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council. In view of the fact that we are just not receiving answers to the problem of overpayments and the entire operation of the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and that the parliamentary standing committees have not been struck, would he give us the assurance that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts will be struck forthwith and that the annual report of the Unemployment Insurance Commission will be referred to that committee immediately?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the first part of the question, I have asked already that the organizational meetings take place as soon as possible. I think that is under way now and the committees will be set up to meet.

● (1502)

With respect to the reference of the annual report, that is a matter I would have to discuss with the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

PRIVILEGE

MR. NIELSEN—OMISSION IN OFFICIAL REPORT

Mr. Speaker: Yesterday the hon. member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raised a point of order, or possibly a matter of privilege, regarding the omission from Hansard the previous day of certain remarks which he recalled had been made by the hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). The Minister of Transport, in his contribution to the discussion, indeed confirmed that he had made the remarks which had been heard and recalled by the hon. member for Yukon. Those omissions constitute the word "hypothetical"—where the minister had said, "hypothetical" and "theoretical", the word which ultimately appeared was "theoretical" and, subsequently, in the minister's remarks the phrase, "The decision will then be taken by the commission."

On both of these counts I can confirm that the minister did make those remarks, that the omissions did occur, and that the omissions or alterations were not in any way attributable to any intervention by the minister or anyone on the minister's behalf, but in fact were attributable to the editorial staff of Hansard. On one occasion there was an editorial change in leaving out the word "hypothetical." On the second occasion it was simply an error in transcription by the reporter who, in moving from one page to another page of his own notes, left out a phrase that was at the bottom of the page. It was simply a human error.

On both counts it has brought home again—as I think it always must, because in every case it is always well, I think, for a member to raise such errors or omissions when he sees them and bring them to the attention of the Chair, either in the House or privately—the reminder that we should always be vigilant that these errors may occur. After all, human error can take place, and editorial judgment has to be used from time to time. All of us should share the vigilance of the hon. member for Yukon in bringing such points to the attention of the Chair in order to make sure that we always have the highest quality of recording.

When we do have a human error, of course we try to point that out and make sure that we are conscious of it, but in this case there was certainly no aberration in the practices; I believe there was simply a mistake made. There was a judgment made in respect to the omission of the word "hypothetical" and that does concern me to a certain extent.

I also, with all hon. members, reflect on the relationship between the electronic facilities we have here and the human reporting facilities which we have had for so long. I think that it is essential we recognize on some occasions the superiority of the one over the other and make sure that in the future we have a useful combination of the two, and not a conflict, as may occur from time to time. Again, I reiterate that the way to ensure this is for all members to be vigilant whenever they spot any kind of error in Hansard and bring it to the attention of the Chair so that we can exercise the kind of quality control that all hon. members demand.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. HNATYSHYN—OPERATION OF STANDING ORDER 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise on a point of order with respect to the matter of the motion under Standing Order 43 moved by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), where the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) took opportunity to debate the motion prior to the allotted question period time and which, as I understood it—I did not hear over the general murmur that goes on in this chamber, therefore, I may not have heard you clearly, sir—gave me the impression that we may be inadvertently moving into an area of precedent which might be contrary to what I suspect is the spirit and the intentions of the standing orders and the rules of this House.

I wonder if I could beg your indulgence, Mr. Speaker, to speak at some little time to put forward my contention with respect to my understanding of the procedure and the rules relating to Standing Order 43, for I believe, sir, that you did indicate at the time when the debate was interrupted that the matter would be considered under government orders, which, in the vernacular, means that the matter will come back again at the pleasure of the government itself, as opposed to the pleasure of this House.

I would just like to make my points procedurally on the basis of precedent, and if I may be permitted to do so at this time it would then be appropriate for you to take the matter under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: Certainly, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) will be permitted to proceed with the point. I would like to set the record straight and then the matter can be discussed.

By virtue of relatively recent changes in our procedures, we have transferred the consideration or the calling of motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 to the beginning of the day, prior to the question period.

This problem has arisen once or twice in the past. On those rare occasions when the House does give its consent that the motion be presented, the question is put. The question is not, as all hon. members will know, when an application is made pursuant to Standing Order 43, for the passage of the motion, but simply for the putting of the question, for there is no authority to put a motion at that hour of the day, or, for that matter, at any time by a private member, outside of the private members' hour. Therefore authority is sought, pursuant to Standing Order 43, to put the question, and the question being asked is not the consent of the House to pass the motion, but the consent of the House to put the motion.

Occasionally the House gives it consent, as it did today. Therefore, when the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) put the question earlier, he was seeking the consent of the House that his motion be put, and since the House gave its consent, the motion was put. The motion then becomes debatable, and it is the duty of the Chair therefore to call the motion for debate: "Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?" Any members then rising obviously must be recognized by the Chair for participation in the debate. Today, the only member who was rising at the time of the calling of the question was the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). At 2.15 a confrontation, or collision, occurs between that rule pursuant to Standing Order 43, and that practice in another standing order which prescribes that the question period shall begin at 2.15 and continue until three o'clock.

I want to refer hon. members to Standing Order 45(2) which reads:

> When a debate on any motion made prior to the reading of the orders of the day is adjourned or interrupted, the order for resumption of the same shall be transferred to and considered under government orders.

It seems to me that we had two choices at 2.15. One of them was, by virtue of having put a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43, to set aside the question period at 2.15 because the debate was under way. Obviously the danger with that is that if we set aside the question period and the debate carries on—for example, until three o'clock or later—we would need the consent of the House to restore the question period. So, the risk is that if we continue with the debate at 2.15 we wipe out the question period, to which, I am sure, all hon. members would be opposed.

If we do not wipe out the question period and do as I did today, stop the debate at 2:15 a.m. it seems to me we are caught with Standing Order 45(2) which says that, having done that, the only way we can return to the debate is take it as a government order. That is the background against which I made the decision I made earlier today. I now invite the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) to continue.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I want to beg your indulgence and make my submission for your consideration. The preliminary thought occurs to me that there are parallels in other circumstances which have brought this to our attention during the last three days, particularly where there had been preliminary proceedings, the introduction of new members, for example, where there had been, by your leave, a forestalling of the question period, notwithstanding the strict wording of the rules that questions proceed during the hours you mentioned. I want to deal with the substance of the matter first of all.

It seems to me that two points have to be examined in deciding how to deal with motions under Standing Order 43. First, is a motion under that rule different in some previously unnoticed way from any other motion called under motions during routine proceedings, and second, how is Standing Order 45(2), to which Your Honour referred, intended to operate? I am concerned not only about motions under Standing Order 43, but about other motions dealt with under the item motions itself. For example, the result of a ruling that the interpretation of Standing Order 45(2) is to change after 12 years from the original intention to an exact literal meaning, would be to curtail sharply proceedings on concurrence motions. If this is to be done it should be through a change in the rules.

On the first point, Mr. Speaker, the move of Standing Order 43 to a slot before the question period was nothing more than a move to limit their number for the convenience of the government. No new category was created in a formal procedural sense; we have motions under Standing Order 43 which are taken before 2.15 p.m., and the other motions, with Standing Order 43s excluded, taken afterwards. An examination of the proceedings of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization will show that there was no intention to create a new category under routine proceedings with a different status and a different relation to the rules governing motions. There was simply a subdivision.

When the period of notice expires on a motion put down for routine proceedings, it is immediately debatable. Similarly, if the notice provision is waived on a motion brought forward under motions, whether this happens during motions as before the rule change, or under a separate subdivision as at present, then the motion is a debatable motion. This has been confirmed by our practice. Once the motion is properly before the House for debate there is no difference in the way the standing orders respecting motions apply.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Then the question is: how was Standing Order 45(2) intended to be applied to such a motion?

As some members of the House may remember, a motion called under motions prior to 1965 had absolute precedence until disposed of. It precluded the question period and any other proceedings each day, since motions came before oral questions. Since the motion was not a government order, Standing Order 18(2) giving the government the right to call its own orders as it saw fit, did not apply. Thus the business of the House could be blocked for days until such a motion was finally disposed of.

To correct this situation Standing Order 45(2) was introduced. In bringing it in the then government House leader, the Hon. George McIlraith, said as reported at page 2132 of Hansard, volume II:

> Paragraph No. 7 deals with a matter which was not provided for in the rules formerly. There was a provision that caused some concern to those responsible for administering the rules having to do with a motion moved by a private member. It arose, in my experience, where a private member was moving concurrence in a committee report. The change is such that a motion, which seemed to have a doubtful or unclear position on the order paper, is now placed under government orders after it has been debated for one day. There will be a safeguard offered in an amendment we will be bringing forward to give that order precedence. The rules now provide that any item of business under government orders can be called in any sequence the government wishes. There will be a safeguard put in to protect the priority of debate of such a motion when it is transferred to government orders.

The amendment referred to was made, and simply meant that although the motion was transferred to government orders, it still had to be called first on government orders until disposed of. This was not satisfactory either, and so in 1969 the amendment that had been made to Standing Order 18(2) exempting Standing Order 45 was dropped.

The third report of the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization of the House (Journals 1969, pages 429 to 438), in dropping the amendment to 18(2) which gave the motions a priority, said:

> XII Transferred Motions
> 33. On June 11, 1965 a provisional section (2) was added to Standing Order 43 (as S.O. 43 then was), providing for the transfer to government orders of an order for the resumption of a debate which had originated on a motion under routine proceedings. Its purpose was to prevent such an order from obstructing indefinitely the normal business of the House. This purpose was only partially achieved, however, because under the provisional rule the government is obliged to call such an item of business before any other government order.
> 34. Your committee believes that this restriction on the government's discretion should be removed and that it should not necessarily be obliged to call such an order before any other. One day of debate would already have been devoted to the kind of motion contemplated prior to its transference to government orders—

The committee therefore recommended the necessary change, and, in addition, made Standing Order 45(2) refer not to Standing Order 15(2)—description of routine proceedings—but to all motions "prior to the reading of the orders of the day". This had, I believe, the effect of bringing any debate on a motion concerning a prima facie case of privilege under the rule as well.

It is clear from the statements made on these two occasions, and from subsequent practice, that the debate begun on a motion moved before government orders was to proceed until the daily hour of adjournment was reached, or until a superceding motion interrupted the debate. In all the motions which have been debated after proceedings were begun before orders of the day, we have never interpreted private members' hour on the dinner adjournment, fixed at a set time as is the question period, to mean an interruption in the procedural sense. They are a temporary suspension of proceedings properly before the House.

How can there now be a contention that this rule does not have the meaning it was intended to have by its authors, and the meaning it has had for twelve years? Are concurrence debates now to stop at five o'clock or the dinner hour? Will that be the limit on any debate which may arise on a question of privilege? Are government adjournment motions to be a routine proceeding before dinner and a government order after? Will the government be able to arrange for Black Rod to come tapping at the door at four o'clock, thus interrupting debate on a motion properly before the House? Are we to decide that an interruption at 2.15 p.m. is somehow more permanent than an interruption at five o'clock? Any change in the interpretation of Standing Order 45(2) would have profound effects on our procedure, all to the disadvantage of the opposition parties, pro tem.

I know, Mr. Speaker, that the counter argument is what appears to be the plain language of the rule to which you alluded in your opening discourse. I have shown that the rule was never intended to be interpreted in the way now suggested. I must point out that not all standing orders can be applied without reference to practice. If we are to take rules literally, then we are in for interesting times. The next time the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) leaves to deliver an address such as the one on February 22, he will need the permission of the House under the terms of Standing Order 5; according to Standing Order 11, I am sorry to say we will never again see an increase in members' salaries or benefits, because we would all be forbidden to vote on the matter. I particularly look forward to the enforcement of Standing Order 28, when all members wishing to address the House must rise "uncovered". I assume the Chair will not be sympathetic to arguments that this was meant to refer to hats, because the rule does not mention hats.

Mr. Speaker, a motion which is properly before the House before orders of the day has always been debatable until the House adjourns or a superceding motion is moved. If the House wishes otherwise then it must carry further the revisions made in 1965 and 1969. We cannot ignore precedent and practice simply because a potentially awkward situation is created for the House.

That constitutes my formal submission to you with respect to the operation of the standing order. I think it is possible there may be other people who wish to participate in the course of the debate, and I hope it will be possible for you to take this matter under serious consideration and entertain representations from other members of the House in order that we may have a most important point clarified in the interests of having an understanding of the rules and be able to expedite the business of the House, because that is what we all seek to obtain.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar will recognize at once that I have had this matter under consideration for quite some time. He asked me to take it under serious consideration. There have been three previous occasions on which I have been faced with the same difficulty. However, the hon. member in his contribution does not address the central point. The central point is whether he or other hon. members would prefer that we go past the hour designated for the commencement of question period. That is the difficulty. It is not difficult to carry on the debate. But once we go by the hour of 2.15 the question then becomes: do we have any authority to take question period later on? Yesterday and the day before when there were a number of members to be introduced, I indicated to the House that obviously we consider it a matter of priority to introduce new members to the House. I presume that members are agreed that we should guard the time for the question period in order to do that, and in the circumstances of course the House agreed.

Supposing we were in a situation in which the House did not agree? Does the Chair have the authority to return at four o'clock or five o'clock, or eight o'clock in the day, to a question period? It seems to me that the House does not have that authority unless the House gives the Chair the authority to do that. It appears to me this means a second question requiring the consent of the House. The first question would be whether the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) today had the consent of the House to present a motion for discussion. That motion having been presented, when 2.15 arrived and the matter was under discussion, the House would either have to give its consent that the debate could go on for some time, with the question period to be taken later in the day at the conclusion of the debate, or that once we had gone past 2.15 the question period could not be called for that day. That is the real collision between the two rules, and that is the one to which I want all hon. members to address themselves.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will receive considerable representation.

As I understand it, at 2.15 the debate can be interrupted. But it seems to me then, and this is my own idea of the interpretation of the rule, that if that is the strict understanding of the rule, you would revert back and have a continuation of debate following that interruption, the same way as I referred in the course of my presentation to the interruption during dinner hour or private members' hour. In other words, it is an interruption in the same way in which those two items are interruptions in the proceedings. But they do not forestall the return or continuation of the debate properly initiated prior to 2.15 when you have received the unanimous consent to continue with, or to present to the House, the motion brought by any private member. In my opinion it is the logical explanation of the rule and the spirit of the rules by which I would submit Your Honour should be bound.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should be very happy to participate at length in a debate on the theoretical aspects of this procedural problem, and I shall say a word in that vein, but I should like my intervention to be regarded mainly as a suggestion with respect to what we might do today. However, I shall come to that in a moment.

First may I say that I think Your Honour is quite correct that, as the rules are set up, there is a collision that arises when the putting of a motion has been allowed, and 2.15 arrives. I think that those of us who were on the standing committee that drafted these rules, or agreed to them, have to take some responsibility for the fact that there was a point which we did not cover. I think that an effort should be made, perhaps through that committee, to cover that point.

It seems to me that common sense, which is not a standing order in our rules, of course, would tell us that if the House agrees under Standing Order 43 that a motion may be made, that implies more than just putting the motion. I know that the standing order does not say that, and I know that the standing orders require that we move to the question period at 2.15. But surely on those rare occasions when the House gives its consent to the making of a motion under Standing Order 43, the House expects to decide on that motion.

There is not much point to a motion being put, a few words being said to it, and then for it to languish on the order paper for the rest of the session. I think we should find some way to resolve that problem.

One of the reasons we got into this collision was because we had made changes back in the old days. Motions under Standing Order 43 used to come after the question period and, if they were allowed, the debate could go on and on. Then this also got mixed up with the problem as to what happened to motions for concurrence in reports of committees. It was that kind of a motion respecting the flag debate that got us into a position where, day after day, we had to carry on that debate because it was on the motion for the adoption of the report from a committee. It was in an attempt to resolve that impasse that 45(2) was put in the book in its present form. I do not think that those who were drafting 45(2) at that time to cover that problem realized what it would do to a motion under Standing Order 43.

As I say, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to participate in the theoretical aspects of this. It seems to me that such a discussion should start from the basic common sense proposition that if the House is willing unanimously for a motion to be put, especially a motion that has the very day's date in it, the House wants to resolve that matter that very day.

As I say, I should like to see this matter discussed. I think Your Honour has the proper answers. When the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) asked you to review the matter, you have reviewed it at great length and on many occasions. That does not give you the right to change the rule. But maybe the kind of review that is necessary is a review by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization of the House.

Having said that, may I get to what I think is more urgent today. The House received, with applause and approval, the suggestion made by my friend, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes), that certain things be said about the arts in Canada and that this day, Thursday, October 26, be designated as Arts Day across Canada. If there is any day to pass that motion, surely it is today. There is not much point to our passing a motion sometime in November or next March making October 26, 1978, Arts Day.

We got into a situation that is perfectly understandable. My friend made the motion. We thought it would be carried at that point, but the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) chose to stand and speak, and he kept talking until 2.15.

My suggestion is that the House now agree unanimously to call that motion so that the debate can be concluded just as soon as we get through routine proceedings. My suggestion is that it be a debate with one speaker per party, and a limit of ten minutes for each such speaker. If it is agreed, I hope the House will allow the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie to be the speaker for our party even though technically, having made the motion and sat down, he has exhausted his right to speak. I hope this might be considered seriously. I think we would be carrying out the thinking of the House on motions under Standing Order 43 generally, and carrying out what we in this House felt when the motion was put and received so enthusiastically today.

That is a suggestion I put forward, hoping it will be considered right now. The theoretical idea is that it can be dealt with at some other time. However, I hope that just as soon as we finish routine proceedings, before we go to whatever is to be the business of the day, the House will agree that there be a debate with one speaker per party. I will not even object if the government contends it has not had a speaker, although the Secretary of State had six or seven minutes. I suggest there be one speaker per party and that the motion be put at the end of that debate.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I believe the easiest way to solve this very simple problem of when a motion put under Standing Order 43 can be debated is this: I feel the surest way is to refer to the Standing Orders themselves.

Let me refer to four standing orders which are relevant in this case. At the beginning, Your Honour has very pertinently underscored three of them. Obviously, it starts with Standing Order 43, which is relevant and under which we can put a motion on an urgent matter. However, it should not be forgotten that Standing Order 43 is an exception to the general principle outlined in Standing Order 42, which stipulates that an advance notice of 48 hours must be given prior to the putting of a motion. But Standing Order 43 provides for the case where, if the matter is urgent and if hon. members unanimously consent, the member is dispensed from giving notice and can put his motion. That is all what is stipulated in Standing Order 43. This Standing Order does not authorize us in any way, as you pointed out so pertinently, to debate the question or put it to a vote. The consent is to dispense with notice and to put the motion. Then where do we go once the motion has been put? As I understand it, Mr. Speaker, Standing Order 15(2) was introduced provisionally in our rules on March 24, 1975 and became a permanent feature on December 12, 1975. That Standing Order 15(2) stipulates very clearly, and I quote:

(2) Not more than two minutes after the reading of prayers, the business of the House shall commence. Members, other than ministers of the Crown, may propose motions pursuant to Standing Order 43 at this time. Not later than—

And this standing order is very clear, I point out, Mr. Speaker—

—Not later than 2.15 p.m., or 11.15 a.m., as the case may be, oral questions shall be taken up. At 3.00 p.m., or 12.00 noon, as the case may be, the House shall proceed to the ordinary daily routine of business, which shall be as follows:

So, that second standing order which is relevant to this debate and which I draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, is very clear, that is there is no choice. The legislator, hon. members and parliament have asked under that standing order to proceed with the oral question period at 11.15 or 2.15, depending whether it is a Friday or another week day. I do not think that we have any other choice. This standing order is quite clear and compels us to interrupt our proceedings and proceed with the oral question period.

There is a third relevant standing order when it is 2:15, as happened today, but the standing orders leave us no alternative nor any choice but to interrupt our proceedings and proceed with the oral question period. What happens then to the motion under consideration as is the case today? Then we have to refer to Standing Order 45(2) provided for that purpose and which reads as follows:

When a debate on any motion made prior to the reading of the orders of the day is adjourned or interrupted—

—such is the case now—

—the order for resumption of the same shall be transferred to and considered under government orders.

Mr. Speaker, nothing could be clearer than that standing order which provides that when the debate on a motion is interrupted, as it has been today, the said motion is transfered under government orders. This is the point we are at now. What should we do once time comes for the government orders? Again, the answer is in the standing orders, Mr. Speaker. I refer you—and I suppose Your Honour has not mentioned this before because you thought that all members knew it—to Standing Order 18(2), and I quote:

(2) Government orders shall be called and considered in such sequence as the government determines.

Mr. Speaker, it is our responsibility to determine the sequence of the proceedings of this House and it will be ours, pursuant to the standing orders to decide when the debate will continue. The government decides which matter is more important than others. It is the government's responsibility and it must be accountable to the public. Hence, what the hon. member suggests to the Speaker is to withdraw the government's prerogative to decide the order of the proceedings of the House. If we were to accept his arguments and give priority to the debates on motions pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, once it has been agreed to do without the notice pursuant to Standing Order 42, the opposition would determine the order of the debates of the House through the expedient of a motion under Standing Order 43. This is absolutely contrary to tradition and absolutely contrary to the standing orders, particularly the provisions of Standing Order 18(2). We determine the order of business of the House and what is urgent or what is not. In the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, if we stick, as we should, to the rules of the House pertaining to the business of the House and if we refer more particularly to the four relevant standing orders which I mentioned and which are quite clear, then there is no problem at all. The answer to your question is that at 2:15 the discussion of motions under Standing Order 43 for which notice was waived with unanimous consent and debate started, is interrupted, the debate is stood as a government order, and the government decides when the matter will be debated.

There is another point, Mr. Speaker, that was raised by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). They referred to the date when Standing Order 45(2) came into effect or one or the other of the standing orders. There is also a principle that must be respected here, Mr. Speaker. It must be taken for granted that when members amend the Standing Orders they want the amendment, be it a new standing order or an amendment to a standing order, to read in agreement with the other provisions of the standing orders. That must be presumed, Mr. Speaker, even if Standing Order 15(2) which directs you to interrupt the debate at 2:15 is subsequent to the others that existed. A case can hardly be made for the previous practice when Standing Order 15(2) did not exist. That is another story then. My reasoning is that by accepting Standing Order 15(2) without amending the other standing orders, members wanted the procedure to apply, as I just mentioned, that Standing Orders 15(2), 18(2), 43 and 45(2) apply in correlation with one another. Otherwise Standing Orders 45(2) and 18(2) could have been amended and Standing Order 43 might have been amended, but they were not. Standing Order 15(2) was introduced, and that produces a situation like the one we have now. We have no choice, we are bound by the Standing Orders. We must assume that those who drafted the Standing Orders knew what they were doing. If practice shows that it is not too advantageous for one party or another, the standing orders can be amended later on. That is another matter. But, as things stand now, it cannot be said that because Standing Order 15(2) was introduced just recently the other standing orders become non applicable. There is in my view a basic principle that must be respected. When an act or a regulation is amended or a new one is introduced, each provision is construed in light of the others and they must all be consistent, otherwise they are amended. This has not been done in this case.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, to limit myself strictly to the point that was raised, much has been made this week about the introduction of new members. This delayed the oral question period, and per force Standing Order 15(2) was not adhered to. As you very appropriately emphasized, you assumed there was unanimous consent, there was no objection, and you quite rightly did so. One thing must be said however. Although new members do not come every day, each and every day motions are put under Standing Order 43. Things must be looked at in their right perspective, Mr. Speaker. As you can see, my point is therefore very logical. I believe we have no choice if we want an orderly House, we must simply abide by our standing orders. They are clear. Four are relevant to the case. If we are not happy with the result—and for quite some time I for one and other members on this side of the House have been suggesting our procedure should be amended—let us sit down and modernize parliament, let us make it more efficient by all means. In the meantime, let us apply the rules, let all parties be treated on the same footing as provided for in our rules.

Coming finally to the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who asked for consent that one speaker from each party deal with today's motion, my view is that it would be a dangerous precedent. Because you know it is not every day we receive sensible motions under Standing Order 43. Most of the time you know how the preambles are too long, they are partisan, and the rule is abused. However, this will be the subject of another debate you have reserved and in which I will welcome the opportunity to participate. On the precise suggestion itself, Mr. Speaker, the mere fact that consent has been granted—and I think the Leader of the Opposition understands me—to the waiver of notice under S. O. 43 for the hon. member putting his motion forward reflects a collective will to concur in the substance of the motion that today be called Arts Day. I believe that any additional debate and a division would be futile and a needless waste of the time of the House. It is an undeniable fact that all hon. members agree on the contents of this motion, but the government needs more time to discuss matters which have higher priority. That is all I wanted to say.

[English]

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my heart bleeds for this poor government which is so afflicted by the backbenchers of this House, particularly the opposition, that it is not able to carry out its functions. After listening to 20 years of amendments to rules of the House, particularly in the last 12 or 15 years, I know that every time rules are made there is an attempt by the government, which unfortunately too often is supported by the Chair, and I exclude Your Honour, so far, from that—

An hon. Member: Cheap!

Mr. Baldwin: —which has the effect of denying private members the rights they have had. These rights have been taken away from them slowly over the last number of years. There is no question about that. If it is not asking too much, I would hope the House would approach the question of these rules in a mood of common sense. I know this is difficult to ask from members of the government side, but I would hope this would be done. I think this requires an examination chronologically of these rules.

I had something to do with Standing Order 43. I do not know whether I was the father, godfather, or grandfather. I remember it was originally used at a time when the House was seeking a chance to debate a motion dealing with the problem in Biafra. We used a motion at that time. Unanimous consent was secured, and we went ahead and had an excellent debate. Use of the rule has grown since then. I would be the first to admit that there are occasions when we may need to look closely at the rule and its application, but that is a question for another debate.

I was involved in the debate on Standing Order 45(2) as a member of the procedure committee. I agree thoroughly with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It was thought, quite properly, that debate on certain motions, particularly motions with regard to concurring in a committee's report, should not go on and on ad nauseam and the sensible decision was made and accepted on both sides of the House that we would limit debate at that time to one day. A motion to concur in a report of a committee would be a motion which would come within, for example, the parameters of Standing Order 45(2). Both sides agreed the House should have a one-day debate on a motion of that kind, and that was it. I think the same thing was understood to apply to Standing Order 43. But it was much later than that when changes were made with regard to the establishment of fixed times.

I would suggest to Your Honour, as a member of the profession to which you and I have the honour to belong, that common sense should be applied and that the application of those fixed times must be taken to be ingrafted on our rules subject to the existing arrangments.

I think the wording of Standing Order 45(2) gives support for my view. It says:

When a debate on any motion made prior to the reading of the orders of the day is adjourned or interrupted—

I call your attention, Mr. Speaker, to those words "adjourned or interrupted". I think in the first place you could apply the rule of ejusdem generis—the "interrupted" must be taken to be within the context of the word "adjourned". I am supported in that contention. I was able to send for the dictionary. This is a dictionary from the Table; I am sure Your Honour makes reference to it from time to time, so it has that sanctification. According to the Concise Oxford Dictionary the definition of the word "adjourned" includes "break-off for later resumption", and the word "interrupt", "break in upon a process, speech, person speaking, etc." I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that those words must be taken as having virtually the same meaning. I think that makes sense.

When we brought in Standing Order 45(2) there was no intention of other than limiting the right of members of this House engaging in a debate to concur in a committee report, and under S.O. 43 no intention to have a debate lasting more than one day. The government always had the right—and it should have, and I agree that was proper—at the end of a day to adjourn debate, and the motion did not come back. They could make a formal motion to adjourn, if they had the courage to do that.

The government always has the right to make a formal motion to adjourn, and when that happens it is an adjournment within the meaning of Standing Order 45(2). That is up to the government. That is their privilege. But I submit to Your Honour, and I am very sincere in this, there is such a limit on the opportunities for private members in this House, particularly on the opposition side, that I think it would—the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) smiles. He has been one of the foremost movers in attempts to curtail the rights of members of this House. Ever since I have known him as House leader he has never lost an opportunity to cut down the rights of hon. members on this side. He has been very successful in it.

Mr. MacEachen: Not very.

An hon. Member: Machiavellian.

Mr. Baldwin: I will not go into that now; we are in trouble already. I suggest that this was the intent of members of the committee in making their recommendation, and the intent of the House in accepting it. Surely it was to put these two rules together and say: there shall be a limit of a day, but in using fixed times for the question period common sense would enter the picture and the words "adjourned or interrupted" would mean that when you broke into the debate at that time, then at three o'clock or whenever the question period was over, we would resume this particular debate.

I think that is the only way there can be a sensible and logical interpretation. I am sure the leader of the House for the government might come along and say. "Maybe we ought to look at this rule to see how it is applied and what we can do, with due right to preserve opportunity for the private members of this House to engage in debates and discussions sometimes." I know the government suffers very greatly from the deprivations of the rules in these very sad circumstances. But I suggest any other interpretation would do violence to the intent of the committee, to the intent of the House, and to the situation which arose today when a member of the government properly initiated a debate and, having done that, the debate will never be brought back.

The very fact that the wording of Standing Order 43 refers to urgent and pressing circumstances must surely impress itself upon Your Honour as indicating that the intent should be that Your Honour should be vigilant and ingenious—and I am sure Your Honour can be very ingenious—to find ways to enable this debate to continue. You can do so under the circumstances I mentioned, without violating the rules.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my remarks will be very brief. It seems to me that there has been a lot of razzmatazz and procedural jargon heard here this afternoon which could be cleared up by a sensible agreement among all concerned in the House. Surely we have many things to consider, and the suggestion made by the hon. member from Edmonton was a fair one. The principles can be laid down in our standing orders. We have all read them and we should know them, but I suggest to you, sir, that the primary principle in parliamentary procedures must be the principle of common sense, natural justice, fairness and equity.

Here is a motion which has been put to the House by unanimous consent. Even the mover of the motion was cut off from making a statement. A minister of the Crown rose and talked out the motion. I thought that could only be done on a private member's bill and on matters of that nature. Surely the motion was brought before the House by unanimous consent and, I understand, there was agreement that there would be no debate and the motion would be unanimously agreed to by the House. So I am most surprised that members of the House, and particularly ministers of the Crown, would back off from an agreement made with members of various parties.

I think the government owes it to us to sit down, discuss this matter, and iron it out. Let the mover of the motion at least be given an opportunity to say a few words—I am sure he must have a few words. It seems to me that natural justice demands that the mover of the motion be allowed to speak up and say a few words, in view of the fact that a minister of the Crown was given that opportunity. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we stop the razzmatazz and agree to have this motion heard, and get it over with once and for all.

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak briefly on this matter. I think the points were well put by members on this side, but there is an essential point which needs to be made. There are the rules, which are very important to the effective operation of this House, and there are also the practices. I think the practices are quite clear, Your Honour, that usually motions under Standing Order 43 are opportunities for private members to bring motions before the House, usually to raise issues which are rarely voted on and even more rarely debated.

In this particular instance a motion was presented later than normal because of the introduction of a new member. It was presented with the understanding—certainly on this side of the House and we understood that such was the understanding on the other side of the House—that it would be accepted, because it referred to a specific event today, and passed without debate. In fact, as I recall it, it was seconded by a member on the government side of the House, thus showing there was all party support for the motion which would be accepted without debate. I would like to be charitable and believe that the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) did not know of that agreement because, if he did know it, what happened was in violation of the agreement which was generally understood.

The other aspect which concerns me very much is that when motions are presented it must be a rule in the House that there should be equal opportunity given to members on both sides of the House to make a fair statement on the issue. The fact that by this particular interpretation of the rules there is to be no equitable sharing in the expression of opinion strikes me as being in defiance of both the spirit and practice of the rules, and I think that should be unacceptable to all members of the House.

The third thing that strikes me as being a very strange anomaly is that the particular motion refers to an event today, and it was the understanding that because of the importance of that motion it would be passed by the House as an expression of support for the 1812 committee and what they represent to the broad cross-section of the artistic and cultural community of this country. To have it stood over for some eventual debate, which might not even take place later, surely makes a farce of the whole motion. Such action would undermine the spirit of what I thought the Secretary of State was supporting. I find it strange that by his speaking he would want to prevent the House from adopting a motion which he said he was supporting, not only in his brief remarks but in answering the questions that followed. I am surprised that the parliamentary secretary says it would be ridiculous to give an opportunity for an expression. Without that expression surely the House is not in a position to adopt the motion, and that would be against the interests of us all.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the debate which has taken place on this point and I think it serves to underline further the unsatisfactory operation of Standing Order 43. You might recall that last week I raised a point of order when the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) proposed a motion under Standing Order 43 which I regarded to be replete with false allegations, because in the normal course of events it would not be possible for members on this side of the House to indicate the fallacy of the statements in his motion. It is for that reason that I raised the point of order on motions under Standing Order 43 and that, at your suggestion, sir, the debate was deferred.

I have been away, and today the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), who wishes to participate in that debate, is absent. At his suggestion we have deferred the debate on the broad operation of Standing Order 43.

I could not agree more with the statement that was made by the hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) who urged that in the operation of our Standing Orders there should be a sense of fairness and a sense of natural justice. It is to that point that I wish to address myself when later I make my argument on the broad operation of the Standing Order, and I was delighted to hear the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) refer to the necessity of our proceedings being fair and providing an opportunity to reply when allegations are made.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Yes, when motions are debated.

Mr. MacEachen: Often there is a long preamble to a motion before consent is asked. However, you can say yes or no to the motion, but you never have an opportunity to reply to the false allegations made in these increasingly lengthy motions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: Members of the opposition have laid the groundwork for my argument when they have urged equity, natural justice, and fairness in the operations of our proceedings. I assure you, sir, if there was unfairness today—

An hon. Member: Poor Allan.

Mr. MacEachen: —if there was unfairness today because one member of the House was unable to speak on the motion, then it is a sequel to a long succession of unfair episodes under Standing Order 43 when, within the preambles and motions, there are false allegations, personal insults, and political partisanship, with absolutely no opportunity for members of the government to reply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: If there are complaints on the other side, the complaints are legion on this side, and we shall return to them later when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton comes to the House.

I would add one point because I regard it as very important. I was not involved in the negotiations on Standing Order 43 today. No member of the opposition approached me with respect to how that motion should be dealt with in the House. I have no personal knowledge of it and therefore I cannot clarify the situation, but I do say that usually when members of the opposition ask for my consent, when the motion is satisfactory I always add the rider "provided there is no debate". I do not know whether or not that was arranged today, that is a matter beyond my knowledge, but I think it is a matter which should be clarified later when those who are involved in the negotiations are present in the House.

That is my introductory comment to the statement I would like to make later when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton is in the House.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) sat down before he intended to do so. He spoke about the principle of fairness and how important it is to respect that principle in the House of Commons. Certainly there is a belief, or a very clear understanding, on this side of the House that this motion introduced by a member of the New Democratic Party, and seconded by one of the members of the Deputy Prime Minister's own party, had associated with it the understanding that there would be no debate. That understanding, which I am given to believe was there, was broken by the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts) when he rose to speak.

In the interests of the fairness to which the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council has made such extensive reference, I am sure he intended to go on to say that it was the intention of the government to accept the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and to ensure that there would be an opportunity for one spokesman for each party in the House of Commons to speak for a limited time, ten minutes, so that there would be extended to the other parties the exact equal and fair treatment which was extended by circumstances to the Secretary of State.

In putting forward his case in the interests of fairness, I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister would not want to mar that case by establishing now an obviously unfair system where the Secretary of State, who may have been very well in breach of an agreement given to members of the House, is allowed to be the only person to speak. It was quite a reasonable request by the House leader of the New Democratic Party to ensure that other parties would be extended the principle, practice and fairness already exercised by the Secretary of State.

I am sure the Deputy Prime Minister wants to rise in his place and simply complete his remarks in order to make it clear that it will be the intention of his party, as it is the intention of my party, to agree to the position put forward by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has invited me to reply to two points. The first point is that I regret very much, as he does, if an understanding reached among the parties has been broken. I would regret that very much and apologize for it, but I do not know whether that is so. Those involved in the discussions will be able to return to the fray tomorrow and clear that matter up.

In reply to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in principle I would not find it very difficult to agree to, but I believe I ought not to agree to it, in order to underline the unsatisfactory operation of this standing order generally. If we are to clean up the inequity alleged today, let us clean it up for the past and for the future, and hon. members opposite can show their bona fides tomorrow when they rise under the provisions of that Standing Order.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Point of Order—Mr. Hnatyshyn

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There has been a rather full discussion of this point this afternoon. I remind all hon. members that two applications for consideration pursuant to Standing Order 43 are being reserved under a point of order. One was raised by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), in which I ruled on a preliminary basis that the subject seemed to be one of general concern and not a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Subsequent to that, a motion was raised by the hon. member for Vaudreuil (Mr. Herbert), when again I repeated the suggestion that the subject of the motion was really one of rather general concern and not a matter of urgent and pressing necessity as envisaged by the rule. Those two applications pursuant to Standing Order 43 remain under consideration as a point of order for an argument to be addressed at a later time on the use of the Standing Order.

One of the many difficulties we have faced in the application of this rule is whether or not the Chair ought to take a strong position in determining whether a matter really is one of urgent and pressing necessity. Previously when these motions were taken up after oral questions, it would seem to me that there was an open-ended period of time for consideration of them. Often there were so many that the Chair had to step in and take some measure of control of those which seemed not to be in conformity with the rule. However, when the procedures were changed to put them before the questions, there was a sort of self-limiting factor. Therefore I thought that there was much less compulsion on the Chair to intervene, because indeed they are almost always opposition applications. It is somewhat unseemly, day after day, for the Chair to be interposing itself in the face of what are consistently opposition applications—not exclusively but almost—for consideration under the rule, particularly when there was an automatic time limit on them. Therefore I have tended to be rather generous in the interpretation of what motions can be considered. However, there is a limit to that.

Two of the motions now under review should be the subject of discussion by the House. I look forward to the time, as the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has mentioned, when House leaders can agree and give me some advice as to a convenient time for discussing the subject matter. At that time I think we ought to continue the discussion about the difficulty we face if one of these is considered. There are real difficulties respecting the point just raised by the Deputy Prime Minister.

Also there are difficulties in knowing clearly what is going to take place, if a member gives his consent under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Certainly it is one thing for a member to be asked to give his consent to the immediate passage of a motion, if that is the case. Indeed that has certain weaknesses to it, but nevertheless it is a known quantity. It is another thing altogether to ask a member to consent to setting aside the business of the day and, on a priority basis, debate some other motion to the exclusion of and then priority ranking in the subject matter for the day. If that is the question being put—will the House put aside its other business and debate this matter as a matter of priority—surely that ought to be put in a question so that members can address themselves to that very point as a matter of procedure.

Therefore, these considerations remain as loose ends. As I have said, on three previous occasions they have been a problem for the Chair. This is at least the fourth occasion. On every one of those occasions, on October 26, 1976, February 18, 1977, and December 16, 1977, we ran into similar difficulties. On one occasion we had a vote. On another occasion the proponent of the motion was talking until the appointed hour for the beginning of question period. By talking in support of his own motion, in effect he deprived himself of the opportunity for a vote. On some of those occasions in the past, at the conclusion of question period the situation was rectified with the consent of the House.

There is no procedure which I can invoke at this time to return to the consideration of the question we had before us at 2.15 this afternoon. It was interrupted by the question period. In our practices we cannot change from one item of business to another without the adjournment of the item before the House and asking the agreement of the House to move to another matter. Having done that at 2.15, surely we cannot then return at three o'clock without the agreement of the House in some form. Therefore, in my opinion, we are powerless to return to the consideration of this matter, unless we do so by unanimous consent. In fact, on a previous motion put by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin), this was the case. We agreed to a debate of limited proportions, but that was done clearly with the consent of the House. I have no authority to direct that. I am bound by the fact that at this time we are facing the calling of other proceedings described in the standing orders, and I do not have the authority to direct us back to this motion, unless the House consents. At the moment I do not have any vehicle through which to determine that consent.

I think this matter ought to be set over along with the other matters of substance which were raised by virtue of the proposals by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings and the hon. member for Vaudreuil. I hope the parties will agree to an early discussion of this. Frankly, I think it can be resolved only by some changes in the rule, something which will have to be done by the Standing Committee on Procedure and Organization. I hope that the House leaders will agree to an early opportunity for full discussion of these points raised today so that we can address ourselves to this problem which, after all, is a part of our daily proceedings and therefore a problem of great urgency.

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, just so that the record is clear, I would like to reply to the statement made by the Deputy Prime Minister and House leader (Mr. MacEachen). The reason that we have had this hour-long procedural debate is because an agreement was broken. I had put the proposition to the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) that I would be putting my motion under Standing Order 43 today on the agreement that there would be no debate. It was a non-contentious and non-partisan issue, and for that reason the government agreed by unanimous consent to having it put.

The point is that, unfortunately, certain developments occurred which prevented that motion from being put for final resolution. I just wanted to clear that up, that it was the government side that broke the agreement and got us into these difficulties. I understand that the government is not prepared to allow equity in terms of participation in debate. I wonder, in the interests of good sense and fairness, whether I could move at this time that my motion under Standing Order 43 be now put for final resolution, without debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: This is more in the nature of a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes) states that we have gone against an agreement that he is supposed to have made with me. He mentioned my name. He talked about the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister. I never gave my consent, or the consent of anyone else since I could not do so, for the motion to be accepted without debate.

All I said to the hon. member, in his own language, when he came to see me in the government lobby a few seconds before two o'clock, was that as far as we were concerned, contrary to what we must usually do because of the nature of the motions moved, I would not object to this motion being moved, I would not say no if unanimous consent were needed for this motion to be moved, and I would ensure that no one on our side would say no when you ask: Is there unanimous consent for this motion to be moved? This was the only agreement between the hon. member and myself. Therefore, when he suggests to the House that I have gone back on an agreement, I must point out that the hon. member is wrong and that I am sure that if he is misleading the House, it is unintentionally. Perhaps in his mind—I cannot say for sure—he did not want us to debate this matter. It is not my place to guess what he was thinking. However, in all honesty, since he mentioned my name and referred to to an agreement against which I am supposed to have gone, I want to formally deny this charge. All I said in English was:

[English]

All I agreed to was that I would not say no to the putting of the motion, and that nobody on our side would say no. If the hon. member is pretending that he talked to me about not debating the motion, I am saying to this House that he is not telling the truth, and I deny it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House will realize the very great difficulty that we are in here. First we have the difficulty when in fact one of these motions is accepted. It is a difficulty we have faced two or three times in the past. None of us is clear on how it can be handled. I have to take the best course I can, pursuant to the rule, and it is the same course I have taken in the past. If we were to differ from that course we would need the consent of the House.

The other difficulty we face is that, obviously, before two o'clock there had been some discussion about one aspect of the rule with regard to whether or not consent would be withheld or given to the presentation of the motion. As often is the case in the eyes of members of the House—and, I am sure, in the eyes of many others—the two are equated. The two are considered to be synonymous, the consent for the putting of the question and the consent for the passage of the motion. In fact, they are two very separate questions.

There has always been a general impression that consenting to the putting of a motion to the House is thereby agreeing to the passage of the motion immediately without debate. That is not the case and never has been. It is a difficulty that we face every day in the interpretation of this rule, and it is a difficulty that has even, it seems to me, introduced itself into a discussion between two members—who have each taken I am sure, quite righteously, entirely different interpretations—which they had before the presentation of this motion. Surely it would be helpful even to those kinds of conflicts if we could clarify some of the many difficulties which face us in this Standing Order.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, it being Thursday, it has been the tradition that a question be placed, under a point of order, before we go into routine business, as to what the government's intention is with respect to the business for the next week. I am sure that I could come up with some speculation as to what it may be, but it would be better to hear it out of the mouth of the government House leader, who is probably now giving some undertakings or obtaining them.

I would ask the government House leader if he would tell the House what the government's intention are with respect to business during the course of the next week. It is Thursday, the government House leader is back from Rome, over his jet lag and able to consider the business of the House, I am sure. Possibly he could stand up and tell us what he has in mind for the next week.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot say what the business is today until I have reached motions, when I want to have a discussion with the hon. gentlemen opposite with respect to the business today. Quite apart from the disposition which may be reached with respect to the borrowing authority bill, I want to indicate that the Old Age Security Act, the child benefits act, and the Health Resources Fund Act will be the next package of legislative items. Of course, as my hon. friend realizes, we have already agreed that Monday shall be the final day for debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

CRIMINAL CODE

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES ON FIREARMS CONTROL

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), and further to my reply in this House last Friday to a question by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) on the government's plans concerning the implementation of the gun control legislation, I would like to table, in both official languages, letters and attachments which I sent recently to all my provincial colleagues responsible for the enforcement of the Criminal Code and, as well, to the two territorial commissioners, reviewing arrangements for Canada's first firearms amnesty to be held from November 1 to 30, 1978.

I might also indicate that I have made that correspondence available to my critics in the opposition parties.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH NEWFOUNDLAND ON SHARED COST PROGRAMS

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), copies in both official languages of correspondence with Premier Moores of Newfoundland concerning publicity of shared cost programs.

STATUTE LAW (SUPERANNUATION) AMENDMENT ACT, 1978

MEASURE TO CHANGE RETIREMENT BENEFIT PROVISIONS

Hon. Jean Chrétien (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-12, to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, the Public Service Superannuation Act, the Canadian Forces Superannuation Act, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Superannuation Act and the Members of Parliament Retiring Allowances Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

ELECTRICITY INSPECTION ACT AND GAS INSPECTION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-13, to amend the Electricity Inspection Act and the Gas Inspection Act.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Speaker: Motions.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

AGREEMENT ON CONSIDERATION AND PASSAGE OF BILL C-7

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should like to make a brief comment on the disposition of Bill C-7.

An hon. Member: Withdraw it.

Mr. MacEachen: Following the spirited, if illogically based, speech of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in the debate yesterday, I received a communication from the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). It is not a private letter because it was posted in the press gallery within 15 minutes of its arrival at my office, so I trust I will not be breaking any tradition of confidentiality by quoting—

Mr. Clark: That is known as open government.

Mr. MacEachen: —the third paragraph which may lay a foundation for the later discussions I had with party representatives and for the proposal which I trust will be agreed to as expediting the business of the House.

The hon. member for Grenville-Carleton wrote as follows:

> Following upon the leader's presentation, I am writing formally to request that you agree to withdraw Bill C-7 and to bring in a new bill in place of Bill C-7, limited in its scope to a borrowing authority for the fiscal year 78-79 as set forth in Bill C-7.
> In return, we are prepared to permit the introduction of this bill later today, or tomorrow if necessary, for first reading, to give second reading to such a new bill without debate immediately after its introduction and to refer it to a committee where it will be given speedy consideration.

I draw attention especially to the final paragraph because it is the one that attracted me particularly. It reads as follows:

> We make this suggestion to you as a way to expedite the business of the House and the committee in which we have a mutual interest and I hope that it will meet with your favourable consideration.

I was very pleased to receive this letter and I communicated to my colleague that I would give it consideration and be in touch with him as soon as possible. I have had discussions with the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn), the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and the representative of the Social Credit party.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

I believe there is general agreement to my proposal that second reading of this bill will be concluded without further debate and that the bill will be amended in the standing committee to confine its application to the current fiscal year. It is not necessary to withdraw the bill. We can achieve the objective of confining the operation of the bill to the current fiscal year by particular amendments to it. We are agreeable to doing that, on the understanding that the committee will report not later than November 10, and that it will have no fewer than three meetings in that period, and that report stage and third reading will be completed in a period of not more than five hours.

I should add that I am quite agreeable that we have discussions to determine a mutually agreed upon time for votes that might occur as a result of the proceedings at report stage and third reading.

I suggest that, if this proposal is accepted, we might have the division on second reading today at 5.45 p.m. in order to ensure that those members of the House who have attended the funeral of our former colleague, the hon. Mr. Greene, will be present for the vote.

I hope this is a faithful representation of the discussions and, if it is agreeable to hon. members, it could be made a House order.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, I just want to comment briefly on the proposal put forward by the government House leader. First of all I should point out that the suggestion made by my leader yesterday, and subsequently transmitted to the government House leader by our House leader in a letter, underlined the fact that one part of the bill causes us particular concern, that is, what has been termed the "blank cheque" provision of $10 billion for future spending.

My leader pointed out very strenuously, as have the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) and others, that we still have some substantial and valid objections to the remaining provisions in the bill with respect to the $7 billion. It was on this basis that we had the discussions.

It was part of my understanding that the government House leader indicated he would ensure the attendance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) at the standing committee so that he could be questioned. The government House leader is quite right in saying it was understood there would be no fewer than three sittings. I should make it quite clear that we came to this agreement on the basis that government members will not indulge themselves in points of order, questions of privilege, or other procedural tactics which are irrelevant, and that members will be able to question and cross-examine the Minister of Finance during the standing committee deliberations. I think it is fundamental to this understanding that we have a clear and unequivocal undertaking with respect to our right and ability to question the minister on the remaining provisions of the bill which are fundamental and very important to us.

The Minister of Finance is in the House, so perhaps he could give us an undertaking that he will be present at those committee meetings. I want to be quite clear that this is the basis upon which we put this matter forward. I say that, not suggesting there will be any such tactic, but sometimes enthusiasm takes over where logic should prevail, and occassionally—

An hon. Member: You should know.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: We want to get this business through and we put this forward on a serious basis in order to help expedite the business of the House and to get the government off a sticky wicket with respect to the $10 billion. We put it forward in good faith in order to get the bill through in the minimum amount of time. It is essential that the Minister of Finance be at committee and that we be given the opportunity to examine and cross-examine him on the remaining provisions of the bill.

I believe it was the understanding given by the government House leader that, as far as he had any control over this matter, he would counsel his colleagues not to indulge in excessive debate or other tactics. The Minister of Finance is here and he will be able to confirm that he will be at those particular meetings.

● (1632)

Finally, as far as the understanding is concerned, we are agreeable to the five hours but that any votes that might arise by virtue of the discussion and amendments brought forward in the report stage will be taken at a time mutually convenient after discussion on this matter.

Mr. Pinard: The rules provide for that.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Maybe the parliamentary secretary, who was so good at undertakings, and who would not participate in this debate now, wants to make an interjection. But I am trying to recall publicly what was my understanding of the arrangement, that the votes would not be considered as part of the time involved in the five-hour debate. In other words, the five hours would be attributable and available for debate and not be included as far as—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I hope that all hon. members will recognize that if we are trying to come to some kind of agreement here, which I expect will be made the subject of a House order, the matter has now become so complicated that it will be difficult, if not impossible, to frame an order in extemporaneous language.

If the parties want to finalize the terms of an order, that perhaps ought to be done privately. But to attempt to do this as we move along from moment to moment, adding different paragraphs, conditions, and undertakings from the one side to the other, into the final product, I simply want to point out makes a practical procedural difficulty. If we were to attempt to phrase some sort of an order, there is a limit to how much we can incorporate in it extemporaneously.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the reason I rose to explain my understanding of the undertaking of the government House leader was due to the fact that he inadvertently did not say it was his understanding the Minister of Finance would appear before the committee.

Mr. MacEachen: That is all right.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The proposition that he makes is satisfactory to us. He is confirming that now, sir, and he did not make that clear when he made his proposal. I simply want to make that quite clear, that that was an essential and integral part of it, and I gave it some background. With those very few caveats and observations, we are prepared to go along with the suggestion and the recommendation put forward by the government House leader.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I often go to the press gallery and look at the notice board because it is a good way to find out what is going on around this place. It just so happens that I did not go last evening, so I have not seen the letter that was written to the government House leader by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). However, I was clued in a little before lunch time today as to what was happening, and although I have not had an opportunity to consult with all of my colleagues, I have consulted with enough of them to be able to state our position.

Our position, Mr. Speaker, is that we are prepared to agree to the proposal that has now been made by the government House leader.

May I state it as I understand it, hoping that it is the general proposition. It would be, first, that the debate on second reading of Bill C-7 be now regarded as concluded which, of course, would do away with that motion under 75(c), of which notice was given yesterday. It is also understood that any vote on second reading would come at 5.45. The bill would go to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs with the understanding that in that committee the government will move for the deletion of the clauses that relate to fiscal year 1979-1980.

The rest of the understanding is that when the bill comes back to the House, and it must come back by November 10, that the debate at report stage and third reading will not exceed five hours, and that any time required for recorded votes would be outside of the five hours.

I should like to say that I prefer that way of putting it, that is, five hours of debate, rather than saying one sitting day, because one sitting day can sometimes be messed up by a long debate on procedural points, references to Standing Order 43 and so on, and the first thing you know a sitting day can be an hour and a half or two hours.

So, Mr. Speaker, if you do not mind my having taken this time to say it, I have been trying to spell out what we understand to be the agreement, and we agree to it.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think it is important enough that we do not have later misunderstandings as a result of our discussion. I do not believe the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred in his otherwise admirable summation to what would happen in the standing committee, the number of meetings, when it would report, and so on.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is that in the standing committee there will not be fewer than three sessions. In other words, the government cannot ram it through in one or two.

Mr. Clark: And the minister will be present.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And the minister will be there, the government says, in the normal way. I gather it is understood that the minister will be there for those three meetings. That is not a prohibition against there being more than three meetings. The understanding is that there will be no attempt to do it in fewer than three meetings.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think there is a limit to what we can put in this order. I have undertaken in reply to the very statement that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Saskatoon-Biggar.

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, I am sorry. I remember the former member for Rosetown-Biggar. He was so much better.

Mr. Clark: Simply closer in age.

Mr. MacEachen: —that the minister would appear before the committee in the normal way. If only to preserve some relative dignity in the House, I do not think I am going to undertake that no matter how many meetings—I think there is a steering committee,—there has to be a certain element of good will in the operation of this House, and I undertake that the minister will co-operate within that spirit of accommodation with which this whole agreement has been worked out. I do not think we ought to go beyond that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I see the hon. member for Scarborough East (Mr. O'Connell) rising. We are not in a debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This is a negotiating committee.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) has risen on motions to put what has been laughingly referred to as a brief discussion on this subject. The suggestion is that an order be made at this time, which obviously requires the consent of the House, first of all that the order be presented by unanimous consent at this time because it is being presented without notice.

As I understand it, the order contains the following terms: that debate of Bill C-7 be concluded now; that when the question is put under Orders of the Day to terminate that debate, if it leads to a recorded division that division shall be taken at 5.45 o'clock this afternoon; that the bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs; that while in committee the government will move to amend the bill in such a way so as to restrict its scope to the fiscal year 1978-79; that the minister will co-operate with the work of the committee in the usual way; and to be more specific, but not so as to restrict the generality of that proposition, that not fewer than three meetings of the committee will be used for this bill and the minister will be there for those; that upon its return to the House not later than November 10, five hours of time will be allocated for the consideration of report stage and third reading of the bill, with any vote to be taken to be exclusive of that five-hour period of time.

I believe that is the proposition put before the House. That order can be put only with the consent of the House. Does the House give its consent for the putting of that motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

• (1642)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, on the question of the way Your Honour dealt with the portion of the summation with regard to the $10 billion for fiscal year 1979-80, that is the intention. There is another provision which I have not examined which may have application to that year, but it does not relate, as the hon. member rightly observes, to 1979-80. I would like it understood we are dealing with the proposition of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) with regard to the borrowing authority 1979-80. However, there is another provision which may have application to that year which is not under discussion, but which your summation may have included, I am sure inadvertently.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to mar in any way the coming to an agreement that has now been reached. However, I must rise on a question of privilege. I hope it is clearly understood that the order of this House does not restrict private members like myself who may be sitting on that committee from the full exercise of their rights on that committee. I object very strenuously to the smuggling in by the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) of some suggestion that the members on this side should not perform their full functions on that committee. I trust in all of those other summations that it is very carefully deleted, because I certainly will perform my full function there. I resent the suggestion that we delay or raise points of order. The history of those committees goes the other way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

MR. PAPROSKI—REFUSAL TO ANSWER QUESTIONS

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, this has to do with questions on the order paper. In order to expedite answers to questions on the order paper, and in view of the fact some questions have been on the order paper for a matter of months and even years without the government feeling any obligation to answer them, will the parliamentary secretary do the House the courtesy of giving a list of questions he refuses to provide answers to, and possibly we can take that into consideration?

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I merely refer the hon. member to the order paper and as for the remainder, our record is self-explanatory since we answer an average of 90 per cent of the questions per session.

Mr. Speaker: Are the remaining questions allowed to stand?

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 25, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: According to the order the House made earlier this day, the question is on the motion of Mr. Chrétien. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Shall I declare the motion carried on division?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: In accordance with order made earlier this day, the members will be called in for this division at 5.45 o'clock this afternoon.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved: That Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

She said: Mr. Speaker, this is the first time I rise on second reading of a bill in the House, a piece of legislation I personally submitted to hon. members for consideration and I do hope to have their support. During the budget debate in April last, I had started discussing poverty in Canada and the urgency of doing more to increase share of national income for our most needy Canadians. I realize that in an affluent country concerned about losing its recent wealth, to which most Canadians are entitled, it was not proper to talk about the state of poverty of some of us. I felt however it was urgent to refer to it specifically because the feelings of concern among some sectors of the Canadian community could scare us and make us lose sight of existing problems whose urgency is quite obvious.

On August 1 last, the Prime Minister made it clear that he would do more to protect senior citizens against the adverse effects of inflation. So I am most happy today to introduce two amendments to the Old Age Security Act, one about the annual guaranteed income supplement and the other regarding the spouse's allowance. The supplement is paid to those who have hardly any or no income at all other than their old age security pension. At present, in October, 1978, this monthly supplement may mean up to $205.22 for a couple of pensioners and up to $115.55 for a single pensioner, alone, or whose spouse does not yet qualify for any pension or who is not eligible, so to speak, for the general old age security, as well as for those who get the spouse's allowance. To qualify for this supplement, single, widowed or divorced pensioners must have an income under $2,784. Married pensioners whose income is less than $4,944 will qualify too. A married couple with a single pension will be eligible if the income does not exceed $7,544.87.

[English]

The proposed change to the GIS, the guaranteed income supplement, will increase the total benefits to each household currently receiving GIS by $20 a month effective January 1, 1979. As far as I know, this is a new characteristic in our program. It means that the monthly benefit for a single GIS recipient will be increased by $20. For a couple, each member of the couple will receive an additional $10 per month, for a total of $240 for the coming year. This total will be indexed every three months according to the cost of living in a similar way to what we do now with the pension and the supplement.

This change will give a break to those who are referred to in the statistics as "unattached" elderly people. It may appear to be an injustice to give more money to those who live alone than to a couple on pension. However, I am sure the House will agree with the justice of the proposal.

At the moment, those in Canada who live alone and are the recipients of a pension and a supplement receive approximately 50 per cent of the amount a couple is entitled to receive. In fact, it is 52.4 per cent.

First, the cost of living for the person alone, single, widow, or in whatever circumstances, is much more than just half the pension of a couple. The cost of living alone is approximately two thirds of the budget of a couple or family. For instance, the basic one-bedroom apartment, the cost of the telephone bill, electricity, hydro, will be the same for a person alone living on a supplement as for a couple. Therefore, it is a matter of great urgency, it seems to me, to bring our program in line with the realities of the family budget. It is the first time we are taking such a measure.

When the economy is in better shape I hope to be able to come here with further such measures and I hope we shall never hear that measures to help older people living alone are a disincentive to marry or an incentive to divorce. I am only talking of relief to the family budget by which we bring up the pensions and supplements going to unattached, elderly Canadians. There is no way they can live as cheaply as two can live. This must clearly be said of present and future steps to increase benefits to elderly Canadians. Right now, this proposal of $240 additional money per year as of the coming January will bring them to approximately 54 per cent of a family's budget, that is, 54 per cent of what a couple receiving a pension can be entitled to. It is a first step. It is surely not a complete correction of the problem but I think it is a step in the right direction.

It is important, it seems to me, to ask who will benefit from the change in the GIS. I should like to use this opportunity to put before members of the House and other Canadians the fact that in our rich and affluent society, which we keep forgetting, in times of better circumstances for the majority of Canadians, approximately 60 per cent of all the pensioners in our country will benefit from the new GIS provision of $240 a year, that is 1,350,000 elderly Canadians. We keep forgetting there is such a big number needing our help, who live mainly upon pensions paid through the money of the taxpayers. I am not sure this fact of the poverty of the elderly Canadians is known to us.

Sixty per cent of all the pensioners in Canada receive some supplement, some assistance in addition to the basic pension because they are in poverty by all standards of definition.

We should consider some figures here. Over the last 20 years, consistently more than 50 per cent of elderly Canadians have been in the poorest one-fifth of our population.

Over one million Canadians, in fact 1.3 million, rely almost entirely on public funds as their only income. For a couple this amounts to $6,410 a year at the most, and the $240 additional money will for the first time bring them just above the poverty line. As to the single elderly person in such a situation, survival must accordingly be achieved on $3,363 a year.

[Translation]

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask honourable members, my colleagues and all Canadians how many of us would be able to survive without financial help on $3,363 a year. We simply cannot figure out how these people can make it and it is high time and most urgent that we realize the state of poverty the majority of Canadian pensioners live in. When we grow to that age, we hope that either the pensions will be a lot higher than they are now or that Canadian pensioners, because of different circumstances, for instance access to good private pension plans, will not be in a situation where 60 per cent of them will have the two public pensions of the government as their only source of revenue.

Now my question is this: who will benefit from the changes in the GIS? Besides the figures I gave earlier, that is the 1,350,000 Canadian pensioners who, starting next January, will be entitled to $20 more every month, indexed every three months to the cost of living, there are 100,000 others who, to this day, are not entitled to the guaranteed income supplement. Allow me to take a couple of minutes to explain that point.

[English]

The 1,350,000 Canadian pensioners who will receive the new $20 per month as of January include 100,000 who right now do not have access to any supplement. In other words, not only will it go to 60 per cent of all Canadian pensioners but it opens the doors to qualifying for the GIS to another 100,000 Canadians. These 100,000 will qualify for assistance and therefore part of the $20. By the way, the $20 will go in full to pensioners now in receipt of assistance. This is because if we raise the annual GIS by $240 we automatically, to effect such an increase, have to raise the ceiling on income. The maximum incomes pensioners can receive and still qualify for some assistance under the GIS will increase by $480 a year. For every additional dollar there is a corresponding $2 in the allowed income and the integration of an increase to our benefits increases immediately the total ceiling under which people can qualify for supplement.

I am pleased to stress that 100,000 more Canadian pensioners will now have access to some assistance in addition to the basic pension.

• (1702)

Miss Bégin: Perhaps I could put on record a list of who these Canadians are. This provision will help 662,000 unattached individuals. It will help 200,000 couples. It will help 21,000 couples when one only of the two partners qualifies for the pension, and it will also go to 72,500 couples in receipt of the spouse's allowance. The new pensioners I have just referred to can be described according to the same spectrum of categories.

The cost of the program is very easy to figure out. It amounts, including a margin of uncertainty of between 9 and 10 per cent, to $290 million of additional expenditure in the coming calendar year, 1979. This cost is going to be absorbed into the government budget and will not mean any additional tax.

When I spoke in public of these new provisions in the fall, newspapers quoted a few times the word "robbery" attached to the discussion of the provisions for indexation included in the old age security. I think I owe the House an explanation which I shall give this afternoon. We are often told, virtually always by those still working and commanding high salaries, that Canada cannot afford indexation. I just want to refer members to two sources of such statements.

Very recently the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants stated that the indexation of social service programs had led to the fall in the value of the Canadian dollar—a statement, which, of course, I do not accept at all. Also, the Canadian Construction Association stated through its president that we cannot afford our social programs. This sort of grand generalization is particularly detrimental to social programs directed at those Canadians who live on fixed incomes, the golden age Canadians, our senior citizens, the pensioners in our country.

Surely those who make these statements who are still in the productive stage of their life have access to increases of 6 per cent, 8 per cent, 10 per cent, or even more, in their wages every year. That is fine; they still have bargaining power. But they forget that those Canadians who have ceased to have that bargaining power must live on fixed incomes which are usually voted by parliament. They forget that this country is extremely rich in natural resources which are being exploited but the potential of which is not yet fully known. That is very obvious to older Canadians who have seen change more than we have, and who keep telling us to have faith because this country can offer so much. It seems to me that we keep forgetting that.

We look at the immediate advantages to which most of us have access, or which we have acquired in the past ten years or so. We are afraid that in these times of economic difficulties we might lose some of these recently acquired privileges and we are ready to protect our own assets immediately at the cost of the indexation of social programs, and in particular the indexation of old age pensions which at first appear to us to be hugely expensive. I refer to the Canadians who carelessly state to whomsoever wishes to listen to them that we cannot afford indexation. I wonder how they can look at themselves in their mirrors.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: That is why I refer to this as a subtle form of robbery. I hope to be able to present publicly very soon a paper putting forth the problems of the indexation of pensions in general, including private pensions. I am not sure that it is normal in a country like ours for the government to index our own pensions and not to take care of 60 per cent of our older citizens who have no other source of income but the two pensions from the government, that is, the general universal pension and the supplementary pension. I do not understand why the share of the burden of providing for our old age citizens is not distributed in a better fashion and why some of it is not shared by the private sector, but I suppose there will be many other occasions when this matter can be discussed.

Before leaving the subject of indexation I should like to refer to something which historians might have already recorded, which many citizens and members of the House might have witnessed, and which I now offer as an hypothesis. The indexation of social programs was an innovation and was quite imperfect at first. It was a step toward progress in the development of social policy, and that first step was the indexing of pensions. Having been here for six years I think that many of us in 1972, 1973 and 1974 have witnessed the full and automatic indexation of pensions every three months which was written into the law. It is one of the greatest developments in the social policy of our country and is now applied to all our social programs. Basically, we owe this to our senior citizens, who through well organized and numerous clubs and groups, have put pressure on members of the House and on the government, and rightly so. I suppose that is the name of the game.

I want to acknowledge the social role played by the senior citizens in our country who have made the general public aware of the concept of indexation which, five or six years ago, was a complicated concept which only economists understood. The word "indexation" was not generally used, but now it is a word in our everyday language, a word which workers recognize when they bargain for their settlements, which journalists use in their daily news reports, and which is very much part of the Canadian language. So I want to pay tribute to our senior citizens who have put on the map, forever I hope, through acts voted by this parliament, the concept of indexation of all social programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I often hear questions about the huge cost of our pensions, as well as other arguments against indexation which I would like to refute today. One argument I hear is that very soon there will be too many old people in Canada and that no one will be left to pay their pensions. I should like to put forward briefly some statistical facts. I do not think people should use these figures as an excuse for what I would call future panic. They think that very soon in the future we will have a vast dependent population, with no one working and earning left to support it. This is absolutely incorrect, although it is true that every year the percentage of people in our population who are over 65 is rising.

● (1712)

At the time of the last census in 1971, senior citizens accounted for 8.1 per cent of our population, or over 1.7 million people. By 1981, nine out of every 100 people will be 65 years of age or over. By the year 2001, this age group will account for one-tenth of all Canadians, for a grand total of approximately 3.4 million people. If we look at the visual representation of our population, the graph, we will see that it is not a panic situation. Even if it were one, we would have to face that situation and find solutions. But there is no reason to panic.

The truth is that there will be fewer dependent age people in the future. Social scientists refer to dependent age people as those under 18 or over 64 years of age, and therefore not in the labour force. The peak in this regard was in 1961 when there were 47 people of dependent age for every 100 Canadians. By 1971 the figure had dropped to 44. It dropped further last year to 40, because of the decreasing birth rate. It is safe to predict that it will be between 38 and 40 for the coming years and well into the next century. That means that the increased cost of better social services and health care for older people will be more than offset by the savings at the educational level and all programs relating to children.

There is absolutely no reason to panic and psychologically visualize Canadian senior citizens as a burden. Of course there will be more senior citizens, but one must remember the children of the baby boom who will be entering the labour force for decades. These workers will ensure a decent living for the senior citizens and, in turn, one for themselves when they reach retirement age.

The universality of old age pensions also was questioned in some quarters. The basic pension program should remain universal for all Canadians. It is the cornerstone of our system of retirement. All senior Canadians have contributed to the growth and development of the country. Surely it is a general feeling that all should have access to a basic universal pension, no matter what their income.

The first part of the bill proposes to provide $300 million a year to senior citizens who are in need, who receive one of the basic pensions or one of the pensions which provide assistance, the guaranteed income supplement or the spouse's allowance. The second part of the bill deals with the spouse's allowance, which often has been called a problem. Three years ago the spouse's allowance did not exist.

During debates in the House we witnessed pressures to lower the age of compulsory retirement to 60. Those pressures were resisted, and rightly so. At the present time a Senate committee is studying that question, and Canadians have been placed in a position of making their views known. We will witness a move toward flexibility of retirement age, rather than its being compulsory. Also we will witness a movement in favour of labour participation in the work force by many Canadians who are over age 65 and now realize, as governments do, that an arbitrary age of retirement at 65 without any transitional period affects people physically, psychologically, and does not help at all.

In October, 1975, a spouse's allowance program was introduced. It was meant to meet the needs of many married Canadian couples who suddenly lost one full salary and were required to live on a single pension. This program was passed by parliament. It applied to the spouse who was not yet 65 but at least 60. In all cases where families were in need, the spouses would receive this allowance. It is similar to the GIS which is offered in addition to the old age pension to those in need. Approximately 75,000 Canadians, most of them women, are in receipt of this additional pension. After three years of operation, we concluded that the program needed to be corrected on an emergency basis. That is one area covered by this bill.

At the present time, a partner or spouse loses the allowance and the first pension after the month in which a pensioner dies. I do not apologize for that. I know it creates hardships for many Canadians. All Canadians in need, be they under or over the age of 65, have the benefit of welfare and social assistance payments at the provincial level. That assistance is waiting for them as a right, not as a privilege. Approximately $1 billion of taxpayers' money is paid to the provinces every year in order to cover only 50 per cent of the welfare payments made to individuals. Even without this new proposal, families have been able to go to provincial welfare offices to apply for assistance over the last three years.

Many Canadians, particularly senior citizens, still consider welfare to be a form of help which does not respect their dignity. One must remember that welfare payments are a recent social development in all countries. These senior Canadians have lived during the years when their lives and careers were based on pride, dignity, and self-sufficiency. Their neighbours and their extended families provided for them during economic crises. A more recent development in our society led to the establishment of social welfare payments. Senior Canadians in need are entitled to such payments; it is their right to receive them. In fact they have paid for this right, and their children are continuing to contribute moneys. I regret that a stigma is still attached to welfare payments and social assistance.

At the time of the establishment of the spouse's allowance, the federal government paid for approximately 75,000 senior Canadians instead of the provinces. Many people, to offer a solution to the hardship created by this sudden loss of two pensions in the instance of the death of a partner who was a pensioner in his or her own right, suggested that we keep these people on until they reached age 65, or that we put all people in need between the ages 60 to 64 on pensions. I rejected both avenues, and I would like to explain why.

In one case, then, we would have taken the pensioners' roll and lowered to 60 the age of eligibility for all the needy. Such an option, Mr. Speaker, can be ideal. It does not however take into account the fact that many Canadians are beginning to have doubts about retirement age; they want it to be optional and flexible. Canadians would rather not have a compulsory retirement age, namely 65. They would prefer to choose their own, a few years sooner or later, according to their personal circumstances.

I do hope we can find a way to distribute pensions because, to my mind, therein resides the whole practical problem of distributing pensions that leave room for the principle of flexibility and choice in one's retirement age. But we are not there yet. I shall be very anxious to get the recommendations of the Senate committee on the matter. But to say today that everyone of 60 to 65 who is in need should receive the federal pension automatically would cost the state $630 million more each year. In times of economic restrictions, that argument becomes important for the very simple reason that $1 billion already go each year to the provinces from all Canadian taxpayers, through the federal government, to pay for 50 per cent of the costs of all social welfare programs.

Needy people between 60 and 65 have to apply to their welfare office and withdraw the amounts for which they are eligible. So the question becomes rather whether this should be paid for by the federal or by the provincial government.

We are now covering the spouses of pensioners who have already a right to their retirement and who are in need, which makes about 75,000 persons. If, because of the present state of our economy we cannot cover all the needy people, no matter what their marital status, we think about what we can do. The other solution is to keep on the list of eligibility the widow who lost both pensions after her husband's death, until she is 65. I examined the situation, Mr. Speaker, and I rejected this solution for the sake of fairness. I think the House will understand my reasons for this; I rejected this solution because it is unfair to the neighbour who is single, and to the other neighbour who has been a widow for a long time, or to the separated woman or the single man who is not eligible for this pension.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: It wasn't fair in the first place.

Miss Bégin: The hon. member has asked why this was so in the first place. The opposition will recall that when this idea was introduced and passed by this parliament three years ago—the spouse who qualifies for a pension because of a partner who is 65 years of age—this was at a time when we were still negotiating a guaranteed annual income for all Canadians. That would have been automatically taken care of by, if I may use the word, negative income tax or other techniques. We were very confident that an agreement would be reached between the provinces and Ottawa. Some months later, however, some provinces refused to embark on such a huge, brand new social approach to solving problems of poverty in Canada, and consequently we did not settle on a plan for a guaranteed annual income. I hope that I will see the day when such a program is instituted, but it will not be in the near future. Therefore it would be very unfair to exploit the expectations and hopes of people.

In good faith we established a program to help Canadians in this very bad situation. The approach taken was a pragmatic approach. We asked: what is the most urgent need for people in this situation? The answer was, in cases where a married couple are living on one pension and the other spouse does not qualify, to give these people assistance.

Now we face another problem, and that is the hardship created for a spouse upon the death of the mate. In cases such as this we propose that we keep the individual on the equivalent of OAS, GIS and, of course, the additional $20 which is proposed in the first part of the bill for a further six months after the death of the partner. The six months interval is not perfect. The ideal would be to take on pension all Canadians in need between the ages 60 to 65.

This is a cost which the federal government cannot afford right now. It is money which is given to the provinces to provide this benefit and the cost amounted to $1 billion last year. We are ready to enter into negotiations with the provinces to make the necessary changes to include Canadians from age 60. We hope that we will also be able to work out a system where we can offer a choice to an individual with regard to the age of retirement. If that is what hon. members opposite wish to have, I am sure the official opposition will propose it. It means federal-provincial conferences and negotiations in areas of jurisdiction which are provincial right now.

I propose the realistic solution of keeping the partner on benefits for six months. How did I arrive at six months? It is enough time to give the widow—I say widow because most often it is the woman who is in this situation—or widower, as the case may be, time to settle the estate even if it is small. Members of this House know that the government's definition of income is quite generous. For example it does not consider as income savings in the bank or the equity in the little home. The death of a partner in most cases does lead to—

● (1732)

—and I am going to say it in French. The death of a spouse naturally brings up the question of the house in which they live. Most elderly people we are talking about live in a small house which they own. Six months may not be enough to sell the house. Yet things can get started. One can find residence in a small apartment, a place in a home, in a residence, arrangements can be made with the children, a bank account can be closed, saving bonds can be cashed—

[English]

For instance, they can make the application to have the dossier processed to obtain the CPP survivors' benefit, which takes 60 days. I think six months given to the spouse who survives the partner who was a pensioner in title gives the time needed for readjustment. That is what I am asking of hon. members, knowing very well that it is not an ideal solution to the problem. It is a solution, however. I challenge any hon. member to say that six more months is not something that is good for the spouse who is in receipt of the spouse's allowance.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I would like to close my remarks by making a plea to my colleagues from all parties for the cause of the elderly, particularly old women who live alone and in poverty. When we talk about this bill which proposes two amendments providing nearly $300 million more for elderly people in Canada, we are talking about some 800,000 women who are old, poor and live alone. I know this is a case of urgency to which nobody can remain indifferent. As soon as the House passes this bill, it will enable the Senate to deal with it and our parliamentary system to give it royal assent so it will then allow the continuation of the spouse's allowance for an additional period of six months. This is a matter of urgency which I bring to the attention of hon. members.

As for the second program which will benefit 1,350,000 Canadians, if such is the desire of the House, it will come into force starting January, 1979, that is in two months, and I would urge the members of all parties in the House to give their support for a quick passing of Bill C-5.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 40 to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae)—Transport—Movement of grain on Great Lakes—Lengthening of Seaway season; the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil)—Agriculture—Sale of government elevators; the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae)—Finance—Tax recommendations of Economic Council of Canada.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that we, on our side of the House, firmly intend to support this bill, but as concerns social welfare, how many times did the minister note this afternoon in the House of Commons that she cannot do much because of the economic situation? It is true that, compared with previous administrations, including Liberal administrations, the minister has not been able to do much. Why, Mr. Speaker? Because for the last ten years we have had the worst economic administration in our country since confederation!

[English]

It is pretty hard to speak for long about this bill, Mr. Speaker, because it is merely tinkering. How many times has the minister said today that she cannot do much because of the economic situation facing Canadians? She said it three times. Because of ten years of the Prime Minister's mismanagement and socialism that has brought this country to its knees, because of $150 million waste in the UIC, because of millions of dollars worth of government space going unoccupied, because of the worst economic mismanagement since confederation, this government cannot do much in the domain of—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Compare this administration with past administrations. What major piece of legislation has this government been able to bring before the Canadian people in ten years because of the worst—I say the same thing that the people back home are telling me—the worst economic mismanagement since confederation? Ten years of this Prime Minister's socialism has brought this country to its knees.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest that the hon. member get back to the bill under discussion, Bill C-5.

Mr. Grafftey: The hon. minister said today that because of the economic situation in the country, she could only tinker and bring in a $20 raise, or a $10 raise, or a six months' raise for old people and spouses. If this country is bleeding economically it is because of ten years of the worst economic mismanagement it has seen since confederation.

The New Democratic Party likes to lecture us about a social conscience. The minister has said on many occasions that this party does not have a social policy. We have a social policy, Mr. Speaker. One only has to look at it to see under our present leader how humane, decent and compassionate it is toward the handicapped, in the area of housing, the aged, etc. If we cannot do too much today, as the minister has admitted we cannot, it is the extravagance, waste, and economic mismanagement by this administration that has handicapped her.

We are a Progressive Conservative party—progressively humane and decent in social policies. Surely hon. members opposite must recognize that in order to invoke progressive, humane, social policies there must be conservative, expansive, and constructive economic policies. Under their economic mismanagement the pie has got smaller and smaller and smaller. Today, at the end of a dying parliament, supported by a government that would in the name of God go away, the minister is handicapped, handcuffed, and put in a corner and she can only get up and tinker.

[Translation]

I want to take this opportunity this afternoon to congratulate the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). Of course, the policy of our party—and the minister discussed this matter a few minutes ago—states that the partner of the 64-year old widow who is left behind after the death of her husband, at the age of 67 for instance, must receive what we call the spouse's allowance until she is 65.

[English]

I know that deep down the minister wishes she could pay the spouse's allowance earlier. Her arguments today were pretty good and she made a good defence on a sticky wicket. If this government had managed the economy properly the minister might be able to support the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Kingston-The Islands (Miss MacDonald). She is boxed in, however, and can only tinker as she has today.

[Translation]

It would be difficult for us to vote against an increase of $10 or $20 or against a six-month extension of benefits for widows, but government members will certainly admit that this is only a band-aid solution.

[English]

I challenge this government to name one significant social program it has invoked in the last ten years compared to those of previous administrations in this country. Just name one.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. member has the floor for the purpose of making a speech. I suggest we all listen to him.

Mr. Grafftey: The UIC is very apropos. We are told today that this great innovation of the present administration has shown a $150 million wastage in one year. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) now has to get up in the House of Commons and pretend she is doing something brilliant by offering a $20 increase in the GIS, a $10 increase in the GIS or an extension of six months for the spouse's allowance. Does the minister really think this is such a great innovation? Can she go to the people of Canada in this dying parliament—and thank God, it is dying—and say this is a great social—

Miss Bégin: Nobody said that.

Mr. Paproski: Yes, you did.

• (1742)

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister said three times in her speech that because of the economic situation in this country, this is all she can do for the old people and the handicapped. It is all she can do because of the economic mismanagment of this government, the worst economic mismanagement since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: By articulating Conservative economic programs we are confident that the pie will get bigger and bigger and we can help those people who need help in this land with progressive social programs.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: But in the name of God, until this government moves this will not happen. Because of economic mismanagement the government have embarrassed the hon. lady today.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: There has been millions of dollars of waste. Of course, the hon. lady is going to have rapid approval of this bill. What else can we do?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest we listen to the hon. member.

Mr. Grafftey: Of course the hon. lady will get rapid approval. This is certainly not enough, $20 here, $10 there, and an extension of six months. I know the hon. lady's social conscience well enough to know that she would have liked to do much more for the old people, the disabled and the handicapped of this country who are the very people who have suffered most.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: These are the very people who have suffered the most from the economic incompetence and waste of this government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: Of course she can count on our support, but we deplore the fact that in ten years no major social programs have been introduced on the floor of this House. We tell the Canadian people that only when this government goes and we have a chance to govern and make a bigger pie with our economic policy—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: —will we be able to invoke humane, decent, and progressive social policies.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker. But how much longer can anyone speak on a bill like this?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: Normally the lead speaker from this side of the House is allowed 40 minutes, but this bill only deserves ten minutes from the lead speaker. It is a band-aid, it is a sop, it is peanuts. And in the name of God this government must go so we can invoke progressive, constructive economic policies to help the disadvantaged people of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being 5.45 p.m., pursuant to an order adopted earlier today it is my duty to interrupt the hon. member in order that the House may proceed with the recorded division on Bill C-7.

[Mr. Grafftey.]

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80, and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Chrétien), which was agreed to on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. Speaker: It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6.15 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we have returned to the debate on the second reading of Bill C-5, which contains two proposed amendments to the Old Age Security Act. Sometimes I have the feeling that the very walls of this chamber must be so accustomed to speeches by me on the subject of pensions that those walls themselves should almost play my speeches back. But I hasten to assure not only the walls of this chamber but the members of this House that there are many more such speeches still to come.

If hon. members on the Liberal side imagine that they know what I am going to say about this bill, namely that it is good as far as it goes but that it does not go far enough, I assure them I will not disappoint them. That is precisely the position my party and I take respecting Bill C-5. The things which are in it are good and move in the right direction, but they do not go far enough. However, because the things in the bill move in the right direction, we shall be voting for it.

In view of the fact that the bill is set up in such a way that although the $20 increase in the guaranteed income supplement will not come into effect until January, 1979, but that the change with regard to the spouse's allowance will come into effect as soon as the bill has had royal assent, I feel the minister's request that we not delay the handling of this bill is one to which we ought to respond. It is my hope that the various stages through which the bill must go will not take very long.

Before I talk about the bill itself, the things in it which are good and the failure of the bill to go far enough, I confess I want to say a few words about the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). I realize that opposition members, to be in character, must see no good in any member of the present cabinet. It is not very difficult to take that stance in respect of most of the members of the cabinet. But there are two or three—I do not think I would go much higher than that, though there may be four—who, in my view, have their priorities straightened out. One of those ministers is the present Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope that is not the kiss of death; I would not want to do that to her!

If the rumours are correct that a cabinet shuffle is in prospect, I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) will not move the present minister. I have noted with intense interest the speeches she has made. In fact, I have read, if not in full, certainly I have scanned them, all of the speeches she has been making all over the country, and it is clear that she is aware or has become aware of the shortcomings of some of our social programs. She is proud of the programs that have been put in place, and she has the right to be proud, but her awareness of the inequity of income distribution, her awareness of the high proportion of our people who are in the lower income brackets, and particularly her awareness of the difficult time that many of our older people are having, make her one whose voice in the cabinet is very important.

The spokesman for the official opposition who took part in this debate just before the vote we took at 5.45 referred to the fact that the Minister of National Health and Welfare is limited by the policies of the government in what she can do. It was a critical statement he made, but I think even that criticism carried with it the implication that if she could do better, she would.

I compliment the minister on the speeches she has been making and on the efforts she has been putting forth to try to win some significant improvements in our social legislation. I have referred to her discovery about the large numbers of our people who are in the lower income brackets. She had something to say about that this afternoon.

I want also to refer to her discovery—and maybe this comes about because before she was in this department she had the portfolio of the minister of national revenue—that our income tax structure is one in which there is a host of hidden benefits for the wealthy. She has made a move to counter that by winning certain changes in respect of family allowance payments, and we will get to that when we get to another bill. Her proposal, even if it is in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), that there be income tax credits—and by "credits" we understand that to mean not just figures on a page somewhere, but actual dollars being paid out—granted to persons whose incomes are below certain levels is an indication of the awareness of the minister that there is an awful lot that is wrong with our income tax structure. It is, as I say, full of hidden benefits which exemplify the biblical statement that to them that hath is given. I commend her for having made a start in that direction.

I was interested in her reference this afternoon to the guaranteed annual income or to a negative income tax, or something like that. It was in character for her to blame the provinces for not having been willing to agree to it, but at least she is aware of that sort of thing.

I have no hesitation in commending the minister for the speeches she has been making and for the battling she must have had to do in cabinet to get some improvements in social legislation at this time. After all, the government tells us this is a time of restraint, and there are cuts being made, all over the place. If in such an atmosphere one minister is able to bring before the House an increase in certain social payments, it is obvious she did not accomplish that by suggesting it just once; she must have had to fight for it for a long time. I commend her for that, and if she can stand life in that cabinet much longer I hope she wins further gains.

I want also to commend the minister for taking the time this afternoon to dispel some of the myths about pensions and pension policies. I think she dispelled only two or three this afternoon, but she made at least one speech in which she lists seven of them and dispels them all. I am glad she took the time to point out that the campagin some people wage against pension indexing is completely without foundation. She was quite clear on that, and that just as other members of our society have the right to expect an increase in their incomes to keep up with the rising cost of living and, perchance, to keep up with a rising standard of living, that right should also be extended to pensioners.

I am glad that she took the time to point out that the arguments some people make that if we keep on doing so much for pensioners—and those words "so much" are not mine, but words other people have used—the day will come when everybody will be my age or older and there will not be anybody left to do the work. The minister gave statistics this afternoon to set that right. I have said many times in this House that perhaps the best legislation the Parliament of Canada has passed in my lifetime has been legislation in the social field. I am not going to give that fatherly or avuncular lecture I sometimes give about conditions as they were before I came to this House, but I will take a moment to say that I did have the good fortune of being alive and active in the 1930s, so I have a memory of what life was like for older people before there was extensive government intervention to see that they got their rights.

I happened to be just 34 years of age when I came to this place back in 1942, and it was not very long after, largely because I succeeded the late J. S. Woodsworth who had something to do with the first old age pension legislation, that I became a spokesman for the older generation of that day. Now that my friends who were in their thirties when I came here are, along with me, members of the older generation, I am glad and honoured still to be one of their spokesmen.

So, Mr. Speaker, even though as a member of the opposition I am supposed to get up and condemn any minister for what was said at the beginning of a speech, I have to say that to me it was a delight to sit here this afternoon and hear the minister speak with pride about our pension legislation, to make it clear that it is here to stay, that things like indexing have to continue and that we have to continue to make other improvements for our older people.

There is no doubt that we have done a lot in the years since I first came here. In those years about all we were doing—and it took all of our efforts—was trying to get the amount of the opinion increased. When I came here the pension was only $20 a month payable at age 70 and then only with a means test. For years we worked hard on getting the amount increased, on getting the eligible age brought down and on winning universality. We have moved on from that to hospitalization and medicare, first for older people and now for everybody. We have moved on to housing for our senior citizens. I am particularly proud of the good job that was done in that field in my province during the years that Premier Schreyer was the leader of the government. We have established programs like, "New Horizons" and we have made all sorts of changes that have really been revolutionary.

I said that I was not going to repeat some of the things which I have said so many times here, but at this point I feel I have to say again that I well remember those days when our parents or our grandparents were at home in the back room, kept alive but that is all. They were not out in society They did not have clothes to wear or car fare. Car fare was something you spent on streetcars in those days, in case some members come from cities where they do not have streetcars.

Today many older people have their own apartments, and even if they are at bingo, at least they are out. I saw a sticker on a car the other day that I thought was very interesting. It said, "Support bingo, keep grandma off the street." I say that in the jest which the sticker intended, but I think that even in reciting it I can convey to hon. members—in fact, I am trying to impress upon them—that we have changed quite radically the life of our older generations. It just does not compare, the life of older citizens today, with what it was when I first became active in public affairs. To me this parliament has been worth it, to me our party has been worth it, if we have done nothing else. To me the years I have spent here have been worth while even if that was all we had achieved.

If I am taking a moment or two like this to speak with pride about what we have done, it is not just to be historical; it is because I am terribly concerned that there be no retreat from that position, that there be no rolling back. Every time I hear talk about privatizing or cutting government expenditure or the government getting out of the economy, I get afraid of what some of us knew and experienced when the government was not in the economy in the way it is today. I was delighted to listen to the speech which the hon. minister made this afternoon, and she has my support and backing as she continues to try to get social improvements out of the cabinet of which she is a member.

Having said that, sir, I should like now to get to the terms of the bill. I said at the start that members opposite knew before I began what I would say, namely, that the things that are in the bill are good but they do not go far enough. Certainly the $20 per month increase, whether it is $20 for a single pensioner or whether it is $20 for both partners of a married couple, is good. It still leaves many of our people on levels below the poverty line, but the $20 increase is good. I was delighted when I realized, soon after the announcement was made, that the minister won that as $20 across the board for those receiving the guaranteed income supplement, that it was not graded in some way. In other words, if a person is getting $50 or $60 guaranteed income supplement he still gets the $20; or if a person is getting only $1 guaranteed income supplement he still gets $20. Well, Mr. Speaker, let there be no doubt about it—and I am saying this on the opposition side of the House—that is good.

So, what is wrong with the bill if it is so good? Nothing is wrong with it, it is just what it does not do. The minister said this afternoon that 60 per cent of the people of my generation, a generation which is over 65, have little or nothing else. That is attested to by the fact that they qualify for guaranteed income supplement. I have been boasting about what parliament has done in the 40 or 50 years that I have been following these matters, but when 60 per cent of our older people have for their retirement only what they get from old age security and the guaranteed income supplement, this is a terrible condemnation of our economy, of our so-called private enterprise.

These are the people who have worked to build up this country and have made their contribution, and they now have to rely on so little, and they have to listen to speeches about the desirability of privatizing things and getting the government out of the economy. That being the case, that 60 per cent of our older citizens have so little else that they qualify for all or part of the guaranteed income supplement, I want to remind the minister that there is another bracket just above that where people are also in trouble. I am glad that she is by this legislation in effect raising the ceiling.

My arithmetic, which I hope is not far out, shows that when this plan is in full flight the 60 per cent will probably be 65 per cent, the 100,000 or so that were to be added. That 65 per cent of our older citizens have nothing else; they gain nothing because of the greatness of this private enterprise economy, but they are taken care of at the level of old age security and guaranteed income supplement provided for in the legislation of this parliament.

But just above that 65 per cent there will be another, I would guess, 20 per cent of older citizens who are in difficulty. The top 10 per cent or 15 per cent of those of us who are 65 years of age or older are all right. I am basing that statement on statistics that have been produced from time to time by the minister's own department. Quite frankly, I think 10 per cent is quite generous, but people between that 65 per cent level and the 90 per cent figure, another 25 per cent or 400,000 or 500,000 older Canadians—we are not talking just about a few, we are talking about 400,000 or 500,000—have just enough other income that they do not qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. There are certain benefits and perquisites that adhere to the guaranteed income supplement which these people do not get.

I wish, with the skill she has shown in getting money out of a cabinet that is cutting back and in getting something done about some of the unfairnesses in our income tax laws, she would give her attention to that group of people.

I know my simple solution has been rejected, that is, to raise the basic amount of old age security and adjust income tax so that the few at the top will have to pay most of it back. I make that proposal time and time again and I will go on making it, although it is difficult to win. In the meantime, there is that group of Canadian senior citizens, that group from 65 per cent to 90 per cent, which is about 25 per cent of the two million—that is, 400,000 or 500,000—who are having a rough time. They do not all write to me, but many do and they describe their difficulties. That is what is wrong with this bill; it does not meet the needs of those people.

The minister can say to me that she could not get that much money out of the cabinet and could not get a universal increase across the board. I enjoyed the way she told us this afternoon that what the government is doing can be done out of government revenues without any new tax. That is true. It is interesting, however, that every time over the years I have proposed pension increases the government has said to me: "Look at what it would cost; certain new taxes would have to be imposed." When the government decides on increases that amount to a few hundred million dollars, however, all of a sudden taxes do not have to be raised.

I hope the minister will find some way to persuade her cabinet colleagues that further things should be done. I know they cannot be done in Bill C-5. This parliament is not over yet, however, although it has not very many months left. I plead that she give thought to that group of 500,000 senior Canadians who are between those two points, 65 per cent and 90 per cent of the senior citizens of Canada.

I stand by and repeat the plea that I have been making in this place since the early 1940s—that pensions should be universal without a means test and that the amount should be a lot higher.

The clock always seems to move faster when I am speaking than at any other time, Mr. Speaker, so I had better get on to the other aspect of this bill.

The bill also provides for a continuing for six months of the spouse's allowance in the case where a younger spouse has lost the pensioner or older spouse. There is no doubt it is a good thing that is being done. Every month between 200 and 250 persons in Canada, most of them women, have this experience. Every month in Canada 200 to 250 persons, mostly women, lose the older spouse and the spouse's allowance. Indeed, the pension, the whole works, is suddenly cut off. That is one of the reasons I am glad to see this part of the bill is not designed to come into effect in January, but instead as soon as the bill has had royal assent. Let us get it over to the other place and hope they will not treat this pension bill as they used to treat pension bill years ago.

That just solves the problem for some of the 200 to 250 persons, not all of them. It solves it for those aged 64½ until they reach 65, but what about the woman who becomes a widow at age 61 or 62? She gets another six months' pension and then has to go on welfare.

I think what is wrong with the minister's defence of this is that she puts the whole business of spouse's allowance in the context of its having been desirable for the government to solve the problem of two persons trying to live on one pension. She now says that in that context what she is doing is valid, that it does not destroy that, that it does not start giving pensions to widows or single persons. But I still feel and I felt at the time that the whole basis of the spouse's allowance that was passed in this House in June, 1975, and came into effect in October, 1975, was basically wrong when it established a marital test.

This House knows how opposed I am to a means test by whatever name it is called. But I would rather provide a pension between ages 60 and 65 on a means test or needs test basis, if you cannot make it universal or available to all those out of the labour market, which is the way I would do it. Surely the single person, the widowed person, the divorced person, is just as much in need and has as much right to be on a pension with honour and decency, rather than on welfare, as the woman who can say she got a man—this business of saying to a woman between the age of 60 and 65, "If you are single or alone you cannot get a pension; that pension with all its prestige and honour is only for you if you have got a man who is over age 65."

I cannot blame the minister; she was not in the department at that time. I think she was parliamentary secretary to some other ministry and although parliamentary secretaries have certain advantages they have the disadvantage of having to keep quiet about a lot of things. So I cannot blame her.

The minister said one thing this afternoon that I rather liked when she indicated that this was a step which is resolving one problem connected with the spouse's allowance. The problem of the spouse's allowance will not be solved until it is replaced in its entirety by a pension for persons between the age of 60 and 65 on some basis—some basis that does not have a marital test. That is completely wrong. My answer is a universal pension available, if you will, to all persons between ages 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market—universally available, I do not mean universally paid, as it is, to those over 65. That is my answer. If that is too costly and the government is not prepared to do that, then, certainly between ages 60 and 65 the government should make it available to all persons who are in need.

Even the spouse's allowance, the key to which is the marital test, also has a means test with it. I know the spouse's allowance works both ways and the same deal applies to a young man with an older woman for a wife as vice versa, but in 80 per cent of the cases of marriage in this country, the husband is older, and in 90 per cent or perhaps 95 per cent of the cases where the spouse's allowance is applied for, there is a younger wife. I have had lots of complaints from widows who became widowed between ages 60 and 65, but I have never had a letter from a man saying; "My old woman died and I lost the spouse's allowance."

Miss MacDonald: I had three.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I guess those 60 to 65-year-old men are more interested in Flora than in me!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) who has heard from three men in that age bracket has heard from many times that number of women. That's what this spouse's allowance is, a program of pensions for women between ages 60 and 65 but only for those women who can say they have a man. I am putting it that way rather than in the more formal way of saying they are married and living with a spouse—because it is so ridiculous.

This lifelong advocate of universal pensions, this lifelong opponent of means and needs tests, stands here tonight and says a needs test for everyone between ages 60 and 65 would be infinitely better than the marital test that is there now.

I do not expect the Minister of National Health and Welfare to accomplish a miracle and get this bill amended before it is passed. The present parliament can last only another few months, however, and it would take a lot of hard work on her part to get something more. But I think she would like to have some legislation about next spring that would boost the Liberal stock in the coming election. I suggest she could do that and in fact she might even become leader of the Liberal party—

Miss Bégin: Minister of Finance would be okay.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —if she could get out of the government by next spring an amendment to the Old Age Security Act that would provide pensions for those between 60 and 65 without any marital test but simply on the basis of a needs test, so that the single woman or the single man or the divorced woman or the divorced man or the widow who is already a widow or the spouse who becomes a widow will get the pension on the basis of need and not because of this really cruel, mean and ridiculous test that is there now.

I suppose what I have done, Mr. Speaker, is to fill those walls up there with more of my words on pensions. The issue never really gets resolved. We have done well over the years. I have said it many times and I have said it in my speech tonight that the things being done in this bill are good; they move in the right direction. I give my plaudits to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I hope my colleagues will not criticize me for doing that. Anyone who gets anything out of this tight-fisted cabinet at this time deserves credit.

I hope she will keep at it and soon get changes in the Old Age Security Act that will do something for the 500,000 Canadians I referred to who have just enough that they do not get guaranteed income supplement, but not really enough to cope with today's rising cost of living. I hope she will do something for the women of this country between the ages of 60 and 65 who deserve better than they are getting under the spouse's allowance as it now stands.

I congratulate the minister for what she has done. I wish her well as she tries to win more for the senior citizens of this country.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, it is not that easy to speak after such an eloquent speech by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Frankly speaking, it was in sharp contrast with what we heard just prior to the adjournment at six o'clock. The hon. member was quite right in congratulating the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for managing to get that improvement to the Old Age Security Act. You will not be surprised, Mr. Speaker, nor will my colleagues in this House if we support this bill.

Ever since we have been elected in this House—and I have personally been here for over 16 years now—my colleagues and I have not stopped calling for amendments to that act to provide a better retirement for senior citizens. As early as 1966 I introduced a motion in the House. I did not have the right to introduce a bill but I introduced a motion, and I think I was the first one to put that idea forward in that fashion in the House. Had it been passed at the time, that motion would have had the effect of giving the pension to all spouses of pensioners and it was in that period that we saw the age of retirement gradually reduced from 70 to 65. It was denied in 1966. I came back on several occasions without having the opportunity in each session to defend that view. But I had an opportunity to do so in 1974, and I came back with the idea.

If I remember well, it was in 1974 that the government started talking about being more flexible on that aspect of the Old Age Security Act. When the government softened its position on that act and recognized that a spouse in need would have access to the pension even under age 65, that is from 60 to 65, well, we applauded that amendment to the Old Age Security Act. But I would have preferred to have that amendment applied to all spouses because it must be recognized that there are not that many spouses below 60. But there are some. Last Monday as I was doing some office work in a city in my riding, Amos, I came across such a case. A lady of 52 whose husband is 66—and that is a fairly wide gap in ages—is not entitled to her pension or any pension of any kind, and that couple must live on the pension he receives from the federal government and a small pension under the Quebec Pension Plan. It amounts to just about what might be given to them by the Quebec Department of Social Affairs. Yet those people will receive less than what a 65-year old couple now gets under the old age security legislation.

Mr. Speaker, people in that kind of situation find it very difficult to make a living and the situation might not be solved before several years. When we urge the minister and the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to increase pension funds and to make it accessible to all spouses they always say that the provinces should take care of those people through their social welfare programs. Being aware of the meanness of some provinces concerning those people and the socially handicapped I think that a large percentage or our people are living under the poverty level and I am talking now about the province of Quebec.

The minister said that even with the old age security many senior citizens, a high percentage of senior citizens are living under the poverty level because their pension cannot cover their basic needs in these times of steadily rising costs. But what about couples where both spouses must live in a home for senior citizens when only one of them gets a pension? And what about those socially handicapped under 65 who are unable to work because of disability or illness and who must live on a small welfare allowance?

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that those people are living in dire poverty and that they find it even more difficult to cope with the cost of living than those who can defend themselves like organized workers in powerful unions. We certainly approve this $20 increase, particularly for couples and persons living alone but if we grant that increase to a single person, for instance, I think we should have given twice that amount to couples living together as obviously it costs them more to make a living. May be it does not cost them twice as much but there is a significant difference and this is something which people will not understand and which is rather difficult to admit.

In her presentation this afternoon the Minister of National Health and Welfare eloquently managed to describe the increase as if it is going to be almost a fortune which will save all those people from misery. I think this is just a catch-up allowance because the quarterly adjustments to the old age security pension in recent years have always lagged behind soaring prices so that there has always been a deficit in income for old age pensioners.

The $20 increase they get today or next January is only a catch-up allowance. I want now to deal with another aspect of the bill: after the death of a spouse they will continue to pay the old age security pension for six months to the surviving partner who is still under 60. I wonder why six months instead of nine months. That would have made more sense if they did not want to continue until 65. It is as if this government is trying to govern on a temporary basis.

We have seen the sales tax abolished for six months. Now we are authorizing the continued payment of pensions for six months before the next elections which will probably be coming six months from now. The minister would have brought much more applause not only from members in this House but from all senior citizens across Canada had the pension continued until age 65 to all spouses of deceased pensioners. As I said earlier, without producing at this point a whole set of figures, I believe the cost would not be so huge, and although the Minister of National Health and Welfare made serious efforts to obtain that increase from her cabinet colleagues she will have to keep on pressing for something that would completely satisfy all senior citizens.

My feeling is that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) meets with much more success with his cabinet colleagues than does the Minister of National Health and Welfare when it comes to increasing every year the interest share we have to pay on the national debt. He has no difficulty obtaining that, because this year the increase is $1.5 billion.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare would have to keep pressing her cabinet colleagues for their needed attention to get that pension without a means test, a very sad situation I believe the minister is aware of. If she does not, maybe she is not in the field often enough to know what goes on. A very sad situation. Every week I meet with a number of senior citizens and it is very sad indeed to find out people who worked all their lives, people who saved to put something aside, either a private pension fund, a bank account or an income producing property. Because of those savings, they are not entitled to the guaranteed income supplement. They feel penalized because they saved. Over and above having paid taxes when they were working and paying taxes on the interests or income from their savings, they are now penalized for allegedly having money. Mr. Speaker, this is very hard to understand and to accept for people who worked and managed to save some money.

I submitted these points to the minister so she could study them carefully and plead this cause with her colleagues for solving this situation once and for all. It is all very nice to say, as my colleague from Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and some other of my colleagues here, that we make two or three fresh attempts each session to drive the nail home, to get this idea across, it is all very nice to say that, but I think that instead of discussing these matters we could be debating other matters just as important, if this question were settled once and for all. So I think that in the present debate we will support it as soon as possible. There is at least one thing I am happy about, contrary to what was done in the past, this bill was not brought forward three or four days before Christmas. It was presented early enough in the session to be studied properly, referred to committee and given third reading so it will become law as soon as possible, that is to say, in January. As to continuing payments after the death of the spouse, let it be adopted as soon as possible.

We wish to assure the minister of our co-operation and support and we want to tell her that we expect even more from her, that she will have to work even harder.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to have this opportunity to participate in the second reading debate on this bill to amend the Old Age Security Act. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, I consider this legislation as important and even essential. I think that many have overlooked the significance of this measure and in my speech I would like to rouse deeper interest in this question which is of concern to us all.

This measure is important because to our senior citizens it is an indication of our constant concern about their needs and their welfare, even in a period of budget restrictions. We owe it to ourselves to be aware of the plight of those of our senior citizens who have problems and urgent needs. By increasing the guaranteed income supplement, we prove in a concrete way to our senior fellow Canadians that our commitment toward their welfare will stand.

We as members of the House have to deal with bills which sometimes need to be explained. This bill was remarkably explained this afternoon by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and I understand that members of the Opposition have also given other necessary explanations. This bill is important, Mr. Speaker, because as it was pointed out this evening for the first time it will enable many old age pensioners to rise above the threshold of poverty. Of course it is difficult to define poverty which can be quite subjective. Some consider themselves poor with incomes that others consider comfortable. In addition, strictly in terms of income the needs of people vary, depending on whether a person lives in a city, in a village or even in the country. We also have in Canada different levels of incomes and needs according to the areas of our country. This is why the definition of the threshold of poverty is more than arbitrary.

• (2102)

Nevertheless, there have been some measures established which are very useful. Statistics Canada has published such a measure of low income, beginning in 1973. This is based on the premise that families which spend more than 63 per cent of their income on basic necessities such as food, clothing and shelter are considered to have low incomes. These levels vary by size of area of residence, with the lowest level corresponding to rural areas, and the level gradually increases with the size of area of residence.

Since Statistics Canada figures are always retrospective—the latest ones are for 1977—we have to make some assumptions about the growth rate of these poverty lines, but if we assume that the consumer price index for 1978 rises about 9 per cent over 1977 and that the low income level rises at the same rate, we find that a pensioned couple will for the first time be up to the Statistics Canada poverty line even if they have no income apart from their basic old age security and guaranteed income supplement or spouse's allowance. There are about 40,000 couples in this group. Those with incomes from other sources such as the Canada Pension Plan or private pensions will be better off than this.

Some people will suggest, of course, that $20 is not very much. They may not appreciate how tight the budget is for some senior citizens, and this extra amount may be the difference between not quite making it and having enough to get by.

[Translation]

The increase will not be enough to enable pensioners living alone to rise above the poverty line but it will certainly contribute to improving their lot and they will go from 74 to 80 per cent according to the standards of Statistics Canada itself. Pensioners living alone are faced with a particularly difficult situation because unlike married couples or those who qualify they do not share the cost of rent, property taxes, heat and food. One interesting feature of this bill is that unattached pensioners covered by the guaranteed income supplement will receive the same $20 monthly increase as married pensioners.

Since this $20 increase will be most helpful to our senior citizens, I would like to comment briefly on provincial programs which will be affected by this measure. Mr. Speaker, some provinces pay additional benefits to GIS recipients. This extra amount—known as "gain" in my province—adds to their income so that they can at least meet their needs. Given the higher supplement proposed in Bill C-5, there is a possibility of conflict. Should a province not change its ceiling on income level, it would thus deprive many of its senior citizens of this increase. Some provinces sometimes reduce their own contribution to the guaranteed income supplement when there is an increase in the federal benefit. A few moments ago I was talking with the minister to know whether she had received from the provinces the assurance that they would leave that increase to those who really need it. She told me that she did receive that assurance from only two provinces, British Columbia and Ontario, and I congratulate them on that. I hope the other provinces will do the same.

As for housing, Mr. Speaker, the minister also confirmed a moment ago that she had not received from any province the assurance that they would not touch that increase in order perhaps to replenish their coffers or help fill their deficits in housing. And that I find regrettable. I would like the provinces to show as much generosity to try and understand that needy people do need that increase today because of the galloping inflation we now have in this country. Anyway I hope they will avoid the old practice, namely that you have to erode an increase when needy people do need it.

[English]

Another potential problem is presented by old age pensioners who reside in institutions. As I understand it, it is a common practice in most provinces to charge residents a proportion of their pension to cover room and board, leaving them with a portion for personal expenses which is called a comfort allowance. Concern has been expressed about these pensioners residing in institutions. I realize that this is a very complex issue. Practices vary from province to province and there are situations where comfort allowances become meaningless because of the physical or mental impairment of residents. However, I hope as far as possible this increase will be permitted to help augment the personal funds of pensioners in institutions.

I might mention also the situation of pensioners living in subsidized rental accommodation. I hope they will be allowed to benefit from this extra $20 a month and that there will not be a rise in their rents to take advantage of this benefit.

I have mentioned the importance of the GIS increase to pensioners. I think we should not ignore this importance as an economic stimulus. An extra $290 million a year will be in the hands of low income elderly Canadians who will be able to purchase more in the way of basic consumer goods. We know they will be spending this money and in helping them we shall be helping producers and retailers as well.

I turn now to the other amendment which is contained in this bill. Its cost to the taxpayer is not nearly as great but it is also a valuable improvement to the program, one which will provide relief for recipients of spouse's allowance who are faced with a particularly distressing situation.

[Translation]

Most hon. members know that the spouse's allowance paid the younger spouse of an old age security pensioner lapses upon the latter's death. That is a problem the government had foreseen and accepted when those allowances were first paid, because it is inherent in the nature of the program which itself is limited. I am happy that the minister found a way to improve the tragic situation which must faced by the recipient who, in addition to losing one he or she holds dear, suddenly also loses the financial assistance afforded by the allowance.

[English]

The logic of the spouse's allowance is very straightforward. The families with which this benefit is concerned have a direct connection with old age security through the pensioner's spouse and it is reasonable that their immediate income needs should basically be met through this program. I do not agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when he says it is a marital criterion. I repeat, it has a direct connection with the old age security program. It did not make much sense that a couple receiving the old age security pension might also have to seek provincial social assistance to meet basic income needs.

There are many others in the 60 to 65 bracket who are not eligible for this allowance, including widowed, separated and single persons, and married couples where neither spouse is old enough to qualify for old age security benefits. Also their needs are important, and the minister has expressed her concern on many occasions for such groups and for other Canadians in vulnerable circumstances. But as they do not have this direct and current connection with the old age security program, it seems reasonable that their needs should be met through other programs.

This is a very important point to understand about the spouse's allowance. I have heard a number of criticisms of this program, but almost all of them are criticisms of other programs, most particularly the present system of provincial social assistance. Really they are stating that other programs are not as adequate, effective or attractive as the spouse's allowance and the old age security program in general.

Undoubtedly the good example set by programs like old age security and the spouse's allowance shows that efforts toward general improvements in the over-all Canadian system of social security must continue. But it upsets me to see good programs being criticized essentially because they are better than other parts of the current system.

Because the spouse's allowance is a limited program, however, it has been necessary to terminate the benefit if the younger spouse's connection to the old age security program is terminated, whether it be by separation or divorce, or by the death of the pensioner. We could not in fairness continue this benefit indefinitely when there are no further ties to the old age security program. It would not be fair to do so when so many others in the 60 to 64 age group in similar situations who would also like to benefit from the Old Age Security Act must be told that they are not yet eligible.

On the other hand, the wrenching, emotional experience of widowhood and financial loss is something that we all must sympathize with. The six-month extension proposed by the minister will help those caught in this situation, without going against the essential principle underlying the entire program.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I know many hon. members would like us to do even more than what is provided in this bill; I share their concern and wish to help their compatriots. But we cannot use the old age security program to solve all old age security problems in all social areas in Canada. Those problems can only be solved by improving other sectors of social security; I am confident that they can and will be solved. I shall mention only the initiatives already taken, through the changes made in family allowances and the income tax act we shall probably be looking into within the next few days, to help families generally through increases, changes in structure, changes in the programs and in the income tax act.

[Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier).]

[English]

I would be guilty of exaggeration if I stated that the old age security program is perfect; it does not pretend to be. But it has been adapted to meet many of the changing needs of Canadian society. Let us look at the changes made to the program over the last 15 years. In 1965 the old age security program provided a flat rate benefit of $75 per month for Canadians aged 70 or over. Today, whether retired from the active work force or not, a Canadian aged 65 who meets the residence requirements will receive a basic old age security benefit of up to $164.74 a month. This is an indexed benefit which is revised quarterly to reflect rises in the cost of living and to maintain its purchasing power.

As well, the pensioner with little or no additional income can qualify for a guaranteed income supplement, which now amounts to as much as $102.61 per month for a married individual and $115.55 for a single pensioner. Soon this will be more. The spouse's allowance is also income tested and currently provides for the payment of up to $267.35 each month to the younger spouse aged 60 to 64 of an old age security pensioner. A retired couple in Canada can now receive monthly benefits of as much as $534.70 from the old age security program alone, and with the increase proposed, this amount will be more than $20 higher in January of 1979.

[Translation]

The cost of improving benefits is not negligeable. But the importance of the program in meeting the needs of our old people is, I am sure, understood by all. That is why we shall continue seeking to further improve our old age security program, for instance, through the higher income supplements and broader spouse allowances as contained in this bill, without ever forgetting exactly where old age security fits in the context of our over-all Canadian social security system, through which we must continue to meet the needs of all Canadians.

[English]

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great care to what the minister said this afternoon because I do not think there is a member among us who is not concerned with social legislation and policy. I am sure the minister will not be surprised if I say to her that I do not expect to be quite so fulsome in my praise as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Nevertheless, I am tremendously interested in this bill and in what the minister has proposed.

Every member in the House is interested in the social legislation which comes before us, in any piece of legislation which provides some kind of betterment for those Canadians whose lot is more difficult than it is for most of us. I listened to what the minister had to say and how she explained what she considered to be the major positive thrust of the bill, the increase of $20 a month in the guaranteed income supplement. Also I listened as she gingerly picked her way around the proposed six-month extension to the spouse's allowance, trying to find a rationale for a program which was discriminatory when put into effect and remains discriminatory to this day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss MacDonald: I listened with wry amusement to her tribute to indexation of pensions, and I wondered how often the Liberal party could swallow itself. I recall the Hon. John Turner's tremendous and strong denunciation of the principle of indexation when it was first voiced by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield).

The two major proposals in this bill are the increase in the guaranteed income supplement and the extension of the spouse's allowance for six months after the death of the elder spouse. Of those two major proposals, I should like to deal specifically with the second one, because it has been an ongoing concern with me since the spouse's allowance legislation was first introduced in the House.

Perhaps the minister will remember that on May 3, 1978 I put forward a motion in the House on behalf of my party which read as follows:

That, in the opinion of this House, the social policy of the government contains severe inequities for elderly Canadians, and in particular the House considers the practice of terminating the spouse's allowance after the death of the older marriage partner to be cruel and unjust.

● (2122)

That was a motion put forward on May 3 of this year. What did government members do on that occasion? They voted against it. They voted in that way because they really did not believe that the termination of the spouse's allowance on the death of the elder partner was cruel and unjust. That is what they said in voting in that way.

That debate, as the minister will remember, was about inequities for elderly Canadians, and in particular it concentrated on the plight of elderly Canadian women. Over and over again in this House I have asked questions and raised the subject of the plight of elderly women and the poverty in which many of them live.

One may ask why I should focus on elderly women. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has already made the point that the spouse's allowance applies far more to women than it does to men. I do not want to deny that many elderly men live in poverty and, indeed, there are even a few men, as I said earlier, who are victims of the cruel removal of the spouse's allowance, and I have heard from some of them. However, the fact remains that it is women who live longer, with the result that there are more widows than widowers.

These women who in their younger years remain in the home looking after the children with no access to a continuing income or a pension plan are the women who in later years, elderly, poor and deprived, have been referred to in this country as the poorest of the poor. This is borne out by the statistics which I am sure the minister knows.

Statistics show that back in the early 1970s, of the widowed population of this country between ages 55 and 65 there were only 1,600 men with no income but there were 18,000 women in the same situation. Statistics show there were some 4,000 men on welfare as compared to 40,000 women. That is why it is the elderly women and their plight in which I am particularly interested, and I want to focus particularly on the spouse's allowance provisions of this bill because spouse's allowance applies particularly to women.

I remember when the bill introducing the spouse's allowance was discussed in committee back in 1975. At that time I expressed my concern about the discriminatory nature of the spouse's allowance and pointed out that it did not cover all of those who should be entitled to it. I particularly asked the minister at that time what he had against widows, and what he had against the people who were being denied the benefits of this program, those people who were already widows and could not apply for the spouse's allowance. I said to him at that time:

What we are doing in this bill is saying that if you have the good fortune to still have your husband alive, and you are between 60 and 65, you benefit by getting a spouse's allowance, but if you had the misfortune to lose your husband, then you are not going to be eligible for such an income.

I reiterate what I then said:

I find that to be entirely discriminatory. I just cannot understand the rationale of it.

I feel compelled to put on record what I said in committee at that time regarding the spouse's allowance program. I do so because on another occasion earlier in this year—one of a number of occasions when I spoke about this matter in the House—the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) tried to distort my concerns. She attributed my interest in the plight of elderly women to the fact that it had become fashionable to do so. This is what she said:

I did not hear her speaking about older people, older women in particular. After a few very good reports were published by some outside groups, it suddenly became a fad to be talking about the issue. We then heard her voice.

That is what she said as recorded at page 5119 of Hansard of May 3, 1978. I want to tell the minister that she had not heard my voice on this subject before because she was not listening. Those who have been listening have heard me speak on this matter over a long time. I want to tell her, as she leaves the chamber that it is—

Miss Bégin: I have not left the chamber. You just say what you have to say.

Miss MacDonald: I shall continue.

An hon. Member: As the minister leaves the chamber.

Miss MacDonald: I want to say to the minister, as she leaves the chamber, that it is not just a fad, and it is not enough to use the word "fad" when you are referring to the plight of elderly women in this country. It is not a fad to those people who have to put up with poverty and deprivation. It is not enough to use the word "fashionable"; it is something which has only now come to her attention. These things have been going on for a long time but what really concerns me is when the minister allows words like "fad" and "fashionable" to creep into her vocabulary with regard to the plight of elderly women. I have to question her concerns as to how deep and genuine they are.

Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I have been following the minister's speeches outside this chamber. I have been reading them with some interest. I noticed that she spoke a week ago to the Canadian Association of Gerontology in Edmonton, and it was with a certain amount of scepticism that I read that speech. The minister said in Edmonton:

What we need is nothing less than a new deal for the aged.

I agree that those are fine words "a new deal for the aged". Then she said:

I don't intend to slip away from the challenge that the question of old people puts to the federal government.

She spoke of a new deal and a challenge in Edmonton on Saturday, and then on the following Monday in Ottawa the minister introduced the bill we are now debating, a bill to extend the spouse's allowance for six months. Well, that is some deal—and some challenge.

The new deal for the aged means, according to the minister, that instead of running to the welfare office when her spouse dies, the former recipient of the spouse's allowance can now walk very slowly. That seems to be what the new deal means, and I suppose that is the government's idea of how the spouse retains her dignity and her self-worth. But the department's letter to the spouse will remain the same. Whether it is on the date of the death of the spouse or six months later, she will be told the same thing. She will be told in heartless, cold prose that her allowance is through, that her income is terminated. Unless the widow is 64½ years old and can get her own pension when that six months is up, she will be on her own living with her poverty, scrounging for some kind of support. That is what she is up against, and there are many of them.

An hon. Member: The minister says she will have her estate.

Miss MacDonald: The minister asked in Edmonton:

Who are the old people? What do we owe them?

I can tell the House what seems to be her answer, and that is "Not very much". The minister has come into the House to claim that it is the first objective of the government to concentrate on the basic needs of old people. I thought the first objective of the government, as shown earlier this week, was to borrow money. She went on to say we must work—- —to ensure that all old people receive enough financial support in order to have a decent life.

● (2132)

I am not sure what the minister considers a decent life, but certainly for the widow who loses her husband and her allowance as well as her husband's pension when he dies or six months later—it makes very little difference—a decent life is denied her completely. The minister must remember that that spouse became a recipient of a pension because she was in need in the first place. She did not have a decent life and so she applied for the spouse's allowance.

I cannot understand it when the minister says that she will be guaranteed, or will carry on, a decent life. I think it is simple justice for the government to add $20 a month to the guaranteed income supplement, thus easing the financial plight of 1.2 million pensioners. Certainly I and my party support that, as stated earlier, and it has been incorporated in our party's welfare policy. But I have to ask: If it had not been for the economic mismanagement of this government, would that not have taken place long ago?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Allmand: What about the big homeowner?

Miss MacDonald: For the widow who loses her spouse's allowance and her husband's pension, just think what that increase to the guaranteed income supplement means, that $20 a month increase. That increase means that she is denied an additional $20. That is what it means. It means that her income would have been increased by $20 a month, but because she now loses the income, she loses the increase as well. No, that $20 will not help the widow lead a decent life. It will not help the widow who is 60 to 65 one bit.

The news release covering this bill stated that because of the six month extension of the spouse's allowance "a financial bridge will exist to the widowed spouse until more permanent arrangements can be made". The minister put out that news release very carefully. I looked at the words and that is what it said, that the extension of the spouse's allowance will mean that a financial bridge will exist to the widowed spouse until more permanent arrangements can be made. It went on to explain that the idea is that once the estate is settled, the widowed spouse will be secure with payments from life insurance, pension plans, etc., and the minister reiterated that nonsense this afternoon about there being sufficient time in that six-month period to get the estate settled. She even went so far as to say that the six months' extension could cover the period until the widow could sell her home. I would like to know what she expects her to do, sell her home and move into a boarding house?

Miss Bégin: I did not say that.

Miss MacDonald: That is not the kind of just society we heard so much about.

Mr. Allmand: You would want to help the big homeowner.

Miss MacDonald: As the minister is sure to know, for many widows there is no estate to settle.

Mr. McGrath: Go back and defend your McDonald commission, Warren.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I thought we had recognized the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald).

Mr. Paproski: Tell the minister to keep quiet.

Mr. Allmand: There is a lot of hypocrisy over there.

Miss MacDonald: I want to reiterate that although the minister may think that in the case of many widows there is an estate to be settled and there is an ongoing income to be met in six months' time, for many widows there is no estate to settle and there is no bridge. And if there is a bridge, it is a bridge to nothing or to the welfare rolls. That is what will result, whether it is on the day of the pensioner's death or six months later. That should come as no surprise to anyone who knows that there are less than one million Canadian women who are covered by survivor benefits under their husband's pension plan and there are less than a million Canadian women who have pension plans of their own.

My point is, sir, that it is not the widow who must await the settling of her husband's pension plan, his insurance benefits and his stock market holdings to whom this six months' extension, this so-called bridge, applies because such a widow was not likely a recipient of the spouse's allowance in the first place. No, sir, this pertains to the widow whose husband had no pension, no holdings and probably no insurance, and at best this bridge might help her pay for the funeral before she goes on welfare.

Most of these widows do not want to go on welfare. That is the question. As one of the scores of widows who have written me in this regard said when her spouse's allowance was cut off along with her dead husband's pension:

I couldn't work as I have arthritis in both my knees so I had to go on welfare and it is an awful feeling to be on welfare—a pension cheque, you can hold your head up, but welfare, no.

That is what is important to these women, to be able to hold their heads up.

The minister tried to persuade us this afternoon that people should think of welfare as a right, that everyone is entitled to it and that applying for it should cause no great concern. Well, sir, that is just not the way the world works and it is not the way that a great many people think of welfare.

Mr. Alexander: Now you know where Liberals are losing.

Miss MacDonald: Another widow wrote me:

Not everyone can build the bank accounts! But it took a nation of everyone to build roads, bridges, schools, churches and work the land! Isn't it time we paid them back? Isn't it time we stopped the treadmill and said thanks?

No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think that putting them on the welfare rolls is the answer. I have said it before and I say it again: too many of these elderly people, too many of the people who built the roads, the bridges and the schools, are living in poverty; and of the poor elderly, it is women who are the poorest. Some of them must eke out a meagre existence on less than $2,000 a year. In 1975, the last year for which we have statistics, approximately three-fifths of the unattached females in Canada between the ages of 65 and 69, and four-fifths of those women over the age of 70, had incomes below $4,000. These are the women who are 65 years and over, and yet I suppose they could be termed the lucky ones because they are entitled to old age security. Well, sir, those who are between the ages of 60 and 65 are even worse off.

The minister may tire of hearing me cite these bleak statistics, and I want to assure her that I tire equally of having to repeat them over and over again, but I shall be forced to continue to cite them until the policies of this government have got to the root of the problem, and the government comes up with some kind of solutions that deal with the inequities that are there in society for elderly women.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (2142)

Miss MacDonald: I know the minister said this afternoon her six-month proposal for the extension of this program is not an ideal solution. But she did insist that it was a solution. I would like to know, a solution to what? A solution meaning what for six months? What will it basically resolve? Nothing. And yet Liberal party spokesmen continue to put forward band-aid solutions to what is rapidly becoming a cancer in our society—growing poverty among the aged.

Just the other day a Liberal spokesman, the parliamentary secretary for urban affairs, came up with a very unique solution. His solution—and I have heard no minister repudiate what he had to say—was to discontinue all transfer payments to the provinces for social programs, whether for health, welfare or housing, social policy equalization. He would discontinue the whole lot.

This government has its six-month solutions and this bill, but it is not the first of its type. The government is running on a six-month cycle of programs. Earlier this year it put forward a six-month sales tax reduction which, of course, was leading up to the fall election that never was. Now we have a six month extension to the spouse's allowance to the spring election that we are waiting for. I would say that a great deal of what we are being shown tonight and what is being presented in this bill is mere election propaganda which the Liberal party is trying to propagate.

The people who live in poverty in this country deserve something better than to stagger from one six-month program to the next. This kind of proposal will not come to grips with the problem of poverty among elderly Canadians. The minister says that there is not the money to go any further, that she has no means to go beyond that limited six-month period, which will take her into an election campaign. She cries restraint and she tells us how expensive it all is.

It may be expensive, but it is not nearly as expensive as some of the financial fiascos that this government has blundered into over the past number of years, and I would cite only one or two. They invested some $17 million in unoccupied land which they have rented up to the middle of the next century, or there is the $4 million in an unoccupied office building that they paid out back in 1975. There is also the situation we heard about today where $142 million was paid out in overpayments by the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Why do we not create restraint in those areas and use the money that is saved to pay for the spouse's allowance to widows until they reach 75 and can have their own pensions?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sixty-five.

Miss MacDonald: Until age 65, rather, and then they can have their own pensions. That, sir, is a better solution than the six month band-aid which this government has proposed today.

We on this side of the House have said that we will support this bill and the $20 increase in the guaranteed income supplement, which we feel is overdue. It is with great reluctance that I support the extension of the spouse's allowance, since we do not think it goes far enough and we do not think it ends discrimination and injustice. It is better than nothing, but it is not much.

I have maintained throughout that the withdrawal of the spouse's allowance is cruel, unfair and unjust. I still maintain that and I will continue to do so until this practice is ended completely. But after hearing what has been said by the Liberal government in the House today, I can say to you, sir, that it will take a Conservative government, the next government of this country, to carry out that kind of program.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): We have just had, Mr. Speaker, this evening and this afternoon with the hon. members from St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and now the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), the real Tory approach to politics.

Mr. Alexander: A point of order, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Alexander: I wish you would shut up for a while, sir. I know you had a tough time in Toronto. I know that I make them nervous, but, Mr. Speaker, my point is just this. I heard my riding mentioned, Hamilton West. I do not know whether the member was sleeping in the House all the time, but I have not delivered a speech this evening, nor have I made a contribution on this bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order.

Mr. Alexander: If they want me to give a speech—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order.

Mr. Alexander: —I will destroy them because—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that the hon. member for Hamilton West knew more about the parliamentary system than to think that that was a question of privilege. For a member from the class of '68, he should know by now that that is not a question of privilege at all.

This afternoon the hon. member for Hamilton West in the question period was asking the government to establish a fraud squad to go after the unemployed in this country. The hon. member for St. John's East, from the great province of Newfoundland, also got up to support the Auditor General and all of the right-wing forces in his party to try probably to take the initiative before members like the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) started pressing the government, to go after the unemployed, the poor UIC claimants in this country, to collect money because of errors that were made by civil servants. Then to show this party's phoniness, the member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) this afternoon, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands this evening, and other members of the Conservative party, have been arguing for more social programs and more social spending in the country.

The Conservative party is saying this evening that the government of Canada should spend more of the G.N.P. on social programs. How can anyone stand up in any public forum and pretend to speak the truth, or have the courage to speak the truth, when we all know that it is the Conservative party, the member for York-Simcoe, that great banker from Bay Street, and members like the member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), the other member from Calgary, the oil man, who keep repeating day after day, week after week that too many of the resources of this country are going to government spending and to social programs. This so-called, great party is continuously attacking this government because we had the guts and the courage to persuade the provinces to go into medicare.

I will just say to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and her friend, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie)—although I know one should not refer to new members too quickly, and I want to be courteous—that I appreciate the assistance they gave the Liberal party in the recent provincial election in New Brunswick. I should like to invite them to New Brunswick and I would even ask the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) to facilitate their travels all across the country. Because when they came to New Brunswick they helped the Liberal party to thrash the Tories to a mere coalition in a few local areas of the province.

That great Tory party is saying that because they still have a few premiers who are Tories in the provinces—although they are about to lose two before long—they could form a better government in Canada. Let me tell them what Tory governments do, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, now that the hon. member has vented his spleen for the loss both of New Brunswick and the leadership, I was just wondering when he is going to get back to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair would invite the hon. member to speak on the bill to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Breau: With all due respect, Mr. Speaker, Bill C-5 asks the House of Commons to authorize payments of moneys for social programs in Canada. I am speaking about the hypocrisy of the Conservative party members who come here this evening, as they did this afternoon—they do it all the time—with some members on the one hand pretending to speak for the party and advocating more spending, while on the other hand the policy of their party is that they want less government spending, a smaller percentage of the g.n.p. That is the real policy of the Tory party as dictated by Bay Street. The rest is hypocrisy.

I have respect for the New Democratic Party because on this issue they speak out of conviction. The Tories speak out of confusion. They do not know where they should stand. They know it is better for this country to have more social spending and they know it is better for this country to reallocate resources in the economy. The only reason they get up now is to hide what the real power in the Tory party is saying—that you should have less reallocation of resources in the country. That is the real position of the Conservative party.

Let me tell them, if they do not already know, what more Tory administration would do to the poor and the handicapped in this country—the people the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi was quite properly concerned about this afternoon, and I know he is sincere. In my province when family allowances were increased a couple of years ago, families on welfare found their welfare payments reduced despite the fact they were paid 50 per cent by the federal government. That is what a Tory administration does to poor people in the country. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands and her friend from Rosedale, pretending to be great spenders and great people who support reallocation of resources, go to New Brunswick and support that kind of Tory administration.

Under the Canada works program, the local employment assistance program and the community employment strategy of the federal government, we look to welfare officers in the country to put welfare recipients on the payroll and try to bring them actively into the labour force. I know of cases of people who are handicapped and cannot work in a normal labour activity. Under the Canada works program they are hired and then they get UIC, but what happens in New Brunswick is that the great Tory administration cuts them off welfare. We have in New Brunswick a housing program to assist low income families. But what happens when federal funds go into assistance for low income housing, Mr. Speaker? The great Tory administrations in Ontario, in New Brunswick, and, I suppose, in Newfoundland, cut them off welfare.

Members who pretend to be on the side of low income people—they know they have to be humane when they face their constituents and have to reconcile their position for the Tory party—advocate a fraud squad to go after the unemployed of this country because a few civil servants make a mistake. I suggest to my friend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae), whose family I know very well, that he should listen to what I am saying.

This afternoon the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands bootlegged another issue, that of transfer payments and equalization. We listened to the Tory position on equalization as enunciated this afternoon by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands on many occasions, and by her great friend in New Brunswick who was thrashed to pieces last Monday—they do not seem to know that the Conservatives in New Brunswick lost three seats nor that the premier only won his own riding by 300 votes. The Tory position on equalization is this: leave it alone; do not adjust it. The result will be that Ontario will be the recipient of equalization next year. That is the position of the Tory party.

On transfer payments and on equalization the policy of this government is that we should divert some of those funds to job creation and development. That is a better policy than just supporting provincial bureaucracies, as the Conservative party wants to do all across the country.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES—LENGTHENING OF SEAWAY SEASON

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, a week ago in this House I had the opportunity in the middle of the strike on the seaway to ask about the efforts being made to keep the seaway open a good deal longer, given the backlog of grain and the need to move more grain to maintain a balanced economy and our balance of payments.

The strike on the seaway was extremely serious and there is no question that it was dealt with in that fashion. It lasted just about a week and then we had legislation overwhelmingly adopted to end the strike and put the ships back in operation. The fact that the House moved so fast, the fact that the economy of the country was in serious jeopardy because of this strike, highlights the extreme importance to the economy of Canada of the St. Lawrence Seaway and, of course, of the port of Thunder Bay.

Thunder Bay is the third largest port in Canada. In terms of grain tonnage we ship two-thirds of all the grain moved from the west out of Thunder Bay. Therefore, anything that closes down the seaway and the operation of the port of Thunder Bay is of vital consequence to the country, and certainly the speed at which we moved to terminate the strike illustrates that factor.

In the last six years many of my colleagues and I have fought hard to improve the St. Lawrence Seaway and to improve the facilities on it, as well as to lengthen its season. We fought to keep the tolls down, even though an agreement between the United States and Canada was in the offing which would have seen the doubling of the tolls over a one-year period. However, we gained the point that the tolls will be doubled over a three-year period, 50 per cent in the first year and 25 per cent in the subsequent two years. This is very important. I hope that the minister keeps in mind that the excess revenue which comes from this increase in tolls over this three-year period will be used to improve facilities on the seaway. Specifically, Mr. Speaker, to lengthen the season of traffic on the seaway.

Early this summer the ministry announced that a study had been initiated by the department using a firm of consultants to test the economic feasibility of lengthening the season ultimately to 11 months. This is extremely important, and certainly it would have been this year, with a slowdown because of the strike as well as a backlog of grain in the west, if everything had been in position to lengthen the season. But of course, this is not the case.

I understand the report is completed and the draft is in the hands of the ministry. I hope it will be tabled in this House within a month. I am sure it will indicate that there are great cost advantages to lengthening the period in which the seaway is open. We hope the minister will move as rapidly as possible, considering the extra revenue that is now being received.

If we can put class 10 icebreakers in the Arctic to move natural gas, oil and so on through a 12-month season, there is no reason why we cannot extend the life of the St.Lawrence Seaway to ten, 11 or even 12 months. It is important that we put pressure on the department in this direction. We hope that the result of this initial study will be out very shortly and that we will then move into some very progressive measures to keep the seaway open.

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to pay tribute to the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) who for many years has been trying every time he gets a chance to do so to exert as much pressure as he can on the Department of Transport and people in general who have to make decisions concerning the St. Lawrence Seaway to improve that system that is truly vital to the economy of this country.

However, Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind him that since the St. Lawrence Seaway was opened in 1959 the seaway authority has been trying to find a way of extending the shipping season on that waterway. That research which is being carried out at a time when demand is much lower than the capacity of the system is motivated by the simple desire to make the system of locks and canals more effective.

The seaway, as anyone knows in Canada, met with much greater success than had been anticipated initially. So, last year, record volumes of 63.3 million tons of commodities were shipped between Montreal and Lake Ontario, and a record volume of 71.1 million tons was also moved that same year through the Welland canal. So it is obvious, Mr. Speaker, that the best way of increasing the capacity of the seaway and its effectiveness is to extend the shipping season and, hence, the period during which the facilities can be used.

Already, without pomp or ceremony, Mr. Speaker, the season has been extended by a month from 7½ to 8½ months. The season now goes from April 1 to about December 15, and even last year the last ship to leave the seaway or the system did so on December 26.

So the seaway authority is developing an ongoing program to slowly extend the season, adding four weeks. That program will be gradually phased in on the basis of demand and also, of course, the advantages Canada will be able to get out of it.

● (2207)

[English]

The cost of this development is naturally increasing as the Seaway attempts to work under adverse cold weather conditions. Studies indicate just enough benefits to warrant this modest and gradual approach. We can therefore look forward to steady work and the long term goal of a season lasting 11 months, one month being used for annual lock maintenance.

A crash program to extend quickly the season because of unusual circumstances would likely be impractical. Much of the experience gained so far by the two U.S. and Canada Seaway entities and by the coastguards, indicates that more than positive thinking is now needed to achieve the objective. Sustained efforts and large amounts of money are required from now on to extend the navigation season further.

This effort must necessarily be a long term undertaking. I wish to stress that the interest of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae) and the type of pressure he is constantly bringing to bear will certainly assist in having the season extended.

AGRICULTURE—SALE OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, on October 13 I posed a question to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) in relation to the sale or proposed sale of government inland terminals. I specifically asked whether the decision to sell the elevators was his decision or that of the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and, second, whether the government would guarantee job security and security of pensions to those employed in the elevator system.

I received no response to the first question. I can only assume that the decision was not that of the Minister of Agriculture but rather that of the President of the Treasury Board. I believe the Minister of Agriculture has more sympathy than that for the farmer and is concerned about the sale of grain in western Canada.

Since 1972 I have pressed for the utilization of these inland terminals. The answer from the Minister of Agriculture, the minister in charge of the wheat board and the officials of the wheat board has always been the same, namely that they blame the line company elevators. They say the line company elevators did not and do not want the terminals to be utilized to the fullest extent.

These terminals were built in the era of 1914 to 1920 approximately. They are all in pretty good shape at the present time. There are five terminals having a capacity of some 17 million bushels. They can supply half the needs of Vancouver harbour with grain prepared to export condition. I might point out that in Moose Jaw the elevator is operating 24 hours a day.

In the past these elevators have operated at about 20 per cent capacity yet they made a profit. I put a question on the order paper in 1976 asking for a statement of the profit and loss position of these elevators. I found that in the period from 1959-60 to 1975-76 the five terminals made a profit of over $4 million; if you add the profit of the Prince Rupert terminal the amount is brought up by more than $5 million. Yet the President of the Treasury Board in his statement announcing the sale of these elevators indicated that the sale was being carried out for the purpose of saving some $6.3 million. It is interesting to note that Mr. Mantz, the general manager of the terminal elevators, said he could not understand where the President of the Treasury Board got those figures because the elevators would this year show a profit of between $4 million and $5 million.

As I say, the Moose Jaw elevator has been operating since May 1 on the basis of three shifts a day around the clock. They are handling rape, flax, buckwheat and mustard and most of this is coming from the Alberta Pool, the Manitoba Pool and the UGG. All these companies are utilizing the facilities to the fullest extent. They evidently see a need for them and I suggest that the statements by the Minister of Agriculture and the minister in charge of the wheat board to the effect that the pools and the UGG do not wish to utilize these elevators are not correct.

It is unbelievable that the government should be wanting to sell these elevators when they have been operating at a profit. This year the profit will probably be larger in one year than the profits for the last ten years. The Hall commission recommended the utilization of the government elevators but the minister and the Canadian Wheat Board rejected the report. My opinion is that neither the Minister of Agriculture nor the minister in charge of the wheat board has ever sat down to discuss the proper utilization of these facilities. Certainly, in my opinion, they have never discussed the matter with the line companies or with the railways. The farmer-owned elevator companies are concerned about the maximum movement of grain on behalf of their members.

Our transportation and grain handling system is in a mess. Deliveries this crop year are 33 per cent down compared with last year. Surely the time has come to make a realistic attempt to develop and improve that system. I believe these inland terminals must be part of our grain handling arrangements.

I understand these terminals are worth $120 million. What will they be sold for? I do not think a buyer will be found at that price. My personal feeling is that they should not be sold. At most they should be leased. They should be operated at cost. If there is a sale there should be a condition attached that the elevators must be utilized to the maximum, otherwise the sale would be void and the facilities would be returned to the taxpayers and used by the government.

I am concerned also about job security for the employees. If a sale takes place it should be a condition that the job security of these permanent employees as well as their pension rights will be protected.

● (2217)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it gives me pleasure to respond to the hon. member's question. The Canadian government elevators consist of five inland terminal elevators at Moose Jaw, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and Lethbridge, and one terminal elevator at Prince Rupert. The total licensed capacity of the six elevators is 541,870 tonnes. The total licensed capacity by elevator is as follows: Moose Jaw, 154,020 tonnes; Saskatoon, 154,020 tonnes; Calgary, 70,010 tonnes; Edmonton, 65,510 tonnes; and Lethbridge, 35,000.

The amount of grain handled by the inland grain elevators in 1977-78 was as follows: Moose Jaw, 21,163 tonnes; Saskatoon, 140,709 tonnes; Calgary, 55,778 tonnes; Edmonton, 57,413 tonnes; and Lethbridge, 22,000 tonnes. Current projections for the 1978-79 crop year are that the amount of grain handled at each of the inland grain elevators will be higher in 1978-79 than in 1977-78.

The current projection for operating profit for the 1978-79 crop year is that it will be higher than in any of the six previous crop years. This will be as a result of the substantial increase in revenue coming from the increase in grain handling. The net operating profit—before depreciation—in the last six years was as follows: 1972-73, $1,051,375; 1973-74, $765,458; 1974-75, $2,056,081; 1975-76, $2,531,461; 1976-77, $838,377; and 1977-78, $1,301,180.

The five inland grain elevators were all built between 1914 and 1931 with the Moose Jaw and Saskatoon elevators being built in 1914, the Calgary elevator in 1915, the Edmonton elevator in 1924, the Prince Rupert elevator in 1926 and the Lethbridge elevator in 1931. All of the elevators have been maintained in good working condition, considering their age, through a regular program of structural repair and maintenance. The five inland grain elevators are each equipped to dry grain and to clear grain to meet export standards.

The Canadian government elevators have not been utilized to their potential physical capacity. The government has announced that the elevators are to be sold to the private sector. We are optimistic that this initiative will enable these elevators to be used more in line with their potential.

The Department of Agriculture is now drawing up the conditions for the sale of the inland grain elevators. We feel that the elevators must be operated in the interest of the grain farmers of western Canada to assist in realizing market opportunities for Canadian grain.

Adjournment Debate

FINANCE—TAX RECOMMENDATIONS OF ECONOMIC COUNCIL OF CANADA

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, the question I put to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) yesterday concerned the fifteenth annual report of the Economic Council of Canada. I put to the minister the fact that the Economic Council has recommended this year, as it had last year, that the economy required, at the very least, the following three measures: cuts in income tax, cuts in the federal sales tax, and a federal-provincial capital works program to offset the difficulties that currently last in the construction industry, particularly in our metropolitan areas.

In his answer, the Minister of Finance simply indicated that he would take into account the recommendations of the Economic Council and that he was appreciative of efforts from this side as well as from other quarters to draw his attention to certain recommendations before the budget was brought down.

I think his answer raises two further problems, and they are the ones to which I should like to address myself this evening. The first is the fact that the economic priorities and economic direction of the government have been, it seems to me, severely criticized in the report of the Economic Council. Obviously the council will not put it that way, but that seems to be the implication of their report.

The second problem which is raised by the minister's answer is the totally unsatisfactory way in which budgets are prepared and in which economic advice is given and taken. We in the New Democratic Party have been arguing for many years that it was not good enough to have an Economic Council which would simply make recommendations to the government which could be ignored at any given time. The composition of the Economic Council of Canada depends entirely on the whim of the government. We in the NDP have argued for a form of social and economic planning which would allow a serious canvassing of opinion from all quarters of our society, not only those people who have the power to make representations.

If the Minister of Finance was asked who made representations to him concerning the budget, both formally and informally, I am sure the reply would not include many of the people who do not have power in our society. It is these two problems I wish to deal with this evening, briefly as it may be.

The first problem is that the government, by adopting the Tory policies of cutbacks, has assumed that these policies will somehow administer a boost to our economy, on their own and that they will be sufficient to stimulate an economy with a serious problem of industrial undercapacity and unemployment that causes tremendous human problems of which I am sure all hon. members are aware. The fact is that the cuts brought in by the government were brought in without any consultation, even with the cabinet of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and without any warning or systematic planning.

There have been a series of ad hoc emergency measures to deal with a set of long term problems, and they are simply inadequate. One cannot cut $2.4 billion off a budget in the space of two weeks or one month without creating havoc within the government or great hardship and unfairness toward individuals.

In particular, I should like to direct the government's attention to the fact that the immediate implication over a period of a year or two of cutting back the amount of benefit paid in unemployment insurance is to reduce considerably the level of demand in our economy. It will take money out of the economy which would otherwise be there. If I am not mistaken, the estimate of the Minister of Finance indicated that demand would be reduced by $1 billion. While that type of cut might seem attractive to the bankers of this world, certainly it will do nothing to stimulate consumer demand or protect the living standards of ordinary Canadians.

Yesterday in my speech I had occasion to recite the figures from Statistics Canada concerning the fact that more and more families were forced below the poverty line as a result of the anti-inflation measures of 1976 and 1977. I guarantee the number will be increased as a result of measures introduced by the government since August 1978.

Coupled with these cutbacks is the assumption that the private sectors will fill in the gap. It is that myth which the Economic Council attacks directly. It has pointed out that, in order for that to take place, it would require an increase in consumer spending and private investment which has been unheard of in the country for the past 50 years. That will not happen.

The second point I wish to emphasize is that it is no longer possible to continue consulting with different power groups in this ad hoc manner. That does not amount to economic planning and consultation. The government should look at the proposals of the New Democratic Party respecting economic planning, particularly the mechanisms which allow us to consult fairly with all groups, and propose a budget over a period of time which allows the House, and the many groups outside it, to be consulted about the economy of the country.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in its Fifteenth Review, the Economic Council of Canada has once again made a useful contribution to the discussion of Canadian economic problems and the policies necessary to deal with them. Of course, this is not to say that I agree with all their policy proposals.

I should like to begin my discussion of the council's recommendation for a $2 billion cut in personal income tax or manufacturers' sales tax by noting that there is much more to the council's discussion of fiscal policy than the specifics of its recommendation. Indeed, the council wrestles with many of the same issues that the minister must face in preparing the budget. It should come as no surprise that the council emphasizes that the policy choices he must make at that time are, indeed, difficult.

On the one hand, expansionary initiatives such as the tax cut could improve the short-term outlook for real growth and employment. On the other hand, there are also concerns over the exchange rate and inflation. The minister is now in the process of preparing a budget. He will have to form judgment about the relative magnitudes of these various effects of expansionary initiatives and how to weigh them off one against the other. He has some difficult choices to make. He is concerned about employment, but at the same time he is determined to bring down the rate of inflation. To find out what his choices are we will have to wait until budget night.

The council observed that the cumulative increase in public debt relative to national income or to the tax base has raised questions about the government's room for manoeuvring. To shed some light on this issue, the council presents figures on the general government deficit as a percentage of gross national product for Canada and for the other major OECD countries. These figures show that the Canadian general government deficit at all levels, both federal and provincial, while at 3 per cent of GNP, is, indeed, greater than in the United States, but smaller than in other countries such as West Germany, Japan and Italy.

The council interprets the international comparison of government deficits as suggesting there is perhaps room for additional fiscal stimulus. This is not to say it does not regard the deficit as worrisome. Others may interpret the figures differently. The minister will inform us of his interpretation on budget night.

The Economic Council has come forward with its review at a good time. Its tax cut recommendation and supporting analysis must be welcomed as a useful input to the budget making process. It will be given full consideration, just as are all the other pre-budget submissions the minister receives.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I would simply like to commend the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae) who, in less than 30 hours as a member of this House, has raised two questions, made his initial speech and been on the late show. I would defer to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), but I think that must be some kind of record.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And a good one, too.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of events yesterday before the McDonald royal commission, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis):

That the government make available to the McDonald commission all documents and other relevant material in its possession and instruct its counsel not to block or object to the production thereof so as to enable the McDonald commission to fulfil its mandate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House, in conformity with Standing Order 43. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC DISCLOSURE OF MATERIAL RELEVANT TO McDONALD COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, this is, in fact, something of a similar motion. In view of the motion by counsel for the government at the McDonald inquiry yesterday to block introduction of some 14 pieces of correspondence, and government counsel's further refusal to even permit perusal by the commission of some four documents, I would move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That this House directs the Minister of Justice to instruct counsel for the government at the McDonald inquiry to withdraw objection to production of all material and documents and, further, to withdraw argument against public disclosure of all material relevant to the inquiry.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Standing Order 43 requires the unanimous consent of the House for the presentation at this time of such a motion. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

REQUESTED EXTENSION OF SALES TAX REDUCTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. All Canadians are gratified that postal service has resumed. However, the length of the latest stoppage in postal service has caused a serious shortage of cash for many businessmen which will take some time to overcome. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Hare):

That the government waive the October 31 deadline for the remission of the federal sales tax to the federal treasury for 15 days in order to ease the burden being felt by many Canadian businessmen in the wake of the postal strike.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR CREATION OF TRIBUNAL TO SETTLE LABOUR DISPUTES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that for several years, the Canadian public have put up with the after-effects of numerous strikes in public and semi-public sectors as the result of the legitimate claims of workers, considering also that the mechanisms that have been set up are more or less efficient, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Mercier (Mr. Boulanger):

S.O. 43

That a permanent labour tribunal for conflicts arising in public and semi-public sectors be set up by the minister concerned.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

OVERPAYMENTS UNDER PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Andy Hogan (Cape Breton-East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. We all know that the Unemployment Insurance Commission is in the process of asking some 15,000 Canadians, including 5,000 Nova Scotians, to pay back $4.3 million due to a mistake of one of its employees. Since up to this date all such recipients have not yet been notified, and since UIC officials admit that so far they have not received any repayment, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

● (1112)

That the UIC cancel these overpayments immediately, given the serious economic straits we are in and given the fact that such an error would have been caught by a properly operating internal auditing system within the UIC itself.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REQUESTED COMMITTEE STUDY OF OVERPAYMENTS UNDER PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the findings of the Auditor General as contained in the annual report of the Department of Employment and Immigration tabled in this House that there has been an estimated $142 million in overpayments to UI recipients, and in view of the fact that the commission failed to act on the recommendations of the Auditor General in 1976, where he identified $95 million in overpayments, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That the public accounts committee be struck immediately and, further, that the 1977-78 annual report of the Department of Employment and Immigration be referred to the Standing Committee on Public Accounts.

[Mr. Lavoie.]

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

DEFAULTED MORTGAGES INSURED BY CMHC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43, arising out of a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation press release that AHOP defaults are up by 300 per cent over 1977 and now account for 53 per cent of the defaulted mortgages insured by CMHC.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That in light of this grave situation, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs be asked to make a statement to the House on how his proposed graduated payment mortgage plan based on high incomes and appreciation equity will work, and what plan Central Mortgage and Housing management has to fill these hundreds of vacant houses.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister will know, yesterday counsel for the government tried to withhold from the McDonald royal commission certain government documents. The Prime Minister will also recall that on October 25 of this year he said, as reported at page 450 of Hansard:

—we would produce and have produced every document asked for.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, is that still the position of the government, and will the government instruct its counsel to make available to the McDonald royal commission all government documents, all documents in the possession of the government, relevant to the inquiry of the McDonald commission.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I am informed, what happened yesterday before the commission is that counsel for former commissioner Higgitt asked for the production of documents without any notice either to the government or to the commission itself. Naturally, both the commission and ourselves think that this is a procedure which should be corrected.

I repeat my assurance that we will co-operate by making all documents available to the commission. We will, further, co-operate in making public any documents which the commission wants to make public and which are any evidence of wrongdoing. But in order to co-operate, we have to know what is asked for and we must have notice of what documents are to be produced, so that we can consider their classification and consider their declassification if the commission so requires.

It was just a matter of the government and the commission having been caught by surprise with documents that they did not know were going to be asked for. I think that it proves once again the unfairness, in terms of due process of law, of proceeding in this way in public without complete co-operation on the procedures to be followed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it was simply by inadvertence, but I think the Prime Minister declined or neglected to answer my question as to whether or not there will be an instruction to counsel to make available the particular documents in question. I would like him to clarify that, and elaborate on the significance of the phrase he used when he said that the government would want to consider the classification of the documents that would be made available to the McDonald royal commission.

Does that mean there are, in the possession of the government, government documents which have a classification that in the view of the government makes it improper or impossible for the government to make those documents available to the McDonald royal commission? In other words, are there some documents that this government will not make available to the McDonald royal commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, certainly not documents that it would be improper to show to them. As I said the other day, the government does not attempt to absolve itself of its responsibility for the protection of secret documents and Privy Council secrets. I have said that when the commission feels that such documents which are covered by the necessities of secrecy should be published, and that they show evidence of some wrongdoing, we will undertake to declassify them.

I cannot say in advance that we will declassify all documents in every circumstance and permit them to be made public. We will do so when they show evidence of wrongdoing, in the judgment of the commission, and when in the judgment of the commission it is important to make these documents public. The Leader of the Opposition will realize that probably even the McDonald commission will not want to make all documents public, any more than any other royal commission of inquiry into matters of secrecy and intelligence.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, there is perhaps confusion here between the question of the production of documents and the question of publication of documents. I want to come to the question of publication later. I want to be absolutely clear, here, on the question of production of documents.

Is it the position of the government that the government will make available to the McDonald royal commission every single document, regardless of classification, which might in any way be relevant to the inquiry of the McDonald commission? I am not speaking here of publication—that is another question—I am speaking of production. Is there going to be any limitation at all upon the documents that the Government of Canada will make available to this commission?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am informed that the commission has had access to all these documents. Therefore, it is not a question of not showing them to the commission. The commission has had access to the RCMP files, and presumably knows about these documents. The debate yesterday was about whether they should be produced at that particular stage.

Mr. Clark: A final supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister and I have a slightly different views of what went on yesterday before the commission. For the record, and in very unequivocal terms, I should like to have from the Prime Minister a categorical assurance that every document that is relevant to the McDonald royal commission that is a government document, or is in possession of the government, will be made available to the McDonald royal commission and that no question of classification will stand as a bar to the production by the government of relevant material to that commission.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I think that undertaking can be given in a general way. I cannot say in advance that all cabinet minutes can, or should, be put before the royal commission without the government asking itself if this has to be done. If the royal commission makes a case for access to cabinet committee minutes as is the case with the documents which were asked to be produced yesterday, my answer is yes. I saw the cabinet committee minute just five minutes before I came to the House. Certainly, the government would have no objection to producing that cabinet committee minute.

I do not think the discussion in cabinet of every and all subjects should be available to any outsiders of cabinet. I think this is a clear doctrine of cabinet secrecy, and it will be preserved.

INDEMNIFICATION OF COURT COSTS OF MEMBERS OF FORCE

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I should like to pursue the uncertainty that seems to have been created. I think it is important, in addressing my question through you to the Solicitor General, to clear up something that happened last Wednesday, when the Solicitor General told me that to the best of his knowledge there was no government policy that would permit the indemnification or protection of RCMP officers who, acting through the tacit or expressed approval of their superiors, might have transgressed the law.

There has now been made public, as the Solicitor General knows, clear and detailed documentary evidence that such a policy existed, at least within the force, as long ago as 1970.

My question to the Solicitor General is, has he conferred with any of his five or four predecessors in office: if it is not within his knowledge, has he conferred with his predecessors to determine whether it was within their knowledge during their respective terms of office? If so, have they confirmed, or denied, knowledge of this policy? If they have confirmed having knowledge, could he tell us when they became aware of that policy of protection and indemnification?

● (1122)

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I stand by what I said on Wednesday, that there is no information that has come to me from either interviews with my predecessors or with officials who have been in place since the early part of the 1970s indicating that there was any knowledge within the government of a policy within the RCMP as described by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry the Solicitor General will not tell me if he has consulted with and asked the specific question of his predecessors. I would think it would be incumbent upon him to do so. The Solicitor General is aware, from the documentary evidence, that the protection and indemnification policies resulted from prolonged consultation among the highest-ranking officers in the force, being exactly the same officers who were consulting weekly with this series of solicitors general: the very same officers.

In view of these circumstances, can the Solicitor General offer the House any reasonable explanation whatsoever as to how a policy so important, so fundamental to the operation of the force for which the Solicitor General is responsible, could be in effect as long as eight years without any of this series of solicitors general being aware of it?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. gentleman fully recognizes that the matter is one that is presently being studied by the McDonald inquiry in terms of its being internal RCMP policy. That matter, of course, is now subject to direct examination of former commissioner Higgitt and potential cross-examination in the near future.

As I have indicated before, it is not my intention now, relating to matters before the commission, to start commenting on either the direct examination or cross-examination that may be adduced. In terms of what was government policy, my statement is categorical, that to the best of my knowledge there has not been any policy of this government indicating that there was condonation or, indeed, acceptance of illegal activity on the part of the RCMP.

[Mr. Jarvis.]

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister a question relating to his earlier answers. Since the documents in question at the inquiry yesterday were requested to corroborate Mr. Higgitt's allegations or claims that certain ministers of the Crown knew of certain illegal or inappropriate activities, and since government counsel, on instruction from the government, objected to the introduction of these documents not simply at this time but in general, in part on the grounds that some of the documents were not appropriately in the hands of the RCMP in the first place, I ask the Prime Minister if he would reconsider his earlier answer.

Why did the government instruct its counsel to block the presentation of these documents, which could be used in a fair-minded way to either confirm or deny Mr. Higgitt's allegations, for submission either for public assessment or simply for consideration in camera by the commission?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have not given any such instruction and I do not know of any such instructions regarding the particular documents produced yesterday. There is a general policy, which I have tried to explain in this House, which applies generally to the government's attitude before the commission.

I cannot comment on the hearing that went on yesterday, because I did not read what they said. As I say, I was informed five minutes before coming into this House about a certain cabinet minute. I was asked if I would permit its declassification and I said, "Sure": if the commission wants to declassify this particular one, I see no reason not to. That will remain my policy and it is the policy of the government.

Whether the lawyers yesterday were acting on specific instructions in that case, or on my general instructions—ones I have just stated—I do not know. But my information is that it must have been, in this particular case, that they objected because they had not been notified of what documents would be produced. The commission itself was not notified, and it was sprung on the commission.

Once again I appeal to the House and I appeal to the Canadian public to keep the due process of law in mind. One party has a lawyer making some allegations in front of the court. If the opposition is interested in having the truth come out, let us see what the lawyers for the other side will say; let us see what the documents will eventually say, if they are produced; and if they are not produced, let us find out why. But let us not draw the conclusion that the government is trying to hide a document which it did not know would be produced until, apparently, the moment it was produced yesterday. That is all that is being asked for, due process and fairness, and not just jumping to conclusions because a lawyer for one party has suggested that something be adduced in evidence without the other side hearing about it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, unfortunately, the reasonable note of the Prime Minister's answer does not accord with the facts. Counsel for the government said before the commission yesterday—and I quote him as he is quoted in the press—that he was instructed, presumably by the government, presumably by the Minister of Justice or someone representing the government: he is quoted as having said:

I am instructed to tell you that the RCMP is not an authorized possessor of the documents. The government objects to them even being shown to the witness—

I say to the Prime Minister, that is counsel acting on behalf of the government telling the commission that he has been instructed so to act. I do not think there is much doubt about that, and I find it a little strange that the Prime Minister would not be briefed on this fundamental matter until five minutes before the question period.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister, in this context, going back to the question of the Leader of the Opposition earlier, whether the Prime Minister is now saying that he will be the final arbiter in deciding which documents are appropriate for the commission to see. He is saying it will be for the cabinet to decide what is relevant for the commission to see.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know from what report the hon. member is reading. I do know, because I was so informed a few minutes ago, that a particular series of documents—four, I believe—were sprung on the commission yesterday and sprung on the government by the lawyer on one side. I am told that the McDonald commission itself expressed annoyance at this way of proceeding, precisely because when something happens in this way, of course, it makes the headlines and raises indignation across the country and from the opposition benches. This is not the way we think things should proceed.

Once again, I do not know from what report the Leader of the NDP is reading, but if my information is correct, that this information was sprung on counsel for the commission and counsel for the government, then obviously there could not be an instruction relating to those documents which had been given to counsel. They had no instructions; they were caught by surprise and they said, "Okay, what other documents do you want? Let us look at them. The government has always co-operated, shown them to the commission and co-operated when necessary and declassified them. Presumably we will do that in the future. But let us know if you want a document to be produced, and let us know if you want us to declassify it, so that then we can get instructions from the government."

This seems a perfectly normal attitude to be taken by counsel for the government, when the government is responsible for protecting the confidentiality of documents.

● (1132)

Mr. Broadbent: I say, with respect, that the Prime Minister did not answer the crucial question—the question I put to him two days ago, too—about the government's attitude with regard to allowing the commission to determine what it should see, rather than having the government decide.

The Prime Minister made the case two days ago in this House—he referred to this question today—that certain conversations or discussions in cabinet are confidential and that he would not, as a principle, reveal such documents to the commission if he thought it was none of their business. But what is at stake here is the credibility and integrity of the government itself.

Would the Prime Minister not agree that it is absolutely essential that the commission should have the right to acquire and have access to any conversations which took place in cabinet which might indicate, for example, that ministers had knowledge of wrongdoing? Would he not agree that ultimately it should be the commission, and not the government, which makes that decision?

Mr. Trudeau: I repeat, if any document can convey knowledge or implication of wrongdoing by the government, we shall co-operate in any way if the commission wants to make it public. To use the expression used by the Minister of Justice, we shall bend over backwards to declassify those documents. But we shall not let the RCMP, the commission, the opposition or the country, have access to all cabinet minutes. We are not going to open all the cabinet minutes for the commission to look into to find out all the discussions which have gone on in cabinet, with the possibility that they are going to find some illegality. Indeed, Mr. Speaker, confidentiality of discussions in cabinet is the most basic principle of cabinet government. It is also based on common sense, which I understand the new member over there has not yet had time to familiarize himself with.

This is the principle I stand by. Any former prime minister would stand by that principle, and I believe any future prime minister would do so. The only alternative is not to have cabinet minutes. If there is not to be free discussion in cabinet, then there should be either no cabinet or no record of its discussions.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

INQUIRY WHETHER MPs WILL BE INVITED TO ATTEND FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister.

Since a federal-provincial conference has been scheduled for next week, would the Prime Minister inform the House whether hon. members may attend this conference as observers or whether the sittings will be held in camera? If observers are invited among members of the House, will we have to submit a list of our delegates to the Prime Minister or will there be a special invitation to that effect?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is an open conference, the press will be represented and television cameras will be there. The size of the hall, of course, imposes a certain limitation on the number of persons who may attend but I have written to all parties represented in the House to send one or several representatives to the conference. We will not be able to admit all members from both sides of the House but every party will have at least one representative and several in some cases depending on the number of members representing parties in the House.

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question will be directed to the Minister of Justice, but I think there are two very important facts which should be clarified here. First, the example of cabinet minutes cited by the Prime Minister is a red herring, because the documents to whose production government counsel objected yesterday were correspondence, documents emanating from the office of the commissioner of the RCMP when he was commissioner. Second, it is not one party which attempted—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Does the hon. member have a question to put?

Mr. Nielsen: It is not one party which attempted to produce these documents, but—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Nielsen: Since counsel for the RCMP, and not only for ex-commissioner Higgit, was the lawyer who attempted to produce these documents, how can the government take the position they were sprung on the commission? This was counsel for a body of policemen for whom the Solicitor General is responsible, and presumably he knows the instructions that are given to that counsel. How can the government take that position? Presumably he knows of the instructions given to that counsel. How can he take that position?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): It is very clear from what counsel said to the commission that that was the case, because the possibility of introducing these documents in evidence was not a matter of prior knowledge as far as counsel for the commission is concerned and, indeed, as far as counsel for the government is concerned. At that point, counsel said they would request instructions in connection with an argument about these documents. That was the procedure which the commission itself had foreseen would be taken and, obviously, counsel for the government wanted instructions at that time.

[Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse).]

Mr. Nielsen: Counsel for the RCMP, then, should get together with counsel for the government. They were both working for the same client.

Some hon. Members: Collusion.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps I could address my supplementary to the Minister of Justice on the basis of an answer he gave in the House on October 24 when he said, "The material in our possession is available to the commission. That is our position, a position we shall continue to take before the commission." Then he went on to say, "Once these productions are made—"

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Nielsen: "—decisions will be taken by the commission." Can the Minister of Justice tell me how the commission can make a decision with respect to what documents to examine in camera, and what documents not to examine in camera, if the government will not even show the commission the documents upon which they have to take a decision?

Mr. Lang: Obviously, that will not be the position the government will take. Counsel for the government wanted instructions in connection with these documents before being in a position to discuss them. Therefore, they have sought further instructions.

I find it most extraordinary that the hon. member for Yukon should be surprised by the fact that there are a number of lawyers acting on behalf of the government and the RCMP and, in due course, of various ministers and former ministers who may be before the commission. Somehow he regards all these lawyers as though they were one unit. Obviously, the reason for having all these lawyers is so that all the interests can be represented and all the normal, legal and ethical approaches applied. Therefore, the lawyers do not all know, automatically, what every other lawyer knows, though in the usual way of courtesy we would expect some notice about what is sought to be introduced so that the normal seeking of instructions can take place.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RELOCATION AND RETRAINING OF EMPLOYEES WHOSE JOBS DECLARED REDUNDANT

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board. Is the government prepared to allocate funds for the retraining of public servants whose positions have been declared redundant?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Both relocation and retraining assistance will be made available where required and where it will help upgrade or provide a new skill for the person whose job is declared redundant.

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister in light of the response of the Minister of Justice when he said that all that is involved here is notice of production, which the government did not receive. To the best of his knowledge, were any instructions given by himself or by any of the ministers to object to their admissibility merely on the ground that no notice of production had been given?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know of any instruction being given in that direction, but it seems to me a common sense attitude for a lawyer to say, "Look, you want to publish some secret documents and show them to the commission. If you want us to declassify them in some way, let us know and we can seek instructions." It is very simple.

Mr. Woolliams: A supplementary to the Minister of Justice. Sometimes honesty, particularly in this place, flows from the element of surprise. I appreciate that the Prime Minister has narrowed the issue. Is that the narrow issue? Were instructions issued to object to the admissibility of those documents before the commission on those grounds, and on those grounds alone?

● (1142)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): No, Mr. Speaker, that was not the basis on which counsel were objecting. They were not objecting to admission so much as they were objecting to not having had time to obtain instructions. When the lawyers were faced with a situation which had not been contemplated, I think it is obvious that they wanted some chance to obtain instructions. They will now be doing that. As a result, by the appropriate point in time when the commission reconvenes, I have no doubt that all this fuss and uproar over the fact of lack of notice having caused surprise on the part of counsel will be behind us, and the commission again will be about the ordinary business of doing its job quite clearly unimpeded by any action on the part of government or its counsel.

FISHERIES

COMMERCIAL FISHING IN FRASER RIVER, B.C.

Mr. Alex Patterson (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. In view of the fact that two meetings have been held by commercial fishermen for testing the unfair and inadequate openings of the Fraser River between the Pattullo and Mission bridges, can he indicate what steps are being taken to rectify the injustice being done to fishermen in this area compared with those below the Pattullo bridge, or downstream?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of justice or injustice. It is a matter of conservation. Because of particular water conditions, fish moving into the normal spawning grounds and streams had difficulty doing so. For that reason, we had to impose stricter measures. I understand meetings have taken place and the issue is now resolved. In fact, I believe fishermen have been able to fish during the current week.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Speaker, as the last opening was made without effective notice, will the minister ensure that sufficient lead-time is allowed to enable these fishermen to take full advantage of what are fewer and shorter openings in that area?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly look into this suggestion.

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister and it concerns the first issue raised. The McDonald commission was set up for the purpose of settling and dealing with public disquiet on the question of RCMP security activities. Given the fact that public wrangling over secrecy or disclosure of documents particularly taking place before the McDonald commission is likely to destroy, or certainly impair, the effectiveness of the commission to undertake its responsibilities, will the Prime Minister follow the example set in the decisions of the highest courts in the United States and the United Kingdom and, in a more humble way, by the recommendations of the joint committee dealing with the question of information in using the words, "accepting the fact that it is not a proper role of a minister to make the final decision as to whether a requested document is covered by one of the exemptions"?

Even if it means the examination of documents in secret, will he make an unequivocal statement to the country indicating that the McDonald commission will be entitled to the final right to decide on the question of publication?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is returning to a series of questions asked of the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice and myself last week and earlier this week. Our answers are the same.

FINANCE

REQUEST THAT ASSESSMENT OF CONSEQUENCES OF BUDGETARY CUTBACKS BE MADE PUBLIC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Yesterday, according to a study tabled by the Quebec government, it was claimed that the budgetary cutbacks will represent a loss of 18,000 jobs in the province of Quebec alone. I should think that before announcing those cutbacks the Minister of Finance had also made an assessment of their consequences. In the public interest, will he give the House the assurance that the assessments he made on the consequences of those cutbacks will be made public to allow Canadians to see both sides of the coin?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in August we announced that a reorganization of public finances in Canada would create a better environment for economic growth. I doubt that the study tabled by Mr. Landry yesterday is really sound. For him to say that Quebec will ask for compensation because we want to manage the country properly is, to my mind, rather ridiculous; he too had to make certain cuts at some point or other, some people lost their jobs and others had to go on unemployment insurance but we did not, at that time ask the Quebec government for compensation.

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, I imagine the Minister of Finance had assessments made. I think that in the public interest the minister should let us know the results of the assessments of the consequences of budgetary cutbacks and, given the fact that we have heard about the possibility that the savings resulting from those cutbacks might be used in job creation programs, I would ask the minister whether he will soon be in a position to tell the House about the special job creation program that will be implemented with those savings.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I would refer the hon. member to the statements made by my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration in August and to other statements we have made. We have reorganized our job creation programs to a considerable extent. This winter we will spend much more money than we ever have in recent years and we also have brought changes in the social field. These changes are now before the House, more specifically the increase in old age pensions and improvements in the family allowance system. That is the program we had announced: streamlining the public administration, a shift toward job creation, job creation programs and better social programs.

LABOUR RELATIONS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL FORCE PARTIES TO NEGOTIATE BEFORE CONTRACTS EXPIRE

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Considering that conflicts do arise at times in the public and quasi-public sectors, as occurred in the Post Office, can the Minister of Labour tell the House whether he intends to amend the legislation in order to encourage and to force the parties concerned to negotiate before collective contracts expire?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is an excellent suggestion, and I shall be pleased to consider it thoroughly, but I must tell the hon. member that, at this stage, the government does not intend to amend the legislation. The hon. member's suggestion most certainly deserves thoughtful consideration.

PRODUCTION OF GOVERNMENT DOCUMENTS TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister: it follows the answer he gave to the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby. In terms of the McDonald inquiry, have Mr. Justice McDonald and his commissioners had the opportunity of reviewing all cabinet minutes, documents and correspondence over the period under study by the commission, or has the procedure been that the government simply has supplied those documents which it believed to be relevant to the inquiry?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the obvious answer is that I do not know. I know the McDonald commission was given everything it asked for, and I know we have supplied things it has not asked for to make sure it looked into this matter in depth. Presumably, it has not read everything over the period of the several years covered by the commission. I suppose it would take years to do that. I honestly do not know if it has done that. I know it has been given everything it has asked for, and it will be given everything it asks for; and, I repeat, even more than that. I am told that in many cases the officials said, "You do not know about this particular thing; take a look at this file; it might interest you".

Mr. Leggatt: The Prime Minister has told us that the commission has been given everything it asked for. That presupposes the commission knows what it wants or, in other words, knows what questions to ask in order to receive the material.

Can the Prime Minister at least give the House an undertaking to provide to the commission sufficient staff so that all minutes, correspondence and proceedings of cabinet meetings which occurred over that period can be made available to the commission, so that the commission, can determine what is relevant to its inquiry and come to a fair conclusion? Will the Prime Minister give us that undertaking?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member means well, but if he reflects a little he will realize that his request is not really reasonable. It is not realistic for any royal commission to want to hire aides to go through everything which has passed through the hands of governments, ministers and officials over a period of years. That is why the commission is proceeding differently; it is proceeding by interrogating senior and junior RCMP officers, officials and ministers. The commission is asking them questions which, hopefully, will lead it to acts which are questioned. If some of them are illegal, the commission will take the next step.

If the commission suspects, from what someone says, that there may have been an illegal act, it will want to know about a document which would support or deny such suspicion. Then it will ask for its production. I repeat, we have never refused to produce documents which have been asked for so that the commission could look at them; nor will we. The question of publication is something else again, but in terms of access we will co-operate.

Mr. Broadbent: You didn't yesterday.

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the New Democratic Party has a supplementary question. Perhaps you could recognize him, Mr. Speaker.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

RCMP INVESTIGATION INTO HAMILTON PROJECT

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Can the minister make a report to the House on the progress of the RCMP investigations into York Place, in Hamilton, and when will charges be laid?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am a little confused by the hon. member's question. The matter dealt with in her question clearly does not come under my responsibility. I do not think I am responsible for the RCMP. I am surprised by the kinds of questions raised by the hon. member, because since the House resumed I have noticed that she has been very quick to rise under Standing Order 43 to bring forward allegations—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I apologize. My question deals with a Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation project, and that is why I asked the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

May I ask the Solicitor General about the progress of the RCMP investigation into the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation project at York Place, and when will charges be laid?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the investigation is ongoing.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POLICY REGARDING EXTENDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare: it relates to the ever-growing use of social insurance numbers, which the minister will recall were originally put into place to be used for social service programs.

Can the minister tell the House what the policy is regarding the extension of the use of social insurance numbers in a variety of ways to become glorified identification cards and numbers? Is it the policy of the government to encourage the use of social insurance numbers in that way?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, that question is very bizarre.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Bégin: The social insurance number was invented and implemented years ago, before the hon. member and I were in this House. It is with surprise that the vast majority of hon. members listen to senior members of this House who are against social insurance numbers. Most Canadians do not understand why one would not be in favour of the social insurance number.

It is quite in order that in the future social insurance numbers will be used more and more. More computers are being used in every department, whether provincial or federal.

An hon. Member: Nineteen eighty-four is here.

Miss Bégin: I simply do not understand the paranoia which is behind the hon. member's question.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Mr. Speaker, the only thing which is bizarre is the fact that an undertaking was given by the Deputy Prime Minister when he was responsible for the introduction of the social insurance number's program to the effect that it would be limited to social service programs.

Under those circumstances, and in view of the fact that the minister wants to look back, I remind her of the undertaking given, and ask her whether she is now saying that the government is encouraging provincial, municipal and private concerns to make further use of this number for identification purposes.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I want to answer in a common sense way, and I hope the hon. member will understand. I am responsible in this House for $14 billion per year which is spent by the provinces and by us. I do not want to see people cheating even to the extent of one penny. I do not know the hon. member's definition of social services, but it is a very large and vulnerable field and one bad example or abuse in that field should not be a reason to penalize all the other people in need in this country. I do not want any loss of control, and that is my policy.

AGRICULTURE

ADVANCE PAYMENTS TO POTATO GROWERS

Mr. Eymard Corbin (Madawaska-Victoria): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Agriculture, I would like to put my question to the Acting Minister of Agriculture. I would like to know whether a final determination has been arrived at with respect to payments to Elite and Foundation seed potato growers under the program announced in July. I ask this in view of apparent confusion within the potato industry at this time.

If the answer is no, will those growers in Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick who received advance payments in May and June be required to reimburse the federal government?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Acting Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Agricultural Stabilization Board is now reviewing the situation, and Elite and Foundation growers could be included under the plan. The hon. member asked about paying back interim payments which were made to all producers upon receipt of an application filled out by them. This was paid to all producers so that they could get assistance in putting in their crops. With their applications they also signed a document saying that if they were not eligible for the full payment they could be required to make a partial repayment. However, this has not been established in any way. I know the Minister of Agriculture is looking at this matter very closely and I think things will work out very well.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT THROUGH THUNDER BAY

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the minister responsible for the Canadian Wheat Board. The Wheat Board has indicated that grain sale commitments still to be met through Thunder Bay are in the neighbourhood of four million tons and that even if the system was operating at its maximum, which is based on a five-day week—and there are approximately seven to nine weeks left before freeze-up—the total amount of grain which could be expected to be exported through Thunder Bay is between 1.5 million tons and two million tons. Will any sales through Thunder Bay have to be cancelled or deferred in this shipping season?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Wheat Board had a very full sales program, including about as much as the board thought could be put through Thunder Bay and the eastern part of the system during the season. The strike of even fairly short duration will obviously have caused some new problems. Lake shipping may be a limitation, although even without that strike lack of supplies at Thunder Bay might have become a problem because of the low level of stocks. That will not now be a problem and what remains is to assess how close to original targets the Wheat Board can come.

I think the board will take the precaution of discussing with its various customers what reasonably can be deferred slightly in order to avoid a critical situation, and I am sure that is going on at the present time. I do not think the over-all volume involved need be very great, but clearly we have to look at all the alternatives, including whether any addition to the time the Seaway can operate is possible, or whether operations can be undertaken on a seven-day week or around the clock. If these alternatives are not already being used in regard to any part of the bottleneck, we will have to see what we can do in order to catch up.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, I take it from the minister's answer that there certainly is a very real possibility of either losing sales or having sales deferred, I suppose, until next spring or even into the new crop year.

My supplementary question is in the area of what we can do in the time left, the seven to nine-week period of operation of our terminals and the grain fleet. Is the government looking very seriously at operating the loading aspect on a seven-day week basis, including weekends, so that we may maximize to the fullest extent the handling of loads; and could he be more specific by indicating what, in fact, the government is asking the industry to do now and in the immediate few weeks that are left?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, there are some constraints and some reasons why it is not easy to just automatically move from five to seven days a week, and those include some of the labour difficulties and some of the collective bargaining agreements that are in place. I did indicate in my previous answer to the hon. member that obviously we will be looking at each of these possible solutions and, I said, particularly in the area where bottlenecks occur. In other words, if it is a limitation on lake shipping that is the problem, and not the cleaning of grain at Thunder Bay, then we will not solve our problem by cleaning more grain at Thunder Bay. We will only solve it if we can turn around lake shipping more quickly, get it back and have more loads and more trips by lake shipping during the remaining time.

That is what we are doing: we are identifying the bottlenecks, then identifying the difficulties which may lie in the way of moving toward the solution, like the seven-day week operation, and we will then try to solve those problems.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: 47 and 174.

[Text]

CONTRACTS FOR PROFESSIONAL SERVICES

Question No. 47—Mr. Orlikow:

1. For the fiscal year 1976-77, what contracts for professional services were let for studies, surveys and analyses into (a) present or future policies, programmes or information analysis and their efficiency and effectiveness (b) the examination of the administration or internal operation of the Canadian Inter-governmental Conference Secretariat?

2. How much was committed on each contract and to whom?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): 1. None.

2. Not applicable.

USE OF GOVERNMENT AIRCRAFT

Question No. 174—Mr. Cossitt:

1. With reference to the answer to Question No. 48 of the Third Session of the 30th Parliament which stated in part, that the Minister of Agriculture addressed a Liberal Party meeting in Brighton, Ontario, on April 6, 1977, is it government policy to permit honourary colonels to use Department of National Defence aircraft and specifically will the Prime Minister confirm or otherwise that the Minister of Agriculture was enunciating such a policy by declaring "I use Department of National Defence planes quite a bit because I am an honourary colonel"?

2. With further reference to the answer to Question No. 48 of the Third Session of the 30th Parliament stating in part: "Honourary colonels may travel by service aircraft to attend official duty functions related to Canadian Forces activities", was the Minister of Agriculture performing an official duty function related to Canadian Armed Forces activities when he addressed the Liberal meeting in Brighton, Ontario, on April 6, 1977?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): See reply to question No. 48, third session, thirtieth parliament, answered October 10, 1978.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO INCREASE GUARANTEED INCOME SUPPLEMENT

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 26, consideration of the motion of Miss Bégin that Bill C-5, to amend the Old Age Security Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, when the clock reached ten last night I was just about—

Mr. Paproski: To get into the bill.

Mr. Breau: —I was just about to give another example of how phony and hypocritical the Conservative position is on the whole question of improving social programs in Canada, and on taking a larger share of the economic pie to help those who are disadvantaged in the country.

Mr. Clark: Such as by equalization.

Mr. Breau: Yes. I am glad now that the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), brings up the question of equalization because I was coming to that, and I was coming to the position which seemed to be enunciated by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) yesterday during the question period regarding equalization. I suppose the hon. member for Rocky Mountain, the Leader of the Opposition, takes the same position on equalization as the premier for New Brunswick, his friend, Dick Hatfield.

An hon. Member: The re-elected premier.

Mr. Breau: The re-elected premier with 300 votes in his own constituency and the loss of three seats; that kind of re-elected premier.

An hon. Member: How many votes did you get in the leadership nomination?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: This is a fifth place speech.

Mr. Breau: The position of the premier of New Brunswick, I suppose, is the same as the position of the Leader of the Opposition and of the hon. member for Halifax, that we should not touch equalization, but should allow it to increase as it is increasing now. Does he know what the result of that would be? Has he looked at what the result of that would be? The result of that would be that Ontario would be a recipient of equalization next year, if not this fiscal year. The position of the Tory party is that Ontario is a have-not province and should receive equalization payments. If we leave equalization untouched, that is what would happen.

What we want to do with transfer payments to the provinces is establish special job-creating programs to bring about development in the provinces, rather than supporting provincial bureaucracies. We want to have programs like the two we had this summer under the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). That latter program was started when my colleague, the hon. member for Westmorland-Kent, now the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, was the Minister of State (Fisheries) and Minister of Environment. That program was a special job-creation program in the forestry sector, in order to make sure we have reforestation programs, and use the diversion of funds of the federal government in the provinces, not to help Premier Hatfield buy himself a plane, but rather to help people such as those of New Brunswick find jobs.

The concept of equalization held by the Tories is that because the premier of Alberta and the premier of Ontario have jets, the premiers of other provinces should also have private planes. That is their concept of equalization.

We want to use federal spending power to help people find jobs. We want to create jobs and to help in the development of the provinces, and that is what the people want. I am very happy the Leader of the Opposition has brought up the question of equalization. I am still waiting to hear their position on equalization because, like everything else, they try to be on both sides of the fence. There is no Tory position either on the part of that party here, the federal party, or the provincial parties. You cannot find any cohesion or logic in this party, or in the Tory administrations in the provinces either.

An hon. Member: What about the Liberal party in the provinces?

Mr. Breau: I hear an hon. member talking about the Liberal party in the provinces. I would like to tell him that the Liberal party and the people in the province of New Brunswick have just decided to put together again a strong Liberal coalition, and that they told the Tory administration of that province what they think of that kind of government, and that is what is going to happen across the country.

● (1212)

I said yesterday evening that it was very typical of the Tory party yesterday in question period, and in the debate last night, to be phony and hypocritical. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath)—I hope that he is going to speak in this debate—typifies the hypocrisy of the Tory party. I am not saying that he is a hypocrite. He is sincere and probably fighting in his own party to convince the bankers from Bay Street, the member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies), the member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the oil industry people from Calgary and the others in that party, to come to their senses.

A year and a half ago, Mr. Speaker, this government brought a bill into the House to change the UIC. The member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie), who had just come to the House at that time, got up and said that "we, the Tories from the Atlantic provinces, are going to filibuster this bill, stop it from going through because it is terrible for the people in Newfoundland and the Atlantic provinces." Then we had a vote on that bill on second reading and, of course, we, the Liberal members from the Atlantic provinces, had conversations with the minister, and with the help of the NDP the vote was forced.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who forced the vote?

Mr. Breau: The NDP. They helped us once again to bring out the hypocrisy of the Tory party. Not one Atlantic Tory MP came into the House and voted on that bill.

This summer the government brought out another proposal to modify the UIC. At the time I was fishing in the Gulf of St. Lawrence with a group of fishermen. The statement of the hon. member for St. John's East, the social affairs critic for that party, was to the effect that the proposals were terrible and that they were going to hurt the people in the Atlantic provinces. He felt that they were cruel and terrible proposals. I thought to myself at the time that he is being his own sincere self again, but let us see if the Tory party has changed. Just 20 minutes later a statement came on the air from the real power in the Tory party, the member for York-Simcoe, who said that the government should have been tougher, that the regulations should be more stringent, that the UIC program is too generous, and that the government is being wasteful.

I do not believe that the Tory party has ever said clearly what it feels the UIC program should be, but I do remember some members saying that a potential recipient should be 25 weeks in the work force before he or she is eligible for UIC benefits—or was it 20 weeks? What is it? Is it 20 weeks, 12, 8, or 40 weeks? I would like the member for St. John's East to get up and tell us what is the Tory position on UIC. What would their policy do to the women in Newfoundland, New Brunswick, and in my constituency, who are between the ages of 60 to 64—a concern of the member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), another example of Tory hypocrisy—who work in the fish plants for ten or 12 weeks of the year.

What would the Tory position on UIC do to the poor people in this country if it were adopted, if they have any concrete position at all? Some people say sometimes that the UIC is wasteful, that it is terrible that with ten weeks of work an individual can get 44 weeks of UIC benefits. The member for St. John's East will be telling us, because we are talking—

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member. I would like him to continue in the same vein even though he is not speaking in relevance to the bill. All I would like, sir, is an assurance from you that the rest of us will be given the same latitude later on today.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a lot more latitude. I would like the Tory party to tell us if they have a position on anything. Last night we heard the member for Kingston and the Islands tell the House how terrible we were to the poor women between the ages 60 to 64. What would the Tory party do with the poor people of this country aged 60 to 64, whether they are women or men? What would they do about poverty in this country at any age? What would the result be of a Tory economic policy, social policy, UIC policy, cultural policy, or anything? The result would be more deprivation because we hear from that party all the time that we spend too much of the G.N.P. on social benefits.

We hear from the Tory party continuously that in the ten years of this government, and the five years before that, it has spent too much on the reallocation of resources, medicare or hospitalization. This is the phoniness and hypocrisy of the Tory party, because they know that these programs are necessary and humane. The program of income redistribution, which the Leader of the Opposition was ridiculing the other day when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) brought it up, is something on which this party must decide whether they are for or against it.

I challenge any member of the Tory party to a debate under proper circumstances to prove to me that the social security programs brought about by Liberal governments in the last 25 to 30 years have not been a factor in the high growth and productivity of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: In spite of the fact that this country had the smallest work force of any of the major industrialized countries in the world between 1945 and 1975, we had the best productivity record because our workers were producing more. That is because we have medicare, workmen's compensation, and hospitalization, so that when people are ill they can be treated and go back to work.

I said last night that at least the NDP were honest in this debate and that they were speaking out of conviction. However, the member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) said just recently in this House that there has been more inequality in Canada in the last ten years. I do not think he knows what he is talking about or that he can read, to say something like that. Again, I challenge that statement because one can prove that whether you are talking about people, from a demographic point of view, about the regions of the country, about the economy or in any way, inequality has been combated and reduced in this country. We have more equity and justice in the reallocation of the resources of this country to the poor people than we have ever had.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Read the speeches of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

Mr. Breau: I read all her speeches, and I read all the speeches of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) also because he does not say what the member for Oshawa-Whitby says. I suggest to the member for Winnipeg North Centre that he brief his leader so that he does not get up in the House and make the kind of irresponsible statement that there is more inequality in this country than there was ten years ago.

Let us look at the facts. I have a quote from the Ottawa Citizen, September 1, 1978, written by Mr. Don McGillivray, a man who is not a friend of the government but at least he knows what the facts are. He says:

Old Age Security Act

In 1970, the highest average incomes were reported by self-employed doctors and the lowest by pensioners. In that year, the average doctor made $34,757, more than ten times the $3,455 annual income of the average pensioner.

● (1222)

In 1976, the year on which Revenue Canada has just reported, doctors were still at the top of the totem pole but pensioners had risen one space up the pole, leaving fishermen as the lowest income earners.

But the space between the top and the bottom had been sharply reduced. The income of the average self-employed physician had risen about 42 per cent to $49,310. But the income of the lowest recorded category had jumped 193 per cent to $10,144.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a terrible gap.

Mr. Breau: I agree with the hon. member from the NDP. That is why I think the NDP is honest on this issue. I am trying to use them to show and help me prove how hypocritical that bunch is over there.

Mr. Nystrom: Why do you not join us?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, that is a very interesting invitation, that I should join the NDP. I am not sure I would want to be a member of the NDP. I should like the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) to telephone the Premier of Saskatchewan—I am sure his relationship with him is good enough that he could call him on the telephone—and say, "Mr. Blakeney, have you agreed with the federal government that in this bill we are going to give $20 more per household to people receiving GIS? Have you agreed, Mr. Blakeney, that you will not increase low income housing rents? Have you agreed, Mr. Blakeney, that you will not cut people off from welfare? Have you agreed, Mr. Blakeney, that you will not take away that $20 per family?"

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: In New Brunswick, as we saw last Monday, it does not take long for a politician to be brought to his senses. I was trained in that kind of political action. I would not want to be a member of a party that would attempt to erase inequalities in this country and then not guarantee to the Government of Canada that as with the family allowances a couple of years back, as with the very generous and just housing programs for our low income people, that provincial government administrations, even the NDP, would not take that away from welfare recipients.

The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville says no. I will take his word for it as I know he is an honest man. I know when he gets Premier Blakeney on the telephone and says, "Allan, are you doing this?" He is then going to say, "I am not going to work for you any more."

I should like to illustrate one more point, Mr. Speaker. In her speech yesterday the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands said that on May 3, 1978, she put a motion and the government voted against it because the motion said that government policies were inequitable. First of all, Mr. Speaker, we never voted against that motion because the Tory party did not think that social security programs were important enough to make it a voting non-confidence motion. It was just one of those motions under Standing Order 58(11) where they did not ask the House of Commons to vote. Apparently the hon. member does not know the difference between Standing Order 58(11) and Standing Order 58(10). It was not a non-confidence motion at all. We never voted against that motion. The Tory party obviously would not want to test the confidence of the House of Commons on spending more for social programs, because there are probably enough members of that party with the sense to know and appreciate that governments need to take an ever-increasing role in society. We live in a period where governments should do more for people.

I want to come back to this article written by Mr. McGillivray, Mr. Speaker. It is a beautiful one for the NDP to recall. I challenge the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in the proper context—probably the budget debate—on that score. I have analysed a lot of this and I will prove to what extent this government has done something to reduce the inequities in this country. It is true that if you take the highest and the lowest there is a gap—too wide a gap. What that party does not say is that more people went up than came down.

The article continues as follows:

Edward Schreyer, when he was premier of Manitoba—

Mr. Nystrom: Who is the Manitoba Liberal leader?

Mr. Breau: When I read this, I would think Mr. Schreyer is probably a Liberal. He cannot be an NDP because he disagrees with his leader. Let me begin the quote again:

Edward Schreyer, when he was premier of Manitoba, caused quite a stir by saying that the top income classes should not get more than two and a half times the income of the average industrial workers.

But in 1976, the average doctor was getting just 3.7 times the income of the average employee (or 3.2 times after federal taxes were paid) compared to the 5.4 times of 1970.

That is 3.7 compared to 5.4 in only six years, Mr. Speaker. The rest of the article is not important.

There are not only widows or widowers between the ages of 60 and 64 who are poor in this country; there are not only people between the ages of 60 and 64. There are people 14 years of age who are poor in this country, people who are 18 years of age who are poor in this country, people who are 40, people who are 50, trying to put their children through university, and they are poor. I hear people like the Leader of the Opposition talk about this and the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Of course the hon. member for St. John's East never says that because he knows better, but he does not have enough influence in his party to shut them up. That is the problem. That is the difference between this party and that party. There are enough in this party who can say no to the people from Bay Street and to the right wing forces in the country who claim that you should slash everything, have tax cuts for the rich, have mortgage interest deductions for the rich and never mind if the poor have a mortgage or a house because that is not important—there are enough of those on this side of the House.

In the last 15 years we have proved that we stand up for what is right and it does not matter what the bankers say.

I am told that the minister for social services for Saskatchewan is in the gallery, so the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville will not have to call Premier Blakeney after all. He can ask the minister.

An hon. Member: He is a good guy.

Mr. Breau: He should be a Liberal if he is a good guy.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I wonder if my good friend from New Brunswick would answer just one question.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I will answer questions from the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville at the end of my speech.

When they talk about poverty and about reducing inequalities in the country, they should not be phony and put motions like the one the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands offered on May 3, 1978.

If the Tory party want to say that they want to fight poverty; if the Tory party want to say that they want to help the poor people between ages 60 and 64, whether widows or widowers; if they want to say they want to help people 45 years of age, 18 years of age, single, married, whether they have seven or eight children, then they just have to shut up the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the hon. member for Don Valley, the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Bawden), and the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who keep on saying that the Liberal party in this country has reallocated too many resources to the regions in this country and to deprived people in this country.

If one looks at the facts—any version of the facts—one can see that the greatest increase in government expenditures of the federal government has been in transfer payments. The biggest increase, the biggest share of the NDP—the biggest share of the GNP—

• (1232)

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Breau: The biggest share of the g.n.p. has been in transfer payments. What are transfer payments for? Medicare, equalization, more universality in education—that is an ideal that we will probably never reach, but it is still something one works toward—Canada Assistance Plan, old age security—that is not for the provinces—but transfer payments to the provinces. Those are the areas where the thrust of federal government expenditure has been for the last 15 years. Then there is DREE, housing for low income people—

Mr. Nystrom: Grants to Imperial Oil.

Mr. Breau: The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville does not like it when the Government of Canada answers to the forces of western Canada who say, "We want to develop more oil; we want to do more for oil exploration." Therefore we have a very good tax system which provides incentive for that. Again, he disagrees with the premier of Saskatchewan who wants more incentives for oil exploration.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: There is one deep and profound difference in the House of Commons and in the country. I agree there is a deep disagreement. On the one hand the Tory party has expressed that by saying we are reallocating too many resources of the federal government. On the other hand there is the other group who say that we should do more. It is productive to help poor people, it is productive to make sure that people have good medical treatment—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp).

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, it is my intention, like the hon. member who preceded me, to speak on Bill C-5, but I have to correct the record on a number of counts. Last night when the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) spoke I rose and asked the Chair to direct the hon. member to return to the subject of Bill C-5, and today he has simply proceeded as he did last night.

There are a number of items which must be straightened out because they cannot be left unchallenged on the record. It was a similar speech to the one given by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) not very long ago. I am the type of person who likes to analyse why people do what they do, and the only interpretation I can come to with respect to the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Gloucester is that they are worried. The hon. member was literally lashing out at everyone and anyone in an attempt to gain some political benefit.

However, I would like to point out to the hon. member, in the event he has not heard, that the Liberal party did not win in New Brunswick on Monday last.

An hon. Member: Three seats.

Mr. Epp: Last night, and again today he spoke as though it had been the Liberals who had won.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Epp: The hon. member also says the Hatfield government of New Brunswick lost three seats. May I ask him, with the most respect I can muster, how many seats did the Prime Minister lose on October 16?

An hon. Member: Five.

Mr. Epp: How many did he lose?

Miss Bégin: Is that relevant?

An hon. Member: Get on with the bill.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I will get on with the bill if I am given half a chance. I am saying to you, sir, that after the latitude you gave to the hon. member for Gloucester it should be pointed out that, in the event he has not heard, it was New Brunswick returned a Conservative government led by Premier Hatfield for the third time. This was a first in history for that province, a third consecutive win.

There is another point that must be mentioned to the hon. member, again in the event he has not heard,—"Yes, he did run for the provincial Liberal leadership, and yes, he came last". This makes me wonder if he is trying to vent his spleen on this floor at the frustrations he has. If the hon. member wishes to point out anything further, the seat that was lost in his area was in his own hometown because the Liberals could not get their act together.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member permit a question? He does not have his facts right.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, of course I would permit a question on the same terms as he permitted it. He said, "After my speech".

There is one further point, the most serious one, which must be corrected on the record. The hon. member for Gloucester attempted, in his speech, to give the impression that questions raised by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) indicate that we are opposed to equalization payments.

What must be stated very clearly is that the policy of this party, enunciated by the Leader of the Opposition time after time, is that not only are we committed to equalization payments but in fact that the principle of equalization would be enshrined in a constitution of Canada brought forward by our government in conjunction and with the co-operation of the provinces. That is the issue, Mr. Speaker. This government has unilaterally refused to accept that principle. So when the member gets up to talk about equalization, I suggest to him that he get his facts straight.

The hon. member also likes to mention what the former premier of Manitoba said about the Liberals. I know how desperate they are in that province; in fact they asked him to run for the Liberals. We are well aware of that. But even he saw the handwriting on the wall. He preferred to stay in opposition rather than risk running with the Liberals, so much so that just yesterday in the new riding of Winnipeg-Birch Hill the Liberals have no candidate. This coming Monday the candidate for Winnipeg-St. James, who has defended the leader of the Liberal party in Manitoba many times in court and in other places, is coming before the provincial executive to check whether he should resign his position. I simply say to the hon. member that before mentioning things here as facts, check them first, please.

After Mr. Schreyer was defeated as premier following the policies that he brought in and the economic mess that resulted, what did he do? I find this one of the most hilarious things going. He joined the market economy! He started a business and became a businessman. I wish him good luck. I hope he makes it.

Returning to Bill C-5, it has been stated quite clearly that this party is in favour of this bill. Basically what Bill C-5 will do is increase the per family guaranteed income supplement by $20 per month. I think all of us in this House could say that this is not enough, but I do not know if that is really the issue we are debating today. The fact of the matter is that we cannot spend more due to economic mismanagement. I say that again. The reason it has not been increased is because of the economic mismanagement of this government and the colossal waste this government has brought into the public economic affairs of Canada. I intend to give you examples of that.

I used to sit with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on committees of the House and I know she has a social conscience. She cannot convince me in any way that she is satisfied with Bill C-5, but it is the best she could get. Let us not have people getting up on that side of the House and saying that the $20 is as great as they are trying to make it out to be. It is the best you could do under the economic circumstances.

This bill will result in a public expenditure of $290 million in the calendar year 1979. The minister made an interesting statement yesterday. She said these $290 millions would be spent without additional cost to the Treasury. If that is the case, I take it that the only manner in which she can meet that payment is to make cuts in some other areas within her budget or the budget of other departments. I have looked at the budget cuts in her department and I think the hon. member for Gloucester should be very careful that the government, because of the economic restraints, will make cuts in that region as well, since it is impossible to cut back without either increasing the deficit or reducing the expenditures in some other area.

What I find interesting is this matter of the spouse's allowance. It has been extended for six months after the death of the pensionable spouse. Surely, putting all political biases aside, the hon. member for Gloucester did not think that the motion put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) back in March, which would have extended the payment to Canadians to 65, was hypocritical because, despite his rhetoric and bombast, he should be very careful with such an analysis on that count. It is my firm conviction that the minister would have extended the spouse's allowance to age 65 if she had found the resources. The amount of money this will cost seems to vary, depending on which economic factors you take, between $8 million and $12 million.

I want to put into perspective why the minister could not extend the spouse's allowance to age 65. Just yesterday we had a revelation from the Auditor General that in the Unemployment Insurance Commission there were overpayments in the order of $142 million. The minister indicated that the Unemployment Insurance Commission had, on their own initiative, found $65 million to $68 million. Last year the Auditor

General reported that there had been losses in the commission in the order of $95 million. When one puts those figures before members of the House, all of us must recognize that the amount of money which it would have taken to increase the spouse's allowance to age 65 is but a fraction of the waste and mismanagement in this one agency alone. I say to the government members: before you criticize, you had better accept the message people are giving to you, that is, that they have seen too much waste and they want it corrected. This is not government money, it is taxpayers' money, and all the government has is the right to use it as wisely and as properly as possible.

Just today the Minister of National Health and Welfare said she will extend the use of social insurance numbers as a control in social welfare areas. That is fair enough if such is her purpose, despite what we have heard in the past concerning the way in which social insurance numbers will be used. The point I am making is that there have been enough revelations of waste to make it evident that, if that waste had not taken place, that money could have been used for pensions to Canada's elderly and those who find themselves in desperate need.

The other point which needs clarification is the matter of Canada's so-called aging population. Yesterday, in order to prove the point she was trying to make that as social welfare programs are in place, the dependency factor will not increase as we approach the twenty-first century, in order to substantiate that basic premise the minister used the following statistics. She said that in 1971 Canadians over the age of 65—taking that as the retirement age—were approximately 8.1 per cent of the population. In 1981, that number will have risen to 9 per cent, and by the turn of the century, in the year 2001, it will be 10 per cent, or 3.4 million Canadians.

The minister was basing her arguments on the fact that Canada's population will be in the order of 34 million by the turn of the century. I think it must be clearly stated that demographers do not accept that figure. I admit that demography is not an exact science, but great strides have been made in demography, especially in the Department of Employment and Immigration, in its projections of Canada's population. I have taken a personal interest in demography and in the changes that the Canadian population will undergo as we move toward the twenty-first century.

I want to say to the minister that she is using a set of figures that are not being used by her own government. In fact the interdepartmental committee on demography does not accept the figure of 34 million for the year 2001, and consequently the percentage that she mentioned yesterday—that approximately 10 per cent of Canada's population by the year 2001, will be over the age of 65—is not correct.

Immediately after the second world war, in the post-war period, Canada's annual growth rate was in the order of 2 per cent, and that growth rate has been declining steadily since 1959. A figure that is used very frequently by demographers is the fertility rate, that is, the number of children a women would have in her child-bearing years. In 1959 the fertility rate in Canada stood at 3.9 children per female of child-bearing age. In 1977, the latest figure we could get, that rate had dropped to 1.7 children. What I am trying to point out is that that figure is substantially below the replacement value. In other words, we are still having an increase in the population, which will continue to the year 2001, a projected natural increase in the order of 26 million to 26.5 million because of the large number of women of child bearing age, despite the fact that, on a statistical level, we are below the replacement value.

There are two possible conclusions one can reach. First, if the minister's hypothesis is true about the population numbering 34 million by the year 2001, it will mean that the fertility rate will increase dramatically—

Miss Bégin: How do you know?

Mr. Epp: I do not know, but I suggest the minister does not either.

Miss Bégin: I do not pretend I do.

Mr. Epp: The minister did in the House yesterday.

The other factor is immigration. The government, by its own statistics, argues that in order to change the demographic distribution, that is, the age patterns of Canada's population, by the year 2001, we would have to have immigration in the order of 200,000 to 300,000 in order to change dramatically the aging population syndrome. The point is that this party came out with a clear policy stating that, in view of the additional number of young Canadians coming into the labour force and the additional number of women entering the labour force, up to the mid-1980s our immigration should be in the order of 100,000. We said that immigration then, at that time, resulted in about 50,000 so the net increase would be in the order of 50,000 per annum. I find it interesting, after the annual report has been tabled by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), and despite the criticism we received that that figure was too low, that that is the exact figure the department is now projecting for next year. As a matter of fact it is projecting that figure to the 1980s for the very reason we gave at the time.

• (1252)

I know there were a number of members on the other side of the House, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare, who said that figure was too low. I remember sitting in committee with her when she was arguing that immigration levels per year should be in the order of 200,000 to 250,000. Since she left the committee to become a minister, there have been some dramatic changes in thinking on the government's part. It is now in the area of 100,000. So the maximum population figure expected by the department by the turn of the century is more of the order of 26 million or 27 million, and if one allows any leeway for the exactitude of the size for demography I think we can look at a 28 million population as a maximum present assumption. So I believe the factor of 10 per cent should be evaluated by the department as well as the effect it has on the thesis the minister put forward yesterday.

This brings me to the point I am trying to make in my intervention this morning. We all realize there will be an increase in number of Canadians who are known as senior citizens. I deplore the fact that these people have been used political pawns. I hope this bill is not another attempt to buy the vote of the senior citizens.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Epp: I say that very openly. I say that because I think everyone in this House recognizes and accepts the fact that those who are senior citizens today did not have the earning power of the present generation. But they were the builders of this country, so they deserve attention which will allow them to live in dignity. I hope that everything we do to assist senior citizens is done on the basis of their right rather than on the basis of charity. This is the point which has to be stressed.

An hon. Member: That's it.

Mr. Epp: I am glad members on the government side acknowledge that principle.

As I said earlier, I am sure the minister would have wished to re-examine the amount of money available to senior citizens if it were not for the restraint program. Underlying this concept is an attitude which is developing and which I believe should be placed on record. It is this. While all of us recognize that senior citizens have a right to a basic pension and that those who do not possess any means should be entitled to benefit under the guaranteed income supplement, what is emerging from these programs is a division of the senior citizens into two classes. I am not talking about those who have the economic means to take care of themselves. I am talking about senior citizens who get the pension and the guaranteed income supplement, all the benefits available from federal and provincial governments. What frequently happens is that people who receive full supplementation qualify for ancilliary benefits from a provincial government.

What has happened is this. There are pensioners who get the basic old age pension and others who get none, or only part, of the supplement, either because they have paid into the Canada Pension Plan or because they were frugal during the years when they earned very low wages. But they had that mentality. Now they feel that because of those savings they are being penalized. They argue that pensioners who were frugal and who are in many ways no better off financially than those who are receiving the full old age pension and the guaranteed income supplement along with the provincial benefits, which vary from province to province depending on particular programs—I realize this is a difficult concept to explain and assess but what I hear from senior citizens in my riding office and elsewhere is to this effect—they are not saying people should not get the supplement, but they do question the penalty which is imposed on them in respect of extra income. While I believe there should be a maximum at which this should be triggered, I seriously question the concept that the person who has a small bank account and who wishes to retain that account and get interest from bonds or whatever, should immediately lose approximately 50 cents of supplement for every dollar of income. One can justify it if one looks at this matter strictly in terms of a socialist policy, but if one looks at it in terms of fairness, remembering that these people have built up the country, it does not seem so equitable.

I suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that we should re-examine this question of whether the triggering of the loss of supplementary benefits should take place as soon as there are earnings.

Let me give an example—I might stress that it is only an example. A senior citizen receives $400 or $500 of interest per year from bonds or from a bank account. If that is the only other income received, should he or she be penalized the full amount by way of a reduction of supplement?

Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I will be concluding my remarks in very short order. I mentioned earlier that we are supporting Bill C-5. The bill contains two amendments. One is to increase the guaranteed income supplement by a maximum of $20 per household. The second is to extend the spouse's allowance to six months beyond the death of the pensionable spouse.

It should be clearly understood that larger increases were not in the offing because of the government's mismanagement of the financial affairs of this country. I gave examples earlier. According to the Auditor General's reports of last year and this year, there has been waste in the Unemployment Insurance Commission, and if that kind of waste could eventually be eliminated there would be moneys available for Canada's senior citizens.

I also said earlier that I hope all hon. members will approach the question of pensions as if it were a right rather than charity. Too often increases in pensions are viewed by people in public life as gifts to Canada's senior citizens, when in fact they are earned through contributions to this country prior to old age.

As the lunch hour approached I was trying to make the point that as Canada's population ages, in other words, as the dependency factor for those over 65 increases numerically, we must re-examine what we are doing regarding the basis of guaranteed income supplement payments. Old age security eligibility has been changed. There is a residency requirement for those who were under the age of 18 at the time of change. For every year a person between the ages of 18 and 65 lived in Canada, or was abroad in an accepted capacity of foreign endeavour, such as employment with CIDA, to a maximum of 40 years, that person would get the basic old age pension at age 65. There is no argument there. What I was speaking about was this: the gap between what the person who receives the old age security pension and the maximum guaranteed income supplement and what the person who gets the old age security pension and some supplement but does not get more supplement because of certain earnings, is not wide enough.

I do not want to take away from those who need money under the guaranteed income supplement, but what is happening as we look at Canada's senior citizens is that individuals who have small bank accounts bonds, some holdings, or a small amount of earnings, are penalized. For every dollar of income they lose 50 cents of supplement.

I have been saying to the government for some time that old age pensioners should be able to earn a certain amount before the supplement is affected, because what is happening is that we are developing a philosophy whereby people are not saving for retirement because they feel they will be penalized. It flows from that philosophy that as all of us approach old age, the thought is that government "will take care of us." The reason we have seen an acceleration of this thought process is that senior citizens who have been independent, who built this country and who gathered for themselves a little nest egg for their old age, suddenly feel vulnerable because of inflation. They just cannot keep up. The expenses senior citizens are required to meet are not at all in keeping with the amount of money they have put aside for their old age. Constantly we remove some of the dignity which is rightfully theirs.

Far too often senior citizens have come to my office and said. "I have a little savings, I have helped build the country, and now I am being penalized." I am not saying that this should be open-ended, that they could earn any amount of money and qualify for a supplement. If that were the case, obviously the entire concept of supplement would be defeated. But let us not penalize those frugal Canadians who are now senior citizens and have some small savings. We should not penalize them to the point where incentives are taken away from those who will be senior citizens in the next few years. That brings out another dimension, the concept of guaranteed annual income.

Only a few years ago the concept of guaranteed annual income had much more political acceptability than it does today. An experiment known as MINCOME has been conducted in Manitoba. A guaranteed annual income was put into place in a specific area of that province. The program cost approximately $17 million. It was a co-operative enterprise between the federal government and the former government of Manitoba. The program ended before the provincial election took place. Perhaps the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) could speak more completely on this since the program was put into place in his area.

The people on MINCOME were taking away the incentive of people who were earning a marginal amount of money and, with a little bit of government help, would have been independent. They were better off receiving a government cheque, so they decided to go on MINCOME. Even if the financial resources were there, much more study is necessary before I could accept the concept of guaranteed annual income, particularly in view of the experience in Manitoba.

As a spokesman for my party stated yesterday, we are supporting this bill with the reservation that we are unhappy the amounts are not more in keeping with the actual expenses of senior citizens. Obviously they cannot do that because of the government's mishandling of the economy. In the longer term, I should like to see a much more detailed study of the effect government payments, such as the guaranteed income supplement, have on the independence of senior citizens. I hope the minister and her officials take my suggestions seriously. This group of Canadians is an ever-growing one, and demography indicates that this will continue to be the case. It behooves all of us to take a look at some of these developments before they occur, rather than attempt to take care of them after they are upon us. With those words, I want to say that I will support Bill C-5 at the time it comes up for division.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Earlier the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp) indicated that he would be happy to answer a question after he completed his speech. I wonder if he would do so now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Will the hon. member accept a question?

Mr. Epp: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Breau: Referring to the facts about New Brunswick and my home town, I should like to inform the hon. member that we won the seat with an increased Liberal majority of 40 per cent. In northeastern and eastern New Brunswick, we defeated two Acadian ministers who were in the Tory party.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member's question is not relevant to the bill before the House.

Mr. Breau: It is relevant to the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I suggest the hon. member poses a question which is relevant to the bill.

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, my question is relevant because the hon. member referred to transfer payments, social programs and equalization. Because of increased revenues to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan resulting from oil production and increased prices of oil, does the hon. member realize, if equalization payments were left untouched, that Ontario would be one of the recipients of equalization payments next year? If so, does he think that is a tenable situation and a good federal-provincial relationship? Does he think it is fair?

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I find it rather humorous that the hon. member is trying to ferret in another one of his views. All of us who have studied the situation know that if the present equalization grants were to remain, next year Ontario could become a recipient. The point which my party has mentioned, time after time, is that we would underwrite equalization in the constitution after agreement with the provinces. That is something which the Liberal party has refused to do. It was an issue in the election. I am sorry the hon. member is so touchy, but I want to commiserate with him as he gropes with the difficulty of trying to save his own backside and retain his seat.

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I am glad of this opportunity to participate in the debate on Bill C-5 to amend the Old Age Security Act.

After the Speech from the Throne, I said I was deeply moved to see our government responding to the needs of the sectors of our population where people most need our help. It is important that our old age policy reflect this intense desire of senior citizens to keep the full status of citizens, to keep being considered as human beings in the fullest acceptation of the words.

Those who have withdrawn from the labour market without benefiting from a policy of economic growth are finding themselves in a very difficult material situation because of the increase in the over-all prosperity and the resulting rise in the standard of living. Consequently, we should try to adjust incomes to the increased prosperity. I congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for her obvious interest in improving our social laws. We all know how concerned she is for the lot of small earners in Canada and she has once again proven it.

The government is often asked to do something about the deplorable situation in which older people find themselves but today, Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see that the government I represent is going to help senior citizens by proposing amendments to Bill C-5 to extend the allocation for a period of six months after the death of the pensioner and provide an increase of $20 a month for those who receive a supplement to give the surviving spouse a period in which to adjust. That will result in an additional outlay of $89 million for Quebec in 1979 but we should remember that money will be going back into the economy. Mr. Speaker, an old age policy should first reflect a deep concern for the dignity of older people and also help them maintain their personal independence to the fullest extent possible from a physical, mental and social standpoint.

The measures all hon. members of this House are being asked to pass are extremely urgent. When you think, Mr. Speaker, that in 1961 in Canada 1,400,000 senior citizens were left on their own because the members of their families were unable to take them into their home. The same goes for the province of Quebec where in 1961 740,575 older persons, or 53.7 per cent, lived with a member of their family, either spouses or unmarried children. In Canada, 89,028 older persons lived with people who are not related to them. This is due to a number of factors, namely the lack of sufficient financial resources. I believe we are all aware of it and should care more for our senior citizens' plight since there are now a large number of older people because of a high birth rate in the years prior to 1930.

Mr. Speaker, according to the final report tabled by the Special Committee on Aging in 1966, the elderly population in Canada is rapidly increasing. Based on a 65 arbitrary age, the number of senior citizens was 1.5 million in 1966. It has increased five times since then, which points to a three million figure around the years 1991. Those trends seem economically alarming, and they are matter for concern. Senior citizens are the only ones in the total population not to fully share in the general prosperity, yet they are entitled to more than those who have not contributed as children and teenagers.

The great majority of our senior citizens earned low salaries throughout their lives, they lived through the great depression and its insecure environment, they had little or no leisure, and they now are far from the affluence that would minimize the vital importance of money, because money is a factor in freedom and self-dependency. One of my constituents told me: "I was, I am and I will always be what I have always been". He wants to express his views with all his strength and energy. No doubt we are all aware of the gap in private pensions between men and women. The enormous gap between men and women as concerns pension plans is due partly to the fact that 60 per cent of women workers are employed in support services or in business where the level of unionization is very low.

There is another important factor: many employers have deliberately taken action to exclude women from their pension plans. Some of these actions are very subtle, such as the development of pensions plans restricted to employees whose wages exceed a certain level which very few women can hope to achieve or pension plans restricted to certain categories of employment where there are very few women. Other employers have been brutally frank. In its report on private pension plans in Canada in 1974, Statistics Canada shows that, at that time, 400 pension plans were reserved exclusively for men and provided explicitly that women were not eligible. Of the 400 employers involved, 47 had implemented a separate plan for their female employees, 93 had a plan exclusively for male managers and 270 others were in the transportation or the construction field where very few women are employed.

Another way to restrict female participation is to set different minimum and maximum ages of eligibility for the plans. According to Statistics Canada, in 1974, 1,400 plans had different minimum ages of eligibility for men and women, the usual requirement being 21 for men and 25 for women. Moreover, 1,200 plans provided for different maximum ages, retirement being usually set at 60 for women and at 65 for men. Employment is not a major income source for most senior citizens, but it remains a major element in the life of approximately 10 per cent of women aged between 65 and 70. Some of them are career women, mostly single, who choose to postpone their retirement, but most are women who need the money and must work part-time for very small wages.

During the throne speech debate, I talked a lot about the situation of older people. Therefore, I do not want to go on too long on the subject, but since it concerns me deeply, I did not want to miss the opportunity to show my approval during the debate on Bill C-5. I am convinced that all hon. members will support the amendment moved by the government, which increases the amount of the guaranteed income supplement by $20 for single pensioners and $10 for married pensioners whose spouse also receives a pension and which will be implemented on January 1, 1979.

[English]

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take just a few minutes to participate in this debate on a bill that will make two changes, one to increase the old age supplement by $20 a month, and the other to extend the spouse's allowance for six months after the older spouse dies.

Let me begin by repeating, really, the words of the House leader of this party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), who commended the minister for moving in a progressive direction. I just wish all the ministers of the cabinet were as progressive as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). It is unfortunate that a very conservative influence is now showing up in that cabinet with the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner), the Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), who are offering her all kinds of static when she wants to move in a progressive direction. I think that is a very unfortunate thing.

One of the things this parliament can be proud of, and which has happened in the last few years, is the progress we have made in the area of social legislation, such as family allowances, old age pensions, medicare, hospitalization, and things like that.

It struck me as being rather humorous this morning when listening to the hon. member from New Brunswick who was talking about how the Liberal party introduced medicare and hospitalization in this country. My seat mate, the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), sits here and chuckles. I am sure that hon. member from New Brunswick did not really want to take the credit for medicare away from that hon. member whose government it was that initiated the plan in the first place.

I was very amused by some of the statements made by that hon. member from New Brunswick. I am not criticizing him, but I am just reminded of something that happened in my childhood days when there was a big doctors' strike in Saskatchewan. The hon. member suggested that the Conservative party said hospitalization was too expensive. I am sure it did. I remember that the Liberal party in Saskatchewan always used to say that hospitalization was too expensive. They said medicare was too expensive. The Liberal party which we always had in Saskatchewan always said that medicare was too expensive. We had a committee in Saskatchewan called the "Keep Our Doctors", or "KOD" committee, and that committee continually fought against the medicare plan, particularly back in 1961.

As you know, medicare is a plan that primarily benefits two groups, people with young children, and our senior citizens. It is very humorous, but I think very pleasing and very positive, to note that the Liberal party is now doing a complete turnabout in being very proud of that medicare plan it fought so hard against in our province just a short time ago.

I want to point out this afternoon, when talking about increasing our old age supplement in order to help the elderly, that in the last few years we have come a significant distance in helping the low-income people of our country. What concerns me is that we have not by any means come far enough. We have not redistributed income in Canada in the way I think we must. The gap is still much too wide between the poor and the rich. My hon. friend from New Brunswick, and my friend from Montreal, both agree with that statement. We have to go a lot further. I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare wants to go a lot further in redistributing income in this country.

The concern I have is that in the last few months, particularly since August 1 when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was converted in Bonn, and sort of reinforced in Morocco, we have heard about huge cutbacks in government spending amounting to around $2.4 billion. The Prime Minister, in suggesting these cutbacks, I think was looking over his right shoulder. He was looking at the Conservative party and what it has been advocating, in general that government is too big and should be cut back, and government is spending too much money. They have suggested we should have more free enterprise in government, and so on.

I am concerned that the Prime Minister has listened to the conservative forces in our country. When you have cutbacks such as these, where do they cut back? They cut back on the Farm Credit Corporation, housing, and areas like that. We need to build houses for the people of this country to live in, as well as to provide jobs. I know the member for New Brunswick was concerned about these things earlier today. But they did not ground the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). As a friend of mine once said, if they had grounded the Minister of Transport for a year we could have kept the weather office in Saskatchewan open for three years. They did not pull the plug in the Prime Minister's pool or fire many senior mandarins or bureaucrats in the government. They laid off a few people, but in the main it has been people on the low income side, a few secretaries and clerks, people like that.

Because of those cutbacks, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has to fight hammer and tongs for a small increase for the senior citizens. I think this is dead wrong. A big issue in the election campaign which is coming up is going to be the whole area of whether the government should be cutting back and taking the meat axe to all departments in this country.

I can only look at what I know best, and that is the prairie provinces. There is the example of Saskatchewan's sister province, Manitoba. I remember Sterling Lyon, the Conservative leader there, when he campaigned against Ed Schreyer and said that the government was too big and had to be cut—"we can't stand the government doing all those things and interfering in people's lives". Mr. Lyon kept his promise. He is a good Tory and an honest one, and he cut back. The unemployment insurance statistics came out about three weeks ago and you can guess where the largest increase in unemployment has been in the last year. It was in the province of Manitoba where the rate went up by between 30 and 35 per cent last month over a year ago.

A large amount of that increase is due to the fact that the Tory government in Manitoba has cut back so radically on its spending, on funding programs for native people, on helping ordinary low income people and on funding to municipalities. We have the former mayor of Toronto here, and I am sure that he is concerned about this trend in the Conservative party being that, I gather, he is a good left wing progressive Tory.

The mayors, reeves and councillors were concerned about electing a Tory government in the Saskatchewan election campaign because they promised all these cutbacks on local government. I am sure that people in the House will be shocked when they learn what Sterling Lyon has done. We know that the inflation rate last year was 7½ per cent to 8 per cent and that operating funds for hospitals in Manitoba were cut back to 2.9 per cent last year. As a result of that cutback, I am sure that their health care is deteriorating and that a good many people have to be laid off. This almost makes Frank Moores in Newfoundland look good. The cutbacks in municipalities meant that many programs had to be cancelled and people laid off.

I am concerned about this most recent trend in our country of governments cutting back on spending. There is an alternative to what this government should be doing, and that is economic planning and resource planning for all people. Instead, however, we have conservative forces that want to attack the most vulnerable, the little people, the old people, family allowances, people on unemployment insurance and the like.

I have commended the Minister of National Health and Welfare for trying to help with pensions, medicare, and so on. We should be looking at what different political parties offer for old people. I could go over a long list of what is happening in the province of Saskatchewan where the old age pension is supplemented by a provincial pension plan. I can also look at medicare.

I was very happy when the Liberal party came around to introducing medicare and hospitalization in Canada. I am sure that if the Tories were in power even they by now would have done the same thing. But what do Tory governments do to medicare plans in this country? In my province we do not have any medicare, hospitalization premiums, deterrent fees or utilization fees.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Careful.

[Mr. Nystrom.]

Mr. Nystrom: I know that the member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) is very proud, as I am, of the plan.

But what does big, wealthy, Ontario do when it comes to medicare? For a family of four in Ontario, the medicare premium is $456 per year. If it were not for the opposition, the NDP and the Liberal party in Queen's Park, that premium would be higher than $456; it would be over $528 for a family of four. In Ontario the government collects more money from medicare premiums than it does from resource revenues. Even in oil-rich Alberta, with the billions of dollars of oil money that they have, the medicare premium there for a family of four is $196 a year. And to top that off, Alberta has all kinds of special fees and utilization charges that they put on people when they are sick. For example, they still charge $4 a day for each day after 120 days for level three and level four care in nursing homes.

They have the same thing in Manitoba where they just brought in a special deterrent fee of $7.50 a day on extended care patients. They are talking about bringing back medicare premiums in that province. All of this is because the party in power is of the belief that people should pay as they go, that government is too big and that we have to cut back.

This is something that cannot be overlooked in a debate like this because, if you are going to cut back on government spending, it is not the grants to big companies, the tax breaks to companies like Imperial Oil and so on, that are cut back; it is the money which goes out to the small people such as the old age pensioners.

As a wise old man in my riding once said during an election campaign, "The Liberal party may cut your throat, but the Conservative party will cut it deeper." I think that he is right when it comes to the social plans of the party.

I would like the Conservatives to get up in this House and to tell me exactly where they stand with regard to old age pensions, where they stand when it comes to cost sharing programs with provincial governments, to upgrade the care and incomes of the ordinary people, when it comes to medicare, hospitalization, unemployment insurance, and family allowances. I think that they have had it both ways for too long. That party has been asking for all kinds of cutbacks, but suddenly when people in the arts appeared on Parliament Hill yesterday, there was a Conservative spokesman saying to them, "God, this government has cut back too far," and that was the member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). When it comes to agriculture, they always have my friend, the member for Elgin (Mr. Wise), sympathizing with farmers and saying, "Well, I don't understand why they cut back by 8 per cent, and cut back on some of these terrific programs." When it comes to social programs such as unemployment insurance, we always have one of the two Bobbsey Twins from Newfoundland, namely, the member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), getting up and saying, "My gosh, they have cut back too far; they are going to hurt people down in Newfoundland." When it comes to the public servants where they want to cut back drastically, they have the newly elected member for Ottawa

Centre (Mr. de Cotret) saying, "Oh, no, I'll make representations to them; I'll make sure that they don't cut back."

One of the issues in a debate like this when we are talking about increases in the old age pensions is whether or not the members of this House are really committed to helping the old people. As the member for Winnipeg North Centre said, a $20 increase is a good increase, but it does not go far enough. We must keep the pressure on the treasury benches to increase the old age pension for those who need it.

● (1442)

Every time I go out among the old people in this country I find that a lot of them are living on the poverty line, not getting enough money to buy the nutritious foods they need, and in big cities particularly a lot of them cannot afford decent housing. It should not be forgotten that these are the people who built this country, the people whose sweat, toil and blood made Canada what it is. I think we owe them more than a small pittance in their old age pension cheque.

The second point I want to make is that we agree with the increase in the old age supplement and with the extension of six months for the spouse's allowance when the elder spouse dies. These are good measures. The spouse's allowance did not exist until a few years ago and, while it helps a lot of people, it still discriminates against single people between ages 60 and 65 who cannot work, and against spinsters, widows, and others. When I go knocking at doors in my riding, many people will say to me, "My neighbour can get the spouse's allowance—in other words, a pension; why can't I get it?"

Even if we pass this bill today, what happens to the spouses who were there yesterday and whose husband or wife passed away? And what happens when the six months are up? The old man is still dead. In 98 per cent of cases the survivor is the wife. She gets an extra six months of grace, but what happens then? Is she to go to the welfare office? The spouse's allowance has created a lot hardships, Mr. Speaker.

I know of a case in the city of Melville where the husband was ten years older than the wife. He had been a small farmer who retired to the city and bought a small house with the proceeds of his farm. All of a sudden he died of a heart attack, although he had not been sick a day in his life. His wife had turned 60 and had qualified for the spouse's allowance. She called my office to know what to do, and it was one of the saddest things I have ever witnessed to see her cry. She had lost her pension, her spouse's allowance, and she did not have any savings. All the money from the farm had gone to buy the house in the city. She was too proud to ask for welfare, but at age 60 she had no training or skills to offer. All her life her work had been on the farm and raising a family. I had to advise her to do the only thing possible and apply for social assistance. That is not easy for someone with the tremendous pride she had in the work she had put into our country and into raising a family. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says it happens to some 200 women every month, and I am sure the story I have told could be repeated by every member of the House.

I know if the Minister of National Health and Welfare were the minister of finance—and according to yesterday's Hansard, I know she wants to be—she would not be the scrooge the present minister is. We would not then have such discrimination against these old people.

My friend from New Brunswick says the minister is not a villain. I would be interested in knowing who the villain is. Is it the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? I know he changed horses, but he is still riding the same old nag. If it is not the Minister of Finance, I would be interested to know who the scrooge is across the way.

Our party has said for years that the old age pension age should be brought down progressively from 65 to 60 for those people no longer in the labour market. If that were done we would not be discriminating against people on the spouse's allowance who have lost their partners, and we would not discriminate against single people between ages 60 and 65, people who have been widowed and people in that general age group who need help through no fault of their own. I know that many people say that it is too much, that government has grown too big, that government cannot afford that. Still, we can afford that kind of money for empty buildings, and the kind of money for cabinet ministers to fly around in executive aircraft. We can provide that kind of money for tax concessions for big companies, so why is there not enough for the old people between ages 60 and 65 to provide them with their daily bread? The people who would get this money would spend it on consumer items and thus stimulate the economy and provide the jobs that are needed.

I know the Minister of National Health and Welfare is going in the face of many people on the rather conservative side of our society who say that pensions are too big, that indexing should not continue, and that the money should be spent in other places. I happen to disagree with that. I think we need a real stimulus for the economy, and the way to do this is to work from the bottom and put the spending power in the hands of the little people. They spend money on things like shoes, shelter, food, things that stimulate the economy and provide the badly needed jobs.

For these reasons, Mr. Speaker, I should like to encourage the House to pass this bill and regard it as another step toward making life more decent and humane for our older people. They are the real pioneers of Canada; they wanted a country that was strong, that was united, that had equality between people and between regions.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay this bill going to committee where I hope it will receive speedy passage, but I should like to offer a couple of brief comments. First of all, I want not only to congratulate the government but more specifically the minister. Previous speakers have made the point that the public mood today favours retrenchment and that spending on social issues is not a priority, so it makes me proud to be a member of the Liberal party because the social conscience of the party, which has been its foundation, is still there.

It seems to me that the announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in August, the subsequent announcements by ministers, and the decisions outlined in the throne speech on which we are moving now, the reordering of priorities, and finding the money to help those who need it the most, are most commendable things. This should make it easier to do the things that we know need to be done. We should be sure that those who need help the most are being accommodated.

I should also like to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). As I told him before the question period today, he always makes good speeches but I thought the one he made last night while I was in the House was excellent. I was also attracted by the comment made by his colleague, the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) the other day. He said that surely the debate in this House should resolve around ideas and not personalities. I thought the debate last night and most of today has been productive from that viewpoint.

As an aside, Mr. Speaker, I recall the first time I spoke in this House when it convened just after the 1974 election. At that time I commented that members of my family were related to the first woman to sit in the House of Commons, Agnes MacPhail. Some times I get some of the old Hansard and read some of her speeches although I regret I do not have more time for this. I say jokingly to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that he has given that kind of speech so many times that I sometimes wondered if he was not using some of her earlier speeches as a text. It indicates how slow social progress really is. It indicates why it needs so many people to be committed to it to keep making demands, because many of the issues the hon. member talked about many years ago in this House are the kinds of legislative action we are taking at this time.

I would also like to join with my colleague, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau), in saying to the official opposition that I think this is a moment of truth for them. Many speakers have commented on exactly where they stand respecting some of the social issues, preaching for government restraint and a cutback in programs. But the minute that there is a change they go out and champion everyone who is affected by it. I think this just brings out the tremendous division in their party, between members who come from slower growth areas who are supportive of this kind of legislation, and those who for political reasons, say a very different thing.

The position that members have been taking in the House on some of this legislation has been stated, but I would raise the point of what I think is more serious, and that is what some of them say outside the House. The difficulties that we have in advancing social legislation as a result of some of the very, in my opinion, deplorable positions that certain of them have taken, in terms of trying to convince Canadian people that governments are too socialistic or that we have destroyed the work ethic, and the kind of social objectives I am sure all members on this side support, are not in the best interests of the country.

Last night when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was speaking, he mentioned that he well remembers living through some of the depression years and how elderly people were looked after during that period of time. I am not nearly as old as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, but having been raised in rural Ontario it is not impossible for me to think back to the days when elderly people had a most difficult time. In the neighbourhood where I came from, people by today's standards would be long retired and would be receiving not only old age assistance but also the supplement. Presumably they would be living at a reasonable standard. However, not that many years ago these people were almost totally dependent on the generosity of their families, and lived in accommodation that was not the best. They had very limited opportunity to travel to occupy their minds, and at such time as the farm or other enterprise was taken over, their only occupation was to sort of vegetate. I think Canada has come a long way since then in terms of social legislation.

I am glad to see that we are moving on this bill. It seems to me the present generation of senior citizens deserve support and help almost more than any other generation. If one recalls, senior citizens of today lived through the depression. They were the ones who gave up a lot of economic opportunity to help the war effort, and they have not had available to them any of the programs that people who are middle aged or younger have had. They may not have had the opportunity to prepare for their older years as much as some of us have had.

I am also pleased that we are dealing with this bill at the present time because it gives us an opportunity to show that we do stand for this. I have been concerned, along with other members who have spoken earlier, about the attack on pensions, and the indexing provision in pensions. It is always interesting to note that the people who attack these things, generally speaking are well off and have very little to fear if there is any change in the indexing procedure or any change in the level of pensions. It is good to see that the government is committed to do that, and to increase further those rights.

I want to state, as other members have, that the next move will need to be to look at the spouse's allowance. It seems to me there is agreement on all sides of the House, at least from the speeches I have heard so far on this bill, C-5, that there would be little trouble in advancing that. I think I am correct if I say the cost of providing the spouse's allowance for those people between the ages of 60 and 65 who would qualify would be in the order of $600 million a year, which is some considerable amount. I would hope that in terms of reviewing government expenditures and the validity of government programs etc., before too long the money could be found, money that is being spent in other areas, and redirected to this area. In my opinion, it is a just and necessary social aspect on which we should move.

My purpose in rising was to make one point, and I would like to do that now. Perhaps I could suggest to the minister than when continuing to review the problem of the spouse's allowance some thought be given to a proposal I have been wondering about for some time.

Many women have come to see me, some were not even 60 years of age, but many of them have been receiving the spouse's allowance. Some women have come to see me whose husbands have died, and who have been left a home but very little money, and in some cases a small mortgage. I think members on all sides of the House would agree that it is a good social point to try to encourage senior citizens to live in their homes as long as it is possible for them to do that, and as long as they prepare food and look after themselves ably, and perhaps with the help of friends and neighbours. I am sure other members have had the same difficulty with representations, trying to find alternate accommodation, and there is never enough. The difficulty, of course, is that in many instances seniors cannot afford to maintain a home. It may well be that they have a home worth $60,000 to $80,000. They may be asked to pay $1,000 in municipal taxes. Some municipalities in various provinces have given relief on the tax aspect. With the upkeep of the home and payment of taxes, senior citizens have very little money left over.

It seems to me people in that position are in similar circumstances to farmers. They have worked hard all of their lives to get rid of a mortgage so that with the equity they will have some protection for their older years. I believe the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) made the point about farmers working hard during their lives, and selling their farms. In my community the process was for them to move into town. That was a way for them to withdraw the equity that they had worked hard for, and hopefully they had money left over after the sale of the farm to live reasonably well.

People who have worked hard and have a house in an urban area have great difficulty in withdrawing equity, and in still being able to maintain their house. I have often wondered why Central Mortgage and Housing or the private mortgage sector did not look at the possibility of negative mortgages. I am suggesting to the minister that she might want to look at this in the over-all review as a next step. If a widow is living in a house with some $60,000 to $80,000 equity in it, that person could withdraw from it, say, $10,000 to $20,000 in equity. There would be no repayment schedule on that, and at the time the person either died or had to go into a nursing home for care, or for whatever reason dispose of the house,—or at some stage the estate did,—that accumulated mortgage against the property would then be due and owing.

As far as I can see this would not cost any money. It would seem to me to be just as profitable a proposition as are standard mortgages. Perhaps this could be a role for the private sector, and for Central Mortgage and Housing to guarantee that type of mortgage. To thebest of my knowledge this has never been done. It is done in terms of certain provinces and municipalities which recognize the fact that municipal taxes are onerous for senior citizens. They set the taxes aside until a person dies. This money is then collected from the sale of the property. Perhaps this would be a way to enable seniors to live in their homes many years longer than they can afford to do now, simply because although they may have equity in their property they may not have the cash reserves or the income to maintain that house. We might allow them to withdraw some equity in the property, with no repayment schedule, and accumulate the interest payments against it. Then on the disposition of the house, either by the estate or by the owner moving to some other facility, that amount would be due and owing in a lump sum. I wonder if there is any validity to that. I put it forward to the ministers who are concerned about this when they next look at social assistance programs.

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, this is a very important bill before the House. I am glad to see that it is being treated in a much more tranquil and, shall I say, serious atmosphere than when my friend, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) had the floor. That is only right because this is a most serious bill, one which requires the serious attention of the House.

It is our intention, Mr. Speaker, as my colleagues have indicated, to support the bill and get on with it because of its importance to a large segment of our population. I congratulate the minister for bringing in the bill. I know what a difficult time she has in that cabinet over there. I know, for example, she has to compete constantly with her colleagues, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan), and all these other hon. gentlemen who make the minister's life really quite miserable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McGrath: We can certainly understand and sympathize with the minister.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I love my job and I do not need sympathy.

Mrs. Pigott: It's not your job, it's your colleagues.

Mr. McGrath: The extent of her success is somewhat of a disappointment. She will not, and indeed she cannot, explain why she was unable to persuade her colleagues to go all the way with respect to the spouse's allowance. How can she possibly justify the spouse's allowance for a period of only six months? She talked last night about these unfortunate women being able to take advantage of the six months' period to readjust by settling their estates, and what have you. The fact of the matter is that a woman who is in a position where she has to subject herself to a means test in order to qualify for the spouse's allowance obviously, by definition, has no estate. She has nowhere else to turn, she has no one to fall back on. That is a fact.

We have a bill before us which we will support. Half a loaf is better than none. We have a bill before us which will provide a continuation of this payment for six months after the death of usually the elder spouse. What happens then? What happens then is that that unfortunate person, usually a woman, will receive a letter from the minister to this effect:

We have learned with regret of the death of your husband. Please accept our sincere sympathy. We have to inform you that since you are a widow, you are no longer eligible to receive the spouse's allowance.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some sympathy!

Mr. McGrath: Some minister. I really sympathize with the minister because I know that deep down inside she finds this just as repugnant as I do, and she knows as well as I do that the people who receive that note from the minister, these unfortunate people, will usually have to swallow their pride under difficult circumstances, submit themselves to another means test and fall back on the provincial welfare agencies.

I am sorry that my friend, the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) brought in the question of costs, because surely you cannot put a price on this kind of thing. Surely the country owes this to its senior citizens, a country as affluent as Canada. The minister could have gone all the way and she would have received the support of everyone in the House and everyone in the country if she had made provision in that bill to provide for the spouse's allowance until that person was eligible for the old age pension. But she did not do it.

Indeed, it raises the much broader question—and this is a question which is quite appropriate with respect to the present incumbent in the portfolio of national health and welfare—of the Canada Pension Plan with respect to housewives. This is a subject which I know is very close to the minister's heart because she was, among other things in her distinguished career, the secretary of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. In its report, one of the principal recommendations of the commission was that housewives, the homemaking spouse, if you like, be permitted to qualify for benefits under the Canada Pension Plan.

Miss Bégin: No, we recommended a study.

Mr. McGrath: I read the report.

Miss Bégin: Obviously you do not know the report.

Mr. McGrath: I know whereof I speak, Mr. Speaker.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. McGrath: I do not mind being interrupted, Mr. Speaker, by such a charming lady. I will be glad to entertain a question from the minister when I conclude my remarks.

I do not want to misrepresent the minister. If she said that the commission proposed that this matter be studied or looked into, I will accept that, but the end result is the same. Obviously the commission felt seriously and strongly about this question of the injustice that was being perpetrated on a large, voiceless element in our society, and those are the people who take their responsibility seriously to the point where they believe that their place is in the home to provide a healthy environment for the raising of children which, in my view, is probably the most honourable and one of the most important things a person can do.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: But you know, Mr. Speaker, in this society of ours where roles are changing, where inflation has taken its toll—and this is a sad commentary on what is happening to us—it has become more and more essential for women who would normally want to stay at home to enter the work force. When you realize that what they have facing them in terms of retirement benefits, of which they have none, in terms of that awful letter which they will get from the Minister of National Health and Welfare six months after the death of their husbands, then you can understand the terrible conflict that must take place between a woman's natural instinct to remain at home and the quite natural instinct to get into the work force and not only help to provide for the family and offset the consequences of inflation but, quite frankly, to provide for her own retirement.

I hope the day will come when we can have a Canada Pension Plan that is actuarially sound to the point where this will be possible. My leader and my party are dedicated to this end. One of the first things we will do is to put the fund on a sound actuarial basis; and the second thing we will do is to make provisions within the Canada Pension Plan so that housewives, or the homemaking spouses, can qualify for Canada Pension Plan benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: My colleagues, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) and the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey), dealt with this at great length last evening and I will not dwell on it further.

The other important provision in the bill before us deals with an increase in the guaranteed income supplement, which is a very important part of the old age security system in this country.

• (1512)

While I commend the minister and welcome this measure, I say to her that we have to look beyond the provision of an additional sum through the GIS and consider the plight of older people in its entirety. This is a serious question and a sad one. Indeed, I think it is a blot on the face of Canada that this country, built up by those who are now senior citizens, cannot adequately provide for those people in their old age. I say "adequately". Obviously we do make provision for them under various programs but the fact remains that many of the senior citizens of this country are living in poverty. Many were not financially prepared for retirement, some because they never saved for the future, others because their incomes were never sufficient to allow them to accumulate savings, and still others because they experienced financial tragedies during their more active years. The consequence is that many of them are forced to live below the poverty line. The fact is that 48 per cent of the unattached people living below the poverty line are aged between 65 and 69. Those who are 70 and older represent 61.7 per cent.

There are those who say that indexation should be done away with. But in this area indexation is not, in itself, adequate, as is recognized by the bill before us increasing the amount of the GIS. Indexation is based upon the consumer price index, and I think we should examine that index to determine exactly how relevant it is to the plight of older people. I am sure the minister will agree with me that it is not an accurate or adequate measure of the position in which older people find themselves in dealing with inflation.

We feel that the consumer price index should take much greater account of components such as food, shelter and health care. I am not talking about sirloin steaks, or of food eaten outside the home. It seems to me that given the expertise which exists within Statistics Canada and within the government itself, we should be able to devise an accurate measurement of the impact of inflation upon older citizens. While there are those who might question the indexation of pensions where members of parliament or others are affected, I think there would be very few in this country who would argue against the concept of protecting senior citizens against inflation. If support of that kind is forthcoming, a heavy burden is placed upon the government to make sure that the measurement of inflation is as accurate as possible.

I submit to the minister that in present circumstances indexation based on the consumer price index is far from adequate. For example, using 1970 as a base year and $100 as the base rate, the cost of food as of September, 1978, was $211, shelter, $176.50, and health care, $168. I should like to see the consumer price index or a special price index take these factors into account. Let them deal specifically with indexation of family allowances and old age pension; in other words, the impact of inflation on low income earners in Canada. Of course, when we speak about low income earners, obviously the lowest incomes are those of older citizens who have to depend upon old age assistance as their only means of support.

There is general support for this bill and I want to get on with it. I want the House to get on with it as does the minister. We do not waste time on it because we all agree with this bill. Nevertheless, there are a few things that have to be said. I do not mean to inject an unduly partisan note but questions have been asked by the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe, by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom) and by the hon. member for Gloucester. You know, Mr. Speaker, they behaved as though we were the ones proposing this bill and they were attacking it. They wanted to know where we stood on certain areas of social concern. We stand four-square for social justice with respect to old age pensioners, with respect to low income earners, and I would tell the hon. member over there, who like his friend from Yorkton-Melville, is trying to corner the market on compassion for low income earners and the plight of the unemployed—

Mr. Breau: Tell us about the UIC.

Mr. McGrath: Let me tell the hon. member that long before he and his colleagues within the Liberal caucus of the Atlantic provinces were able to screw up enough courage to challenge the government on what it was doing with unemployment insurance and the impact its proposals would have on the Atlantic provinces, I made an official statement on behalf of my party. I did so on September 1, 1978. That was a full two or three weeks before we heard from the hon. member for Gloucester or from the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey). They did not work up enough courage to speak to caucus—

Mr. Breau: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. McGrath: Yes, Mr. Speaker, after I finish my speech. We set out our position on September 1, 1978, with respect to proposals put forth at that time by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) outlining the impact the government's proposals with respect to UIC would have on the eastern provinces and Quebec. I do not often quote my own statements, but for the benefit of the hon. member, whose great qualities and talents seem to have escaped his Liberal colleagues in New Brunswick because they turned him down for the leadership, and who campaigned in New Brunswick for three or four weeks in the provincial election—obviously he missed out there because they came second—I said the government's proposals to change unemployment insurance and put into effect a new employment strategy was a kick in the gut to unemployed and seasonal workers in the five eastern provinces. I went on—and this was an official communiqué on behalf of my party—to draw attention to the impact this measure would have on seasonal workers in Canada and especially seasonal workers in the four Atlantic provinces and Quebec.

This statement was made a full three weeks before we heard from the hon. member for Gloucester, and I would tell him as he sits smugly in his place—and I have great respect for him that when unemployment insurance changes last came before the House it was this party, and my hon. friend from Hamilton West (Mr. Alexander) and myself speaking on its behalf, which brought in the provision whereby the seasonal factor with respect to qualifying for benefits and the benefit period was taken into account and incorporated in the legislation.

The hon. member is not usually as inaccurate as he was today, so I will just mark that up to the trauma he has just been through not only in the New Brunswick elections where the Liberals lost out badly because of the position his colleagues took on equalization payments, but also because of the trauma he went through when he tried so hard, but unsuccessfully, to win the leadership of his party in New Brunswick.

Where do we stand? The hon. member for Yorkton-Melville wants to know where we stand. We stand four-square in support of income support for low-income families. We support without equivocation the concept of family allowances. We support without equivocation the concept of medicare. We support the concept of unemployment insurance. We do not support gross mismanagement of the unemployment insurance fund by this government. What happens when the Auditor General identifies $142 million in overpayments? Apart altogether from the impact it has on the Canadian people, what is the end result of that kind of mismanagement? It means a tightening up, and when there is a tightening up, all too often the innocent have to suffer.

The people who are legitimately unemployed and who are legitimately drawing unemployment insurance benefits find it much more difficult to qualify for benefits because of the growing mismanagement of this government and especially of the Minister of Employment and Immigration. We do not support that kind of mismanagement because it is obviously counter-productive to the philosophy behind the unemployment insurance fund. The hon. member for Gloucester knows that better than I do.

I could go on to our position on the Canada Pension Plan and on equalization. Where does the hon. member for Gloucester stand on equalization? It would be interesting to know that. He talked about it today, but he did not take a position. Having just been through an election which cost his party dearly because of the stand taken by the President of the Treasury Board with respect to equalization—and he knows it—I would like him to know where we as a party stand. We stand, and I quote from the Kingston statement which was the result of a meeting between the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the next prime minister of Canada, and four of the premiers of this country, as follows:

> We strongly endorse the principle of equalization and wish to strengthen it. No citizen should be deprived of fair opportunity or essential public services because of regional disparity. In any changed constitution, this basic Canadian principle should be fully and formally protected.

Does the hon. member support that statement? Can the hon. member stand in his place and say that he unequivocally supports that statement?

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member is asking me if I would like to make a categorical statement, and if the House agrees, I can make that statement now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It certainly would require the agreement of the House.

Mr. McGrath: Notwithstanding the rather substantial temptation of watching the hon. member swallow himself, I will resist and let him make his statement after I am finished speaking. I would like to see him reconcile what he is about to say with what he said when he participated in this debate earlier today.

Regardless of the economic situation we are in as a consequence of mismanagement and as a consequence of what has been going on in the government for the past ten years, I do not think as a compassionate people we can afford for a moment to lose sight of the plight of the poor and deprived in this country. Standing out above all others are those people in this country who, through no fault of their own, have no pension income, no private means, nothing to fall back on. I hope the day is not too far distant when we will no longer have an old age pensioner in this country who is deprived because of lack of income, whether pension income or any other kind of income support. We hope that day is not too far away.

I know the minister is a compassionate person. She has a big heart, but I know she has big problems when she has to deal with this cabinet and with some of the people opposite who feel that they have the divine right to power and that they have all the answers. I say with regret that I cannot for the life of me—and neither can many of the women of this country who will be deprived by this legislation—understand why this minister would incorporate in this bill a mean, inhuman provision which would cut off the spouse's allowance six months after the death of the elder spouse. That makes no sense whatsoever.

The minister talks about injustice. Let us deal with each injustice one at a time. Let us deal with the plight of the surviving spouse who has no pension income, and let us deal with the plight of single women. Single elderly women constitute a blot on the conscience and the face of this country. We know the plight of single elderly women. The minister knows it better than I, so let us go after these problems. Let the minister not sit there shaking her head, because she knows full well that she has to be accountable for what she does not only to her caucus but ultimately to the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Miss Bégin: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member has been kind enough to allow me to ask him a question.

[English]

The hon. member said he would entertain my question at the end of his speech. Knowing full well that social change is a slow process and that there is never enough money for old people in need in Canada, I would like the hon. member to clarify a point he started to make but did not finish in his speech. The total bill for pensions in Canada right now is $4.8 billion. With this bill we are adding approximately $300 million to that. How much more would the Conservative party like to spend on pensions in Canada? The hon. member spoke about realignment of priorities. We have never heard of any signe de piastre, as we say in French, or any dollar value attached to that. Of what is he talking? I would like to know.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, very simply, we would put no price on the correction of an injustice, and obviously the termination of the spouse's allowance six months after the death of the elder spouse is an injustice. That is our position. We are prepared to defend that position either inside the House or outside the House. Let the minister try to defend hers.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Breau: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was kind enough to say that he would entertain a question from me. I wonder if the House would agree to allow me to put a question to him?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Agreement would be required. Does the House agree?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Breau: Before I put my question I would like to say that my position on equalization has always been very clear. I support the program of equalization. I support the intention of the government to include the principle of equalization in a new constitution. I believe that the program of equalization—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recognized the hon. member so that he could pose a question. Would he get on with the question, please.

Mr. Breau: I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, but I thought the House had agreed a while ago that I could answer the hon. member. If not, I will make my statement later on. I want to ask the hon. member two questions with regard to the UIC and how it affects low income people. On the same day in September of 1978 that the hon. member made a statement about UIC, or the day after, the financial critic of his party, the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), also made a statement. Would the hon. member for St. John's East care to quote the statement made by his colleague?

Second, in April of 1977 the House voted on the second reading stage of Bill C-27. If the hon. member and his colleagues from the Atlantic provinces were concerned about that bill, why did he, the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald), the then member for Fundy Royal, Mr. Fairweather, and the then member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, now Senator Marshall, not show up for the vote?

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I suggest the hon. member should ask these gentlemen just exactly why they were not here. But I submit the question he put, reflecting on the absence of members who have been in the House for a vote for ten years, is not worthy of him—what about others who were absent.

Mr. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, at the start of the intervention by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), he stated that this bill requires the serious attention of the House. In fact, he emphasized the word "serious". We share that view on this side of the House. That is why we have been looking at the inconsistencies of the official opposition on matters concerning spending, as displayed in debates relating to this bill and others.

There are two dangers in this debate. The first one is for a party in the House to set double standards. The Tories have walked into the trap of setting double standards. They have demonstrated this attitude to those who have followed the debates over the years, as well as many people in the galleries who attend debates more than once in a while. On social issues in particular, members of the official opposition have said one thing in the east and another in the west. They have said one thing in Newfoundland and another in Ontario. For example, their financial critic said that they would cut public spending, yet their social policy critic urged for more public spending. Surely one must question whether there is consistency in the minds of hon. members opposite. This is the reason the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) made his speech. He brought to the attention of hon. members of the official opposition the shortcomings and gaps in their positions.

The other danger in this debate is that one could look at this bill in isolation instead of considering it as one further step along the road leading to the goal of better social security for Canadians. I suppose it is fair to look at it in isolation, but in doing so the Tories have walked into another trap, that is, looking backward rather than at the advancement and progress represented by the bill.

Yesterday and today we have seen a sequence of Tory speakers who have said that this bill does not go far enough, yet they end their speeches by saying that they support it. This bill is one of many Liberal bills passed by parliament which have established a fine foundation for social security. We have come a significant distance over the last few decades. This was emphasized by the hon. member for Yorkton-Melville (Mr. Nystrom). Canadians have told us that they support government expenditures for better pension programs. Perhaps I would not include in this group the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Construction Association or the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Workers or employees in factories engaged in assembly line work, construction, mining, heavy work or tedious factory work, tell us about their dream and hope of being given the option of retiring with a pension at an earlier age than the present one, possibly 60, as is the practice in other countries. Also, they tell us about their willingness to pay higher taxes if those increased taxes go into a pension fund designed to provide pensions at age 60 for those who want them.

The first group of people who will benefit by this kind of approach would be those who are recipients of the spouse's allowance. This group consists mostly of women who have been dependent upon their husbands most of their lives. Their dependency is real. When they lose their spouses, the widows can either apply for social assistance, which many simply do not want to do, or seek employment to support themselves, which is not easy. In many cases it results in women seeking jobs for the first time in many, many years. I am convinced the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) is to be congratulated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Caccia: She has managed to produce this bill in 1978, a year which will definitely go down in history as not an easy one. Also she produced an approach to family allowance which will benefit mothers across Canada. Because of her humanistic attitude, she deserves the support of all parties in the House, particularly the Tories.

People in my riding have indicated that the Tories are "the plague of the nation". I must admit I do not try very hard to change their minds. It would be much easier for me to answer these people if the hon. member for Simcoe North (Mr. Rynard) and the hon. member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) indicated where their colleagues collectively stood on old age pension policies. Where does the hon. member for Don Valley stand on this matter? What about the hon. member for Simcoe North? What is the stand of the hon. member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) who was in the chamber earlier? What about the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) who has just left? What about the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams) who is an influential frontbencher? What about the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) who was also here earlier? What are their positions on this bill? What is their general approach to old age pensions?

I see there are only three Progressive Conservative members in the House at the moment, so I will not continue questioning the missing ones in this particular regard. We should like to hear from the silent ones, those who have not spoken on this bill. When it comes to financial and economic matters, they tell us public spending should be cut. I would welcome a positive stand on their part. That would provide me with an opportunity to return to my riding and say, "Your are wrong, Tories are not the plague of the nation".

Also I would be able to tell them the Conservative stand on social policies and pensions. Where are they on this matter? Let us see whether the Tories can rise to the occasion and remove this clear impression of a double standard, a double standard set by their spokesmen and particularly their financial critics. The gap between their financial critics and their social critics is not only widening, it is increasing as the months go by.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, let us see some participation on the part of Progressive Conservative members that will bring an end to misrepresentations and devious interpretations of what the minister has said in the past. An example of what I mean can be found in what was said last night by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). I do not think it was worthy of her to have introduced certain elements of interpretations that are far from being accurate.

In conclusion, the fact is that this bill represents one further step along the road of reaching a desirable goal, that of giving Canadians a fine social security program which includes a fine program of old age pensions. This bill represents one step in that direction and has to be looked at in context with what we have done socially and what can be done within the financial means available.

If the official opposition feels that more should be done, then let its members give us a clear signal as to where they stand in this House and out beyond the walls of this building among the Canadian public. If there is unity within this House, and if there is a political will, surely more can be achieved. In this sense I must recognize that the NDP has at least been consistent in this regard. They support public spending and they have been crystal clear on this matter. Of course, what they are doing is just copying us.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Caccia: Otherwise we would not have introduced all these measures, including hospital insurance, medicare, the Canada Pension Plan, pensions and family allowances over the past 25 or more years.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): When did the Liberal party bring in hospital insurance?

Mr. Caccia: We have the very fine example of Saskatchewan, and I recognize that. It is very good that it was done that way. But you know, we did it nationally across the nation.

An hon. Member: No, you didn't.

Mr. Caccia: We sure did—medicare.

An hon. Member: The Conservatives did it in 1958.

Mr. Caccia: No, it was done in 1957, and it was based on legislation and proposals made by the Liberal government of that time.

An hon. Member: That's just not good enough, Charles.

Mr. Caccia: If the people really feel seriously about the subject of greater pensions, then there has to be a unanimity of intention, and that unanimity of intention has to come from the party in this House which fulfils the role of the loyal opposition. As long as that party is unable to demonstrate a united will and cannot speak with one voice, of course, we will not be able to make as much progress as we would like to make.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I rise with sad feelings to join in this debate. The speaker who has just sat down, the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), devoted his entire time to an election speech, castigating—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He is obviously in very deep trouble or he would not carry on the way he has.

An hon. Member: He sure is. There won't be a Grit who will survive in Toronto.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I would like first of all to remind members of this chamber of a motion put before this House earlier this year. It was quoted last night but it deserves repeating, particularly in view of the distortions which have entered this debate, starting with those of the hon. member for Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Milne) and continued by the hon. member for Davenport. In a matter of this importance and of such concern to the Canadian citizen, I find that to be beneath contempt. Let me read this resolution put forward by a party of which I have the honour—

An hon. Member: Of which you are a member.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): A party of which I am proud to be a member. The resolution read as follows, Mr. Speaker:

That, in the opinion of this House, the social policy of the government contains severe inequities for elderly Canadians, and in particular the House considers the practice of terminating the spouse's allowance after the death of the older marriage partner to be cruel and unjust.

The members who are now saying that this party has no social policy for the elderly voted against that resolution.

An hon. Member: There was no vote.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): If I may continue, Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: There was no vote. Stick to the facts.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Last August the leader of my party published a statement relating to this very area, and I take pride in reading from it. I am going to be selective as it is a two and a half page statement, but there are important aspects dealing directly with what we are talking about today. These are the words of the statement underlined by the leader of my party.

The Progressive Conservative party is very much aware of the difficulties faced by the aging in our society. Although everyone in Canada has felt the impact of the rapid increase in the cost of living, our aging, and others on low or fixed incomes, have been hardest hit by inflation. My party believes that for too long these important groups have been the innocent victims of the present federal administration's inability to provide the economic and social leadership which this country needs. We deplore the attitude of neglect which the Liberal government has shown for Canada's senior citizens.

Let me say right now that I am glad we are beginning to remove that difficulty.

An hon. Member: Who said that?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That was said by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark).

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The next prime minister of Canada.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Later in the same statement we find the following, and these are some of the principles governing the policy to which I subscribe and which were enunciated by the leader of my party:

Those who wish to continue working beyond age 65 should be allowed to do so, and we would act in those areas where the federal government has the jurisdiction to eliminate compulsory retirement.

In other words, we believe in preserving dignity. Some members here are working beyond 65. We have lots to offer, so why shouldn't we? That is one principle, and I am going to come back to this in the course of my remarks. The next principle is:

Recognizing that the components of the consumer price index may not necessarily reflect the major expenditures of senior citizens—food, light, heat, etc.—we would review cost increases in these major expenditures to ensure that the Old Age Security and Canada Pension Plans are at least adequately indexed to meet these increases.

• (1552)

A further one:

The provisions of the Old Age Security Spouses Allowance would be changed—

And there has been a change here in this legislation, I am glad to say.

—so that a person receiving spouse's allowance would not lose that allowance should the older spouse die.

The last quotation I would make from that statement is:

Canada is a country of unparalleled promise and potential.

That, I hope, is something that we in this chamber all believe.

Our senior citizens still have much to contribute in the way of experience and energy.

Here, we are harking back to that earlier principle.

The Progressive Conservative party is aware of this potential, and as the government we would provide the necessary support and encouragement to make it a reality. Those are the principles, the foundations, on which our policy vis-à-vis the elderly, is built.

I think that the deprecation which has gone on here this afternoon—part of which I heard and part of which I was unable to hear because I was attending a meeting of young political leaders from Europe upstairs—is most unfortunate. Part of the argument that has been launched in this direction is that there seems to be, in the eyes of those on the other side—and I can single one member out in particular—a notion that the Progressive Conservative party is talking out of both sides of its mouth.

The one thing which this government lacks is an ability to understand where to place its priorities, which programs to finance, and there are many one could single out. The cuts which have been made recently are in the most extraordinary areas. They must have been made on high profile projects in order to draw the attention and put the idea across that they are really out to impose restraint. Nonsense. There are lot more places where expenditures could be cut.

An hon. Member: Where?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The Auditor General has just told us of one. I will give the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) credit, in his capacity as the minister responsible for reporting to this House on behalf of that department, for arranging that there be examinations of some of the frauds which have been perpetrated against it. That is fine and there ought to be more such because $142 million went undetected.

I wonder if any of the hon. members present heard the report this morning over the radio issued by the Fraser Institute of British Columbia. I looked for the account in the papers, but it had not obviously reached them in time for printing. I heard distinctly over the radio that the Fraser

Institute, having examined the unemployment insurance situation in this country, reached the conclusion that 90 per cent of the funds expended in UI benefits were expended in either a wasteful way or to those who were unentitled to them. I do not know what their definition of "unentitled" is. I would not have put the figure that high, but I do feel that this $4.5 billion, shall we say, as large as the fund administered by the minister sponsoring this bill, has not all gone on an insurance scheme. I hark back to the meaning of the word "insurance". That is why it was established, but that is not the way it is being used, and that is waste.

There are other areas as well. I can think of the perennial redecorating of ministerial offices. It is only one thing, but when you have 30 ministers it soon adds up. There is also the annual purchase of new vehicles.

An hon. Member: Pettiness.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It may be pettiness, but if you add 100,000 petty things together you get a great big whacking sum of money. Another example is the Langevin block. I worked in it and thought it was a perfectly good place to work, but the government thought it had to be gutted. We do not know how many millions of dollars had to be spent on that. Moreover, that building was not big enough, and the big increases in personnel in the PMO or the PCO, whichever is there, caused them to overflow into the Blackburn building and the digging of a tunnel between the two buildings. Waste in government such as I have mentioned must be stopped, and could easily have been stopped long ago and diverted to looking after the elderly.

That is where this party stands. I will not bother giving more examples because I think that there is something fundamentally important in this bill and I do want to comment on it.

Reference was made in my leader's resumé of the stand that we take toward the elderly about the construction of the cost of living index. I cannot remember exactly, but I am sure that the minister can tell me when there was an adjustment to the guaranteed income supplement. The government proposes in this measure, which I support, to increase that by $20 a month with respect to a single pensioner and $10 a month with respect to a married pensioner whose spouse is also a pensioner. If I knew what year the last GIS additions were made, I would be able to determine from some material which I obtained from the library just before I came into the chamber what the cost of living index was at that time, and I would compare it with what it is now. That is only one aspect of it, but obviously there has been a great increase in the cost of living since the guaranteed income supplement was set.

There now is an adjustment being made, a catch up for those who have been left behind, those who have no voice or pressure group to speak for them except those compassionate members of this House. I would have liked to think that more members on the government side, instead of indulging in politics, would have indulged in some compassion. Those are their spokesmen before this parliament, and those are the ones who support this bill.

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

The other aspect is the consumer price index which, I believe, is to be changed in the weighting which was designed on the basis of a target group devised in 1967. I believe that the November consumer price index which is to be issued on November 24 will have a different system, perhaps a different target group and a different weighting system.

The present consumer price index is improperly devised for the elderly. I would like to quote three or four elements of the 100 per cent package. Food is 24.8 per cent of that package; health and personal care 4.51 per cent; recreation, education and reading 6.89 per cent; and tobacco and alcohol 5.96 per cent. The mere enumeration of those headings and the weighting which is attributed to them is sufficient indication, I suggest, that this consumer price index is not targeted on the people about whom we are now speaking.

I have made the case in this House before, Mr. Speaker, and I will make it again, that there ought to be a special consumer price index for the elderly. The whole pattern of their purchases is different from that of people in the labour market who have an income and prospects of increasing that income from month to month and year to year. When people are backed down to a fixed income, except for measures such as this they alter that pattern. Transportation is shown as 15.18 per cent, but how many people over 70 spend 15 per cent of their expenditure package on transportation? Those who can go out are either taken out by relatives and friends or they take a bus, and that is not going to consume 15 per cent of their expenditures.

There should be an adjustment in the area of health, personal care and housing. Housing involves heating, according to my recollection of the breakdown of each of these categories. By the time people have retired they may own their house and the carrying charges thus may not be as great as for people in the work force. But the heating charge is a portion of the expenditure pattern, and for the elderly I suggest it is much higher than is attributed in the statistics.

I think improvements could be made in the statistics, and, indeed, I think Statistics Canada should devote more of its efforts to devising an appropriate form of consumer price index which could be applied to the matters under consideration today.

In the last three or four months we have heard a great deal about our falling dollar. The last quotation I had showed it below 85 cents. I have heard there is a great deal to be said for a low dollar because it is helpful to the export market. There is no question about that, of course. In fact, we are selling our patrimony cheap on contracts that have still to run out. We are selling our coal and iron in semi-refined form. It is coming back on wheels and we are paying the import price. Those who convert that coal and iron into automobiles buy it cheap and sell it back to us dear. This applies to food as well.

Hon. members will recall that each year on March 21, I manage to get into that "thawing out" part of the country, which is Ottawa, daffodils for all members of the House and the other place. They are the product of a milder climate and are simply a symbol of the earlier season on the west coast where our vegetables and fruit mature earlier. That area is in competition with vegetables and fruit from further south that have matured even earlier, however. They are in abundance just as our fruits and vegetables are coming in. On more than one occasion I have made the plea to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) and his predecessors that we ought to have some preferential seasonal and regional tariff adjustments.

Mr. Railton: You have them.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In Niagara they are fine, but not on the west coast. That is another problem, Mr. Speaker; this government does not know the west coast is there. They have a few members from out there but they have no influence.

Mr. Railton: We have a duty right now.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In the Niagara peninsula.

Mr. Railton: And in British Columbia.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Apples, raspberries, strawberries, lettuce, tomatoes—I could name a whole range of foods which we have to import on a cheap dollar and which are costing a lot of money while our own growers are being driven out of business.

Mr. Railton: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. I have to correct that statement because it was mentioned in the House that everything was sold by our own growers.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Railton: The whole crop was sold this year.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will partially accept that explanation. The point is that we are losing our producers of food and we are importing at a cost of another 17, 18, 19, or 20 cents on the dollar from California or Florida. Our elderly people have to pay these prices.

Another aspect of this bill that I should like to mention briefly is the absence of any comment on or any rectification of section 12 of the Old Age Security Act which deals with the guaranteed income supplement and the earning capacity of the elderly. As my leader mentioned in his summary of the stand we take on old age security, we believe that the elderly should still be able to contribute and work in the work force, if they wish, either full-time or part-time, and the level of earnings should not have an adverse effect on the guaranteed income supplement.

We hear a lot about the universality of social programs from this government, but someone introduced a means test with the guaranteed income supplement. I think that possibly that was the correct thing to do but we should not be sanctimonious about it. Let us recognize that the guaranteed income supplement presupposes a means test, and let us accept it. I think there ought to have been some further comment. Obviously, an amendment cannot be moved on second reading, and I suspect it would be ruled out of order if it were proposed from the opposition benches, which would permit an elderly person on guaranteed income supplement to increase the amount of earnings without the guaranteed income supplement being reduced.

I am glad Mr. Speaker, that the measures in the bill are there, but I regret that there is provision for a penalty for extra earnings because that prevents pensioners from asserting themselves and continuing to make a contribution to society. I feel that the bill deserves our support, Mr. Speaker, and we intend to give it.

• (1612)

[Translation]

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill C-5, an act to amend the Old Age Security Act. First of all I want to congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for her statement in the House. This is not the first time, Mr. Speaker, that we on the government side say that more needs to be done for retired people and pensioners in Canada, especially since we feel the ravages of inflation. This legislation on old age security concerns people who receive the annual guaranteed income supplement and will qualify for a monthly increase of $20 starting on January 1. Other provisions in the legislation provide for the continued payment of the spouse's allowance for a period of six months after the death of the pensionable spouse.

Mr. Speaker, that measure by the Liberal government of Canada is welcomed by senior citizens in the electoral riding of Gaspé which I represent in the House. Most Gaspesians as well as most Canadians who receive the old age security pension and the income supplement still live in their own homes. Even though not the ideal solution to resolve every problem, this extra $20 a month for a couple will be of great help to pay school taxes, municipal rates and heating fuel.

In October, 1978, the old age security pension for an unattached person is $164.74 a month plus a supplement of $115.55, that is a total amount of $280.39. For a couple, the monthly old age security pension is $329.48 plus a guaranteed supplement of $205.22, a total allowance of $534.70 a month. In January 1979, that couple will receive an extra $20 each month, that is $554.70, while the unattached person will get $300.39.

Mr. Speaker, Canada and Sweden are the countries which have the best social programs for senior citizens. As I have said on many occasions, Canada has the best social programs in the world and Canadians are aware of the fact. For senior citizens in small municipalities with fewer than 2,500 residents the government has set up the Residential Rehabilitation Assistance Program—RRAP for short. Hundreds of Canadian couples have already taken advantage of that program and I must add, Mr. Speaker that such a program should not be abolished for a good while.

The insulation program for senior citizen housing is another example of social legislation to help needy older people. Mr. Speaker, I listened last night to the speeches of the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). They could not say one thing to show that this government had passed good legislation and implemented effective programs to help older people in Canada. However, they are happy enough that the senior citizens clubs in their constituency can benefit from the New Horizons program and that this government assists in building meeting and recreation facilities for senior citizens through the Canada Works program. Those are revolutionary programs and it is unfortunate that the opposition cannot recognize it occasionally. However, I applaud the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who said the following in his speech yesterday:

So, M:. Speaker, even though as a member of the opposition I am supposed to get up and condemn any minister for what was said at the beginning of a speech, I have to say that to me it was a delight to sit here this afternoon and hear the minister speak with pride about our pension legislation, to make it clear that it is here to stay, that things like indexing have to continue and that we have to continue to make other improvements for our older people.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Cyr: I therefore thank the hon. member.

I can find nothing constructive in the speech by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald). She likes to criticize, but she can suggest nothing to improve the situation of Canadians. She only wants to criticize. She believes that the government should do more for senior citizens, but her leader and her party are always saying that the government spends too much and should reduce its expenditures.

Everyone will recall that the Leader of the Opposition announced that a Progressive Conservative government would freeze hiring in the public service and reduce by 60,000 the number of jobs in the public service. In view of these proposals and his belief that we need to reduce our budget by several billion dollars a year, where will the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands find the money to give a pension to all Canadians between 60 and 65? The minister said yesterday that she would be in favour of giving a pension to people between 60 and 65 but that would cost the government $630 million a year. And we know that the Government of Canada gives over $1 billion a year to the provinces to cover 50 per cent of all social pensions paid by those provinces.

Mr. Speaker, it is not a shame for people between 60 and 65 to apply to their province for social assistance, on the contrary. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) says the federal government should pay a pension to people between 60 and 65 but did she consult the provinces to be able to say that the federal government should get involved in that field of responsibility? If the government of Canada were to pass a law saying that all people over 60 are the responsibility of the government of Canada and should be paid pensions, we would see the provincial ministers start crying that it is scandalous, and during the debate on the bills in this House or the question period we would see members of the opposition cry their heads off, saying: Why did the Trudeau government interfere again in a provincial jurisdiction

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I would like to see the proposed amendments to the legislation giving $20 to a couple or $20 to an unattached individual as of January 1 passed by the House in the near future. And I would be remiss if I did not congratulate the minister again for having introduced this bill in the House to improve the lot of older needy Canadians, and I say to the minister: Keep up your good work, the House is behind you.

● (1622)

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I had the privilege of listening from my sick bed to the speech that the minister made yesterday, which I watched at home on television. Let me say at the outset that I was quite impressed by the very impartial and non-partisan way in which she presented the case for this bill.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I congratulate her for that. I congratulate her as well for bringing the matter forward because, as has been indicated by other speakers in this debate, the principles in this bill are supported by the official opposition.

I will not speak very long, Mr. Speaker, because it is the intention of the official opposition to allow this bill to proceed through second reading and to the committee where its background can be examined. But I want to say at the outset that we support the bill, the effect of which is to increase the amount of the guaranteed income supplement by $20 for a single pensioner and $10 for a married pensioner whose spouse is also a pensioner, and to extend the spouse's allowance for six months after the death of the pensionable spouse. That principle is supportable, if not on moral grounds, which I think it is, then on statistical grounds.

Statistics relating to senior citizens in Canada are rather alarming as a result of inflation which has come about by reason of the policies of this government. Inflation is an extremely serious thing for senior citizens. Dealing with the value of the dollar in 1968 in terms of food for senior citizens, that dollar is only worth 43.4 cents; in terms of housing, it is worth today only 48.7 cents; in respect of clothing, it is worth 64.1 cents; in respect of transportation, it is worth only 53.7 cents; in terms of health and personal care, it is worth 53 cents; in terms of recreation and reading, it is worth 58.2 cents.

As Canadians generally have suffered from inflation, I think the impact of that phenomenon on our society—for which the government must take considerable blame—rests heavily on the shoulders, on the pocketbooks and on the peace of mind of our senior citizens. So when the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia), a few moments ago in this debate, asked where the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton stood, let me say to him, through you, sir, that the member for Grenville-Carleton supports this bill. Like the members of his party, he believes that the job of the government is to help the disadvantaged to the extent that society can reasonably help the disadvantaged, just as it is the job of government in a society like ours to create an atmosphere where those who are not so disadvantaged can use their initiative and their entrepreneurial skills and take the risks to help build this country.

The question was asked of me where we stand. I put it to the hon. member that that is where we stand and, in terms of the senior citizens in this country, our party does not take second place to any other party in terms of its support of their betterment and their welfare.

But there is one thing that the hon. member for Davenport said which rather disturbed me. He said that it was his party which brought in the hospitalization scheme for Canadians, that his party proposed a hospitalization scheme in 1957, just before they were defeated. Let me point out that there was a little catch to it, and that is that the scheme had to be approved by the provinces having the majority of the population in the country.

The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) called it for what it was, a fraud and a swindle, and pledged that if the Conservative government was put in office in 1957 those conditions would be removed, which they were. So the hospitalization scheme that we have today in this country has as its basis that which was proposed by the right hon. member for Prince Albert when he beat the Liberal government in 1957.

I think one problem that arose—I do not want to fall into that trap—is that this debate has not followed the example given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A little trading game has been played, a little political game on the backs of the senior citizens. But I will say to the hon. member for Davenport that he is wrong in what he said. I felt I had to rise to correct his statement.

Quite frankly, I wish we would follow the request made by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and extend the spouse's allowance all the way, as had been advocated before. I assume from what the minister said that if the country could afford it, it could be done. What she said to me is that she has consulted with her colleagues but because of the restraint program which is in effect, it cannot be done.

I do not think there is any person in the House of Commons who would not want to see this program extended if it could be, and I assume that that kind of investigation was made and the extension of that program was turned down. I would be terribly shocked if it were turned down in order to be advanced perhaps next spring, just in advance of a general election. I think that would be the height of hypocrisy and I live in the hope that we will not play that kind of action game with senior citizens or any other group in Canada. I think we have to be honest about that.

I rise for a second reason and that is with respect to a remark made by the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) about the equalization payments and the attitude of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield). As I heard the hon. member for Gloucester, he was saying that the hon. member for Halifax, the former leader of this party and former premier of Nova Scotia, took a stand the other day against equalization payments when he asked a question in the House. I heard that question from my sick bed at home and I heard the answer, and I must say that if that was the conclusion reached by the hon. member for Gloucester, then he needs his hearing fixed. I would commend to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that she invite the hon. member for Gloucester to go down to her department and have his ears examined, if not his head, with respect to that position.

I feel I have to say this because I come from central Canada. It is very easy for members from eastern Canada, from New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, to support the concept of equalization payments, but it is sometimes hard in Ontario to support that concept. However, I support it and I am somewhat concerned when I hear that kind of misconstruction placed on the question put by the hon. member for Halifax by the hon. member for Gloucester.

I have no problem supporting the equalization principle, nor does the federal Conservative party, nor does the Conservative party in the province of Ontario. This has always been the case. That is the reason we are here as a nation. The concept of equalization is so important to us in Canada that our party has taken the view, against the advice of some constitutional tinkerers, that we should have that principle enshrined in the constitution of our country. I say that knowing that there are some on the other side of the House who would like to say that as the mother and father of every social program in Canada they are also the mother and father of the equalization system in this country. Well, they are not. It is axiomatic that it is necessary in terms of our confederation, and it is supported generally.

● (1632)

The hon. member for St. John's East referred to the Kingston document which was the result of a meeting of all the then premiers of Canada who happened to be Progressive Conservatives. That number has been augmented to such a degree by the bringing in of Mr. Buchanan of Nova Scotia and Mr. Lyon of Manitoba—we almost had Angus MacLean by one seat in Prince Edward Island—and Mr. Hatfield has been returned, that the next meeting of premiers will almost be a meeting of Convervatives; we wait only one event, and that is the installation of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) as the Prime Minister of Canada. That is coming. Our system needs flushing out now and again and can certainly stand a flushing out now.

Our approach to federal-provincial relations goes far beyond equalization. There is the whole question of tariffs and transportation policy, a host of areas which have been left relatively unexplored, except as to user-pay, in terms of the welfare of the whole country. I thought I would make those things clear.

The hon. member for Gloucester also mentioned that it had been the policy of our party to allocate too many resources to help the poor people. I listened to him say that this morning. The Progressive Conservative party has never taken that position. What it has said is that we must begin paying more than lip service to developing a larger economic pie, because if we fail to do so we shall experience great difficulty in supporting economic programs to help the disadvantaged. It is in that area the emphasis must lie over the next few years.

This does involve the cutting back of government. It does involve giving up some programs which I for one, as a member of parliament, would dearly like to see. I represent the people in the national capital area. One of the issues in this House has been the question of grants in lieu of taxes. The mayor of Ottawa has said it is worth $150 a household because the government is not carrying its weight with respect to grants in lieu of taxes in the city. I would love to have the luxury of being able to say that the government can give that $150 a household, but I cannot honestly support that now, much as I support the principle. What is worse, the reason I cannot advocate it is not because something has happened in the world. It is not because there has been a change somewhere in the country—ours is still a rich country with large resources. It is that something that has happened to the government which has wasted those resources and opportunities over ten years so that this inequity cannot be rectified.

When the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) asks the government whether it will accede to changing the grants in lieu of taxes this year and rectifying the situation, the hon. member is engaging in window dressing because he knows that the policies of the party he has supported since he has been here have brought about an economic situation which makes it impossible for him to get his wish and impossible for me to get mine. It also makes it impossible for a lot of members of the House to have a great many of the programs they dearly want for their constituents.

That is the tragedy of the last ten years. It is not restraint, it is what led up to it. The attitude of government in the last ten years has been that we had a bottomless pit, that they could dig into it and continue to dig into it and there was no tomorrow. They did this in spite of warnings from the Economic Council and its predecessor, from every responsible organization in Canada, that there was a bottom to the pit and that the government's spending habit had to stop. Now we find ourselves in a position where, indeed, it has to stop.

Mr. Watson: What about the four billion in mortgage payments?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): The hon. member mentions the mortgage payments. Somehow or other we must begin to create an atmosphere of incentive in order that we can build again. Mr. Speaker, this government spills almost as much as it spends. The hon. member for Laprairie (Mr. Watson) mentioned the mortgage program. He says to us that it is too rich for Canada.

Mr. Watson: Four billion dollars.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): He dearly wishes he had brought in the mortgage program and the property tax deduction proposal himself because it is an imaginative program. But that is not the important thing about his intervention. It is this. While the government were saying that Canadians were too rich to deserve a tax break, that the home owners, 60 per cent of whom make less than $18,000, were the filthy rich and could not be helped, they were entering into and defending a deal for four office complexes in the Ottawa region under lease-back arrangements, the results of which were going to cost the government $179 million more than would have been the case had they gone the more conventional route. And this is not an assertion by me, it is an assertion by a Senate committee, headed by Liberals including Liberal Senator Everett and Senator Giguère, a committee which condemned the government for its flagrant squandering of public money, money which might be used to help constituents in Laprairie.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): That's the pity.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): As my hon. friend says, that's the pity. We have come to the point at which one of the central institutions for the public good in Canada, CMHC, is being examined by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, and rumors are that charges will be laid. That is maladministration. That is waste. That is some kind of wrongheadedness. But that is what we have come to. We have come to the position at which, with respect to Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) at the opening defended the indefensible and said it was an excellent transaction for the government. Robert Campeau stood on his hind legs and grinned into the television cameras and said this was a good deal for Campeau and a good deal for the federal government. He was only half right.

● (1642)

An hon. Member: What about the bill?

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I will tell hon. members how this relates to the bill. There is not another member of parliament who would wish more than I that the $179 million which was wasted on Les Terrasses de la Chaudière, the money spent on things which are going to be found out in the investigation of York Place, the glass monstrosity of the Bank of Canada which will cost us millions and which is a monument to the architect rather than to good sense, and the $210 million blown on the unemployment insurance program, could go to the objectives spoken about so eloquently by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) when I heard her speak yesterday.

That is the tragedy of all this. We speak of what we have done about redistributing income in Canada. From 1968 to 1978 the budget in Canada has grown from $10 billion to almost $50 billion, and yet the proportion of Canadian families below the poverty line is just about the same as it was in 1968. We have not succeeded in redistributing income successfully at all. Perhaps it is because we have concentrated so much on redistribution and not on developing the economic pie upon which redistribution could be based and on which a change in it could be based.

That is why I feel sorry about the situation our country is in today. I do not pretend to be any more compassionate than any other member of this House, nor do I take second place to any other member. But I wonder when the day is going to come when we are going to be asked to support proper social programs, and when we will have a government which has a real commitment to restraint and to priorizing in terms of where our country is going, so that we will not waste as we have, so that we will not dissipate the riches we have, so that we can give our children and our children's children some opportunities, so that we can do something about unemployment which now stands so high and so that we can do something for senior citizens who, when they speak to me about the benefits of this bill, as good as they are, say, "Mr. Baker, that still does not get me out of the problem in which I find myself". They tell me that they are worried about their future and still feel insecure.

We support this bill. The minister tried to say that I was insecure about my future. That is not in my hands. I am talking about the senior citizens who have spoken to me. They still say that, as commendable as these steps are—I commend the minister for taking these steps, and this party intends to support the bill and allow it to go to committee today—the government ought not to break its arm patting itself on the back. It has our support with respect to every worth while program. It has the support of all sides of the House. We just wish that in terms of the management of the business of the country the government would give us an equal dose of common sense. The Canadian people are sick and tired of waste and of seeing large tax increases month after month and then finding themselves further and further behind. When we put this bill through today, perhaps the government will bend its efforts to get to the root of many other problems. We will support appropriate social programs in Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): May I point out to hon. members that if I recognize the Minister of National Health and Welfare at this point, she will close the debate. The hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie).

[English]

Mr. Macquarrie: Mr. Speaker, could I say—

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council on a point of order.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, you thought the minister was about to rise and because of that you pointed out that in so doing she would close the debate. The hon. member on my left was trying to be recognized at the same time, and I believe you did not see him inadvertently. According to tradition, hon. members are allowed to rise alternately, and one hon. member was trying to be recognized who should have been allowed to speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): That is precisely what happened. While warning the minister, I noticed the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie). But I believe I had been given the name of the hon. member for York East (Mr. Collenette).

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry there was confusion this afternoon regarding this bill, and I am sorry that the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) went on for so long and denied hon. members on this side of an opportunity to reply. The hon. member was well within his time, but he showed the type of advantage which is taken.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is not fair.

Mr. Collenette: Hon. members are certainly not gentlemanly in that respect.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I shortened my remarks, but let me just say, so that my friends will feel much better, that we on this side are prepared to extend the hours of this House, if the government is agreeable, in order that the hon. member for Hillsborough (Mr. Macquarrie) and any other member can speak, on the assumption that this bill will go to committee today.

Mr. Collenette: Mr. Speaker, I have never seen the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton as unctuous as he was today, and it is certainly a sight to behold.

I strongly support this bill and, had I the time, I would have liked to go on at length and talk about the reasons why I am a great supporter of the universality of the old age pension program. I would have liked to talk about my experiences while growing up in Great Britain after the war when many millions of people were left alone and destitute. Many lost children and other relatives in the war, and the protection afforded by the state through the old age pension program was one means whereby people could maintain their dignity and their standard of living. I base my remarks on a great philosophical tradition in terms of support of old age pensions. One must remember that it was the Liberal party of Great Britain which was the originator of the social security program in that country, and it was the Liberal party in this country which brought in old age pensions and other social legislation.

I support the bill, but I would like it to go somewhat further. I would like to see the $20 which is to go to people on the guaranteed income supplement extended to everyone who receives old age pensions. About 20 per cent of the people of my constituency are senior citizens. Many of them live in their own homes or in rental accommodation. Most of them do not live in housing for senior citizens supplied by the state, in this case the Metropolitan Toronto Housing Authority.

Housing for senior citizens in metropolitan Toronto is probably second to none anywhere in the country. Metropolitan Toronto has a good program. There are good housing units there, but not everyone chooses to live in senior citizen accommodation. Thousands of people prefer to stay in their own homes or in apartments. That encourages a sense of independence and non-reliance on the state or other people. I think it is beneficial to the state that many people do remain in their own homes. The party opposite is always conscious of dollars and cents, and I suggest that by encouraging people to stay in their own homes or in rental accommodation we encourage a saving to the state because federal and provincial governments build senior citizen housing.

However, there is one problem with senior citizens who wish to stay in their own homes, and that is that with increasing inflation and especially increasing property taxes people are being driven out.

● (1652)

I should like to explore an avenue which is related to something brought up recently by the Conservative party in the by-elections. As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said, the Conservative party is concerned about social security and the state of our old people. In the by-election campaign, that party introduced a scheme of mortgage deductibility. Yesterday the hon. member for Brome-Missisquoi (Mr. Grafftey) castigated the Liberal party and referred to this scheme which makes the Conservative party the sheriff of Nottingham of today—those people who plunder the poor to give to the rich. That party would be well advised not to think of mortgage deductibility for upper middle income Canadians, but of course that is the vote they are after. They should consider a scheme whereby senior citizens would receive some form of tax credit to assist them in remaining in their own homes, a tax credit related to their property taxes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: The government of Ontario has such a scheme. It is a good one, but it does not go far enough. There is no reason why this scheme should not be extended right across the country. I am not a tax expert so I will not go into any great detail.

When the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) brings down his budget in a few weeks, I urge him to take into account the plight of people who although they may have a few thousand dollars in the bank, live in their own homes or rental accommodation but are being squeezed out of their homes and losing their sense of independence. Perhaps many people want to move into senior citizens' accommodation and nursing homes, but the majority would like to stay where they belong, where they lived all their lives, to encourage this sense of independence.

Such a tax credit scheme to aid senior citizens would be supported in the House. Certainly it is a progressive scheme; it is a Liberal one. It does not go along with the charade of a scheme introduced by hon. members opposite. Their scheme is punitive and would give undue benefit to those who least need help.

As I said earlier, the increase of $20 a month should be applied right across the board. In fact, if it can be afforded this year, it should be doubled.

Further to what the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia) said, the old age security system should be available to anyone after age 60.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) indicated that there are people who want to continue working. They should have that right to continue or choose whether they want to receive the benefits of old age security. Even though many people know it is their due, they do not like to admit, at the ages of 65, 66 or 67, that perhaps their usefulness to society is over. I can understand that. If they want to continue working, they should be encouraged to do so.

But there are many others who would appreciate pension benefits at age 60. I am referring to people who worked in labour intensive industries with their bare hands. For example, a mine worker at Inco, a worker at a uranium mine, a fisherman, forest worker, outdoor worker or a construction worker perhaps does the work of two people in his lifetime because of the physical toll taken by his jobs. With all the technological advances and the relative wealth of society in 1978, it is a crime that these people do not have the option of receiving the old age pension at 60 when they start to wear out, if you will. I recognize the plight of the government in terms of expenditure, yet I would like to see these programs go further.

The hon. member for Davenport alluded to the theme of the duplicity of the Conservative party. The Conservatives in metropolitan Toronto are preaching restraint. They are the Sterling Lyons of Ontario. The hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) and other members from the maritimes have a genuine concern for the plight of the less favoured regions of Canada. They come to the House and attempt to come to grips with statements made by their colleagues elsewhere. I feel sorry for them and their party because they will never resolve these differences; their positions are so rigid.

Over the years the government has succeeded in coming to terms with the less favoured regions of the country by assisting them. This has been achieved by people in the wealthy provinces, like myself and other members from Ontario, such as the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton), the hon. member for Bruce-Grey (Mr. Douglas), the hon. member for Davenport, and the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts). We are not faced with the same problems of the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton when defending equalization in Ontario. We were the ones who pushed it through. Perhaps the Conservative party has some difficulty with this problem, but the Liberals do not suffer embarrassment by helping those Canadians who need help the most.

Old Age Security Act

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being after five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

POLICY REGARDING EXTENDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the position of the government, as enunciated by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, to actively encourage the expanded use of social insurance numbers outside of social service programs by all levels of government, contrary to the long-standing undertaking of the government to restrict the use, and in view of the serious questions arising from this extended use as they relate to invasion of privacy of the citizen, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That this House directs the government to immediately introduce legislation setting forth guidelines and limitations on the use of social insurance or other identification numbers, to protect the rights of citizens against abuses arising from the expansion, without parliamentary approval, of the use of social insurance numbers.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

PUBLIC SERVICE

RIGHT TO STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that, according to published reports yesterday, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) stated that if he were prime minister he would end the public service's right to strike, while at the same time his own party's labour critic was also reported yesterday as stating that if he were labour minister he would not take away the right to strike from the public service, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House, noting the potentially disastrous conflict between two of its members, call upon the Minister of Labour to intervene to resolve this dispute before this issue becomes a permanent split or a lock-out takes place.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRADE

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON GATT NEGOTIATIONS AT GENEVA

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, may I put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister who is leading a rump government here today? I guess the rest of the rump is over at the Confederation Centre.

We have not had a progress report on the GATT negotiations for months, and there is considerable alarm in Canada about the progress of GATT as the negotiations have to conclude by the middle of December. We have had newspaper reports that the Japanese and the EEC offers are unsatisfactory to Canada, that nothing has been offered in fisheries, farm products, forest products, non-ferrous metals and agricultural products.

Would the minister bring the House up to date on what is happening at Geneva? Are these reports accurate that the EEC and Japanese offers are unsatisfactory to Canada? If so, what is our strategy? We only have two months to go to the end of the negotiations. Would the minister agree to a full briefing of parliament and arrange time for a debate on these negotiations before they are concluded?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): On the question of briefing of members of parliament, Mr. Speaker, I would be quite ready to have our chief delegate, Mr. Warren, meet with members of opposition parties to have an intensive briefing on the progress of negotiations.

On the question of the deadline, it is true that there is an enormous amount of work to be completed before the deadline suggested, which is some time in December. It is a negotiating session. For example, the European community at one point put on the table certain industrial tariff offers, and later there were certain withdrawals. Whether these are permanent withdrawals or a negotiating technique is uncertain at this time. In any event, we have not yet secured what we regard as advantageous offers from all the participants in the negotiations.

Of course, when it comes to the end of the game, Canada will have to decide whether the benefits we receive justify maintenance of the offers we have put on the table at the conference, so it is much too early to conclude what the results will be. I suggest there is quite a lot of work to do yet, and certainly we are not satisfied that our objectives have been fully met by the proposals that have been put on the table by the major industrial countries.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. It is always difficult to pin the Deputy Prime Minister down, so I should like to ask a more specific question. The government now has this report by the second tier committee. The government has a lot of "tears", I know, but this is the second tier committee. The 23-industry task force report recommends as follows at page 13, paragraph 4:

There are certain manufacturing industries that are vital and where any degree of reduction in protection would be disastrous at this time.

They recommend that these industries be completely exempted from the Tokyo Round. They point to clothing and textiles, which they say is the key case, employing close to 200,000 workers. Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell me if the government has exempted the clothing and textile sector of Canadian industry from any lowering of tariffs in the GATT negotiations? Could he also tell me if any other industries have been exempted? Has Canada exempted any industries, in particular clothing and textiles, as recommended?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is provision for exemptions or exceptions from the over-all tariff cut that was proposed, but there is a limit to the number of exemptions that can be introduced because it requires compensation across the board in order to maintain the total tariff cuts.

Let me say, in the case of textiles, that at the present time there are not likely to be substantial cuts taking place at the multilateral trade negotiations. The concerns which the hon. member expressed are shared by quite a number of other countries. It is unlikely that the textile industry will experience the deep cuts that could occur in accordance with the general tariff formula.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, we are getting a tremendous amount of lack of information in these replies. I will try again in the fisheries sector.

• (1117)

Is it true that the European Economic Community has told Canada that they are not going to reduce their tariffs on Canadian fishery products unless Canada gives them assurance that they will have definite quotas for catching fish species within Canada's 200-mile economic zone? Is that a position taken by the European Economic Community?

Would the Deputy Prime Minister also tell me whether he is going to arrange, not only for a private briefing of members of parliament but for a public briefing of parliament so that the public and industry will know what our position is; and will he provide debating time before any conclusions are reached at Geneva? So there are two aspects to that question, on the specific question of the fishery and the EEC, because the fishing industry of Canada is very much involved in that, and as well the question of public information and debate, which is badly needed.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, there is, to my knowledge, no suggestion that we ought to link the access of Canadian products into the community with commitments that certain quotas would be provided for fish in Canadian territory. Certainly, we would oppose that particular kind of approach because it is understood, within the framework of the negotiations, that countries will make offers and concessions to other countries in return for access to their markets. The principle is one of reciprocity within the framework of the negotiations, and certainly it would be alien to that principle to introduce fish quotas as part of the negotiating process.

With respect to the other question, I cannot assure the hon. member that I could put aside a day for a debate, because of the press of business; but the budget debate will be coming forward and I will undertake at that time to give the House, or have one of my colleagues give the House, as complete a statement on the progress up to date and the difficulties, so that hon. members in that debate, if they so wish, may reply and express their views.

GATT NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. With time running out in the negotiations, what can Canadian farmers expect from the MTN after the negotiations have concluded? Can the minister indicate in general parameters what we can expect in terms of agriculture?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is much too early in the field of agriculture to say. We are attempting to increase access, for example, in the European community for agricultural products and, as the hon. member knows, there is a parallel discussion going on with respect to grains related to the negotiations at Geneva. But it is not possible to say at the moment what agriculture can expect, any more than it is possible to say what manufacturers in the country can expect at the conclusion of the negotiations.

We are pressing ahead to secure the greatest possible access to other markets for all products; that is to say, industrial products, agricultural products and fisheries, and in return for that we expect to be asked to make reciprocal decisions. We have to balance both together at the end of the day to ensure that Canada has received a good deal.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, the minister's general comments this morning give one some indication that the talks are not going very well, that all countries have really bogged down, especially in some of the very important areas, and maybe agriculture is one. Japan is of particular concern to agricultural producers because of the protectionistic policies that it has adhered to in the past.

My question is this: in the specific area of Japan, have we gained any access at all to the Japanese market in the areas of meat, and specifically we are talking about pork and pork products?

● (1122)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I regret that I cannot reply specifically on the question of meat and pork products with regard to the Japanese market. Let me say that, in general, the initial Japanese offers made in the negotiations were, in our view, unsatisfactory and in concert with, certainly, the United States and the European community we have been pressing Japan to improve its offer. Some improvement has taken place. We would press for further improvement, particularly in view of the very heavy current account surplus that Japan is presently running with the rest of the world. This is one of the objectives that is certainly behind the negotiations at Geneva, to gain greater access or to sell more in the Japanese market in view of the very great sales being made by Japan in the rest of the world.

POST OFFICE

ADDITIONAL PERSONS TO ASSIST MEDIATOR-ARBITRATOR IN SETTLING LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Labour. In attempting to get a just resolution of the postal dispute, the Acting Minister of Labour indicated last week that he accepted the need to add to Judge Tremblay two persons, one representing the union and one representing the Post Office.

Considering that the Acting Minister of Labour has indicated that the government would not add two additional mediator-arbitrators with authority to sign the final report but, instead, has recommended simply the addition of two assessors or advisers, can he tell the House whether the government had any further thoughts on this important matter over the weekend?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, one would hope that if the government does not think during the week, it would do so on weekends.

In a much more serious vein, I have a supplementary question in light of the minister's answer. Considering that the assessors the government is recommending will have no authority to sign the final report, will the minister agree that as a consequence they will not have the bargaining power that is essential, either with the union or the Post Office on the one hand, or with Judge Tremblay on the other, that is necessary to get a final settlement which does justice to the workers and brings continuous peace in the Post Office?

Mr. Ouellet: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with that line of thinking by the Leader of the New Democratic Party. I feel that the addition of two assessors will be very helpful and constructive with regard to the work that must be done by Judge Tremblay. We must remember that the responsibility of the mediator-arbitrator, in the final analysis, if he cannot bring the two parties together by successful mediation, will be to draft a collective agreement in his role as arbitrator. This collective agreement will be imposed on both parties. Having two assessors to help him in his work while acting as mediator could be very helpful and constructive. However, adding two persons to the team to draft a collective agreement could result in three collective agreements. That would be very bad.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows very well that an amendment could be introduced, and I am sure there would be agreement on both sides of the House to give it quick passage, to give the chairman, Judge Tremblay, final authority in cases where there is not unanimous agreement to make the binding recommendation. That problem could be removed.

Does the minister not agree that having spokesmen with authority to sign the final report would be much more effective with regard to reaching a final resolution, because the two people would not simply be advisers: they could bargain with the union and the Post Office and, indeed, in the final analysis with the chairman, in getting a much more favourable solution?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, that would put some doubt on the ability and impartiality of the mediator-arbitrator. I think he must be able to carry out his responsibility and bring about a fair and just collective agreement.

● (1127)

It is one thing to say we shall add two assessors to help the mediator-arbitrator in his work, but it is another thing to say, after the fact, that in order to please some postal employees we should change the mandate which has been issued by this House to the mediator-arbitrator and put a new team in place which could probably satisfy some union leaders. I submit to the hon. member that the course of action offered to the employees to appoint someone as an assessor who would help the mediator-arbitrator in his work is, by its nature, a giant step forward in an attempt to solve this dispute. It should be regarded as a positive gesture by the government and not be considered as just another step in the negotiations. I think that procedure has been explored to the fullest, and the employees ought to accept the will of parliament.

EMPLOYMENT

INQUIRY AS TO MEASURES TAKEN BY GOVERNMENT TO ASSIST UNEMPLOYED YOUTH

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I understand that today several ministers are absent as a result of the federal-provincial conference. However, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I would like to put my question to his parliamentary secretary.

There is at present a very serious problem. On one hand, the Canadian government is spending very substantial funds to assist individuals who are retraining and learning a new trade to enable them afterwards to serve Canada while earning their living; on the other hand, when the technical training is completed, especially as far as heavy machinery operators are concerned, they had been told that there was a need for heavy machinery operators and when all expenditures have been incurred they learn there is no job. I would like to ask the parliamentary secretary what steps the Department of Employment intends to take to enable those who have been trained as heavy machinery operators to get a job when they have made the necessary efforts to be useful in their trade in Canada and honourably earn their living?

[English]

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Employment and Immigration is trying to maintain active liaison with industry to find out the types of jobs which will become available so that the courses can train people in the skills needed by industry. Because of the time-lag between pupils starting their training and finishing training, it is not always possible to merge the two identically, but efforts are being made to improve the situation so that people are trained for jobs which will become available.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER VOCATIONAL TRAINING PROGRAM WILL BENEFIT FROM NEW FUNDS

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I should like to ask him whether he can tell the House today what additional steps the government intends to take in order to further the implementation of the training and job-creation program. Can he tell the House whether a program that has benefited from subsidies during the second phase, that is recognized by all concerned, organizations and middle management to be of value, can he tell the House whether such a program can obtain additional funds to enable it to operate on its own and thus guarantee the employees who worked within its scope to obtain permanent jobs?

● (1132)

[English]

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the ultimate test of spending money on manpower training is to have people usefully employed in jobs at the end of their training. All efforts are being expended to make sure money is being spent justifiably and that the results are those desired. To that end, in times of restraint we will certainly be trying to do whatever we can to make sure that the taxpayer is getting the maximum benefit for his dollar.

TRADE

GATT NEGOTIATIONS RESPECTING AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my questions are supplementary to those asked earlier pertaining to GATT and they are directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Since the tabling of the tariff report with respect to fruits, vegetables and other farm products, organizations of farmers and food processors have made repeated and well-substantiated representations to the government to indicate the precarious economic position in which the industry finds itself.

In view of the need for new markets, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us today what new markets he anticipates will result from GATT negotiations either for fresh fruits and vegetables or for processed foods?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the objective of the Canadian delegation at the talks is to increase our access into all markets, but we obviously have a considerable interest in the United States market, in the European community and in Japan because they are big markets indeed. It is impossible to tell at the moment precisely what commodities will be successful in gaining additional access.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, we were described by a gentleman from the European Economic Community, who was familiar with the negotiations, as dealing there "naked as a newborn babe", with very little to offer and obtaining very little.

If new export opportunities are not obtained, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure the industry that arrangements will be made for expanded access to our own markets and an element of restriction on imports which are extremely detrimental to agricultural income in this country?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the observer from the European community must have been thinking of some other country, not Canada, when he made a comment of that kind. I believe our negotiators have established a reputation for being very tough and shrewd. For example, following the last round of negotiations it was commonly stated that Canada had received disproportionate benefits. We do not believe that, but that was the image which had been created by our negotiators, and I think the same image is present today.

On the specific question, the hon. member cannot have it both ways: he cannot ask for additional access into other markets for Canadian products and, at the same time, advocate a reduction of access into the Canadian market. This is a reciprocal process and every country which gives benefits at the talks expects to gain advantages from other countries. It is a reciprocal operation and there cannot be a parallel movement to cut tariffs for us and to raise them for others.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, I think we have been the Good Samaritan, in spite of what the Deputy Prime Minister has stated. We are so recognized by those outside Canada, according to the reports which some of us receive.

Mr. Corbin: Question.

Mr. McCain: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member for Madawaska-Victoria wishes to make a speech, perhaps he could be given a special opportunity this afternoon.

Other participants at GATT have overriding legislation which is used to protect hard-pressed sectors of their economies. Others are using non-tariff barriers or regulations in a multitude of ways to negate concessions which it was felt had been made in good faith. Does the Government of Canada intend to advise our trading partners that it is our intention to protect hard-pressed Canadian industries without compensation, as can be done by the EEC, Japan and the United States, or are we to remain as naked as we have been?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I should tell the hon. member that, in addition to negotiations on commodities or the exchange of goods, there is also a very important aspect—perhaps the most important—in the effort to reduce non-tariff barriers to which the hon. member has referred. If we are successful in establishing new codes of conduct for trading countries in that field, that might be more significant than, or as significant as, the exchange of goods.

The hon. member raises the question of the test of injury and how quickly a country can move in order to protect its domestic production against sudden, unexpected and probably unfair competition from abroad. We have been doing quite a number of things in that regard already in Canada, but one of the objectives is to improve and surround more clearly with legal mechanisms the test of injury and the possibility of countries acting to protect their domestic production in the situations I have mentioned.

RIGHTS OF INDIAN BANDS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is back in his place, because I have a question to ask him. Has he managed to reconcile or resolve the difference which arose between him and the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment arising out of a "goof", as the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment described it, in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development following the failure of the minister to disallow bylaw 10 of the Squamish Indian band?

Hon. James Hugh Faulkner (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the hon. member understands the history of the difficulty very well. The difficulty is the one pointed out by the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, namely, that there are two statutes. One is the Indian Act, which provides very clearly for bands to pass bylaws dealing with matters of conservation. There is also the Fisheries Act. There is some dispute about which of these two statutes has pre-eminence.

That is the origin of the problem. I am satisfied that between the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and me, with the assistance of conservationists, wildlife people and, particularly, Indians, we can resolve it. However, the pursuit of a resolution will be aided immensely by a degree of reason on both sides.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question deals with the possibility of having this matter regulated in the courts. I wonder whether the minister is telling us that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has been persuaded to abandon his responsibilities under the Fisheries Act for the management of Canada's fishing resources.

Mr. Faulkner: Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of silly observation which does not contribute to a solution of the problem.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

SUGGESTION CANADA'S UN DELEGATES PARTICIPATE IN GATT NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to those asked earlier of the Deputy Prime Minister. I understand that about a week ago there were reports that European Economic Community countries were almost ready to scuttle the GATT talks at Geneva because of their refusal to grant any reductions in tariffs on agricultural and fisheries' products to coincide with the reductions being offered by North American countries.

This raises the matter of the contractual link which the Prime Minister announced a few years ago. It seems to be more of a contractual kink than a contractual link, because it was all words and no substance.

• (1142)

Does the government not think it is time to make a direct effort in respect of countries of the European Economic Community to see if something can be done to make the talks in Geneva more worth-while, more substantive and not all talk? Also, does he not believe that our people at the United Nations could be of assistance in this regard, because they have access at all times to representatives of these other countries and the GATT negotiations are an offspring of the United Nations. I think this would have more effect on Canadian than South African problems—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe the European Community will want to scuttle the multilateral trade negotiations, nor do I believe any of the participants would want to take the responsibility for scuttling, at this stage or at any stage, the important work which is ongoing at the negotiations. There are many reports to that effect, but I doubt whether that is in the mind of any of the participants. At the same time, I should say that I would rather see the talks continue in Geneva than have them transferred to the United Nations in New York.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT HAS SPECIAL ECONOMIC PROGRAM FOR NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. According to the Conference Board in Canada, the province of Newfoundland will experience a second year of economic decline in 1978, down 2 per cent in productivity over last year.

Since unemployment currently is officially at the 17 per cent level, and more reliable estimates place it around 30 per cent in the province, I should like to ask the minister whether he would consider a special economic program for the province of Newfoundland when he brings in his budget next month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, when we draft a budget we always take into account the different regions of Canada. Of course I am aware of the problems in eastern Canada, Newfoundland and other provinces. We always take that into account. Many of the programs of the government are already very oriented to helping people in slow-growth areas.

Mr. Faour: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Over the last few years we have seen what special consideration has done for the province of Newfoundland. Will the minister seriously consider a special economic program for the province at this time? If so, what sort of proposals might he bring into effect?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in my last budget there were provisions, special measures, providing accelerated depreciation, greater advantages to the eastern provinces. In addition, government employment programs help those provinces and the equalization payment program gives assistance to the low-income provinces. The Department of Regional Economic Expansion has a special vocation in helping out the weakest provinces in Canada. If the hon. member looks at the record seriously, he will find that in the last few years we have always made special efforts to help the provinces experiencing difficulties.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

SUPPLYING OF ARMS TO SOUTHERN AFRICA—POSITION TAKEN BY GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. It arises out of the situation where Great Britain has joined the bad example of certain communist countries, such as the Soviet Union and Cuba, in supplying arms to certain parts of Africa, particularly Zambia, thereby increasing tension in the area. Has the minister made any comments to the United Kingdom in that regard, or is it a case of silence being consent?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on this particular and specific action of the United Kingdom government, I have not had any conversations with the foreign minister of the United Kingdom. I have had many lengthy discussions with him with regard to Southern Africa, of course, as recently as two weeks ago when we were in Pretoria together.

As hon. members of the House will know, the situation is most deplorable. While I do not propose at this moment to comment upon this action one way or another, it illustrates that it is tremendously important—indeed, of the utmost importance—that all parties seek a peaceful solution to the problem.

I think generally it is known that the Rhodesian raids of the last two or three weeks have been at the basis of President Kaunda's request for support. In these circumstances, it becomes a question of one side escalating, then the other side seeking some kind of defence against that escalation, and so it goes. This is the precise reason why we have all been urging the countries of Southern Africa to work toward a peaceful solution, not only in Rhodesia but in Namibia and in the front-line states generally.

Mr. Schumacher: Mr. Speaker, the hon. minister said he is not prepared to comment on that matter at this time, and sort of indicated that the action of Great Britain is support for the Zambianese. Is he prepared to comment on this type of thing in the future, or in fact are we to see a build-up of more and more arms in this very sensitive part of the world?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, my reason for refraining from specific comment was that I was answering the specific question, had I discussed it with the British foreign minister? I have not; therefore, I would like to have more information.

My supplementary comments related to the general situation there. Obviously, it would be highly desirable—indeed, no one thinks more along these lines than the United Kingdom government itself—if no country was giving any arms to any of the participants. That is the answer in the long run. As long as we have the Soviet Union, on the one hand, Cuba somewhere else, and some other country somewhere else providing these various movements and various countries with arms, there will be a counterdemand by the parties affected. It is desperately necessary to bring this kind of escalation to an end. We must persevere in our efforts to bring about a peaceful solution.

When I have some more specific information on the United Kingdom action, I will consider whether it is useful or in any way helpful to the House to give a more detailed response.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO INDIVIDUAL EXPENSES TAX DEDUCTIBILITY PROPOSED IN FORTHCOMING BUDGET

Mr. Gaston Clermont (Gatineau): Mr. Speaker, does the Minister of Finance intend to follow his predecessor's example in preparing his budget by increasing the allowable amount for job-related expenses? That amount is now $250.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will merely note the hon. member's question, and if we decide to adopt certain changes, they will be announced on budget night.

THE CANADIAN CONSTITUTION

GOVERNMENT POSITION ON PROPOSALS OF PROVINCES

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I begin my question by saying to the Deputy Prime Minister how commendable he has been today in the way in which he has answered questions. It is a model for others on the government side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: All of us are deeply concerned about Canadian unity and the success of the dominion-provincial conference which is taking place. Can the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether it is a fact, as suggested by the media, that the Government of Canada, in its relationship with the provinces, has indicated or will indicate a type of ultimatum concerning the Prime Minister's so-called constitutional plan with regard to the Queen of Canada, the Supreme Court of Canada and the Senate, to the effect that legislation will be proceeded with by parliament regardless of the attitude of the majority of the provinces which will be deeply affected by these changes if they are made?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I attended the early part of the conference this morning and heard the address made by the Prime Minister. I would regard his approach as being the very opposite of an ultimatum to the provinces. That was certainly not the tenor or the atmosphere which his speech created this morning. I believe anyone who listened to it would reach the same conclusion.

I assure the right hon. member that there is absolutely no basis for the suggestion in the media that the Prime Minister in any way presented, or will present, the provinces with an ultimatum at this particular conference.

● (1152)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is this: has the government decided, as was stated by the Prime Minister outside the conference, that regardless whether the provinces accept the changes he has in mind to which I have referred, the Government of Canada intends to place measures before parliament? Does the government intend to do that, irrespective of the feelings of the provinces which will be greatly affected, as will all Canadians, by such changes?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I think this is a good opportunity to restate what has been the attitude of the government from the very beginning, that the proposals put forward in the paper, and subsequently in the bill, were proposals and were not final decisions. We have said from the beginning, "These are our views. Please express your views." That invitation was again put forward this morning by the Prime Minister to the premiers, "We have presented what we think. Will you now tell us what you think so that we can see if we can reach consensus on the major issues facing us in the way of constitutional reform?"

I can assure the right hon. gentleman, again, that the original proposals will not be pushed ahead without taking the provinces into account and listening to them, to the joint committee of the House and the Senate and to other interested Canadians. That is the process we propose to follow.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED PHASING-OUT OF FISHING VESSELS' INSURANCE PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get back to the Deputy Prime Minister on a matter of great concern to the fishing industry in the part of the country he represents and also right across the nation. I refer to the announcement of the phasing-out of the fishing vessels' insurance program.

In Nova Scotia this weekend a resolution was passed by a large number of fishermen deploring this. I would ordinarily have waited, sir, until the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment was back in the House, but since I contacted him over three weeks ago and have had no definite response I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister would indicate his feeling and government policy as to this possible phasing out, keeping in mind that it is not really a restraint-related matter but it is actually showing a profit and is an excellent program.

[Mr. MacEachen.]

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, in respect of the important question raised by the hon. member, it is not the intention of the government to reduce the protection made available to the fishermen. It is possible there are other alternatives that can be examined which will provide the same level of protection.

I understand the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has undertaken to consider the matter further and to meet with fishermen to see whether satisfactory alternative arrangements can be worked out to provide the same level of protection to the fishermen.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, I very much appreciate the Deputy Prime Minister's answer, but will he undertake to keep in mind that the private insurers, who are for the most part based in areas like New York and London, will be very hard put to provide the same level of protection for the same cost and to provide the same amount of service? Will he undertake to make representation to his cabinet colleagues that it is very unlikely any private insurance program can provide the same type of protection and benefits to Canadian fishermen—over 5,000 of them at this point, I believe—provided by the present program?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure I can agree with the hon. member's financial analysis, but that is not the important thing. The question is whether we can provide alternatives that will be of equal advantage to the fishermen, and that is what we are attempting to do.

URBAN AFFAIRS

MORTGAGE PAYMENT DEFAULTS UNDER AHOP—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. Data released by CMHC last week show an alarming and disturbing increase in the number of mortgage payment defaults in respect of the Assisted Home Ownership Program: there were 826 defaults in the first nine months of 1978, more than double the the total of the past four years.

Is the minister aware that, relative to other types of mortgage defaults, the AHOP figures are astronomically high? Does he now admit to the failure of his department's policies, and will he undertake to assure the House that he will take specific measures to resolve the threat of economic disaster which may confront numerous home owners?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker; the figures which have been published demonstrate in fact that there have been 800 payment defaults out of some 603,000 loans approved. Consequently, if the hon. member wants to make the calculation, he will see that in fact those who did not make their payments represent only a very small percentage of the total number of those, either in the private or the public sector, who obtained guaranteed loans, through the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, and what the hon. member considers as an astronomical number is in fact a very small one.

[English]

Mr. Darling: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the financial community believes the recent changes to the AHOP program, namely, the graduated payment mortgages, will increase the likelihood of default, and considering that the situation is likely to worsen as conventional mortgage rates increase in light of recent bank rate hikes, will the minister undertake to consult with his colleague, the Minister of Finance, and announce some relief for the home owners who face losing title to their homes? Will he review the situation and announce in the House a more sane and economically viable alternative?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think the program which could bring the greatest number of defaults in Canada would certainly be the program which would include the proposals announced recently by the Leader of the Opposition, if they were implemented. The proposals of the Leader of the Opposition would have undoubtedly much more serious consequences on the number of possible defaults than the present Assisted Home Ownership Program.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

MEDAL IN RECOGNITION OF NATO SERVICE

Mr. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. It is now three years since the government agreed with a motion I introduced in the House to establish a medal in recognition of NATO service. In the last three years there have been a number of undertakings by the minister's predecessor and himself to bring forward this medal. I should like to ask, once again, when some progress will be reached in the production of this medal in recognition of service in NATO.

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I have only been the minister for two of those three years. The issuance of new medals is not treated lightly, and a number of steps would have to be taken. I expect to announce in the very near future the issuance of a general service medal, rather than a specific NATO medal. A NATO medal produced by Canada would not be appropriate if it was not general throughout NATO. This general service medal will apply to the regulars and the reserves after a minimum length of service in Canada and/or abroad, with special recognition in the form of a clasp for NATO service and other types of distinguished service.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I guess I have made the announcement.

AGRICULTURE

PROPOSED SALE OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture: it concerns the proposed sale by the government of five inland government elevators.

I should like to ask why the government intends to sell these elevators, especially since last year they turned over a profit of $1.3 million and this year the projected profit is some $4 million, while at the same time it is known that the elevators are greatly underutilized. In view of those facts, why does the government want to sell these elevators? Why does it not turn them over to the Canadian Wheat Board so they can be used in a planned and rational grain movement system in this country?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is asking the same question asked of another government member, perhaps with the hope of getting a different answer so he can say we do not agree.

The whole program is to privatize these operations in which the government is involved. It may be that the grain elevator facilities the hon. member has mentioned can be used to a greater extent. I think he fully understands why these elevators were never used to the extent for which they were constructed; namely, because the government and the Wheat Board did not direct grain there as that would be taking grain away from the private sector. The wheat pools in the private sector handle about 80 per cent of the grain produced in western Canada, and that would hurt that operation. In turn, this decision hurt the operation of the government elevator services.

If the wheat pools, or somebody else, want to make an offer in respect of these facilities—some of which are in very good condition, while others are not in such good condition—that will be considered. Perhaps they may be able to make them function in a proper way.

STUDIES OF POTENTIAL CAPACITY OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any studies were carried out that would indicate the potential capacity of those five government-owned elevators, or was the decision to restrict the use of these elevators simply taken in the absence of such a study?

• (1202)

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, these elevators, especially the ones which have been updated, meet the standards for fireproofing and have improved grain-handling facilities, car-dumping facilities, truck-dumping facilities and improved loading facilities for either the rail cars or the trucks hauling from the elevators.

If these elevators were run around the clock, it could nearly touch their capacity for handling a tremendous volume of grain. There have been improvements at Prince Rupert, but further improvements could make that elevator even more efficient. However, it would cost millions of dollars. The hon. member himself has criticized us for spending too much money. Whoever takes over these elevators will have to spend millions of dollars, for instance, for dust-collecting equipment to make it safe for the workers.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the minister could answer the specific question; that is, whether or not there was an actual study done and whether or not we, as members of parliament, can get that study. While he is on his feet, could the minister comment specifically on the capacity, or any studies relating to grain-drying and grain-cleaning prior to shipping to the coast?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that we have those studies and I am only too willing to give them to the hon. member. They may not be in as much detail as the hon. member would like, but we do know the volume at the scales, the input-output of grain, etc., and we do know the drying capacity of the elevators that have this facility. We will provide that for the hon. member.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

PROCEDURE RESPECTING INTRODUCTION OF PUBLIC BILLS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: The House will be aware that after a request that it be deferred for a few days, the draw for private members' bills was held at the end of last week. Again, I would like to refer to the House the practice which has been followed with regard to the introduction of all these bills in the past. As a result of that draw, there are listed on today's order paper approximately 241 bills standing in the names of various hon. members.

It is not practical or possible for the Chair to review the provisions of each of the bills. I, therefore, suggest that we follow the past practice, namely, that we proceed to the introduction and first reading of these bills en bloc so that each may be scrutinized, between now and the time that it is called individually for second reading, in order to allow the Chair to consider whether there are any defects in the bills with respect to the practices and usages of the House.

If we can proceed that way, by unanimous consent, all of the private members' public bills listed for introduction on today's order paper would be deemed to have been introduced, given first reading, ordered to be printed and be standing for second reading at the next sitting of the House, subject, as always, to a subsequent examination as to the procedural regularity of each bill. The House has heard the procedure that I have outlined. Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PRIME MINISTER

Question No. 182—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Did the Prime Minister during a 1977 visit to London and the western Ontario area in the course of a speech state that Canadians were too concerned with summer homes in the country and two cars in the yard and, if so (a) what were the exact words he used (b) in what location did he make the statement and to what audience (c) is the Prime Minister aware that radio news broadcasts carried voice clips of such a statement?

2. Has the government adopted a policy to close the Prime Minister's summer residence at Harrington Lake as a restraint and economy measure and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

3. Has the government adopted a policy to sell one of the two $85,000 Cadillacs used by the Prime Minister as a restraint and economy measure and (a) if so, on what date (b) if not, for what reason?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): See reply to question 347 of the third session of the thirtieth parliament, Hansard No. 139, page 6442, dated June 15, 1978.

MR. W. O. MORRISON

Question No. 375—Mr. Malone:

Was Mr. W. O. Morrison hired by the Prime Minister's office and, if so (a) on what date (b) what is the termination date of his employment (c) what is his salary per annum (d) what are his travelling expenses arrangements and what items is he able to include as expenses in the operation of his job?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): No. (a) Not applicable. (b) Not applicable. (c) Not applicable. (d) Not applicable.

[English]

Mr. Young: I would ask, Mr. Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

CONFLICT OF INTEREST

PROPOSED STANDING ORDERS TO GOVERN CONDUCT OF MEMBERS OF PARLIAMENT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): If I may continue, Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 41(2), I wish to table proposed Standing Orders of the House and Rules of the Senate with regard to members of parliament and conflict of interest. This is subsequent to the bill which has been introduced.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 18, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Crosbie) (p. 238).

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): It is appropriate, Mr. Speaker, that I should be participating in this debate today, the first day of the first ministers' conference. The representation that the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) referred to, on the views of all Canadians being sought with respect to the form of their constitution, I am afraid does not hold water. The territories were assured, in correspondence by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) with the premiers, that they would be represented at the federal-provincial conferences of first ministers, the Yukon by its commissioner and the Northwest Territories by its commissioner. Both would, in the words of the Prime Minister, "be part of the federal delegation."

These commissioners, as the House is aware, are appointed public servants, appointed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, from whom they take their instructions. Of course whatever the minister says is followed, because unless his instructions are followed—which theoretically come from the governor in council—the commissioners would not have their jobs very long. But we in the Yukon, sir, are not even enjoying that degree of participation, if it can be called participation at all, in this very important conference on the affairs of our country because we have no commissioner.

The commissioner of the Yukon resigned last August, but then he really didn't resign, and should have resigned a good deal sooner if he followed the example of the ex-minister of labour of this government and the example of the attorney-general of Ontario, and the examples of the other ministers across the way who have tendered their resignations. In any event—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The list is too long.

Mr. Nielsen: As my hon. friend has said, the list is too long, and I do not want to take up the time in my remarks to go through the whole list, except to say that they did the proper thing.

As I say, the commissioner of the Yukon has resigned, but he has not resigned. Because of pending criminal charges against him, he has "stepped aside", to use his words. We in the Yukon were all under the impression that stepping aside meant leaving the post, but yet he has not stepped aside. The commissioner says that he has stepped aside and has discussed that action with the minister, but he is still there. He still draws his salary and occupies a government house, but he is not performing any of the functions with respect to the job.

Indeed, the daily affairs of the Yukon are now being carried out by an administrator, also appointed by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, a gentleman who has been at that post less than a year. The day to day affairs are really being managed by the elected members or the executive committee. We are totally unrepresented at that most important conference taking place today because of this situation.

I presume that the commissioner of the Northwest Territories is present at the conference, but a fat lot of good that will do him because, as part of the federal delegation, he will be sitting there as another civil servant and the views of northerners will not be heard whatsoever. That is the main subject upon which I wish to speak today.

I received a letter from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development on July 25, 1978, in which he refers to a questionnaire that it is my habit to circulate throughout the Yukon from time to time. In the letter he refers to the questions with respect to provincial status where I was seeking to establish, through the questionnaire, what proportion of Yukon residents was in favour of it, and what proportion was opposed. He writes as follows:

● (1212)

I am puzzled by question number 4. I would be most interested in knowing what method you have in mind to pay for the cost of provincehood for the Yukon without an increase in taxes or alternatively, a reduction in government services, both of which are underlying premises of question 4.

I would be most interested if you could write to me and elaborate on the ways this could be accomplished.

With tongue in cheek he finishes by saying:

I trust the discussion of this problem will not compromise the well known position of your party.

Because a full reply to the letter would have constituted several pages, if not a small book, I decided to use the vehicle of the throne speech debate to reply. I trust when he receives Hansard tomorrow he will read my remarks carefully and take them as a reply to his letter.

It is well known that the national policy of this party is that if it be the desire, the will, of the people of the Yukon, that if the people of the Yukon want provincial status, that will be achieved within the first term of office of prime minister Clark and his government. That is as it should be. We in northern Canada, as Canadians, are asking for no more but no less than the rights and privileges enjoyed by all other Canadians. The answer to the questionnaire which I sent out came back with 65 per cent of those returning it indicating the affirmative, namely, that they would desire provincial status.

The position of the New Democratic Party on this point has always been one of waffling. They say out of one side of their mouths that fully responsible government is a good thing, that all Canadians should enjoy it, and the Yukon is no exception. Then they say, "Mind you, you are not ready for it yet, but sometime in the future it will be satisfactory to meet this very valid desire of the citizens of the Yukon."

On the other hand, the position of the government can best be summed up by using the words of the Prime Minister around August 17 last year. In Whitehorse, he said that the

[Mr. Nielsen.]

Yukon would never be a province within his lifetime. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish the Prime Minister any ill will, but if he is setting that timetable all I can do is hasten his demise because the sooner the people of the Yukon are allowed to express their will on this matter, and the sooner we have a government that will respect that will, the sooner we are going to have the same rights and freedoms that are enjoyed by all Canadian citizens.

I want to contrast the position of the Prime Minister with the position of his own party in the Yukon. The Yukon provincial Liberal party was established four years ago, in 1974. As stated in its constitution, its objectives were as follows:

(a) To advance the social and economic interests of all the people of the Yukon;

That is laudable.

(b) To advocate and support Yukon Liberal principles and policies;

Whatever is meant by that.

(c) To secure full responsible government and provincial status for the Yukon.

They at least are in tune with the wishes of the people of the Yukon. We now find that very noted Liberals, including the Prime Minister, are saying that provincial status is certainly not going to be achieved within his lifetime, and our estimable senator in the other place, Senator Lucier, saying that provincial status is something the people of the Yukon do not deserve, that it is just a stupid policy entirely.

In a draft paper entitled "Outline Platform," issued in 1974, the objectives of the party are set out. The first heading is "Provincial Government" with the subheading "Policy Aim: to achieve provincial status." The next heading is "Policy Objectives," and I will have something to say about this policy of theirs later. It lists the objectives as follows:

—immediate authority for the administration, distribution and disposal of Yukon land —totally elected executive

—evolution of the role of Commissioner to that of Lieutenant Governor

—assume immediate responsibility for forestry, health, solicitor general's office, and those other administrative areas provincial in scope

—establish a formula for taking over responsibility for resources

I think the hon. member for Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) will be interested in the next one:

—to achieve an end to the Indian Act by a negotiated fair land settlement, with strong Yukoner input, between Yukon Indians and the federal government, to achieve:

—eradication of racial inequities

—a land in which everyone is subject to the same laws and has the same responsibilities to the Yukon

So, Mr. Speaker, four years ago the Yukon Liberal party took a firm stance in favour of what we in this party stand for nationally, but at the same time the Prime Minister and the government were refusing us full participation in the democratic life of our country. The Liberal party of the Yukon was completely swallowing itself because of the Prime Minister's statement a year ago last August to the effect that provincial status is not a good idea.

The only way we are going to have an input into the important questions being discussed this week is by having the same powers as all other Canadians.

I should refer to just one clause in the constitution amendment bill which will be under discussion at the conference taking place this week. Clause 11, for instance, sets the term of the elected assemblies at the federal and the provincial levels, whilst clause 28 makes it clear that the charter may be extended to the Yukon Territory and the Northwest Territories in the same manner as to the provinces. Surely this is a question upon which we in the Yukon should be making the decisions. What right have the nameless and faceless hordes of bureaucrats here in Ottawa with the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to impose their decisions and will upon the people of the Yukon?

Of course the position of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) is the same as that of the Prime Minister; it had better be or he would go the same way his predecessor went when his views differed. "Participatory democracy" seems to have become unfashionable these days. They brag about "the consultative process." They speak about consulting with the people before decisions are made. That was the thrust of the answer given by the President of Privy Council today in answer to a question from this side of the House. "We have presented our views", he said; "we expect the views of the provinces now to be presented."

I am sure that hon. members do not realize the difficulties under which we operate in the Yukon with respect to land. It is virtually impossible to acquire the smallest piece of land in the Yukon for residential purposes or for a private developer. It is, of course, held in the name of the Crown federal. While they deny the right of the people of the Yukon to administer the disposition and the acquisition of lands, and they deny even the simplest application of an individual to acquire a small piece of land to develop it whether it be for commercial, industrial or for private purposes, at the same time they give away thousands of square miles under the COPE agreement. The minister, I understand is going to sign the agreement in principle either tomorrow or the next day without any consultation with the elected representatives of the people of the Yukon who sit on their assembly, and indeed without any consultation whatsoever with any of the native groups of the Yukon.

Virtually thousands of square miles have been given away to the Inuvialiut people of Northwest Territories. In addition, the minister, by unilateral act, established a wilderness area of 5,000 square miles in the Yukon. Does he discuss it with the elected representatives of the people of the Yukon sitting in their wholly elected assembly? He does not. Does he discuss it with the native people of the Yukon? He does not. And this is the process of consultation!

Notwithstanding the objections of the people of the Yukon, all of them, native and white alike, to the provisions of that COPE agreement, the minister is still going to be travelling to the Northwest Territories in a day or two to sign the agreement in principle. That is not my idea of the consultative process. Contrast that, thousands of square miles that been ceded by the minister of Yukon lands, with the pitiful story of the people of the community at Haines Junction attempting to obtain 13 acres of land to provide for the orderly development of their community. Thirteen acres were finally obtained this year but it is not yet finalized because there is still the red tape of government to go through. But the people of that community first asked for these 13 acres in 1972 and six years had to go by, longer than the total elapsed time of the existence of native organizations in the north in their negotiations for a settlement of their claims. Thirteen acres they could not get, and yet thousands and thousands of acres the government literally gives away with the stroke of a pen. This is not our idea of the democratic process. We have said repeatedly that the title to lands in the Yukon should be in the hands of the elected members of the legislative assembly. That is one of the ways that development of the Yukon could be stimulated in order to permit for the national good the true potential of this resource rich area in Canada.

The other example I want to draw to the attention of members is the position of this government with respect to the length to which they are prepared to go in negotiating the settlement of aboriginal rights in the Yukon. Again, they are prepared to cede to the native organizations a proper stance on the part of the government. The only difference we have is one of degree. There are thousands of square miles on land given away but none to any other segment of the Yukon society which, incidentally, constitutes 80 per cent of the population. The government is also prepared to cede, by way of negotiation, the right to resources in hundreds of square miles of land in the Yukon. Revenues from those resources the native organizations have demanded and they are going to get them. Again, any difference in viewpoint is one of degree.

They are going to get a share of resource revenue from resources mined in the Yukon, but not a word as to the same rights being given to the elected assembly of the Yukon. So there seem to be two standards that the minister is practising here, and of course he wears two conflicting hats in his portfolio. That is a matter a Conservative government would clear up in a hurry, namely, the splitting of that portfolio so there would not be this constant conflict with every decision that the Minister of Indian Affairs (Mr. Faulkner) has to make and the juxtaposition to decisions he makes with respect to developing the north, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

That brings me to another subject which is dear to the hearts of Yukoners at the moment, and that is the northern pipeline. This is the natural gas pipeline which is being constructed to bring the product from Prudhoe Bay through Canada to the United States. The Lysyk inquiry recommended the setting up of a heritage fund that would provide the basis upon which Yukoners could achieve legitimate aspirations with respect to the same rights and privileges enjoyed by all other Canadians. That heritage fund was negotiated down the tube by the President of the Privy Council in his negotiations with the United States. So there are all sorts of onerous expenses which are being incurred now by the taxpayers in the Yukon in furtherance of this federal project without one red cent being spent or guaranteed by the federal government. But then we are used to being treated that way.

With respect to the land policy of the government, I neglected to make mention of the current executive assistant to the minister. He is supposed to be, and certainly he should be if he isn't, the person who advises the minister with respect to Yukon affairs because theoretically he keeps his finger on the pulse of Yukon opinion. That current executive assistant ran for election in the territorial council in 1974. He was not successful, I might add, but I have here one of his pieces of election material. I would think that the minister would take advice from a person who occupies a position that close to him. He says in his brochure with respect to land policy:

● (1232)

Land has to be made available to Yukoners who want to:

Own a home

Build a cabin

Operate a farm

All planning must be designed to meet these needs. There is room for everyone, and you must be given the right to decide where you want to live.

Maybe the executive assistant has lost this pamphlet. I could send him a copy. He might once again prevail upon his minister to adopt those views. With regard to resources, he stated:

Ottawa collects the revenue from Yukon resources. Until this money is allowed to stay here,—

Presumably he wants it to stay in the Yukon.

—the costs of essential services such as water, sewer, and streets must be paid by Ottawa, not on a cost-sharing basis—but 100 per cent. This will help to hold property taxes at the present level.

That is a very sound policy and position for the executive assistant to have taken. I only wish he could convince his minister to adopt those policies. I cannot make reference to him. If I could, I would point out that he is in the gallery. However, I do not even see him.

This brings me to the NCPC. The short answer to the minister's puzzlement expressed in his letter of July 25 this years is: if the government in Ottawa will leave the resource revenues with us, transfer the lands to the jurisdiction of our elected people and transfer the resources to us, we will look after ourselves. Indeed, we more than pay our way.

If we had taken any part in the negotiation of those pipeline provisions, we certainly would have seen to it that other levers of negotiation were used with more effect than they were. That is the short answer to the question of the minister—how can we achieve provincial status and pay for it without an increase in taxes? Simply leave the revenues generated in the Yukon there. At least I have the small consolation of knowing that the minister's executive assistant supports me in that position. As I say, I wish he could marshall the views of the Liberal party in the Yukon to be tuned into the same wave length in order to give him greater strength in making his position known to the minister and to convince the minister that is the proper course to take.

[Mr. Nielsen.]

With regard to the Northern Canada Power Commission, I want to cite a small example in order to knock holes in the argument of the government that we cannot pay our own way. If the government would stop making costly decisions and costly errors in the Yukon, we could with these resource revenues pay our own way.

The power project which was just completed at Aishihik was originally placed in our estimates in this place at $11 million. The final cost being paid by the consumer in the Yukon is $46 million, an overrun of some $35 million. It is a federal Crown corporation which, in my view, and in the view of many Yukoners, should be a Yukon Crown corporation. The federal government overspent $35 million, and the legislation under which the corporation is set up requires that the consumer in the Yukon pay for that dreadful error of the federal government.

When they should be bringing new sources of power into production in order to meet the growing demands of resource rich projects, they are sitting on their hands. The lead time when the commission should have been acting has now gone. The power is required now. There will literally be no further mineral development in the Yukon until such time as additional sources of power are on stream. It will take between three and eight years to achieve any such power development

The pipeline is going ahead. It is going to be so designed to use electrical energy for pumping the product through the pipe. However, NCPC has taken no steps in order to establish power to achieve that purpose at, I might add, great savings in the transmission of that gas. That is one small example of how the Yukon could meet the demands which would be placed upon it by the achievement of provincial status.

There is one other point I wish to bring to the attention of hon. members before resuming my seat. It has to do with native land claims. The position of the government, taken unilaterally without any consultation with the native people, was to freeze the availability of any land in the Yukon for disposition until the native claims had been settled. That has almost brought development to a standstill.

The government is concerning itself more with social and cultural development than it is with development of our resources. The position on this side is, and always has been, that there is no reason why negotiations for the just settlement of land claims cannot proceed hand in hand with industrial and other development in the north without the one prejudicing the other.

The government makes great exceptions with regard to the land freeze. As soon as it needs a chunk of the Yukon to settle the claim of the Inuvialiut people, it takes several thousand square miles to satisfy that claim, and freezes it for other purposes. Certainly it is not for the purposes of the ordinary citizen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired.

He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: I thank hon. members for their tolerance. I do not intend to continue except to sign a footnote to what I have said. I started out by saying that I wanted to answer a letter of the minister of July 25 this year as to how we can achieve provincial status without increasing taxes. The simple answer is to leave us the resource revenues and give us the land. Leave us those revenues and we will manage very nicely, thank you.

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I want to put on record a few things that have come to my attention in the last few days and weeks about Canada. Last week a great many of us paid our respects to a former member of this House, a former minister of agriculture, former minister of energy, mines and resources, and late of the Senate. I refer to the Hon. J. J. Greene.

We talk a lot in this House and in this country about unity, what Canada means to us. We recognize this as the greatest country in the world. It was founded in a rather unique way by two founding races. The fact that we have lived together so long and so peacefully makes us the envy of the world.

Today our constitution is being discussed. It is probably one of the most fragile, federal constitutions in the world. I can think of no other constitution which gives to the provinces so much authority and so much freedom.

Several weeks before he passed away, the Hon. J. J. Greene wrote a poem entitled "I Too Had A Dream". I am going to read it into the record:

● (1242)

I too had a dream,
A dream of a land
Where they would deem
Two languages, two cultures
And all their treasures beyond esteem
Would belong to all, out of hand.
But not so said the Vultures
And the dream's but a dream
It would seem.
I too had a dream,
A dream of a land
Enriched as none had been,
By free men, respected for developing here
The ways of the lands they had once seen
And sharing with us, be we Franc or Anglo
Their ways as diverse as the sand
But the Pygmies said NO
So the dream's but a dream
It would seem.
I too had a dream
That once a year in ol' Quebec
The Peewee Hockey Players were to be seen
And that when asked if it was great
The red-headed kid from Saskatchewan did state
I know now why they call them the Flying Frenchmen—"Can those kids ever skate!"
And Guy Lafleur and the Rocket belong to us too
Just as Bobby Orr and Gordie Howe belong à vous
And all we need is to think in all things
As we do in hockey
That whether Anglo or Franc or Uke
We'll take pride in excellence that is no fluke
We'll overcome together the road so rocky
And in doing so, the dream will come true.
I too had a dream
Nothing original 'twould seem
The dream that the Fathers
And John A and Laurier and King, and Pearson and yes,
Meighen and Borden had long before seen
And in such company I must confess
My courage returns
The flame again burns.
And in my heart of hearts I am
Again keen
That the Pygmies and Vultures we will spurn
And the Vision of McGee will come true
The dream will stretch like the Shield of Achilles from ocean unto Ocean blue.
That's up to you, and you et vous
If you believe in the dream as I do.

Mr. Speaker, at the service for the late Hon. J. J. Greene, his daughter read that. He was an Anglican, but the service was held in the Catholic cathedral in Arnprior. Little people of every description, ditch diggers, truck drivers, politicians, Supreme Court judges, and farmers, were all there to pay their respects to this man who really believed in Canada. As one who knew Joe Greene from the time he entered this House to the time he left, I can say he truly was a great Canadian and one who really believed in what Canada stood for.

I want to touch on some things when we talk about unity and what it means to me as a person born in Canada, not like many others who chose Canada to be their home. We who were born here sometimes take Canada for granted; not so other people who came from other lands to make Canada their home, to contribute to this great country. My wife is one of those people. Her dad came to Canada in 1929 and went to Saskatchewan. Those of us who read anything about the economics of that time—and I see some in the House who would remember the economics much better than I do, because in 1929 I would have been five years of age—know how severe conditions were. My father-in-law came to Canada at a time when the farmers could not even pay the wages of their hired men. At any event, he ended up in the soup lines in the great city of Toronto in the winter of 1933. He went to the most southerly part of Canada in the spring of 1933 to work as a hired man for $15 a month. Ultimately, he became a successful farmer though his trade was that of a mason—he was an expert mason, bricklayer and plasterer, having been trained in that trade in Yugoslavia which was part of the old Austro-Hungarian empire from where he came. He hardly ever used his trade in Canada to make a living because there were just no jobs available in that line. As I say, he became a very successful farmer.

Needless to say, he well remembered his first nine years in Canada, right back to the first one, and he also remembered who was in power. Needless to say, he was something like the former leader of the good old Tory party, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield)—he is sitting in the House at the present time. The hon. gentleman made a speech I well remember—it wasn't according to his written text, but that is a lot like the speeches the Minister of Agriculture makes; all it says on the top of my brief is "Notes for a Speech".

As I mentioned, the former leader of the Conservative party made a speech, and the heading which was placed over the press report of that speech was "The Good Old Days". He went right back to the first world war, all through the twenties, all through the thirties and into the terrible second world war. And the notable part of it was, he said the good old days really started after the war. He talked about the days when there was no unemployment insurance, when there was no hospitalization program, when there was no medicare, when there were none of these programs which look after the unfortunate in our society. Then the hon. member went into the years after the last terrible war and described how these social programs had come about. Those were what he called the good old days.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Halifax was quite sincere when he talked about the good old days. He was recognizing that the good old days took place in this century. He was also recognizing which party was in power and had the most to do with those good old days, not the bad old days he had been talking about before.

I just put some of these thoughts on the record when we talk about unity, when we talk about economics. When I hear what some people are saying about the economics of the country and about the conditions of its industry, and the future of this country, I am reminded of something which happened in my constituency. There was a man went there by the name of Roy Bennett, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada. I am not going to read the whole of the speech he made but I will put part of what he had to say on the record. He was speaking at a sod turning ceremony for the new plant in Canada. Among other things, he said:

> Interestingly, it was the prime minister at the time when Ford started operations in Windsor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who presently holds that distinction.

He was talking about the prime minister who served the longest term of office in Canada, and who still holds that record. And we know that Sir Wilfrid Laurier was a Liberal, too. I thought it was unique in some respects, because here is the Ford Motor Company making an investment of $550 million, the largest investment the company has ever made outside its operations in the United States of America, the largest it has ever made in Canada since its beginning 75 years ago.

Not very far away from them we find General Motors investing over $400 million, and again not very far away, Maple Leaf-Unilever investing $96 million. Right next door to them United Co-operatives of Ontario is investing $22 million. A few miles to the east Labatt-Redpath is investing over $140 million. Ciba-Geigy is investing nearly $2 million right next to my area. I could go on and mention others who are investing large amounts of money at the present time in southwestern Ontario.

• (1252)

I hear the economic pygmies talk about gloom and doom in this country. Does Ford Motor Company not have economic advisers? Ford has the best advisers money can buy. General Motors has the best economic advisers money can buy. So does Maple Leaf-Unilever. Do UCO and Labatt-Redpath, not have the best economic advisers money can buy? Are the economic advisers they have stupid or ignorant? Do they lack the ability to advise the directors of those companies that they should be investing money in Canada at this time? We know they have the best economic advisers. Their advisers are living in 1978, 1979, and into the future. That is why they are telling their companies that the best place in which to invest their money is Canada. Many other people are telling them the same thing, but some hon. members opposite would try to put into people's minds the idea that Canada is a terrible place to be in and that it is terribly mismanaged economically. That message is certainly not getting through to Ford, General Motors, or Maple Leaf-Unilever. Unilever is one of the largest corporations in the world. Labatt-Redpath and Ciba-Geigy, another world company, are investing in Canada because they realize that Canada has the greatest of everything. No matter what anyone wants to say, our standard of living is second to none in the world. Our way of life is second to none in the world.

An hon. Member: Oh?

Mr. Whelan: Our opportunities are second to none in the world.

An hon. Member: Our government?

Mr. Whelan: I hear some noises opposite. I have a brother out in Saskatchewan. People talk about unity. Some wish that we could all be like Alberta. Alberta is a great "unifying" province which is piling up billions of dollars. I am sure we will get Peter to share that. I hope the former mayor of Toronto will get Peter to share his heritage fund with the rest of Canadians. Peter says he is a good Canadian, but $4 billion are being piled up year after year, and that causes some problem in a country which calls itself federal and which has a federal constitution bringing together many provinces.

The politicians of 1930 made a very serious mistake. Do hon. members want me to remind them who those politicians were? They handed over the resources of this country to the provinces. In a certain province people are being told that they will not have any taxes to pay in a few years. That part of the country will still be called Canada. A Canadian on one side of an invisible provincial boundary will have to pay taxes because his province does not have the resources which can be found on the other side. Those resources were certainly not put there by the former premier of Saskatchewan, even though he might like to think he had something to do with their creation. He maintains that he has created everything that is good, or at least his party does, but some people in Canada are saying that there are too many social services in this country. They are saying that we do not control them adequately. They point to people in Japan, West Germany and such countries as that as being great economic masterminds of industry and trade, but both those countries have social services which can be compared with those in Canada. Let us not deny that.

Some people say that this Minister of Agriculture is not very sympathetic with people who are jobless. I am in this House of Commons because I was once in municipal politics, although in not nearly as big a way as some hon. members. However, when I was in municipal politics, I was guided by and had to abide by the same municipal laws. In 1962 the mayor in my area was not opposed at election time because of the federal and provincial grants the Ford Motor Company received. Spending taxpayers' money made it possible for the Ford Motor Company to come to Canada instead of Michigan or Ohio where the same kinds of concessions were being offered. They are in an economic boom and it is not because of a lack of spending.

On a local radio station the other day I heard the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) say that he would not get involved in anything like that. Some hard talking was required in order to get my cabinet colleagues to conclude that we should get involved in things like that, as long as things like that exist in that great country to the south of us. Other economic giants such as Brazil, Japan and West Germany make tremendous concessions and, if we are going to compete in the world market, we will have to do the same.

Someone suggested earlier that perhaps we should not be competitive. Would the hon. member for York-Simcoe, who displays an economic pygmy attitude, rather see us spend money on unemployment insurance? Two thirds of the money put into the construction of the plant, to which I referred, by the federal and Ontario governments, will come back in taxes before the plant turns a wheel. There will also be taxes on steel and other commodities.

The figures I saw while consideration was being given to this matter did not include the tremendous amount of earnings construction people will have. Last night at the airport in Toronto I met someone from the construction industry, and he told me that the industry locally could not supply the Windsor area and that some components will have to come from many other parts of Canada. This development will not benefit only the area I represent but also many other areas of Canada.

I once studied to be a tool and die engineer, but I never completed my studies. Some might wish I had. They might think I would not be here if I had. However, one can hardly find a tool and die shop in my area which can take on any new work before 18 months or two years. They are booked solid. Mr. Speaker, may I call it one o'clock?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At one o'clock the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) had the floor, and he has ten minutes remaining.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, when we adjourned for lunch I was talking about the economy of the country, the future of Canada, unity, etc. I should like to continue for a moment on that.

The recent by-elections were of interest, of course, but I was appalled to hear some of the things said, especially about the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau). When I spoke with some of the opposing candidates, I said, "You know what has been said is not true. Why do you not tell them it is not true?" They more or less walked around that question. They did not want to become involved in long debates. It put me in mind of the time of Christ. One of his apostles, Peter, went to Pontius Pilate and said, "What has this man done which is wrong? How has he sinned, this man called Christ?" Pontius Pilate said, "I can find no way he has done any wrong or no way that he has sinned. But they want him, so let him be crucified". I do not propose, as a member of the government, to allow that to happen. I would rather be an honest, defeated politician. Opposition members cannot say that the Prime Minister has done anything wrong at any time.

I have pointed out some of the economic philosophies to which so-called learned people in this country are referring. I have pointed out that they are bad. I was in Washington some weeks ago at a food symposium on nutrition, on feeding the world, food policy and strategy, etc. I have been quoted since then respecting what I said about jobs. At that time I was speaking in the same context as today, about how well we take care of unfortunate people who are unemployed, disabled, retired, and who cannot be in the earning sector of our society. I pointed out similar things as those pointed out by the hon. member for Halifax several months ago when he referred to the good old days being from 1946 on, when social services looked after those people. I said that it was not the same when I worked and earned 55 cents an hour for 80 hours a week, with no unemployment insurance or social benefits. That was the type of comparison which I was making. There is no country in the world which treats those people I am referring to any better than we do in Canada. Great issue was made of that.

Also great issue was made of the fact that I said the breakfast we received was lousy, when I spoke about nutrition. The right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made great play about that. He went so far as to indicate that we were liable to break off diplomatic relations because of such a statement. Editorial writers from coast to coast also made comments about it. How could they write without being there, knowing what I said and knowing what kind of a symposium it was? I have been associated with these people for years. I was not invited by the American government. I was invited by a group of people, plus a public service broadcasting system in the United States. They were putting on this program. So, I said that the breakfast was lousy. It was a lousy breakfast. It consisted of poor coffee, an old sticky bun, but the orange juice was not so bad.

At that time we were talking about nutrition. Our medical scientists and our nutritional researchers tell us that the most important meal of the day is breakfast. It is the most nutritional meal, because that is when a person's blood sugar is down and he requires energy to work for the next four or five hours before he eats again. That is what we were talking about at that time, but it was never told. Then I find my fellow members in the House of Commons going to extremes and using this comment again out of context. I thought I should put that on the record.

We presently have a program in co-operation with the Department of National Health and Welfare which indicates how people should eat properly and nutritiously. I think this is more constructive than making statements that tend to make diplomatic relations impossible, or break relations with the United States, as some people will try to make us believe.

Mr. Bergland, the Secretary of Agriculture in the United States, knows probably more about Canada and the Canadian Minister of Agriculture than did any other secretary of agriculture of that country because he lives just a few miles south of the Manitoba border. He has done his shopping in Winnipeg and has gone to that city for hockey entertainment. He has said that he has even listened to the national broadcasting system we have in Canada, so he probably knows quite a bit about Canada. I am not suggesting how factual that may be if he listens to that outfit, but some of it would be factual, especially if he listens to the farm programs about which he talks so admiringly.

We talked also about jobs. It has been said that I am not concerned about jobs, or that this government is not concerned about them. This government is concerned about jobs, and this is supported by some of the programs to which I referred. We have even changed some federal policies to entice industries into Canada rather than having them establish in the United States of America, in upper Michigan across the lake and across the river. These are things I feel very strongly about, and I have fought very hard in support of doing that kind of thing in order that we can compete on the same level as the United States, thereby enticing those industries to come to this country.

The NDP—boy! The leader of that party has a new adviser. I read his background, but I did not read that this new economic adviser had worked for a living doing manual labour. I never read of him risking his finger being cut or crushed in a factory, on an assembly line, or something like that, yet he seems to have all these answers, already. I find that difficult to understand. His leader said we were wrong in doing what we did for Ford. I can tell hon. members that union members in the city of Windsor, whether the employees work in auto plants, supply plants, construction or wherever, have never been happier in their lives than they are at the present time. Let that be a fact known to hon. members. We do care about the unemployed.

No country in the world has found as many new jobs as have this country and this government, the government for the people. Hon. members continually refer to the fact that we have so many unemployed. Sure, there is a lot of unemployment in Canada and we are not happy about that. However, I think we should be factual and state the honest to goodness truth about what is taking place. In the past seven years we have created more than 2.3 million new jobs in Canada. Some like to make that comparison with West Germany, that economic giant we hear a lot about. Hon. members talk about this great economic trading country with a balance of payments so good, but West Germany during that same period did not create one new job.

What did some of the countries in Europe do? I suggest they imported people from Yugoslavia and other countries, and when their economies worsened they sent them all back home. At one time there were over 600,000 people from other parts of the world working in West Germany, and Germany sent practically all of them back home overnight. Canada is more humane than that.

Our government and our Prime Minister are more humane. People try to talk about him not being humane when trying to put all these things before the public. Those of you who have ever done that know that is false. During an election campaign, when that wild man in Uganda was sending his people out, he announced that he was allowing several thousand of them to come to Canada, and we agreed. Was that inhumane and political? Perhaps it was not political enough. Maybe we should have stopped some of the small-minded people who think Canada belongs to just those of us who are fortunate enough to be here at the present time, allowing nobody else to come here. I do not take that stand, and I do not think anybody who is a real Canadian should take that stand either.

I am sorry the right hon. member for Prince Albert is not in the House. I wish he were here, as he is a great trial lawyer and I am a great admirer of his. On several occasions in this House he has tried to make a point about final payments under the Western Grain Stabilization Act. The farmers in Canada, particularly those in his part of the country, and in Alberta, know darn well that when you are talking about the final payment you mean the final and complete payment the farmers are going to get. They know this refers to the total payment.

If you go through Hansard on the days those attempts were made, and check everything that was put on the record, you will find the hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) making statements in recognition of what I am talking about, stating there is going to be so many more millions of dollars, and asking why we were not paying it immediately. The hon. member for Lisgar recognized what I was talking about, and I am sure the right hon. member for Prince Albert also knew full well what I referred to then.

When I talk about honesty in politics, these are some of the things I have in mind. I do not mind being told about the bad things, when they exist. If I were to say that this country, with such a fragile constitution, as I said earlier, did not have some problems, that would be untrue, but when we are comparing problems—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does he have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five minutes.

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the deputy speaker down at the other end of the House is telling me exactly how many minutes I should use. I hope you have noticed him. That is the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and that is about the only thing he is centered on, as far as that goes.

If we compare the problems of Canada with the problems of any other country, and I do not care which it is, we find ours are minute by comparison. We have talked about the problems in respect of agriculture, for instance. I think I should say a few words about this industry. I will be as quick as I can.

Never in the history of the agricultural industry in Canada have the producers done as well as they have in the last five years, eleven months, so many days and so many hours—since I was appointed Minister of Agriculture! I suggest that humbly, Mr. Speaker. Let me just put a few figures on the record in relation to farm cash receipts for the period from January to July of 1977, and for the same period in 1978.

From January to July, farm cash receipts in respect of crops for 1977 amounted to $2,558 million as compared to $3,003 million for 1978, an increase of some 17 per cent over the same period last year. That is even better than my best economists advised me was possible. Mind you, I never knew an economist who was right, but that is even better than the best economist advised. Cash receipts in respect of livestock have increased 19 per cent in the same period. We have often talked about the livestock industry.

I suggest hon. members opposite should talk to some of their new members in relation to food policy. Those new members have said many things about food policy and what that party is going to do in relation to food strategy to lower food prices. The Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark) has said he is going to make tremendous changes in respect of the dairy industry. I suggest to hon. members that before they follow that path they should check to see what the European community is doing. It is studying Canadian dairy policy and is adopting some of the same policies we are following. Australia is doing the same thing regarding its dairy industry. It is following Canadian policies.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I hate to interrupt the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), but I think it should be pointed out that he did not touch on the subject of agriculture during the course of his speech. He is now beginning to do so as a result of the generosity of members in this House who have agreed to allow him extra time. Notwithstanding the fact that he has made an eloquent speech here today, to which we have listened with attention, during which he talked about his leader, national unity, and the economy, he did not refer to that subject for which in this government he has responsibility to the House and the country. He is now trying to bootleg in an agricultural speech on borrowed time, and I think that is unfair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I would suggest to the hon. member that on many occasions while sitting here I have observed hon. members wandering from the subject at hand, yet the Chair has been pretty lenient. I suggest we listen to the hon. minister.

● (1422)

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I was here the other day when the right hon. member for Prince Albert was talking, and we let him talk as long as he wanted. The hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) is saying that I have no right to talk about anything else. My constituency is 90 per cent urban, and these people depend on the agricultural industry, as does the agricultural industry depend on the commercial and manufacturing industries. They are interdependent. The House has given me the authority to continue on, and I do not intend to abuse that rule any more than anybody else. The hon. member is surmising and placing innuendo on what I am attempting to do. Can the hon. member foresee the future?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Just the other day, I was stopped.

Mr. Whelan: The hon. gentleman was not stopped while I was here.

On going over some figures, Ontario is up 16 per cent in agricultural income; Saskatchewan, 14 per cent; Quebec, 15 per cent; Manitoba, 23 per cent; B.C., 8 per cent; Nova Scotia, 6 per cent; New Brunswick, 2 per cent; Prince Edward Island, 4 per cent, and Alberta is up 3 per cent. These figures are just for part of the year; the final sales have not taken place. We are merely making a comparison with the year before.

There is not a government in the world that has put in better programs for agriculture, or a country that has more productive people than we do in Canada. In the last few years, in this span I just humbly talked about earlier, the farmers in Canada have produced $2,000 per capita more in produce than the farmers in the United States. We hear so much about the great food machine in the United States of America, but we have the best farmers, and at the present time we have more younger farmers than we have ever had since 1962, actively engaged in agriculture. The ratio of young farmers entering and staying in agriculture is the highest it has ever been for nearly 20 years.

When the hon. member talks about bootlegging, I hope he is not suggesting for one instant with respect to the total economy of this country, especially agriculture which provides approximately 25 per cent of the jobs in Canada, that the person in the auto plant, the brewery or the city worker in Toronto or Windsor, is not concerned about dairy farming. This is one of the things that we talked about, unity. Unity is needed in the areas such as I have mentioned also, and if the hon. member is suggesting that it should not be allowed to take place, I am appalled at this man for whom I hold such high respect.

Mr. Mazankowski: You are on borrowed time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister is talking through his hat.

Mr. Whelan: I am really shook up at what he is saying at the present time about me being, to use his terminology, bootlegged.

Mr. Mazankowski: I think the minister is in for a shuffle, right out of the cabinet.

Mr. Whelan: The agricultural record is so good and speaks so well for itself that I will say no more. I appreciate the extension of time.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): My first words this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, are to congratulate those new members who have taken their seats among us, particularly the one who came in today. May the example of what we are doing today not put him off entirely, particularly the speech to which he has just listened.

Before embarking on the theme I have in mind for the throne speech, I want to compliment the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), who unfortunately is not with us this afternoon, and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) for the fairly credible job they did, under very difficult circumstances, in their spirited defence of the government to which they belong. It is not an easy task at any time, but they defended it well.

I also want to comment briefly on the despicable performance of government members on Friday when they rose ostensibly to discuss an important bill extending supplementary benefits to pensioners. Instead, they used the occasion to perpetrate inaccuracies, misleading statements and innuendoes about the party to which I have the honour to belong. Nothing is more unworthy of a member of this House than to attribute such thoughts or motives to fellow members. We are said to be "lacking in compassion", "heartless", "uncaring" about those unfortunate souls who find themselves alone, uncared for, and without family in their old age. Those comments are unworthy of those who voiced them in this House.

I hope that I managed to correct some of those abuses of the freedom of speech in this House in the comments I made on that occasion. I can think of no one in this House who fits the description which was attributed to this party. We are all here because we care about our country and our fellow Canadians. At least I hope so; why we should be here otherwise, I cannot imagine. I think a few gentle words of reproof are required to be directed at this stage to those who indulged in those tactics on Friday. I deeply deplore their antics, and I hope that they will not be repeated.

The throne speech debate is an opportunity to become involved in a debate touching on matters that may or may not stem from the throne speech itself, matters of general concern to Canada. I propose to do that this afternoon. On October 19 I attempted to elicit from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) the policy of this government with respect to fisheries, because there has developed within his government a deep conflict between two departments involving a jurisdiction over fisheries. I tried again today, without success, and was put off with the comment that it was a silly question and not calculated to help matters at all.

The two departments are the Department of Fisheries and the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I propose to examine this matter because it is one with wide implications, much wider I think than perhaps the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Faulkner) is aware. The matter has not been fully explored, and I think that it ought to be brought out in the open. I would like to go back to the origin of this conflict. I cannot make out the date exactly, but it was in November or December of last year. At that time an Indian band in British Columbia passed a bylaw covering fishing within the reserve, an act which is their custom and within their rights. They claimed sole jurisdiction over the management of the fish within their reserve.

I understand that bylaws passed by Indian bands are all submitted to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who is empowered to examine them and either to allow them to stand or to disallow them. I quote from Section 81 of the Indian Act:

> The council of a band may make bylaws not inconsistent with this act or with any regulation made by the Governor in Council or the Minister, for any or all of the following purposes, namely:
> (o) the preservation, protection and management of fur-bearing animals, fish and other game on the reserve;

This section says that it is quite within the band's jurisdiction to make these laws.

Section 82 of the Indian Act requires that these bylaws be submitted to the Minister of Indian Affairs, and by some process—and I am not quite sure what it is; I have been trying to determine that—either by explicit act or by default, that is, by taking no action whatever—these bylaws can be approved or disallowed. I imagine the disallowance would have to be done by explicit act. Permission to go through might have to be done by explicit act, or it could be done just by indifference or default on the part of the minister. The minister is nodding his head, so I gather that if no specific action is taken in his department that bylaw becomes law within the reserve. So far, so good, but I should hope that all these bylaws are examined carefully by personnel in the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I find it more than strange that a bylaw with such wide implications should pass around that department without some of those implications having been detected and the minister alerted. One is therefore prompted to conclude that the minister was alerted.

● (1432)

There was one other minister who was not alerted, however, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc). It seems to me, therefore, that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development deliberately kept from a colleague in cabinet the fact that this bylaw was going to become the law of the land. I should have thought that cabinet solidarity involved co-operation and that when a matter which happens to fall within the jurisdiction of one minister touched upon the jurisdiction of another, it would be brought to his attention. I should have thought there would have been consultation, but we have it on fairly good authority that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment was unaware of it during the 40 days that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development had to allow or disallow the particular bylaw.

There is another minister involved in this who, I suspect, was not notified. Maybe he was, but we do not know for sure and have not had a chance to question him about it. It is not clear whether this bylaw refers just to fishing or to hunting as as whole. It may very well apply to hunting within the reserve, and then we get into the problem of whether it is hunting in or out of season, and whether it is hunting migratory birds for the needs of the native bands. That is perfectly in order and is within the terms of the treaties.

The Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) has jurisdiction over the Migratory Birds Convention Act, the implications of which are international. The Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development apparently took it upon himself, or else his advisers did not warn him—I do not know which—to refrain from telling the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment about something that affected his ministry, and also to refrain from telling the Minister of State (Environment) about some of the implications that might fall within his area of jurisdiction.

About three weeks ago in the House, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) elicited from the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment the admission that somebody had "goofed"—and goofed was the word used. It is in Hansard for all to see. We have reason to suspect that that was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development or one of his colleagues, and I should very much like to know who it was. If it was the minister, then he has not fulfilled his cabinet responsibility and notified his colleagues; if it was one of his officials, I think a reprimand is in order, or even some sort of penalty, for failing to fulfil his responsibilities.

When it became apparent to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment that this bylaw had passed its 40-day existence as a temporary bylaw and then became law, we have, in default of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment who had a few things to say about it.

Does this bylaw refer only to meeting the need of the reserves through which the Squamish, the Capilano and the Seymour pass? Is it just for the needs of Indians on those particular reserves, or is it to fulfil the commercial wants of the Indians? The Province of Vancouver for Friday, July 14, 1978, refers to a federal fisheries officer for the Squamish area as follows:

> Last year, he said, Squamish band members took 20,000 to 30,000 fish from the Squamish River with an average weight of 13 pounds (260,000 to 390,000 pounds).

That is a lot of fish, Mr. Speaker, and is what led the former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment to wonder whether, with the price of fish what it is, the temptations to overfish and sell the catch might prove to be too much. If this were to happen it would be a disaster for the fishery. There is a temptation to fish beyond one's needs, which are met under the treaty rights, and to go into the commercial field. The minister has not made it clear whether he believed that Indians have the right to fish commercially and unlicensed, within their reserves.

The former parliamentary secretary to the Minister of the Fisheries and the Environment may find himself in a conflict of interest. In July, 1978, he was parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and he is now Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development (Mr. Anderson), so he really has his problems. If the three ministers have problems, then I think this parliamentary secretary has some as well. The parliamentary secretary is quoted in the same newspaper article as saying:

> 'I am sure you are aware that we already have problems with some band areas where hundreds of pounds of salmon are caught for native food but are actually sold in B.C. and also exported out of the province.'

I think the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development owes this House and the Canadian people an explanation of why he disallowed bylaw No. 10, thereby bringing the problem to a head. Was he just trying to enlarge his particular empire at the expense of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment, and at the expense of the Minister of State (Environment), or did he do it in ignorance? I think this is an important matter and we should know exactly where he stands on it. For several days now I have been trying to secure this from the minister, the Prime Minister, or somebody on the other side, and it was only today I was able to be recognized for the second time. I was not really satisfied with the way my question was answered. In fact I was told it was kind of a silly observation. I feel than when one gets a reply of that sort one ought to have the opportunity to rebut the minister. I propose to do so at ten o'clock one of these evenings to find out why the minister considered it to be silly, because what has happened here is very important.

● (1442)

I believe there is on the drawing board a bill to separate the ministries of fisheries and environment, carrying over to the Minister of the Environment those affairs undoubtedly environmental. There is one other matter, the administration of the Migratory Bird Convention Act. Just before I rose to my feet I went across to the other side to make sure that this was one of the responsibilities of the Minister of the Environment. But there he is caught too, because if the Minister of Indian Affairs were to extend this particular jurisdiction, as is proposed I understand in revisions to the Indian Act, into the hunting field, then he would run afoul of the international commitments. That, of course, brings in a fourth minister.

Talk about putting a falcon amongst the pigeons or a "Faulkner" amongst the pigeons. Maybe that is where it is. He has really done it.

An hon. Member: Put the pigeons amongst the "Faulkners".

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He has run afoul of the fowl. We are in real trouble, in any event.

An hon. Member: Where is the "Faulkner" when we need him now?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): He is the peripatetic minister; he is never around when I want to ask him a question.

However, there has been circulating quite widely in Canada, and it came to my attention when I was in British Columbia recently, a document which is said to be a cabinet document making certain recommendations concerning revisions to the Indian Act. To quote from this document it says:

The following proposals for a revised Indian Act revolve around two basic themes—

And one of these themes in the document is that the band should have:

powers and jurisdiction over the on-reserve management and utilization of fish and game

That does not say whether it is just for their own use, which is a treaty right which allows no exception and is perfectly in order, or whether it goes on for commercial purposes. The way that this was to be done was to revise section 88 of the Indian Act. Here we run across a fifth minister. Section 88 provides that the Indians are subject to provincial legislation, but the revisions are intended to provide that the Indians on the reserve should be subject to federal legislation as well, unless parliament expressly provides otherwise. So there is a real hodgepodge here. We are moving over into the field of federal-provincial relations. We now have the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) involved. That is now five ministers that this apparently innocuous act of the Minister of Indian Affairs involved. I am surprised at all this but I suppose they have to put up a brave face.

The ministers concerned show little concern about the implications of what they are doing. There is the Minister of Fisheries, some of whose management jurisdiction has been taken away; then the Minister of the Environment, because some of his juridiction will be taken away, and, by implication, that brings in the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) because of the international tangents, and finally the Minister of Federal-Provincial Relations because of the proposed amendments to section 88.

From this memoradum I referred to before, let me quote the following:

Where treaties are silent about government regulation—

[Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich).]

That is, treaties with the Indian Tribes. The article continues:

Such laws would appear not to apply to the Indian people entitled to the benefits of these treaties. Accordingly the Migratory Birds Convention Act would not apply to them and Canada would effectively be in breach of international convention—

This is a memorandum by the public servants to their minister about proposals that they are making to put Canada in breach of international conventions. I do not know what has happened to public servants when they come forward with this notion.

This memorandum goes on to say:

While the Migratory Birds Convention Act and the federal Fisheries Act are federal legislation, they deal with areas which the provinces consider to be otherwise within their jurisdiction in the sense that they form part of the natural resources of the province.

As I say, that is how this problem has overflowed into the area of federal-provincial relations.

I suspect there is one further area which is beyond the powers of this legislature in that these matters may come before the courts to be resolved. The memorandum states that:

The courts have not settled the question of the full effect of the Natural Resources Transfer Agreements on the prairie treaties.

Are the resources that were affected by the transfer agreements superseded by the treaties or do the treaties take over from there?

The memorandum goes on to say:

It is proposed that the revised Indian Act provide clear authority to Bands to make bylaws concerning the management and use of fish and game resources within the boundaries of reserves and clear powers to enforce such bylaws.

There is surely a ground for compromise here which was not envisaged and which ought to be envisaged. The treaty commitments have to be honoured. There is no question about that, but to accord even within the reserves over-all, complete, entire and unique jurisdiction in those areas that are of federal or provincial concern is merely to cause greater problems than we already have, when goodness knows we have enough problems without this one.

The suggestion is made in the memorandum that there might be Indian participation on local game advisory boards. That is fine. Perhaps that would be a better way of doing it so that there might be Indian participation on the advisory boards and the band members might become game enforcement officers on the reserves. Sure, why not? But to extend this, what is called a right, to the Indians, and then to suggest that having done so it might be possible to encourage them to enter agreements either with the province with respect to game or with the federal authorities with respect to fish is, I am sure, asking a bit too much.

I would suggest that the Indian Act as it now stands does have within it, in section 60 and section 73, the power to resolve this matter. As is usual, the resolution suggesting positive steps comes from this side of the House. Do not be surprised if within the next month or so this dispute has been resolved. Full credit will be taken by the ministers concerned. However, let it be noted that here today I mention that sections 60 and 73 contain within them a germ of a solution to this problem.

● (1452)

Section 60(1) reads as follows:

The governor in council may at the request of a band grant to the band the right to exercise such control and management over lands in the reserve—

We have the granting of a right. I question the use of the word "right" because section 60(2) reads:

The governor in council may at any time withdraw from a band a right conferred upon the band under subsection (1).

I wonder if "right" is the correct word to use. Is it not a privilege, authority, or power? The word "right" has gathered around it a sanctity which, once given, is very difficult to withdraw, although it states quite clearly the so-called right may be withdrawn.

We ran into this problem last week when talking about the right to strike in the Post Office. It had been granted by parliament, and withdrawn on that occasion. Therefore I wonder if we are using the right terminology here.

I mentioned that section 73 would facilitate the resolution of this argument. That section reads as follows:

The governor in council may make regulations for the protection and preservation of fur-bearing animals, fish and other game on reserves;

I think there is groundwork here. Having exposed the dispute, it is obviously there. However, very little is being said about it. When one minister says on the floor of the House that another minister goofed, there is obviously a great problem. I suggest it might he helpful if they got their acts together, we might say. Let them look at their respective acts and see if there is something that can be done. In that sense, and as I seem to have driven the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development out of the chamber completely, I will rest my case.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour). I would advise hon. members that this is the hon. member's maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fonse Faour (Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe): Mr. Speaker, this is my maiden speech. I wish to begin by thanking all those members who over the past few days have offered me their encouragement and congratulations on my coming to Ottawa. It is comforting to a freshman member to receive this encouragement when in unfamiliar surroundings.

In particular, I thank the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) for his kind comments at the beginning of his speech. I assure him I am not disillusioned by what is happening today. What disillusions me are the effects upon Newfoundland, and on my constituency in particular, of the policies and programs offered by the Liberals and Tories of the past few years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Faour: Before proceeding further, it is absolutely essential that I pay tribute to my predecessor, Senator Jack Marshall. There is tremendous respect for Mr. Marshall in my constituency. I share that respect. I have held him in high esteem for some time. In fact the esteem in which he is held by his former constituents was probably one of the few positive notes I found while on the campaign trail. I have committed myself to my constituents, and now commit myself to use Senator Marshall as a model of representation. He did a magnificent job of bringing his constituents' problems to the attention of this House.

I am here today to bring the message the people of Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe are sending to Ottawa by electing me to be their representative. They have spoken very clearly the feeling of many Newfoundlanders, namely, that the provincial Tory government and the federal Liberal government have not responded to their real needs.

We witnessed the situation in Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe during the course of the campaign of Liberal and Tory candidates and parachute helpers from other parts of Canada trying to justify the policies of their parties and the effects they have upon Newfoundland. This could not be done without some ridiculous posturing on their part.

The policies of both parties have, over the past few years, amounted to a serious attack on the fundamental foundations of the province of Newfoundland, the economy of that province, and my constituency in particular which, if it does not have the highest, has one of the highest rates of unemployment in this country.

In recent months the government has announced cutbacks in a number of programs essential to the operation of several industries in Newfoundland, the fishing industry in particular. Later it has relented or taken the sting out of its initial remarks. It is like saying to Newfoundland, "We know you are down, we have decided to kick you twice, but instead we will only kick you once." It is ridiculous to expect Newfoundlanders gratefully to accept this kind of relenting.

The message from Newfoundland in that constituency is that they are fed up with this kind of politics. The message goes further. The personal message I received from many constituents while on the campaign trail is that they cannot expect any different or any better from the two old line parties. The Liberals have shown by their record the priority they place on Newfoundland.

Let us look at what has happened in the last few months. The cutbacks in unemployment insurance are probably the most serious undermining of the economy on the west coast of Newfoundland in recent history. In the fishing industry, it will mean a loss of $18 million to the economy of Newfoundland. Overall, it will mean a loss of approximately $35 million, the lowest figure we have been able to obtain. It is horrendous to take that much out of the economy of a province that is now at rock bottom.

An official from a government department in Newfoundland, who will remain unnamed, said that these cutbacks will mean, in parts of Newfoundland next year, to some people cold homes and hungry children. For that to exist in this country in 1978 is completely unacceptable.

How can you say to a man on the northwest coast of Newfoundland, in February, that he is being cut off unemployment insurance and he will have to find a job? There are no jobs. What we need is job creation, not cutbacks in unemployment insurance. Let's get some positive programs.

● (1502)

Another government announcement concerned the phasing out of the small vessel insurance program. This cannot be placed in the context of restraint because that program, instituted in the early fifties, has been making money for the past 25 years, during which time it has been providing an essential service all over Atlantic Canada, in particular to some 1,200 fishermen in Newfoundland; it is a prime example of a government program which is working as a government program ought to work, that is, in an efficient and competent manner. Yet the government decides to take this service away from east coast fishermen while offering little or nothing in return.

The state of the railways in the province is one more example of the way in which the government has allowed transportation in Newfoundland to deteriorate to the point at which it is completely unacceptable. Policies followed by the government have hit communities like St. Lawrence on the south coast. St. Lawrence was dealt a death blow last year when Alcan decided to close its mine because minerals could be found more cheaply in Mexico—it was not that the mine was failing to make money, but the company could produce more cheaply elsewhere. It is the same kind of thing as happened in Sudbury some time ago in connection with the Inco cutbacks.

It is interesting, also, to examine the activities of the Export Development Corporation and what they mean to my riding. In the Town of Stephenville a linerboard mill has been lying idle for the past year because of government mismanagement and lack of help from the federal government. The Export Development Corporation has not been inactive in this area. Since 1975 it has found some $900 million to invest in pulp and paper mills overseas—in Poland, in Czechoslovakia, and even in such an undeveloped country as the United States! If dollars are available on this scale for foreign investment, it is madness for government to do this sort of thing without taking into account the situation in Newfoundland. Why cannot dollars be found for Newfoundland if they can be found for foreign pulp and paper mills?

In Stephenville thousands of people are out of work. In one area where I was campaigning a few weeks ago a man had a quarter of a million dollars worth of logging equipment in his yard. Last year he employed 82 men supplying this mill. Today, none of them are working. He has had to lay them all off. If we are talking about increasing productivity, what about the productivity of these 82 men which remains unused because of unemployment?

[Mr. Faour.]

I mentioned the abandonment of the vessel insurance program which is making it harder for fishermen to operate. Then there is the announcement of the phasing out of certain programs of the weather office, after which government spokesmen told us they would not to phased out after all. All these things have caused a tremendous amount of distrust among Newfoundlanders about what government does. People will not accept this sort of thing any longer. That is probably why I am here today.

The Conservatives are offering even less. They have been advocating cutbacks for some time, and now the Liberals seem to be following their philosophy. We do not need restraint in Newfoundland. Restraint would be disastrous for us. Our economy needs a boost. The fishery is just at the point of becoming capable of making the province a little better off and providing much needed income during the period when there is really not much hope for us elsewhere. Yet all we hear about is restraint and cutbacks. I do not know how this goes over in other parts of the country but the message I have received very clearly is that this cannot go on.

One interesting thing I noticed during the campaign was that though both the Liberals and the Tories are advocating cutbacks here in Ottawa, their representatives, when they go to Newfoundland, say maybe it would be unwise to apply those cuts to that province. They cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. They cannot advocate restraint in one part of the country, and then say in another part of the country that those restraints do not apply. Policy in this area has to be consistent. This is why I allowed myself to stand for election under the banner of the New Democratic Party, and that is why I am here today. Obviously the people of my riding liked what they heard during the campaign, believed what they heard, and made their decision on the basis of what they heard.

The party to which I belong would not allow cutbacks of this sort to be applied as they would affect Newfoundland and, probably, other parts of the country as well. We are committed to the idea of the public sector being involved in a province such as Newfoundland because private industry has completely failed us, as is obvious from the fact that we have the highest unemployment rate in the country. Indeed, it is higher now than it was during the great depression. If this is not an emergency situation I do not know how we are supposed to define emergency.

I am confident that if a similar situation existed in other parts of the country, perhaps in the Ottawa area, there would be riots in the streets and the government would be compelled to act. But the government is not reacting to the situation in Newfoundland in a helpful way, as a result of which the economy seems to be slipping further and further downhill. The Economic Council forecast that this year productivity in the province would decline by 2 per cent. This attests to the failure of the government's policies and also of those of the government of Newfoundland.

What this party is proposing is well documented. We want increased government involvement in various sectors of the economy, particularly the fisheries. This party has proposed a national marketing board which would help not only Newfoundland fishermen but fishermen in all parts of Atlantic Canada and do for fishermen what the Wheat Board has done for farmers in the west. At the same time we recognize there is a distinct need for a short-term stimulus to the economy. This does not seem to be part of the policy policy of the other parties. There are many approaches which could be taken at this moment, for example, labour-intensive public works programs such as the upgrading of the railway and the development of harbours in Corner Brook and Stephenville. Small harbours could be upgraded or constructed throughout the province. These things could be done now; and they would provide an immediate stimulus, but long-term benefits to the economy would follow.

That is the message my constituents sent to Ottawa in electing me. They do not approve of what has been happening. They do not endorse the restraint and cutback mentality we have been hearing about over the past few months.

We in Newfoundland want to be an integral part of Confederation, contributing to its development. We do not want to exist on handouts for the next ten or 20 years. We have hopes of becoming in the future, perhaps, one of the "have" provinces, instead of being one of the six or seven "have-not" provinces. We do not want continuing high unemployment; we want to make a greater contribution to the economy.

• (1512)

We want jobs. We do not want to continue to receive unemployment insurance, which at the moment is a bigger contributor to our economy than the fishery. We want productivity to increase, and we want our people to be employed.

How can people have any dignity or pride in themselves as individuals or as a community if they do not have productive work of which they can be proud? This is the kind of thing upon which no positive action has been forthcoming from Ottawa, and I think the people of my riding have delivered a message. The message is that this has to change, hopefully as of now.

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, may I change the order of going which is common in these circumstances in the throne speech debate and begin by extending a very genuine and sincere welcome to the House to the hon. member for Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe (Mr. Faour).

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: I have to tell him that it was with considerable pride that I listened to him and also that it struck me, for reasons which will become evident in a few moments, what great progress we have made in Newfoundland in our 30 years since confederation. That period is probably longer than the hon. member's whole lifetime, but let me assure him that 30 years ago it would have been quite unthinkable, I suspect, that a man of his age and talent would have had the opportunity so early in his career to enter the House of Commons in Canada or, indeed, to enter the parliament of our own country as it was at that time. So I extend to the hon. member a very warm welcome. I too, somewhat younger but not quite as young when I came into this House, came in after a by-election, and I know what it is like to find oneself in this rather perplexing place for the first few weeks.

I say to the hon. member, in all sincerity, that if I can be of assistance to him in finding his feet, as it were—although obviously he is doing a very good job of it—he has only to ask, and I will be glad, as a fellow Newfoundlander, to help him in any way I can.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't go too far, Don.

Mr. Jamieson: This afternoon I do not propose to comment on the hon. member's remarks except to share his wish that Newfoundland be a more prosperous place, something to which, for better or worse and with results as with no results, hon. members can imagine, I have committed myself for a great number of years, and I will work with the hon. member or any other hon. member of this House toward that end.

It is clear that this chamber is not the focus of public attention this afternoon, it being quite properly on the first ministers' conference, and perhaps it is for that reason, among others, that after all my years in the House I am going to break somewhat with tradition today and do two things which will surprise my colleagues, not only on this side of the House but perhaps on the other side of the House as well.

First, I am going to employ what are euphemistically referred to as extensive notes. The second point is that I do not propose to be, and I hope I will not be, in any sense argumentative in any way, as it were, baiting the opposition. I know that breaks everyone's heart, but there does come a time when, and I think hon. members will understand why, it is useful to say something which has been considered carefully by me, and I hope hon. members will take it in the spirit in which it is given because I want to talk today for very special reasons about the issue of national unity.

First, I want to congratulate the mover and seconder of this motion. When some of us speak glibly about the uselessness of this debate, we forget about the opportunity it provides for hon. members to express their views on a wide range of issues, as we have seen this afternoon, and this year's mover and seconder have demonstrated that such views are well worth hearing and heeding.

I have just returned from an extensive visit to southern Africa, and also from discussions with representatives of many countries at the United Nations General Assembly in New York. I am struck by the difference between the way in which we, as Canadians, perceive ourselves, and how we are regarded by virtually all of the peoples of the world. They see us as being among the most fortunate countries on earth and, in truth, we are. A single example will demonstrate.

The amount the throne speech proposes as a tax exemption relating to family allowances per Canadian family, setting aside the family allowances themselves, is more per year than the total annual income of at least 900 million people. Such dramatic figures do not require elaboration.

It is not only in the developing countries that Canada is admired and envied. As the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) showed in his speech in this debate, Canada ranks among the first three or four countries by any impartial economic, social, or other yardstick which can be applied.

An hon. Member: Wrong.

Mr. Jamieson: These facts are not in dispute.

An hon. Member: Wrong.

Mr. Jamieson: Yet there is no doubt that Canada is a troubled country, and it is too facile and mindless an explanation to say that it is all or even largely a matter of leadership, whether federal or provincial or whether in the private or public sectors. The roots of our problem go deeper and are to be found within ourselves as individual Canadians. The maturity with which we face up to that fact, particularly in this House and particularly in the various elective bodies in this country, will determine the rate of our country's progress and, indeed, whether we have a country at all.

Here in Ottawa today our first ministers are meeting to discuss constitutional questions. These meetings remind me—and here I come to the explanation of what I said a few moments ago—that it was 30 years ago this month that I arrived in Ottawa for the first time and, still a foreigner, reported from the galleries and also participated in the negotiations of the terms under which Newfoundland would become a Canadian province. This weekend as I read over some of the documents relating to the first ministers' conference, I was struck forcibly by the fact that little has changed in 30 years or, I suppose for that matter, in the past 111 years of Canadian history. We are still a country with a tenuous hold on nationhood, and regardless of how much government critics may argue, as they always do, that the throne speech is empty, it highlights the goals which paradoxically have both divided and bound us together for more than a century: economic equality and national unity.

Time will not permit an assessment of all the elements in this intriguing and challenging puzzle. Much has been said already about economic matters, and since we are approaching the thirtieth anniversary of Newfoundland's entry into confederation, I propose to confine myself to some brief and necessarily incomplete references to national unity.

When I came to Ottawa first in 1948 I was convinced that there was no such thing as Canadian unity. I was fresh from a bitter referendum campaign in which it was argued, complete with Union Jacks, that confederation was British union, which prompted the retort, "British union with French Canada". Clearly, monarchist arguments and warnings about having French rammed down our throats are nothing new to me.

In 1948 I watched the whole issue of power sharing debated, not just between Newfoundland and Canada but with all the provinces chiming in for fear Newfoundland might in some way get a better deal. Today, 30 years later, as we heard in the speech which preceded mine, little has changed; little, that is, except myself. On March 31, 1949, I became a Canadian, against my will. Born a Newfoundlander, I had opposed the union of my small country with Canada. Thus, with my province's entry I was compelled to test the validity of my new, unwanted country's demands on my loyalty and affection. As a result I am now proud to be a Canadian, strongly committed to national unity, and I hope, with the indulgence of hon. members, that what I have learned may be of some value in the present difficult period.

Newfoundland's resistance to union for so long provides further proof that regionalism is and always has been the strongest influence on Canadian development. Canadians are caught in a constant struggle between their intense regional loyalties and concern for Canada as a whole. Where the basis of this struggle is economic, reflecting a desire for material advancement, the motivation is roughly similar in all regions including Quebec. But when the language dimension is added, the essential difference emerges between the aspirations of Quebec and those of the rest of Canada. Even this distinction is an oversimplification. What is involved is French Canadian, not just Quebec alienation. Therefore the challenge is twofold: to lessen regional disparities generally, and, simultaneously and with equal commitment, to pursue all reasonable measures to give French Canadians in all parts of the country a true sense of belonging.

It is naive to assume, as the NDP and some others tend to argue from time to time, that separatism will be swept away on a rising tide of economic growth, or indeed, that the other threats to national unity posed by the many other manifestations of regionalism across the country are amenable to economic solutions alone. The present issue of Quebec separatism is not a lone aberration thrust on us suddenly to disturb the otherwise smooth and predictable flow of national development.

When this crisis passes, as I am sure it will, there are bound to be others in other regions. This is the price of diversity, whatever its compensating benefits. It is part of the perplexing dichotomy of Canada, and particularly of Canadian federalism. Each new wave of discontent prompts separatist rumblings, or at least a call for the drastic overhaul of structural arrangements. Witness, for example, as we all have, the constant references to western alienation and maritime disillusionment.

Canadians display an obvious ambivalence when, although taking a justifiable pride in their accomplishments, they often see these as having come about despite confederation, rather than because of it. Furthermore, their attitude is common to both weak and strong regions. For example, weakness brings claims that confederation perpetuates disparities. Strength breeds the confidence which reduces reliance on the centre. Yet, most of the time most Canadians, including the majority of Francophones, display a keen sense of nationhood and an implicit awareness of the need to maintain the proper equilibrium between national and regional interests through the constant renewal of their commitment to the basic idea of Canada. It is that equilibrium, rather than many of its specific elements that change from time to time, which sustain the precarious balance that is at issue today.

The genius of confederation, I have come to discover, has been its acceptance of the respectability of compromise. Our federalism has been able to accommodate a remarkably wide range of often changing, disparate economic circumstances and interests, while maintaining the rough comparability of essential services required for national cohesion. This ability to employ creative pragmatism must be weighed now against the likely effectiveness of various current proposals for constitutional and structural changes. Central to most of these, as it always has been, and as we are hearing today in the Conference Centre, is the issue of power sharing between the federal government and the provinces. Also, there is a need for clarity on how much diversity in regional standards and practices Canadian federalism can tolerate before it becomes irretrievably fragmented. Both our history and present circumstances make it easy to understand why provincial leaders in both good and bad financial circumstances want more freedom to handle their own affairs.

Two gentlemen in the House right now, for whom I have the greatest respect, are former premiers of Nova Scotia and Saskatchewan. They will understand what I am talking about. While there is some logic in bringing decision making closer to those affected, this will not of itself remove the basic causes of our most intractable difficulties. It is my sincere conviction that belief that it will is one of the most serious weaknesses in the present Tory case, and indeed in others. The main sources of regional disparity lie elsewhere, and a more localized approach, as practical as it may be superficial, could produce fragmented, contradictory provincial policies. Changes which sharpen regional differences run the risk of diminishing our sense of nationhood still further.

Despite these real concerns, we must be prepared to embrace demonstrably beneficial new approaches, for Canadians and their leaders must feel they have the means to achieve their objectives. This is especially true for language rights and those economic and social opportunities to develop a sense of place and identity which we all desire so strongly, however difficult it is to undertake the task of articulating them with clarity and precision and without generating unfortunate misunderstanding.

The language problem has always been at the centre of the national unity issue. We ought to recognize that and state it factually, baldly and plainly. Even if the many economically motivated demands of regionalism can be met, through a combination of structural changes and what I have called creative pragmatism, millions of Francophones would still feel deprived in the language and cultural sense. Indeed, contrary to the views of hon. members opposite who lay the blame for current unrest at the feet of economic disparity, it has been greater economic security which has brought an upsurge of interest in culturally centred objectives and the desire to identify more closely with origins or roots. Thus, although Francophone federalists and separatists disagree profoundly on means, all are seeking, in their own ways, self-fulfilment in the context of their own language and culture. The same aspirations are stirring noticeably in other parts of Canada, including my own where there has been a veritable renaissance in terms of the awareness of our people for their culture, folk music, tales, history and heritage.

Having rejected the fortress mentality of separatism, federalists must seek these goals within the broader, more diverse Canadian society which is increasingly receptive to accommodation, but still unclear and sometimes frustrated about what needs to be done.

Greater national unity can be achieved through actions in two broad categories. There are more facets to these categories, but I believe these can be stated objectively as being the two routes which can be followed: those flowing from laws and policies, and those reflecting a more understanding and responsive public attitude. Although the two are often mutually reinforcing, the principal opportunities for rapid, decisive movement lie in government action. I am referring to government in the plural. If we are logical in our assessment, we will recognize that much has been accomplished already.

But, the better climate responsible for these moves has been matched by the simultaneous emergence of increased tensions and the election of a separatist government in Quebec. I suggest this paradox is not coincidental, nor does the explanation lie in any faulty implementation of measures such as the Official Languages Act. Undoubtedly there were mistakes. There had to be with such a far reaching policy. They were inescapable. But the heightened reaction which we have witnessed over recent years, and which is so evident today, was the inevitable result of bringing long simmering, highly emotional grievances on both sides into sharper focus. Canadians, including those in my own province, have been obliged to confront a very fundamental issue, and many have been uncomfortable with the assignment. Latent prejudices and concerns were aroused, and fundamental differences were revealed between Anglophones and Francophones in their perception of the objectives of the act, and more broadly, of just what is needed to give Francophones a genuine and permanent sense of belonging.

I want to say something here that I think needs to be said, and needs to be said perhaps by an Anglophone and by one who is a relative newcomer to the Canadian federation. It is too easy to interpret many negative responses as a reflection of Anglophone bigotry and a stubborn determination to resist having French rammed down their throats. Of course, some of this exists, but there are understandable reasons for many Anglophone attitudes and misconceptions. For example, the Anglophone assumption is widespread, certainly in all parts of the country I have visited, and with the many thousands with whom I have spoken over the years, that most French Canadians are already bilingual and, as the saying goes, could speak French if they wished. Anything designed to expand the French language and its usage is not seen as a necessity but as an encroachment, or at best, an unnecessary complication.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, we who are here at the centre of the national government know, or we should know, that most Francophones, particularly in Quebec, speak only French and would have as much difficulty acquiring the second language as do most Anglophones. This, of course, is a basic concern of both language groups. Each fears the growth of bilingualism because of a generally realistic, and I emphasize this "generally realistic", awareness that second language competence is unattainable for most of them and will prove difficult even for their children.

These practical problems may be solvable over time through changes in the educational process but, even then, however, neither Anglophones nor Francophones are likely to want basic changes in the nature of their distinctive societies, their cultures and their lifestyles. This inescapable fact brings us to the heart of the dilemma, something upon which I am sure hon. members have spent many hours trying to figure out, that is, what the central or heart of the problem is—why this country, that I joined so reluctantly and have come to admire so much and want to see together, is being torn in this fashion today.

The inescapable fact is that reasonable people can subscribe to the proposition that there should be no barriers to opportunity in a united Canada. Unrestricted mobility in search of advancement is one of the long recognized advantages of Canadian citizenship. We are, in fact, as the records show, among the most mobile people in the world. But this principle of unlimited access, and this is a key point, runs squarely up against many of our regional characteristics and the desire and necessity to keep two linguistic communities, two distinctive cultures, alive and flourishing within the framework of two official languages.

In this context, therefore, the wish, as we hear it, to keep Quebec for Quebeckers and, inferentially, because the inference is clear, the rest of Canada for English-speaking Canadians, has an attraction for some in both camps because of its apparent simplicity. It is, however, dangerously superficial because it ignores the substantial French and English-speaking minorities whose problems would be seriously aggravated by such an arrangement. It tends also to provide a territorial basis for the two nations concept, incompatible with true federalism.

These then are some of the reasons, I suggest, why the Official Languages Act has been less than universally welcomed by both Anglophones and Francophones.

Francophones have the support of reasonable people for two entirely defensible propositions: Francophones should have full and equal access to employment opportunities in English-speaking Canada on the basis of merit; and, where their numbers warrant, they should be provided with services, including education of their families, in the French language. There is not, we all know, universal acceptance of these principles, of course, but Canadians of good will can see both the logic and justice, as well as the necessity for such measures. But, Mr. Speaker, and again perhaps this is not spoken often enough, and certainly not often enough in this House by those of us who have some responsibilities for leadership, it is equally logical, just, and necessary that Anglophones be aware and have the confidence that within the generally French-speaking community, and particularly in Quebec, these same principles must apply in reverse: that, subject only to competence, Anglophones have equal access with Francophones to all employment and other opportunities; and that services, including education, be available under reasonable circumstances in the English language.

Here, of course, the difference between separatists and federalists emerges quite distinctly. Federalists, generally, accept these and similar principles. Separatists, while sometimes uttering confusing qualifications, clearly do not. But Anglophones are aware—I am aware as other Anglophones are aware, and this too is important—that even some federalist Francophones have expressed sympathy for the objectives of Bill 101, for example, even though disagreeing honestly and strongly with the methods it calls for. Anglophones are, therefore, concerned that their commitment to a free and open Canadian society may not be reciprocated by Francophones because the Francophones need to protect language, culture and identity will cause them, wherever and whenever possible, to wall in their community while resenting and resisting comparable moves by the English-speaking community.

This tendency to insulate is basic to the separatist approach. Federalists on the other hand, say simply, and I say it with them, "Let Quebec be primarily a French-speaking province just as, for example, Ontario or Newfoundland, for that matter, are English-speaking. But, let all the provinces recognize certain rights for their linguistic minorities." Quebec's Bills 22 and 101 go beyond this reasonable proposition and make matters more difficult and controversial by defining French as the sole official language rather than the working or principal language.

It is ironic, I should note parenthetically, that more widespread bilingualism is at best a mixed blessing to those Francophones who take this defensive approach to their goal of protection. English-speaking Canadians, however, must recognize and appreciate their right and determination, of which I have become very aware, to remain a distinct grouping, with their rich heritage and culture intact and assured for the future. The alternative is to accept the inevitable breakup of Canada, not merely through the separation of Quebec, but through the mounting discontent and alienation of the large number of Francophones who live in other parts of Canada for whom Quebec's separation offers no solution whatever.

The potential for misunderstanding, resentment and conflict is most acute where the two linguistic and cultural groups come in frequent and close contact; where the English or French-speaking minority is of very considerable proportions. In such areas and regions it is very much a matter of the two linguistic groups living together, and the utmost in reasonableness and understanding is called for in the search for a fair and permanent accommodation. Such understanding, I suggest to you, cannot ignore the historic English language domination of most key elements of Canadian society, even in Quebec. The intangible effects of this traditional situation are legion, and are responsible for many of today's instinctive and negative reactions on both sides.

The frustrations and, hence, resentments caused by these developments must be recognized and understood. Such reactions are particularly acute in bilingual areas where job security and advancement are seen as being threatened, but everywhere in Canada there is an underlying concern that future economic and other opportunities will be denied those who are not bilingual. It is true, of course, as many bilingual Francophones—and I am sure some of my colleagues here would agree—are quick to point out, that they had to make the effort. But whatever the errors of history, these imperatives, in addition to providing the necessity also provided the opportunity, not only in bilingual communities but in a continent of over 200 million where English predominates. And, of course, although I have stated these concerns from the perspective of Anglophone Canadians, they are no less real for millions of unilingual Francophones.

Clearly, for practical, as well as less defensible reasons, educational systems across Canada have been and generally remain woefully deficient in their ability to teach the second language effectively. We now know also that language training for adults, as sponsored by the Government of Canada and others, cannot, in many cases, produce the desired results even for students whose motivation is strong.

When these practical considerations are linked with the less tangible, but no less real, concerns of Francophones for the preservation of their culture and heritage, the full dimension of the national unity problem is very obvious. In the minds of confirmed separatists many of these goals are mutually exclusive. The task of federalists, members of this House and all who are concerned about a united Canada, is to prove that they are not.

A key tool in this task is education. It has been noted repeatedly, but not always believed by Anglophones, that even today, after the introduction of Bill 101, Quebec still provides more by way of educational guarantees to its English-speaking minority than is provided for French language equivalents in other provinces. Yet, this is the case, and the faster corrective measures are taken, by way of constitutional guarantees and the implementation of new realistic approaches, the faster one of the main and most legitimate sources of Francophone grievance will be removed.

Education, and the greater comprehension and understanding it produces—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. However, he may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Jamieson: I am very grateful to the House, Mr. Speaker, and I assure hon. members that I will not impose on their time unnecessarily.

A key tool to this task is education, and the greater comprehension and understanding it produces is the only alternative to the seige mentality, to the "two nations" concept, and to separatism itself. Those who argue for these alternatives fail to realize in most cases that they would produce, not just one watertight compartment, but two, and this situation might very well lead to still more as other regions, although all in English-speaking Canada, sought to erect their own barriers to protect characteristics or advantages they consider important. I am seeing signs of that already in my own part of the country. I believe it to be very, very negative in terms of national unity. I hope that I will have the opportunity to persuade people in my province, for example, that this seige mentality, this idea that it is a "we and they" situation is counter to the very thing for which we fought such a bitter referendum 30 years ago.

Canadian federalism—and I know now after 30 years perhaps better than most because of this unique background that I happen to have, which is not of my own doing—is either totally open or eventually it is nothing. The diversity various regions prize can only be assured through a climate of openness and through policies and approaches that encourage and nourish regional attitudes, including language rights, while at the same time exposing them to the test of relevancy and value.

While putting great emphasis on education, we must, of course, continue to take other steps toward greater national unity. Some of considerable importance have their roots in constitutional reform, a subject that will be much discussed in coming months. It is clear from all of the dramatic developments in Canada in recent years that the time for leisurely, piecemeal dialogue on national unity is over. The election of a separatist government in Quebec is not the only reason for the new urgency; in some respects it is not even the most important. Its greatest significance is the much sharper focus it has given to an historic, ever present problem. It would be a major mistake, however, to assume that the defeat of the Parti Québécois will end the problem. The task of reconciliation and reform pre-dates the Parti Québécois victory and will remain to be completed after the Parti Québécois is gone.

Those who maintain that defeating the separatists can be left solely to the people of Quebec are only right in the narrow sense that it is Quebeckers who will vote in the referendum, and the provincial election when it comes. But, while these actions may defeat Quebec separatism as a referendum issue, they will not of themselves save Canada. There is a real danger that the ousting of the Parti Québécois government will be seen by many Canadians—indeed, it is already being perceived by many Canadians—as the definitive judgment on separatism.

But, even on the narrower issue, all Canadians have an obvious stake in the referendum. That stake is not just the future of Quebec, but the future of Canada. Therefore, in addition to stating unequivocally what is unacceptable to Canada in the Parti Québécois referendum proposals, it is essential that the Quebeckers be told by their federal government what the federalist options are, and shown how their legitimate aspirations can be achieved best within the Canadian framework. It is unthinkable that the rest of Canada should stand aloof from such a momentous struggle, and those Quebecers, including some federalists, who see this issue as their concern alone, may be well-meaning, but they are wrong.

The Parliament and Government of Canada represent and speak for all Canadians, including Quebeckers, on national issues and in areas of federal responsibility. Nothing fits these criteria more than the threatened dismemberment of the country. There should be no doubts; separatism is the enemy of all Canadians, and all Canadians must oppose it vigorously.

But while separatism is the most urgent and direct threat to unity, it is not the only one. The comprehensive renewal process should not be distorted or compacted into an effort that is directed primarily at the separatist crisis. Other groups and other regions also have problems and doubts. The larger task is to embrace all of these, to find means whereby we can not only lessen grievances but make the entire federal system more responsive and a better instrument for identifying and carrying out the national will.

And there is a national will, I have discovered, a strong Canadian sense of nationhood. It is something more than the distillation of ten provincial government views, the common denominator achieved through the melding of ten often disparate viewpoints, worked and reworked until a consensus appears. Given the complexity of our times, such exercises in co-operation are important, even though not accorded great weight by Canada's founders, nor its leaders during our first half century. The number of federal-provincial or dominion-provincial conferences were few and far between for the first 50 or 60 years of our history.

These founders wisely created a national government, a Government and Parliament of Canada, to represent and speak for all Canadians, the citizens of one nation. Today, just as it is the responsibility of that government and parliament to fight separatism and provide a counterweight to excessive regionalism, it must also articulate national goals, not merely in economic and materials terms, but in ways that will define more clearly—and I have reason to know this through my present responsibilities—to ourselves and to the world what Canada is and for what it stands. Only through such widely shared understanding, Mr. Speaker, can we strengthen the national will still further and share a common pride in the whole of Canada, while fostering and drawing strength and satisfaction from the positive elements of our remarkable diversity.

In this context, while the provinces may be regarded as the bricks of confederation, the Government and Parliament of Canada provide the mortar that binds them into a solid enduring structure. Thus, while the whole is the sum of its parts—and this we forget at our peril—it also has a shape and form of its own. To prevent erosion, formal mechanisms are essential; but these alone will not ensure a strong Canada. Canadians cannot rely on them entirely but must also possess the will to continue living together and to continue saying with pride, "I am a Canadian".

We in Newfoundland have never been at all ashamed of wearing our hearts on our sleeves, perhaps because of the Gaelic background of most of us. In any event, one of those difficult adjustments I had to make as a Canadian was to what I used to describe as "good grey Canadianism"—the kind of feeling that it was somehow improper, or at least modestly incorrect, to express pride in our country, to talk out loud about what this nation means to us. I went through a period when I assumed a part of that greyness, but now I am convinced most sincerely that we have to shrug off what one might describe as a kind of uneasiness or discomfort with the rhetoric of nationhood and say what we think of this country.

Against that background let me conclude by saying that I began with a declaration of personal pride in Canada and of my commitment to work for national unity. Having experienced one identity crisis in my life, I have no wish to contemplate another, because, believe me, it was a traumatic experience. Canada, all of it, is now my home, and no man could ask for better. Through the tremendous advantages that have been given to me by Canada, through these opportunities that have been given to me as a member of parliament and as someone who speaks for Canada to the world, I have come to realize that a variety of circumstances, not all of our making, not always something for which we can take any credit, just God's natural goodness, have brought together on our half of the North American continent a unique combination of the ingredients that give us, as Canadians, a better way of life—not better by comparison with other people in other lands, although most are envious of our good fortune, but better in the sense that these scores of elements, from climate to natural wealth, from majestic scenery and vast open spaces to cleaner, more well-ordered cities, and comfortable, relaxed small towns and villages, from our proud beginnings and our native peoples to our present exciting mixture of races and cultures—all of these and so many more have shaped and responded to our special aspirations as a unique people, Canadians, and have contrived, often without our help, to add joy to our lives, rewards for our labours, and boundless hope for our individual and common futures.

I am grateful to the House for giving me this extra time, but sometime in the future, on the thirtieth anniversary of some other provinces' entry, if there are more, or when people are looking over it, I want to have on record what I thought about this country after 30 years as a Canadian.

Truly I believe we are the most fortunate country on earth. I have no doubt we will keep it that way.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul Yewchuk (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin by offering my congratulations to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) for the passion he put into his remarks, a passion which I am sure stems from the fact that he recognizes the many serious problems facing this country are a direct result of the actions of the government of which he is a member. I want to say that a subject about which I feel equally passionate is scientific research. I have spoken about this a number of times in this chamber, but I am sorry to say that on all of those occasions the suggestions I have put forward have fallen on deaf ears on the government side.

To try to explain the situation a little more clearly or simply, I have to revert to a segment of my life which happened long ago. You may not be aware, Mr. Speaker, that one of the things I retired from to come to this place was farming. I am a retired farmer, so in talking about research in Canada I want to make reference to the farm where I used to live.

As you know, there are a number of animals and birds on farms—horses, cattle, sheep—such as those on the other side of this House. The bird I wanted to deal with particularly is the goose. Everyone knows that the goose lays eggs and that these are a useful commodity. Everybody knows, too, that a goose egg is the symbol for something not very valuable, or perhaps that even represents failure. That is only the case if it is a normal goose egg, of course, but if it happens to be a golden egg, that changes the picture.

I want to spend some time talking about the golden egg. The farmers to whom I am referring, namely, the people of Canada, are fortunate because the goose they own happens to lay golden eggs. That goose is the medical and scientific research community of this country.

We know that in order for a goose to produce, it must have certain things. It requires nourishment—by way of corn, perhaps; it requires shelter—a place to build its nest where it can lay the golden eggs; and it requires some water and some general care. If care is given to the goose it will produce golden eggs every day, every week, every month, and perhaps every year.

That is not to say that a goose is the only animal or bird on a farm. We recognize that there are other animals that need to be fed some of the same corn that the goose needs. It is a question of deciding in times of restraint which should be fed the most or the least.

As I recollect, if there were pet cats or dogs they were generally considered by the farmer to be non-productive and perhaps were even sacrificed during times of restraint or lack of food. Unfortunately, the government we have, has chosen to starve the goose which lays the golden egg, and has chosen to feed greater and greater shares to the pet cats and dogs.

Canada, in common with other developed nations, largely depends on science and technology to maintain and develop its standard of living. Unlike governments in other industrialized countries, the Government of Canada has for the last ten years shown a total lack of concern for the need to develop an adequate fund of scientific and technical knowledge or scientifically and technically educated people. In essence, the Government of Canada has been satisfied to base our standard of living on depleting natural resources and on using the scientific, and technical knowledge and efforts of other countries.

When the government has spent money, it is clear the spending has not been done in anything that resembles an optimum fashion. Rather than asserting strong leadership by committing itself to support research and development, rather than striving to create a science and technology infrastructure that could provide the critical underpinning for industrial and socioeconomic programs, the government has discouraged innovation. It has discouraged hard work; it has discouraged productivity. Instead, the government has chosen to spend the taxpayers' money on creating a huge unwieldy and largely inefficient bureaucracy. Surely this direction is not the road to economic progress.

Few Canadians would pretend that it is easy to establish a comprehensive, scientific and industrial strategy. But unlike those who sit on the other side of the House, we in the Progressive Conservative party will not be dissuaded by issues bearing on ease of accomplishment. We reject categorically any short-term politically-expedient answers to our problems stemming from deindustrialization and scientific-technological insufficiency. We do this in the certain belief that Canada needs to grow and create new wealth. In other words, we need to have new golden eggs, to put it in simple language for the other side, for the benefit of all Canadians in every province. We do this because we recognize that the principle element of any national growth strategy is already visible. Canada, like all other successful western industrialized countries, must emphasize research and development and high technology if it is to compete successfully in the world.

The Progressive Conservative party believes the future of Canada is at least as important as the present. We must look to the future by working diligently to solve the many problems that exist today. The cornerstones of Canada's thrust toward a healthy science base should be similar to those of any other high priority national effort. A science strategy, like an industrial strategy or cultural strategy, will need to be based on existing strengths and needs of our country, on coherence and relevance, and on co-operation between the federal and provincial governments, industry, business, universities, and the lay community.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, a scientific industrial strategy must be based on continuity and stability since progress in science is utterly dependent on the continuing infusion of ambitious, productive and creative new talent. So to state it again in simple terminology, the golden goose indeed does have the capability of reproducing, or at least to regenerate some of its lost parts. In other words, if one plucks a feather, the goose can grow a new one. So it is not too late to correct the wrongs of government shortsightedness.

For the benefit of those Liberal members who for so long neglected science and technology, I would like to point out that Canadians, in spite of the government's negligence, have demonstrated excellence in both basic and applied research in many fields and disciplines. In the area with which I am most familiar, biomedical research, the list of Canadian research accomplishments is both long and impressive. This is the list of golden eggs that I want to put on the record. For example, Dr. Sourkes of Montreal and Dr. McGeer of Vancouver jointly elucidated the cause of Parkinson's disease, a condition which causes uncontrollable shakiness in certain individuals; Dr. Robinson of Vancouver has developed a method for controlling rheumatoid diseases; Dr. Noble, also of Vancouver, has discovered an important group of anti-cancer drugs; Dr. Nickerson, also of Vancouver, has developed drugs used in the treatment of high blood pressure.

Dr. Merrimam of Saskatoon has demonstrated the relationship between grain dust and chest disease and has also pioneered work on the role of exercise in coronary heart disease; Dr. Kirkaldy-Willis' work in Saskatoon has improved methods of managing low back pain; Dr. Harold Johns, formerly of Saskatoon and now working at the Ontario Cancer Institute in Toronto, discovered and developed a Cobalt 60 unit for radiation treatment of cancer; Drs. Gold and Freedman of Montreal developed an extremely important diagnostic test for bowel cancer; Drs. Horlick and Sodhi of Saskatoon—there are a lot of good scientists in Saskatoon, some good politicians, and some bad ones too—clarified the role of high fat levels in atheroschlerosis and their control with drugs; Dr. Chang of Toronto developed a purification cartridge for portable artificial kidney machines; Dr. Bruce, also of Toronto, developed the rationale for combination cancer therapy.

This listing of major accomplishments by Canadian biomedical researchers is by no means all-inclusive. It does, nonetheless, clearly indicate that in addition to the highly publicized achievements of people like Wilder Penfield, Hans Selye. J. B. Collip, D. H. Copp, Fredrick Banting and Charles Best, this country has many other scientists of first-class international standing.

Canada does not lack scientific talent; rather, it lacks a science policy which would allow researchers to contribute to improving the health and well-being of Canada and the economy of the nation. The government that we are faced with today in this chamber deals with health research as if it were an expensive charitable budgetary outflow. The fact is that health research expenditures by the federal government constitute less than 0.2 per cent of the total budget, and less than 1 per cent of the Department of National Health and Welfare budget. Furthermore, there is now ample documentation that funds spent on health research are a prudent investment for reducing health care costs in the future. They are not a charitable expense without any tangible fiscal benefits.

You may be asking, Mr. Speaker, what that means, and perhaps even members on the other side might be curious about how much one of these golden eggs is worth. It might even be thought "Who cares about golden eggs? They be worth nothing." However, I can assure hon. members that the value of gold is very high these days, and I would like to give an indication of what these golden eggs are worth. For example, Dr. Bob Hickie of the University of Saskatchewan has recently completed a study which shows that for every dollar invested in health research, the minimum return within ten years by way of permanently reduced health care costs is at least $20.

The total research cost for developing poliomyelitis vaccine was $41 million. The estimated saving to Canada since that time has been about $200 million per year since 1955. Just consider that saving, for a small investment. The saving due to this discovery alone more than pays for all the health research done in Canada since that year.

Measles immunization has resulted in a saving to Canadians of at least $10 million per year. Treatment of hemophilia saves Canadians $20 million per year in hospitalization costs alone, not to mention the suffering of patients which has been reduced. Basic research into the cause of blindness in premature babies cost $34,000. The annual saving due to the averted blindness is $24,000 for every dollar spent on research.

The discovery of the antibiotic streptomycin used for treatment of tuberculosis has saved Canadians $30 million per year since 1952. Penicillin continues to save more lives each year than were lost during the entire Second World War. Just consider that, for a government which looks on research as a charitable outflow. If typhoid fever were treated today by 1935 standards, the patient would have to be hospitalized for about 50 days at a cost of about $8,500; now the costs include a prescription for chloramphenical at about $5, and one or two days of fever.

The basic research by Canadian scientists into the defect associated with Parkinsonism and its treatment with L-DOPA saves Canadians at least $120 million per year. A diagnostic test for cancer of the bowel, also developed by Canadian scientists, saves Canadian taxpayers about $60 million per year. The total cost of discovering insulin by Drs. Banting and Best was less than $30,000; though not yet documented, the total monetary saving to Canadians since the discovery in 1921 would be staggering.

The lives and livelihood that have been spared by cures and treatments resulting from basic and applied biomedical research during the last 40 years have been estimated by Creditel of Canada Limited to save Canadians $1.7 billion this year. This saving represents nearly 10 per cent of the total budget of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

We believe that the government's expenditures are in general excessively high, and in some areas outright wasteful. As I mentioned, this government can be compared with the farmer who feeds too many cats and other family pets which are not productive. We believe also, however, that spending in the area of research and development should be regarded as a needed investment, not as a loss of federal dollars. It is not a loss or simple expenditure. Federal investment in this area must increase, not decrease, because it is clear that scientific innovation could play an essential role in achieving many of Canada's economic objectives, a strong manufacturing sector with consequent growth of employment opportunities, industrial effectiveness leading to greater price stability and a stronger value for our dollar, positive international trade balance in high-technology manufactured products, good quality cost-effective health care, and a strong, confident, and visionary scientific community.

The government's proposals to cut back further on investment in research and development and the closely related area of post-secondary education are ludicrous. They are tantamount not only to starving the golden goose, but to plucking its feathers and cutting off some of its limbs.

It is truly a quixotic government policy that, on June 1 of this year, proposes to stimulate scientific and technological growth in this country and then, just a few months later, it reneges on the same promises by cutting back on investment.

The proposed cutback in science and technology activities will adversely affect the research performance of most government departments and all Canadian universities. The Department of Agriculture would lose $8.5 million from its science budget; the Department of Environment, $11.7 million; the Department of Fisheries, $11.1 million; and the Department of National Health and Welfare, $10.3 million. The three extramural research granting councils, already desperately short of funds to support scientists and provide equipment and support staff, would lose a total of $3.1 million.

The ramifications of the proposed cut of $0.5 million in the budget of the Medical Research Council and $2 million in the National Health Research and Development program will be much more extensive than simply its effect on the investigators themselves.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) continue to pluck the feathers off the golden goose. Perhaps they will be used for a pillow to make the Prime Minister more comfortable, the pillow being the PMO. There have been no cutbacks in the Prime Minister's office, only in research and other areas. The effect on health care in Canada of this loss of research potential and trained personnel will be particularly severe and will affect the formation and development of cost-effective health care policies. In addition, this loss will affect the training of physicians, other health professionals, research scientists, and will directly affect patient care, as trained personnel leave Canada for other countries which recognize and support scientific research.

These losses will be irreparable. Obviously if you cut the head off the golden goose there will be no more golden eggs. It will be impossible to replace trained staff, and there will be a cessation of valuable research programs which have taken many years to develop. These programs will not be able to be started again on short notice when the fiscal climate becomes more favourable, as it will when a Conservative government takes over, as it takes many years to recruit skilled scientists and to train new staff. There is no doubt that there will be a reluctance among skilled scientists to work in a country which has so clearly shown its lack of interest in and continued commitment to research.

One example of a health research program which will be discontinued if these proposed cuts are implemented will serve to illustrate the lack of vision from which this government suffers.

In the Department of Pediatrics at the University of Manitoba, Dr. Judith Sayed, one of the very few pediatric nutrionists in Canada, and a National Health Scholar, is investigating the nutrition and nutrition-based diseases in Indian and Inuit children in Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. A number of previously unsuspected problems have already been found. Rickets, a vitamin deficiency disease, thought to have been abolished in Canada, still exists among children in remote Indian communities. Intolerance to milk due to deficiencies in gastrointestinal motility, is very common among older Indian and Inuit children and may contribute to diarrheal illness. The high incidence of infectious diseases among Indian infants is, in large part, due to a mistaken preference for bottle over breast feeding. As a result of these findings, remedies are already under way to improve the health of native children.

The Medical Research Council is the main source for biomedical research funding in Canada. That body provides most of the corn to feed the golden goose. It provides approximately 50 per cent of the total $130 million currently spent on health research. Under the current administration the growth of the MRC budget, particularly since 1971, has been painfully inadequate. The measure of corn for the goose has been smaller and smaller. The increases during the past eight years have not even kept pace with the cost of living increase, let alone the inflation costs of scientific equipment, materials and reagents which have been increasing by at least 15 per cent per year and at present exceed 20 per cent taking into account the 85 cent Canadian dollar.

In terms of the total budget of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the MRC budget has fallen from 1.33 per cent in 1971-72 to 1.30 per cent in 1972-73, to 1.14 per cent in 1973-74, to 0.87 per cent in 1974-75. Currently, the MRC receives approximately 0.6 per cent of the total budget of Health and Welfare. The ratio has gone down by about two thirds.

On June 1 the government announced it was going to devote 1.5 per cent of its gross domestic product to research funding. It proposed regional "centres of excellence", innovation centres, and changes in government procurement policy to stimulate Canadian research and development. All these things were swept aside only eight weeks later.

• (1622)

That is why there needs to be a change in government. The Prime Minister has decided to eat the goose's corn. Indeed, he is poised to eat the goose itself.

The Conservative party stated on an opposition day not too long ago that we are committed to directing 2.5 per cent of the gross national product toward scientific research, a program to be implemented over five to seven years. We are talking about trebling or quadrupling the measure of corn for the golden goose. Such a measure will at least enable us to catch up with the level of funding practised in the United States and other industrialized western nations.

To sum up, the Liberal government is starving and dismembering the research community. The Prime Minister has not only reduced the amount of corn available to the golden goose, he has plucked its feathers and pulled off one leg for a meal; he is now holding it over the chopping block by the remaining leg. Why, one might ask, is he doing this since it is so obviously the wrong thing to do? Well, perhaps he does not care about the golden goose. Perhaps he just wants to eat the goose. We, as the party of the alternative government, propose to correct this disastrous policy and to restore the research community to a healthy status so that it can continue to carry out the research which is necessary if this country is to be a viable and competitive nation.

Hon. James Richardson (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, for more than two years, since I resigned from the cabinet, I have been warning the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that he was leading Canada in the wrong direction, that his policies would do more to divide the nation than to unite it. The fundamental flaw in the policies of the Liberal government is that they emphasize our differences as Canadians instead of emphasizing all that unites us as Canadians.

I have had the opportunity to give this warning on many occasions—here in the House in the debate on the Speech from the Throne a year ago, before the Pepin-Robarts Task Force on Canadian Unity this January, and when I crossed the floor of the House in June of this year. Now that we have seen the results of the 15 by-elections on October 16, to see that the Canadian people are trying to tell the Prime Minister and the government that they are going in the wrong direction, that they are doing more to divide the country than to unite it, it is all I can do to resist saying, "I told you so."

My warning has not been confined to the national unity issue. More than two years ago, when I was writing my letter of resignation to the Prime Minister, I said:

> I do not believe the government has fully recognized and utilized for the common good the energies and creativity of Canadian entrepreneurs. The bureaucracy is still too big and government is still interfering too much in the working of the economy.

That was more than two years ago. Now, at last, in the Speech from the Throne the government is talking about, and I quote, "the private sector leading the way towards accelerated growth". The Speech from the Throne goes on to talk about "encouraging a more vigorous expansion of the private sector by reducing the governmet's share of the national wealth."

The words are beginning to sound right, Mr. Speaker. The government has finally learned to say the right thing even though it is not yet clear whether the government really understands its own words and, more particularly, whether it really believes its own words. Only the budget which has been promised for next month will show whether the government's new-found confidence in the private sector is anything more than empty rhetoric. Only the budget will reveal whether the government is capable of understanding how to restore investor confidence, both Canadian and international investor confidence; because that is the essential first step in revitalizing and strengthening the Canadian economy.

Today, as members of parliament, we find ourselves in an extraordinary situation. We have just read a Speech from the Throne which calls for national unity. It comes from the same government that gave us the constitutional amendment bill, Bill C-60, which is one of the most divisive pieces of legislation ever placed before parliament. For example, it calls for a double majority, a French and an English majority, on matters of linguistic significance in the new, proposed House of Federation. This proposed legislation also calls for two classes of Supreme Court judges. Certain judges will be able to make judgments in relation to the civil code and common law. Others will only be able to make judgments about the common law. Surely two classes of judges cannot be based on a one-nation concept?

Then we find the preamble to the constitution in this new legislation. The preamble spends more time trying to describe our differences as Canadians than in trying to encourage our unity. Legislation of this sort cannot possibly unite Canada. I do not think it is enough for the government to say it will revise the legislation, as promised in the Speech from the Throne. The government is so completely on the wrong track that it will be necessary, as I said in the special committee, to put Bill C-60 into the shredder and start over again with a new concept which could really help achieve a united Canada.

Fortunately for Canada, the democratic process is at work. There is widespread opposition to Bill C-60 and to the government's proposals for constitutional amendment. The premiers unanimously opposed the legislation at their meeting in Regina, and though I have not heard the whole of the proceedings at the conference today it appears they are saying the same things today as they did then. Also, the Senate is opposed to the proposals—and not just to protect itself, as some have wrongly suggested, but for much more fundamental reasons.

Wide sections of the media are opposed, and growing numbers of the public are opposed, so we have all this opposition to the constitutional amendment bill, and it is very clear that the democratic process is working. It has been made clear that the government's proposals for constitutional change are clearly not a reflection of the national will.

Despite this widespread and really overwhelming opposition, the Prime Minister gives ever indication of wanting to lock his vision of Canada into the constitution. He still wants to proceed with his vision of Canada. In the throne speech debate the Prime Minister spoke for more than an hour and a half, but one sentence revealed his thinking better than anything else he said in that long debate. When the Prime Minister was talking about the constitution giving protection to his concept of language equality, hon. members who were here on October 12 will recall that he said that it was not really vital to him whether the Supreme Court had nine judges or 11 judges. He said it was not really vital to him whether the House of the Federation was directly elected or elected by the political parties.

The all-important sentence in his whole speech can be found at page 37 of Hansard for October 12, 1978. The Prime Minister said:

It is vital to me that it—

He was referring to the constitution: "that the constitution":

—does give protection to the kind of linguistic equality that this government has put into the statutes.

What does the Prime Minister mean by "give protection"? Clearly, he means that he wants to give protection from parliament. He wants to protect his legislation from any amendment by future parliament. He wants to place his legislation beyond the reach of parliament. Recently I read an article by a newspaper columnist who said that the Prime Minister is prepared to give up power and to give up authority. This columnist was right in this way: The Prime Minister is prepared to give up power and authority, but he is not prepared to give up his power and his authority. What he is prepared to do is give up the authority and the power of his successors to change what he has done.

The Prime Minister obviously does not believe in the supremacy of parliament: he believes in the supremacy of a written constitution.

As recently as this morning when he was opening the federal-provincial constitutional conference, the Prime Minister said, "We want a Canada in which we are all bound by one law," the law of the constitution. I do not believe that Canadians want to be bound by anything, and certainly not by a Trudeau-written constitution. I think members of parliament should be warned by the sentence I have read from the Prime Minister's speech and they should be ready to defend the supremacy of parliament over the supremacy of a written constitution.

I receive thousands of letters from Canadians on this subject, and the people of Canada do not want the supremacy of a Trudeau-written constitution to replace the supremacy of a democratically elected parliament.

The Speech from the Throne talks about good will and about flexibility on all sides. I believe the trouble is that the government wants flexibility from everyone but does not want to be flexible itself. One example of inflexibility over the years has been the Prime Minister has insisted on an amending procedure which gives a single province the power of veto.

I know that today there is some general talk about looking at other forms of amending procedure, but ever since 1968 the Prime Minister, in his letters to provincial premiers and in other ways, has never varied from the Victoria formula, which called for a perpetual veto for Ontario and a perpetual veto for Quebec. We do not have to draw pictures to explain that when we are dealing with linguistic matters a perpetual veto for Quebec has more significance than a veto for other provinces. We should be aware that there is no federal state in the world which gives to one of its constituent parts, that is, a province, a state or a canton, the same right to approve or disapprove amendments to the constitution that belong to the nation itself, and yet that is what the Prime Minister is proposing. He is proposing a single province veto.

I have made several proposals for amending procedures of the kinds used in other countries. I have proposed referenda and a two-thirds majority of an upper house. There are several possibilities. What they all have in common is that they would be a reflection of the national will. I think it is vital that we amend our constitution with a consensus of the people of Canada as a whole and not that we find ourselves placed under the veto of a single province.

The last thing I want to say regarding amendment of the constitution is something which has been mentioned by others, but it is so important that it requires emphasis and repetition. This government does not have a mandate to make fundamental constitutional changes. I remember the 1974 election, as other hon. members do, but there was no discussion of the constitution in those days. We talked about wage and price controls and about other matters. We discussed the constitution in earlier years, so we cannot say that it is just because of the Quebec election of November, 1976, that we are now discussing the constitution. We discussed the constitution before the 1972 election, but not before the 1974 election. If we check the records, I think we will find that there has been very little discussion of the constitution or constitutional amendment, so the government does not have a mandate, particularly in this fifth and dying year of the government, to expect the Canadian people to agree to see fundamental changes in the constitution. That is totally unthinkable.

In passing, it is perhaps worth making the point that we are talking about fundamental change. The Prime Minister likes to use the word "renewal". He talks about renewal of the federation, but I think we should all be aware and be warned that "renewal" is a buzz word. It is a catch word. It is intended to hide the truth. From now on, every time members of parliament and the public read the words "renewal of the federation," I ask them to read "fundamental change " in the federation. Then we will be closer to understanding what the Prime Minister is really trying to do.

Fortunately for Canada, there is an answer to Canadian unity. It is the answer we have always known, and we have lost it only for a little while. Once again it is being presented and articulated by a group of citizens who call themselves Canadians For One Canada. They have set out in clear and precise terms the principles on which they believe Canada can be built as a truly united nation. If the Speech from the Throne had been based upon these principles, today we would be on our way to becoming a truly united nation once again, to being one Canada, instead of being divided and confused by the government's false concepts of duality, diversity, and division.

Canadians For One Canada believe above all in a truly united Canada. These are their firmly held beliefs and principles as contained in their brochure. Their first belief is that Canada is a partnership of all Canadians and not just a partnership of two founding races.

Second, they believe that it should be possible for all Canadians to be united by a common national language and, at the same time, to welcome and respect the French language as an important regional language.

Their third belief is that the serious problem of language difference does not exist in most of Canada, but is essentially a regional problem which can be solved regionally by French-speaking and English-speaking Quebeckers becoming increasingly bilingual. Surely this is the common sense answer which provides Quebec with the best of both worlds and, at the same time, achieves a truly united Canada.

The fourth belief of Canadians For One Canada is that the attempt to entrench nation-wide French-English language equality in the constitution only extends the problem of language difference; it does not solve it. Also they believe that amendments to the Constitution of Canada must not be controlled by the veto of any single province, but must always be a reflection of the national will.

Finally, central to the whole concept is their firmly held conviction that Canada is one country and Canadians are one people. As soon as the beliefs and principles of one Canada are written into a future speech from the throne, Canada will be well on the way to becoming a united nation, a truly united nation, once again.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Demers: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the hon. member allow me a question?

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Will the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) accept a question?

Mr. Richardson: Yes, I will, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. Demers: Mr. Speaker, I would like to put a very simple question to the hon. member. Does he accept in essence Bill 101 of the government of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I have said many times that as long as we can leave the difficult problem of language at the level of statutory law, I see no problem. I am referring to Bill 101 at the provincial level and the Official Languages Act at the federal level. Laws made by parliament or by the national assembly, as in the case of Bill 101, can be amended by future generations of Canadians and parliamentarians. I am opposed to taking the principles of the Official Languages Act and locking them into the Constitution of Canada under a rigid amending procedure which, for all practical purposes, prevents amendment. In other words, it is the locking up for the future to which I am really opposed. I do not think a law passed by the House, or by the Quebec National Assembly, is forever a law. It can be amended. Therefore, I see no problem with Bill 101. But one should read carefully what is in Bill C-60 because it entrenches Bill 101. It is wrong to tie the hands of future generations of Canadians in that manner.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, before getting into the comments I wish to make this afternoon, I should like to refer to a couple of the suggestions made by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson). His concept of Canada is certainly one which will never bring unity or harmony to the country. Where is the equality in having one national language and one regional language? Where is the equality in providing language guarantees to English-speaking Canadians in Quebec only in federal legislation and not entrenched in the constitution? How would language guarantees be provided to Anglophones in Quebec, especially with a government like the Parti Québécois in power? That government wants to make Quebec a unilingual province.

At the federal level we have been working since 1969, when the Official Languages Act was proclaimed, to make the country officially bilingual. The hon. member was in cabinet for some eight years when that law was passed. I am sure he supported it. His suggestions and ideas would take us back to the 1960s before the Bilingualism and Biculturalism Commission held its hearings and came up with the principles of the Official Languages Act. It provides for services by the federal government in either official language where there is a significant minority.

If we accept the concept of the hon. member of a unilingual Canada, one official language, how does a French-speaking unilingual person from the province of Quebec travel to western or eastern Canada with the announcements on the aircraft, train or whatever, being in the English language only? The concepts espoused by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the premiers at the constitutional conference in Ottawa today indicate that they are working toward making this country united, whole and one.

I should like to congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) for their excellent speeches in opening this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. The Speech from the Throne emphasized two things: the matter of the constitution, and the economy of our country. Today we see an outgrowth of that, the heads of government meeting at the Conference Centre in Ottawa to deal with the constitution. We look forward with great anticipation to the success of that conference.

● (1652)

In the matter of the economy, which is really very much on the mind of every member as we reassemble in this final session of this parliament, we see the initiatives which were announced in early August further amplified in the Speech from the Throne; the reduction in government expenditures during the next two fiscal years of $2.5 billion, a move toward seeing the Post Office made into a Crown corporation, a commitment by the government to provide incentives and stimulus to the private sector amounting to some $300 million this coming year, and the re-ordering of our priorities for another $1 billion during this coming year.

It is significant that even though there have been dramatic and very difficult reductions in expenditures of $2.5 billion during this period of time, the government was still able to announce important changes to the kind of social programs we have in this country; aid and assistance for low wage earners, assistance to families with a large number of children, and assistance to our senior citizens, those who do not have other forms of income. We see that, even in the face of very severe cutbacks, our social programs will continue; for instance, the increase in the provision of the family allowance program where, although we will still be providing $20 per month per child, there will be provision for a cheque of $200 per child a year or refundable tax credit available to families earning less than $18,000 and graduating up from there. This will benefit some 2.4 million families, involving at least five million children. At the same time, the guaranteed income supplement will be increased by some $20 starting with the January cheque.

In face of the problems of inflation, an improvement as well was the reduction in excise tax on gasoline of some three cents a gallon, and a move by the government to try to hold down the increase in the crude oil price by $1 a barrel, an increase which would have otherwise gone into effect on January 1.

I must compliment the federal government on being able to equalize the price of crude oil right across the country, with minor variations for transportation costs, because in my constituency one of the very hot issues is the fact that we have such a wide variation, sometimes ten, 12 or 15 cents a gallon, in the retail price of gasoline. This is a responsibility of the provincial government in respect of which it has been reluctant to move to give some uniformity across the province, as the federal government has done in respect of crude oil, which is its responsibility. It seems to me that if the oil companies are unable to give us a more fair and equitable pricing mechanism, the province should move in an attempt to provide some equity in respect of retail gasoline prices, as the federal government has been able to do with crude oil prices.

We have to be careful when we listen to speeches on the motion in respect of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, such as those we hear from opposition benches, that we do not get caught up in all of this gloom and doom they send across the aisle to us, and across the country by way of television and radio.

If we look at many sectors of our economy today we will see some very positive signs. If you look at the merchandise trade figures which were released last Friday you will see that we are heading toward a $4 billion merchandise trade surplus this year, and that is up by some 33 per cent from last year. Naturally the Minister of of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was pleased and delighted with the figures that came out for the month of September. These are not abstract figures which do not fit back into every constituency of the country where we produce resources such as we do in the Algoma-Manitoulin area.

If we look at many of these resource items produced in that area we will see some positive and dramatic changes in the price and demand for those products. If we look at beef production, cow-calf operations, we will see prices this year up by some 75 per cent to 100 per cent over last year. At the annual sales in Thessalon and Little Current we saw a top price for 1977 of $51 per hundredweight for some 72 steer calves. This year at the fall sale in late September the price was $90.50 per hundredweight for some 60 steer calves. This is a very dramatic increase in the price of calves, following a period of some four years during which the producers of these calves suffered from extremely low prices, due in large part to the opportunities which exist for trade and sales to the United States as a result of the reduction in the value of the dollar. If this kind of price for the cow-calf operator can be maintained for the next several years, and there seems to be every indication this will happen, we will see a much more stable and positive industry there, one which has suffered very severely during the last few years. However, in respect of this year we observed the best price since 1974.

If we look at another sector of the resource industry, at lumber, for instance, we will see that we have had one of the strongest markets for lumber this year that we have experienced in many, many years. The demand is strong and prices are very high, certainly higher by at least $100 a thousand for two by fours and lumber products from many areas of northern Ontario than we have seen during the last 18 months. This industry is penetrating into markets in mid-western and eastern United States, and this is helping to push forward these high merchandise trade figures the Minister of Finance announced last week. The same situation exists in respect of newsprint and paper, so we are seeing a forest products industry in Canada that is in one of the strongest positions it has been in for many years.

In this connection I was pleased with the decision of the Minister of State (Environment) (Mr. Marchand) with regard to the Petawawa Forest Research Laboratory. I know the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins) has made tremendous representations in this regard. Many of us concerned with the forest products industry have, as well, made strong representations regarding the continuation of this research centre. The minister saw the wisdom of these arguments, and I understand that in fact the research centre will actually be increased in staff. I am pleased in this regard because it plays a vital and important role in the forest industry in Ontario, in the country and, in fact, in the world. This is important at this time because the Ontario government is changing over to having much of the reforestation, planting of seedlings, carried out by private companies in the pulp and paper industry. This kind of forest research will be very important in ensuring that this industry remains alive, well, and able to reach the full potential that our resources promise.

If we look at another sector of the resource industry, the uranium mining industry, putting aside the gloom and doom we hear from the other side of the aisle, we will see one of the strongest circumstances there in terms of trade opportunities and expansion we have been able to visualize since 1958-59 when that industry was at its peak. In the Elliot Lake area of my constituency, for instance, there are two mining companies, Denison and Rio Algoma, expanding at a record rate, hiring literally hundreds of miners each year.

If we look at the difficulties in some other areas of the country and at our generally high unemployment figures throughout the country, we see that there is opportunity for young people and people interested in becoming miners. During the next six years it is expected that each of these companies will hire some 400 miners. We will see a community which today has some 15,000 people expanding to some 42,000 people. This is important in terms of jobs and economic development in that community, and it is important to our country as well. We are talking about literally billions of dollars in foreign exchange and in trade. This will offset our expenditures for oil and merchandise items which are imported into this country.

Canada has the uranium to sell, and the government has a policy to ensure that our needs will be met. One policy is that every reactor which is put on line must have a 40-year supply of uranium. At the same time we will be able to take advantage of the trade opportunities this important mineral will supply, and perhaps meet the energy needs of our trading partners, West Germany, Great Britain, Japan, United States, etc. It is therefore important that this mineral is further upgraded to its highest potential, and that is why it is government policy that the uranium to be exported from Canada is exported as uranium hexafluoride, a highly refined state.

There are hearings going on this fall with regard to the location of a new uranium refinery in the province of Ontario. It is my hope that it will be located in northern Ontario in the north shore area, and we in that area are trying to put forward a very positive case to have it located there. Last Saturday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) visited Blind River to apprise himself of the advantages of locating the uranium refinery there. If such a thing occurs, it will provide some 240 permanent jobs, millions of dollars in assessment and capital investment in the community and will meet our desire there to further upgrade and process our natural uranium ore.

The greatest need in the rapidly expanding community of Elliot Lake right now is the need for housing. Each year there is a need for literally hundreds of new houses. Elliot Lake will grow from a population of 15,000 today to over 40,000 people in the next six or seven years. A whole new town will be developed during those years which will accommodate some 20,000 people. The existing property lots are being planned and developed at the present time. Surely, CMHC and the Department of Regional Economic Expansion will have a part to play in this expanded community, especially in providing houses for people in the service sector. The mining companies tend to look after their own quite well, but often there is a need for assistance from the government agencies to people in the service sector, where the mining companies do not have a great responsibility.

Another industry that has been in a stronger position in the last year is the steel industry. I think the situation applies to the industry across Canada as well as to Algoma Steel at Sault Ste. Marie. The industry is operating at over 90 per cent capacity and is very close to 95 per cent of its capacity. If we compare our steel industry to that of Japan's, it is my understanding that they have had to shut down 22 of their 64 blast furnaces due to unused capacity.

The fact that our steel industry in Canada is in a very positive position is not something that can be taken for granted. Just a year or so ago Japan and several other countries were dumping steel on the Canadian market. A successful anti-dumping suit was brought against these companies and they have now moved back to a position where they are selling their steel in Canada at the same prices as the Canadian manufacturers. At the same time the Department of Finance and Department of National Revenue have established a benchmark procedure to assure that steel coming into the country is properly monitored so that there is no dumping.

If we look at the demands by the northern gas pipeline for steel, we can see that the market will improve in the years ahead. Just a few weeks ago the Foothills Pipeline company called tenders in the amount of 1.4 billion tons of steel. It is my understanding that during the next few weeks the Foothills company will be putting a procurement plan before the federal government and the minister responsible for the pipeline to assure that it meets all the needs of the Canadian market. I believe that we will see a continued strong situation in the steel industry in this country because of that pipeline, which will not only bring Prudhoe Bay gas to the lower 48 states, but will provide a transportation route for Canadian gas to the southern part of our country.

These are just four resource industries which are in a very strong position in our country. I hope that we recognize this as fact and do not listen to the doom and gloom we hear from the other side of the House.

It is important to note in the Speech from the Throne that significant incentives will be provided to the private sector during this coming year. Part of the strategy of the government in creating a healthy economy is to build on the strong industries we have today. The government intends to move back the level of government expenditure by $2.5 billion in order to let the private sector go forward.

At the same time the government recognizes that there are over 900,000 people unemployed in Canada today. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has put together a program called "Strategy for Employment" which will provide some $710 million during the coming fiscal year to create 113,000 man-years of work and thus provide training and job opportunities for some 368,000 people.

An important thing about this, in my view, is that in addition to the 70 per cent increase in the number of jobs in the next fiscal year this program will provide young people with some $225 million in the next fiscal year through, for example, the job experience training program. This was started last year and will utilize some unemployment insurance funds to give young people on the job experience in industry and in the private sector, while at the same time increasing the work force in the private sector. I want to congratulate the minister on that. It is an important strategy and one that has not been discussed enough.

Not only will that program operate all year round but there is as well a Young Canada Works program whose budget has been increased from $48 million to $62 million. Every year dozens of young people in communities enjoy the advantage of this program and the communities they serve enjoy the advantage of seeing their community projects carried out.

It seems to me that as we look at the Canadian scene today, although we see many economic problems we can also see a great number of positive things in the economy, in trade and in the resource industries. We should build on this and not whine about the difficulties we face. It is only by using the positive aspects of our economy to build on, both through the private sector and the direct job-creation programs of the government, that we will fulfil the great potential of this country.

After the vote tonight I believe we should get on with the business of this session of parliament. There is much positive and constructive legislation to be passed and we should pass it in a spirit of confidence so that we may reach the full potential that the resources of this country provide to us.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I will try and condense my remarks as much as possible to comply with a wish by some official opposition members. First I would commend the mover and seconder of the address. The careful reader of the throne speech for this new session of the thirtieth parliament notes two priorities, the strengthening of our Canadian economy and the renewal of our federation, according to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). We are all agreed on the principle of a boost to the economy, but differences appear on the means of doing it. As concerns the renewal of our federation, we still do not have a clear notion of what the Prime Minister means by that phrase. A closest scrutiny might detect the dark ideas the Prime Minister is most jealously hiding from the people, his surprise box, so to speak. I shall come back to this in a few moments.

If we were to sum up in a very clear way the government's master thought in the throne speech and the legislative program, we might say it wants the provinces to pay the cost of its own mismanagement, taking this opportunity of a crisis of its own doing to take away from the provinces still more powers in order to reach its ultimate goal, the dictatorial federalism it has been trying to establish for ten years. When the Prime Minister refers to strengthening the economy, it is amazing how he sidesteps the issue of dealing with monopolies that affect the everyday life of Canadians, making them poorer by the day, to the point it is normal these days to suggest the rich are getting bigger and bigger and the poor are getting smaller and smaller, and greater in numbers. When I discovered that before the 40's, workers paid no direct taxes, income tax in other words, I found that in those years big corporations paid 75 per cent of the national budget, which left only 25 per cent to collect from royalties or indirect taxes. Today, workers pay 75 per cent of the national budget while the big industrial and financial monopolies pay only 25 per cent, although their net revenues are ten times bigger than 40 years ago. It is therefore pointless to ask why workers are heavily burdened by federal taxes. The government proposes to reduce its expenditures, but this once more will be at the expense of small wage earners. Indeed, it is getting at those who cannot find work, the unemployed, people under welfare who have been denied benefits.

As always and according to a pre-conceived plan, the federal government will let the provincial governments support the burden of its mismanagement while keeping all the taxation rights and unemployment insurance premiums. The ministers are well aware that restricting eligibility for unemployment insurance and reducing the benefit period will cut down the number of recipients and proportionally increase the number of people on provincial welfare programs. The policy of this government is always to take more from the pay cheque of the worker and give him as little as possible. It keeps the provinces quiet by promising them to deal with such or such a sector to obtain the exclusive taxation rights in this area, and then it reneges on its promise while keeping the taxation rights obtained from the provinces. You will say that this is hypocrisy, but it is much more than that. It is treason! However, I do not want to go on any longer on this economic subject, but I shall probably come back to it during the budget debate.

I want to call the attention of parliament to a particular subject, the question of federalism. We must draw the attention of our young people to this notion of federalism. As for the renewal of federation, as it is called today—and I wonder why since it never really existed in Canada as we still have a confederation system—as for a renewal of the federation, the answer is certainly not in totally sterile discussions such as that which we witnessed in the House the other day between the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). This discussion reminded me of a cock fight, and this assembly should be above such things. Such bickering is of no use to the Canadian people who would rather have more information and more details about the political and economic direction of our country.

In the few minutes allotted to me, I would like to appeal to the intelligence of those members who want to leave the paths of petty politics on which many have ventured during the debates of this House since the first mention of an election. It is very important first of all to see where we are today. For ten years, the Prime Minister and his government have repeated the words profitable federalism; they have said that we need a strong central government for a united Canada, and so on, and suggested that those who want to oppose this extremist policy which is a fore runner of the bureaucratic dictatorship that we have repeatedly denounced, are destructors of Canada or even separatists. Even the proposal of a third solution by the Pepin-Robarts Commission had no merit in the eyes of the Prime Minister who believes that he alone holds the true solution.

Mr. Speaker, I believe there should be an end to this verbal battle. The Prime Minister is trying to stir up a war between the provinces which want only one thing, that is to be given back the direct taxation right guaranteed under the British North America Act, which ensures their autonomy or their sovereignty, if you prefer, the base of the confederation created in 1867. I wonder if the greatest separatist nowadays is not the Prime Minister of Canada, because of his intransigence and his harshness towards the provinces. And to give the population an idea of the importance of the debate opening today, it is enough to define "confederation" and "federalism." These definitions are of major importance for all Canadians who will have to make a decision on the form of government of the future. Until now, the old political parties have played so much with words to delude the public and try to impose their ideology that the public wonders where it stands in regard with the 1867 confederation. Canadians seriously wonder if the words still retain their original meaning because the politicians have distorted them so much. Mr. Speaker, this is no time for confrontation but for negotiation. What is a confederation? I come now to it's definition. According to the dictionary a confederation is a union of sovereign, hence independent and autonomous states. That is the kind of confederation the Fathers of Confederation wanted. At least that is the meaning given to confederation in the dictionary. That is quite clear. So why does the Prime Minister call separatists all those who claim that sovereignty for the provinces and Quebec in particular? Is he denying that right of the provinces to sovereignty? That is exactly what the Fathers of Confederation wanted in all freedom in 1867, and that is what we should have in Canada today.

Had that confederation not been polluted by the ever increasing appetite of the federal government which resulted in the provinces being robbed of 50 per cent of their rights in the past 110 years we would not be having that fight to recover provincial rights guaranteed by the British North America Act, that sovereignty which was the essential condition of the confederative pact of 1867, with freedom of choice. Why has the Liberal government been trying for the past ten years to deny both? The evidence is there, and all governments since 1867 have recognized that undeniable fact. That sovereignty was always respected in spite of all the compromises reached at federal-provincial conferences. Indeed, even in 1942, that sovereignty was confirmed by the government of the time and recognized by all political parties in the House. In support of that, I refer those who want to read it to the schedule attached to the draft agreement of 1942. For ten years the Prime Minister has been waging the fight for federalism which he does not want to define to enlighten somewhat the people in that maze where he wants to keep them.

Mr. Speaker, I have here a few paragraphs of that agreement of 1942. You know that the province of Quebec gave up with the other provinces its rights to direct taxation on account of the war, and I quote:

> Whereas it is necessary that the federal parliament alone have the power to levy direct taxes on incomes and corporations to allow Canada to give a maximum effort in the pursuit of the present war;
> Whereas the federal government is willing to pay adequate compensation to the province provided it agrees not to levy such taxes for the duration of the war;
> Whereas the federal government recognizes that the province, in agreeing to do so, does not in any way give up or cede any part of its sovereignty or any of its constitutional rights, powers and privileges;

That seems clear to me. Those who want to read that agreement will see that the federal government recognized the sovereignty of the provinces and also respected it. And furthermore, it agreed to respect it. Mr. Speaker, that is what the Fathers of Confederation wanted in all liberty in 1867, and that is what we would like to see today in Canada. Why then make it a crime for a province to want to recover that sovereignty? I think we will see a good example of it when time comes to discuss monetary matters with the other provinces. They will want to hang on to their monetary sovereignty.

What is that federalism the right hon. Prime Minister would implement through force? I say "force" because not one province agrees with the government, and the best proof of it is what we saw in the last elections. Let us count what is left of the Liberal government in the provinces and we will have even better proof when time comes to discuss jurisdictions and the sharing of powers on the economic level. I want that definition to be remembered.

What is federalism? According to the dictionary it is a political system in which several independent and sovereign states relinquish a part of their sovereignty to a supreme state. It is quite clear. I think that is the idea that the right hon. Prime Minister has in mind. In fact, the provinces will have to sacrifice their sovereignty to the benefit of a strong central government. And the Prime Minister confirms my assumptions when he declares in his legislative program that "the new constitution must provide that Canada will remain a true federation." Is it possible in Canada? It might be possible when two nations are living in the same unified country and one of them is assimilated by the other; but I think this situation does not prevail in Canada as Lord Durham's prediction did not come true yet. The English provinces, also keeping a jealous watch over their economic sovereignty, have just proved it by rejecting the Liberal party in all their provinces. The province of Quebec is adult enough to make its own decision about its future. When I hear charges of separatism, it reminds me of the fall of 1970 when the government saw the FLQ everywhere but forgot to check within its own party, its own departments and its own police force.

I prefer to believe that the present government will consider the provinces as autonomous states by giving them back their property taxes that are direct taxes, so that they can manage their own affairs. We recognize that every province is different and that in Quebec this difference is even more acute because of its language, its common law, its institutions and what have you. This is why we do not believe in unity but in harmony between Canadian nations. This is what we believe and what we propose.

Mr. Speaker, the right hon. Prime Minister declares for the hundredth time his desire to make Canada a united country with a strong central government, that is to make the people accept the bureaucratic dictatorship he has imposed on us in the last ten years. The Liberal party is continually proclaiming that the Quebec government was not elected to separate Canada and, in my view, that party answers by moving towards negotiation. But we want to tell the Prime Minister that neither was he elected to establish a dictatorship in Canada. The worst is that he knows what he is doing, and where he is going while he is shouting to Mr. Lévesque to explain clearly his sovereignty-association theory. Does the Prime Minister define clearly what his federalism means? He takes care not to do so, Mr. Speaker.

On our side, we want the government to tell the Canadian people how it defines federalism. Does the Prime Minister tell the people that his federalism is defined in the dictionary? Everyone noticed that he never says the word confederation. However this is what we want, and the 1867 union was a confederation, which was a bit of a sham, but it is what the four provinces at that time, which were still British colonies, wanted. They even gave birth to the federal government in all freedom, after consulting each other.

When I was a schoolboy they always praised the merits of the Fathers of Confederation. But as adults, we lived the reality of this confederative union. Today, we admit that the Fathers of Confederation had perhaps good intentions but it is not enough to establish a free country. We went through the sad experience of a colonized country, with all the underlying consequences, and this reality still haunts the minds of several of our older people.

This is why we want a renewal but this time it is wanted by us, a constitution written by the provinces clearly indicating the fields of activity that they would grant to the federal government which would become a creature of the provinces, that is what is was at the beginning, working in sectors well defined by the provinces such as currency, defence, external affairs, post office etc., those provisions being accepted at first under a provincial referendum to be ratified by a second national referendum.

Such is the position of our party, Mr. Speaker, a position which we have always championed and which we continue to champion to restore Canadian harmony. I am convinced that if we do not take a step in that direction, we will be led to disaster. I therefore ask each citizen to consider thoroughly the national issue leaving aside for a moment his partisanship to choose the form of government he seeks.

[English]

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commence in the traditional way by extending my thanks to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I do not do so because it is the tradition that we do it to newer members of this chamber, but because I believe they distinguished themselves in their content and in their eloquence.

Before getting into my remarks, I wish to state that I feel a very deep sense of uniqueness about today. While different members have spoken on national unity in this country, in the government and opposition lobbies we have been watching over television the first ministers' conference.

There are some tremendous debates on the various views and opinions in the country, in this House and across the street as to how this country ought to be forged together. In that vein, I wish the first ministers great wisdom. I hope they will have a far-sighted vision and genuine compassion for the regions of Canada. This is a very important day. All members will want to extend to them best wishes on what could be a very historical deliberation.

We are at a place in our history where we must give serious consideration as to how we are going to unite ourselves. This question of national unity has been surrounded with many myths which have been perpetuated by those who would like to put national unity in front of the Canadian people as a red herring in order to divert their attention from the real issues facing this nation.

Until Bill C-60 came before the House of Commons last spring, not a single constituent ever asked me about the Constitution of Canada and why it was not changed. In my four years as a member of parliament, in fact in the previous 30 to 40 years, there has not been a single bill, regulation or piece of legislation that has somehow been denied by the present constitution.

Some myths and falsehoods are being perpetuated by the present government. One was reiterated this morning by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his opening speech. He said that Canada does not have a constitution and that we have been trying to get one for some 50 years. He went on to say that no other nation in the world is in the situation Canada is in of not having a constitution.

We do have a constitution. It is defined as the British North America Act. Canadians from the Atlantic to the Pacific are fully aware that it is our constitution, that it belongs to us. It is unfortunate that it is implied that somehow we are a lesser nation because we are not guided by some piece of paper and that we are thereby a colony of Great Britain.

Although our constitution came to us in a different form than did that of the United States, we do have a constitution. Having said that, I want to say this is a momentous day. The task is not that of writing a constitution for Canada. The task is trying to improve that which we already have.

There is another important idea which must be underscored at this time. There can be nothing terminal in the date of July 1, 1979. The Prime Minister has said that by the date the constitution of Canada must be passed or put in a form that is to his likeness. Obviously, it must have the greatest of deliberation. It must not be tied to a timetable simply to enable the Prime Minister to achieve his ultimate end of taking his place in history as the one who established constitutional reform in Canada. That is a dangerous program to follow. To take something so fundamental as the constitution and to put a time frame on it is to embark on a dangerous course.

Constitutions by their nature guide the very way in which we live. Whether it be a constitution for a youth organization, company or manufacturing organization, club or association, or for the government of the country, it is simply a piece of paper, a document to guide how we will act one toward another.

The government has chosen the wrong time to bring the constitution question into focus. Groups and societies decide how they will act together when they are in a state of harmony. What we have today is a country torn apart, a country that is divided, a country that is unemployed, that has no work, that lacks production, has a $50 billion debt and in every way has created tensions on language, cultural, ethnic and economic grounds. It is in that milieu that the Prime Minister is trying to say that we will formulate a constitution for ourselves and decide how we will relate to one another for however long Canada shall be. It is in that messy, ugly chicken coop that the Prime Minister, acting as the fox, is trying to preach national unity.

If we look, then, at some of the issues on which we note that division has taken place, we find there has been confrontation with the provinces, an assumption of unilateral powers by the federal government, and a desire to treat the Queen like some kind of Christmas tree ornament. Our balance of trade has significantly decreased, the value of the dollar is down, we have seen a 230 per cent increase in government spending, and the phasing out of small vessel insurance on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts which makes the workers feel that somehow less attention is being given to their concerns and needs.

The most dangerous threat to unity is to talk about unity at a time when you have not established common goals. I would submit that one of the most dangerous things we could be doing is talking about national unity at the very time when there is this sense of stress in the nation. We might even say that one of the greatest dangers to national harmony itself is the perpetual dominance of talk about unity. A country could well be like a marriage; if all we are going to do is talk about the things that make us different, obviously harmony cannot be found.

When you have common goals and common objectives, that is when you grow together, as was truly evident in this country in 1967 when Expo brought this nation together. It was clearly evident in the first hockey game between Canada and the Soviet Union, when we acted from our hearts as one. But it is clearly not the case today when, after ten years of this government's mismanagement, we see people divided, thinking in different ways. I believe strongly that the proper approach to national unity is to recreate for this country a common set of objectives, common drives, common aspirations. After a sense of goodwill has been developed in all regions of the country, we can then sit down in a spirit of mutual co-operation and hammer out the kind of nation we want to have.

Expanding some of the comments I was making when I said the Prime Minister had divided this nation, I would like to underscore some of the ways in which I believe he has very deliberately, I would say, cast an injustice upon my part of the country, namely western Canada. Two years ago they purchased from our side of the House a man to go to sit with them as a cabinet minister. That person was somehow to be the guardian of the province of Alberta in the cabinet. After going through the list of injustices which have been done to the province of Alberta, I can only conclude that sending the Minister of Inudstry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) to guard Alberta against Liberals is analagous only to sending an alley cat to guard mice.

Let us take a look at some of the detrimental things that have happened to the province of Alberta. If anyone is in any way intending to protect that province from the government, there is every reason to believe he simply is not being effective. We note that construction of the Lethbridge Research Laboratory has been cancelled. We note that the contribution toward the construction of a veterinary university has been cancelled; students from that large livestock producing province must now migrate to another province in order to get that style of education. The Canfarm program has been canned, together with the Canadian Dairy Commission's allocation for product research.

I think that is important, because this is a party which believes in trimming the fat from the budget. But much of what we are talking about here deals with the very kind of incentives that will increase the production of the country. The Farm Credit Corporation has suffered a reduction of some $23 million and there is no group of people in the nation today anywhere, by the admission of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), which has a better record for production and per capita output than does the farming population. Again, the forestry research stations are very closely related to production. Several of those were intended to be closed. The only ones that got reopened happened to be those in Liberal ridings; somehow the heat from back home warmed up some of the cabinet ministers.

How else, Mr. Speaker, would Alberta have felt recognizing that, when they wanted to make a natural gas trade with the United States in relation to some beef imports, the heavy hand of the Minister of Agriculture prevented it? How else would they act when there is a sales tax rebate program for every province except Alberta, and they do not get in on those federal cookies because somehow it looks to them like a Liberal barren wasteland? So they simply turn an ignoring eye. How were they supposed to act when the public utilities income tax transfer act made changes which most significantly affected Alberta? Because utilities in that province are largely privately-owned and therefore will not be part of this particular program. Take the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce where they cut $9 million from marketing incentive programs and imposed a reduction in assistance for grains and oil seed marketing. Obviously, there are places where government can cut. I do not want to get on record as saying I do not think we should make cuts. But there are in excess of 360 Crown corporations, many of which could easily be put up for individual Canadians to buy shares in, much along the lines Alberta did with the Alberta Gas Trunk Lines; thus Canadians could invest in their own resources and take over some of these top-heavy government agencies which could easily go back into private hands.

We note that in transportation, market research, forestry and agricultural research, the area of assisting people in production, the very areas in which we are failing as a nation economically, the government has decided to cut back. One does not have to be an economist or need to have a very high education or a great sense of wisdom to take that blue book of expenditures off the shelf and turn through the pages and cut far more than the $2 billion the government cut without directly injuring areas which significantly affect the productivity of the nation.

My opponent in the next election has put out little match boxes in the riding which say "Re-elect an effective voice in Ottawa". All I know is that after the damage which has been done to the province by Ottawa we do not want effective voices down here, because every time we get them we lose. We heard that before when Pat Mahoney was here; we got the capital gains tax. I submit that is one of the most retrograde taxes which could be imposed on a democratic society. Democracies, in order to work, require a strong middle class. Capital gains taxes do not tax the poor because they do not make money, and they do not tax the rich corporations because they do not sell. General Motors does not sell, and IBM does not sell. Such companies do not therefore get into the position of having to pay capital gains tax.

But the owner of the local barber shop, small businessmen generally, are in a different position. To every generation of such people the government comes for its pound of flesh. It is a very dangerous aspect of our tax system in light of the fact that this is the part of society which creates the largest percentage of wealth, something like 55 per cent, and the largest share of employment, about 80 per cent. The government somehow thinks it has to go after that sector with the capital gains tax because it wants universality regarding retirement funds. The government would rather tax people and then put them on government pensions than give them incentives to produce.

I mentioned that Ottawa picks on the regions. It uses a sledgehammer to drive shingle nails. It has made cuts in an attempt to fool the public. The government claims it wants to cut back, but a serious analysis would show that there is no such intention. The cuts made were in the most popular programs in an attempt to get the public and the opposition angry so that later they will demand that those programs be reinstated. That would give the Prime Minister the opportunity to shrug his shoulders and say, "I tried to make cuts, but they did not like them". Then he will continue his rampant spending.

Transportation is seriously inadequate in all parts of the country. I began today by talking about national unity. I submit that one of the most important aspects regarding national unity is an improved transportation system. The inequities which exist in the present system cause one region to be angry with all or some regions of the country. Potatoes from Atlantic Canada often reach their destinations 30 per cent frozen because of a lack of insulated cars. Products from the prairies are not getting to market, yet this government allows 23,000 grain cars to be on loan to the United States because there is a better dollar for them down there.

We need to develop infrastructures which would give us a productivity level which would get our balance of payments back on track, but the reserves is the situation. For example, the government decided to sell five inland grain terminals which were underutilized. Even though they were underutilized, they had been making profits in the previous several years. The Hall commission report strongly recommended that those elevators not be sold but, rather, upgraded and utilized more. It is important that we recognize that grain should be dried and cleaned on the prairies prior to being taken to market. That has been talked about since the Western Economic Opportunities Conference. That conference was called because in 1972 the government lost four Liberal members in the province of Alberta, and the Prime Minister wanted to find out what Alberta really wanted.

The Western Economic Opportunities Conference brought great promise. It underscored many transportation requirements. It underscored many regional disparities regarding production. However, nothing was done. After that conference the Hall and Snavely commissions were set up. Those two commissions outlined palatable and acceptable recommendations as far as westerners were concerned, and western producers were encouraged, but the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) then set up another commission to study the recommendations of the first two commissions. The people of this country are getting tired of studies to find out what other studies mean. They want a government which is committed to action which will right the inequities which exist and which will give them some sense of direction.

This government wears masks. It appointed an ombudsman for the Ministry of Transport, for whom there is no need. That is an absolute waste of money. The Auditor General is assigned the task of checking on various departments. Any well managed government department does not need an ombudsman. We may well need ombudsmen at the federal and provincial levels to act as clearing houses for citizens at large, but surely not at the departmental level. This kind of ombudsman concept smacks of a government which is admitting its incapacity to govern.

This government sold five elevators in an attempt to trim its budget, yet the elevators were making money for the federal treasury.

The government built a railway to Churchill, Manitoba, using 100-pound steel except for the last few miles, where it used 80 pound steel. Therefore, the only trains which can be used for the whole length of the track are trains which have loads no heavier than that which can travel on 80-pound steel. That is the kind of ineffective mismanagement that we have.

The government talks about increasing storage capacity at the terminals at the port of Churchill, yet we note that this year the port of Churchill was underutilized by some nine million bushels. The government talks about selling more grain abroad, yet it allows 23,000 grain cars to be on loan in the United States. The result is reduced productivity.

Mr. Speaker, I see that hon. members opposite are either sleepy or hungry, so I will call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Malone: Mr. Speaker, I was very apologetic when I called it six o'clock. Even though there are many problems I should like to discuss, I will relinquish the rest of my time since there are other hon. members who want to participate in this debate.

[Translation]

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful to the hon. member who has yielded his right to speak. I will try to be as brief as possible since there are many hon. members who wish to take part in the debate.

Last year I had the honour to be one of the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. I therefore seize this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) for the outstanding distinction with which she performed that task. As for the seconder, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard), I found it significant that he emphasized in his speech the difficulties senior citizens are up against in our society of today. Besides, I did point out in my speech last year the circumstances of the young, the old and the low income people. The federal government has done much in these areas but, like the hon. member for Verdun, I feel that it will have to intensify those programs.

Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which I am being granted, I will attempt once again to raise the questions contained in the speech I delivered last year in the House of Commons and to assess the extent of government action in this respect.

Among the issues which I brought to the attention of the House last year was the economic development of the Quebec region. On that specific issue, I want to congratulate the government for the contribution it made to the development of the Quebec harbour by dredging the channel of the Saint-Laurent River so as to lower its level from 38 to 41 feet.

This year the government went one step further. The Department of Transports has already commissioned a study dealing with the construction of a wood product shipping harbour for the Quebec area.

Moreover we should mention the development project in the harbour of the old city of Quebec which was announced on February 13 this year during the travelling caucus of which I was chairman and which brought together five ministers and a dozen members from Quebec and Ontario into the riding of Louis-Hébert and the Quebec region.

Announced by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet), Quebec city's old harbour development project implies numerous and significant benefits on the economic development of the area. This $42 million federal program spread over four years is designed to give a new life to some 179 acres of federal acreage located in Quebec city's old harbour district. It will involve the relocation of some industrial, harbour and railway facilities that are now antiquated and do not belong in the urban and historical environment surrounding them. These facilities would be replaced by cultural, leisure and social services, as well as residential and administrative buildings.

However, I must insist that this should be only the beginning of harbour development in the Quebec city area because its harbour is in competition with other ports on the St. Lawrence River, on the Atlantic as well as the western coast. The Quebec city metropolitan area already has a good railway and road system allowing for the quick transportation of goods to the large centres. The Quebec city area offers tremendous potential, and I believe it is essential to develop its harbour.

In this vein of economic development in the Quebec city region, Mr. Speaker, the extension of its airport is a second priority which I dealt with in my speech last year. A few months ago, the Minister of Transport made announcements in this regard. First, the hon. member for Charlevoix (Mr. Lapointe), acting as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport, answered my question regarding the extension of runways. He announced in the House that in view of Quebec City's hotel accommodation and convention facilities, and I quote:

—it becomes more and more urgent to extend the present runway. This is why the minister intends to ask very soon for the necessary funds to extend the runway to 9,000 feet. We hope that the amounts will be invested in the area at the very beginning of summer.

Then, in August, 1978, at a press conference held jointly with representatives of the chamber of commerce and industry of metropolitan Quebec city, the Department of Transport tabled a master plan for the development of the airport over the next ten years.

The master plan of the Quebec airport provides for the extension of one of the two runways to 2743 metres, that is 9,000 feet, in order to accommodate big jets; the building of boarding ramps to be announced shortly; the addition of another storey to the air terminal in order to build a restaurant; and finally, the eventual separation of commercial traffic from small craft training flights and general aviation. That plan, which has been approved by the Department of Transport, is the result of joint studies and consultations by all interested organizations in the Quebec area, including the air companies and the Association des Gens de l'air. It is designed mainly to meet the increasing needs of the Quebec region and to promote the tourist industry in that area.

The national unity issue was also raised in the debate last year and again this year. It was dealt with according to the highlights of the Speech from the Throne made about two weeks ago.

I also know that the government's primary objective is to give back to the country a sense of unity. It is seeking solutions by consulting all individuals and all agencies or groups concerned about the country's future. Moreover, we cannot ignore the fact that we are all affected by the national unity crisis no matter what hon. members of the opposition say. We all know that economic prosperity will not be of a great use to us if we lose our country through internal quarrels and Quebec's separation.

In a very real sense, Mr. Speaker, national unity should remain our first subject of concern. We owe it to ourselves to pursue our search and to keep conceiving new policies and new strategies. We have to create the blend of collective will and individual attitudes that will allow all Canadians to feel at home everywhere in Canada and to participate in all justice and plenitude in the life and prosperity of the country.

To solve the problems that threaten the stability, the unity and the prosperity of our country, a fundamental renewal of the federation of Canada is imperative. At this turning point in the history of our country, we have a unique opportunity to reaffirm our basic values and adjust our practices, our institutions and our constitution to modern realities.

Further to its commitment, in June last the federal government tabled a white paper entitled "A Time for Action", which traces the main steps towards renewal of the Canadian federation, and Bill C-60 on the constitutional reform. Canadians, and more so Quebeckers, have surely been able to see that the government of Canada is in earnest, and that it does not deal in abstract notions such as the so-called sovereignty-association.

The government attempts to define an orientation, to prove, once more, Mr. Speaker, its will to come up with negotiable proposals. We saw that again this afternoon when the federal government made proposals. All the prime ministers of the provinces stressed the fact that the matter was not necessarily urgent. This afternoon, we heard from the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) and the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone).

To that end, the government set up a special joint committee of the Senate and the House of Commons on the constitution of Canada. That committee, which was instructed to study and report on the proposals which have been made and will be made public at a later date by the Canadian government on matters pertaining to the constitution of Canada, heard several witnesses, individuals as well as organizations, all of whom are concerned with the constitutional renewal.

As one of the representatives of the House of Commons on that committee, I was in a position to see how necessary the reform of the constitution is, except perhaps in the eyes of a few hon. members.

● (2012)

[English]

Thus the need for a new constitution is a major necessity if we are to try to keep Quebec and Quebeckers in confederation. The dilemma with which we are faced is not simple. As professor Leon Dion of Laval University said in his brief before the committee:

Therefore, we have to decide whether it would be better to carry out the revision of the Constitution immediately without the participation of the Quebec government or whether on the contrary the whole matter should be postponed as long as Quebec, through a referendum or otherwise, would not have succeeded in expressing a unanimous opinion. By waiting for Quebec we risk causing a serious delay in the reshaping of the country, but by acting without Quebec we risk doing useless work and reaping sour grapes.

This dilemma is not simple and, if we add to it the resistance we have seen to the first propositions of the government, our task is far from finished.

[Translation]

This year's Speech from the Throne delivered by the Governor General mentions that the government is prepared to begin the study of the distribution of powers and jurisdictions at the same time as that of institutions and rights, and to give every aspect of the work a high and urgent priority. Even after meeting that request, Mr. Speaker, we saw once again this afternoon at the first ministers' conference that this is not enough for the province of Quebec or the other provinces. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the government of Canada should show once again a great flexibility and a great deal of good faith.

On the other hand, I am happy to see the increased importance the government attaches these days to the problems of unemployment among young people. The Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) defined last week a score of programs to bring young people into the labor market through grants for the hiring of new graduates and young unemployed graduates. Those programs are intended to provide jobs for about 58,000 unemployed youths. Once again, we saw in the Speech from the Throne the importance the government attaches to that priority, namely the problem of unemployment among young people. And I quote from the Speech:

> The major thrust of the government's employment strategy is to encourage the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector. Special emphasis is being placed on the training and job placement of young Canadians.

The problem of unemployment among young people is not acute only in Canada; it exists in most western countries. I hope the government of Canada with its new measures will continue to show leadership in its fight against that plague. Mr. Speaker, let me say in concluding that after more than a year in the House of Commons I am proud to be part of this group of parliamentarians—with a few exceptions, I must admit—trying to help Canadians save this country regardless of their origin and their affiliations. I am proud to be part of this government and I am proud to represent and serve the people of the riding of Louis-Hébert from this side of the House.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I recognize the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Shymko). I should like to point out to hon. members that this is the hon. member's maiden speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Yuri Shymko (Parkdale): Mr. Speaker, before making any comment on the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne opening the fourth session of the thirtieth parliament, I would like first to reaffirm one feeling and indeed one reality related to the fact that I am here as a member of the House of Commons, among this elite, this distinguished assembly, distinguished because of its speakers, its leaders and sometimes because of its actors.

First I speak of that feeling. Mr. Speaker, 25 years ago, as a youngster of 13, I arrived here in Canada as a political immigrant with my parents. Having survived hatred, war and death as one of the survivors from Dresden—everybody has heard and knows about the tragedy in that city—I came to this country of dream, of peace, of liberty and justice, and I am now among you as a member. That is possible only in a country like Canada. I must remind hon. members, Mr. Speaker, that I did not have to change my name Yuri for George and Shymko for Simcoe to achieve that. I hope that this country, where such a rare opportunity exists in a world of prejudices and intolerance, will continue to represent the dream, the hope, the optimism of knowing that what is impossible in other countries is still possible in Canada. That is possible because of the people, because of the moral and individual values which form the political, economic and social framework in which we as leaders are operating and which we must protect at any cost.

Referring to the second reality, Mr. Speaker, it is a fact inconsistent with all speculations, projections and political prophecies of those experts who predicted that the representative of the governing party would win the by-election in the Parkdale fortress. Well, here I am. I am not a ghost and what you see is real and possible, a prophetic indication for the spring of 1979 of which hon. members opposite are well aware.

It was Pascal, the great French philosopher who said: "The heart has its reasons which reason knows nothing of." Well, Mr. Speaker, the Parkdale constituents have shown their feelings when they voted against all the arguments of the media and political experts, in spite of two personal visits of the hon. member for Mount Royal (Mr. Trudeau), in spite of the constant visits of the hon. member for Ontario (Mr. Cafik). When they voted they showed their feeling, their compassion for this country, their love for that politically polarized, divided and as we know, economically bankrupt country. I will not quote any statistics, you have heard enough statistics given by my colleagues on this side of the House. This is why I decided to give my first speech in the House and I wish to comment on the following paragraph taken from the Speech from the Throne:

> We wish also to express our love of Canada. A great country is not created without difficulty, but to see it develop and grow stronger despite every obstacle has been for us a source of great joy and pride. Our faith in the future of Canada is stronger than it has ever been.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak of that love and faith.

● (2022)

[English]

I, too, will not be partisan, like the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo (Mr. Jamieson), the minister for external affairs, and I will try to digress somehow from the normal procedure. I will speak of the essence of our function as members of parliament and of our common responsibilities as servants of the people on whatever side of this House we sit. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has said, "Canada grows stronger." It reminds me of the cliché of the past campaigns, "The land is strong." He has also said, "Our faith in Canada is stronger than it has ever been."

Let us look at the growing strength of Canada under the management, or more appropriately, the mismanagement, of this government. What kind of strength do we have with one million unemployed, a diminishing manufacturing industry which, in fact, makes Canada a warehouse for imported manufactured products, with a Canadian dollar at its lowest base—lower than the worst period of the depression—with a standard of living that has fallen from second to seventh place in the world? How can the Prime Minister call Canada strong with a $15 billion deficit that is growing every day? How can Canada be considered strong when the government proposes a bill to borrow $17 billion to save the country from total bankruptcy? I could spend the next hour listing the Liberal interpretations of strength. If this is strength, I cannot imagine what the Liberal definition for a weak economy is.

The right hon. member for Mount Royal spoke about faith. We could see examples of that faith in our economy when 1.7 billion of Canada's dollars have left this country in the past three years, when the Prime Minister himself had to go to Germany to be "Schmidt-en" with the wisdom of realizing that the priority of this land is the economy. The proposals of Her Majesty's opposition to cut government spending by $2 billion were the best and the only options that made any sense. Ask and ye shall be given; the government asked and the opposition certainly gave the answers.

But above all, it represents one basic truth, that the government has lost its moral prestige and its moral authority in Canada and now wants to use its sole legal authority to make this fourth session an electioneering session to save face before its citizens. It will, indeed, be a tragedy if the government turns this session into an election campaign. If we do this it will destroy the very aim of parliament—to rule and to legislate, to serve, not to manipulate the hopes and needs of people. The function of parliament as I understood it before being elected, and as I still understand it, is not to become a pompous circus for the entertainment of others or for self-gratification. If such is the aim of the government, it would be much better to accept the reality, as many ministers have themselves admitted, that people in Canada have had enough. They are protesting, as illustrated by the results of the by-elections. The people want a change and there is nothing wrong with changing sides on the floor of this House. We do it as individuals and as gentlemen every day between debates, and all we need do now is to do it collectively.

The Prime Minister likes to pick on the opposition, as was illustrated last week when he colourfully referred to the posterior of a member of the opposition and wanted to kick that particular part of his anatomy. I admit it was quite an introduction to the House of Commons, to be here when that famous remark was made. It was interesting that it was the only remark that made the media. In the confusion I thought that the Prime Minister was referring to expanding his cabinet by picking another member of the opposition, following the example of the hon. member for Crowfoot (Mr. Horner).

Getting back to my earlier point, we can talk about love and faith, but we cannot legislate love and faith. Just as we cannot legislate tolerance, respect for the dignity of man and respect for law, we cannot legislate confidence in this land, confidence in this economy, confidence in this government and faith in our future. How can the government expect respect for the law from workers they have legislated back to work when, on the other hand, rumours and insinuations are rampant throughout this country that even some ministers of the Crown were tampering with illegalities? The government is responsible to the people and to parliament; the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Richardson) pointed this out this afternoon.

Lawmakers must be subjected to the rule of law, not to the rule of manifest unilateral authority. The Prime Minister, if he has not seen it by now, must stop moulding Canada in terms of the shape of his own ideas; he must change his views and values to reflect those of this nation and of the majority of its people. As for the question of unity, it would require another hour at least to adequately discuss this issue.

I would like to refer to the comments made today by the Secretary of State for External Affairs—

[Translation]

—who states that as a former citizen of Newfoundland before that province joined our Canadian confederation a few years ago, he was a foreigner and that he now considers himself completely Canadian.

Mr. Speaker, what is most tragic is that at the time the minister joined the rest of Canada, Quebeckers felt strongly that they were Canadians, while today many of them—and the number is increasing—feel more and more like strangers in this vast country, which was in the past a country of great dreams and great visions and where they enthusiastically celebrated their centennial 11 years ago, united in their hopes and beliefs for the future. But today, Canada is divided, polarized and torn by fear and suspicion. A great number of studies have analysed this situation and suggested solutions. I simply want to say that the question of unity, the problems that it causes or the means to solve them are not as simple as we would want them to be. Everyone of us, Mr. Speaker, every party, every member of parliament, every government leader, whether federal or provincial, and every Canadian, whatever his cultural background, will need to make a great effort of understanding, tolerance and sacrifice if we are to solve this problem.

Let us compare this with the case of Newfoundland. There is only one point that I want to make; if in its historical evolution, Quebec has progressed toward a responsible, parliamentary and democratic government with a blossoming of collective and individual rights, if in its efforts towards the creation of a French-speaking nation in North America, as other colonies in North and South America which have gained their own independence, if Quebec had been autonomous like Newfoundland until the second part of this century, I am certain that it would find it much easier now to join this Canadian federation after having tasted independence. It is the lack of this second stage in its history which now troubles the French-speaking nation. But if we see Canada, like Laurier, as a cathedral still in the process of being built, as a courageous experiment——by a segment of humanity in a world where majorities destroy and persecute minorities; in a world where hatred and wars, injustice, the destruction of civil, human and national liberties are the rule, where democracies are the privileges of only one-fifth of the world's population. Let us not destroy this dream, let us not destroy this vision.

● (2032)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shymko: Let us build it with all the determination, all the faith, all the confidence, all the love and respect for one another that is at our disposal. Because I, as well as millions of Canadians, be they Anglophones, Francophones, or "neitherphones", still cherish this dream.

There is nothing wrong with bill 101, given a few revisions. There is nothing wrong with a referendum in Quebec, given that the majority of Québecois, as I firmly believe, will speak out for unity, will speak for this confederation of regions, of peoples and of cultures. What is wrong is our indifference. What is wrong is our suspicion, our fears and, above all, our lack of confidence in ourselves that we can indeed "make it".

What is wrong is not that the Québecois have taken over the civil service because they are the only bilingual segments of our population. What is wrong is that today only 43 per cent of high school students in such a great province as Ontario even bother to study French and that less than 5 per cent complete Grade 13.

An hon. Member: Right on!

An hon. Member: Tell Bill Davis about that!

Mr. Shymko: The reason for this, Mr. Speaker, as well as the changes that are made in Quebec where the study of English was obligatory, is the fact that it was made an option, just as the study of French had been obligatory when I came to this country, a time when the crisis of unity did not exist. It was obligatory, but when the issue in this country became polarized, French was made an option. Now, no one bothers to study French, and the same trend is beginning in Quebec.

Let us not point to the premier of Ontario or to anyone in particular. As I said earlier, this is the responsibility of every Canadian, of every prime minister and of every premier of every province.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Shymko: Finally, Mr. Speaker, let me conclude by referring again to the question of faith and love. Only the person who has faith in himself is able to have faith in others and is able to be faithful to others. In no other period in the history of this country has faith in ourselves been so diminished, so troubled, as in the last decade. Hon. members, Mr. Speaker, can deduce the reasons for themselves.

Faith is a condition of our ability to promise. As a condition of human existence, faith in the potentialities of others, the potentialities of government in particular, is slowly being eroded. Indeed, for one particular government very little is left.

As for love, Mr. Speaker, I should like to end my speech by quoting from a pocket book entitled "The Art of Loving". It does not deal with a subject that some hon. members would like to hear about. The author of this pocket book is Erich Fromm. At page 111, he has this to say:

> Our society is run by a managerial bureaucracy, by professional politicians; people are motivated by mass suggestion, their aim is producing more and consuming more, as purposes in themselves. All activities are subordinated to economic goals, means have become ends; man is an automaton—well fed, well clad, but without any ultimate concern for that which is his peculiarly human quality and function. If man is to be able to love, he must be put in his supreme place. The economic machine must serve him, rather than he serve it. He must be enabled to share experience, to share work, rather than, at best, share in profits. Society must be organized in such a way that man's social, loving nature is not separated from his social existence, but becomes one with it.

This is my conclusion, Mr. Speaker. It may have been a little philosophical but in the future I hope to have the opportunity to dwell on topics the surface of which I have just touched tonight. I thank this country for the honour and the privilege of being here with you and working with you for many months, if not many years. God bless you; God bless this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to participate in the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I would like to join all those who have congratulated my two colleagues, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) and my colleague from Toronto (Mr. Robinson) who have been the first to speak in this debate. Mr. Speaker, I hope that this speech which I want to keep brief will allow me to correct certain figures, to set some facts in their true light, which will permit me to create the optimism that is necessary and that should normally flow from the situation prevailing in Canada.

A few weeks ago, as by-elections took place, I was personally involved in the riding of Saint-Hyacinthe. Mr. Speaker, I was surprised to see just how eager the opposition is to take power by any means, how they were prepared to use any argument without any basis in reality or on any economic fact. I see new members sitting on the opposite side of the House. Those new members are young people coming from all social classes, and I hope they will succeed in giving to the official opposition the desire to serve the cause at least by using sound and logical arguments which can be repeated throughout this country with the same conviction.

Mr. Speaker, we heard the Progressive Conservative candidate in Saint-Hyacinthe, probably as all or most of his other colleagues, saying that for one reason or another Canada had dropped from second to seventh rank—I do not know when—concerning the standard of living. Well, Mr. Speaker, that is absolutely false. Over the last ten years this country has recorded at all levels the best or the second best performance in the world.

We only have to look at the growth of employment from 1970 to 1977. The rate of growth in Canada was 23 per cent, followed by the United States with 15 per cent, then by Australia and Sweden—the latter being often cited as an example in Quebec—with 5 per cent. Japan, already cited as an example, also recorded 5 per cent. During the last decade, we have created around 250,000 new jobs a year. Mr. Speaker, you cannot find such a performance in any industrialized country during the last decade. As for growth of real domestic product, Canada ranked third with 4.5 per cent between 1968 and 1977. For the growth in industrial production, Canada had the second best percentage increase after Norway. In that country the rise was 38 per cent and 32 per cent in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on putting up figures and a list of impressive statistics; they are not accidental but due to the rational and consistent economic policy of this government. I will not mention what happened before 1974 when I became a member of this House. But in 1974, when we compared our situation—including the unemployment rate—with that of our main trading partner, the United States, we could note that Canada was holding better in that period than its neighbours. But in 1975, things changed; our country had to cope with a very high inflation rate and a sudden increase in unemployment. In 1975, Mr. Speaker, before the government decided to come up with a price, wage and benefit control policy, the wage increase in Canada was approximately 22 per cent while the rise in productivity was only 2 per cent. During the same year, the increase in wages and productivity was respectively 9 and 5 per cent in the United States.

Germany, which is often quoted as an example, had a 7 per cent rate of wage increase and its rate of productivity increase was around 8 per cent. Mr. Speaker, our country, whose economy is above all based on exports, had to act and change the situation which prevailed in 1975.

Instead of the policy advocated by members opposite calling for a price and wage freeze for a given period, our Prime Minister preferred a policy of price and wage as well as profit control spread out over a period of more than three months. Of course, some members opposite are laughing. However, from the results of such a policy in the United States as well as in Britain, one realizes that now the advisers of the American president as well as the Britons would never revert to such a three-month policy which works to the disadvantage of the workers.

Mr. Speaker, the government did not simply decide to control prices and wages; it also decided in 1975 to use its own budget to decide and state that from now on the growth in government spending would not exceed that of the gross national product, namely the growth rate of our gross national product. This commitment on the part of the government has been respected, Mr. Speaker, and last August the Prime Minister intervened again and stated that from now on not only the growth rate of government spending would not exceed the growth rate of the gross national product but would remain below it.

Mr. Speaker, it must also be noted that it is not merely by controlling government spending that the figures I stated earlier and several others which the Prime Minister referred to in his October 12 speech could be reached. Mr. Speaker, listening to the Tories during the last few months, you would have thought they had just discovered, after sitting down with a few Bay St. bankers and so-called businessmen, a series of new programs for economic recovery. We heard the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) mention programs for small and medium businesses. We heard the Leader of the Opposition and also the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) propose an over-all employment strategy, an industrial strategy for Canada.

We heard the Leader of the Opposition, during the summer months, put forward a series of programs, and I believe the only correlation that can be made is with the coldness of his feet at the thought of an election. Mr. Speaker, it is unbelievable! In the morning, the leader of the Conservative party would come up with plans to cut $5 to $6 billion off government spending, while in the afternoon and evening he would be promising new programs. You know, it is rather difficult to convince a serious audience, not a chamber of commerce but a fifth concession, which does not even exist anymore in Quebec, to convince them their taxes can be reduced on the one hand while new incentives given on the other. Mr. Speaker, how can you spend and save at the same time?

However, probably due to leaks from officials as suggested by the Prime Minister, they took and did a poor job of copying certain programs that have been in the making inside the government for more than two years.

Mr. Speaker, this is my second year as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. When I assumed that responsibility last year, the department was already engaged in an analysis of our various industrial segments in Canada for more than a year. Our department developed during that period a specific diagnosis concerning the 23 main industrial segments. At the federal-provincial conference of ministers of industry, trade and commerce in February of last year, we discussed with each of the provincial ministers these diagnostic studies that had been made available to them some months before, and we put to them the following question: Do you agree or not with that diagnosis we are making of the economic situation in such or such an area? No province told us: No, we are not in total agreement. Each and everyone, including management, including labour, recognized the accurateness of all the facts in those studies. On the basis of those first talks between industry and commerce ministers and of subsequent discussions at the time of the federal-provincial conference of finance ministers as well as the conference of first ministers, Mr. Speaker, our government and, more particularly, our department created 23 task forces made up of provincial, management and union representatives as well as, of course, some federal government members, in order that from that diagnosis we would be able to develop recommendations involving all participants and certain measures to correct situations where corrections were needed.

Mr. Speaker, for the first time in Canadian history, a government has clearly shown enough responsibility to convince both management and labour to sit around the same table and not only discuss in times of confrontation over the negotiation of labour contracts. They have been sitting together since last April to study the source of those problems and the corrective measures to take in each area.

Mr. Speaker, 850 recommendations have resulted from that serious work. On those 850 recommendations, some 400 are directed to the federal government. Almost 300 are directed to provincial governments and the others, and this might be the most important denominator, the other recommendations—almost 200—are directed to unions and management. They decided to form permanent working groups that will engage in a continuing consultation process in order to establish common strategies.

Mr. Speaker, when the Leader of the Opposition can only designate the hon. member—and it is strange he is not called Prime Minister anymore but the hon. member for Mount Royal—when the only word the members of the opposition can find when talking about this man is confrontation, but I shall come back to it when I get into constitutional matters, contrarily to the members opposite what they call confrontation is to me a good knowledge of the subject, which is completely different.

Mr. Speaker, I am talking about the process which started more than two years ago to demonstrate to what extent the government, confident in the economic situation, in the rules of the game, in the future of our country, committed itself with its partners of the economic sector to create not only a climate of optimism but also the climate that will encourage investors and that will encourage people not to be motivated by fear but by confidence in the economy and the future of their country.

Mr. Speaker, there are also other economic policies which unfortunately have not been reported adequately by the press. I refer to the statement made last May by the Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) when he set forth his policy on research and development. By this announcement, the federal government showed its willingness to appropriate 1.5 per cent of our gross national product for research and development.

The federal government introduced a series of incentives designed to urge Canadian firms to invest more in research and development so as to ensure a better co-ordination between the research conducted in universities and in the private sector, as well as to create jobs in the private sector for university graduates and the research field.

Mr. Speaker, all these policies make it possible today for a Canadian firm committed to research and development to pay only about 20 cents for every dollar invested. Yet, Mr. Speaker, when we realize that after many years, and I make an exception for the ex-leader of the Conservative party (Mr. Stanfield), all the others propose a new R and D policy, it seems that R and D is something new for the Conservative party.

Mr. Speaker, there is another policy about which we said very little, that is our policy of assistance to small and medium-sized businesses as stated by the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abott) last June. That policy actually implemented many recommendations made by the president of the Association of Small and Medium-sized Businesses, Mr. Bullock. This is so true that a few weeks after our announcement, he wondered whether he was going to be asked to run as a Liberal candidate, and he would probably have been tempted to accept.

With the announcement of that policy, we agreed to tax rebates, we exempted from all federal taxes the first $50,000 of manufacturing production for each business, we agreed that family businesses, small and medium-sized, average their income over several years and be exempt from capital gains tax up to $200,000, if the business was sold to the children and grandchildren. In fact, we were accepting the major recommendations submitted by chambers of commerce, by pressure groups and particularly by Mr. Bullock's group.

Mr. Speaker, in August of this year, our government went a little further by announcing budget cuts to the tune of some $500 million for the current fiscal year, and of some $2 billion for the next one. Of course, there were members opposite who suggested that the Prime Minister had just become aware, that he had just discovered the way, a little like the third way in Quebec. If we made a mistake in the announcements we issued in August, it concerns not the accuracy of what we said but simply perhaps the form or format we chose. And I shall let the experts in communications pass judgment and do whatever analysis they require.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that our Prime Minister, no, I am not convinced, but I know for a fact that if our Prime Minister chose the month of August to announce a series of budgetary cuts after looking at the results of studies on the industrial sectors of Canada, after due consideration at the cabinet and subcommittee levels, and also in the Liberal caucus, it became clear that with the programs of industrial adjustment which had been studied by the cabinet, and approved in principle as for as their contents were concerned, it was necessary, because of their importance, to decide on further cuts elsewhere. With respect to the opposition members who have been announcing programs all through the summer, we know very well that they could only have picked them up from documents which some civil servants presumably fed up with the Liberals might have lost inadvertently. On that matter, as the Prime Minister said, there may be a lot more imagination in the critics raised by the Leader of the Opposition against us than in the quality of the programs that he developed by himself.

Mr. Speaker, in the economic field, I think that this government acted as a responsible and truly liberal government, because while we undertook some reforms, remedial action and adjustment programs, we always kept in mind that, being Liberals, we must always make sure that our resources will be honestly and equitably redistributed amongst all Canadians, and not in the manner described in the Mortgage Follies article published in the Globe and Mail of October 3, 1978, dealing with the mortgage program proposed by the Progressive Conservative party. If the Conservative members want to talk about the redistribution of wealth, I am prepared to answer any of their questions after my speech, and I will probably be able to teach them something on this matter. Even in your own province, there would be room for a better redistribution of wealth, for I know western Canada better than you know Quebec.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Like Mr. Horner!

Mr. Loiselle (Chambly): Yes, Crowfoot is a constituency I know well; in fact, I like both the riding and the minister. Mr. Speaker, I believe the Liberal party can be proud, and its members can carry their head high. The Liberal party holds a record in the economic field which few other governments, amongst our neighbours, amongst industrialized countries, may boast of. This is evidenced by the fact that with a population of 23 million and a country like ours, we have been able to achieve the performances which are reflected in the statistics.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to deal with the constitutional issue, one which of course is at the centre of all discussions in the three-day period we are living now, the first day having ended at about six o'clock. Like most Canadians, I listened to the first reports of commentators and political experts who analysed the first day of discussions of the federal-provincial conference on the future of Canada and on the constitutional changes.

I have to admit, Mr. Speaker, that I am a little confused because I had to go by those reports because I was unable to listen to the speeches of all the provincial premiers. From bits and pieces of speeches and reports, especially those by English-speaking commentators, I had the impression that the Prime Minister had behaved like a perfect jackass throughout the day, that he had lacked leadership. But when we turned to the French channel, we heard someone say that the Prime Minister had been outstanding. So I think we will have to wait for the eleven o'clock news to have the story from both sides. However, from the little I have heard about what has been said today, one question comes to my mind: we had, gathered in this forum, the ten provincial premiers and the federal Prime Minister, that is the eleven Canadians who are or should be the most experienced men on matters related to the future, the possibilities and the constitutional changes to be made in this country.

Mr. Speaker, after witnessing the conduct of some, after listening to interviews given by some premiers, I wonder if they realize that half of a country rests on the common will of its citizens and depends first and foremost on the choice of people of any language and culture to bring together their diversity, their skills, their heart and soul to live as a nation. The other half, Mr. Speaker, rests of course on economic and geographic reasons and one can prove, depending on the time and place, that reasons which were relevant ten years ago on economic grounds are less so today. But, Mr. Speaker, one thing that does not and will not change in any country of the world is the common desire to have a country and that desire is lacking in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, when one sees provincial premiers getting prepared for a conference in Regina to stonewall the federal government, one with natural resources, one with tariffs, another with off-shore resources and yet another using who knows what else, so they all say, like the Conservative leader, that they have come to a consensus, that they are all mad as hell. That Mr. Speaker, is the easiest thing to do. The problem is to arrive at some common denominator. The people from Alberta who are sitting here, my new friends whom I have learned to know since becoming a member of this House, there was a time when they needed the resources from the east to develop. Now it is us easterners who are asking them to show some heart and reason and help our economy. Indeed tomorrow if the wells dry up, they will have to live off their industrial development. Even the newly elected economists on the other side will not be able to deny such an obvious thruth.

Mr. Speaker, if we do not in this country define once and for all our willingness and reason for our staying together, or if we follow the Tory leader's philosophy and strip away most of the federal government's power, then I prefer being a separatist Quebecker. Because the day the federal government becomes a dead weight, Tory style—. What do you want, we might as well be Quebeckers, Ontarians, and westerners above all else. We will meet from time to time at the Calgary Stampede, but we will look after our own business. We would not thus take advantage of the benefit of the whole community because the country was made up of people who once shared common ideals, ideals of freedom and greatness throughout Canada, Mr. Speaker, ideals to build a country which would be envied by all humanists in the world. That challenge has been taken up by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who has been trying to explain it to us for the past ten years, but we refuse to budge. It would be more embarrassing to pass a bill of rights which would compel Canadians to show some open-mindedness. Would it be more annoying for a premier of British Columbia who would not be much embarrassed if suddenly his fellow citizens wanted to vote against him as a result of the bill of rights? It would be better to restrict ourselves to a provincial charter as suggested by our premier, Mr. Lévesque, but at least we know why he says so while we are not so sure about the others. However, Mr. Speaker, rather than enforce a bill of rights which would be included in that constitution as it is in most countries, we say: Let us have provincial charters. We are so much more familiar with our own environment and our own people; we are so much closer to them. However, Mr. Speaker, even Quebec separatists recognize that this country is useful for economic reasons. The proof is that they go on their knees to negotiate an economic partnership. And there are the other provinces; some of them assume a very proud attitude, but they will come to their senses sooner or later, and if Canada is a valid concept for economic reasons, Mr. Speaker, perhaps it is also a valid concept for humanitarian reasons or simply for the evolution of the human race.

Mr. Speaker, I see my colleague for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on the other side. If this man can still live in French and express himself in excellent French as he does, could we not attempt to enable more Alberta citizens to have the same privilege for self-development as this man has? Could we not aspire to this, Mr. Speaker? In fact, when we create barriers which are much more psychological than real, it is of all this that we are depriving ourselves in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) who has at least the courage to say that we must maintain a strong central government in our country. Mr. Speaker, a strong central government does not necessarily mean a government which continually invades provincial jurisdiction, but rather a government which still has at its disposal the means to take action when necessary.

Can anyone think that it would be feasible for Canada to have ten monetary policies? Mr. Lévesque himself has just replied to this question. Would it be possible to have ten customs policies in Canada? Mr. Lévesque himself has just replied to this. Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to have ten energy policies in Canada? I hope that the Conference Board has studied this issue. Mr. Speaker, there is a long list of matters as basic as these three where it is unthinkable to divide the decision-making process. This is why our government has undertaken a review—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by congratulating the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Shymko) on his maiden speech tonight. He distinguished himself and the people of Parkdale, who are to be congratulated on their wise choice. I look forward to his further contributions to our debates and to working with him in the months and years ahead on the other side of the House.

I should also like to congratulate the mover and seconder of the Address, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard). I must confess, though, that that was so long ago that I have forgotten the details of what they said. A lot of water has flowed under the bridge since then, but I do recall there was a lot more substance in their speeches than in the Speech from the Throne.

Indeed, it was a strange Speech from the Throne. And it has been a strange debate. The traditional approach is for the government to introduce by way of the Speech from the Throne its legislative agenda for the coming session. It lays out the plans it hopes to implement. The role of the opposition is to examine the government's proposals and to criticize them where they call for criticism. Members on the government side support the government. This time, though, we were given a completely vacuous Speech from the Throne. There was nothing in it, not a fresh idea. Then we had a speech from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) containing positive proposals—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Andre: —while from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) we heard two full hours of criticism. We make no secret of the fact that we are practising to become the government, but I am surprised that the Prime Minister would demonstrate so openly that he was practising to be in opposition.

The Prime Minister proved again that he is a great Thespian, a great actor. He is long on style and short on substance. By a selective use of statistics he would have us believe that Canada's economy outperforms any other in the world. He sounded like someone from the Flat Earth Society trying to prove the world was flat. Nearly all the statistics he used were inaccurate, misleading or designed to disguise the truth. Since then a large number of editorialists and contributors to the media generally have drawn attention to this, while the results of the by-elections have shown that the voters had made that observation as well.

If our economy is performing better than any other in the world, as the Prime Minister would have us believe, why is our currency under such pressure? Why are people selling their Canadians dollars just as fast as they come into their hands? The Prime Minister would have us believe that Canadian dollars are the most coveted currency in the world because we have the strongest economy in the world. That is the kind of story he tries to tell us.

In his opening remarks the Prime Minister gave us a little psychology lesson. Recalling his earlier training, he said that the human mind has three facilities: memory, imagination and intelligence. He went on to demonstrate a very selective memory and a vivid imagination, and he tried to demonstrate that this House and this country lack the intelligence to see through his specious arguments. The great actor he is, he simply is not able to prove that the world is flat or that Canada's economy is out-performing the rest of the world.

I do not have the time to dwell on the many-faceted examples of misleading, total dishonesty and inaccurate information on the part of the Prime Minister in this debate. Nor do I have time to dwell on all of the reasons why the Trudeau government has mismanaged our economy. I want, rather, to deal with the questions which fall within my area of responsibility in this party, namely, the question of government spending and, in particular, government cutbacks. These subjects have been much in vogue lately.

This is a public issue. It started, I suppose, when the Prime Minister returned from Morocco. Prior to that, as a couple of people have indicated, he was "Schmidt-en" by the need to do something. He commandeered an hour or half an hour of prime time television and announced to the world that the government was going to cut back. He announced that to many of his ministers, who were quite surprised to find out that they were committed to take certain action about which they knew nothing. Then on September 8 we were given some details, finally, as to what these so-called cuts were supposed to be.

Since then we have seen some backing off on the part of many government departments, but the net result has been an escalation of public debate on government spending and on the amount of resources the government utilizes within our economy and, quite frankly, one of the most encouraging things which has happened recently has been the development of an attitude on the part of the population whereby people are sincerely and genuinely asking for less government.

Their voices are being heard. That is a position which my party and I have advocated for a long time, so naturally we feel encouraged by that sympathy for our view from the public.

Mr. Nystrom: Not in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Andre: Members of the New Democratic Party, of course, advocate just the opposite. They advocate more government, and I am sure that they feel that this view on the part of the public regarding less government, less involvement in the economy and less spending is a cosmic occurrence and a temporary aberration which will surely go away in time.

I do not think that is the reality of what is happening because it is evident to me, to people in my constituency, to people in other parts of the country and to people who have examined the record of the last decade, that governments cannot cure all problems. Over the last decade the view has been that any problem, be it economic or social, can be solved, given enough resources to be brought to bear and given good and well-motivated people with enough money. That was the approach which was taken, but it did not work. Government attempts over the last decade to redistribute income have, by and large, failed, as we have been reminded by the Council on Social Welfare here in Ottawa.

Governments over the last decade have taken on more and more responsibilities. They have been doing more and more, but they have not been doing well. The public is aware of that now and is very concerned about the lack of democratic control over spending. People have recognized that parliament has no control over the tax money which is being spent. People are now coming to appreciate that the cabinet has no control over the amount of money being spent. That is because of the style of the present Prime Minister, and it will change with a new prime minister next spring.

Part of this problem has to do with the sheer size of government and the resulting complexity. It is absolutely important that we bring spending under control because, quite frankly, governments in Canada are now spending more money than the people are willing to provide. Empirical evidence for that is everywhere. Recently I read an article which knowledgeably estimated that the so-called underground economy in this country may account for 35 per cent of the total economy. Up to 35 per cent of the economy is being handled in a non-reportable and non-reported cash sense. People are using paper money. The barter system is being used to get beyond the reach of the tax collector. People resort to using hard cash as opposed to writing cheques and keeping books. They are doing that to avoid the tax assessor. People resort to barter because barter transactions are not taxable. They should be taxable, but cannot be traced.

Knowledgeable people estimate that these kinds of dealings may account for 35 per cent of our economy, and that figure is growing. That is a clear indication that a very large percentage of our population is simply unwilling to pay any more taxes. We cannot tax people more than they are willing to pay. Therefore, over an extended period of time governments cannot spend more than people are willing to pay.

Mr. Nystrom: Like Ontario medicare fees.

Mr. Andre: The size and complexity of government means that large amounts of money will be spilled, and they are. A few days ago we were told that $142 million in UIC funds have been misspent. I think it was in the Montreal Gazette and I read an editorial today saying that that is only 4 per cent of all the funds handled by the UIC. It is a variation of the "what's a million" theme. It is only $142 million, but $142 million is a lot of money. Granted, it is only a small percentage of the whole, but it is a lot of money, and the individual Canadian taxpayer who might feel some conscience about seeking a tax avoidance scheme or who might not be paying taxes because he is engaging in underground economic activity finds that his qualms are dissipated immediately when he reads in the newspaper that the government has mismanaged UIC funds to that extent, when he reads that 16 per cent of civil servants are over-classified and therefore overpaid, that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) takes his friends to football games at a cost of $8,000, or reads about any of the assorted examples of government waste of taxpayers' money.

That has contributed substantially to this reluctance on the part of people to pay for government expenditures. The classic response to this circumstance of governments throughout history is to increase the number of tax collectors, and that is exactly what the Government of Canada has done. Between 1968 and 1977 the number of employees of the Department of National Revenue, the tax collectors of this country, went up from 15,500 to 23,600, a 52 per cent increase.

The money spent by government—the amount actually declared is 42 per cent of the gross national product—is not available to the private sector. It is not available for other productive purposes, and that is a reality. That is something we must face up to. Government spending is not productive. I am not saying it is not useful, but it is simply not productive. It does not go into the generation of the goods and services which are part of our productive economy.

Mr. Rae: They provide a service.

Mr. Andre: Of course they provide a service, but it is a service for which people are becoming unwilling to pay. A service is productive only if there is a customer who is willing to buy it, and when it costs 42 per cent of the gross national product, people become unwilling to pay for it. The evidence to substantiate that is everywhere.

● (2122)

Another effect of levying taxes beyond people's willingness to pay is a reduction in growth productivity. For example, an electrician who wants to build a rumpus room in his home for $6,000 might have to earn $10,000 pre-tax. If he builds it himself, it will cost $4,000 in materials. Therefore, he only needs to earn an additional $6,000 in order to have $4,000 after tax to do the job himself. The net result of that is that a carpenter loses $2,000 in salary, a net loss of revenue to the tax department of $2,000, and a loss of revenue to the government of $2,000.

Our present level of spending and taxation affects business decisions. Businessmen now make decisions on the basis of tax implications rather than other economic considerations. Investments are approached from the point of view of how much the tax load can be reduced by making an appropriate investment, rather than how it will affect the number of jobs and the growth of the company. After tax remuneration becomes the goal of people in unions and professions. Their goal is the actual amount they receive for the service performed. The service is immaterial; it is after tax remuneration which concerns them. Those pursuing that goal are stating categorically that they are unwilling to accept the tax load as part of their responsibility. The clear message is: they are unwilling to pay the taxes.

The other consequence of the disparity between government spending and people's willingness to pay is that it is impossible to reduce the deficit in a satisfactory manner. The raising of tax rates in order to raise more revenue is self-defeating. It results in less revenue. The people faced with the tax loads continue to borrow to finance the deficit. That merely results in greater problems for the future. There is the problem of having to pay back eventually and to sustain the interest charges and carrying costs on the borrowed funds.

Recently the country resorted to printing money as a policy option, which results in inflation. It offers temporary relief and growth in the economy, but over time it aggravates unemployment problems and causes serious consequences to the economy. The traditional Keynesian approaches of trying to spend oneself into prosperity do not work. We should address ourselves to this problem. We must close the gap between taxes and spending, working from both ends.

Another aspect of large government spending is the involvement of government in the economy and the effect of the sheer size of it. Last February the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) introduced the Paper Burden Office. He quoted statistics from an American study which indicated that the effective paperwork produced by the American government cost approximately $500 per citizen. Taking all levels of government into consideration, our government is larger on a per capita basis than that of the United States, and it is reasonable to assume that that estimate is equally applicable in this country. Indeed, the minister stated that it was his view that the indirect cost of government forcing people to fill out forms, apply for permits for every activity, take out licenses and react to the demands of government, is approximately $10 billion. That is the cost of the intrusions of big government into the private sector by way of the demands it makes. The present estimate is that Canadian governments account for 42 per cent of the gross national product. If the indirect costs of government are added on, which cost is imposed upon our economy, and if government tax is defined as all expenditures resulting from government action, then surely it is obvious governments are responsible for far more than 50 per cent of the g.n.p. in a direct and indirect sense.

Indeed government spending is one of the most crucial problems we must address ourselves to if the economy is to work in the 1980s, and if the one million unemployed are to be put to work. There appears to be a public will in Canada to support endeavours to find ways to reduce the over-all level of spending. The Liberal party has been true to its flexible principles, has acknowledged its view in public, and apparently has launched itself on a path of reduced government expenditures. I say "apparently" because a lot was said on August 1 and September 8 which was not factual.

On September 8 the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) announced the details of spending cuts. Included were cuts to the Farm Credit Corporation of $23 million, to CMCH of $200 million, to the Export Development Corporation of $240 million, to the Federal Business Development Bank of $22 million, and under the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act of $49 million. The supposed cuts totalled $534 million. They were not cuts at all, they were bookkeeping changes. The government indicated to the Farm Credit Corporation, CMHC, Export Development Corporation and others that they would not receive capital advances from the Department of Finance, but that they would have to go to the market and borrow those funds directly.

Because of that, these entries no longer appear in the blue book estimates which we receive each year. They no longer appear as government spending, and they are claimed to be cuts. They are no such thing. They represent no change in the operations of Crown corporations; they represent a change in the bookkeeping entries. If a private company attempted to make such changes in its accounting practices, it would be called to task by the stock exchange. The tax deductions claimed by a similar method for this current fiscal year amounted to over $1 billion. They were nothing but bookkeeping or accounting changes. They had nothing to do with cuts whatsoever.

The danger cannot be underestimated. The electorate will not be fooled because we will make sure they are informed. The danger is that too many people and organizations accept government figures as fact. In its latest report the Economic Council of Canada accepted the Treasury Board statements of government spending as fact. Those were the figures which they applied in order to arrive at recommendations for the future. Those numbers are wrong because the basis of determination has been changed. The government has disguised some of its spending. When the Economic Council of Canada and others engaged in the business of analysing our economy use numbers which are produced by the Treasury Board as true and factual estimates of government spending, they use the wrong data because the bases are changing from year to year. So they are bound to reach the wrong conclusions.

I think it behooves me in the last five minutes, and I will not be long, to outline briefly what can and should be done. First and foremost, in order truly to bring government spending under control and to bring growth level to a reasonable point, we must have more honesty and openness about government spending. This is not a unique or original idea. That is part of a recommendation of the C. D. Howe Research Institute policy analysis and report of 1975. Three years ago that institute recognized that one of the key contributors to this tremendous increase in government spending could be related to the government's not being honest and open about its programs and plans. This is an absolutely essential first step to providing control in respect of government spending.

We have many examples of the things governments are doing. We must examine some of the things governments are doing in order to determine if in fact the private sector could not be doing those same things, to see if in fact there could not be some rationalization, and to see whether some activities in which the government is now engaged, and perhaps has been engaged properly so in the past, should no longer be done by the government.

I am reminded of a story of a few years ago which illustrates the point I am trying to make. Someone examined the public accounts and discovered that the Department of Agriculture was making an annual grant to a horse racing stable owned by E. P. Taylor, a man of some means. Someone asked why E. P. Taylor, a very wealthy man, was receiving a grant from the Department of Agriculture. It turned out this was being done under an old program established in 1910, or thereabouts, to permit the development of better cavalry horses. Fortunately that program was brought to an end.

An hon. Member: It was an effort to provide a stable economy!

Mr. Andre: I wonder how many more such examples there are on the books. I am sure there are many. The proposal of this party is that we institute a sunset law under which all programs of government would automatically be subjected to a detailed and thorough review on a regular basis. There are scores of things governments are doing which in the first instance were very appropriate for governments to do, but which are now no longer appropriate and in fact should be turned over to the private sector. I am sure that among the 384 Crown corporations, at last count—and probably there are more than 400 now because the number is increasing at a rate of three a month—we could find some whose activities could either be discontinued or turned over to the private sector.

I think it is about time we assessed the real indirect costs of government, an example of which is the $10 billion resulting from the government putting demands upon the private sector. A sneaky thing which has been happening recently, and which is of great concern, is the way in which governments have been imposing additional costs. One example comes to mind regarding drilling in the high Arctic. The Department of the Environment, for good and valid reasons, has said that prior to such drilling the companies must conduct environmental assessments. There is good and valid reason for that, but that involves a cost; in essence a tax. No one has done a cost-benefit analysis of that requirement to determine whether the benefits achieved from that expenditure are in fact worth the effort. That is just one of scores of examples.

What the United States terms "deregulation" is a policy that must certainly be adopted in this country. We must engage in systematic deregulation and an examination of the demands the government makes upon the private sector. We must make a systematic check of the tests, permits and licensing policies which now exist. All these things should be subjected to a cost benefit analysis in order that we can determine whether the benefits produced are in excess of the cost.

We must also restore democratic control over spending. The former leader of my party, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), made an excellent address about a year and a half or two years ago to Mount Allison University regarding the dangers to our democracy of a continuation of the type of growth we have experienced in recent years. If we are so shortsighted as not to recognize the potential dangers, so eloquently articulated by the hon. member, then we will be shortchanging our successors, our children and their children, to a very great degree. Because what we will be leaving them by way of a legacy will not be democratic, or a parliamentary democracy of the type we now know. Thus, we must give parliament more control over government spending. We must have more honesty from government in respect of spending and taxation, and we simply must stop deceiving the public. We must be more open and honest, and possibly during the throne speech debate or during—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to imform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I am speaking only for and on behalf of the people in my riding who have spoken with me in the last few weeks, but rather for all Canadians when I say tonight, in the closing minutes of this debate, that by not calling an election when he should the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has deprived the people of the opportunity of getting rid of the worst government we have had in this country since confederation.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: If there is a worse government, my God, show me. I repeat, this is the worst government since confederation. I am reminded of an old man of 93 years of age who lives in a small town in my riding. He approached me the other day and said: "Heward, I have always voted the Liberal ticket. I am what you call a red, red Liberal. I have never liked you guys, the Progressive Conservatives, but the next time out, even though my ancestors may roll over in their graves, and I really do not like doing it, I intend to vote the Tory ticket in order to help you guys get rid of the worst government we have had since confederation."

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: I know they do not like to hear this, Mr. Speaker, but that is what the people are saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: They are saying that this is the worst government since confederation.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Grafftey: You better get back on your own side of the House where you belong, because this is going to get rough.

When I heard the Prime Minister this afternoon at the constitutional conference say that this country was divided and regionalized at it never has been before, I was reminded of the fact that some ten years ago the people of Canada voted for that prime minister with a high degree of expectation. They thought that he would be the great unifier. Something went wrong in the last ten years and the Prime Minister attempted to pretend today at that conference that he had nothing to do with that.

I am reminded of a president of the CNR who appeared before a committee of this House about 12 years ago. He spent about an hour and a half telling us what a mess the CNR was in, yet for the 15 years immediately preceding he had been the president. I asked him a rhetorical question. I said he was telling us that the CNR is in a mess, yet he had been the president for 15 years. This sort of thing could only happen in public life. I gingerly asked where he had been for the past 15 years.

If we have record unemployment, record inflation, a plunging dollar and division in this country, where, sir, has the Prime Minister been for the last ten years? This is why the people have said time and time again that this is the worst government we have had and they intend to vote Tory. I know these people voted Liberal in the past because I do not get elected by not knowing who votes Liberal and who votes Tory. This old gentleman, I can promise you, never voted anything but the red Liberal ticket.

• (2142)

An hon. Member: He is senile.

Mr. Grafftey: I dare the hon. member to come and tell him that he is senile. He has all his marbles and he is not voting for the Liberals the next time; he wants to get rid of you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Grafftey: After I heard the news that the Prime Minister was not going to call an election, I thought that surely to God there would be something dynamic in the Speech from the Throne, that it would be laden with positive, fighting economic and social measures to get this country moving again.

I am sure hon. members opposite would say that I have been around here too long, and they are not going to like what I am about to say, and that is that if that was not the worst throne speech I have heard in my 20 years, I will eat my hat. It was easily the worst, the damndest document of generalities, at a time when the Canadian people were looking for leadership and positive economic measures to get the economy going; but instead the four million to five million low income people of Canada have been kicked once again. Canadians were looking for social legislation that had some meaning, but what did they get? They got the most general motherhood document I have ever seen in my life. Can anyone name me one significant thing outlined in that document—just one? I certainly did not hear any named during the throne debate either, because there was nothing to name.

Hon. members opposite are going to say, "Wait for our positive legislative package that is to be brought forward independent of that throne speech." It was not really a throne speech in the true tradition of the throne speech. I can think of past Liberal governments that were really serious vis-à-vis socioeconomic legislation, but I am sure that members opposite are going to have a pretty good time defending this document.

We are now told by the leader of the government to wait for the legislative package. I respectfully submit that no matter what the package is going to be in the weeks and months ahead, it will be too late to have any real, concrete effect at the grass roots level, because of the mess that this worst government since confederation has plunged the country into. The record is there—a fallen dollar, one million unemployed and inflation. Has there ever a worse economic situation?

As I said earlier, the Prime Minister has said that the country is divided today as it has never been divided before. Where have members opposite been for the last ten years, sitting complacently on their hands and doing nothing?

Some hon. Members: Time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being 9.45 p.m., it is my duty duty pursuant to special order made

October 20, 1978 to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put any question to dispose of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The question is, therefore, on the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Crosbie), which was negatived on the following division:

FORESTRY

REQUEST FOR DOCUMENTATION RESPECTING REDUCTION IN RESEARCH PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa Centre (Mr. de Cotret). I move:

That the Minister of State (Environment) table all studies, reports and other documents that lead the government to believe that it would be to the advantage of the forestry industry of Canada to reduce research programs at forest research institutes, and make a statement on motions outlining the short and long-term effects of this decision, in new product development and employment in the forest industry.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

GRAIN

FIXING OF PRAIRIES GRAIN AT FARM MARKET PRICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

Four years ago, the farm producer received $4 a bushel for 3CW wheat. Since then, farm costs have risen an estimated 30 per cent, which makes it obvious that the selling price of $2.49 a bushel, for example in northern Saskatchewan, to the farmer is totally inadequate to cover even the cost of production.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski):

That the government should direct that the price of the said grain should be fixed on the prairies at the farm market price of $3.50 per bushel.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Agriculture said "No".

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR PRO RATA PENSIONS FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 and seconded by the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Brewin), I move:

That this House notes that on November 11, just 11 days away, we shall be commemorating the sixtieth anniversary of the armistice that concluded World War I, and this House believes that this is an occasion to do more for our veterans of all wars than giving them words of praise and, therefore, calls on the government to introduce forthwith an amendment to the Pension Act to provide pro rata pensions for the widows of disabled veterans where the rate of disability was below 48 per cent, it being clear that this House would pass such legislation without any delay at all.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

FINANCE

PROPOSAL THAT PRESIDENT OF A CHARTERED BANK ADMINISTER CANADA'S FINANCE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion of national interest.

In view of the fact that according to the Canada Gazette dated September 9, 1978 the total assets of chartered banks as of July 31, 1978 amounted to $167 billion, that is $20 billion more than nine months earlier; considering also the $13 billion deficit incurred by the government for the same period, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the House direct the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to ask the president of one of the chartered banks to guide him in the management of our finances and teach him how and to lay out our wealth and money to advantage.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

FEDERAL COURT WRIT OF PROHIBITION AGAINST RCMP SUPERINTENDENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, regarding the administration of justice.

Yesterday, in the trial division of the Federal Court of Canada, Mr. Justice Décary issued a writ of prohibition against RCMP superintendent Norman D. Inkster prohibiting him from continuing with the trial of RCMP member William Patrick Radey whose legal difficulties arose, in part, from charges of entering into consultation or discussion with counsel for a judicial inquiry.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Halifax-East Hants (Mr. Crosby):

That, in the interests of natural justice, the Crown refrain from further action by way of appeal, that some of the recommendations of the Marin commission of inquiry which reported in January, 1976, providing for fairer treatment for members of the RCMP, be implemented in order that members of the RCMP whom we expect to uphold the principles of justice will be entitled to greater protection for themselves.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

REDUCTION OF TRAIN SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the Newfoundland division of CN has cancelled certain trains and laid off employees, in violation of commitments made by CN and by the Government of Canada, and that CN has now directed drastic cuts in capital expenditures and maintenance expenditures for the Newfoundland division for the year 1979, including a reduction in the capital budget for the restoration of track by 50 per cent, or over $1 million, and cuts in maintenance of $500,000, all of which will result in further lay-offs of railway employees during the winter of 1979 and ceasing of hiring of extra gangs during the construction season from May to October of 1979, with employment down by 200, and in view of the refusal of CN management to permit the replacement of 12 employees of the bridge and building department of the Newfoundland division who have retired or transferred to CN marine, so that the normal complement of that office is now 41 rather than 55, I move, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath):

That this House directs the government to order CN to cease their sabotage of the Newfoundland Railway, to advise CN that the government will meet operating losses and necessary capital expenditures of the Newfoundland Railway, which is owned by the government, and to direct CN or other management to make an effort to make the rail a viable mode of transportation in Newfoundland and to carry out the promises made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs on September 12, that the railway would not be abandoned but that every effort would be made to increase rail freight traffic.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

REQUEST INDICTMENTS BE WITHDRAWN AGAINST EXECUTIVE OFFICERS OF CUPW—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that the postal workers have now gone back to work, in view of the fact that charges have been laid under section 115 of the Criminal Code against executive officers of CUPW, and in view of the fact that the Criminal Code should not be used in the settlement of labour disputes, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae):

That this House calls on the Minister of Justice to withdraw the indictments.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can be done with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

PROPOSAL THAT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS BRANCH BE TRANSFORMED INTO ADVISORY OFFICE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Considering the necessity of showing all the required objectivity in the discussions on the position of Quebec in the present Canadian federalism; considering that as full Canadian citizens Quebeckers pay federal taxes and that they are not unanimously prepared to see their money spent for political purposes, possibly against their constitutional option; considering that it would be to the benefit of all Canadians to know and study all the realities of the country without any passion, prejudice or electoralism to inquire on the best constitutional formula which could satisfy both major nations which make up this country, and because this option could be the establishment of a new Canada which would be in line with the diversity itself; and considering that the special committee co-ordinated by Mr. Tellier, from the federal-provincial relations branch seems to be used first of all for the political polemic against a government which was elected democratically, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Caouette):

That the federal-provincial relations branch be transformed into an advisory office for objective consultation without any partisanship, to which supporters of the main constitutional formulas presently put forward could refer in all objectivity.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

CLOSING OF GOVERNMENT RESEARCH LABORATORIES—INQUIRY WHETHER INDUSTRY CONSULTED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries. In a recent letter to the Prime Minister, the Fisheries Council of Canada pointed out that Canadian scientists and research managers have considerable work to do with regard to gathering knowledge of fish stocks and population dynamics. It is in this area that the federal government has the responsibility and expertise, and it should be directing its efforts there rather than to commercial activities which must be the responsibility of the private sector.

The minister announced his decision to close the department's technological laboratories as part of the government's program to cut back expenditures. I ask if this decision was made after consultation with the private sector. If so, did the industry suggest other methods of reducing the fisheries department budget which would not be harmful to the industry, and what were the industry's proposals?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member gives me an opportunity to put a few facts on the record. First of all, we are not closing scientific research in any capacity. We are looking at closing a technological branch. In fact, it is the industry's normal responsibility to develop the product that it wants to put in the marketplace. We have very substantially improved our scientific research capacity in stocks and management and will continue to do so.

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that the article I saw in the Globe and Mail this morning indicates that one company—which is one of the few public companies in fisheries—has tripled its income. Because of our policy, I think the industry is in a position now to do its own technological research.

Mr. Crouse: Mr. Speaker, since the need for scientific input has never been greater, due to our extended fisheries' jurisdiction on both coasts and the potential it offers our primary fish processing sector, will the minister indicate, in light of his recent answer, what sections of the work presently being carried out by the laboratories will be turned over to the private sector, and how this transfer will be accomplished so that vital scientific work and the scientists who are now doing it will remain in Canada and be available to all processors?

● (1417)

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, again I refuse to use the word "scientific". It is technological research; it is not scientific. I have made it clear that in the area of the primary producers—gear and other developments for fishermen—we will not cut down on the program. There are members of an industry who constantly sign letters in which they ask governments to stay away from certain sectors and to spend less money. Now that their profit picture has improved so much, we have asked the industry if they are interested in developing their own products, in which case we would make an orderly transfer to them. I must say they were less enthusiastic about this suggestion than they were about writing letters of protest.

Mr. Crouse: In the same letter to the Prime Minister, the industry pointed out that the minister's approach is one of increasing intervention and opposition to the private sector. The Prime Minister has stated there is a need to rely on the private sector to create the jobs necessary to improve the employment situation. Does the minister agree with the Prime Minister, and does he intend to follow his policy? If so, when can we expect an announcement from the minister about the federal fisheries' development program?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, what the hon. member calls intervention is simply the federal department playing the role assigned to it by the present constitution, which is the management of fisheries. That management takes place for two groups, the fishermen and the processors. I indicated that I thought the fishermen should take their turn at bat, and that is what the policy is designed to do.

LICENCES FOR FREEZER FACTORY VESSELS

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Fisheries. The Fisheries Council of Canada, in their letter of September 22, appealed to the Prime Minister to change the direction of the Department of Fisheries and to change government policy on fisheries. They pointed to the refusal of the minister to issue to Canadians any licences for freezer factory vessels to replace the foreign effort and enable our fishermen to catch new species.

Why is the minister refusing to issue licences for new Canadian freezer factory trawlers, when he is now permitting East German trawlers to land fish at Newfoundland's south coast ports to enable those plants to continue operating, presumably because the plants need the fish? Why will he not permit Canadians to acquire their own trawlers and start that process, in light of the fact he is now allowing foreign vessels to land their fish from the Canadian quota at south coast ports?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the Fisheries Council and the hon. member did not bother to read a letter which was published in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald and, if my memory is correct, in the St. John's evening Telegram in which I said very clearly that if there were enterprises which wanted licences to catch under-utilized species, and only that, I would be willing to look at their requests.

The fact is that catch rates are still such that the existing fleet can take a very large percentage of the fish available to us in the zone in which we have traditionally fished. The East German landing of fish was done in order to help plants that are undersupplied mainly because of the failure of the Gulf redfish. We made an offer that was open to everyone. Companies that wanted to avail themselves of temporary charters to fish selected stocks, which we had not been taking, were invited to do so. A couple of companies responded; the others did not.

Mr. Crosbie: The letter also points out that there is ad hoc manipulation of fishery resources instead of forward-planning for development. There are now more deals in the fishery than in Las Vegas.

[Mr. Crouse.]

Will the minister tell the House why he is permitting East German vessels to fish traditional species and land them in Newfoundland, and why he gave permission to Bulgarian and Russian vessels to take 400 metric tonnes of herring on the northeast coast of Newfoundland, herring that, had it been landed in Newfoundland, could have kept plants operating and men processing fish? Is it because the president of the union—the minister appears to be his puppet—asked for this concession for the Russians and Bulgarians? What is the explanation of this?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, contrary to what the hon. member suggests, the East Germans are fishing for northern redfish stocks which we have traditionally not found economical to take. It is being landed in plants that are undersupplied.

On the second point, yes, I did authorize the sale of 400 tonnes, out of the total quota of 20,000 tonnes, to the Russians. I feel that our fishermen and our industry are not getting out of herring, which has become quite a luxury product, the full return which they should be getting. The industry asked me if there was a way of putting in a needle, and I answered yes.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INCREASE IN FOOD PRICES—GOVERNMENT ACTION TO CURB

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, Mr. Speaker. According to today's press, the Anti-Inflation Board reports that inflation in food prices is back with a vengeance, with a 1.9 per cent increase in the past month and a year over year increase of 16.5 per cent.

I have here another secret cabinet document of June 20—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: —which the minister played a role in developing, and in this document a number of serious possibilities for government action to deal with food prices are spelled out, including special indexing of the GIS, tariff cuts and consumer subsidies. In view of this re-emergence of inflation in food prices, I ask the minister whether the government has done anything about these suggestions.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I am continually making representations to my colleagues and others with respect to food prices, food quality, and so on. In many cases, those suggestions are accepted; sometimes, they are not. But I shall continue to press forward with the suggestions I have made to them.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister has clearly demonstrated, by his answer, that he has had no influence at all, because it is apparent that the government has done nothing. I will direct my supplementary question to the Deputy Prime Minister, who is sitting there with a benign expression on his face.

Since that document dated June 20 states that the cabinet will review by the end of September of this year—not next year—what ought to be done, including far-reaching action, I should like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether that review did take place last month and, if so, whether the cabinet has decided to take any action about food prices.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the question asked by the hon. gentleman has rapidly erased whatever benign expression I may have had on my face. I can tell him he will not find me authenticating any cabinet document by falling into the trap of his question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: The minister had better go back to Rome and get some better advice on how to deal with serious matters, if he thinks that answer will be persuasive.

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Jamieson: You had better go back to Rome and learn some humility.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

Mr. Broadbent: My question to the minister is a serious one having to do with food prices, a subject which does concern consumers, if not the government.

Since both the documents of June 20 and an earlier document of June 14—and I quote from the latter document—say that food prices are likely to remain an important economic problem for the next 12 months, and since this was realized by the government last June, is the Deputy Prime Minister telling us that since then nothing has been done and the government can just laugh about it? Or does it intend to take some action?

Mr. MacEachen: The government has already taken some action. Last week, as I recall, we sent to committee amendments to the Old Age Security Act which will help to cushion the effects of inflation upon the most needy of the old age pensioners. Today we shall begin a discussion of amendments establishing a new program of child benefits which will mainly help middle and lower income families meet the obvious disadvantages imposed by inflation.

The hon. member has evidently missed a good deal of parliamentary development during his visit to Rome, and if that is to be the result I shall not take him in the future.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT IS CONSIDERING RESCINDING SECTION 57

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and concerns section 57 of the Unemployment Insurance Act regulations. Since this section stipulates that a farm or forest worker must have worked 25 complete days to be entitled to unemployment insurance stamps and since this regulation affects no other class of worker, does the minister intend, in due fairness to all workers, simply to rescind section 57 of the regulations, which is causing real discrimination against the farm and forest industries?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I will look into the situation described by the hon. member, and if there is some form of injustice, we will make the necessary changes.

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seize the opportunity to draw the minister's attention to the fact that this section causes serious problems for farmers, especially those in Ontario, where many of our families go to pick fruits and vegetables because they cannot get the stamps they would earn in any other industry.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has added weight to his argument by that remark.

POST OFFICE

MINISTER'S PRIORITIES IN RESOLVING LABOUR-MANAGEMENT DISPUTE—LEGISLATION TO MAKE DEPARTMENT A CROWN CORPORATION

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. Now that the tactics used by the government in the latest Post Office confrontation have raised tensions in the Post Office to unprecedented heights, and lowered the morale of the workers to unprecedented depths, can the Postmaster General inform the House as to his priorities in resolving this critical labour-management situation?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the reports received by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris are different from the ones I receive. Reports I receive indicate that workers are back to work: they are working better than they have ever worked.

With regard to the action we intend to take with workers who happened to be in difficult circumstances during the strike, I can assure the hon. member that we will use all possible fairness. Laws and regulations exist and they must be applied, but the other side of the story is that many workers abided by the law and wanted to work despite the fact that their leaders told them not to do so. We have to be fair to these people, who are the most important part of the Post Office work force.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to be conciliatory in this matter, I would like to ask the Postmaster General a very positive question. Is he contemplating early action on Crown corporation legislation? Will the legislation be put before key unions, such as the Letter Carriers Union of Canada, the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, the International Electrical Workers Union and the Public Service Alliance, and will they have an opportunity, because of its very vital importance, to comment on any draft legislation? Is the minister having consultations with them?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, there is a difference between being conciliatory and understanding, and being soft. We intend to be understanding in this situation.

With regard to the second part of the question about meeting with the unions, we had a meeting last Wednesday with all the unions involved in the Post Office. We are having another one tomorrow to discuss the setting up of a Crown corporation.

• (1432)

Mr. Dinsdale: In view of the fact that prior to the erosion of the rights of members of parliament in this House we used to have an opportunity to express our viewpoint on proposed legislation, will similar consultation take place with the House leaders?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, of course if we introduce a bill on a Crown corporation, hon. members of the opposition, no matter of which party, will have the opportunity, when the House committee holds its hearings, to discuss the bill and express their views before it is passed. They will then have ample opportunity to discuss the matter and I can assure the House that when the bill is studied in committee I shall be there to stick up for it and the hon. members can then express their opinions.

[English]

REQUEST UNIONS SEE DRAFT LEGISLATION RESPECTING CROWN CORPORATION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I think that the most important part of the hon. member's question concerned the draft legislation dealing with the Crown corporation.

I should like to ask the minister whether, in fact, the Department of Justice has now prepared legislation which is on his desk and, even more important, if that legislation is available, will he give the Letter Carriers Union, CUPW, the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers and the Public Service Alliance of Canada the opportunity to look at the draft legislation in order to improve it because, as I understand, right now it is a mess?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not know where the hon. member got his information—

An hon. Member: From your office.

Mr. Lamontagne: —but if he were on this side of the House he would know very well there is a procedure to be followed before a bill is put before the House and before items can be discussed relating to labour-management relations, and that is what we are doing with our unions.

EMPLOYMENT

SUCCESS OF EMPLOYMENT TAX CREDIT PROGRAM

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance and it concerns the employment tax credit scheme which was announced initially by the minister over a year ago and was finally implemented in January after one day's debate in the House. Would the minister tell us how successful the program has been, a program which was to cost $140 million and create 50,000 jobs?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the program which was announced was particularly successful in one of the provinces. We have put our officials to work to determine where the roadblocks might be to private enterprise taking advantage of the program. They indicated some of the red tape they thought should be removed, and in effect we have done that in the hope that it would encourage private enterprise to participate in the program.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question, presumably, should be directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. In view of the fact that while this bill was under debate in the House, the red tape to which the minister referred was drawn to the minister's attention. At that time he stated he did not wish to see first-time job seekers take advantage of the program and that, secondly, to use his words:

> One of the objectives of the program is to get people who have been in the work force and are discouraged because they cannot find employment back to work.

Would the minister tell us two things: first, is it true that a mere 8,000 jobs are attributed to this program to date and, second, have the regulations been changed or are changes to the regulations being contemplated so that the minimum manpower registration will now be two weeks, as opposed to eight weeks; and if that is so, how does the minister reconcile his new position with what he told the House last January?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, in one breath the hon. member has criticized us for suggesting we should be flexible in that area. That is precisely what we are. We put the new program into place and we wanted it tested to see that undue strain would not be put upon the revenues paid by the taxpayers. Also, the 8,000 people who have those jobs do not think it is insignificant: they got a job as a result of this program and I suggest—

Mr. Clark: Eight thousand?

Mr. Cullen: I thought the Leader of the Opposition liked to be on the front bench. He is acting much more like a backbencher today.

An hon. Member: Answer the question.

An hon. Member: That is where he should be.

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, we have the opposition blowing their cool. That is not the way Mr. Paproski told them to behave this week.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

PUBLIC WORKS

LEASE-PURCHASE AGREEMENT RESPECTING LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Public Works but in his absence I will put it to the acting minister. We would like to know why the government signed a lease-purchase agreement for 1.5 million square feet of space in the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière development in Hull while they still had an existing lease arrangement for 40,000 square feet of space in buildings in downtown Ottawa which are now largely empty and are still being paid for?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Acting Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the hon. gentleman's question and report it to my colleague. The minister is now here.

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I caught the tail-end of the question. I think the hon. member referred to the 1,100,000 square feet of leased space. I suggest to him that the allegation is extremely unfair and unjust.

Of those 1,100,000 square feet, a quit lease has been negotiated on 375,000 square feet as of the middle of September. There were an additional 275,000 square feet in Les Terrasses de la Chaudière for which we have identified a tenant whom we expect to be there in the near future. There are another 140,000 square feet on which the lease expires today, and an additional 130,000 square feet are being prepared for the Department of Supply and Services, the Department of the Environment and the Department of National Defence and will be occupied before the end of the year. If you add all that up, you will come to something near one million square feet out of 1,100,000 square feet.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKinley: It is still obvious that the minister had leased far too much space for occupancy at the same time. I should like the minister to explain the following. It has been reported that $500,000 a month has been paid for empty space. Can the minister advise us how this extreme waste of the taxpayers' money has been allowed to go on by his department?

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, this figure refers to the space that I have just gone over and identified for the hon. member. In fact, as I said, these sums—

Mr. McKinley: How did it happen?

Mr. Buchanan: —are not now being paid out. I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that we have done extremely well. Many of these leases go back ten years. It would have been very difficult to foresee, ten years ago, that we would now be in the situation where, to all intents and purposes, there is zero rate of growth in the public service and a very significant alteration made by Treasury Board in space allotments. For instance, the department of my colleague in Ottawa occupied some 160,000 square feet, but because of the new restrictions in space allocation, when it was relocated it was cut down to 100,000 square feet. Yet in spite of all those changes we have been able to keep the amount of unoccupied space for which we are paying the absolute minimum in rental.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

DOCUMENTARY EVIDENCE AVAILABLE TO McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Ralph E. Goodale (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the decision announced today by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Keable case, which decision fully supports the legal positions taken before the Keable commission by the present Solicitor General and his predecessor, can the Deputy Prime Minister assure the House, on behalf of the government, that the documentation which has been denied legitimately to the Keable inquiry will be made available to the McDonald commission?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think that by way of clarification in reply to the hon. member's question it should be pointed out that there was complete and full co-operation with the Keable commission in so far as it was investigating specific illegal acts within its own mandate. It was only when requests were made for documents beyond that mandate that the Solicitor General, properly, took the course of action which has now been vindicated by the Supreme Court of Canada.

I should add that virtually all the documents that were involved in the Keable commission are already in the possession of the McDonald commission, and I believe have been for some months.

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA JUDGMENT ON KEABLE COMMISSION DOCUMENTS

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Solicitor General a supplementary question, assuming he has seen the judgment and had his attention directed to that part of it which held that documents obtained by the Keable commission, and presumably other Quebec government officials from the law enforcement agencies of Quebec, were held contrary to the provisions of the Official Secrets Act and could not be published without an offence being committed under that act.

● (1442)

Can the Solicitor General advise the House about the present situation regarding those documents? Are they still in the hands of the provincial government of Quebec, or have they been returned to Ottawa? What is the government's intention in that regard?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I had a chance to go through the judgment, which I felt was a proper one and one in which—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: —found support for the positions which had been taken by my predecessor and myself. I looked at the section referred to by the hon. member, relating to the Official Secrets Act. As yet, I have not ascertained where the documents are to be found. But I would like to point out to the hon. member that the judgment itself identifies the Official Secrets Act as being the nominating legislation. It does not matter who holds the documents. If they are classified as being secret, they come within the provisions of that act.

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, this particular judgment illustrates the absurdity and the anomaly of section 4 of the Official Secrets Act. It provides that people who might have acquired documents quite innocently and genuinely may, in holding those documents, become subject to a charge, as in the case of Dr. Treu. Will the minister consider recommending to his colleagues repeal or modification of this legislation, as is being done now in the United Kingdom?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the act is quite clear in terms of the classification of documents. There is no doubt that the classification itself is really the basic criterion. Surely the hon. member knows that if people have documents which could be classified, they have an obligation to make sure those documents are dealt with in accordance with the provisions of the act.

In terms of what intentions there may be relating to amendments to that act, I will take seriously the representations of the hon. member.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING OF PROGRAMS TO ASSIST WOMEN IN FINDING EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It arises out of a response which he made on October 17 to a question put by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby.

On that occasion, the minister confirmed a directive from his department to the effect that Outreach will no longer consider funding projects which specifically help women. In light of that confirmation, can he tell the House what is to happen to Woman Power in London, Women's Career Counselling Services in Ottawa, and Times Change in Toronto when their contracts run out at the end of next March?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in the ordinary course of events, those particular programs will be looked at to determine how effective they are, whether there are other programs which might be put into place and whether the specific Outreach program is appropriate. That will probably take place during the month of November.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on the same date, October 17, the minister said that Outreach programs which specifically help women are not needed because there are many other programs which do that. In view of the fact so many programs which help women have been cut, can he identify the programs which help women who are having difficulty getting employment either beause of age or lack of skills or training?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, under the terms of the employment strategy of the department and the labour policy committee of my own department, we are looking at those specific areas to determine how we can better give assistance to women who have a particular need in a particular area, be it training or skilled training. We have set criteria for our offices in skill training for tasks not normally done by women. Primarily because of attitude, we have asked our offices to set a particular quota so that women, in fact, will participate in those particular programs and others which are in place.

FORESTRY

TASK FORCE ON FUTURE OF CANADIAN FORESTRY SERVICE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Environment): It concerns the request made to him by the Forest Management Institute for a task force to look at the future of the Canadian Forestry Service and the development and continuation of federal forestry programs. Has he received that request for a task force? I understand it was delivered to his office on October 12. Has he considered that request? Can he advise the House what he intends to do about it?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I do not see any real value in employing a task force at this particular point. The Canadian Council of Resource and Environment Ministers now has ongoing a series of committees looking at a national forest policy. It is expected they will deliver that document to me next June. Once I receive it, I will be in a much better position to recommend to my colleagues in government where the Canadian Forestry Service should go and, as a matter of fact, what our national forest policy should be.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am aware of the report to which the minister refers. Also, I am aware of the time that it will be reporting—in June. The task force requested by the Forest Management Institute is one which would report on December 15, 1978. It would deal with the rationalizing of these programs in relation to the cutbacks.

In view of the short period of time for its consideration by the government, and in view of the concern expressed by Professor McNally of the University of Toronto and others, will the minister reconsider his decision and review the appropriateness of a task force which can report quickly? Also, would he undertake to table the reports of such a task force before the House, so that people in the Forestry Management Institute and others in the forestry industry would know quickly the government's intention respecting the maintenance of these programs which are vital to employment and other areas of Canadian life?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, I will have another look at the representation made to me. Yesterday I received one report verbally from Dr. Solandt in relation to the forest products laboratory in Vancouver and the one in Ottawa. He made some very good recommendations to me. They were not much different from the ones given to me by my officials in the Canadian Forestry Service. As a matter of fact, I think the recommendations were fairly sound and fit in well with those announced previously by the President of the Treasury Board.

FISHERIES

SALMON ENHANCEMENT PROGRAM IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. On October 14 and 15, he was supposed to meet with a group of fishermen in British Columbia to take part in the signing ceremony of a salmon enhancement program in that province. Even though there have been several years of negotiations, that agreement has not been signed. Instead, he was in New Brunswick. It so happened that a provincial campaign was ongoing: I do not know whether his visit had anything to do with that.

Can we look forward to the signing of that agreement in the near future, as it is vital to the fishing industry of British Columbia?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, if it is so vital I cannot understand why the province took so much time responding to the initial draft which we sent them. Now that the province has done so, we are looking at the very fine print: the lawyers of the Department of Justice are looking at the legal language of the agreement. As soon as this is reported back to me, it will be ready for signing. Certainly, the reason for the delay has nothing to do with whether or not I was campaigning successfully in my own riding in New Brunswick.

Mr. Friesen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the provincial officials will be glad to read that answer. If the minister was ready to sign the agreement on October 15, why does he now say he has to look at the fine print, and that they need extra time to negotiate the agreement?

Mr. Malone: For the "hal-i-but"!

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, at no time did I say that I would be ready to sign. I told the British Columbia minister that I hoped we might sign this agreement when I was up on the Adams River to see the return of the sockeye. As it turned out, the delays—which in good part were caused by the fact that the provincial government took a rather long time to define its own position—were such that I was not ready to go forward and sign the documents.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO INCREASES IN FRUIT AND VEGETABLE PRICES

Mr. Ian Watson (Laprairie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I have received reliable information that vegetable and fruit importers have been utilizing the depreciation in the Canadian dollar to justify increases in fruit and vegetable prices which are far in excess of any variation in either the dollar or production costs.

Would the minister undertake to investigate this situation to determine whether any excess profit or price-gouging exists, and report back to the House?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member would provide me with the information, I would be glad to look into the matter. I should point out that between July and September there was a 23 per cent decline in fruit and vegetable prices as indicated in the CPI, but it is true that in the past month there have been increases. I would be glad to follow it up if I could get the information.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

EMPLOYMENT OF MR. KNOWLTON NASH AS NEWSREADER

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State: it is a matter that I am sure the minister is well aware of, because it has been discussed in the public media for the last week or so. It concerns the recent employment of Mr. Knowlton Nash as chief correspondent to read the national news, at a reported figure close to, I believe, $90,000 or $92,000. That figure is in comparison with the $45,000 he was receiving as head of news and current affairs.

In view of the fact that there seems to be no audition procedure, that Mr. Nash himself was involved in the negotiations, if not the decision, with respect to the hiring of the newsreader, and that there is some question about violation of the collective bargaining agreement with the staff announcers of CBC, has the Secretary of State initiated any kind of inquiry to find out if the facts are correct in terms of this extraordinary salary which apparently was negotiated for a five-year contract?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure that the assumptions of the hon. member are correct, but I will be happy to solicit the view of the corporation on his comments and communicate it to him.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

FOOD AND LIQUOR CONCESSION AT DORVAL AIRPORT

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs: it has to do with what appears to be a rather extraordinary arrangement which has provided for a 20-year monopoly to a food and liquor concession at Montreal's Dorval airport, the details of which seem to be a very highly-guarded secret.

Having regard to the fact that this arrangement is due to expire in 1981, and the fact that there appears to be some debate within the Ministry of Transport as to whether tenders will be called, and since there is an outright reluctance on the part of the MOT and, indeed, the operator of that concession, to provide details with respect to sales figures, rents, etc., I wonder if the minister, in his capacity as protector of the consumer and defender of the spirit of free enterprise, is concerned about this and whether he or his officials will look into this very serious matter?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether my department has jurisdiction over that matter. It seems to me that it would be what one would call a regulated industry and subject to control by another ministry; but I will refer the matter to the proper minister.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, I would think that anything pertaining to impact upon the consumer or potential bidders for this concession should certainly interest the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, unless he is simply attempting to protect the skin of the Minister of Transport, if not his own.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, as I said, there are rules and bodies which regulate that particular business. It may not come under my department, but I will look into it.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRAIN SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs in his capacity as Acting Minister of Transport.

It has been almost two months since the royal commission on CN operations in Newfoundland reported. The minister, in fact, announced the policy, on behalf of the government, with respect to rejecting the principal recommendations of the royal commission, allowing CN to phase-out their operations in the province. Since that time, notwithstanding the assurances that there would be no cutbacks until the final report of the commission was made, two trains have been taken off, with a resultant decrease in employment with CN, Newfoundland, as a result of declining revenues. I ask, what is the position of the government with respect to the future of CN operations and declining revenues, bearing in mind the commitment the minister made on behalf of the government?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Acting Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will attempt to answer the question within the confines of the question period. On the matter of the cutback of trains, I have personally made representations to the Minister of Transport. I have no hesitation in saying here that I believe the CNR is interpreting the instructions given them in the broadest possible sense, and I think it is quite inappropriate for them to have done so.

Mr. Clark: Are you speaking for the government?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the Opposition has asked if I am speaking for the government. When I stand as Acting Minister of Transport, I am speaking for the government. Furthermore, I can assure him that I will also speak out vigorously and consistently for the people of Newfoundland and the workers of Newfoundland, as I have been doing for the past 20 years or more.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I do believe that the Government of Canada must institute discussions with the CNR—this is in the short run—as to the appropriate interpretation of the instructions that were laid down with regard to maintaining the status quo until the Sullivan commission's final report is in. It is my view—and I repeat that I think this is something which we must make clear to CN within the limits that we can control the CN in this regard—that these cutbacks ought to be delayed.

I would further say, without having been invited to do so, that I think the same thing applies with regard to the rate increase on the bus service. I think that both of these matters are linked; that is the position: I cannot in this sense speak for the Minister of Transport as to how.

Mr. Clark: Oh!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, I am not sure if the Leader of the Opposition is interrupting or if he has hiccups, but I wish he would let me finish my answer.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, to conclude what must be said necessitated a long answer. I am not sure, because the Minister of Transport is across the street at the conference on the constitution, how far he has actually gone with instituting these particular talks with CN, but I will find out from him. Perhaps he will be here to answer for himself tomorrow.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Acting Minister of Transport, what is the position of the government with respect to the position taken by CN, that because of declining revenues the service will have to be phased-out in any event? Is it the position of the Government of Canada, in keeping with its constitutional obligations, that to operate this service it will have to step in and look at an audited statement of losses; and can the minister tell the House if the Government of Canada holds the position that the government of Newfoundland has to share in these losses?

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, on the last point, with regard to the government of Newfoundland—did the hon. member say the Government of Canada?

Mr. McGrath: The government of Newfoundland having to share the losses.

Mr. Jamieson: Mr. Speaker, in so far as the government of Newfoundland having to share in the losses of the railway is concerned, I do not believe that that has ever been suggested. Certainly, it is not anything I have ever contemplated in that particular sense and, to the best of my knowledge, the government has never formulated that idea, whatever CN may have said. There is, of course, the broader question of the whole transportation mix of services in Newfoundland and the cost-sharing between the two levels of government.

On the earlier question, the CN, of course, makes the point that if the revenues and the business is not forthcoming, then one of two things obviously will have to be done, either the trains must operate without having necessarily paying loads—or, indeed, even being filled on some occasions—or somebody other than CN directly must pick up the losses.

The question of auditing the books is one which is now being undertaken by the Sullivan commission. Indeed, I made a specific request, personally, to Mr. Sullivan, after the first volume emerged, that he look into two things, one being the rate structure of Canadian National, to put to rest one way or the other the claims which have been made that, indeed, it is the rate structure that is largely at fault. I understand that that is now going on.

The second thing that I have asked him to do—and which I am prepared to do in co-operation with other members because the hon. member for St. John's West has asked me about this as well—is to talk with all of the parties concerned. I do think—and hon. members, I am sure, will agree—that the business community in Newfoundland must be a part of those discussions, because what we have to determine is whether or not it is possible, given the best good will in the world, to put freight back on to the rail lines. If a meeting involving the business community, the CN and hon. members will help to resolve some of these questions, I would be glad to do what I can to initiate it.

PRIVILEGE

MR. HORNER—UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE USED BY MEMBER FOR BATTLE RIVER

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. It has long been established practice in this House that we go to great lengths to keep the proper amount of decorum, because the purpose of this House of Commons is to encourage intelligent and rational debate. Therefore, when one's motives are questioned, that must be immediately substantiated or the accusation withdrawn.

● (1502)

Last evening I was not in the House, and this has just come to my attention today when reading the speech of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) as reported at page

616 of Hansard. In the second paragraph of the right-hand column on that page, there appears this statement:

Two years ago they purchased from our side of the House a man to go to sit with them as a cabinet minister.

There is no question in my mind, or in anybody else's mind in this House, about to whom he was referring. Later in the same paragraph he names "the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner)." I am not going to get into a debate on the merits of name-calling—

An hon. Member: Or the price.

Mr. Horner: —but I do believe that we want to keep rational and intelligent debate alive in the House of Commons, which we all go to great lengths to do, and I believe the word "purchased" imputes a motive upon both sides—the persons being purchased and the persons offering the bribe. That is what the word means.

Mr. Fraser: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: If the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser) has something to say, he should rise and say it on his own question of privilege.

Mr. Fraser: This is not a debate I would want to get into.

Mr. Hees: Jack, the government is asking for a rebate.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, to my mind, the word "purchased" imputes a motive upon my services to my constituents and to the country of Canada. I ask you to ask the hon. member to withdraw it because it is unparliamentary. If we are to get into a name-calling contest, I think I will do all right.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: You have certainly done it before.

Mr. Horner: I want to say, Mr. Speaker, that surely everybody realizes the distance between these two front rows in the government and the opposition benches is the length of two swords. If we were to get into a name-calling contest the sword distance would have to be a lot longer to keep us apart, and to carry on that intelligent and rational debate that the Canadian people should be privileged to see and hear.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the statement is imputing motives, it is imputing the fact that I was paid money. I want you to rule on the point I am raising that the statement is questioning my privilege to serve in this House for any other reason than the benefit of my province, my country and my people. I say that in all seriousness. If anybody wants to say that outside the House in the presence of a third person, they will have a lawsuit on their hands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fraser: Pay your price and get your product.

Mr. Alexander: Orders of the day. This is a lot of nonsense.

[Mr. Horner.]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In the course of this intervention I have been reviewing the fourth edition of Beauchesne which I have before me, and I am sure I can take more time to look at other precedents. At page 130, subparagraph 3 of citation 154 deals with the imputation of bad motives. Specific examples are cited. I am sure that this had not come to the attention of the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone) when he used this language last night and it was not brought to his attention by the Chair at that time, but I want to draw his attention to subparagraph (6) on that page. This paragraph says that "the words 'purchased by legislation' applied to a member of a House are unparliamentary." Under that section on bad motives it is very difficult for me to be absolutely certain but in general there seems to be a very clearcut precedent there. Obviously, where any doubt would remain I would always want to resolve that doubt in favour of asking the member who had used a phrase like that—I am sure without malice aforethought and without even thinking of the complete implications of it—I would want to ask him to withdraw it, to be on the safe side.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Battle River): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. Certainly I would not want to cause any harm to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). I should like to change the word from "purchased" to the phrase "given away".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Later:]

MR. MACEACHEN—UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE USED BY MEMBER FOR BATTLE RIVER

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I had intended, following the question of privilege raised by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), to raise a separate question of privilege founded upon the same sentence as that to which my colleague drew attention. However, I understand that Your Honour requested the hon. member concerned to withdraw the offending expression. But in the gale of laughter from the opposition benches which surrounded his withdrawal I was unable to determine the nature of that withdrawal.

I should like to look at Hansard tomorrow, and reserve the right to found a separate question of privilege based upon the same sentence. However, I will not do so until I have seen in Hansard the words which were used and which were greeted with such levity and hilarity by members of the opposition party. Given the gravity of the situation, I could not believe it was a sincere withdrawal when it was greeted with such laughter. However, as I say, I will look at the exact words tomorrow.

I say this because there is involved the sentence, "Two years ago they purchased from our side of the House a man to go to sit with them as a cabinet minister." Well, those who are sitting with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce are the ministers seated here, and we have been accused of buying a member of their party to come to sit with us. I think that raises a serious question of privilege, and the words ought to be withdrawn without hesitation or equivocation. In saying so I recall to Your Honour and to hon. members opposite an incident which took place in this House on the last day of the last session when a question of privilege was raised by the hon. member for Pictou involving the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). Your Honour ruled that the words used were offensive, and under strong insistence they were unequivocally withdrawn by the Minister of State.

An hon. Member: Be serious!

Mr. MacEachen: In my view the words used yesterday are even more offensive and I do not think they can be settled by a sort of copping out, in the midst of laughter from the hon. member's colleagues who ought to have been ashamed at the words he used.

[Later:]

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps we can now return to the prior but unfinished question of privilege which was raised by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), after which there had been what I took to be a withdrawal by the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Malone). In this regard I refer back to the point raised by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

The Chair is often as troubled by withdrawals of offensive remarks in this House as it is by the offensive remarks themselves. I reflect back immediately to three or four occasions upon which I have asked for withdrawals of offensive remarks, and I think the record will show that I have been met with some very ingenious and very qualified withdrawals which, in the circumstances, I have been obliged to accept. Whether I ought to be more insistent on an unqualified withdrawal in these circumstances is a point which I am not at all disinclined to discuss, and on examining this particular instance I refer the Deputy Prime Minister back to three or four cases in recent memory involving the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and, I think, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker).

In those cases statements were made which I said ought to be withdrawn. On all those occasions there were presented to the House and to me a fascinating variety of withdrawals. I think we should examine all of them to see whether or not we should be insistent—I am not afraid of this if it is the will of the House—on a categorical withdrawal, not something that carries with it a qualification. In any case, if the President of Privy Council wishes to argue that point tomorrow, I will be glad to hear him.

MRS. HOLT—AFFRONT BY COMMISSIONER FAIBISH, MEMBER OF CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today on a question of privilege arising out of an incident that took place about 1.55 p.m., Tuesday, October 24. The incident, a gross and unseemly assault on me and my office as an hon. member of this House, occurred moments before my scheduled intervention on behalf of thousands of constituents and petitioners before the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission for the express purpose of stopping their harassment of citizens and infringement on the right of free choice on the main cable dial of television in the greater Vancouver area.

I gave notice to you of my wish to raise this matter last Friday, October 27, the earliest opportunity following my return to Ottawa.

My intervention was designed to tell the CRTC that no agency of government must overstep its mandate, that in no way has it a right to diminish or interfere with the freedom of cultural or entertainment choice of the citizens, as it exists now.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that in order to illustrate fully to you the enormity of the offence, I must use, in this House, the explicit language that one commissioner directed at me. However, I feel you can only properly judge the extent and the depth of the contempt by the words he used.

I want to say that I am hardly a neophyte in the world of vulgar, angry men. I have been through the wars of life where men have dominated. In my profession as a writer and reporter I have worked on the streets, in prisons, on skidroads, waterfront—yes, even in exclusive men's clubs and in city newsrooms—where the explicit language of inadequate men is as common as weather talk in a meteorological station.

But I was shocked and stunned when a public servant used assaultive epithets on me as a member of parliament, and thus on my constituents. Some of my constituents were witnesses to the incident, and one actually was struck by a button he seized from my hand and hurled across the space in front of the commissioner's desk.

Mr. Speaker, I will recount the incident and then will give you proof that I was there in my capacity as a member of parliament, that it was an extension of my job here, and, in fact, I could not be here that day because my constituency believed I had a prior duty to serve them before the CRTC in what many B.C. people consider to be a crisis in freedom. Further proof that I was working there before the CRTC instead of here will show in my attendance record this month, as it did in three previous appearances before the CRTC in the past three years. I was acting in my full capacity as a member of parliament.

In the final part of my submission, I will argue the reasons—the law—to show why I feel you should find contempt and a breach of my privilege as a member of this House, and refer this matter to the appropriate committee for action.

I had properly notified the CRTC September 28, 1978, with a hand delivered message to the chairman that I would be appearing as a member of parliament on behalf of my constituents and petitioners in the hearing on October 24, 1978, in Vancouver, on the renewal of cable licences.

The chairman himself, in response to a phone call I made to him, scheduled my intervention for 2 p.m., October 24, to accommodate my duty to be back in the House of Commons on the first available flight, the all-night flight, out of Vancouver to Ottawa.

Between numerous other duties, I worked almost 30 hours to prepare and finish my brief in time for the hearing. The zeroxing of the copies for the commissioners was completed by 1.30 p.m. About five minutes before my scheduled 2 p.m. appearance at the witness table I began to distribute copies of my submission to the CRTC commissioners who were drifting in to take their places at the table following the noon recess.

I was wearing one of the 10,000 buttons that had been distributed to my constituents, petitioners and those people who had called at my office for them and who came in to complain to me about the CRTC and its repeated attempts over the past three years to eliminate all American stations from our primary cable dial in greater Vancouver. The button says "CRTC Stay Out of B.C.". As I handed out the briefs several commissioners asked if I could give them a button. At no time, Mr. Speaker, did I offer a button to them. I carried only a few in my purse.

As I reached the centre table, commissioner Réal Therrien, who has always been cordial and responsible in our committees on broadcasting and at the CRTC, asked for a button. He said, "The last time we were here you pinned your previous button on me." I asked the obvious question, "Would you like me to pin this one on you?" In the good humour that we were sharing, I suggested that it might be wise not to wear it while sitting in Vancouver. He replied that he would like me to pin it on him.

As I reached across the table to fulfil his request, my hand was grabbed, the button taken from it and hurled across the space in front of the table. It struck a constituent who was standing a few feet from me. The assault on her, I have no doubt, was not deliberate. The person who flung this button and made the following statement was later identified to me as Commissioner Roy Faibish.

Mr. Faibish shouted or snarled. I cannot remember the sound, other than it was one of hysterical anger. I do remember what he said, however, "Get that damned button out of here." I said something to the effect, "How dare you? This is still a free country and you are not giving the orders." I remember telling him at some point that the chairman the night before, at the opening of the hearings, had asked for and received a button from me.

He said that he did not care who asked for the button, that I had better get them out of there or he would, in his words "Shove them up your . . .". I hesitate to use the word in here, but you know what I mean.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: I was livid with anger and reminded him that I was present at these hearings as a member of parliament—I was there, hon. members as an hon. member elected and representing my constituents—and that he was the servant and not the master of the people.

He repeated his first threat with, "I don't give a damn who you are, I'd like to shove that button up your—"

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: Again I say I am not a shy person, but I think we should all be concerned that a bureaucrat, a person appointed to serve us, would treat a member that way. I am not new to bad language.

I could think of only one thing to say in rebuttal, "You chauvinist pig, I will take this further". I said during my submission, and it is on the record, and the whole commission heard it, that I would take this incident to the top. I did in fact wire the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) details of this incident and had the message delivered to his desk at 2 p.m. Wednesday, October 25, with a copy to the leader of the government in the Senate, Senator Ray Perrault, who is the minister responsible for my constituency.

I might say that several commissioners apologized to me for what happened, and said that the language was uncalled for and the actions unacceptable.

But, Mr. Speaker, it did not end there. I want to point out further that because of Mr. Faibish's actions I was deprived of the opportunity to deliver my intervention with the normal strength and responsiveness that my constituents have grown to expect. I took my place at the witness table seconds after this incident to deliver my intervention. I was so shaken and angry at the contempt of my duty, this, the highest assignment, which you know best, Mr. Speaker, in the whole of the public service any citizen can accept, that my voice quivered and my hands shook. Friends who were watching the television on monitors at the back of the room expressed surprise later and wondered what had happened, since I had gone in there with confidence and was quite cool. Of course, the newspapers ridiculed my quivering weak voice and angry approach. It may be hard for hon. members to believe that there are times when one is weakened by anger.

When I returned to my duties I was advised Friday by my Vancouver constituency secretary that a friend of Mr. Faibish, his apologist in effect Denny Boyd, had published a statement that, I believe, compounds the contempt and adds to another serious offence against my duties as a member of parliament.

I believe, as a result of what Mr. Faibish did later and what he admitted he did in his statement, my constituents failed to receive a proper, unbiased, and full hearing from the CRTC on October 24 through their member of parliament.

Here is the published corroboration of this in a column in the Vancouver Sun, October 25, 1978, by Denny Boyd:

> After the shouting was over and Holt began reading her formal intervention statement, Faibish screwed a plug into his ear and listened to the French translation of her remarks. Faibish is not French; he is bilingual, however, and, at that point, he had heard quite enough of the Holt voice. And after all, freedom of viewing and listening choice is what the CRTC is all about, isn't it?

Thus by his own admission to Boyd, Mr. Faibish treated my representations with bias and contempt. This and other articles were evidence that this public servant nurtured contempt in the media, not only for this member but of parliament itself.

It does not matter a whit whether Roy Faibish likes me or my method and style of serving my constituents. In fact even if he despises me, and obviously he does, it does not change the fact that he must respect the office I hold as an hon. member of this House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Holt: I was duly elected in Vancouver-Kingsway to represent the people of Vancouver-Kingsway. This was my fourth appearance before the CRTC in almost four years. Each time I made it clear, as I did in this case, that my constituents and others petitioned me to act in their interest to halt the repeated attempts by the CRTC to remove American television from our rich primary cable dial that we are so fortunate to have in the greater Vancouver area.

We receive six Canadian stations, four commercial American—two of them impaired—and one public broadcasting service. Repeatedly in British Columbia we have had attempts to remove them one after another. Constantly my constituents have written, petitioned, and begged me to work for reversal, which we have succeeded in doing in five different instances. In that respect I was working as a member of parliament here and in Vancouver.

Repeatedly before the broadcasting committee on which I serve, and at these hearings, I have made these complaints clear, as I did before the CRTC, that they were over-stepping their mandate. In these actions and in the interventions, starting January, 1976, I have always stated clearly that I was acting for my constituency and had literally thousands of petitions and letters. I have here a small sample from just this one week before the hearings. These people have asked me to act for them. They have made their anxieties clear to me about their concern over freedom of cultural choice. They have made it clear that big government agencies are diminishing or threatening that freedom, the right of cultural and entertainment choice.

● (1522)

Further and current evidence that I produce to you now to prove that I attended at the October 24 CRTC hearings as a member of parliament is contained in my September 28 notice to the chairman. In it I said:

This is to advise that I wish to intervene on behalf of myself, my constituents and numerous petitioners.

One set of petitions brought into my office is also proof of my appearance as a member of parliament. These petitions contain, I presume, 1,000 to 1,500 names. They are proof that I appeared as requested by constituents and petitioners. It begins simply with the heading "Petition". I quote:

Simma Holt, MP will be appearing on behalf of the undersigned at the CRTC licence renewal hearings commencing in Vancouver on October 24, 1978.

It goes on to say:

We demand the right of free choice of television from our cablevision channels.

Possibly the most graphic proof that I was acting as a representative, as a member of this parliament, and that I was seen as such by my constituents, was the writing on an envelope containing a petition requesting that all stations presently on the dial be grandfathered there. It was slipped through the mail slot of my office some time during the night before my CRTC appearance. At the top was a sketch of the button with the words "CRTC stay out of B.C." The letter was addressed to Holt Simma, MP, 303 Knight Road, Vancouver, B.C. At the bottom right hand corner was written:

Thank you Mrs. Holt Simma for fighting for our freedom. We appreciate this very much.

Sincerely A. Nandenberg

The return address was in Vancouver-Kingsway.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that such behaviour toward any citizen, whether member of parliament or private person, by a CRTC commissioner, is totally unacceptable. However, when the witness is a member of parliament, the offence must surely be contempt of this the highest of offices in Canada, and therefore of parliament as a whole.

Certain persons in position of power and influence, of whom Roy Faibish is one, seem unable to conceal their contempt for the elected representatives of the people and the institution of parliament. We have all heard this type of bureaucrat say or imply, "I wish that the members of parliament—or politicians—would stay out of our hair and let us do our job."

It is thus that tyranny by bureaucracy grows. They are not accountable and can do as they wish if they are not stopped. I say that every effort by this parliament, by cabinet, and in this instance by you, Mr. Speaker, must be used to halt this insidious and creeping interference with the lives of the citizens, and to halt contempt of their elected representatives. This may be the start.

Mr. Speaker, I tell you and hon. members that if it is the last thing I do in my life, whether in this place or as a private citizen, I will fight to restore freedom from these kinds of power hungry tyrants whose egos are bigger than their talent.

I must now move on to the law in order to back up these facts.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mrs. Holt: Hon. ladies and gentlemen, I feel I had to state the facts and the proof before I could state the law. If any of you happen to be worth-while lawyers, I know you will understand.

Privilege in the parliamentary sense is the rights and immunities which are necessary, and indeed essential, for the member to fulfil his or her functions. It is the vehicle without which the member could not properly perform his or her functions. Since parliament could not perform its functions without the unimpeded use of the services of members, privilege is thus enjoyed by individual members.

When the privilege of an individual member of the House of Commons or when the privileges of the House of Commons have been breached, this constitutes contempt of parliament.

However, apart from these rights and immunities, or specific privileges such as freedom of speech in parliamentary proceedings, by virtue of its penal jurisdiction the House of Commons has the right to punish actions which, while not breaches of any specific privilege, are offences against its authority and dignity. No precedent is required. If the House of Commons decides that such an action is contempt of the House and requires a punishment, no other court will set aside the warrant when expressed in general terms.

In this regard, a member of the House of Commons has the right to go about his or her business or to perform the functions of a member without being molested, intimidated, or obstructed. Any interference constitutes contempt of parliament.

The British House of Commons on June 6, 1780, resolved:

> That it is a gross breach of the privilege of this House for any person to obstruct and insult the members of this House in the coming to, or the going from, the House, and to endeavour to compel members by force to declare themselves in favour of, or against any proposition then impending or expected to be brought before the House.

In other words, when a member of the House of Commons is in the course of his or her functions as a member, such as speaking in a parliamentary proceeding and acting in his capacity as a member, that member is protected by certain specific privileges, for example, freedom of speech in a parliamentary proceeding and, in the event of obstruction—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I do not think there is any difficulty about definitions of basic parliamentary privilege. Had it been in respect of a proceeding of this chamber that this event had taken place, there would not be much doubt. The difficulty that the hon. member has, as I am sure she realizes, is that she was appearing, not at a gathering of the House of Commons or even a committee of the House of Commons, which might leave her in a stronger position, but rather before a public board which, while it may in some ways be an emanation of decisions of this House, nevertheless is a board at which the public can appear. Therefore, that is the area in which the hon. member should concentrate in establishing her privilege, that indeed she was there in her capacity as a member of parliament.

The difficulty is it may have happened to any other citizen, a difficulty I say only in respect of her establishing a connection with a long line of cases of parliamentary privilege which have always narrowed and confined it to proceedings of parliament or parliamentary committees—a parliamentary proceeding of some sort.

I want this in no way to be taken as diminishing the evident affront, which may equally be an argument that the hon. member may want to establish, to her, as a member of parliament, which is alarming in its proportions and its clarity, I am sure, to every member of the House. That, as a contempt, may be argued. However, in terms of the privilege of attending that proceeding, the hon. member ought to concentrate on the fact that this was a proceeding outside the House. I hope she will state her case in that difficulty.

Mrs. Holt: Mr. Speaker, I know it is not an easy task to determine when a member of the House of Commons is acting in the parliamentary capacity or whether, when you are not in this House or in committee, you are still a member of parliament. However, I feel very strongly that when one member is treated with contempt, not just by a newspaper, it is certainly relevant. There have been cases where contempt has been found as a result of newspaper articles. However, this is by an agency appointed by parliament, and involves a servant of parliament and a servant of the people. I feel very strongly that it is an extension of parliament. I know that if I were speaking before a Kiwanis Club or another group, it would be quite different. I should not have the protection. However, if I were assaulted for having voted in this House, it might well be a contempt.

I do not know whether the case of the Attorney General of Ceylon v. de Livera helps my case or not. I would like to present it. If Your Honour feels that I have already taxed the time of the House, I will not go on any longer. However, I would like to cite that case for your consideration. I feel it is such a gross and ugly contempt that further consideration should be given to it. I will not press my time on you if you feel that case will not be worth-while.

Mr. Speaker: I only wanted to indicate to the hon. member that it was not the basic definition of privilege that would assist her. Rather, she ought to concentrate on the difficulty that she faces by the evident difference between a proceeding of this House and a public proceeding in which any citizen might participate as a functioning member. I do not wish to restrict the hon. member in any way on any argument she may wish to develop that the behaviour of this member of a public body was contemptuous toward her and therefore contemptuous toward the House, because that seems to be a very strong argument.

Mrs. Holt: I just have a few more points to make, Mr. Speaker. Had I been there just as a citizen I contend that this paid official, whose salary would be voted in this House in supply, would still be in contempt of a citizen, but it was greater contempt when I was really there as part of my job in place of being here. I think I have adequately proved I was there and was accepted there as a member of parliament.

If you would permit me to continue, Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in the case of the Attorney General of Ceylon v. de Livera (1963 A.C.103) the defendants gave money to a member of the Ceylon House of Representatives as an inducement to write to a minister requesting him to abandon a proposal to acquire the defendants' estate. For this they were charged under the Bribery Act which dealt inter alia with offences by people offering gratification to a member to induce him to take some action "in his capacity as such member." The central issue to be decided in the appeal was the interpretation of the phrase "in his capacity as such member." This may be stretching the similarity of the cases, I do not know. But in determining the meaning of this phrase the court threw some light on what proceedings in parliament, or what the real or essential functions of a member are, for the purpose of considerations of privilege.

> Given the proper anxiety of the House to confine its own or its members' privileges to the minimum infringement of the liberties of others, it is important to see that those privileges do not cover activities which are not squarely within a member's true functions.

Again, if I were before a board of trade or a similar outside body, I would not expect to have the privileges of the House. But I do feel that as a member, appearing there as I did, and consequently absent from the House, I enjoy certain rights and a certain protection. Similarly, when I am asked by my constituents to intervene before a federal board which was established by and is accountable to parliament for public money, and then, as a member of the House of Commons, I ask and receive permission to present a brief to that board, can one say I am acting only as a private citizen and not in my capacity of a member of the House of Commons? Or, in the words of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, is not my appearance before the CRTC "sufficiently bound up with and analogous to a proceeding in the House as to be properly described as done by a member in his or her capacity as such"?

The difficulty in defining a member of parliament's role is also set out in the judgment in the de Livera case at page 121:

> The most, perhaps, that can be said is that despite reluctance to treat a member's privilege as going beyond anything that is essential it is generally recognized that it is impossible to regard his only proper function as a member as being confined to what he does on the floor of the House itself.

In the de Livera case, a member of the Ceylon House of Representatives had written—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the similarities are well understood between that case and the case raised by the hon. member. I do not think the analogy is very helpful. The difficulty in that case was to define the functions of a member of parliament in such a way as to include a bribe. The case before us is really quite different. There is no doubt that the hon. member was before the board in her capacity as a member of parliament. That is really not the point. The argument is whether or not privilege can be extended so far as to cover a member wherever that member may appear, whether in the course of his duties or not. In my view, this case is quite different. Perhaps if the hon. member has any other arguments to address to the Chair as to the aspect of contempt, she would conclude them.

Mrs. Holt: I was simply citing the principles as stated by the Privy Council. I was hoping to get the benefit of the doubt and that a committee would be allowed to investigate the matter. I was only using the case to cite a principle which should have protected me in my job.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I should like to get these questions of privilege sorted out at least, if I cannot resolve them. I did notice that the President of the Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen) was seeking the floor at the time I recognized the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). I did not observe, however, that there were other members who wished to make a contribution to the discussion of the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway and I should like to rectify that situation.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my contribution will really be short. I listened intently to what was said by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). I am not one of the lawyers to whom she referred. I speak for myself as a member, and as a former coal miner, among other things. I certainly think the hon. member has a case and I would plead with Your Honour and your advisers to think carefully about her presentation. There are others who have been brought before the appropriate committee of this House. Frankly, I get fed up with some of the actions of the flunkeys, lackeys, and pseudo intellectuals who are appointed to some of these boards and then act as they did toward the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. I hope you will give this question every consideration.

Mr. Roger Young (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very brief, and I will not take too much of the time of the House. I just want to make sure that my understanding of the point being made by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), is as I believe Your Honour understood it.

What the hon. member is saying, in essence, is that in our duties as members of parliament we are obliged to attend here and to participate in debates, and that were someone from the outside to prevent us from participating freely in debates, that would be an affront to the rights and privileges of members of parliament and to parliament as a whole. I suggest that the same is true in an extension of that rule to committees. We are obliged to attend at committees and to do our work in committees, and were someone to prevent us from freely undertaking our duties in committees, that again would be an affront to parliament and to individual members of parliament.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway put her case before the House at some length, and I do not blame her for that because she was closely and emotionally involved in the incident. If I might telescope the matter, what I think the hon. member is asking Your Honour to find is that our rights and privileges as members of parliament should extend beyond this chamber and beyond committee meetings to meetings which may take place outside parliament at which we are called upon as members of parliament, on behalf of thousands of constituents, to put forward points of view on their behalf. It becomes physically and in many cases geographically impossible for thousands of our constituents to go to one meeting and to present in one voice a coherent platform, feeling, or point of view, and often as members of parliament we are called upon to attend on behalf of our constituents before a committee and to speak with our voices for all of them.

I think what my hon. colleague is asking Your Honour to find is that there is an extension of the privileges and rights of members of parliament so that they are able to go before the CRTC or other board or commission to present argument, without hindrance, and without insult. My hon. colleague is asking Your Honour to find that members of parliament should be able to do so freely. I think we would all ask this for ourselves. I think we would all ask that any member of parliament be allowed to go before a board on behalf of his constituents without having to face insults, preventive measures, whatever they may be, or obstruction. I think that, in short, is what the hon. member is asking Your Honour to find.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I did not intend to get into this until my friend raised a very interesting point, and I think it is very important that we understand the parameters of the case being put by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). As I understand the parameters of her case and what she is asking Your Honour to look to, the hon. member raises the question of her right to appear in an unhampered way before a federal board or commission which gets authority from this House of Commons.

The reason I rise with respect to the remarks of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General (Mr. Young) is that there was an implication that it might be considered that Your Honour might have authority to go beyond that point, but I do not think that is so because breaches of the privilege which is enjoyed by members of parliament can bring penalties. I think there is a line which must appropriately be drawn, and I want to make sure that Your Honour is considering this matter within the fine distinction made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. We are dealing here with federal boards and commissions.

Members of parliament are not special creatures when they appear before, for example, provincial boards or commissions. I suppose they are entitled to good manners, a reasonable hearing and so forth, but a question of privilege cannot be invoked with respect to any other matter, if there is a question of privilege at all, except matters relating to an appearance before a board or commission of the federal government, created by a federal statute and responsible to report ultimately to the federal parliament. I hope Your Honour understands the distinction I have tried to make.

Mr. Speaker: I regret that I understand the distinction very well. It seems to me that we have three problems to deal with in the point raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt). The first is that the behaviour, described by the hon. member, of a member of a federal commission is distasteful in respect to any person appearing anywhere near a hearing of the Canadian Radio-Television and Telecommunications Commission. That directs itself, however, to those who are responsible for appointments and presumably, therefore, for the conduct of people who are members of that commission. That responsibility lies within this House as well, and therefore it is certainly proper that the matter be brought to the attention of those people to see whether disciplinary action or dismissal results from any member of any public commission behaving in this way.

The second problem is the difficulty of extending the definitions or the parameters of that special privilege which attaches to members of this House because, after all, it has to be remembered that it is a special privilege that attaches to members of this House for one purpose and one purpose only, and that really is to see to it that those who are elected here have the right to do the job which is fundamental to their role as elected members.

The increasingly complex role of members of the House of Commons now draws us more and more into appearances before boards. It draws us into constituency offices and related activities which did not exist only months ago, but to argue that because we have a special privilege in respect to being here, coming here and voting here, and that in addition we have obligations of other kinds and that therefore privileges have to go with us, is an argument which just simply breaks down. It does not follow, and to extend this privilege into other proceedings which are not proceedings of this House would be a step which, I am sure, is not warranted on the precedents as I understand them at the present time.

However, I do not think that relieves us of the third difficulty. The suggestion which troubles me greatly as well as, I am sure, other members of this House, is the suggestion that an elected member of this House, in the circumstances described here this afternoon, was treated in what was obviously a most contemptuous and most abusive manner by a member of a federal public board, and in examining whether this member has been treated with contempt by a person I think we are entitled to take into account the capacity of the member in her appearance there, which was obvious and well advertised, as she argued this afternoon.

In addition, I think we are entitled to take into account the capacity of the person who was delivering what we might consider to be a contempt, his capacity at that time, which surely clothes him with some knowledge and some responsibility in respect to his position. I cannot decide at this moment that there has been in fact contempt of a member of parliament and therefore contempt of the House, but that is an aspect of the argument which I wish to consider, as the hon. member for Cape Breton-The Sydneys (Mr. Muir) invited me to do. That is an aspect I want to consider very carefully before coming to a conclusion as to whether the House can address itself to this matter as a question of contempt or privilege, and I will certainly study it very carefully.

● (1552)

POINT OF ORDER

MR. MACKAY—AFFRONT OFFERED TO MEMBER FOR VANCOUVER-KINGSWAY

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a brief point of order. I think all members of the House were shocked to hear the revelation of the treatment which the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt) suffered, and without prejudice to the very important question of privilege, on which you are presumably still deliberating, Mr. Speaker, I wonder if it would not be appropriate for the House leaders to request that you, as our chief presiding officer, communicate with the chairman of CRTC and express the unanimous feeling of the House at the outrageous treatment the hon. member received, so at least there will be an official communication expressing what is, I am sure, the unanimous condemnation of the House of Commons of the behaviour of Mr. Faibish. In that resolution perhaps it could be suggested that an investigation would take place and that appropriate reprimands or punishments would occur.

At the same time, on a point of order, I would like to remind my friend, the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), that, although he sometimes dwells in the past with respect to his thinking on government policy, my constituency is not Pictou, any more than his is Antigonish. I hope he can change that on the record, and I hope it is not an indication of the way he is thinking these days.

Mr. Speaker: Before I hear the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who has been seeking the floor on a point of order, let me point out that I would want hon. members to reflect on the suggestion of the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay). It would be inappropriate for me to take action before the House comes to a decision, but members of the House might want to give their consent, if I feel bound by the precedents to find that technically no case of privilege is established here, to a committee of the House dealing with the matter so that in some way the House could express displeasure, without in any way extending the parameters of privilege. But that lies ahead of us, and perhaps after I have had a chance to examine the precedents we might consider that again.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I want to make one short point. Like other hon. members, I sympathize with the comments made by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), but I want to make one precautionary point.

I would hesitate to move on this until we hear both sides of the story, because here we are dealing with someone who is on a commission and who does not have the right to defend himself before this body. I know the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway very well and I have no reason to doubt her word, but I mention to you, Mr. Speaker, only as a note of precaution, that before we proceed to condemn anyone perhaps we should hear both sides of the story.

PRIVILEGE

MRS. HOLT—AFFRONT BY COMMISSIONER FAIBISH, MEMBER OF CANADIAN RADIO-TELEVISION AND TELECOMMUNICATIONS COMMISSION

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, if I might add to the question of privilege raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway (Mrs. Holt), may I say that I too appeared before the same commission, and in fact I followed the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway. While I support her in every way, I would like to add that she was there in her capacity as a member of parliament, as I was, and further, I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to keep in mind that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway is a member of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts and as such her work will flow directly back to that standing committee and therefore back to this House of which she is a member.

I would also ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take into account in your ruling the matter of privilege I raised a year or so ago which stemmed from the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. At that time, Mr. Speaker, you allowed me to bring the matter of privilege but you would not rule on it.

I submit that in the matter brought up by the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway, and in my own question of privilege, whereas she appeared before a federal body where minutes were kept, and I appeared as a member of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, therefore the matters flow once again back to the House of Commons, where my subsequent vote as a member of parliament, for or against the government, might hinge on the information which I would or would not have gained as a member of the House of Commons.

Furthermore, I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that you take into account the fact that the hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway was there not only, as she says, quite properly in her role as a member of parliament but also in her strong role as a member of the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. That might help you in your decision, Mr. Speaker, to show the link that this breach of privilege had in so far as the duties of a member of the House of Commons are concerned.

I ask you, sir, when you bring in your ruling, to take into account once again my point regarding the raising of matters of privilege stemming from a standing committee of the House.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Tabling of documents.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that the questions be reserved.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill contains one of the most significant social policy reforms of the decade in this country.

On August 24 I announced the measures that form the substance of this bill. At that time I said:

> These measures represent a major restructuring of our social programs to provide greater benefits for . . . lower and middle income families with children.

The changes are a significant reform of the child benefit system. They represent an improvement in federal social programs in line with current realities. They demonstrate that it is possible to achieve liberal reform even in the context of restraint in government spending. I am proud to be associated with them.

Support for families with children has been a cornerstone of federal social policy for decades. Let me describe the main elements of the child benefit system in place until now.

Family allowances have been paid monthly to mothers since 1945. In 1974 they were substantially raised and indexed to increases in prices. They became part of income tax purposes, and thus subject to progressive rates of tax geared to income, to ensure that net benefits were higher for low income families.

In addition, the personal income tax system has provided exemptions in respect of dependent children. There has been one for children under age 16 and a higher one for those over this age. This distinction dates from the days when family allowances were paid only for children under age 16.

In 1977 the government introduced the $50 child tax credit. It was limited to taxpayers with incomes below some $26,000. But it was of no value to those who did not pay any federal tax.

In considering reforms to this existing child benefit system, I wanted to accomplish three things. They are: to make sure government resources were directed to families which needed them most, to couple reductions in government spending with reductions in taxes, and to ensure that the total amount of federal support of families with children was maintained. Along with this, I wanted to make certain that the share of support going to mothers was not eroded.

I have indicated my goals. To achieve them, I am proposing a three point program: first, replacement of the simple income tax credit of $50 per child with a refundable tax credit of $200 per child; second, a reduction in the monthly family allowance to $20 per month; and third, elimination, on a phased basis, of the differential in the basic deduction for children aged 16 and 17.

Now I wish to explain the mechanics of these reforms. I am proposing that the current child tax credit of $50 per child be abolished and replaced by a new one. This new tax credit is $200 per child and, most important, it is refundable. This means it will benefit those who have no tax to pay, as well as those who pay income tax. It means a parent eligible for the child tax credit, but owing no federal tax, will be entitled to a payment from the government. Thus, a parent who has already paid all his or her tax through payroll deduction will receive a cheque from the government. Similarly, those with incomes too low to tax will be paid to prescribed amounts.

It means a parent who owes some tax will be able to offset this against the credit which he or she is entitled to receive. For example, a mother eligible for a child tax credit of $400 and owing no federal tax would get a refund cheque of $400 from the federal government. A mother owing $100 in federal tax and eligible for a child tax credit of $400 would receive a $300 refund cheque. If a mother owes no tax and her husband owes $100 in tax, the mother will still receive $400, and the husband would pay his own tax.

In addition, benefits are geared to income above the $18,000 level. Full benefits go to families with incomes below $18,000. Above that level, benefits are reduced by 5 per cent of the family income in excess of $18,000, or $50 per $1,000. A family with two children and an income below $18,000 will receive $400. At an income of $20,000, they will receive $300. At $22,000 of income, the credit will be $200, and above

$26,000, a family with two children would receive no tax credit. This is a tax cut amounting to some $810 million a year. It goes mainly to lower income families with children, and represents a major new social reform. In fact it will create an increase in disposable incomes for families below the poverty line in the amount of $156 million.

This is the first federal refundable tax credit. Many have criticized tax cuts which failed to help those in need. This government progressively has eliminated taxes on lower income Canadians through measures such as tax indexing and federal tax reduction. Now we are using the tax system in order to go further, actually to supplement the incomes of such families directly. This is a responsible measure designed in a humane and careful way to re-order government priorities to help those in need. But I want to introduce a note of caution here. This bill is not the beginning of a round of social welfare measures disguised as tax reductions. The costs of this program will not balloon out of proportion.

In overhauling the child tax credit, I had the benefit of thorough study and analysis. This study goes back several years. It involved finding out how the tax system might better be used to provide social benefits. First it was the subject of careful analysis in the federal-provincial social security review conducted in 1973. The federal government set up an interdepartmental committee in 1976, headed by my department, to study the possibility of integrating social program payments with the personal income tax system. This committee examined the matter for more than a year, with particular emphasis on the child benefit area. It is this extensive review which forms the basis for the measures before you today.

The second major proposal in the bill is the reduction in family allowance payments to $20 per child per month. The savings in federal expenditures amount to approximately $690 million a year. They will go toward partially financing the new credit to which I have just referred.

[Translation]

The third change is the elimination of the differential in the amount of exemption for children of ages 16 and 17.

The exemption has been higher for these children because originally they were not eligible for family allowances. Now that family allowances are available to children up to the age of 18, I am proposing to rationalize the exemption system under the Income Tax Act. The amount of exemption will be uniform for all children under the age of 18. However, this change will be phased in. Thus, children who are currently 16 and 17 years of age will continue to qualify for the higher exemption.

The changes that I have outlined are virtually self-financing. The reduction in expenditures is $690 million in 1979-80, with a net reduction in revenue of $655 million. The revenue reduction works out this way. First, the new child tax credit reduces tax revenues by $810 million. As family allowances are reduced there is less tax revenue, some $130 million less. The elimination of the $50 child tax credit saves $260 million and the phased elimination of the differential in the exemption for 16 and 17 year old children saves $25 million in the first year. The net reduction in revenues is thus $655 million.

Mr. Speaker, the new tax credit will be claimable by and payable to the person who receives the family allowance. This will normally be the mother. Thus, while mothers face a reduction in family allowance payments they are the beneficiaries of the new credit. Essentially, these measures will aim federal child benefits at those who need them most. This is accomplished without increasing federal financial requirements. It is accomplished out of saved resources. The amount of benefits going to families with below-average incomes is increased by some $200 million. And as I said earlier, it will create an increase in disposable income for families below the poverty level in the amount of $156 million.

Let me give you a few examples of what this credit will do for a family. A family with two children under age 16 and an income of $5,000 will receive $400 under the new credit. The same family will receive $480 in family allowances for a total of $880. This is $194 more than under the current arrangements. For families with $10,000 of income the gain in disposable income from the changes is $159. Mr. Speaker, at the end of my speech I shall table the figures showing what the various amounts will be according to families and net income.

I would like to say a few words about the timing of the introduction of the measures. The reduction in family allowance payments, the elimination of the current $50 child tax credit and the changes to child exemptions start in January, 1979. The new refundable credit is claimable at the time of filing of 1978 tax returns early in 1979, and is applicable to children qualifying at the end of 1978. The purpose of timing the credit in this way is to maintain the cash flow to families. Lower and middle-income families with children will receive the new credit before they experience the full reduction in family allowances.

I expect this will create some additional economic stimulus, both from the fact that more money will be received earlier and because more of the benefits are directed to lower-income families, those who naturally spend all money they may receive.

Mr. Speaker, I would now like to detail for hon. members some of the major features of the new tax credit. First, children eligible for the credit are all those in respect of whom family allowances are payable at the end of the taxation year. This will be all children who are below age 18 at the end of the year. A child born in the year will be eligible for full credit. A child who turns 18 in the year will be eligible for the higher tax exemption that will remain for those of this age.

Second, the credit will be claimable by and payable to the person who receives the family allowance. In most cases this is the mother. Fathers will claim credit in families where there is no mother. Forms for claiming credit benefits will be mailed to family allowance recipients early in 1979.

Third, the amount of the credit will be indexed in a fashion similar to the current indexing of tax exemptions and brackets. The benefits to lower and middle-income families will not be eroded by inflation. Family allowance payments will continue to be indexed as well.

Fourth, the amount of the credit is related to the family's income. Family income is defined to include the income of both spouses supporting the child. This ensures an equitable pattern of benefits. The computation of the credit has been kept as simple as possible. Income will be net income as already determined on the tax form. Families will indicate the number of eligible children and the amount of family income and will claim the resulting benefits.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word about the way the credit benefits will be payable to families. Benefits will first serve to reduce any tax otherwise payable by the person who claims the credit. Any amount of credit left over will be paid in full to the claimant at the time of processing of tax returns.

Mr. Speaker, I have detailed the proposals contained in this bill. I have outlined their effects with some care. I believe this is warranted in describing what amounts to a major overhaul of the child benefit system. This bill is fully in line with the commitments the government has set for itself. These were outlined in the address of the Prime Minister on August 1. The measures are a re-ordering of social priorities to better aim benefits to lower and middle-income families, using only saved resources. At the same time, the measures are equitable. The refundable child tax credit, based on family income, is a response to today's priorities through innovative tax policy. It deserves the support of all members of this House.

I would like to seek the unanimous consent of the House at this time to table three tables outlining the way in which the proposed changes will operate and their effect on government revenues and expenditures.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree to let the minister table those documents?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the minister want those documents to be included in Hansard or merely to be tabled?

Mr. Chrétien: To understand the debate, it is important to have them published in Hansard.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Does the House agree that these tables be attached as an appendix to Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Chrétien.]

[Editor's Note: For tables mentioned above, see Appendix "A".]

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, this concludes my comments. I hope that the committee will take the necessary steps to deal very soon with the bill which will enable us as early as 1979 to pay a substantial increase to low income families. It will also show Canadians that it is possible to be more flexible in our fiscal and social policies and perhaps as we did today arrive at a successful agreement.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): It is right and fitting, Mr. Speaker, apart altogether from satisfying a legal technicality, that this bill should be introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I have great respect for the Minister of Finance, but he has not a great liking for honourable gentlemen. He has not had an easy time of it, and I am delighted that he has had this opportunity, the first in a long time, to get up in the House and give us some good news, at least news which will be substantially good for a number of Canadians.

I say at the outset that it is my party's intention to support this bill. We look forward to an opportunity to probe the minister's remarks he has made, and the documents that he has tabled, as we get into committee of the whole. The minister referred to the fact that this was the most significant social policy reform of the past decade. That is an interesting observation, because if you examine the record of this government over the past decade you will find a number of significant social reform measures brought to the House.

Many of the reforms of this government have been presented as the be all and end all, or a kind of panacea to cover the problems of equitable and just income distribution in this country, especially to low income earners. In 1965 there was the declaration by the government of a war on poverty. It was an obvious recognition at the time that something was not quite right in our society, that there were people who were falling behind, and that there was a significant proportion of our population who were living below the poverty line, who were being denied an adequate income to provide them and their families with a healthy environment and an adequately nutritious diet.

Then we come up to some of the later social reforms. The bill now before the House, which is being amended, was brought in, as the minister indicated, in 1974. It significantly amended the universal Family Allowances Act by providing for increases in the amount of the universal family allowance payment, added the youth allowance provisions, and provided for indexing to cope with the inflationary situation. That, of course, was in addition to the new unemployment insurance program which was introduced at about the same time, another significant social reform designed to address this inequitable situation in our society whereby a number of our fellow citizens were falling behind. The gap was widening; the poor seemed to be getting poorer and, in fact, seemed to be getting more numerous. We know what happened to that reform, commendable though it may be.

I understand that later this week we will be faced with further amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. We know what happened with respect to the administration of that act. We know that this is the second time since the new bill was introduced that the House has been called upon to change it significantly, either to curtail abuses or cut down on the amount of benefits or tighten up on the qualifications and method of paying benefits.

● (1622)

The fact is that all of these reforms seem to be brought in as a response to the moment without any means of adequate preparation, any adequate study, any adequate forecasting, any adequate—and I do not apologize to my friends on the left—planning. We just go from one ad hoc significant social reform to another, like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan), who goes from one dairy policy to another, so that we never know from one year to the next exactly what the position is in Canada. As far as the production of food in this country is concerned, the result is nothing short of catastrophic.

I state that, Mr. Speaker, because I think it is significant and relevant that this bill is introduced by the Minister of Finance. I would refer the minister and the House to the Senate Study on Poverty in Canada, sometimes referred to as the Croll committee report, which was tabled in the other place in 1971. At page 171 there appears the following statement:

> Poverty is not only the problem of the poor it is the problem for all Canadians. If it is not checked vigorously and solved, not only will the poor continue to suffer, but Canada as a whole will suffer, socially and economically.

Of course, that is true. When we have one million unemployed in this country, our productivity suffers. That is just common sense.

The report continues:

> To eliminate poverty in Canada, we must recognize that economic goals such as national economic growth are not ends in themselves but means to the achievement of ends. Without sustained and stable economic growth, Canada could not afford to take the steps which will be necessary to eradicate poverty.

In my view therein lies the answer to the dilemma of the government—why we have to be faced with one significant social reform after another in the eyes of the government. The fact is that the government is not able to create the economic climate in Canada which would make social reform successful, which would help to narrow the gap between the poor and those who seem to get welfare.

In 1974, Mr. Speaker, the Canadian economy stopped growing at a great rate. The 3.7 per cent rate of growth for that year was less than half that of the year before. It fell to as low as 1.1 per cent in 1975, which economists told us was the equivalent of zero growth. We have had a less than 5 per cent rate of growth in the last five years and we are unlikely to achieve the same rate until 1983, according to the Economic Council of Canada. The result, of course, is familiar to this House and country—it is continuing rising unemployment, continuing inflation, and an economy that has not kept pace with government expenditures. It seems to me that this government has a penchant for dividing a pie that keeps getting smaller and smaller and smaller, and it is the poor who suffer.

One of the first things the government did in 1965 when it declared its war on poverty was to set up a special planning secretariat within the PMO, and one of the first agencies to get the axe in the austerity program that followed was that special planning secretariat. It is the innocent who seem to have to bear the burden and the consequences of mismanagement of the economy by this government. The gap widened, notwithstanding studies such as that of Senator Croll, the various agencies, and the ministers of national health and welfare who come and go, show their concern, then leave the portfolio as they found it without any significant change as far as achieving the objective is concerned.

Most economic commentators, even the Minister of Finance, agree that the potential rate of real growth in Canada is about 5 per cent. At least for the rest of this decade, and possibly for the next five years, the rate of unemployment will not fall unless economic growth approaches 5 per cent. If the potential is 5 per cent, then the Canadian economy has not achieved sustained steady economic growth in recent years, nor is it likely to do so in the future. Since 1971, and including 1978, economic growth has exceeded 5 per cent only twice, almost achieved it once, and has been well below it four times. That record is hardly indicative of the kind of sustained steady economic growth referred to by Senator Croll as being necessary to eliminate poverty in Canada.

I have great regard for the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), Mr. Speaker. I had regard and respect, although not to the same degree, for her predecessor. We heard him speak in the House when he introduced the bill that is now being amended, and we heard that the indexing of family allowances was going to solve some of the problems of inflation. It was a commendable move, one that received and has continued to receive the support of the House and the country. I have made the point over and over again in this House, however, that the major reason for indexation, as far as the working poor are concerned, is the fact that it is based on the consumer price index which does not give sufficient weight to food, shelter, and clothing. For the poor, eating out is academic; for them, sirloin steak is an unachievable luxury.

Let us examine the cumulative effect of indexing since 1974. In 1974 the rate of inflation was 10.4 per cent at a time when food prices rose by 16.3 per cent. Coincidentally, figures released yesterday by the Anti-Inflation Board show that food prices are currently running at 16.5 per cent this year. During those four years indexation meant an increase of 28.4 per cent in family allowances, whereas during the same period food prices increased by 46.1 per cent, which is the equivalent of the total increase in the consumer price index. Low income families continued to fall behind; the bill before the House is a painful admission of that fact.

One would think that as a result of the more generous use of the Family Allowances Act, indexation which I have just referred to, introduced at about the same time, and a more comprehensive, generous unemployment insurance program, low income families would be able to catch up. But, sir, the reverse is true. They have in fact fallen behind.

Just a few days ago in this House the Economic Council of Canada tabled its fifteenth annual review and they made reference to the fact that in spite of a generous universal family and youth allowance program—I am paraphrasing—and the revised unemployment insurance program, the poor of this country in terms of government social transfer programs are falling behind. I quote from the Economic Council of Canada "A Time for Reason", fifteenth annual review, at page 93:

> The combined effect of these and other changes was to increase the share of transfer payments going to members of the labour force and their families from 58 to 63 per cent, and the share going to those with some unemployment from 23 to over 30 per cent. The result has been a reinforcement of the incomes of the non-poor. Over all, the percentage of total government transfer directed towards family units with incomes below the poverty line dropped from 45 per cent to about 29 per cent.

The poor continue to fall behind. This government continues to react with ad hoc measures, which in the economic context of the day are not satisfactory and will not in fact achieve their objective.

Poverty, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare well knows, is everywhere. It is not confined to the so-called have-not provinces, one of which I have the honour to represent in this House, and it is not confined to any region. It is in our small towns and it is equally in our large cities. It is to be found in the rural parts of our country, and, of course, it is to be found in great measure in the northern areas and among our native peoples. It is something in this country which we measure in millions. Indeed, nobody will dispute the fact that given the measurement of poverty by Statistics Canada we have fully one-fifth of our population living well below the poverty line. This is something, sir, of which we should be ashamed.

A few days ago the Anglican Church of Canada tabled a report of a special task force on poverty in Canada. I quote from that report. They refer to the fact that:

> Roughly one in six Canadians live in poverty. Almost two-thirds of the poor families in Canada belong to the 'working poor', that is, their heads participate in the work force, and work for annual incomes that are often less than they could receive as welfare clients.

That is something we often lose sight of in this House as we talk about unemployment insurance and about the number of people who are unemployed, that is, the plight of the working poor. I have them in my constituency, and I suspect they are in every constituency in the country.

This report goes on to say:

> Of the remainder, who depend on the welfare system, 84 per cent do so because they are not capable of earning a living: the disabled, the female heads of young families—

[Mr. McGrath.]

Here is a group, growing, and continuing to fall further and further behind. You talk about equality in this country! It is a joke when one considers what is happening to female heads of families by comparison to their male counterparts.

I continue to quote:

> Poverty is concentrated in certain areas, occupations, and educational levels. In the Atlantic provinces, 45 per cent of all families live in poverty; as do 46 per cent of all rural families across Canada. The incidence of poverty is well over 50 per cent in the case of farm workers, loggers, fishermen, trappers and hunters. 89 per cent of low-income families are headed by persons who have not completed high school.

We are talking about the poor in this country, the working poor, or the unemployed, or those who have to get by on fixed incomes. We dealt with this the other day when we were dealing with a bill amending the Old Age Security Act and increasing the amount payable under the guaranteed income supplement. We think of what inflation must mean to them. We think of food prices which have gone up this year so far by 16.5 per cent, shelter prices, the cost of heating a home, the cost of clothing and the cost to the female parent trying to provide an adequately nutrious diet for her family.

I ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare: What happended to the Nutrition Canada survey? That was something undertaken by her predecessor. It was a very commendable move at the time when he was minister of national health and welfare. He is now Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde). That survey was completed, it was national in scope and it cost a considerable amount of money. It identified the problem in so far as the poor are concerned. It also indentified that we have serious nutritional problems in so far as middle income earners are concerned, large families, children going to school without an adequately nutritious breakfast, the situation where both parents are working and where the children cannot be given an adequate breakfast, where there is no adequate lunch preparation and they get by on junk food, soda pop, potato chips, and things that have no nutritional value. All too often when these children get to the first meal of the day it is around seven o'clock, because they have to wait for both parents to return home.

The minister's department made a submission to the Senate committee on poverty with respect to nutrition. It is worth noting because it refers to the impact that nutrition has on poor people. It refers to the impact it has on the learning ability of children, mental illness, and retardation. In fact the whole complex nature of the growing child is adversely affected by inadequate nutrition. That submission was made in 1971 to the senate committee on poverty, and we have heard nothing about it since.

If a poor family cannot maintain a child, and has to surrender the child to foster care, and this is a sad commentary, the government must provide the foster parent with two or more times the welfare allowance, plus the family allowance to care for the child.

I do not quarrel with what the minister is trying to do. I merely say to her that in the context of what this government is doing, by the economic mess we are in today, it is the poor, the voiceless poor of this country who have to bear the greatest burden, whether it is with respect to inflation, or the consequences of government mismanagement, unemployment, regional disparity, or any of the problems that flow from the kind of situation that we find ourselves in today.

● (1642)

The number of families in Canada that are below the poverty line continues to grow at an alarming rate. I referred to the number of families with female heads living below the poverty line. In 1969, 41 per cent of the families with a female head were below the poverty line. In 1976 that figure had grown to 43.2 per cent. Last year, 1977, 44.1 per cent of families with a female head in this country were forced to live below the poverty line. The number of families living below the poverty line in Canada jumped by 10 per cent in 1977.

These figures are startling. If they are not, they should be. The number jumped from 645,000 in 1976 to 712,000 last year. The total number of Canadians living in poverty in Canada last year grew by over 300,000. Is it any wonder that we should concern ourselves with a bill of this nature?

I could talk about what the government is trying to do with regard to negative income tax. We will be going into committee of the whole. There will be ample opportunity to discuss those parts of this bill which cause some of us some problem. The confidentiality of the Income Tax Act, for example, is being breached in a very significant way by this bill. We will have more to say about that when we get into committee of the whole.

In order to arrive at a figure for family income, it is necessary to know the income of the other spouse. However, giving the minister the power to furnish information on the income of one spouse to another would be and is, as I have said, a very significant development.

Hon. members have anticipated what the Minister of National Health and Welfare would say. What would a Conservative government do? What would the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) do if he were the Prime Minister of Canada, and that will be his responsibility in a very short time?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McGrath: I say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare that I look forward to seeing her as the social critic on this side of the House. It is a role to which she is especially well suited.

Miss Bégin: What is he going to do? How much will he do for the children?

Mr. McGrath: The Minister of National Health and Welfare is very, very sensitive these days. She knows how spectacularly unsuccessful the government of which she is a member has been in addressing the problem of the growing disparity between the poor of this country and the rich.

Mr. Martin: Rubbish!

Mr. McGrath: What would a Conservative government do to solve the problem of poverty in Canada? I would refer the minister and the House to what Senator Croll had to say in his report in 1971. The first thing we would have to do and would do, and this would have positive consequences for the poor of this country, would be to get this economy back on the rails again, get it back on a sound, healthy, and even keel. That is absolutely vital if we are to address the problem of adequate income distribution in this country.

Miss Bégin: What is your social policy?

Mr. McGrath: I do not know what the minister is saying. I am looking forward to her speech.

Miss Bégin: What is your social policy?

Mr. McGrath: The minister would do well to listen to our social policy. For example, we would pay the spouse's allowance until a spouse reached age 64 or 65. How is that for a start? Then we would address as a separate issue, not ignore it, the problem of the single woman who has no pensionable income. The minister ignores that. We would provide the economic framework whereby these injustices could, if not be eliminated, certainly be substantially reduced. Under this government, the gap seems to grow and widen. The poor seem to be falling further and further behind. We would allow housewives to participate in the Canada Pension Plan.

Miss Bégin: Rich housewives with husbands.

Mr. McGrath: That is like the rich homeowner who will participate in the provisions for income tax. Is the minister saying that only the rich will participate? What about the middle income woman who wants to stay home but has no pensionable income and faces poverty because this government would cut off the spouse's allowance at age 60 if her spouse dies? We believe, as did the minister when she was secretary to the Royal Commission on the Status of Women, and my party puts this forward as policy, that it is unjust to deprive the female home-making spouse of the right to participate in the Canada Pension Plan. The minister agrees with that.

Miss Bégin: No, I do not.

Mr. McGrath: She was the secretary of the royal commission which made that recommendation ten years ago and which this government continues to ignore.

Miss Bégin: You obviously have not read the report.

Mr. McGrath: The Minister of National Health and Welfare—

Miss Bégin: Would you read the report? I wrote it.

Mr. McGrath: The minister's impetuousness reminds me of a hen in a barnyard on a hot rock. She keeps getting up, fluttering all over, not knowing what to do with herself. She walks across the floor of the House and hands me the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women in Canada. She is obviously hypersensitive about this report because she was the secretary to that royal commission. She knows better than most members of this House that most of the recommendations of the royal commission have been and continue to be ignored by this government.

Miss Bégin: That is false.

Mr. McGrath: If the minister thinks that that statement is not correct, let her get up and identify the recommendations of the royal commission that have not been acted upon, including the one dealing with eligibility of the home-making female spouse in the Canada Pension Plan. I look forward to hearing the minister speak. Perhaps we might even have the rare privilege of hearing the hon. member for Welland (Mr. Railton), who continues to interject from his seat. I know that hon. member would agree with another very important point in our social policy. I refer to the provision whereby people of this country are forced to retire when they reach that magic age of 65. Where does the hon. member's colleague, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, stand on that particular aspect of social policy?

The hon. member for Welland is probably the most dramatic exponent of how productive one can be when one goes beyond 65 years of age. I hope the hon. gentleman will continue to serve in this House with the same degree of productivity, camaraderie and good nature that has characterized him throughout the years.

I could go on. We are all very anxious to hear from the minister. She is sitting here. She obviously has something to say. She knows where we stand. Let's hear where she stands.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1652)

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before I comment on Bill C-10 I must say I always enjoy these exchanges between the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and various spokesmen for social legislation on the front bench of the official opposition. I notice how friendly they become as they engage in these exchanges, and I notice that the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) always has a reply that he shouts out at the top of his voice, but he never gives any figures.

I should like him to tell us how much he proposes should be paid as an old age pension or a spouse's allowance. I should like him to tell us precisely how he intends to provide for home-maker spouses something of the equivalent of the Canada Pension Plan and, in the case of family allowances, I should like him to tell us precisely how much it is intended the payment should be. I should also like him to be more specific as to what he intends should be done in terms of income tax adjustments, not only in terms of the amount by which the poor are to benefit but in terms of the many loopholes which exist in the income tax legislation which redound to the advantage of the wealthy. Maybe some day we shall get specific answers to questions like that from the spokesman for the Conservative party—

An hon. Member: Don't hold your breath.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —but the advice I am getting not to hold my breath is, I think, good advice.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): It will all be in the next Speech from the Throne.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) says it will be in the next Speech from the Throne. Well, whoever brings in the next Speech from the Throne, I hope there will be a lot more in it than there was in the one we had at the beginning of this session.

When the announcement was made in August about the change we are discussing today, the double-barrelled change, namely, adjusting the rate of the family allowance and making certain changes in the Income Tax Act, my first reaction was one of pleasure. It looked to me as though the net result of these changes would be to improve the position of the poor in our society, particularly the position of families living below the poverty line, and that the cost of doing so was to be borne by those in the higher income brackets. Indeed, I indicated to the Minister of National Health and Welfare personally that I thought she had won another of her victories in getting this type of change out of the tight-fisted cabinet of which she is a member. I still commend her on getting the cabinet to face up to social problems. My hon. friends over here think I am so impressed by the speeches the Minister of National Health and Welfare makes around the country that I would readily support anything to which her name was attached.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: He is going soft!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In this case, though, the bill is introduced by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), and any affection I might have for the Minister of National Health and Welfare does not necessarily carry over to him. Indeed, the more I study this legislation the more questions I find myself asking, and as I try to answer those questions I am afraid I have come to feel that the heart of the Minister of National Health and Welfare was in the right place when she fought for this in the cabinet but that when these changes are put into effect the result will not be all I thought it would be when I first heard of the legislation in August. I thought, then, that here was a plan which would put more money at the disposal of our poorer families, and cause the rich to pay for it. But as I study the legislation, especially the income tax legislation as a whole, it seems to me that though the changes will put more money into the possession of the lower income families, it is the people in the middle income group who will pay the price.

The income tax structure is such that at the higher levels just about every change made in the Income Tax Act results in more money for a fortunate few. It is not a new result of Liberal social policy to make the middle income groups pay for benefits granted to those at the lower levels, and it is for this reason I feel strongly that the legislation should be studied further. I did not like the reduction of the family allowance from roughly $26 a month to $20 a month when I first looked at the proposal and noticed there was to be this $6 reduction. Then, on examining it closely, I found that a noble purpose was being met, not by making those in the higher tax brackets pay the cost, as ought to be the case, but by imposing the burden upon middle income people. This is one aspect which ought to be looked at further.

The bill before us is mostly an income tax measure. It contains ten clauses, only one of which amends the Family Allowances Act; all the others amend the Income Tax Act. We shall have to look at this more closely.

There is one point upon which you and I will agree, Mr. Speaker, namely, that it is five o'clock.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen)—Finance—Grants in lieu of taxes; the hon. member for Palliser (Mr. Schumacher)—External Affairs—Supplying arms to Southern Africa; the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn)—Health and Welfare—Policy regarding extended use of social insurance numbers.

It being five o'clock the House will now proceed to the consideration of private members' business as listed on today's order paper, namely, public bills, private bills, and notices of motions.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' PUBLIC BILLS

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think that the House is willing to give its unanimous consent to proceed with the consideration of Bill C-203 standing in the name of the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) and that the previous bills be allowed to stand.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall order No. 1, in the name of the hon. member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Shall order No. 2, in the name of the hon. member for Calgary North (Mr. Woolliams), be allowed to stand at the request of the government?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West) moved that Bill C-203, to amend the statute law relating to income tax, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, this bill is an amending bill. It is very simple in form. It consists of two clauses. It seeks to delete from the Income Tax Act two subsections of section 234. It calls for its provisions to be retroactive to January 1, 1977, when subsections (5) and (6) came into force.

This bill appears for the second time on the order paper, it having appeared early in the last session when I put it on. This bill arises by reason of the fact that the guillotine was used in passing Bill C-22 in 1976. That bill was an income tax amendment bill arising out of the budget delivered previously, and this provision was one of those little provisions which was sneaked in. It is purely bureaucratic policy. It has nothing to do with government policy except to this extent: in the period since 1964 when the concept of the social insurance number was introduced the concept has been moving step by step toward a total identity card, and a total requirement for an identity card.

The way the social insurance number is applied is very unfair. It is fortunate in one way, and yet unfortunate that this House got to clause 65 of Bill C-22 when the guillotine fell, but when clause 75, which contained subsections (5) and (6) of section 234, came along, there was no question of any debate or discussion. However, fortunately some of us here who were aware of what was happening called out "on division", and so therefore we are not hemming and hawing when I present this bill.

What do subsections (5) and (6) of section 234 of the Income Tax Act provide? I will read them as follows:

Income Tax Act

(5) Where an amount is to be paid or credited to a resident of Canada who is an individual, other than a trust, in circumstances where an ownership certificate referred to in subsection (1) is required to be completed, and the ownership certificate does not contain a social insurance number assigned to the individual by the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the debtor or other person paying or crediting the amount shall deduct or withhold therefrom an amount equal to 25 per cent thereof and shall forthwith remit that amount to the Receiver General of Canada on account of the individual's tax for the year under Part I and shall submit therewith a statement in prescribed form.

(6) Where an amount has been deducted or withheld under subsection (5) from an amount paid or credited to an individual, it shall, for the purposes of this act, be deemed to have been received by the individual at the time the amount was paid or credited to him.

That has certain implications too. My colleague, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot (Mr. Jarvis), told me today about a constituent of his who is a mother of a young child who some years ago was given a $50 Canada Savings Bond. The bond matured this year. The mother went to a bank or trust company to cash the Canada Saving Bond. The child does not have a social insurance number, and it cannot qualify for one. The mother does not have one either. Why should she? She does not seek unemployment insurance. She does not have to be registered. However, the bank or trust company held back $12.50, to be credited to whom, the child, who is not a taxpayer, or to the mother, who is not a taxpayer? If the bond is cashed, 25 per cent of the face value and of the coupons can be claimed back only in the following taxation year. In the meantime, the government will have had the benefit of the funds. The individual concerned has been denied the value of the Canada Savings Bond which was sold by the government.

Whenever anyone bought a bond, he was told that he would be entitled to the face value at the sale of the bond. Now there is talk about a social insurance number, but millions and millions of bonds are outstanding. Incidentally, over four million people here in Canada do not have social insurance numbers, nor do they need them. Children and young married women who do not work have not applied for social insurance numbers. They are nowhere near being in a position where they might want to apply to either for Canada Pension or old age security.

Social insurance numbers were introduced in the first place so that people could get social security at age 65. Let us go back to the days of Mr. Pearson, who introduced the concept. He was questioned by the then leader of the opposition, the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), and I have the quotations here. It was categorically asserted by the then prime minister that social insurance numbers would not be used for income tax purposes, but here we have the introduction of a use of the social insurance number attached to a penalty. There is now a requirement. Every T-1 or T-1 short form filed by personal taxpayers has a space for the social insurance number, but there is no penalty faced by taxpayers filing returns because none is provided. Taxpayers need not be registered for social insurance. There is no law which says that an individual has to be registered. Many of the wives of hon. members do not work and never have, that is outside, in order to qualify for unemployment insurance.

[Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West).]

People must have social insurance numbers for purposes of unemployment insurance, but that is a social security purpose. However, millions of people in this country have not worked under those circumstances, and they can file income tax returns without having social security numbers. But now we have this amendment to the act which says that if a person cashes a Canada Savings Bond and that person is not the possessor of a social security number, the bank, trust company or other cashing agency shall deduct 25 per cent. There is no deduction from accumulated interest, but in some cases 25 per cent of the capital is sequestered. That is sheer confiscation, and I say it is unjust.

It was put forward by bureaucrats in the Department of National Revenue and, by God, they would never have got by me if I had been that department's parliamentary secretary, as I was in the past. I can assure you that, if you are a good parliamentary secretary, you ensure that that sort of thing stops when budget books are being prepared. At that time budgets were brought down in the early spring, so therefore budget books were prepared in the early winter months when proposals were put forward from all sides and considered by the interdepartmental committee on finance and national revenue, and other interested persons were called upon to discuss any particular proposal.

This looks fine administratively, but I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the more use is made of the social security number, the more cheating there will be. It is rather strange, but when my colleague, the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) raised a question the other day, I must confess that I was deeply disappointed in the answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) who has become completely the tool of the bureaucracy when it comes to expressing views with regard to the use of the social security number, and likely her parliamentary secretary is too.

This gave rise to some newspaper articles. I will only refer to one in the Globe and Mail and one in the Gazette which appeared today indicating how far the use of the social security card has crept in by agencies which have no blessed business using it, particularly now that there are computers which store and compare data. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said that with a program of millions of dollars she had to have a computer so as to prevent cheating. Has she seen the statistics on the types of cases involving cheating of unemployment insurance, such as cases of people holding 50 or 60 cards? Why is that? Because with the insistence on the social security number, the value of the card increases, and greater and greater reliance is placed upon it as the true means of identification. Then it becomes an absolute sinecure to cheat the UIC in any manner that can be devised.

Certainly today trust companies do not ask the holder of Canada Savings Bonds whether they may see his social security card or the ownership certificate or that the redemption form be filled out. So long as there is a nine digit number that is reasonable for the area, they say, "Thank you very much, madam, that is perfectly fine". It does not mean a thing because, for the purpose of the Income Tax Act, this is supposed to be a cross check. Someone might have Canada Savings Bonds which they should not have, and they are trying to cheat.

I do not know what promoted this because we were not able to question the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) on the reasoning for it, but all I say is that this is a nefarious subsection in the Income Tax Act. I do not know whether members in the House have considered how unjust it is when, in other cases, they say there is a withholding of 25 per cent of the dividends to a foreign owner, or income which you are paying to a former resident and you withhold 25 per cent in order to ensure that your money is covered for a potential income tax. But it is not that, it is 25 per cent of the capital value as well. Therefore, the Department of Finance is lying in its teeth to the public of Canada when it says that people will be repaid the face value of the Canada Savings Bonds they purchase. Now they have added this kicker, "provided you have a social insurance number." That was not a condition of the purchase of those bonds.

Very few bonds that were subject to this condition are being presented for cashing now. This bill only came into force in 1976. As a matter of fact, it became effective on January 1, 1977. How about all those bonds that are held by individuals, that were purchased prior to that date and were not subject to that condition? There are hundreds of millions of these bonds, possibly billions of them, a high proportion of which are owned by people who do not have a social insurance number and have no need for it.

I would like to make one last point on this. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that there are many senior citizens in Canada who drew their old age pension before 1964, before there was a requirement for a social insurance number, and they have never had to file for one? These people are over 80. Does anyone want to know what forms of proof of identity you must put forward in order to get a social security number? You can get a passport just as easily. You need a birth certificate identifying you here in Canada, in addition to which you need a marriage certificate, if you are a female, and a secondary form of identification. Incidentally, all those people who were born abroad—my goodness, how many do we have here in Canada—will find that a birth certificate from a country other than Canada is not valid as primary identification. There has to be a marriage certificate, and then something like secondary identification or a tax notice on which a person's name has appeared, or some such silly thing. You ask elderly persons of 85 or 86 to go through this rigamarole to get a social insurance number so that they are able to cash in their savings without having 25 per cent of them confiscated, until they can file an income tax return in the following year, which they are not required to do any way!

To that extent, I ask that the House approve Bill C-203 and give it second reading.

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to spend a few minutes making some comments on Bill C-203 proposed by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I will preface my remarks by saying that I do not in any way profess to be an authority on the tax system or to have the kind of legislative background that the hon. member for Edmonton West has, but having read the bill and after listening to him, I thought I might offer a few comments.

I was perplexed as to the reason why he was so exercised by the subject matter of the bill. I noticed the outpouring of emotion, and it seemed to me rather odd because in my constituency, for instance, the minor hockey league requires that all children have social insurance numbers before being allowed to play on any of the teams which represent the municipality outside that area, and so do indeed some of the other minor leagues, even for house league play, as do some schools for their records. So it seems to me that if this is acceptable, it is not because those organizations have any legislative authority to enforce it, other than to bring some pressure to bear on both the parents and the children who may or may not be able to play in those leagues.

But when we are dealing with a measure which is designed to improve the efficiency of the tax system, I have some difficulty in understanding the hon. member's indignation. During oral questions hon. members opposite have indicated with great moral indignation that apparently the efficiency of government is not as high as it should be. They have asked what ministers are going to improve administrative procedures, so that money can be recovered or at least not lost. If it is acceptable to parents and a large number of other people to have social insurance numbers for minor league sport, it seems somewhat peculiar that such a requirement in the Income Tax Act to improve its efficiency would be wrong.

I should like to respond to some of the points raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West. When social insurance numbers were introduced in 1964 by the previous prime minister, the government of the day made commitments regarding the new system. The commitment made was that information contained in application forms for social insurance numbers would be processed and maintained in Ottawa for government purposes, including unemployment insurance and the then proposed Canada Pension Plan. A further commitment was made that the confidentiality of this information would be protected.

No commitment was made then, or at any other time, to the effect that social insurance numbers would not be used in order to identify individuals for the purposes of a common system of government record keeping, such as that recommended by the Glassco commission. The hon. member indicated that the present minister had violated an undertaking by a previous government and prime minister. Perhaps that is not in accordance with the facts. The confidentiality of material on application forms is guarded very carefully. At that time it was stated that the information would be used for unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan and other social measures, but no commitment was made that it would not be used as an extension into the common system of government record keeping.

The introduction into the Income Tax Act of the provision for withholding tax respecting ownership certificates which do not bear individual social insurance numbers does not make it mandatory for any taxpayer to produce his social insurance number, or indeed, to acquire one if he has not previously applied for the assignment of a social insurance number because of some provision in the law. If a person chooses not to apply for a social insurance number, and for some reason feels it would be uncomfortable to have one, because of some moral objection against it, there is no requirement that he must. As I understand it, the law requires that 25 per cent of the interest coupon value would be prepaid. It would be credited to the tax system, and it would be refundable if no other tax was owing.

Also I wonder if the hon. member for Edmonton West was correct when he suggested that 25 per cent of the face value of bonds would have to be deposited. I question that. Perhaps I am not the financier the hon. member is, but my understanding is that it would be the coupon value. I am sure the hon. member would agree that the principal of the bond is not taxable, but the coupon value is. In fact the current issue of Canada Savings Bonds do not have coupons attached to them. Much of what he raised in his argument will disappear as we go forward.

At this point in time, I question that there are four million Canadians who do not have social insurance numbers. Obviously that number will decline dramatically if substantial numbers of school children are required to have social insurance numbers for school and minor sports purposes. The most commonly purchased bonds in Canada are Canada Savings Bonds. If those bonds do not have coupons, the use of this procedure would be considerably less.

I hope the hon. member was not implying in his remarks that the 25 per cent was a penalty. It is a clear requirement to prepay in order to have on record that a certain amount of money was cashed. Further, there is a liability on the part of the person who cashed the bond to prepay an amount to his income tax account, not forfeit it. The hon. member referred to one inequity in a system where money is credited to the account of a taxpayer. If there is a refund owing to that taxpayer, that money may be in the system for a period up to a year. I suppose it could be argued that essentially there would be no interest rate, whereas if the money went to the taxpayer it could be reinvested or used for some other purpose. That is the narrow aspect of it, in terms of people cashing bond interest and not being in the category of owing some type of income tax.

The alternative to the existing social insurance number requirement would be the withholding of tax on all payments of interest. Recently the United States Treasury proposed a mandatory withholding on all interest because of the extent of under-reporting of income in this category by taxpayers in the United States. While this would resolve the compliance problem, it would cause some hardship for a large number of taxpayers. This should be considered only if experience reveals that existing procedures are inadequate.

I apologize to the House and the proposer of the bill that I did not have time to do the amount of research I would like to in terms of an estimate regarding the amount of bond interest not reported. I think in some cases non-compliance with the act is fairly significant. It was rather interesting that an hon. member opposite would set out his argument in great flowing terms that we should not use modern methods to increase the efficiency of the tax system, and therefore perhaps operate the system less inefficiently. Surely any hon. member who has listened to questions directed to ministers involved in social programs, finance, employment or manpower programs, will realize the theme of the questions was efficiency of administration. If the opposition is sincere and believes what it proposes in question form, then such an argument is not terribly consistent.

I am not aware of income reporting slips being issued for bank interest, or any other type of investment, without social insurance numbers being included on them. Some tax forms without social insurance numbers are mailed to elderly senior citizens who have never had such numbers allocated to them. But I am sure approximately 90 per cent of all income tax forms mailed to taxpayers include social insurance numbers.

● (1732)

I find it a little bit strange that in an effort to improve the efficiency of the tax system the hon. member for Edmonton West would argue so vigorously against a practice that is accepted apparently in minor sports, in schools, in all the business transactions involving every other type of investment and, indeed, I would venture to think in well over 90 per cent of all the income tax forms filed in Canada in any one year.

Those are the comments I wanted to make, and for the reasons I have given, I would find it very difficult to support Bill C-203.

Mr. Leonard C. Jones (Moncton): There is no question in my mind, Mr. Speaker, that I would support this bill. It would be ridiculous to do anything else, if an individual has any knowledge of what takes place in some banking companies.

There are thousands of senior citizens in this country who have not applied for social security numbers and have not been asked to apply. These are people who in fact and in practice have to redeem bonds. One of the reasons why they must redeem their bonds is the high inflation rate, and they have to keep up their standard of living because they are not getting enough support from the government.

The situation which this bill is attempting to correct can arise particularly where a spouse attempts to cash in the bond of the deceased spouse. I had a situation only yesterday that brings this act very much into play. I went to the bank with a widow in our community to cash a bond. The bank asked her if she had the social insurance number of the deceased. The spouse had died at 93 years of age and had never applied for a social insurance number because it was not necessary to do so when he purchased the Canada Savings Bond. Despite that, the bank took off 25 per cent of the principal and interest on that bond.

At the time the bank officers had this very act in front of them and they quoted from it. I was flabbergasted that this type of thing would take place in this day and age. That woman had to forfeit that money, temporarily though it may have been, which could have helped to pay doctor's expenses, ambulance bills and, of course, funeral costs. She will not get the money back for some time, and she will lose her discount on the funeral expenses. It may seem like very little, but to this lady it was a lot.

It is bad enough that the bank take 25 per cent of the accrued interest, but as the hon. member has said, it also takes 25 per cent of the principal. The situation I have just related is not the first time that I have run across such dealings. I think that the hon. member, instead of being ridiculed by members on the government side, should be complimented on bringing in a bill of this nature. I support him fully.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to make a few comments and take part in the debate on Bill C-103. First of all, I would like to congratulate my colleague from Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) for having raised this matter.

Mr. Speaker, this concerns once again some type of regulations established by our bureaucratic dictatorship, which is greatly concerned with technological efficiency, but very little with reality and even less with human dignity.

As was explained by my colleague, there are many people who, for various reasons, do not have a social insurance card. This included senior citizens and younger people. It seems to me that a deduction of 25 per cent is a somewhat unfair penalty for someone who has neglected to take the necessary steps to obtain a social insurance number. Many people do not have a social insurance number simply because they never needed one. As my colleague from Moncton (Mr. Jones) underlined earlier, many Canadian wives do not have their own social insurance card. And such cases as those mentioned by the hon. member are really quite unfair to those people.

Of course, the majority of Canadian citizens have this little red and white card. It seems to me that it would have been more realistic, fairer and no more complicated than necessary to ask the banks and the financial institutions where savings bond interest coupons are cashed in to give an application form to their customers who do not have a social insurance number and to urge these customers to complete these forms for future use. It seems to me that this decision was made rather arbitrarily and with no period of transition. I have in my office an employee who used to work for a Canadian chartered bank. He told me recently that quite often, nearly every day, people would go back home very frustrated and angry at the fact that they could not cash in their savings coupons because they did not have a social insurance number and the bank deducted 25 per cent from their interest.

These are the few comments that I wanted to make about this unfair situation. If we are to require this card to deal with the government, it seems to me that the government should launch an advertising campaign to tell each citizen to obtain it. Let us distribute application forms in public establishments and advertise on television, but for God's sake, let us not take some money away from a poor man who does not have a card; let us give him this card instead. It seems to me he should be given a chance to get his card before being penalized.

What I am thinking of here, Mr. Speaker, is a publicity campaign. Some people will tell me that publicity campaigns are expensive. Perhaps, but recently, last month in fact, in one of the shopping centres in Hull, the information centre on national unity set up a puppet show praising the bounties and virtues of the federal government. The people did not stop shopping for all that, and I can understand them. There was a din of background music. It reminded me somehow of the swan's song of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), as my colleague from St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) likes to remind us.

So, Mr. Speaker, once again I thank the hon. member for having pointed out that injustice to the House, to which I trust remedies will be found in the very near future.

[English]

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): In reference to the remarks, Mr. Speaker, made by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard), it may be of interest to note that on the passing of Bill C-22 it became the responsibility of Revenue Canada to administer the provisions of the amendments, and in that connection it carried out a publicity campaign by placing ads in papers across Canada as well as having counter displays set up in banks, trust companies and other institutions that cash coupons. Since this legislation applied to all coupons, not just Canada Savings Bonds, it was directed specifically to Canada Savings Bonds holders. The publicity campaign was carried out in 1977.

Personally, in my own constituency I have had very little problem with people not being aware of the terms of this particular legislation. The hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), and I am sure that it was quite unintentional, used the word "principal" several times regarding the 25 per cent deduction. Yet I note his own bill, Bill C-203, says in the explanatory notes:

> —that required all holders of bonds, especially Canada Savings Bonds, to have social insurance numbers, failing which 25 per cent of the bond interest would be retained at source.

I hope that will lay to rest the fact that we are not dealing with principal but are dealing with interest.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): I would like to draw to the hon. member's attention, Mr. Speaker, the practice that exists in some places where the cashing authority is insisting on taking 25 per cent of the capital as well.

● (1742)

Mr. Anderson: Mr. Speaker, if cases of this kind are brought to the hon. member's attention, I trust he will report them immediately to Revenue Canada. In their operating brochure it is stated that if an individual does not want to show the social insurance number—and I do not know why that would be—the alternative is to have 25 per cent of the interest deducted, file an income tax return and then claim a refund if no tax is payable.

What we have here today would sound very unreasonable to anyone who wandered in here and heard that a social security number is required in order to obtain interest on bonds or coupons. But what was the purpose of the amendment in the first place?

Mr. Ellis: Sheer bureaucracy.

Mr. Anderson: That is stupid thing to say.

Mr. Ellis: It may be but it is a fact.

Mr. Anderson: Obviously people were collecting interest on bonds and clipping other coupons but were not declaring them as interest. When the hon. member says it is sheer bureaucracy, it shows he has not paid much attention to the original legislation. Its purpose was to correct a problem. Members of the official opposition have told us time and time again that it is the responsibility of this parliament to run an efficient government.

Just the other day the government was severely criticized for having paid $142 million to recipients of unemployment insurance funds which the Auditor General said should not have been paid. Various members of the official opposition were indignant that this government could be so negligent as to pay $142 million to people who did not deserve it. The fact that they might have had a job but in the meantime a cheque had been sent out was not considered.

The hon. member opposite is saying that this is a bureaucratic administration because it is attempting to gather revenue from people who have obtained income from bonds and who have not reported it to Revenue Canada. I think they should also show wrathful indignation at those people who over the years have collected money from bonds and coupons but have not declared it on their income tax report. Apparently the hon. member is saying it is all right for them to collect money and not report it, but it is terrible that money should be sent out to recipients of unemployment insurance funds who for one reason or another are disqualified. I find that a strange attitude.

I think hon. members on both sides of the House would agree that in order to run an efficient government, in order to collect moneys owed to us—because revenue from stocks and bonds must be declared on income tax returns—the fact that we use the social security number as a cross-check should be applauded and not condemned. If tomorrow a newspaper headline said the Government of Canada was failing to collect $300 million in interest on bonds because it was not declared as income, I am sure there would be an expression of wrathful indignation and an accusation that we are not running an efficient government. I know hon. members opposite would be the first to say so. Instead, we are told that this is a bureaucratic mess.

For these reasons I oppose the bill brought forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West, though not in a spirit of anger or confrontation. If there is to be an accounting of payments to recipients of social welfare and UIC, by the same token there should be an accounting of revenue derived by people who clip coupons to make sure that income is declared. I have no vendetta with them, Mr. Speaker—I have no bonds—but I think it is fair to ask that an accounting take place. The hon. member for Edmonton West has much more financial experience than I and he knows that not all our taxpayers are honest all the time. It is easy for the tax department to see how much a person earns in a year because they get a slip from the employer, but it is not always easy to get an accurate accounting of interest on bonds.

I think that Bill C-22 and its amendment merely do a bit of housekeeping to prevent abuses that have existed heretofore and make things fair for all taxpayers in Canada. For that reason I support the amendment and Bill C-22, and I regret that I cannot support the hon. member's bill.

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, if it were not that I considered the source of the remarks, I might have got upset by a stupid comment made a few moments ago. Having given due consideration to the source, however, I am going to let the matter go by.

Surely some members of the government realize that the social insurance number—not the "social security number"—is being used as a sheer bureaucratic measure and nothing else. It is iniquitous and it is oppressive. The hon. member for Moncton (Mr. Jones) spoke of a case he had, and I intend to outline the case of a widow of many years who tried to cash her Canada Savings Bonds. The bank told her that she must have a social insurance number in order to do so. This particular bank did not give her the right to give up 25 per cent of the interest—which she would likely never get back anyway. Being a very law-abiding lady, she applied for a social insurance number.

One of the things that my colleague the hon. member for Edmonton West did not mention is the fact that the method of issuing social insurance numbers by itself is ridiculous. When the request for a number goes into that behemoth of a computer, all records of that input are destroyed and if nothing comes out no one ever knows what happened to them. If the application form does not arrive there—and goodness knows, with the mail system recently there is a good chance of that—no one ever knows what happened. This poor lady consulted my office and we were told the next issue of the computer would be available today, October 31—my birthday. If that did not come out of the computer today, Mr. Speaker, this lady is in trouble again because we do not know whether her application for a number ever went into the computer. We know she put the application in the mail but we do not know what happened after that and we have no way of knowing. Neither have we any way of speeding up the process. She could put in another application for another social insurance number and perhaps end up with two. That does not seem to make much sense, Mr. Speaker.

This inefficient, iniquitous piece of nonsensical legislation was forced upon us through closure. It would not have been so bad had we had a chance to debate it at the time, but we never got to it; the guillotine fell and we did not have a chance to do anything about it. It is a particularly objectionable example of bureaucratic bungling.

I suspect such things are happening in other ridings throughout Canada. The banks, because they are not inhuman, are quietly advising people who come in to buy Canada Savings Bonds to buy something else. This is something I deplore but it is happening simply because of an overriding bureaucracy.

It is getting close to six o'clock, Mr. Speaker, and I would like the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) to substantiate the reason for talking this bill out, as I am sure the government will. This bill deserves the support of the House. It would repeal at least one iniquitous clause in the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think many of the comments I would like to make were made on this side of the House in defence of the legislation that was passed a year or so ago and against the proposition put forward by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert). I have worked with the hon. member for a number of years on finance committees and other committees, and I know that he has put a lot of thought into a bill of this nature. Everything he does is always done with a great deal of care and thought.

However, it seems to me that before we complain about people, being asked to identify themselves by means of a social insurance number so that tax compliance can follow when cashing coupons, should we not take a look for a moment at the young girl or boy who has a temporary job in the summertime? For example, I had a young girl working in my riding office recently but I was not able to pay that girl even so little as $10 or $15 until I informed the House of Commons payroll division as to what that individual's social insurance number was. I am not against that procedure, although it is quite a nuisance especially when one employs temporary help for a few weeks. However, all businesses face this problem.

Why is this requirement necessary? It is required for one reason only, and that is to assist in the compliance procedure within our income tax system. As hon. members know, our system is based on self-assessment.

An hon. Member: It is done for other reasons too.

Mr. Martin: It is done for other reasons as well. It is done for unemployment insurance purposes, etc. Social insurance numbers are recorded on tax returns and T-4s so documents can be matched, all as part of the compliance procedure. For us to say that we do it for high school students, or whoever they may be, who are earning small sums of money for a short period of time and then to say it is unfair to do it for people who have more substantial means and have managed to acquire bonds but are upset when cashing their coupons on finding that they are required to show a social insurance number—

Mr. Ellis: Widows in their eighties.

Mr. Martin: —I do not think is a complaint that is really justified.

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): All rich people?

Mr. Martin: No, I did not say rich people, but richer than a young high school student who has taken his first job.

Mr. Ellis: Not by a long shot.

Mr. Martin: We are living in a computer age whether we like it or not. There are many credit cards today; oil companies have them, the major department stores have them. Banks have had account numbers for ages and ages. Everybody works by means of identification of accounts through a number system. This is simply done to ease administration, to facilitate the handling of thousands and thousands of accounts, and to simply make things easier in terms of the administration of many thousands of documents.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Invasion of privacy.

Mr. Martin: For us to talk about a tax system that is based on a self-assessment system, as is the case in this country, and to say to our tax authorities, "Look, for goodness sake be careful how you respect this compliance; don't tread on anybody's toes, don't ask people for too much information"—

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): There is a penalty.

Mr. Martin: There is no penalty involved, Mr. Speaker. The hon. member for Edmonton West refers to a penalty. There is no penalty whatsoever. What is being done is withholding money at source, a procedure the hon. member is familiar with. This is done with all kinds of payments. The money is returned to the individual when he or she files an income tax form.

Mr. Johnston: Breaks the contract.

Mr. Martin: That is what happens. If the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston) wishes to participate in this debate, assuming there is sufficient time, I will be glad to hear his comments. But indeed that is exactly what happens. Just as is the case with income tax, the deduction is made at source.

Why is income tax deducted from salary at source?

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): It does not have to be.

Mr. Martin: No, they do not do so in France, and I believe in some other European countries. But what happens? There is a great game at the end of the year chasing after people to get them to pay thousands of dollars worth of tax. Deduction at source makes a lot of sense for a number of reasons. Once that deduction is made then the identification of the person from whom the deduction is made is very important. That is where the use of the social insurance number is of great assistance.

People in my riding have not been coming to my constituency office with this matter. They have many matters of concern to them but I have not had one person come to me making an honest case or complaint about how they have had great trouble when cashing bearer coupons by having someone ask them to supply a social insurance number.

Mr. Ellis: Wait until this is over.

Mr. Martin: Otherwise they might have tax deducted at source. It is not a point that has been brought to my attention at all. I honestly think it is a little unfair that in the case of the person earning minimum wages, or wages for part of the year, we insist on reporting and checking standards. Why not be equally insistent in the case of people who are fortunate enough to be obtaining money through the medium of bond coupons?

This is a problem which really will not exist in the future as far as Canada Savings Bonds go, because they will not have bearer coupons. So we are talking about a problem that is phasing itself out so far as Canada Savings Bonds are concerned.

I do not want to carry on very much longer, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. parliamentary secretary that his allotted time has expired.

I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973, be read the second time and referred to a committee of the whole.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the few remarks I made in the debate on second reading of Bill C-10 just before five o'clock, I tried to make the point that there are some aspects of it which I think should be studied further. If my hon. friend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) looked a bit worried and wondered where I was proceeding in light of what I was saying, I would like to tell her that my purpose was to try to make her realize that this bill is not perfect.

This bill launches out in a new area by using the Income Tax Act not only for the purpose of collecting taxes from Canadians, but for making payments out of income tax collections to those who need them. Although it is new in that it moves into that area and is therefore to be welcomed, no one knows better than the Minister of National Health and Welfare that the Income Tax Act is still full of many loopholes, many opportunities for the rich to profit. If those loopholes could have been plugged, she would not have had to agree to reducing the amount of the family allowance from $26 to $20 a month.

From time to time we have had a good deal to say about the unfairness of the Income Tax Act in terms of what it does for the wealthy. I have two or three statistics here that have been given on previous occasions by members of my party, and I think they make the point.

In 1972, there were 92 Canadians with incomes of $50,000 or more who paid no income tax. They managed to take advantage of the escape clauses and the loopholes in the legislation. In 1973 that number rose to 156. I point out that the situation is getting worse, because in 1974, the last year for which I have this kind of statistic, 252 persons in Canada with incomes of $50,000 or more paid no income tax whatsoever. The average income of those 252 persons was $92,000 and 17 of them made over $200,000.

It is because of that sort of situation in the Income Tax Act that I wish the Minister of National Revenue had had a little more influence with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). It is good what is happening in that a $200 refundable tax credit is being established. As I say, the Income Tax Act is not only being used to take money from persons, but to give money to certain people. A lot more money would be available for the equalization of incomes if the provisions of the Income Tax Act could be tightened up.

One of the discussions in which we take part around this place has to do with whether or not we are making progress. One of the persons who has documented very well the continuing discrepancy in the amount of income received is the Minister of National Health and Welfare herself. I would point out that according to Statistics Canada the distribution of income as between the bottom 20 per cent of income earners and the top 20 per cent has changed very little. In 1951 the bottom 20 per cent received 4.4 per cent of total income earned. The figure fluctuated a bit from 1951 to 1975 when it was down to 4 per cent. In 1976, it was 4.1 per cent. So it may be said, as was said by a member at the foot of the government side the other day, that in terms of dollars the poor now have more than they used to have. But in terms of their percentage of the national pie, they have scarcely moved at all. On the other hand, as opposed to the fact that the bottom 20 per cent received about 4 per cent of the earned income, the top 20 per cent got around 42.8 per cent—the figure went up and down a bit—and in the last year for which I have statistics their share was around 43 per cent.

It is this I had in mind when in the few minutes for which I spoke before five o'clock I said that for all the good there was in the bill now before us there was room for a completely new look at the income tax legislation. I realize this bill is in the name of the Minister of Finance and that I seem to be speaking about it as though it belonged to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. I feel it is more hers than his though, because it does deal with a change in the way in which family allowances are provided.

The other day in the course of another speech I was making, the Minister of National Health and Welfare made an interjection which I did not hear at the time but which I enjoyed very much when I got to the Hansard office and read what she had said. I had suggested that if she made certain improvements in the old age pension she would improve the stock of the Liberal party at the next election and might even become leader of the Liberal party. Her interjection, which I did not hear but which was on the record, was: "Minister of Finance would be okay." In light of the statements she has been making in speeches around the country, and in light of what she has said about loopholes in the Income Tax Act to which I have referred tonight, I would be quite happy if she got that portfolio and pushed to the limit the possibilities there are for equalizing the distribution of income by making changes in the Income Tax Act.

In saying, as I did a moment ago, that if the Income Tax Act were applied on a fair and equitable basis there would be sufficient money for the Minister of National Health and Welfare to have instituted a $200 cash credit without cutting back on the basic amount of the family allowance payments, I implied, and I hope the implication was clear, that in our view this is what ought to have been done. We approve the refundable tax credit idea; it is one we have proclaimed from this part of the House for a long time. But we do not think it is necessary to reduce the basic amount from $26 to $20.

I am aware of all the arguments about people in the middle and upper brackets not needing the money, but I believe many families will notice the difference, especially in the face of rising prices, when they are confronted with this reduction of $6 per child, especially families whose incomes are such that they will not get the $200 tax credit in March or April. We know the reason the minister could not get through the kind of program we would like to see. It was because of the inequities and loopholes that are still present in the Income Tax Act.

Having said all that as an indication of our attitude toward Bill C-10, I should like to say a few things about elements in this measure of which we approve. We note with respect to the family allowances program that universality is being maintained. It is true that the amount everyone will get is reduced, but the program is still to be applied universally. That is the way it was brought in in the first place and that is the form in which it has survived over the years.

There was a time in the parliament of 1968-72 when the government tried to bring in a program bearing the name FISP. It almost got approved but the measure died on the order paper as that parliament ended. The result of the program would have been to destroy the universality of family allowance payments. In the succeeding parliament when the government was in a minority position FISP was thrown out the window and universality was maintained. Despite any shortcomings the bill before us may have, it is continuing the principle of universality and we welcome that.

We welcome also the fact that the principle of indexation is still alive. It may not be well this year, or in 1979, but it is still alive. The basic amount of the family allowance will be cut back in January from $26 to $20 a month, but in 1980 it will be escalated or indexed according to the rise in the cost of living.

It is also a fact that the $200 tax credit is to be indexed annually and that the $18,000 cut-off is to be indexed. I am glad to see the minister nodding her head to confirm that the things I am saying are true. What worries me about this assurance that indexation will continue is that this minister may not always be in her present portfolio and that under another minister it may have less value. We remember how the indexation of family allowances was suspended for a year—the government cancelled it—and now it is being cut back for the second time. So who can be sure that the guarantee of indexing in 1980 or 1981 will be honoured when the time comes? Nevertheless, if there are enough of us here who believe in these things, let us hope universality of social payments and the right of indexation will survive.

I am looking forward to the speech the Minister of National Health and Welfare is going to make tonight, and I hope she will take the same stand with regard to the indexing of family allowances that she took the other day with regard to the indexing of benefits under the Old Age Security Act. If we can have that kind of assurance from her, well, we will have to count on it, but down the road I suspect that these things will still have to be fought for time and time again.

That is something I have learned from experience around this place. No battle ever really stays won. I remember how long and hard we fought to get rid of the means test and to get pensions on a universal basis and when it happened there was really great rejoicing and satisfaction, but after only a decade, or a generation at most, some people were talking about the means test as though it was something that might be employed again.

I am conscious of the long battle we have waged to get the government into our economy for the benefit of all the people the government represents. I am conscious of those years when we were aware of how little the private sector and the free enterprise economy did for our people, but today, when we have many government programs which have made life better in Canada, "privatizing" has become a word which both Liberals and Tories like to mouth in this place. We are aware of the fact that battles which have been won have to continue to be fought.

I welcome the battle that the Minister of National Health and Welfare fought inside the cabinet, even at a time of restraint and cutbacks, not to have a total cutback in the family allowance but to get the kind of program we have before us tonight. It is a fact that although people in the higher middle and upper income brackets will be receiving fewer dollars for their children in that they will get only a $20 a month family allowance, in the case of those where the family income is $18,000 or less there will be, in return for that $6 a month they will lose, a $200 credit in March or April of the succeeding year. That is good. We welcome that, but we think that the principles underlying it must not be forgotten.

We think also that this beginning of the use of the Income Tax Act to make payments to people should be pushed a long way, and the way to push it is to plug some of the loopholes which make it possible, as I have already said, for 252 people in 1974 to make $50,000 a year or more and 17 of them over $200,000 but not pay one cent of income tax. We are reminded of all the various escape clauses there are. If ever a sentence in the Bible was true, it is that one about things being given to those who already have. The income tax seems to be very biblical in that respect.

Before I sit down, and because the Minister of National Health and Welfare is on the list to speak, there are one or two points I hope she might deal with when she gets the floor. I wonder if she will be able to tell us of any discussions she has had with the provinces about these matters. I have two points in mind. On the one hand, when persons have their allowance cut from $26 to $20, does the minister know whether any provinces are likely to make up the difference?

The other side of the story relates to the $200. What is going to happen in March or April of next year when some families get $200 per child? In some cases that will amount to a total of $600 or $800. What will that do to the position of those families which are on welfare or benefiting from any social program in any of the provinces? I realize that this is totally federal legislation, but still there is hardly anything left in this country which does not become the subject of discussion between Ottawa and the provinces.

Then there is one other matter which I hope the minister will have something to say about tonight. I believe reference was made to it this afternoon. I refer to the consumer price index. I welcome the fact that the minister has stood firm and won the continuation of indexation of family allowances as well as pensions, but the recently announced change in the way the consumer price index is made up gives some of us cause for concern. I refer in particular to the downgrading of food as an element in the basket, particularly at a time when Statistics Canada tells us that the cost of food is rising. I believe this month it rose more than in any month for a very long time.

This will affect pensioners and those who depend heavily on family allowances very severely. There is already the feeling, if not the fact, that indexing is always behind and never seems to keep up with rising costs, but if the consumer price index is being revised in a way which will result in even less accurate increases under indexation, that is something which is very serious.

I do not recall whether I have had discussions with this minister during the time she has been in this portfolio on this issue, but certainly I have discussed it with previous ministers of national health and welfare. I refer to the desirability of having a special index for senior citizens or for families. After all, the consumer price index is made up by Statistics Canada on the basis of the Canadian population as a whole, but senior citizens have special needs on which they spend their money, and mothers of families, especially those who are having a difficult time, also have special needs. I realize that the consumer price index is tabulated under the aegies of another minister—it does not come under this minister—but as I recall, at least some of her predecessors have expressed an interest in looking at this, and I wonder if she will tell us whether she has tried to get Statistics Canada to come up with an index which would be appropriate to those who depend on family allowances and to those who are in receipt of old age pensions.

Those are our views respecting this bill. As we have said several times, it is good that in this time of restraint, which we think is false, uneconomic and turning the country the wrong way, one minister has been able to bring about some progress, and in that sense we welcome this bill. It will have our support, but we shall keep on pressing for the changes which ought to be made in the Income Tax Act to get rid of those loopholes so there will not be so much leakage and there will be more money for distribution to those who need it, whether we are talking about senior citizens or about families.

We are also glad that provision is being made for the $200 per child to be given to mothers in the spring. We will go along with the technical arrangements which are necessary to make that possible. We heard some explanation of that this afternoon from the Minister of Finance, and I look forward to hearing from the Minister of National Health and Welfare tonight. I hope she will deal with some of the points I have raised, and I hope she might even go so far as to make the commitment that, if she ever does become Minister of Finance, she will do something about the gross inequities in the Income Tax Act.

[Translation]

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, like my colleagues, I am pleased to participate in this debate.

We are now studying a bill to reduce from $25 to $20 the family allowances paid for every child. This bill also proposes to grant a tax credit of up to $200 for every child in families whose income does not exceed $18,000 a year. In addition, any family with earnings of up to $46,000 a year and at least seven children under 18 years of age could also claim tax credits to be indexed annually, according to the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

That new program is, of course, a positive step towards the redistribution of wealth among the middle class who are always the first to bear the brunt of the economic problems we have had to face in the last decade. Through this new system of tax credits, we are getting away from the situation where family allowances existed for all families. Their purpose was to encourage demographic progress in the country and, in addition, to give substantial financial assistance to large families.

Naturally, with the new system based on the redistribution of wealth, many families will lose that financial aid. In addition, the new measures, which the people do not understand too well, will surely create a nightmare for our bureaucracy. Let us just imagine, Mr. Speaker, all the confusion that will arise in the income tax returns. Many interested parties have pointed out that millions of women who have no income, and consequently do not file income tax returns, will now have to change their habits.

It also appears that everyone qualifying for tax credits will have to file a separate income tax form, which means that in a single income family where the breadwinner is the father or the husband, the wife or mother will have to send in her own income tax form. And what about the problems of separated couples and the incomes of dependent children? It looks like it is going to be an absolute administrative mess. Revenue Canada will have to check over two million additional income tax forms, make sure that all statements filed by husbands and wives agree, scrutinize all enclosures, income adjustments and required documents.

Mr. Speaker, I am happy I do no work in the Department of National Revenue because I am sure several people in that department will have a big headache next spring. I also expect a full scale publicity campaign will be necessary to inform the public about these changes. All in all, I think I would rather work in a publicity agency than in the Department of National Revenue. Maybe these agencies will pull the big buck out of this mess.

Mr. Speaker, we must not forget that benefits from family allowances decrease as income goes up since they are taxable. The tax credit granted until now, $50 for each child, does not help the poorest families since they do not pay income tax nor the more affluent ones since they can accumulate that credit in the form of a tax rebate not exceeding $500.

We must not forget that families in the poorest category depend upon family allowances as a substantial source of income and that with these new provisions they will now be forced to wait for the payment of the tax credit which will be paid, presumably only once a year. The tax credit will not be paid automatically, as it is now. That will therefore result in the poorest families being even more dependent upon provincial social welfare, thus increasing the provincial burden in that area. So the cost of providing for our children will no longer be used as criterion, but the family income level will.

I think the proposed provisions are somewhat premature because their consequences have not been cleared up. This measure has been widely criticized because of the difficulty to implement the system and of the administrative costs which will be incurred. Also, we should not forget that those funds come from the unemployment insurance cuts which were announced and which will deprive some 250,000 to 300,000 unemployed of the benefits.

Mr. Speaker, on September 14, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said in a speech in St. John's, Newfoundland, and I quote:

It should be clearly understood that these benefits are directed towards those people who have immediate needs.

Mr. Speaker, I am terribly surprised because if the government is really aware of the fact that the needs of many persons and families who find it terribly difficult to make both ends meet are immediate, why did they change the family allowances program so that those families will have to wait for one whole year before receiving the new tax credits?

In the same speech, the minister added the following, I quote:

Finally, we must define the new measures in light of our economy; the formula should encourage people to work and stimulate our productivity.

● (2032)

Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us how we can encourage somebody to work when we have the highest unemployment rate ever seen and when our economy is very weak? Why this relentlessness to make a scapegoat of the small earner?

Before concluding, Mr. Speaker, I must establish clearly that the bill before us is creating a certain ambiguity with respect to the term "family income". On what criteria is it determined? On the income of one spouse, of both spouses, of both spouses and their children, of separated or divorced spouses? I think this point should be clarified. In order to solve the problem of family allowances, it would be in the best interest of the government to consider as an alternative the abolition of tax deductions and an increase in family allowances.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to speak tonight in this House of what I also believe to be the most fundamental reform, and I would like to correct the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) who suggested this afternoon that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was exaggerating when he said this afternoon, in introducing his bill, that this was a most important reform. He did not say that it was the only reform undertaken by the government in the last ten years, but rather that it was the most significant social policy reform that this House had seen in at least ten years, if not more.

This reform is directed towards Canadian children. It appears to me most important and appropriate that we study this legislation immediately after a bill which considerably increases our senior citizens' share of the national income. These are the two most vulnerable ages in periods when economic restraint must be imposed more strictly than we would want.

In Canada, in the year and two months since I have been responsible for the national health and welfare portfolio, I have noticed, and I think it is important to indicate this to the people of this country, that it is as easy to mobilize public opinion in favour of our senior citizens as it is difficult to mobilize the same public opinion over what should be done to ensure that the children of this country, who are the number one human resource of a nation, receive their rightful share in the government's social policies and income distribution schemes. I will say a few words about that later in dealing with two issues raised by the official critic of the New Democratic Party, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), concerning the universality and the indexing of family allowances.

It is a great pleasure for me to speak, as a minister whose mandate is in part to ensure that poverty in Canada is eradicated, if at all possible, or at least decreased. This bill is in fact, let us not deny it, a redistribution proposal.

● (2042)

[English]

If one studies the bill proposed by my colleague the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), one must face the fact that this project, which is the most fundamental reform in social policies of the last decade, basically is a project which touches upon redistribution. Therefore, it will hurt some Canadians and it will help others. Why did we do that, who are these people, and in what order of magnitude was the reform conducted, are questions which should be answered in the House tonight.

I should like to direct my attention to a few points made by the two opposition members who spoke this afternoon and tonight. If we speak of redistribution, we speak of poverty. I was surprised to hear the hon. member for St. John's East making a grand, general speech about poverty in Canada. His speech was full of wrong statistics. As he said, the Conservative party is against poverty. My party is against poverty, and so is every Canadian.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: We asked him how much money he and his party would attach officially to the children of Canada, but he never answered that. He did not answer that question because the Conservative party is split down the middle, still discussing whether it is in favour of universality of family allowance. We on this side know where we stand; we favour the right of every child in this nation to receive family allowance.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: We have decided to correct some of the injustices of the socioeconomic system vis-à-vis families by adding to the basic universal family allowance a special new cheque, an annual one in the amount of $200 per child. That cheque will go to all families below a certain income. That is what we are proposing. In other words, we decided to put together the best of selectivity and universality.

The hon. member for St. John's East also mentioned that the number of poor in Canada had not decreased. That is not true. The social programs which were devised in the sixties have decreased the total number of poor in Canada. The total number has not been decreased enough, but there has been a consistent fight against poverty. He said that approximately 20 per cent of Canadians are poor. In order to correct the record, let me indicate that 20 per cent of Canadians share 4 per cent to 5 per cent of the wealth, but of that percentage, half of them are really poor.

If the hon. member wants to talk about poverty, he should refer to a few more of the facts rather than just generalities. He did not tell Canadians that it is not fashionable to talk about poverty today because there is no longer visible, flagrant poverty in Canada. People no longer really suffer from malnutrition as they did when I was a teacher 20 years ago. People no longer suffer from the effects of unacceptable housing conditions. Poverty is far more difficult to fight. It is far more difficult to sell to Canadians the fact that poverty should be put on the map of urgent problems to tackle because it has gone underground and has become less apparent.

The usual criteria used to define a certain neighbourhood or certains quarters of cities as being poor areas have changed. It is more difficult to use the usual criteria. The hon. member for St. John's East did not acknowledge that at all. He repeated that Canada was in an economic mess. We on this side believe in Canada. We do not believe Canada is in a mess at all. In the last ten years the income of the average Canadian has increased by 25 per cent. This is in constant dollars, which means that I am taking into account the inflation which has existed over the years. Our wealth, incomes, the goods to which we have access have increased by 25 per cent, as evidenced by improvement in the physical environment of our homes. Increased standards have been passed on to everyone, including the poor in Canada. Their hopes and aspirations have naturally increased. If a list of the basic goods a poor family possesses today was produced by a social worker, it would be quite different from what it was in the past. I hope it would include such things as television sets. Of course, television sets would not have been included in such a list back in the sixties, because total wealth, hopes and aspirations were not at the level they are today.

Also the hon. member referred to the fifteenth report of the Economic Council of Canada. He quoted figures in an attempt to prove the total number of families living in poverty has increased tremendously. They have not increased, they have decreased, especially if we refer to statistics in proportion to the total population of Canada. I should like to refer to the fact that the incidence of poverty has declined from 1971 to 1975, the period referred to by the hon. member as the one in which poverty increased. That illustrates and provides us with points of reference when we talk of social policy and poverty in the country.

I should like to refer to the social policy budget of the government. Approximately 15 years ago, that budget was roughly 12 per cent of the total budget of the Canadian nation. The Department of National Defence received the biggest share of all federal government expenditures. The social portion of the national budget for 1978 amounts to 33 per cent. So when the hon. member says that the share which goes to people in need has decreased, that is not so. It has increased tremendously.

● (2052)

I would also remind the hon. member that if the total number of poor families and people on welfare decrease in Canada, of course the total number of welfare payments will decrease. Although the hon. member may have made his speech in good faith, his erroneous assertions regarding poverty do not demonstrate where the Conservative party stands regarding family allowances and child benefits.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I wish it were possible to illustrate in this House this graph showing distribution of benefits for children in Canada. It shows who gets what in Canada regarding child benefits and I am sure it will answer the points made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Families with children benefit from those programs in three different ways. If I were to ask the person on the street what tax benefits a family receives from children the first thing to come to mind would be the family allowance, the monthly cheque to the mother of $25.68. There are two more very important benefits which accrue to families that have children. The graph illustrating these benefits will show very clearly that those who do not pay income tax, who are by definition poor and in need of help, receive only one of the three benefits, and that is the family allowance. They do not pay income tax on the family allowance because it does not put them in a category that is high enough that they must pay income tax. As soon as the family begins to pay income tax, it loses a portion of its family allowance, but gains from the other two programs, the hidden benefits, for which the poor do not qualify.

One of the hidden benefits is the $50 exemption per child, a feature which was introduced into the system just two years ago. The other tax exemption is the child exemption of $460 per child. These three benefits combined, taking into account the fact that family allowances are taxable, benefit basically the middle class and the rich. The middle class could be a family of four children with yearly earnings amounting to $30,000. This family and the rich family receive the family allowance. But they also benefit from two hidden tax privileges. People do not think of the two tax deduction benefits because they are more or less hidden benefits. This is something we want to correct.

The ideal, of course, would be to replace exemptions with credits and not to make reductions in family allowances. However, at the introduction of this program there was not enough money and, therefore, the family allowances were slightly reduced each month to create that credit. We also decided to cancel one of the two tax exemptions, the small $50 tax credit. The official critic for the NDP is right when he says that the system is not perfect and that the reform does not go all the way. To go all the way would have meant the cancellation of both tax privileges because by their very nature they favour those who pay taxes.

We had to settle for what can be called a Canadian compromise. One thing that was certain was that we could not totally withdraw from those families those benefits in these difficult times. We decided to propose reform in a gradual fashion, cancelling only one of the two tax exemptions, the smaller one, and keeping the bigger exemption which favours so many families. By doing this we protected the middle class families with children, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has repeated often that it is the middle class who will pay the price for this new tax credit.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I do want to stress that this tax reform we are talking about now is now being carried out on the backs of middle-class people. Middle-class people—and I wish I could show this graph which I will be distributing to all my colleagues in this House—continue to benefit from the three child benefits in the Canadian system, namely the taxable family allowance even in its reduced form, the new tax credit, and the $460 tax exemption that the father or the mother deducts each year on his or her tax return.

With the new system middle-class people continue to be the great beneficiaries of a large number of child programs. On the other hand, upper-class people who were receiving a lot clearly come down in the graphic representation of the redistribution. And poor families who do not pay taxes because they will be receiving that cheque which is not taxable and will be sent directly to mothers or the person having the legal custody of the child come up a great deal but will not be the ones benefiting the most; it will continue to be the middle-class people, but they will come way up in the redistribution graph. So it is not perfect but it is not being carried out on the backs of middle-class people. I want to insist on that. It is rather important because middle-class people do represent the majority families in any society and they have the feeling that is it very difficult to make ends meet, so I want to explain that quite clearly.

[English]

Now, there are many things we could have added to this reform, the first fundamental change to child benefits in our country since family allowances were introduced in 1945. Despite the tripling of family allowances and their indexation a few years ago, there would be lots more to say about what needs to be done for children and what this program is all about; but I think the committee of the whole will permit us to discuss these things in detail.

• (2102)

Permit me to make one point, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

I will say it in French. I want to say to all hon. members of this House and to Canadians that when the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) raises a scarecrow, namely that with this bill we are going to break the rather strict confidentiality of the tax system, I say to him that he is dead wrong.

[English]

The only thing the hon. member said that had anything to do with the bill was very simple but so untrue. I want to make it clear. I do not know how to put it in English, but he was using the illustration of the false man you put in a field—

An hon. Member: A straw man.

An hon. Member: A scarecrow.

Miss Bégin: Yes, a scarecrow. He was scaring people by saying this bill had something significantly dangerous in it; that we are going to introduce a breach of the confidentiality of the tax system. He then went on with an incredible statement which makes me wonder if he ever saw poor people in his life. He asked about the man who will have to declare the money he makes to his wife. That is a bit strange, Mr. Speaker, for usually in poor families when there is $200 per child, non-taxable, ready to go to mothers at the beginning of the year at tax time, people are not going to play games with each other. In any event, these people do not make enough money to start hiding it. When husbands hide money from their wives, usually they make good money. With my common sense, I know that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Miss Bégin.]

Miss Bégin: So the comment about breach of confidentiality does not make much sense. If he wants to be technical and really maniacal about the sacrosanct confidentiality of the Income Tax Act, I can tell him there will be a one-page form included with the family allowance cheque in January which in most cases will go to mothers. This form can be filled out by the father or mother. If the father does not want to tell the mother how much he earns, she can sign the form and he can fill it in and send it. That should satisfy the breach of confidentiality charge. The hon. member must be surrounded by very wealthy people. In ordinary social classes, especially in poor families, people know what money they make. They also know what they make when they work on the weekend as waiters in hotel bars or whatever sideline it is they find to make ends meet. Everybody knows approximately what they make when they are poor. The hon. member is just raising a problem that does not exist for poor Canadians, those of whom we are speaking tonight.

My colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked for my views on universality. I have already spoken on this earlier tonight. He also asked me about indexation. I regret that to create the bank of money needed to start the new annual cheque for mothers, we would have to add to the "pot" the indexation of 1979. That is really what we did. We put in that bank all the money we could because we knew Canadians would not agree to pay more taxes and that there was no other source of funds than shifting benefits within the existing system, making it more fair and equitable.

I regret that the indexation for this year has gone but I am very pleased that full indexation will be on the books for the new benefit, the ceiling at which a family can claim that benefit, and for the family allowance as well. I want to make it clear that indexation is provided for in the future.

Referring to the CPI, Mr. Speaker, and to a more proper measure of the increased cost of living, the only thing I can say tonight is that I will look into it and hope to be ready to answer questions during committee of the whole discussion. But I do not have anything to say that would help the debate at this point.

I should like to speak now of a few practical aspects of the new child tax credit. Some have said it is just unacceptable that the poor would suddenly get a huge sum of money once a year when they do not know how to spend $10. I am sure that is not true. I am not sure that mothers of good, wealthy families know how to spend money better than poor people.

Another fact about which I want to speak is the possible budgeting problem of families with an annual benefit versus several monthly benefits or benefits given through several instalments. I want to say to the House that this new benefit will use the tax machinery. This is the first time that the tax system will be used to deliver benefits to people. That is why we give it that funny name—the refundable child tax credit, although it is a cheque sent to mothers. It goes through the tax system and because of that this machinery has been set up only for annual deliveries. In future years it will be important to monitor what is best for, and what is wanted by, mothers.

In 1979 when the program is introduced it will work this way. In January a form will be sent to mothers along with the first reduced family allowance cheque. By the end of January all Canadian mothers will get $20 per child per month. Mothers in need, mothers on welfare, mothers in receipt of mothers' allowance, will, of course, be entitled to the new tax credit. It is they who will need it most and need it most urgently.

During January, February and March, the time at which the cheques will start being delivered to families, there will be a relative loss in the family allowances. For families in need with more than three children, this may be a practical problem but not for other families. This bothers me a great deal but there was no other way to introduce the system at a given point in time. So this is the loss we have to live with in order to gain much more.

The Minister of Finance gave the amount of these net gains. They are huge gains—gains for people in provinces as wealthy as Alberta, with its rapidly growing economy but where there are 43,000 poor families who will benefit from money that now goes to the richer families of Alberta and coming from all Canadian taxpayers, to the extent that about a $5 million net gain will go to Alberta in 1979. This takes into account the reductions in family allowances. This is very significant. In Ontario I think the reductions and the redistribution between families will offset each other. In other words, the poorer the provinces, the bigger the transfer payments, for we are now talking of the equivalent of a new transfer payment to individuals.

I was speaking of the real problem of family budgeting which may arise for the two first months of this year. I do not know of any solution to it. If hon. members have some solutions to suggest I would like to hear from them. As for the future, I do not foresee any problem because mothers will be receiving the $600 or $800 cheque. If they have three or four children, they can put aside a certain amount for monthly budgeting and spend whatever is needed for a down payment or repayment on a fridge, a washing machine or whatever might be needed in the home. Purchases like this ultimately benefit the children.

I acknowledge that problem and we will monitor it to see if the bill will need to be amended in the future or the idea of instalments introduced. We will be able to see what will be the most helpful to those in need. I say to hon. members, let the people concerned tell us what they want. I think it is important to listen to them. They are not well organized and their voices are not usually heard by politicians. Mothers of families are a segment of our society that is not represented by pressure groups. We do not know what they think or want.

It is important that the universality of family allowances be established once and for all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me that question. In all honesty I think members on the other side could agree with me that family allowances, no matter the economic circumstances of a family, are a right, by which the government shows that the nation is responsible for the well-being of all children who, after all, are the best of all its natural resources. That right is not well established in Canadian philosophy, if I may use that word. I have travelled across the country many times. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is always astonished when she discovers she is not the only one who talks to people. We all pretend to be close to people, and we try to be. It is important to discuss with various groups what Canadians want in terms of universality. Universality is established right now, but I point out to Canadians that family allowances, as a program of child benefits, are the weakest element of our social policy, I suggest, in the eyes of those who have economic interests to defend above and before all others. I say this to the House in order to assist and to raise the consciousness of my colleagues, and through television of the Canadian public, to ensure that we continue to see the merit of a universal family allowance. We will add whatever reforms are needed to be certain that in addition to the basic family allowance whatever is required for those in need will be available.

No doubt many other questions will arise. I will conclude by outlining what the prospect will look like for mothers in 1979. By the way, I am very pleased to say that mothers or fathers when they have legal custody of their child or children, will receive the cheque. It may seem strange to always refer to the status of women in this way, but for so many years women did not have their voices heard adequately in this House. I think that all hon. members will realize that every one of the provincial advisory councils on the status of women as well as the federal Advisory Council on the Status of Women recommended that the tax exemption for children be abolished and replaced with a tax credit. The federal Advisory Council on the Status of Women made it known publicly that it was very pleased with the new tax credit. A few other women's groups in Canada also approved of it, but I must admit that most women regretted the small cut we had to make in order to create the new program which, in the final analysis, is an important plus for all Canadian mothers in need, including mothers on welfare, and the Indian mothers who do not even exist as such under the Income Tax Act right now. It also means a great deal to the mothers of the poor families, in other words the working poor, who work but cannot make enough to live above the poverty line. Altogether it will mean an additional $300 million redistributed to Canadian families living below the poverty line, and this is worth quite a fight.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: Mr. Speaker, would the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) be agreeable, with the unanimous consent of the House, to have the draft which she referred to included in today's Hansard?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Agreed and so ordered.

[Editor's Note: For document above referred to, see Appendix "B".]

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I presume that some time later on if the parliamentary secretary wishes to make a speech and make a brilliant addition to Hansard, that will take place. I also look forward to the minister of sports and whatever activities she is pursuing making a speech in this debate. The minister seems a bit ruffled over there and I can understand why. I think it is perhaps more than a little appropriate that this particular item is being debated on Hallowe'en because we have just been treated to a trick or treat presentation by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

An hon. Member: That is a cheap shot.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If she can refer to this legislation, as she did at the outset, as being a revolutionary bill, one of the major pieces of social legislation in the present decade, and then go on to say that in fact there are no serious problems of poverty, that there are really no unacceptable—

Miss Bégin: Was my English that bad?

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am saying your speech was that bad—

Miss Bégin: Read it tomorrow.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the minister is prepared to listen, as I was quite prepared to listen to her, she will learn about some of the weaknesses and misconceptions in the presentation she made. It is regrettable that a Minister of National Health and Welfare should make such an incredible speech. The minister, who is responsible for many who are faced with extreme poverty and hardship in this country, told us in concluding her long statement that there is no poverty or serious housing problems today, as once was the case, that in fact poverty has gone underground. That is merely an indication that the minister has gone underground and has missed the whole point. In some areas a growing hardship exists for people in terms of poverty and housing.

We should not be too surprised at the minister's attitude with respect to housing because the same attitude has been displayed by this government in recent days. The minister talks consistently about a model family consisting of four children. I am not sure how many of these model families the minister is personally acquainted with, but it seems to me that her presentation was naive. Obviously she is not worried about the confidentiality of the tax system being violated. She is not even worried about the social insurance numbers and the way in which they are used and abused by this government, or about the commitments made by previous governments to protect the right to privacy that is part and parcel of the allocation of the social insurance numbers.

It is obvious that this minister has not only lost contact with people who are facing extreme hardship; she seems to have lost contact with those people who could tell her what in fact is going on in this country today.

When she refers to this reform as helping everybody and hurting no one—

Miss Bégin: I said the exact opposite.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That was part and parcel of what the minister was saying. If she wants to rewrite the speech she just presented, I am sure she will be given equal time to do so.

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is impossible to debate in this House. Words are not twisted, but the opposite is said. I just said that if it is going to help a lot of people in need and not cost more taxes, it is going to hurt other people. That is what I said and I want Canadians to know that.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I appreciate these interventions, Mr. Speaker. I am more than willing from time to time for the minister to bob up in her place and make further little points. If she wants to be assured of the serious problem this has created, let me speak specifically on one aspect of the legislation. The minister only briefly touched on it in her concluding remarks. She presented a very distorted report from groups having to do with the status of women.

Frankly, I am shocked that the Minister of National Health and Welfare would come into this House this evening and give the kind of partial reports from the Advisory Council on the Status of Women and other women's groups in terms of their satisfaction with this bill, as if everything is fine and well done by it. If she has read any of her mail or listened to any of her telephone calls, she knows there is a large body of women in this country who are seriously concerned about the initiatives the minister is taking in this legislation and the impact it will have on women in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the minister wants to reply to that, I will be delighted to give her the opportunity to do so. I want to read one brief section from the report of the Economic Council. Perhaps the minister has not had the opportunity to read it. This is found on page 92. It deals with the section having to do with the present unemployment and financial hardship of Canadians and refers specifically to women. I quote:

> The difficulties confronting women, particularly those who are the sole supporters of their families, are manifest. They constitute a growing proportion of the poor. Not only do they lack a complementary source of income, but in most cases they earn substantially less than men. This in turn means that, when unemployed they usually draw proportionately lower over-all insurance benefits even though they face longer periods of unemployment than males. In 1975, unattached males in the labour force received about one-third more total income than did their female counter-parts. Among the male-headed families who experienced unemployment, the average family income in 1975 was nearly $5,000 higher than the income of female-headed families with unemployment.

That is just one recent report from an independent advisory group to this government indicating the severe and increasing plight of women in the work force today. If the minister does not recognize in the legislation that she has had a hand in introducing to this House the serious impact it will create for working women in this society, she had better resign and give her office to someone who will recognize the realities of today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Just in case the minister did not have an opportunity to review some of the events of the past few years in this country, she might want to refresh herself with one committee that was appointed at the end of World War II. In fact, it was during the period of the war at a time when the participation of women in the work force had increased very rapidly, for obvious reasons. In 1939, just prior to World War II, 24.4 per cent of the work force was women. By the end of 1945 it had risen to 33.2 per cent. However, within a period of one year the work force dropped back to 25.3 per cent.

A subcommittee was appointed called the advisory committee on reconstruction, post-war problems of women. It had to do with this very question of the rapid increase of the number of women in the work force and what was likely to take place with respect to their continued employment. Interestingly enough, one of the members of that committee was later a New Democratic Party member of parliament, Grace MacInnis.

The report said very clearly that some steps would have to be taken with regard to the training programs and unemployment insurance benefits. Interestingly enough, a recommendation was made in terms of a family allowance program. I quote from one of the recommendations of the subcommittee:

It was felt that the addition to the family income from children's allowances paid to the mother and by her spent for the welfare of her children may well be an alleviating factor in the mental attitude which may result from the surrender of the double income.

This scheme obviously was to work as an incentive to create more opportunity for some women to provide household care for children under certain kinds of informal day care programs, and for other women who had decided to participate more fully in the paid work force to continue to do so.

The sad fact is that through the introduction of those child care benefits more than 30 years ago, the participation rate dropped in one year from 33.2 per cent to 25.3 per cent. None are so deaf and dumb as those who refuse to learn from the lessons of history.

If the minister does not think that this initiative which she herself describes as being revolutionary today is not going to create a very serious situation for many thousands of presently employed women, she should give very long serious and sober second thought to it. It is obvious that the kind of incentive the minister has built into this tax credit program could in fact create a very serious problem and growing hardship for a number of Canadian women.

In 1978, 48 per cent of all adult Canadian women were in the paid labour force. According to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), speaking to this House some months ago when presenting his budget, one of the immediate problems that confronts the Canadian economy today is the growing number of Canadian women who are working. I quote from his statement on the evening on which he presented his budget:

An important reason for the growth of our labour force has been the growing number of Canadian women who are working. Since 1970 the number of adult women in the labour force has increased from 1.9 million to 2.7 million, a rise of more than 40 per cent.

The Minister of Finance went on to point out that the surge of young people as well as the increased participation of women has created a problem. He did add on that occasion that this surge would not last as there was a growing number of empty desks in the classrooms. What the minister was saying in a kind of code language and what other ministers have said before and since is that there are too many women who want to work outside the home.

One would think that a government which introduced a bill having to do with human rights legislation, advocating fair and equal opportunity for both men and women to participate in the work place and be given equal access to employment and to be given equitable rates of pay, would introduce legislation not to discriminate against women and make it more difficult for there has to be an adjustment in the work place, in concert with the change that has taken place in the complexion of the work force in the last few years.

What do we find? We find a government that has done the reverse. There is a move afoot, certainly in this legislation, to take women out of the work force and to ensure that if women work at all, they will work only in what can be described as the job ghettos. If she earns any kind of a reasonable salary, augmenting a possibly moderate salary earned by her husband, we know what will happen. That family will lose its $200 tax credit, or most of it, the one the government is touting will be of such great assistance, the one the minister has assured us gives us no need to be concerned about the confidentiality of income tax. She said in rather naive language that everybody knows how much money so-and-so is likely making. I wonder what kind of responsibility this minister exercises when she makes this kind of superficial statement.

I am both shocked and disappointed, Mr. Speaker, that the minister could have passed off the whole situation of the impact upon working women in such a cavalier fashion. Furthermore, under the proposed amendments to the act, even if a woman presently working in a low income position decided to improve her over-all skills and gain access to employment at a higher rate of pay and with greater recognition, we know that the minister's colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), has taken steps in concert with the Minister of National Health and Welfare to reduce the training allowance for women who decide to take an upgrading program or a program of training under the Department of Employment and Immigration.

What do we find today? Instead of the equitable training allowance that existed until this past year under which men and women were effectively treated the same in terms of the training allowances available to them, we now have a program introduced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration which is related to unemployment insurance benefits. I certainly do not have to draw a large picture to let the minister know that, by and large, women receive less benefits because they have been in lower paying jobs. Therefore, women taking retraining programs are going to receive a much smaller training allowance.

If she were to respond at this point, I am sure the minister would say that the exception would be those women who have more than four children. The minister has a great time with her model families containing four children or more, but like so much that she says, they are more of a mirage that a reality. The government feels these people should receive additional funding, but what it does not realize, and what the minister does not realize, is that the day and age of the family with four and more children is virtually over. There are 7.2 million children in this country today belonging to 3.6 million families. Those are the figures for families receiving child allowances last year. I would point out that this is an average of two children per family. If the minister wishes to use examples I hope she will stick to those that are relevant to the greater part of the experience of most Canadians.

I would like to turn to another aspect now because it seems to me that what is happening here this evening, and what has been introduced this afternoon by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), cannot be viewed in isolation from actions which are being taken by the minister's colleagues. It seems to me we see quite consistently now from the Minister of Employment and Immigration, from the Minister of Finance, and now sadly and tragically from the Minister of National Health and Welfare, a concerted effort to take women out of the work force and put them in the unenviable position of being increasingly dependent upon their husbands for income. I see this as really trying to turn back the clock.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): This afternoon one of my hon. friends was asking the Minister of Employment and Immigration about the Outreach program. We know—because a memo was circulated to the various manpower offices in the month of September—that the government has decided to eliminate women as one of the special groups for consideration in terms of making extra effort to ensure they have an equal opportunity to gain employment at the present time. The minister circulated the word to as many offices as there are around the country that women will no longer be a part of the target group. In addition, specific programs, such as Women Power, which were making a particular point of dealing with situations where women had special problems finding employment, affording them an opportunity to obtain skilled training and satisfactory employment and incomes, are to be substantially reduced or cut altogether. The government is clearly attempting to lay the burden of unemployment on women to divert the public's attention from its own mismanagement and lack of planning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I think the problem here is that the minister and the government are indulging in old-fashioned, reactionary thinking. There is an assumption basically—

Mrs. Campagnolo: Everybody in this country knows where the Tories stand!

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I am glad to hear the minister is listening to this speech because it is good for her to get some real information. She spends too much time with the wrong people over there, Mr. Speaker. I am glad to know I have her attention. She ought to know about these things because she ought to be concerned about them. The old-fashioned thinking of the government of which she is a part has somehow or other clung to the idea that a woman is an extension of her husband and that a woman's income is just an extension of her husband's income. If the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) refutes this contention, I hope she will get up and say so. I hope she will explain—

Mrs. Campagnolo: It has been explained. You just closed your ears to it.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): That is the weakest refutation of anything I have ever heard in this House, Mr. Speaker. The minister does not even know or is afraid to express what the real opinion has been in the past few weeks—ever since the program was announced in late August—by various women's groups across the country which are extremely concerned about the impact of this legislation on the progress women have been making in terms of their full integration and acceptance into the modern day work force of our country.

An hon. Member: And the minister just laughs.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): If the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) is not concerned about that, she has more problems than the ones she is personally administering under her own jurisdiction.

The suggestion that the computation for the purposes of this tax credit is to be based on family income is bound to be of disservice, bound to be a setback to the right and opportunity of women to participate fully in the work force of this country. What we are arguing is not a woman's right to work but rather her right to be independent and equal. The government has yet to accept the fact that, under the terms of this bill, a woman could be just as helpless with a husband whose income is $50,000 as with one who earns $5,000 if he doesn't support her. There is no reason a woman should lose any of the $200 tax rebate because, for instance, her husband makes $30,000 and she makes $5,000 and a bit more.

What about the actual mechanisms of the tax credit itself? We know that on December 1 family allowances would have increased from $22 to roughly $28 at the end of the year. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) talked about a $26 figure, but it would have gone to $28, as I understand it. This means that if the bill is passed, as I assume it will be, the figure will be rolled back to $20, which will mean a loss of $96 per child next year.

Who will receive the full benefit of the tax credit? Certainly not the poor alone, as was implied by the minister. Some proportion of it—we do not know how much—will wind up in hands of those with higher incomes, in the hands of families who have the money to take maximum advantage of their registered retirement savings plans, home ownership tax benefits, you name it. I say this because income is defined as income after deductions, and I would refer the minister to clause 122 of the Income Tax Act.

Again, we have a bill which to some extent will still penalize the poor, discriminate against women and add to the coffers of the rich in some instances—how many we do not know.

From another standpoint the minister is almost advocating a reproach to men and women which one would quite frankly regard as being immoral. I say this because a woman who decides to enter into a partnership with a man outside marriage will not be penalized under this legislation. If a man and a woman want to live together, and I have heard it happens on occasion, and they have children, there is no obligation under that arrangement for there to be any computation of family income. That applies only in the case where a legal marriage is entered into. I trust the minister is not advocating a new and sophisticated form of tax avoidance, but certainly with this kind of legislation there is that possibility.

● (2142)

Why, then, does the government see fit to impose penalties on a woman because she is married? Recently the Human Rights Commissioner, Gordon Fairweather, formerly a distinguished member of parliament who sat on this side of the House, made a statement which I think represents an important instruction for this government. He said, and I quote:

> I would be unhappy about a formula based on marriage. You know, we are over the days whether women have a right to work or not. 3.5 million women in this country work, and a quick answer would be that if a formula for eligibility is based merely on marital status, I think it is contrary to the Canadian Human Rights Act. Women have the right to work and marital status in itself should not be used as an excuse for a different formulation.

I wonder if the minister has yet had a chance to read those comments which the Commissioner of Human Rights recently made.

I want also to quote the Advisory council on the Status of Women because the minister made the statement that the advisory council was only a little bit unhappy about a minor matter and had no substantial objection to the legislation introduced by the minister. The Advisory Council on the Status of Women has stated, and I quote:

> Until Canadian women enjoy full economic equality within marriage, it is very important that no new measure be introduced that will further erode the independent financial position of married women. A joint taxation system would have the effect of reducing the independent financial security of married women who have personal sources of income.

Miss Bégin: Read what they said about this bill.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I hope the minister will read everything the advisory council said, and I hope she will present a fair and balanced presentation of the council's case to this House and not the one-sided and misinformed presentation she presented a few moments ago. I am really quite shocked that in her remarks the minister dealt in such a cavalier way with willingness to seek disclosure of income. I have always thought that that was regarded on both sides of this House as one of the things which should not be violated but should be held as sacrosanct. That is not so with this government and certainly not with this minister.

If we accept the basis of family income which is enshrined in this bill, what will that mean for future legislation? What bearing will that have on such legislation as amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act? What is next? Will Manpower centres soon be policing married women whose husbands are making more than $18,000 or $20,000 a year and telling them that, because their husbands are making that much money, they have no right to come into a Manpower office to seek work? Is that the implication? Is that the direction in which this minister is heading? Is that the kind of co-ordination there will be between the minister's initiative in this bill and that of her colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration?

There are other problems with this legislation as well. For instance, child-placing agencies presently receive family allowance payments for children under their care. Since that is to be reduced—indeed, frozen—these agencies immediately stand to lose $4.2 million as a result of these proposed changes, and unless there is some offsetting measure taken by the federal government, the provinces will have to make up the difference. That approach by this federal government has become all too common.

I want to make one or two other brief comments because I think the minister is getting at least some of my message. It seems to me that the minister has badly misled us by suggesting in one instance that this bill will save an enormous amount of money and that there will be a more equitable spreading of available funds to those who need them most. There was certainly no indication in the charts either minister presented that that is necessarily the case. I do believe that the intervention both ministers have made through this legislation will have a major impact, but it may not be the one which the ministers have outlined to us here today. It seems to me this is a major change in government policy.

This is the first instance, as has been said here, of the use of negative income tax at the federal level. It is a very striking departure, no matter what the Minister of National Health and Welfare says, from the long standing tradition of universality in the family allowance system. We are concerned about these measures. We would like to be as assured as the minister seemed to be in her presentation that the results will be all good with almost no bad; but unless the minister or some of her colleagues can be a great deal more convincing about the impact there will be on hundreds of thousands of women presently in the work force, even though we support this legislation we will be gravely concerned about its effects in that regard.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, just before the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald) began his remarks the House was asked to give its unanimous consent for the production of a chart showing figures with respect to the poor in Canada. The hon. member then said that I should get up and make a speech. I am delighted that I now have the opportunity to speak to maritimers, and I have television aiding me here tonight.

I am sure some of the hon. member's constituents have been able to watch the supercilious attack he made on the character of the minister tonight. That attack had nothing to do with the bill. The hon. member talked about unemployment. He was all over the court. I have the impression that somewhere along the line he has come back into the good graces of his leader and has been made official critic regarding the performing arts. He certainly was on stage tonight, and he certainly was performing.

We know that the hon. member has for some time been a man of the cloth, and while I would not be prepared to say he was lying tonight, he was certainly stretching the truth with some of the things he had to say.

The hon. member for Egmont spoke about tonight being Hallowe'en. We suggest that he take off his mask because his performance was really not like him. He was out of character tonight, and I am sure that on reflection tomorrow and after reading what he said tonight he will find that there is egg on his face, he being the hon. member for Egmont.

I should have thought that the hon. member would at least have said "thank you" on behalf of Prince Edward Islanders who have benefited greatly from the millions of dollars which have been pumped into that province through DREE and Manpower. Money has been pumped in to the tune of about 75 cents on the dollar.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): I will lend you my fiddle.

Mr. Harquail: He had nothing to say about farmers' wives who will be receiving benefits through the progressive and modern legislation which our minister has the courage to introduce. She has convinced her colleagues in cabinet to approve these measures. Notwithstanding that, we are faced with inflation, restraint and cutbacks. The minister has been successful, and we should congratulate her for that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: I am convinced that there is not a positive bone in the body of the hon. member for Egmont. He thought he could use this occasion to become a champion of the cause of the women of Canada, but at their expense. He mentioned his former colleague, the chairman of the Human Rights Commission, who is the distinguished former member for Fundy-Royal, Mr. Gordon Fairweather. The hon. member brought everything before us but the facts.

We have just witnessed a provincial election in one of the maritime provinces. In that election the Tories criticized the federal government with respect to equalization. Let us stop and consider that this bill will increase equalization payments to the maritime provinces. The hon. member did not comment on that, which proves my earlier point that he was far from the truth in his remarks. He certainly was not listening when the minister told us that we are now spending more in social services than we are on defence. We have arrived at a significant point in this country, through the efforts of this government. This government has made other progressive moves in terms of assistance to the unemployed and in terms of other social service programs.

Many social service measures have been brought in over the last number of years by this government. Let us remember that 33 per cent of the budget of this government is spent on social services. The hon. member had the audacity tonight to say some of the things he said about the minister. The truth of the matter is—

• (2152)

Mr. Nystrom: He is a Tory.

Mr. Harquail: I suppose we are supposed to excuse him for this. The fact of the matter is that we have a champion for women in the House in the person of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin).

Miss MacDonald: Some champion.

Mr. Harquail: Whether or not he admits it or whether or not I have to say it, the fact is that by her actions, her leadership and her efforts what she has been able to accomplish for the women of Canada puts her in that category.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Harquail: These are the facts before us tonight. Since he was not interested in putting the facts on the table—some facts with respect to Canada's poor—let me state the following. The population of poor numbers three million and is roughly composed of the following: 50 per cent of the poor are families with children; 25 per cent are elderly; single women represent 55 per cent of the elderly; and 25 per cent are young, single people and couples.

Let me put forward some facts on families with children. There are approximately 3.6 million Canadian families with children less than 18 years old; 7.2 million children are under the age of 18, 900,000 are 16 or 17 years old, and 6.3 million are under the age of 16.

Let me also put forward some facts on the current federal child benefit system. The current federal child benefit system consists of family allowances. In child tax exemptions, $25.68 is allowed per child, $460 per annum is allowed for each child under 16 years of age, $840 is allowed for children 16 and 17 years of age, and a tax reduction of $50 per child was added to the federal tax reduction.

Consider the scare tactics which are typical of what we have heard from opposition members both inside and outside the House and across the country, as well as the scare tactics we have witnessed this afternoon from another maritimer, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), who did not take the opportunity to say anything positive about what we are discussing here tonight but put up a straw-man and brought forward false facts and information. Who did these people think they were kidding?

I pointed out earlier the number of dollars that have been directed by this government to help Canadians, and in this case in particular to help mothers and families and assist them through increased family allowance payments. Surely members opposite would have enough decency and honesty within them to stand up and say that they appreciate that type of assistance, especially in those provinces which are in the category of have-not provinces from which both members I mentioned come and which they represent. I refer to the hon. member for St. John's East and the hon. member for Egmont. That hon. member made no mention of assistance which will be given to farmers' wives and he had nothing to say about the benefits which the island from which he comes will enjoy. After listening to him speak tonight I wondered where he came from. Is he from Alberta or British Columbia? Whom does he represent? I am sure one thing that will be clear from the performance of the hon. member for Egmont tonight is that he qualifies for some sort of prize in the performing arts, which has more to do with the Halowe'en evening tonight.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, before speaking to the bill before us, I wonder if I could take this opportunity first to make some general comments. This is my first speech in the House, and, first of all, it behooves me to thank hon. members on all sides of the House for the kindness they have shown me this past week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: It is great to first join an institution when the river is still running, which allows you time to catch up. So I want to thank a lot of people for throwing me a few lifelines and offering me the odd skiff so I can get across.

Now I should like to take the opportunity, if I may, Mr. Speaker, to pay tribute to my colleague and friend, the former member of parliament from Rosedale, Mr. Macdonald. Mr. Macdonald represented the riding of Rosedale from 1962 until last spring, when he resigned. He was a friend of people in all sections of Rosedale, and indeed he was a friend of the people in the city of Toronto. During the time I held office as mayor of Toronto there were many times when we had to deal with the quarters of power in Ottawa and we found that we could do so more swiftly when we could make a call to Mr. Macdonald.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: Often when that call was made we found that, when the constituency demanded, the service was there.

I should like to make one final comment which might seem odd. I should like to pay tribute to the Liberal candidate in the riding of Rosedale in the last by-election. Yesterday morning I received a letter from my wife which was sent by Dr. John Evans to my son. It is not generally known that during the last week of the by-election campaign my son was hospitalized, which caused considerable distress to both my wife and myself. Although this was not generally known, it was known to Dr. Evans. Dr. Evans did not say anything to me but he wrote a letter to my son. This demonstrated once again, it seems to me, that Liberal though he may be, he is a gentleman with a touch of class.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: It appears, Mr. Speaker, that I have only about one minute left in which to introduce my comments on Bill C-10. What I would like to do now is to indicate that I would be happy if the House and you, Mr. Speaker, would grant me the opportunity tomorrow to speak about two nations. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, about two weeks ago, on October 17, I heard with some surprise the hon. member for Ottawa West (Mr. Francis) rise to ask the following question of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien):

Is the government considering amendments to the formula for grants in lieu of taxes to the city of Ottawa to compensate for the loss of tax revenue due to vacant office space as a result of moving public servants out of the city?

I say that I heard that question with some surprise because I raised that same question about four years ago. It is an issue in my riding that touches on the administration of the municipality of Surrey where we have a major federal installation, the Fraser River harbour commission, which does not pay taxes or grants in lieu of taxes. So when the hon. member for Ottawa West raised this issue in the House, I perked up my ears and said to myself: here we have another deathbed repentance. Now that the hon. member is in trouble in Ottawa, all of a sudden he has become interested in the core of Ottawa and he wants to do something for the people. The Minister of Finance in answer said the following:

Mr. Speaker, I had the occasion to discuss this problem with the mayor of Ottawa. We are looking at the problem at this time.

It cheered the cockles of my heart considerably to realize that the government was doing something about it, so I rose to ask the question myself a few minutes later, and I quote from page 168 of Hansard as follows:

I refer specifically to the Fraser River harbour commission in Surrey. Is the minister entertaining an investigation of other federal installations across Canada, and does the government plan to pay grants in lieu of taxes in respect of facilities outside the national capital region?

To which the Minister of Finance replied:

● (2202)

Mr. Speaker, I am looking into this question and will be discussing it again with the government. We will look not only at the properties of the government in the national capital region, but also at all properties across Canada.

That was said two weeks ago. In looking at the problem over the past four years, I realize I am not the only member who has raised this question. It was raised by the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). On February 20, 1978, as reported at page 3046 of Hansard, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton said the following:

The promise is not new. On December 20, 1976, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) replied to the mayor of the city of Ottawa by indicating that effective action was being taken.

That occurred approximately eight months ago. We are still looking for that effective action. As reported at page 3047 of Hansard, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton went on to say:

Two years ago he responded to it by indicating the legislation was forthcoming.

That raised our curiosity level even more. On January 27 the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) said the following:

—my colleague, the Minister of Finance, will be dealing with this question in the very near future.

He went on to say:

—the announcement made by the Minister of Finance will be followed through in the very near future. I would prefer to have him deal with this question when he is in the House.

Looking back a little further, the former hon. member for Ottawa Centre, Mr. Hugh Poulin, who is now a judge, as reported at page 412 of Hansard said the following:

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in correspondence with the mayor of the city of Ottawa, has indicated that the Grants in Lieu of Taxes Act will be amended during the life of this parliament.

[Mr. Friesen.]

Unless the Prime Minister has some strange schemes going for this parliament which we are not aware of, he had better act in a hurry because there is not much life left in this parliament.

Mr. Halliday: There is not much life left in this government.

Mr. Friesen: The hon. member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday) is dead right. I do not mean to pun on that word.

This is a very serious problem. The government is aware that the national capital region has a problem. In the past few years they have made sure there were office buildings in the city of Hull and that there were vacant ones in the city of Ottawa. That robs Ottawa of business tax. Now that problem has been created, perhaps the government will realize problems exist all across Canada as a result of this particular policy and the failure of the federal government to deal with this important matter.

In the municipality of Surrey there is one federal installation. The municipality reckons that Surrey loses $200,000 a year from an installation which is making money. At present, legislation does not call for that installation to pay taxes or grants in lieu of taxes. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that he plans to bring forward legislation in the life of this parliament to deal with that problem.

I hope the parliamentary secretary has a concrete assurance to give us tonight. I hope he will deal with this so that municipalities providing services, proper roads, sewage and water facilities to these installations also will have the benefit of either grants in lieu of taxes or the taxes. I trust the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) will have something to say on this.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen) asked in the House on October 17 if the government plans to pay grants in lieu of taxes in respect of its facilities outside the national capital region. He went on to inquire whether the government is examining the status of the property of the Fraser River harbour commission in Surrey, British Columbia.

The government's system of grants in lieu of taxes is a national system which applies in all parts of Canada, and not just within the national capital region as suggested. Payments on departmental property are made under the Municipal Grants Act. This is a 1951 statute which was last amended in 1957. As the Minister of Finance indicated in this chamber on October 17, the government has been giving some thought to a number of issues which, it can be appreciated, exist in a statute of this age. As the statute now stands, it brings considerable benefits to municipalities in all parts of Canada.

In this regard, I might note that total payments to British Columbia local governments and the province itself in respect of property in municipally unorganized territory are expected to reach about $15 million in the present fiscal year. The district of Surrey receives grants in lieu on various departmental properties. The grant for the 1977 taxation year was $147,804. No application has yet been received for 1978.

● (2207)

In so far as the Fraser River harbour commission is concerned, the property which they administer is not departmental property and is specifically excluded from the provisions of the Municipal Grants Act. The government does not contemplate that properties of this kind would be brought within a revised Municipal Grants Act within the foreseeable future because the various harbour commissions are joint, intergovernmental bodies. In many cases, they administer lands belonging to different levels of government.

It would seem somewhat anomalous for the federal government to establish a policy with respect to those lands under a port commission's jurisdiction which are federal, unless the same policy is to apply to the non-federal lands. However, this would raise a question as to why the federal government should establish a policy that would have very direct implications for the other governments involved, be they municipalities or provinces. In these circumstances, the government has decided to leave the matter of future grant policy to each port commission. It is hoped that this will result in the negotiation of arrangements which will be in the best interests of all concerned.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS—SUPPLYING OF ARMS TO SOUTHERN AFRICA—POSITION TAKEN BY GREAT BRITAIN

Mr. Stan Schumacher (Palliser): Mr. Speaker, the question I put to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) yesterday was concerned with Great Britain's involvement in the supplying of arms and munitions to certain African states in high tension areas where such "aid" can only result in further violence and bloodshed. I wanted to know particularly whether the Canadian government has commented in any way to the United Kingdom with regard to this volatile situation, and the minister replied rather lamely in the negative. This does appear to be a case of silence being consent.

At any rate, the government does not appear to object to Britain involving herself in these African atrocities in precisely the same manner as the Russians and the Cubans, placing modern weaponry in the hands of tribal warriors whose main goal these days seems to be to kill anyone who disagrees with them, or even anyone they suspect might disagree with them.

It is a dangerous game, one which the communists have been playing for a long time in Africa and elsewhere. Britain and, by association, other members of the Commonwealth would be most unwise to get into this lopsided chess game at which the Russians are past masters. In that part of the world today, Britain is sadly outnumbered and it is foolhardy to think that sending a few guns—though in this case it is much more serious because we are talking about surface-to-air missiles and other such pieces of sophisticated equipment—to Zambia is going to thwart any plans being engineered by the communists.

An arms build-up in Africa can only lead to tribal wars and genocide; civil wars, if you like. These in turn can spread across state borders, eventually involving any number of African states. Since Cuba has been highly visible in African affairs for some time—and it appears that our government has co-operated with Cuba in its efforts to get arms and men to that troubled continent in the past by allowing their war materiel to land in this country en route to Africa—and since it is common knowledge that the Soviet Union has been supplying various states and factions with war materiel for years, this is no game for the British who have enough problems at home and in Ireland.

By its commonwealth association and by its silent consent, the Canadian government is involving itself in African affairs along with Britain. This is foolhardy enough in itself, but really foolish when you stop to think of the odds stacked against anyone who confronts communist-backed forces in that part of the world now.

This government has been pouring money hand over fist into African countries, supposedly to feed starving millions of people. How much of that money is feeding the people and how much of it is buying bullets, bombs and back-up material from the communists? How much of that money is killing the very people it was intended to keep alive?

In this connection, Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to note that the World Council of Churches has been giving aid to these terrorists. I was amazed on Sunday night to see the Primate of the Anglican Church of Canada on television admitting that he was only going by his conscience and was not concerned with what was actually going on. He had not made any effort to visit the area. It is a fact, Mr. Speaker, that 95 per cent of the people killed in Rhodesia by the guerrillas invading from Zambia are black people.

The minister said earlier today that he would need more specific information on Britain's involvement in African affairs. All he needs to do is read the same newspapers we all have access to. But he prefers to sit, wait for word from London, hoping and praying nervously all the while that these nasty things will pass away and Africa will settle down to a peaceful, pastoral picture once again. It seems to me he is proceeding in a very naive way.

I say to the minister that African people, in one part of that continent or another, have not known true peace in this entire century. There has always been some big nation from Europe sticking its thumb in to see what it could come up with. And Britain is back into the act, not as the empire builder she once was, but as a relatively minor member of a gang of misdirected moderns who will achieve nothing there but the building of a gigantic powder keg.

We must not forget that the Middle East problem also involves part of Africa—a big part of Africa in the north. So it is all part of the same grandiose chess game and it becomes increasingly and dangerously unstable every time one more non-African nation tries to get into the act.

If Canada is seen to approve, silently or otherwise, British involvement in African affairs, then this country's position is jeopardized, whether we are seen as aligning ourselves with communist aggressors or simply doing nothing to persuade Britain from doing just that. If his government, as the minister says, really believes this kind of arms escalation must be brought to an end, then let us have some action on at least some strong words on the subject, not just a mouthful of excuses.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) stated in the House on October 30 that he had had no conversations with the British Foreign Secretary regarding Britain's decision to send military supplies to Zambia. We would not, indeed, expect the British government to consult us on its transactions with a sovereign fellow member of the Commonwealth concerning its defence needs.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs added that, when he had more specific information, he would consider whether it was useful to the House to give a more detailed response. We are seeking confirmation of press and other reports that the military equipment sent to Zambia is for Zambia's defence needs, particulariy air defence. According to reports, the supplies have included communications equipment, mine detectors and anti-aircraft guns, with the possibility of ground-to-air missiles to follow, and they have been supplied on condition that they are not handed on to the guerilla forces.

We also understand from reports that Dr. Owen has stated that there was no question of stationing British troops or aircraft in Zambia or of sending any equipment that could be used for any purpose other than the protection of Zambia.

As all hon. members will realize, the actions of the British government are related to the vexing Rhodesian question. For too many years the repressive Rhodesian regime has illegally exercised power in defiance of the international community and the situation has been in the forefront of unsolved international problems. The unacceptability of the illegal regime's policies and its intransigence in the face of international efforts to find solutions have through the years severely affected the neighbouring states. Incursions such as took place in recent weeks and particularly the raids into Zambia point up the need for all parties to get together to discuss peaceful ways to settle the affair without delay. Zambia is particularly vulnerable, both militarily and economically, to Rhodesian actions. It is unable to protect itself from the operation of the illegal regime's security forces. In addition, it has had to open its border to permit transhipment of vital supplies of fertilizer through Rhodesia.

It appears from all reports that the military supplies are indeed of a defensive nature and intended only for Zambia's defence should it be attacked. Until we have confirmation of the reports, however, we can make no further comment.

[Mr. Schumacher.]

HEALTH AND WELFARE—POLICY REGARDING EXTENDED USE OF SOCIAL INSURANCE NUMBERS

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, on the face of it the social insurance number appears to be a simple and innocuous number to be given out as casually as you would give out your name. Unfortunately, the SIN number has become much more than that; it is becoming more and more a national identity number and the card a national identity card.

Think of all the occasions, sir, when the SIN number is used. It is used for registration at hospitals, schools, libraries, banks, insurance companies, and indeed it is now being used by the army as a regimental number. Youngsters playing pee-wee hockey are asked for their SIN numbers for the National Hockey Association's computer. Canadians must provide SIN to cash Canada Savings Bonds and SIN are a must on income tax returns. The school systems of Saskatchewan and Ontario use SIN for record keeping for students in senior grades. Motor vehicle drivers' records in Quebec, and hunting licences in Manitoba, are recorded by SIN.

Due to the ever-growing use of social insurance numbers in different agencies and departments at all levels of government and in the private field, I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) on October 27, 1978, the following. I asked her what the policy is regarding the extension of the use of social insurance numbers in a variety of ways so that they have now become glorified identification cards and numbers.

The question is important to Canadians for several reasons. First introduced in 1964, the Pearson government gave repeated assurances that numbers would not become national identity cards but would be used solely as social security numbers. Yet through the years, notwithstanding this firm undertaking, there has been extension of the system to most government departments.

My objections are twofold. The use of SIN has been so extended as to become a de facto national identity card, despite government assurances to the contrary. Secondly, this policy, whether overt or covert, has been adopted without a full examination and public debate of its merits and consequences. That is really the substance of my complaint in this matter. Maybe we will get to a single identification number in this country, but I suggest that the government has broken its word, broken the commitment made by Prime Minister Pearson and others not to let this policy be extended without first having a full debate on the implications of having a single identification number.

Closely related to these concerns is the problem of safeguards and laws to protect the confidentiality of the information in the computers. Information given for the purposes of one program, for example old age pensions, should not be transferred to other computers dealing with another program. Because of the increasing compatibility of the latest computers and their ability to communicate with each other, our social insurance number could then become a key which would open up our lives to the unscrupulous data bank manipulator.

Secondly, the access to the information in a file should be closely regulated to guard against abuse by government or other agency.

These concerns about our privacy in the face of new computer technology and increasing government are not abstract musings, in recognition of today's realities. I will give examples of some things that have happened according to testimony given by the assistant commissioner of the RCMP, Hank Jensen, to the McDonald commission into RCMP activities in June of this year. He gave some interesting information. He said that 50 per cent of all cases of false pretences made use of SIN cards. He pointed out that the problem relating to this false pretences percentage was due to lack of security surrounding SIN.

He illustrated the case of a Calgary man who had 109 SIN cards, 59 UIC claims and a monthly income of $33,000. He also told of a Montreal duo who used 60 SIN cards over a period of two months to collect $32,867 from the UIC and who had projected earnings of half a million dollars from their gainful unemployment had they not slipped up. Then there was the Winnipeg man who parlayed 25 SIN cards into $92,000 over 4½ years.

The minister missed the point of my question. We must have a public debate. Parliament must give its mandate to the expansion of the use of these numbers or we fail our responsibility in this House as individual members. The parliamentary secretary can take a message to the minister. I intend to pursue this matter until we get a satisfactory resolution of this very difficult and ominous problem.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, it has several times been suggested in this House that the government intends actively to promote the expanded use of social insurance numbers outside of social service programs by all levels of government. Such is not the government's policy, nor did the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) at any time say that it was. As she did say, however, the government is concerned to maintain tight control of the very large program of expenditure for which she is responsible as minister, and to that end the social insurance number is an indispensible tool.

As I said, the government is not trying to promote the extension of the use of the SIN outside the federal government. I am not saying, however, that the government will prohibit such use, or refuse to co-operate if a private sector organization, or one in another level of government, decides to make administrative use of the SIN. The holder of a social insurance number is at liberty to divulge it to those with whom he or she transacts business. Whether he or she does so or not is essentially a matter of negotiation between the parties. Any attempt on the part of the government to control or influence such negotiations would be intrusive, and probably ineffectual.

The use of the SIN in connection with the administration of unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan, and the income tax is sanctioned by statute. In the context of those very large programs involving millions of Canadians, effective administration is impossible without a unique identifier for each citizen involved. Large business firms, other levels of government and, indeed, other departments of the federal government doing business across the country experience the same administrative need. It should therefore occasion no surprise if these organizations ask a person with whom they deal for an identifier which distinguishes him or her from all others of similar name.

As to the use of the social insurance number within the federal government outside the area of "social service programs", such use has, of course, been recognized since parliament amended the Income Tax Act in 1967 to provide for the use of the SIN on income tax returns. Other departments also use the SIN as a matter of administrative practice, in the same manner as do firms in the private sector.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 10.27 p.m., without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

* A positive number signifies a tax increase; a negative number a tax decrease. The Change in disposable income is the amount of refundable child credit less the amount of reduction in family allowances and less the effects of other tax changes.

The refundable child credit is $200 per child, reduced by five per cent of family net income in excess of $18,000. Family allowances are reduced to $20 per month per child. Net income is wage or salary income less deductions for employment expenses and CPP/QPP and UI contributions.

Other Tax Changes include the elimination of the $50 per child portion of the federal tax reduction and decreased taxes resulting from the decrease in family allowances. The amounts shown are changes in federal and provincial tax.

Each family is assumed to have one earner under age 65 receiving earned income. Family allowances are added to income in calculating tax payable. CPP/QPP and UI contributions as well as the employment expense deduction, calculated at current rates, are deducted in computing tax. Provincial tax is calculated at the rate of 44 per cent. As provincial tax rates vary from province to province the value of other tax changes will differ somewhat, depending on the province of residence of the taxpayer. No account is taken of provincial tax cuts and credits.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

PRODUCTION OF DOCUMENTS BY WALTER RUDNICKI IN CIVIL ACTION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I seek to invoke the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The motion I would put, if leave is granted, is as follows:

In light of the judgment of the Supreme Court as to the application of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act, this House requests the government, and in particular the Solicitor General, not to accept requests to apply that section to deny Walter Rudnicki production of material documents in the civil action brought by Mr. Rudnicki against a former solicitor general in the infamous blacklist matter, where the issues involved are ministerial stupidity and embarrassment rather than defence or security.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

ALLEGED FRAUDULENT CLAIMS FOR WHICH CHEQUES ISSUED—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning unemployment insurance cheques distributed during the postal strike from temporary distribution centres between October 13 and October 20, and the fact that a high official of the commission has advised me that in excess of 40,000 cheques were not picked up in Ontario alone.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration make an immediate statement concerning a meeting being held at this moment in Toronto of UIC officials, chaired by Mr. David Brown, regarding the fact that a great percentage of these unclaimed cheques are for apparently fraudulent claims; that the minister advise the results of this meeting, including what steps will be taken to deal with possible fraud and, finally, that he reveal the total number of unclaimed cheques in all provinces in this same category which are reported to comprise about 10 per cent of all claims.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

REQUEST NATURAL GAS EXPORTS NOT BE INCREASED—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. It was reported in the Globe and Mail last week that the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) supports the call of the Conservative Premier of Alberta, Peter Lougheed, for increased natural gas sales to the United States, a statement which is in direct contradiction to the position of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). I know the minister of industry has changed horses in full flight; despite that, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez):

That this House request the Prime Minister to mediate the dispute between his two ministers and announce that the gas will be conserved for Canadian use.

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

REQUEST FOR CONDEMNATION OF STATEMENT BY LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION RESPECTING SOVEREIGNTY ASSOCIATION WITH QUEBEC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I seek the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the shocking statement made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) to the effect that if he were the prime minister of Canada, he would negotiate sovereignty association with the Quebec government if 60 per cent of the Quebec population supported their government in the referendum; since the wording of the referendum question is not known and could be prejudicial to the very existence of this country, and also since a federal-provincial conference is going on at present, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Duvernay (Mr. Demers):

S.O. 43

That the House condemn the irresponsible position taken by the Leader of the Progressive Conservative party who, without any popular or political mandate, is already willing to negotiate the future of my country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion can only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REPRESENTATIONS THAT DANYLO SHUMUK BE ALLOWED TO IMMIGRATE TO CANADA FROM U.S.S.R.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Burnaby-Richmond-Delta): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. It is well known to this House that one, Danylo Shumuk, a political prisoner in the Soviet Union, is in a seriously deteriorated state of health at a harsh labour camp in the Mordovian region of the U.S.S.R. We now learn, through apparently reliable channels, that Mr. Shumuk is dying of terminal stomach cancer.

Members of his family in Canada have repeatedly requested this government to seek the release of Mr. Shumuk so that he might be allowed to immigrate to Canada. I therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan-Kootenay (Mr. Johnston):

That the Secretary of State for External Affairs be requested to renew, reinforce and persist in diplomatic initiatives which will bring Mr. Danylo Shumuk to Canada so that he might enjoy the closing days of his life among friends and relatives.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to Standing Order 43, can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

POST OFFICE

USE OF CASUAL EMPLOYEES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to deal with a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Supreme Court of Canada as recently as October 16 refused to hear an appeal by the Post Office Department concerning a Federal Court decision rendered in June, 1978, allowing 2,700 grievances on the matter of the use of casual labour in the Post Office, and in view of the fact that the Deputy Postmaster General told the Supreme Court that there an average of ten people were attached to each grievance, which meant that the grievances affected 27,000 employees and would cost the government more than $2 million, and in view of the fact that this waste of $2 million of taxpayers' money, as well as the hard feelings caused by forcing unnecessary grievance procedures could have been avoided if the Post Office had either obeyed the collective agreement in the first place or even accepted the decision at the first level of the grievance procedure, I move, seconded by the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth):

That this House call upon the Postmaster General to make a public statement guaranteeing that his department will now follow the terms of the collective agreement in the use of casuals, thus improving labour relations in the Post Office and saving the taxpayers $2 million.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for discussion requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT SMALL AND MEDIUM SIZED BUSINESSES BENEFIT FROM SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and pressing matter.

Considering that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) has announced that he will close the technical laboratories in his department and encourage private businesses to take over and since only the larger companies are likely to be able to afford these functions and that smaller ones will only have a limited access to these developments; considering also that most of the research must be done by the government as is the case in all countries of the world, specially since we have extended our fishing zones, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Lambert):

That the House urge the government to review its decision so that small and medium sized businesses might benefit from the advantages stemming from scientific research in the field of fisheries.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

REASON FOR DELAY IN FORMING MARITIME ENERGY CORPORATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Maritime Energy Corporation is a concept of vital importance to the development and transmission of electric power in the maritime provinces, and whereas after the initial announcement over a year ago by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) for Canada and the maritime premiers the corporation is still not in existence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be directed to make a statement on motions indicating the reasons for delay in formation of the Maritime Energy Corporation and the steps that must be taken to activate it.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion at this time, in conformity with Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

FINANCE

ACCURACY OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been to the President of the Treasury Board, whom we were told was going to be here today. In his absence, I will direct it to the Minister of Finance. It has to do with the public accounts tabled yesterday, and the statement by the Auditor General therein that the public accounts again this year overstate assets of the government and understate expenditures. I am sure the Minister of Finance would agree that accurate public accounts are absolutely essential and would recognize that a private company with that kind of qualified audit would, in fact, be called to account by the responsible regulatory authority.

My question to the Minister of Finance, if he is in a position to answer, is: when will the government take action on the recommendations of the Auditor General and ensure that the public accounts are a true and honest statement of government accounts?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, over a period of years we have been receiving good advice from the Auditor General. We have made a lot of corrections. The President of the Treasury Board will look into these recommendations and do what he can in the circumstances. I cannot say more than that. I expect my colleague to be in the House later in the question period.

Mr. Andre: The Auditor General also points out that the failure of the government to consolidate certain Crown corporations within government accounts creates a distorted picture of government accounts, assets and spending. It has also been the practice of this government not to declare in estimates certain Crown corporation borrowings and then to claim that these are somehow cuts in spending.

In view of the fact that the government has apparently dismissed the Auditor General's recommendation that there be this consolidation of Crown corporations, in the interests of honesty and a completely accurate picture, will the Minister of Finance indicate to the House why this recommendation is dismissed and why we are not being given an accurate picture of government spending, its assets position and its balance-sheet and income statement?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, all Crown corporations report to this House through ministers. When somebody wants to know the exact picture of a Crown corporation, they can obtain that information. On the technical problem raised by the hon. member, I stated that the President of the Treasury Board is looking into that and will certainly reply to the hon. member.

● (1417)

Mr. Andre: I ask the Minister of Finance a specific and simple question. The Auditor General has pointed out that assets and investments in some Crown corporations are listed as assets when in fact they are written off and should be listed as expenditures. They should be put on the expenditure side; they should not be claimed as some sort of investment. The corporations mentioned are the National Harbours Board, the St. Lawrence Seaway Authority and Atomic Energy of Canada Limited.

Can we at least have an assurance that this simple book-keeping procedure will be followed, so that with respect to at least those three Crown corporations we will have an accurate picture of their financial position and the Crown investment therein?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, of course, we shall consider very seriously the recommendations of the Auditor General and see what can be done to accommodate him. At the same time we should not disregard the autonomy of Crown corporations which often operate under a law of parliament, and which have very often their own auditors.

[English]

IMPLEMENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS OF AUDITOR GENERAL

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): My question is for the Minister of Finance, Mr. Speaker, as one of those who signed the public accounts which we tabled yesterday. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman this: since the fifth report of the public accounts committee which was tabled in the House in 1976 endorsed the 41 recommendations of the report of the study of the accounts of Canada, why is it that the Auditor General now reports that six of those recommendations, including one requiring parliamentary authority for its implementation, have not been implemented despite the commitment given to the Auditor General last year that this would be done?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member—and he said so himself—that the number of recommendations which have not yet been implemented by this government are lower than the number of recommendations which were accepted. I am sure we are going on in this direction to satisfy him, while taking into account the administrative requirements of the government.

Mr. Clarke: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary.

Considering the 50 per cent increase in the budget of the Auditor General, I would like to ask the minister when the government will start listening and making his proposals known?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think we changed our procedures quite a lot following the recommendations of the Auditor General, and we intend to continue to do so but we may not be able to satisfy him 100 per cent. There are ongoing discussions between the Treasury Board and the Auditor General. We established a new office inside the government at his request, namely the office of Comptroller of Government Expenditures. We followed a very important recommendation of the Auditor General. We increased quite considerably his staff and I think that relations between the Auditor General and the government are very good at the present time.

URBAN AFFAIRS

LOANS FOR LAND BANKING PURPOSES

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs: it concerns a decision on the part of the federal government, announced on September 9, 1978, to cut off loans for land banking purposes in accordance with the report submitted by Mr. Greenspan.

Why was this decision to end the land banking loans, particularly as they affect the city of Toronto, made at a time when the Greenspan report dealt only with suburban land banking, not with inner city land banking?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): I am aware of the particular problems surrounding land assembly in the core of the city. It has been suggested that a program should be established to facilitate the infill, and we are looking at the situation at the present time.

• (1422)

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear that the minister is taking these steps, but I would like to know more precisely what he has in mind. As he may be aware, the commissioner for housing of the city of Toronto submitted a report to the Toronto city council. That report was approved on October 10, 1978. It was a scathing indictment of the actions of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation for cutting off land banking without any warning and without any advice being given to the city of Toronto. Was the minister aware that this threatens further development of a housing site which is currently being developed for some 700 housing units?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I think that the provinces and municipalities will have to acknowledge that they cannot have it both ways. If they resent federal government intervention, particularly in land assembly or any other activities in relation to municipal infrastructures, they cannot claim that the federal government should pull out of some of their activities and then come back and say that they did not receive warning and, therefore, the Government of Canada should not have done so.

I believe that the federal government has taken the decision that we will no longer be part of buying land and we will let provincial and municipal authorities engage in that if they want to.

Mr. Rae: Mr. Speaker, I am sure that if municipal authorities had taxing power, it would be possible to take the minister's remarks seriously. But until they do, they cannot.

An hon. Member: What about property taxes?

Mr. Rae: Will the minister at least guarantee that he will look very seriously at the possibility of maintaining the current land banking loans of $30 million and allowing the city to repay those loans into a fund which could then be rolled over and used for future developments? Will the minister at least consider that proposal?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like the city of Toronto to knock first at the door of the provincial government: that is the first thing it should do. In the meantime, the federal government will always be ready to assist municipalities. In the past we have done so quite brilliantly in many respects.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: It has been said by some hon. members of this House, particularly members of the official opposition, that the federal government ought not to infringe upon provincial rights. We have indicated that we are willing to do away with some of the programs which were previously in existence. Now that people realize the federal government is ready to take a less important role in municipal projects, people are thinking twice: they are thinking that the federal government was not so bad in doing what it was doing after all.

NATIONAL REVENUE

INQUIRY WHEN OFFICE WILL BE ESTABLISHED IN SHAWINIGAN SOUTH, QUEBEC

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance, and that because of the absence of the Minister of National Revenue who is sitting in the Senate.

In view of the government program to decentralize administration by setting up regional offices for the various departments with a view to better serving the people, can the minister tell the House when the Revenue Canada office is to be officially opened at Shawinigan South which was mentioned recently in news bulletins over the radio and also in the newspapers?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am taking note of the question of the hon. member and shall advise him as soon as possible.

INQUIRY WHETHER DECENTRALIZATION WILL IMPROVE ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

As the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of National Revenue was kind enough to answer my first question, I shall put a second one to him.

As all the ministers are concerned with better serving the people, will the fact that regional offices are being opened by the Department of National Revenue throughout Canada help to better serve the taxpayers on the one hand, and ensure greater income to the government on the other hand, thus helping the Minister of Finance to balance his budget?

Mr. Yves Demers (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the main purpose is not so much to collect more revenue, because I believe Revenue Canada offices have been very efficient in that regard in the past, as to help the people in all parts of Quebec as well as Canada to get to know the Canadian government better, and to give jobs to the people throughout Quebec.

FINANCE

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS RESPECTING USE OF EXCESS CASH ON DEPOSIT

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. As a result of the dramatic moves made in the United States today with respect to their economy, putting that nation into a relatively tight money situation with the federal discount rate going up a full point, would the minister indicate what the government plans to do with their excess cash on deposit, the $5.5 billion that they have on deposit at the present time? Do they plan to use that cash in a way to let it run down, as opposed to borrowing on our domestic market; or do they in fact plan to do what the minister has represented to some people, to use it to hold the dollar down roughly to the 85-cent, 86-cent level?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speculate on the movement of the dollar. I think that the announcements made in the United States this morning were quite dramatic. I am following the situation very closely. I do not want to speculate, because everybody is aware of the fact that the stock markets in the United States and Canada fluctuate up so far during the day.

Any move which the United States takes to stabilize their economy has to be welcomed by Canada because our economies are so interrelated. So far, the effect on Canada has been positive. I do not want to add to the situation at this time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, the one thing that we do know is that there is no speculative nature in the fact that we will have higher interest rates than we have ever experienced.

Two weeks ago I pointed out to the minister that the bankruptcy rate in Canada was now seven in relation to every ten in the United States, whereas ten years ago it was one in relation to ten in the United States. At that time, I asked the minister if any specific measures had been taken to relieve the lot of the small businessman in Canada who must live with these high interest rates to the detriment of his well-being. The minister indicated that he would take the matter up with the governor of the Bank of Canada, who in turn would speak to the presidents of the chartered banks in order to make the plight of small business a little better.

Would the minister indicate to the House what report he has received, either directly from the presidents of our chartered banks or the governor of the Bank of Canada, as to how they intend to ensure that the small businessman will not have to share the complete ravish caused by high interest rates in the country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I said I would talk about this problem with the governor of the Bank of Canada. I have not received a reply as such. The governor of the Bank of Canada meets regularly with the presidents of the chartered banks to discuss problems with which they are faced.

As to the plight of the small businessman, this House of Commons was called upon last spring to vote on some measures that were to improve the fate of small business and they were passed unanimously. Let us hope that those measures are helping the small businessman in these difficult circumstances.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the full point discount rate increase in the United States will likely mean at least a half point further increase in our bank rate, would the minister indicate what effect this will have on the Canada Savings Bond issue that is still being sold? Does the government plan to raise the rate on that issue, or will it try to suck Canadians into buying still more savings bonds in spite of the fact that interest rates are likely to go up still higher in the country?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to comment too much on the situation. It is evident that the hon. member is attempting to create confusion, and in doing so he shows a very high degree of irresponsibility in his comments. If there is any movement in the interest rate, it will be announced in due course. I am not going to speculate and engage in the kind of business that the hon. member enjoys.

ENERGY

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO CLOSE PLANT IN LAPRADE, QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

On October 19 last, the minister met his provincial counterpart Mr. Joron about the Laprade plant. In view of the fact that the federal government still gives the impression that it will maintain its decision to close the Laprade site and that the Quebec government is restating its intention to take all necessary steps to see that the contract which has been signed is complied with in the interest of Quebeckers, after some ten days is the minister in a position to tell us today whether the government decision is final or whether he is reconsidering it?

[English]

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, in my discussions with the minister of energy for the province of Quebec, I made quite clear to him the reason the federal government was anxious to mothball the Laprade plant in an expeditious way: it was because there would be significant savings to Quebec consumers. To do otherwise would be irresponsible at this time. He undertook to take my position to his own cabinet colleagues and to get back to me. I have yet to hear from him.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the minister is speaking to Quebeckers from a consumer point of view. I imagine he made an assessment before those spending cuts were announced. I cannot understand today how the minister had not considered the consumer's interests before signing such agreement.

I would also ask the minister, considering that his provincial counterpart has mentioned that the closing down will cost 1,500 jobs and that he has referred to 500 jobs during the first 18 months, whether he can confirm his assessment, and I think it is an important matter, that 1,500 or 500 jobs are involved?

[English]

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, there has been a very substantial change in the marketing situation respecting heavy water and the increased need for nuclear power. Various governments have been scaling down their electrical demand forecasts over a period of years. As perhaps the hon. member knows, as far as the export market is concerned, recently there has been a scaling back of what had been rather ambitious programs in various countries.

Given that information and the further information by the Quebec government in its own white paper, when it indicated clearly that it did not expect to require nuclear power over and above what it was committed to during the 1990s and before the year 2000—which position was different from the one we understood at the time the agreement was signed in January of this year—and given that it would cost the consumers of Quebec millions of additional dollars to proceed with the plant at this time, we decided the correct course of action was to renegotiate the agreement with Quebec with a view to mothballing that facility. There are approximately 500 people on that site at the present time. If the mothballing goes forward in the interests of the consumers of Quebec, then there will not be any significant reduction for a year's time of the number on the site at the present time.

URBAN AFFAIRS

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF WM. TERON

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs: it concerns the extended leave of absence given to Mr. Bill Teron, the deputy head of his department. Can the minister indicate to the House when we can expect the return of Mr. Teron? Also, can he explain the conditions under which this unusual extension of leave of absence was granted by the government?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I should like to report that, in fact, Mr. Teron is back at work. I had a meeting with him this morning.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT WILL FINANCIALLY ASSIST ESTABLISHMENT OF ZINC PLANT IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. First of all, I would like to know what progress has been made in the study conducted by his department concerning a second zinc smelter in northeast New Brunswick; second, has Noranda Mines Limited announced a decision in this matter; and finally, can he ensure the House of his department's full co-operation and of the federal government's financial support in this project should the company give the go ahead and, of course, ask the government for help?

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I first want to reassure the hon. member as to my department's continuing interest in this project. As he is aware, we had started negotiating with Noranda Mines and New Brunswick Mining and Smelting about two years ago. However, market conditions have deteriorated since then with the result that the company is far from a final decision. Nevertheless, in the meantime we have agreed to look into the possibility of conducting a feasibility study of the whole project. In the last few months we have received a proposal from a firm in that regard. Both levels of government are now considering this proposal and trying to establish what part of the cost they should bear, as this study would involve substantial sums of money. I can therefore confirm to the hon. member our continuing keen interest in this project, and our hope that international conditions will improve in the next few months so that we may go ahead, if the company so agrees as that time.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION INTO FRAUDULENT CLAIMS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it arises out of information which I received from a high Unemployment Insurance Commission official, indicating that over 40,000 UIC cheques remained unclaimed at temporary distribution centres in Ontario alone at the end of the postal strike.

Will the minister confirm that high-level consideration has been, and is, taking place in Toronto under the chairmanship of Mr. David Brown to determine whether to investigate many such claims that appear fraudulent? Will he confirm that he will order such an investigation and prosecution in all fraudulent cases?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised that the hon. member would jump to the conclusion that the large majority of working persons in Canada would not pick up their cheques for some fraudulent purpose.

An hon. Member: Who said they were working? They were on UIC.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: If they are working, that is the best fraud.

Mr. Cullen: The fact of the matter is that we were able to advertise that there would be some pick-up points. I would expect that a lot of these people did not pick up their cheques because they did not see the ad. In many cases they were back at work and could not leave the employment they had recently secured. So I think we should await the outcome of the examination to see whether there was fraud, as the hon. member said. If there was, I suggest it would be in a very small minority of cases.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, I am glad, at least, that the minister admits an investigation is going on. Also, I am aware that there are almost 2,000 cheques in the Ottawa area alone. Will the minister advise the House of the total number of unclaimed cheques across the country, including Ontario? I mentioned just Ontario in my previous question. Are investigations taking place regarding all provinces? Will all fraudulent claims be prosecuted? If he can, I think the minister should acknowledge to the House that someone out of work who needs a UIC cheque will not leave it unclaimed, if it is on the level?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, I would think, first and foremost, my officials have a responsibility to see that people who did not receive their cheques will now receive them. They will endeavour to find out where they are and why the cheques have not been picked up. They would be remiss in their duty if they did not check out the reasons for it. But I think they will find, in the vast majority of cases, that it was because people were either at work or were not aware of the fact that it was possible to pick up the cheques at the outlets.

Oral Questions

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WEATHER FORECASTING AND REPORTING SERVICES IN REGINA, SASK.—MEETING WITH PROVINCIAL OFFICIALS

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, since no government should be blamed for the weather, particularly today's, in addition to all the things they should be blamed for, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Environment).

In view of the fact that one grain crop in Saskatchewan is worth hundreds of millions of dollars to the Canadian economy, that more improved farmland is in Saskatchewan than Manitoba and Alberta combined, and that 40 per cent of occupied farmland is in Saskatchewan, can the minister tell us the results of the meeting between himself or his officials and the government of Saskatchewan regarding their offer to put up $200,000 in order to maintain full weather forecasting and reporting services in Regina?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the meeting was a very fruitful one. My assistant deputy minister explained to the officials of the government of Saskatchewan that there will be no diminution in the weather forecasting services available to the province of Saskatchewan. The moving of weather forecasters from the Regina office to Winnipeg had been in the planning stages for some time; it was not a recent move. But since the spending cuts came about, the move was speeded up.

● (1442)

Another outcome of that meeting was that the Saskatchewan government offered us $200,000 in order to keep the Regina office open. We are considering that proposal.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Marchand: I will take their money.

An hon. Member: Saskatchewan has lots of money.

Mr. Marchand: Saskatchewan has lots of money, and they would have even more if—

Mr. Benjamin: We would, if you guys would leave us alone.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, someone says they are getting snow in Regina. We are getting snowed here. In view of the fact that there are as many square miles in Saskatchewan as there are in either Alberta or Manitoba, and since the minister was able to reverse the decision in the case of Newfoundland when a by-election was on—and there are 100,000 fewer square miles in Newfoundland about which to report the weather—will the minister advise his cabinet colleagues that this decision must be reversed and that full weather forecasting and reporting services in Saskatchewan will have to be maintained and, in fact, that they need to be enlarged compared with what they used to be?

[Mr. Cullen.]

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, there were two different situations. In respect of Newfoundland, representations on the basis of safety were made to me, not only by my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but by a large number of the public there who felt that if the weather office in Gander was closed, it would endanger the lives of a great many people, especially the fishermen. Professionals involved in weather services said there may be some truth in those representations and that there may be situations where a safety factor would be involved.

However, in the case of Saskatchewan this advice was not given to me. I am absolutely assured that the people in Saskatchewan will get full and complete weather service, just as they had before. As a matter of fact, it is only the forecasters who are being moved from Regina to Winnipeg: we will still maintain at least nine people in the Regina office to give the people of Saskatchewan full weather forecasting services.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

COMPETITION FROM PRIVATE OPERATORS IN CN MARINE ACTIVITIES AT NORTH SYDNEY, N.S.

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Transport. I gather that, unfortunately, it is not the Secretary of State for External Affairs, as I was hoping it would be.

My question refers to the activities of CN Marine and CN generally which, by their actions, are drastically reducing the opportunities for employment for stevedores and others at North Sydney, the port from which the shipment of goods destined for Newfoundland is made. I was hoping that the acting minister would be the Secretary of State for External Affairs, since he is from Newfoundland. However, will the acting minister discuss this matter with his colleagues to ascertain whether an inquiry could take place in respect of this drastic cutback in employment and with regard to the government's provision of subsidy through the CTC to private shipping operators competing against the government's Crown corporation for the shipment of goods to Newfoundland?

[Translation]

Mr. Charles Lapointe (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, whether in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia or any other Atlantic province—I think in this case Newfoundland is the province concerned—we have reviewed and are still reviewing the situation in relation to the CN railways and ferry services, and that is why we have set up the Snavely commission; as for the other provinces we also have received representations, for example from the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi, to review the transport situation in those areas. That question is constantly under review, and we are trying to find ways to provide the best service to the population, and also the best ways to create as many jobs as possible in the railways or ferry services.

[English]

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his reply. However, he still has not advised me whether it is the policy of this government to provide subsidies to private shipping firms which acquire old ships with funds, in many cases, from the treasury and go into business in competition with Crown corporations which were set up to ship goods from the mainland, North Sydney—the port from which goods are to be shipped—to Newfoundland. Why is the government doing that and destroying the opportunities for CN Marine and CN generally to use their own ships, which on many occasions are lying idle?

[Translation]

Mr. Lapointe: Mr. Speaker, the government subsidy policy, as far as I know, does not necessarily apply to help private companies make profits, but rather to provide the best service to any population. As for the specific point raised by the hon. member, I will be glad to try and get more information for him.

FISHERIES

RIGHTS OF INDIAN BANDS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment: it relates to questions asked previously regarding bylaw No. 10 passed by an Indian band on the west coast.

Are there other bylaws which have been passed under the authority of the Indian Act which would literally give control over fisheries to Indian bands? Are there other bylaws than bylaw No. 10 presently awaiting consideration by either the Ministry of Fisheries or the Ministry of Indian Affairs and Northern Development regarding their acceptance?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague said in the House—and I read Hansard—the issue involving management of fisheries in relation to native people's claims and these bylaws is one we are endeavouring to resolve. I think this has to be done with a very reasonable approach. I am sure the hon. member would want to avoid a situation such as we have seen on the other side of the line, in the United States, where a judgment of the court has created a nightmare in respect of management of fisheries on the west coast of the United States. It is to avoid that sort of situation that my colleague and I are taking a very responsible route and a very responsible approach rather than a legalistic one.

I know of one other bylaw that was proposed. I objected to it. My colleague has looked at it and has suggested the sort of changes which I think can accommodate both our aims.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, speaking of the need to be responsible, perhaps I should compliment the minister on his letter to the editor the other day regarding a much more serious matter, and I do so. I know in his responses he is trying to be responsible. However, I come from a maritime province where fisheries are of great importance to the economy of the area—specifically, British Columbia. There is a great deal of confusion now as to just who is going to control the rivers in which salmon return annually to spawn and from which the harvest is taken. The confusion that seems to exist between the minister and—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Would the hon. member put his question.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I apologize for being so extensive. Could the minister tell the House if there is now a debate going on between his ministry and another ministry as to whether the Government of Canada has final authority over the fisheries in anadromous fish streams; or are we, in fact, faced with a dilemma in the law of the country regarding whether that authority is to be shared with Indian bands or given away to them?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, when I made reference to people who are not responsible, I was not referring to the hon. member. He has been extremely responsible in his questions on this issue, because he recognizes the problem. There is no debate about the authority of the Government of Canada over fisheries' management in respect of fish returning to spawning grounds, etc. The only question is in respect of access to fish which might be affected by Indian band bylaws under the Indian Act. In that case, we are looking for what will possibly not be a legalistic approach but an intelligent approach which recognizes that the Indian food fishery has had a very high priority, not only in the department of my colleague but in my department as well.

The other matter, of course, relates to good conservation and fair distribution of fish to all users of the resource. I might say that responsible leaders in Indian communities do not disagree with this approach.

CONSTRUCTION OF WHARF ON TUSKET ISLAND, N.S.

Miss Coline Campbell (South Western Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and concerns the proposed fisheries' industrial park on Tusket Island.

The minister had agreed to go ahead with the joint construction of a wharf on Tusket Island with the previous government of Nova Scotia. Has this proposed joint wharf construction been ratified by the new government of Nova Scotia and, if so, how soon can construction of a wharf in this area be started? If not, will the minister press to seek approval from the new government of Nova Scotia to proceed immediately with construction of this needed wharf?

Mr. McGrath: What about my wharf?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I will come to the hon. member for St. John's East, and his wharf, next time. I will be meeting the new minister of fisheries for Nova Scotia next Monday afternoon, when I will raise this matter with him. It is obvious that the offer I made to the previous government still stands.

URBAN AFFAIRS

FUNDING OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The federal government's $2.5 billion budget cut includes a $110 million reduction for the Canadian Home Insulation Program.

My question to the minister is prompted by a statement from the CMHC news and information director that "... original funding levels were set in a relatively arbitrary manner." Could the minister explain, in light of a cumulative report of the program statistics which shows only 11 per cent accounted for in grants issued, what are the administrative costs of this program and what will be the disposition of the remaining approximately 80 per cent of the budget during the remaining half of this fiscal year?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the question of the hon. member should be put on the order paper because it would require a long explanation with a series of figures to be presented. In short, if I am allowed, I could answer the hon. member by saying that the case had to be arbitrary in the sense that we felt the federal government had to be restrained in its expenditures. We did it in a fashion that would not hurt those on lower incomes, more particularly the clientele of the Department of Urban Affairs, they being low income families and senior citizens.

We had, therefore, more naturally to cut in the case of my department in relation to other programs that were not directly involving or affecting low income families and senior citizens.

Mrs. Pigott: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Would the minister confirm that it will be the intention of the government, as outlined by CHIP director Noel Guilbeault "to go directly to the population rather than through TV, and the message will be more direct to come and get the grant and do the insulating." Would the minister indicate how the provinces have reacted to this direct intervention?

Mr. Ouellet: The provinces have indicated that they would like to take the federal money and do the program themselves. That has been the general posture of the provinces every time the federal government has a good program: they would like the federal government to give them the money to carry out these good programs.

I understand that it is the position of the Conservative party to support the provinces in this endeavour, to take the federal money and do things provincially, giving credit to the provincial authorities. We feel there should be a strong federal government, having its own responsibility and doing its own program. We are not going to have ten separate states in Canada; we still want to have one strong federal government.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST THAT POSTAL CODE BE PRINTED ON HOUSE OF COMMONS' ENVELOPES

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Hastings): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Postmaster General? Now that the inside postal workers are back to work—although from the complaints I am getting, the service is not much better—I have just received a letter from Canada Post. I assume it is meant for me, although it is addressed to an MPP. It gives me some concern because it asks me to put the postal code on envelopes going out of my office.

I wonder if the Postmaster General has spoken to the Minister of Supply and Services and other ministers to make sure that the envelopes going out of my office, which are the same as those going out of every other office, marked only "House of Commons, Canada" will also have the postal code on them?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the reason is that we are trying to get people to use the postal code because it helps mail to be dealt with more rapidly.

As for the first part of the question, I think the hon. member should understand that even if he does not get his mail regularly at this moment, it is because there is obviously a backlog of mail. We are trying, by way of overtime and the use of casuals, to get it moved as soon as possible. I presume the hon. member will get his mail on time in the next few days.

FINANCE

INTEREST RATE ON CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Can the minister tell the House how great is the number of Canada Savings Bonds on which the interest rate is below the present 9.5 per cent and on which it may well have to be raised?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are having an active campaign on Canada Savings Bonds at this time and the market is responding very well. I do not want to speculate about what could happen in the next week or the next month.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Can the minister assure the House that the treasury can handle the large sums of money for redemptions that could occur if the Canada Savings Bonds were presented, bearing in mind that some investment houses are advising clients to avoid Canadian bonds?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, Canada Savings Bonds were easy to market in the past, and they are easy to market at this time.

PENITENTIARIES

PLANS FOR NEW FEDERAL PENITENTIARY AT SELKIRK, MAN.

Mr. Peter P. Masniuk (Portage): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. The prairie regional director for the Canadian Penitentiary Service, Mr. Jim Phelps, stated recently that the government is considering three options for the proposed new federal prison at Selkirk, Manitoba: first, no penitentiary at all; second, an even bigger prison; third, a medium-sized prison, but not for some years yet.

In view of these stated contradictory options, which have only served to create more confusion and uncertainty for the people of Selkirk and for the employees of the present institution at Stony Mountain, I would like to ask the Solicitor General if he could give a clear statement of the government's plans for the proposed new federal penitentiary at Selkirk, Manitoba.

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member describes the options as being contradictory, but they are options and they are being considered. An announcement relative to the Selkirk penitentiary and the option we may select of the three the hon. member has advanced will be made in due course—I hope soon—in order to remove the uncertainty the hon. member has described.

CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS

ALLEGED DISHONEST LABELLING OF FORD CARS BUILT AT OAKVILLE, ONT.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The minister knows that Ford of Canada recently received a $68 million hand-out from the government of Ontario and the federal government. Considering that its profits are more than twice as high in Canada than they are in the United States, I ask the minister if he is aware that at the Oakville plant in Ontario, Ford is producing vehicles dishonestly labelled as coming from Buffalo, New York, and that for the identical vehicle coming off the assembly line at Oakville, Canadians are being charged some $388 more per vehicle than the same car going to the United States?

Hon. Warren Allmand (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): No, Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of that problem, but since I have responsibility for labelling, I will check into this matter and make sure that they follow the rules.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, considering that the issue at stake is not simply dishonesty in suggesting where the car is being produced but also concerns equity for Canadian consumers, and considering that if you add the differene in price that comes from additional extras, the additional mark-ups that come from a whole variety of other items that are not included in this basic price difference, will the minister take steps to commit the government to a policy that will mean Canadians do not pay one cent more for cars produced in Canada than do Americans?

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, I will certainly check the allegations of the hon. member to see if what he says is correct; and having done that, I will follow it up.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—DELAY IN ANSWERING QUESTIONS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the parliamentary secretary again that many of us have had questions on the order paper extending back many months, and in some cases a matter of years. I wonder whether the parliamentary secretary might do the House the courtesy of saying if he does not intend to answer questions that have sat on the order paper for several months. Perhaps he could table in the House a list of those questions which the government has no intention of answering, so we could have some idea of what they are, and certainly if there is some justification for presenting such a list then I am sure those of us who are affected would be pleased to withdraw the questions. If that were done, at least we would have some indication of what the intentions of the government were, and we could pursue the government as to the reasons why it felt it was necessary to leave the questions on the order paper for a protracted period without giving any adequate explanation.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I find these remarks unfair. On numerous occasions, following interventions made by the hon. member or by others, I have shown the government's goodwill and efficiency in dealing with questions on the order paper. I repeat once more that during the last two sessions we answered more than 90 per cent of the questions on the order paper. We are at the beginning of a new session and all the required personnel of the 40 departments or agencies are doing research to find the best complete answers to the very numerous questions already on the order paper and I can assure the hon. member that everything is being done to answer the greatest possible number of questions in the most complete and exact way possible. I can assure him that in the next days we will be able to list more questions which have been answered and I simply ask him to show here the most elementary patience.

October 30—The Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council—The following proposed motion: —That the document entitled Proposed Standing Orders of the House and Rules of the Senate tabled Monday, October 30, 1978 (Sessional Paper No. 304-7/2), be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Speaker: Order please. I believe I overlooked, under government notices of motion this afternoon, that pursuant to section 2 of Standing Order 21 the notice of motion standing in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is transferred to and ordered for consideration under government orders later this day or at the next sitting of the House.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen).

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. Is it in the name of the Deputy Prime Minister?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 31, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, be read the second time and referred to committee of the whole.

Mr. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, first of all let me thank you once again for the opportunity to speak on this matter. For those members who are unaware of it, I had the opportunity for four minutes last night to begin my speech. I took that opportunity to pass on my thanks and my compliments to those who have assisted me in the past. I also indicated that I was very happy to be able to speak today with respect to Bill C-10, particularly within the context of the guaranteed income supplement debated last week and the forthcoming discussions with respect to Bill C-2. As I indicated last night it allows me to talk about two nations. I recognize that this caused some difficulty because some people felt I might engage in a constitutional debate. Of course my purpose is otherwise.

I wish to talk about two other kinds of nations. In fact I steal the phrase from a book by a former prime minister of Great Britain in the nineteenth century, Benjamin Disraeli, who was not only a politician, as you recall, but was also a novelist. He used the novel in the way many people in the nineteenth century did, and that is to say, to make social comment. He wrote a novel called "Sybil." In that novel he described the England of his boyhood. He described two nations. They were two nations that had almost no intercourse one with the other, and had very little sympathy one with each other. Indeed, they were two nations that were ignorant of each other's habits, ignorant of each other's thoughts, and ignorant of each other's feelings. It is as though they were dwelling in two different time warps and on two different planets.

In fact the two nations were formed by different breeding, different upbringing. They were fed by different food. They were ordered by different manners and different mores and they were governed by different laws and different regulations. They were, indeed as he called them, the nation of the rich and the nation of the poor. They had very little connection except in two ways, one in the work-place where they met basically on the staircase, one coming from upstairs and one coming from downstairs. They also met socially through the institution of charity because, in the nineteenth century, at least in England, the institution of charity was the basic way in which they followed biblical injunction to look after the poor, the lame, the halt, and the blind.

Today, in this country, as the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) indicated happily, Canadians need not starve or beg in the streets for food, for shelter or for clothing. Our old people do not die because they are deprived of proper medical attention. Medical care and sickness are not the catastrophe they once were in terms of wiping out a family's lifesavings. So we have come a great distance. We have gone far in developing not only a social conscience, but also in realizing the importance of social security. But, like any long journey, it is wise to pause to see what we have built and to reflect on what it means to the people for whom the benefits are supposed to be forthcoming. I think now is a good time to do that, particularly in light of the comments made by both ministers yesterday.

I believe the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated that this was a bill involving major social reform, a major restructuring. I believe the Minister of National Health and Welfare called it a revolutionary bill. So perhaps now is a good time to talk about where we have been and where we might want to go.

My own view is that we have two nations still with us. That is an oversimplification, and indeed it is not helpful to call them the nation of the rich and the nation of the poor. But it is helpful to understand them as the nation of the haves and the nation of the have-nots. When I say that, in order to appreciate the point as I do, it is necessary to understand that being a have or a have-not in Canada is not only an economic condition, it is in fact a condition which is moral, psychological, emotional, and indeed spiritual.

Indeed, if you look at the ethical criteria for any of the social welfare programs in the history of this country, and I look to the old Bruce commission of 1934 for the quote, the state has the right and the obligation to intervene in the economy in order "to assist individuals to realize their personal goals, their dignity and their self-esteem". That is the justification of social welfare in this country. Indeed, that is the crucial difference between charity and social security. That is the test.

To the extent that social welfare programs in this country contribute to the individual's personal goals, dignity and self-esteem, that is the extent to which we succeed. To the extent we do not, we fail the test. We talk about the principles of self esteem, dignity, and personal goals. That is the talk not only here but anywhere one wants to discuss it in this country.

I remember a line from Eldridge Cleaver who wrote the book "Soul on Ice," "If you are going to talk to talk you're going to have to walk to walk." I thought it might be helpful, it is certainly helpful to me, to take a short walk through the nation of the have-nots. Who do you find there? You find the same people. You find some old people sitting there with a lifetime of skills, a storehouse of knowledge, talent, and ways of doing things, unused, blunted by an artificial barrier. You find them sitting there so lonely.

If I could interrupt my own comment, I recall being in Peking in 1975. I had the opportunity to talk to a number of people dealing with urban affairs in that country. The first question was what were the two or three most important problems for a large urban area. We agreed that they were not transportation and housing. In fact the largest single social problem in large urban areas is loneliness. The price of that, in both economic and non-economic terms, is incalculable.

We also find in the nation of the have-nots our old friends, the lame, the halt, and the blind. They are not called that today. They are called the disabled. This country, the federal government, provincial governments, municipal governments, private corporations, and people, continue to handicap the disabled at every turn.

If you have never been disabled in an ambulatory way, think about the enormous physical effort in terms of strategy and in terms of logistics for the simple act of going to the bathroom if you are in a wheelchair.

There are about two million people in this country who are regarded as being disabled. They are often ignored and forgotten. I might add that those who are most often forgotten are the adult handicapped. The media, our institutions of learning, and most of our social voluntary organizations tend, and with good reason I am sure, to focus only on young disabled persons.

Do you know what happens to people who are paraplegics, people with ambulatory difficulties, and people with perception difficulties, who are no longer taken care of in the range of institutions which we have for young people? They do not do anything. That is what happens to them.

[Mr. Crombie.]

In December of this year there will be the first, if not in North America, certainly in Canada, paraplegic disco. A man by the name of Ben Graf is organizing that. He knows there is no place for these people to go. The incidence among these people is something we do not often hear about because it is not part of the numerology of statisticians.

A little further along the walk we find women. It is not necessary for me to deal with this in any lengthy fashion because it was dealt with so well yesterday by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald). However, I think it is worth-while to point out that the constant debate about the rights of women is a kind of smoke screen that does not assist us.

Surely the liberation of the ability of women to proceed to a life of self-esteem, dignity, and pursuing personal goals, should not be at odds with their traditional role of being a mother and a wife.

I have two daughters. They are every bit as bright as my son. I see nothing wrong with them having the ability to be doctors, lawyers, plumbers, MPs or anything they choose, and, as well, enjoy the sorrows and pleasures of being wives and mothers. There is nothing wrong with them being twice blessed, as it were. Men, of course, have enjoyed being twice blessed since their inception.

Finally, there are the poor. In many years the poor are the other three as well. It is one thing to be old. It is another to be old and poor. It is one thing to be handicapped. It is unbelievable to be handicapped and poor. It is one thing to be a woman and deal with that role of confusion in our time, and another thing to be poor as well.

Those are the people I found in my walk through the nation of the have-nots. I am sure hon. members would add people whom they know. Most of those people have become conscript clients in a multi-million dollar social welfare system. I wish to speak about that system for a moment.

It is a system that has "growed up like Topy", put together piece by piece, in some ways brick by brick, but a bit lumpy. It is a system that has become huge, often wasteful, and increasingly incomprehensible to the people for whom the benefits are to flow. It is a system which too often offers not self-esteem but humiliation. It is a system which does not eradicate but often perpetuates the loss of individuality. Talk to your constituents and you will know it has become too often a source of a constant reminder of an assault on their sense of dignity. To put a face on it, it is a system of waiting lists.

One thing I discovered in the short time I have been in this city is that when going to the airport in order to fly back to wherever you happen to come from, you get wait-listed. I am sure all hon. members have been wait-listed. It is frustrating to want to go somewhere and do something, and not be able to get there because of forces beyond your control.

We have a system of social welfare in this country which wait-lists us. It wait-lists all of those people. It does not just wait-list them for an airplane ride home. How would hon. members feel if they were wait-listed for a home? How would we feel if we were told "put in an application and come back three years from now"? Wait-listed for a home; wait-listed for a wheelchair; wait-listed for a brace for your stump; wait-listed for opportunity—that is what it means to a great number of people in this country.

● (1522)

I do not have any words of wisdom or easy solutions, but I do suggest that there are some things we might wish to think about again. Perhaps we should remember that it is sometimes wise to have a renewal not only of a program but, indeed, of the philosophy and the purpose behind it. Perhaps we should, therefore, think about a couple of things. This society places great value on three things—independence, usefulness, and making a contribution to society. Those are precisely the goals and desires of the people who dwell in the world of the have-nots. They want independence; they want to be useful; and they want to make a contribution to their society.

Maybe we need to look at other ways in which to approach the social security system. Perhaps we should be looking at new self-help programs. Should we not be looking at the merits of a self-development corporation so that these people can engage in free enterprise? Perhaps we should also find a way to rationalize the programs at the federal level, the provincial level and, as in the city from which I come, at two other levels. Maybe the simple act of just putting them under one roof so that people only have to go to one building would be useful. It would not have to be a government building, Mr. Speaker.

In the city of Toronto local 183 of the Labourers' Union—well known I believe to the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Caccia)—has an excellent set-up. By and large the members in that union are Portuguese and Italian. There used to be a lot of Irishmen on the executive but they have managed to overcome "that difficulty"—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: —so the head of the union is basically Mr. Stepinnini. If you go to Dupont Street and see local 183 in action, what you will find on four floors, other than a computer, which is interesting to note, is the opportunity for every member of that union to learn driver training; they can get information on local welfare programs; at the next door they can get information about citizenship. Indeed, I have attended a citizenship meeting there where I am sure that the people felt that their citizenship came from the Queen, the Governor-General, and Johnny Stepinnini!

What is important about my point, Mr. Speaker, is that these people can go to this one place and find two things. First, the services we try to offer are gathered together in one spot. Second, the person they deal with has the range of understanding of what those programs mean and what is available to them. They are treated as a whole person. Nobody goes to a doctor's office and is met by 39 people who all want to take over a part of his body. That comes later!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crombie: People go to a doctor and say; "Look at the whole of me." That is what these people need, too.

While I was preparing my thoughts to make my contribution I thought of my experiences over the past years in government. I am well aware of the difficulties which are met in the administration of programs. Perhaps it is wise to remember there is a vast difference between a good idea and a good idea well administered. There is all the world of difference. It is the good idea well administered which touches the people we intend to help.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: I also wish to say that no one has a monopoly on wanting to help; no individual and no group.

I remember a line from W. B. Yeats which I learned for a different purpose. I think he spoke for all the poor, all the people who would be considered the have-nots, when he wrote:

But I, being poor, have only my dreams; I have spread my dreams under your feet; tread softly because you tread on my dreams.

Maybe if we begin by remembering these words, we will serve our people better, Mr. Speaker. Thank you.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to support the bill before us today which would make some fundamental changes to the family allowances program. When the economy is buoyant it is fairly easy to use our prosperity to develop creative social programs, but in times of restraint it needs great thought and care to come up with some imaginative changes which will put more disposable income in the hands of people who use it most and who need it most, without breaching restraint. The minister is to be congratulated for a set of proposals which increase moneys available to families with young children in low and middle income brackets without increasing the over-all burden on the taxpayer.

If we look at what is available to families with children at the present time by way of state help, apart from the non-direct financial assistance such as medicare, free education and so on, the government moneys available to families with children are, first, the family allowance which has been in place since 1945 and has been indexed since 1974, and which at the present time is $25.68 a month, or $308 a year for each child under the age of 18. Second, through the tax system there is the dependant's exemption of $460 for each dependent child under the age of 16, and $840 for each dependent child over the age of 16. Then in 1977 there was an additional measure of a reduction in federal tax of $50 for each child. Both family allowance and the dependant's exemption are indexed to the cost of living.

Faced with the high cost of child rearing and the need which many low income and middle income families were expressing for assistance in this regard, the question was how to reorder the distribution of existing moneys so as to place more into the hands of those who needed income supplementation in order to create a healthy lifestyle for children in these groups and give them the same opportunity to develop physically, intellectually, and emotionally as children in more fortunate families.

● (1532)

The minister's solution which is before us now is to eliminate the $50 tax credit and to replace it with a refundable $200 child tax credit for families earning less than $18,000 a year, if there is only one child. This is scaled progressively upwards for each child in a family. As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said when introducing this bill, this is the first federal refundable tax credit. I quote from the minister's speech as follows:

Many have criticized tax cuts that failed to help those in need. This government has progressively eliminated taxes on lower-income Canadians through measures such as tax indexing and the federal tax reduction. Now we are using the tax system in order to go further; to actually supplement the incomes of such families directly.

Last night there were two speeches from the Tory benches which were long on invective but short on reason. Near panic was expressed because this measure opens the door to negative income tax. I do not know where some hon. members opposite have been for the last few years, because this is not a new idea. In 1973 there was a federal-provincial social security review which involved provinces and citizens generally in an extensive review of the whole structure of our social security. These ideas were discussed then. This measure is a beginning which really does not terrify most people, particularly the poor who stand to gain from it.

Another absurdity we heard from the Tory benches last night, and which I could hardly believe, was that increasing the family allowance for low income families was a plot to force women to stay home instead of working. As evidence of this alleged plot we were treated to some 30-year old figures and statements. Apparently the Tories think that women are in the happy position that the promise of a $200 child tax credit once a year will be a sufficient bribe for them to quit their jobs and go home. The figures I have show that most women, like most men, work because of economic need. About 43 per cent of Canada's working women, or about 1.5 million, are single, separated or divorced, and in some cases they support dependants. I suggest that they really do not have the luxury of choosing whether to work outside the home. They probably would need more than $200 to make them choose to stay home.

Last night we also heard some reference from the Tory benches to the report of the Royal Commission on the Status of Women. It is very nice that the Tories have discovered it at last. It is only what, seven years old? Perhaps their reading of that report was not as careful as it might have been because they missed the whole emphasis of that report regarding women having a choice.

Women whose family situations are such that the best plan is for them to work outside the home should, according to the commission report, have access to affordable day care, but women who think that the best choice for them and their families is to stay home with young children should also have access to supportive services from their communities, be they libraries, nursery schools, educational services for their children, or financial assistance such as family allowances. I think that this emphasis by the royal commission on choice is something which most of us support.

In a civilized society, whether we are parents or not, most of us think it quite appropriate that we use our taxes to contribute to medical care and education of the next generation, and also that we contribute to family allowances in a meaningful way. Children are everybody's business. This bill attempts to provide additional assistance to offset the heavy costs of child rearing. It is designed to assist parents whether they work or not.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) raised a number of important questions which should be addressed at the committee stage. They have very practical implications. One of them had to do with whether people on provincial welfare who receive the tax credit will have their provincial assistance cut.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I hope not.

Miss Nicholson: I think the hon. member might have added to that parents who are assessed for day care, because we often find that parents who receive small raises in salary, small increases in benefits, or reductions in their rent for subsidized housing, promptly have their day care fees raised, so that the benefits are cancelled out. I think this is a very important concern. If this tax credit is to be useful and meaningful, it must be something from which parents can really benefit.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) tells me she has written to all her provincial counterparts asking them to try to leave this tax credit in the hands of parents. She has met with five of them to pursue the discussion. I am sure that all hon. members on all sides of the House wish her well in this endeavour, and want to assist in any way they can.

The other matter raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre had to do with whether this credit, which I gather he supports in principle, might nevertheless press too hard on middle-income families. This is a sound question because increasingly middle-income earners carry the brunt of most of our taxation programs. According to the figures put before us in the charts yesterday, this measure does not seem to work that way. It does seem that families earning up to $23,000 a year will not lose on this, but since the computation is fairly technical, I think it is good that we be alerted to this. The figures should probably be examined and reviewed very carefully to ensure that the assistance to lower income families does not come at the expense of the middle-income group.

Mr. Speaker, I will stop at this point and let someone else have the floor.

• (1542)

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): The introduction of this bill, Mr. Speaker, gives scope for discussion on the effectiveness of allowances such as these, and an opportunity to debate the whole question of the redistribution of income from one group in the community to another, regardless of ability to pay, and in the process hoping to achieve a desirable result.

The previous speaker mentioned that she hoped that the middle income group would not have to bear the brunt of these proposed changes in the family allowance. Who else is there? It is only the middle income group that can afford to pay because they make up the vast bulk of the taxpayers. Even if you took all the assets of the very wealthy it would still not achieve the amount of money necessary to allow this income redistribution. We must look at it on the basis that the middle income earner will be the one to pay.

I have always thought that children's allowances differed from old age pensions in the sense that most families in receipt of the family allowance were also the producers and taxpayers in the community. Of course a few recipients of the old age pension will point out, quite proudly sometimes, that they are in receipt of the family allowance, but these people are usually a minority and looked upon with some awe in the community.

The main change proposed in the family allowance is that it is to be reduced from $25.68 for each child under 18 to, I believe, $20 as of January 1. However, it is to remain indexed on a yearly basis, and for this present year the rate of indexation rate was 7.5 per cent. The cost estimated for the fiscal year 1978-79 is $2 billion, some 4 per cent of the gross federal budget for the country. The mere fact that 7.2 million children were encompassed in half as many families indicates it is a program that has a wide application.

The proposed tax changes will differ in a significant way when the redemption is reduced as of January 1, 1978, from $840 to $460 for those children who are 16 to 17 years of age. This, to me, is a negative proposal, as is the tax credit of $50 per child that will be eliminated on the federal tax payable. It is an attempt to reduce the effect of the allowances payable on those who pay higher income tax. The most significant fact is the proposed refundable child tax credit which is to reduce taxes on a means test basis by up to $200 per child. In cases where there are no taxes payable, a refund will be given.

These things raise a host of questions about which way this program is going, particularly whether or not this form of negative income tax, the $200 direct payout, is a good departure from the accepted norm. I have worked with welfare people and low income people during much of my professional life, and while I am not greatly in favour of universal programs, I deplore this departure from the standard practice of universality. It seems to me that the payments should be made across the board to all families, regardless of their financial situation. Of course the family allowance is considered as income and is taxed at a marginal rate. This way there is not the feeling of alienation by middle class families who feel that for their hard work and efforts they are being unnecessarily penalized. Certainly it is not a good thing to have citizens in the community feeling that the tax system treats them unfairly.

While in England some years ago, I noticed that there were a lot of letters to the newspapers from young women with children born at home, who had been unable to get into the hospitals. These women were complaining that they had to give birth at home while people on welfare were able to use the facilities of the hospital, due largely to the fact that midwives refused to work for welfare recipients in poor housing conditions.

The negative income tax to which I have referred will mean an exemption of $200 per child, and many families will receive upwards of $2,000 or more in one lump sum. Most people who deal with social welfare programs feel that one of the underlying problems with families on social welfare is their failure to budget properly for food, clothing, and other essentials. People who operate small grocery stores in isolated areas and deal with welfare recipients will tell you that the best thing that could be done for these people is to give them a course in how to shop for such things as, for example, foodstuffs, and fruit in season rather than in the off season. To hand out between $200 and $2,000 in one lump sum to these people is not a very good move because much of the money will not benefit the family greatly. The payout should be made in instalments, for example, on a monthly basis, and there should not be a massive outflow of cheques from the federal treasury on April 1, 1979. Perhaps the government is thinking of votes in the June election.

There are a couple of problems that I see with this negative income tax. One is obviously the expense involved in the administration of the program. People are always complaining about the vastness of the bureaucracy and how it is tying up good, productive people who could be better involved in other efforts which do not show up on tax forms. To set up the program will require an investigation of people's income tax files in order to ascertain the extent of the family need through last year's income. Presumably it will be based on the total family income, but with many wives working, and submitting separate income tax returns, the problem is doubled. There is also the fact that the government will be digging into people's personal income tax returns, a further intrusion into the financial affairs of families, not of corporations or the wealthy, but of the ordinary person.

Another factor to be considered is that the income tax return of an individual may bear little relation to a family's financial position. For example, they may have a low income but a large amount of assets, a situation which often occurs when the individual is self-employed. Where one lives is also important. A person living in a rural area may show a much lower cash requirement, but in fact they make a substantial living through their own efforts, what they raise on the farm, etc.

There is also what I call the underground economy. Some people have suggested that it amounts to 15 per cent of the total economy in the United States. In Canada it is probably higher because our income tax is greater. When I say underground economy I am referring to people who circumvent the normal commercial system. It is not necessarily tax evasion, but tax avoidance. Everyone is familiar with the problems of high taxation. Indeed, it is said that in Sweden, where the tax rate is very high, the only people of real worth are the plumbers and carpenters who are able to work for cash as opposed to working for receipts. The problem is assessing the actual cash income of families.

How does one assess a person who raises a vegetable garden and reduces the amount of money spent on food out of the family budget? I understand in Denmark the government is attempting to tax garden produce on the basis that families should show a reduction in the amount of money spent out of their budgets for food. It is felt that they should be taxed so that everyone is equal. Apparently a person who raises a large garden should be taxed on his efforts, as opposed to someone who does not raise garden vegetables and has to pay the market price.

These are some problems administering such a program on a reasonable basis. This growing problem is peculiar to high tax regimes which now prevail in the western world. I do not like the $200 per child direct payment. If it is to be made, surely it should be on a monthly basis. I do not dispute certain families in lower income groups would benefit by extra income, but blanket payouts to every child is not the way to approach the problem.

Over the years I have become quite familiar with how Canada assistance plans function. Careful assessment by experienced workers is necessary to arrive at the best method of assisting low income families with their financial problems. Many low income families need considerable counselling and suggestion. The voucher system is very much in effect on the Indian reserves in my riding. A more careful control is kept over the well-being of families by administrators of bands through the voucher system. The results may be debatable, but considering the vast amount of money spent, negative income tax payouts are not a good idea. This brings up the entire question of government spending.

Perhaps it is fortunate for politicians, but it is unfortunate the public does not have at its disposal a method of informing politicians about how they feel. Such a method is in existence in the United States. Proposition 13 in California startled and shook the foundations of government policy in the United States. That slopped over into Canada. It has become much more honourable to talk about fiscal economy.

In the United States a debate took place concerning its 1979 budget. Representative Marjorie Holt of Maryland rose to introduce a brief but explosive amendment to reduce the president's deficit of $61 billion by $13 billion. The amount of $61 billion is considered large in the United States. What about our approximate deficit of $10 billion or $11 billion, and some even suggest upwards of $15 billion? Our economy is approximately one-tenth the size of the United States. If the American deficit were as large as ours, it would amount to $100 billion or $150 billion. Furthermore, American government expenditures for the benefit of the states are much less than those in Canada for the benefit of the provinces. Provincial deficits account for approximately one-half of the federal deficit. We are in a much worse position, as far as finance is concerned, than the United States.

Today the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated that dramatic happenings occurred in Washington because of the raise in interest rates. Representative Holt said:

> What we must do is to reduce the growth rate of federal spending. We must reduce the government sector's burden on the economy and the excessive strain on the capital markets. The remedy for inflation is production.

Her resolution was defeated, but the substance of it was included in American politics with the Republicans submitting an updated and dramatic five-year plan to produce a balanced budget in 1982. Of course politicians are happy to embrace what is popular and likely to gain votes, even if the idea can be dismissed as empty rhetoric. But we are witnessing a turning away from economic policies which place emphasis on pumping up aggregate demand for goods and services.

We are moving toward policies which encourage production and increase supply. Of course that is the true source of the health and welfare of a nation. Some people say that this common sense objective was lost during the depression in the intricacies of Keynesian theories. It was felt the market system was not self-sustaining due to leakages between people's propensity to save and real investment opportunities. Thus, there was a tendency for demand to fall short of potential output, and the government increased spending to make up the deficit. Of course it was argued that this could be done without inflationary consequences until full employment was attained.

This thought or attitude was embraced by all politicians, but one must remember that it was based on conditions which existed a long time ago. Today there is inflation, unemployment, and a universal agreement that we suffer from an acute shortage of capital investment. Thus the emphasis on pumping up demand through increased consumption and transfer of income from rich to poor looks less and less attractive. It is a fact that there must be balance oriented to growth and capital formation. Without capital it will not be possible to solve production and inflation problems.

It would be nice to reduce taxation without reducing outlays. Government spending has risen at fantastic rates. The present budget deficit of the Canadian federal government is greater than the total budget in 1968 when the Trudeau government came into power. These enormous deficits sop up capital and savings which should be invested in capital markets. If the Bank of Canada is required to monetize the debt, or even a substantial portion of it, there will be the added factor of dangerous inflation. Therefore there is every reason to welcome a determination to retain fiscal control.

We can look at what happened with a minority government during the period 1972 to 1974. At that time the deficit was less than $3 billion. Largely it was monetized. The Bank of Canada printed money rather than distribute a bond issue in the marketplace. This added to the severe inflation which we experience today, and I suggest inflation will increase in the immediate future.

It is important to examine the direction of government spending. Perhaps military outlays should be increased, but we must look at welfare spending which largely consists of transfer payments from one group to another. No matter how unpleasant it may be, this is the area we should look at if we are to curtail government outlays. In the past, transfer payments put a floor under purchasing power as well as caring for human needs. If transfers are made from savers to spenders on a vast scale, savings, investments, and capital formation will be destroyed. If transfers are wide-ranging, incentive to work is undermined and/or destroyed, because the people who work finally realize that their rewards are not greater than those who do not. As workers find their net take home pay reduced, their incentive to keep their jobs is reduced. In extreme cases, transfers encourage idleness.

Perhaps this is a difficult index to measure, but recent statistics of the Unemployment Insurance Commission indicate that UIC benefits have increased unemployment by approximately 1 per cent or 2 per cent. I am sure many hon. members know that a large number of people have used UIC as income maintenance rather than a true insurance feature. They were entitled to do so under Unemployment Insurance Commission regulations.

It is reassuring that we are now aware of the dangers of discouraging healthy growth of productive enterprise, on the one hand, and indiscriminate expansion of the welfare state on the other. One must remember that there are inflationary consequences: increased payroll taxes, minimum wage costs, and rising business costs. Surely these are issues which justify the control of inflation.

In 1919 Keynes wrote the following:

> There is no surer way of destroying capitalism than by debauching the currency, The process engages all the hidden forces of economic law on the side of destruction, and does it in a manner which not one man in a million is able to diagnose.

This bill contains a provision to transfer wealth from one group to another. Apparently the so-called refundable child tax credit proposition is to be socially beneficial, but in my opinion it is not as useful as it might be. Therefore I have considerable reservation that in the future we will find this refundable tax credit being the best method we had hoped for in respect of child support.

Mr. Bob Rae (Broadview): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my remarks by agreeing with my colleague in the class of '78, the hon. member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie), that the introduction of this bill allows us the opportunity to review some of the problems and philosophies underlying legislation regarding social welfare and economic maintenance. I think it is important for us to do so. It seems to me we are frequently in the position of adding on a piece of legislation, or changing a piece of legislation, from time to time without fully realizing the implications of what we are doing, or what precisely are the problems we are trying to solve.

I was interested last night to hear the hon. member say he was going to be speaking today about two nations. Because I knew he was referring to Disraeli and not Mr. Daniel Johnson or someone else when referring to that subject, I took the opportunity this morning to go to the library and look up Disraeli's biography by Sir Robert Blake. According to that book, Disraeli was asked at the end of his life which of the two nations he belonged to, and his answer was that he was not of either nation; he was on the side of the angels. I might say that the hon. member for Rosedale demonstrated in his speech today that he too is on the side of the angels, because in his very eloquent remarks, and I take nothing away from them, concerning the condition of many of our fellow Canadians, he was a little short, if I may say, on hard measures that will have to be taken to deal with the problems these people face, but was very long on description.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: He didn't say anything about your maiden speech.

Mr. Rae: He was a little short on remedies. In reply to the hon. member who interjected, let me say that he did.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I did not comment on your speech, but I will now.

Mr. Rae: I might also add that it seems to me it is important to realize that the position of our party in respect of welfare, problems of poverty, and income distribution, is significantly different from those of the other two parties. It seems to me that our differences stem from the very simple fact that what we are looking at here is an economic system which creates poverty, which creates deprivation, and which creates inequality, and haphazard attempts by the government in response to social pressures over the past 40 years to alleviate some of the harshest inequalities that our economic system creates.

It was the minister last night who said as the minister who is responsible for bringing an end to poverty in Canada, she was delighted to bring in this measure. The difference between our party and the other two parties, realizing as we do that it is the economic policy which is at the heart of solving the problem of income distribution, and not welfare policy, is that we realize it is not economic measures that will have to solve the problems of income distribution. These problems will not be solved by a simple band-aid approach to those people who are suffering as the result of the inequities and injustices of our economic system.

It seems to me it is very important and necessary for members to realize, and in the speeches we have heard from both sides of the House this has been forgotten, that poverty is not something that strikes out of mid-air; it is not a haphazard event, but something that strikes at the people who are unable to compete in the economic market place which puts a premium on power, which puts a premium on ability, and which puts a premium on productivity and one's ability as an individual to be a good economic commodity. That is the hard, ruthless truth about our economic system. The kind words that many members have spoken about the importance of doing good for those people who are less fortunate than ourselves should not blind us to the very harsh facts which lie behind an economic system that benefits systematically certain people, and does not benefit others.

There have been arguments I have heard, and I am sure many members have heard, as to whether poverty is declining or growing in Canada. The facts recited by my House leader yesterday, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), gave the clearest demonstration of the facts that we know, and that is that, relatively speaking, the share of the national economy going to those who need it has not changed significantly since 1951. The relative share has not changed significantly since 1951.

In her remarks yesterday the minister said that up until 1975 the number of people below the poverty line had gone down. Be that as it may, that ignores the fact that the economic measures which have been taken by this government that have created unemployment, that kept down wages as a result of the Anti-Inflation Board, and the freezing of wages that took place after 1975, all have resulted in an increase in the number of families who are below the poverty line of some 67,000 in 1977.

When we look at what it is—and perhaps it is appropriate that it was a minister of finance who introduced this bill—in our economic system which creates inequality, it is completely artificial for us to focus all our attention narrowly on certain very minor changes, important though they may be in their own way. It is artificial that we focus our attention very simply on the question of welfare and certain benefits going from one group to another.

I think it was the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Miss Nicholson), the hon. member for Trinity, who best described the completely limited vision and the totally restricted view which the government, and I can only say that I assume it is shared by members on the other side since they have said nothing to criticize it, has taken in the presentation of this bill. That myopic and limited view is that the government is concerned with how to re-order existing moneys. I wrote down what the minister said, and I think that is a pretty fair quotation. The government's problem, which it set itself, was how to re-order the moneys which currently are being spent on family allowances, and to distribute them in a better way.

Perhaps I could refer to the bill specifically and say, speaking for myself, my main reservation and concern about this bill are that what it does, quite simply is to take money away in terms of the reduction in family benefits—immediate benefits of $6, and it will be $8 in December—and attempt to redistribute that money.

We are not talking about the wealth of Canada. We are not talking about the bounteous wealth of Imperial Oil or the advantages that go to the corporate executives of this world. We are not talking about that wealth. That wealth has never been touched by the Liberal government, and it never will be. What we are talking about when we talk about distribution of wealth is a much narrower subject, and that is distributing the part of the family allowance that has been cut back to another group of people. Let us not have any fuss or bother from the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) or the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), or any fine words about redistributing income in this country, because that is not what they intend to do. What they intend to do is redistribute family allowances. Let us be quite clear about that.

If they were serious about redistributing income, or if they were serious about inequities in the income tax system, they would have a massive job to do, and that is not a job they intend to do, and remember, they had the opportunity to do it after the Carter commission report. I think they then showed the muscle of which they are made by their decisions in respect of that report.

The number of loopholes that exist in the act, and indexation in the income tax system, give far greater benefit to those who are well off than those who are not. The whole system of deduction and exemptions rather than the principle of giving tax credits gives a tremendous advantage to those people with more money compared to those with none. There are the advantages that are given to those people who are allowed to incorporate themselves, the advantages given to those people who are allowed to be self-employed rather than wage earners. These are all examples, Mr. Speaker. Anybody who has been in the market place and knows what people who call themselves self-employed can do, know what a joke our tax system is if regarded as an equitable way of distributing wealth and opportunities.

Since 1968 the share of income tax revenues coming from corporations has dropped dramatically, and the share of income tax revenues paid by individuals has increased dramatically. We know that every time the corporations of this country come to the government with a problem, the government is ready to roll over like a spaniel. The list of depreciation allowances and benefits which have only created an atmosphere of mistrust and division within the country, give a tremendous advantage to those who have and do nothing for those who have not.

I know it is not fashionable on this side to be critical of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but I could not help but be critical when I heard she was reported to have said a couple of months ago that she could not hear the voice of the poor. Then yesterday she said that the trouble with the poor is that they are disappearing and that it is not as fashionable as it used to be to speak up on behalf of the poor. All I can say is that the minister is in the wrong party. If she were in our party she would be well aware of the fact that the poor are speaking up all the time. She is welcome in my constituency on any Saturday morning to listen to the complaints, the worries, and concerns of people who cannot live a decent life on the benefits provided by the federal government and the provincial government. I think it is disgraceful that the minister should say that poor people are not speaking loudly enough.

In 1968 this government put forward programs providing grants to old peoples' groups and to the Company of Young Canadians to speak up for old people, to organize them so that they could speak up. Then the same government took those grants away. When the voices were loud they cut the mikes. As one who had his mike cut today, I appreciate the difficulties that can cause. The mikes have been taken away from the old people of this country and now the minister is saying, "Speak up, I cannot hear you." All she has to do is put the mike in again and she will hear them loud and clear.

Apart from the general concerns we have about the legislation, I suggest if this government were serious about redistributing income and opportunities there would be a number of things it could do not only to the tax system but also in terms of its economic policy. If it were serious about the distribution of income it would not propose to cut back on unemployment benefits the way it has done. Cutting back on unemployment benefits means cutting back on the incomes of those working people who are temporarily out of the labour market, and has the direct effect of reducing incomes. It has a negative effect on the distribution of income.

If the government was serious about creating greater equality between men and women there would have been serious affirmative action programs in the federal market place where something could be done for the disadvantaged. Nothing has been forthcoming, however. The legislation is there that would enable the government to do something, and we are waiting for action, but nothing has been put forward as yet. The government could have put forward economic policies with respect to the really powerful people in our community to see that their actions would create employment rather than unemployment. It could have acted on the Inco cutbacks a year ago. It could have been serious about the number of plant closures in Ontario in this past year. It could have done something about the fact that ours is a branch plant economy, and it could have done something about research and development and an industrial strategy. None of these things have been done.

It is the highest form of hypocrisy for the government members to come to us and say they have discovered the idea of redistribution of income. They are not interested in that; they are only interested in saving money on certain kinds of benefits such as family allowances, and then producing this tax credit scheme. Why stop with the family benefits? Why not move ahead on all the other tax credit suggestions that have been forthcoming from this side of the House?

Finally, Mr. Speaker, there are two problems that I want to raise with respect to the legislation, which I think are important. The first matter has been raised by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and has been partially answered by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The problem is that any attempt by the federal government to redistribute income may be sabotaged by provincial welfare legislation. This is what makes the principle of redistribution so difficult to attain in this country. From her work in her own constituency I am sure the minister is aware that with the plethora of programs we have—the disability pension, workmen's compensation, family assistance plans, provincial disability legislation—what frequently happens to people on welfare is that they get bogged down with regulations. If they apply for a disability pension under the Canada disability plan they have to ask themselves if it is worth all the problems and difficulties involved when the net result will be no increase in their income.

Before the minister can come to us and claim that this bill will have a redistributive effect, we must know which provincial legislatures will go along with it. Without that assurance it will be difficult to convince anyone that this is anything more than an accounting scheme which gives money to the provincial governments and nothing to the people involved.

Last year this government passed Bill C-46 which deals with those marvellous individuals in the private market who make a living from providing loans to people about to receive income tax refunds. I find it extraordinary that a bill provides for a 60 per cent rate of interest over a year for people who rely on income tax refunds and need the money on a short-term basis. I think this is extraordinary. It is a tribute to the usurious members of our community, and I put it to the minister that this bill was passed before this new legislation was contemplated. I suggest that in this way we create an entirely new market for income tax discounters which was not contemplated at the time the legislation was passed. This new market of some 700,000 individuals means that all the income tax discounters will be able to prey on people receiving a large lump sum payment in March, April or May next year. That will take place at a time when there is no clear indication from the government which department will enforce the provisions of Bill C-46. In view of the cutbacks announced by the government, it is clear that there will not be enough bureaucrats to enforce the regulations under Bill C-46.

The fact that the payment is being made in a lump sum is an invitation to the income tax discounters to take advantage of the women and men who are living at the bottom end of our economic system. I am concerned about the effect this will have on the people in my riding. I am sure the minister, too, is concerned about people in her riding, and I know that my fellow members on this side of the House are concerned as well. I would much prefer to see in place a system which would allow payment to be made over a period in such a way that people would not be reliant on the income tax discounters for their bread and butter or refrigerator. In our opinion, these discounters should not exist.

I say frankly that it will be with considerable reluctance that I will vote in principle for this bill. The reasons are simple. First, I do not particularly like to see a reduction in the universal payment of the family allowance, and the fact is it will be reduced by some $6 or $8 depending on the cut-off. Second, in terms of general principle, I am concerned that this is not a significant redistribution of income but is a redistribu-tion of existing moneys, a reordering of existing moneys according to the phrase used by the hon. member for Trinity.

Agreement with the provincial government is necessary before we can even talk about income maintenance. As I say, I am concerned about the discounters—this may not be a matter of principle, but it is, nevertheless, one of real concern.

In closing I want to say that the government has put forward this measure as if it were a revolutionary time in terms of income tax legislation and of social welfare legislation. I am afraid that one does not have to be a Marxist to differ from the views of the government on that score. I do not see this as a revolutionary change.

Miss Bégin: Nobody said it was. It is only a reform. Do not get excited.

Mr. Rae: I can assure the minister I am not getting excited about this legislation at all. I would only point out that if it is to have the effects that the minister wants it to have, there is a lot of hard work to be done convincing provincial governments to go along with this scheme and not to penalize those who receive benefits. I am not entirely optimistic on that score. In addition, there are very real administrative difficulties in this legislation which I hope we shall be able to discuss further in committee because they are of great concern to members on this side.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I must say that I was greatly interested in the flowery rhetoric of the hon. member for Broadview (Mr. Rae). It must recognize that for a newcomer, he knows how to handle sophistry masterfully. He seems to irradiate an intimate coalescence with the poor of this country. His only problem is that he is cheeky. He accused the minister of being insensitive to the pleadings of the poor. What does he know about poverty, Mr. Speaker? I leave it to the Canadian people to answer. He will no doubt readily realize that Proudhon, Rousseau or Marx may be very fine in books but that reality sometimes requires some adjustments, which has been well understood by his colleagues of the New Democratic Party who, when promoting quite legitimate interests and endorsing social objectives to which I suscribe in principle, have generally shown more restraint than he did.

Mr. Speaker, in a very lengthy and wordy tirade, the hon. member took to task both our society and the ruling party. It is very easy for someone who will probably not have the opportunity to run the country, and in this regard, I merely remind him that he would be well-advised in the future—if he really believes in the principle he endorsed earlier—to support the efforts made by this government or any future government to better meet the needs of those Canadians who experience hardships and to try to narrow the gap between the rich and the poor. I must remind him, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberal party has always sought, since we are the ones—history proves it—who introduced most of the social measures we now have.

Without necessarily being a cure-all they still helped put this country at the forefront of all those which have enacted elaborate social measures. In that respect, he tried to see in Bill C-10 a new philosophy based on providing encouragement for the rich when in fact it is only a readjustment. I will come back later to the objectives the minister wanted to promote when last August, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), she announced amendments to the family allowance program and an upward revision of the guaranteed income supplement.

● (1632)

I would just like to point out in passing a few mistakes that probably crept surreptitiously in the text of the hon. member for Broadview, mistakes having to do with the interpretation he placed on the provisions of Bill C-10 and the effect on the administration of the family allowance program. He insinuated that with those amendments a new corruptive element was being introduced in the system, namely that the Income Tax Act was now going to have an effect on the family allowance program when the department will mail out the annual cheques. He insinuated that this would allow other agencies to take with one hand what has been given with the other. I just want to remind him that it has been provided, whether through the War Veterans Allowances Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act or even public assistance plans, that those programs will not affect the new credit which will not be considered as income, and I think that is fundamental, Mr. Speaker. On the other hand—

Mr. Orlikow: How will you make the provinces live up to that?

Mr. Lachance: If he wants to speak I would ask the hon. member to do so later. I did not interrupt the hon. member for Broadview so I would ask him to let me speak.

I would like to point out something which may not be a mistake on the part of the hon. member but at least an innuende that could be misleading for Canadians and especially those who will benefit from these measures, concerns what is commonly called tax discounters. Let me remind you that this system allows potential recipients of any government assistance to get in advance from private agencies the money they expect to collect shortly for a certain percentage. The hon. member mentioned earlier usurious rates—he may correct me if I am wrong—of 40 or 45 per cent, Mr. Speaker. I simply want to stress that point.

Mr. Orlikow: Sixty per cent, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Lachance: The hon. member says 60 per cent, Mr. Speaker. I must remind him that the interest rate stipulated in Bill C-56 is 15 per cent or less. Therefore, in that case they are not usurious rates, Mr. Speaker. One could say that 15 per cent is too high and that this measure should be completely abolished. The matter is debatable, but let no one say nor suggest what is not true.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, as far as monthly payments are concerned, the hon. member says that the yearly lump sum should be spread in equal payments over a full year. I simply want to emphasize that if he listened to or read the speech of the minister he should know that she clearly stated that in future, if the beneficiaries so wish, we are prepared to consider giving this single payment provided in Bill C-10 in several instalments.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should not try to attribute bad intentions—which I cannot indeed clearly identify since he took care not to substantiate his charges—to the minister, the government and its members, but he should try rather to make constructive suggestions and recommendations, to which we would listen with interest at the committee stage or elsewhere, so as to improve the technical aspects of this bill.

In this regard, beyond the technical aspects of this bill, which only applies the technical principle of redistribution, the hon. member asked quite appropriately whether we are not taking new sums within the budget of the federal government to give relatively higher amounts under this program than in the past. I think he is right.

However, he is quite wrong to jump to conclusions and say that we do not want to do more, Mr. Speaker. History has shown us, and again quite recently—and when I say recently I go back perhaps two or three years—that this government has taken very serious steps in co-operation with the provinces to try to implement a guaranteed annual income program on a new basis, by trying to rationalize the multiplicity of existing programs and to replace the disgrace that some people still associate with social assistance by a fairer system which can help all those Canadians who, for one reason or another, must at a certain time in their life ask the government to help them out.

Mr. Speaker, the word "request", I think, is important. Some have seen in the amendments proposed by the minister an unhealthy shift from the previous universal system without a means test to a system under which those recipients who are entitled to a lump sum payment will have to make a formal request in January when they receive their monthly cheque. I think that point should be seriously considered beyond the scope of Bill C-10.

As I said earlier, Bill C-10 is an attempt at redistribution and should not be considered as a new philosophy in social security. I want to be quite clear about that. It is not because we do something, perhaps not very much, for groups of have-nots that we should not seek ways of doing better. In that respect, I feel the House and our governments generally must by all means bring their efforts to bear on a rationalization of social services in Canada and, particularly, income support.

I would like to encourage the minister to continue that effort with her provincial counterparts in order to try and revive what was, for some time, an almost tangible hope to implement at last a universal guaranteed income support system in Canada. That would make it at last possible to get rid of that "odiousness" I was referring to earlier and which is attached to some of our social measures and some of our current social programs. It would also make it possible, in cooperation with other government levels, to allocate most of the funds to those who really need them and thus avoid wastage in complex administrations.

In that respect, I believe the system which had then been proposed, the negative income tax, was a step in the right direction. Had there been agreement, it would surely have made it possible to set up swiftly such a system and thus enable us to steer clear of complicated processes to achieve what we are trying to do with Bill C-10, namely redistribution. In this context, this redistribution is made through a central system, the Department of National Revenue. Unfortunately, again, circumstances beyond our will to social reform prevented us from reaching an agreement on the new program, and obviously we are still trying to use the tools at our disposal to redistribute the money to those who need it most. Such is the purpose of Bill C-10. This bill is based on such a redistribution purpose. It is not a new social policy, or at least I do not consider it as such. It is an attempt, a commendable attempt, as several hon. members put it, in a difficult economic context.

When I refer to a difficult economic context it is not in the same spirit as the hon. member for Broadview did earlier when he rejected the whole society and our economic system. That is not my own view, Mr. Speaker. The fact is, and you just need to look at the situation on the global level, that so-called western societies are presently facing serious economic problems. In such a context, there is always a danger that social programs will be affected by the inhibitive reflex in our political leaders that such a situation will necessarily cause.

I should commend the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for having stood her ground, and particularly for having convinced her colleagues to resist the temptation that was probably very strong to cut our social programs for which the Liberal party has been fighting for the last 20 or 25 years. I must say, Mr. Speaker, that I am proud of those social programs and that will to help shown by the Liberal party and successive Liberal governments. Here again, it should be kept in mind that most assistance measures we now have were introduced by this party, by these governments.

As I said, Bill C-10, in the context of fiscal restraints announced in August, includes what might be called a necessary evil, a reduction in the traditional category of monthly payments under the universal system of family allowances. Although that reduction may understandably create significant hardships for certain families and beneficiaries who have trouble making ends meet, it is relatively small, and the $20 average reduction per child is counterbalanced on the income redistribution level by a non-refundable income tax credit of $50 per child, while special exemptions for children 17 and 18 years old are abolished.

With these savings we proposed firstly—a provision we could develop last week—a $20 increase in the guaranteed income supplement for senior citizens, which was most urgent in my view since nearly 58 per cent or 60 per cent of our senior citizens, according to evaluations, live below the poverty line, and secondly to reallocate to the most needy, through an annual lump sum payment of a maximum $200 per child part of the savings obtained through that relatively small reduction in monthly allowances.

That redistribution proposal is very much in line with the philosophy of the then minister of national health and welfare when he discussed with the provinces an in-depth reform of our Canadian social security system because, as I explained earlier, payments will be made through the Department of National Revenue, through income tax as commonly referred to by Canadians. Therefore, the income tax will for the first time be playing an opposite role to its traditional one of taking from the taxpayer dollars generally earned the hard way.

In order to make payments earlier to those who apply and meet the test, relatively large sums of money will go out around April or May. It has been suggested it is dangerous to give out such amounts in one single payment. A mother of three or four could eventually find herself with a $700 or $800 cheque from National Revenue, and there was a danger she could spend it before she could have considered the truly best way of using it. My feeling is this is an insult to the poor in our society, to the most needy, implying they are less apt to plan their purchases than the fortunate affluent.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that when a person or family must manage with a small budget, each dollar counts. And I am convinced those relatively large amounts they will be getting in April-May will enable them to make purchases that might have been waiting for two, three or four years, as changing the refrigerator, buying a new range, a bicycle for the boy or the girl, things they could not do because of an exceedingly restricted budget, and also because it is difficult, Mr. Speaker, to make monthly savings within a very restricted budget.

This amount, I was going to use the word "manna" but that may have a negative connotation, this considerable amount will allow them to incur necessary expenses which they might not have been able to afford had the present system continued to exist, even if, for example, an increase in family allowances of $35, $40 or $50 a month had been proposed. Ten or fifteen dollars is so quickly spent when you are living on a budget. So we must not only consider the negative aspects of a yearly payment but also, of course, the opportunities that such a payment offers to those receiving it.

I can understand, from a theoretical if not philosophical point of view, that some may be opposed to a decrease in family allowances which, I repeat, is relatively small, to allow for a larger amount, when applicable, a few months later. I can understand and, in this regard, I think we must let the beneficiary decide which formula he prefers. That is indeed what the minister stated and I wholeheartedly agree. Who are we to prejudge of what the beneficiaries of this system will decide, in due time, when the system is implemented? Let us give the system a chance to prove it can work. It is a new system and as in the case of any new system perhaps there will be some readjustments to be made during implementation. But regarding these adjustments, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Broadview does not seem to be confident in the ability of the poor to get organized and make themselves heard on the hill, yet I can tell him, Mr. Speaker, that when it comes to their interests, they do organize and they do let us really know what they want. So I am confident once again that they will let us know whether the system being put in place, the newly instituted system when Bill C-10 will have received royal assent, is satisfactory or not. If it is less satisfactory than before, perhaps they will suggest two, three or four yearly payments or perhaps urge us to return to the old system of monthly allowances.

In any events, let us not prejudge of the reaction of the beneficiaries and let us give the system a chance to prove it can work. Once again, one must not see in Bill C-10 a new social philosophy on the part of the present government. Personally I only regard it as an important and praiseworthy effort to take from available funds, from out present tax basis those funds which are being distributed coast to coast to all who need them, thereby taking a little away from the rich and the well-to-do in order to give more to the less fortunate. Of course, these amendments to the family allowances program will not solve the problem of poverty.

Of course, Mr. Speaker, it is not through the family allowances program that we are going to build a new society in Canada. Such is not the purpose. The purpose is simply to give a little more to those who need it most and I do not see, Mr. Speaker, how one can have reservations about such an objective. The more we debate the social policy in Canada, Mr. Speaker, the greater our chances of arriving sooner at a more equitable system, at a better redistribution of wealth within our society. Let us debate, I am all for it, but let us not use Bill C-10—a relatively minor and technical measure in light of our overall social policy—as a pretext to conduct the trial of the Canadian society. I think that is a misrepresentation and also a great disservice to those that are to derive benefit from the proposed measures.

Mr. Speaker, some observers may have seen in the proposed program very spiteful intentions on the part of the government as they presumed that by relating in this way family allowances to the tax system we intended to strip—what spite—the most underprivileged of whatever small amounts they manage to scrape here and there by forcing them to report their income. Is our society so sick that any time any government tries to rationalize its administration or help the community and those who need help the most, that government should be taken to task and charged with having spiteful intentions? I was disappointed to read, for example, an article by Michel Pelletier in Le Devoir of Thursday, October 25, 1978, and the previous one on Wednesday, October 25. I think it is a great disservice to be charging the Advisory Council on Social Welfare with being biased, if not blind. I think it is a great disservice to mothers to have them believe that they are going to lose something when facts show that they are going to gain, at least up to a family income of $25,000. I think it is dishonest to presume that with an income of $25,000 a family does not have enough for the purposes of this bill and that in any event the only solution is to just open up the system and provide for everybody.

I think it is a very serious matter when a government is being accused by reporters, in this case an economist, of playing the game of nineteenth century capitalism, and I think that perhaps the hon. member for Broadview wanted a little while ago to insinuate something along those lines when we all know—and once again the evidence is there—that, on the contrary, the House—and I even include for the purposes of my demonstration the opposition parties and especially the official opposition—has as its objective the promotion of the interest of all Canadians and not only insuring the survival of multinational corporations.

Reference was made earlier, I believe, to Imperial Oil, for example. It is so easy to accuse the multinational companies. They do not have a forum like the hon. member has to dismiss the charges that are made against them. Of course, it is easy to blame the multinationals, to blame our society, to blame capitalism, to blame everyone, to blame the government. But people should stop doing this whenever a piece of legislation is good, when it offers possibilities for the future and is aimed at the redistribution of wealth, when it would allow less fortunate Canadians to partake a little more of the national wealth. Whenever a government tries to help the poor, people should stop seeing spiteful intentions and asking for more and charging that it is not doing enough when it is precisely trying to do more and expresses the will to go on doing more.

Let us encourage those who fight to protect the weak and help the poor instead of attacking them and blaming them for everything. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has introduced a bill which is frankly progressive in the circumstances since it would have been quite easy when a majority of Canadians would want us to cut back, to justify, for instance, at least in the eyes of the public, the elimination of family allowance indexation without taking any other corrective action. This would have been the easiest solution. The government did not choose to do so. The minister did not choose to do so. The minister decided, within the very narrow restrictions that she had to apply, to find a formula which, we admit it, may seem a rather lame one to some people, but which will at least help those whom we all want to help, that is the underprivileged Canadians.

Mr. Speaker, I encourage the House to discuss social policies. I am always happy to do so. The more discussions on this subject, the more chances we will have of establishing equality. However, when a bill seems at first glance and even after study to favour those in need, we should support it. And in this regard, I make a special appeal to the New Democratic Party. They should be the first, Mr. Speaker, to rise to applaud the efforts of the government and the minister to help the poor. They do rise, but only to denounce capitalism, multinational companies, and so on, and to pass judgement on society, the minister, the government, and members on this side of the House. In short, Mr. Speaker, I cannot understand that in discussing a bill which will certainly help tens of thousands of Canadians, some choose to attack capitalism and denounce a society which, we must admit, has served Canadians well to a large extent and remains one of the few societies in this world where life is good.

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): I am very eager to make a few remarks, as briefly as possible, on Bill C-10. First of all, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that, after hearing two very different but still very interesting speeches, I must congratulate those speakers who preceded me for taking part in the debate on a bill whose purpose is to redistribute wealth. We recognize the principle of that redistribution, we approve of it and will have no difficulty in supporting the bill. We believe that additional help to low-income families is a must, and we are conscious of their needs.

Figures were quoted and I note that the minister herself said that families whose income is less than $18,000 will benefit from it fully while, over that amount, the credit will be reduced by 5 per cent of the amount by which the family income exceeds $18,000, that is, by $50 for every $1,000 of additional income.

A family with two dependent children and an income of less than $18,000 will receive $400. The tax credit will be $300 for a family with an income of about $20,000 and $200 if the income falls within the $22,000 bracket. But if a family with two dependent children earns $26,000 or over, there will be no tax credit.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out that the government has made a few changes. We are not contesting this legislation to which we are going to give our approval but I think it is equally important to clarify a few things and to make some comments. Many members of parliament have addressed themselves to this question and had a lot to say about it.

Earlier I was listening to the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont (Mr. Lachance) who delivered an excellent speech, there is no doubt about it. But I would like to ask a few questions. For example, how do you explain that a government which was so attached to the principle of universality decided to put it aside? Not that I blame them for that but I would like to make sure that this change which seems to me necessary in the present context is a real change of attitude in the government, as we can see it in many other areas.

I regret also that the government has not though it necessary to discuss those proposals officially with the provinces. I do not think that the government of Canada would have lost anything in doing so and we know of two provinces which have their own family allowance systems, Alberta and Quebec. Of course these allowances are far less generous than those of the federal government. But nevertheless I think it would have been good, particularly in the present context, to submit those proposals to the provinces, and expose those ideas and those changes in an attempt to get the support of the provinces on a matter which affects a fundamental institution of our society, the family itself.

This decision has probably been taken as rapidly as all the others which dealt with budgetary reductions. In recent weeks we have observed with interest but with a certain amount of discouragement that most of the decisions have been taken without any serious analysis. Of course this has prompted us to make certain comments which were often negative and which the government so far has failed to answer. I cannot help thinking of the true motives of such measures. We might wonder why they waited so long. I remember that, all of a sudden last summer the Prime Minister felt it necessary to delay the general election to tell us how important it was to bring in economic measures because he had just realized, when he came back from Bonn, that the country was in a difficult situation and that he had to propose job creation measures. Those bills, the increase in income supplement and in family allowances are important, of course.

This does not quite jibe with the statements made by the Prime Minister that he would create jobs in the country. It is not quite with such pieces of legislation—nor with the bill asking for authority to borrow $17 billion, which we finally gave for an amount of about $7 billion—that we shall create jobs in the short term. Canadians probably think in the present context that—when we examine the political context—the government thought perhaps it was profitable to play the trick with the $20 after the trick of the $85 they played last summer, and after the increase in family allowances before an election campaign. Other governments did so before, and I am forced to recognize that it may be a tactic I know, which is still used today, which disappoints me. I remember very well the principles which motivated the responsible minister at the very beginning of a political career, and I am convinced that this minister would have rejected any such argument or insinuation that it might be well to introduce a measure which could be fascinating for the so-called poorer people, to try to gain their support in an election campaign. Again, strangely enough, that will happen a month and a half or two before the next election. I suggest that we should warn the Canadian people not to fall in such traps. I repeat that we support this bill and that we shall vote for it. We would have done so a year ago because I feel the needs at that time were as pressing as they are today.

Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member for Lafontaine-Rosemont who very skillfully tried to convince us of this government's concern for social legislation designed to help the have-nots and low income groups. He said that the Liberal policy was charity-oriented and one of concern for those deprived Canadians.

I would like to know why this government feels compelled to devise new social legislation and why, in order to enable Canadians to make ends meet, it has to be so generous, spending millions on unemployment insurance benefits, family allowances, old age pensions. Maybe we should remind them that if they had devised an industrial strategy well-adjusted to modern times, these so-called social measures would not be necessary today. Because of the economic mess, this government now has to turn to piecemeal solutions, giving away small amounts, $10, $85, $20, and this, just before the election. We will not say that it is dishonest because it cannot be proved.

The minister could have introduced this legislation 12 or 15 months ago because the situation has been deteriorating in Canada for a few years now. For the past five years, members on this side have been warning the government of the dangers looming ahead, but unfortunately, we were laughed at. But now the government realizes that we were right. They have come up with social measures that I really approve of. I must say that the government has to show some imagination to allow people to collect unemployment benefits without having to work, but they may have broken the record in this area. But with regard to showing imagination in relation to an industrial strategy and the recovery of the Canadian economy, I think this could be dealt with at length and I think that the evidence is there that it is a failure. This is why today I do not wish to dwell on this issue but I think I had to underline it. First it is rather strange to see how the introduction of this legislation was timed. Is it that the government did not understand a couple of years ago that this was an urgent matter then? By taking action then they could have dismissed any allegations that they are trying to buy off votes by introducing this measure.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. La Salle: Of course the hon. member for Lévis (Mr. Guay) has not thought about that but he may still use this legislation as an argument come the next election. Perhaps he will say to his voters: You know we handed out a little cheque for the children and the elderly now get an extra $20. Yet there are also elderly people in my riding who are experiencing a lot of difficulties in pulling through financially. We want to hear about the need to increase the pensions of our elderly people who have now left their jobs after having made such an enormous contribution to this country.

The government was somehow caught at their own act when they announced these measures last summer and everybody thought that the election was to be held in October. Now the election will have to be held next spring and it is still something which raises some questions regarding this government and I must mention it.

I would also like when dealing with social measures, since this is a bill which concerns the family, to invite the minister to ponder seriously over the situation of the handicapped and the blind. The minister knows quite well that this segment of our society has derived benefit from the Canada Works program. But as this program is planned differently from year to year other and as this class of people cannot get a second grant under the Canada Works program, they find themselves now cut from the benefits they derived from this organization which has served them well for some six to 12 months.

With regard to senior citizens, let us take, for example, the New Horizons program. I wonder if the minister would give serious consideration to this excellent program which we endorsed. We even supported additional funds to provide these people with facilities and necessary and justified recreational activities. I think we could also seriously consider permanent funding for the disabled and the blind. The minister is fully aware of the great needs of these people. Some will say that we would have to negotiate with some provinces. I urge the minister, of course, to negotiate with the provinces special programs that could meet their needs.

I am convinced the minister will keep these remarks in mind and I am confident that when the budget will be brought down in a few days, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will introduce a job-creating program, because people are needed to look after the disabled and the blind. Such a program could, while creating jobs, meet the expectations of these people and give them a fresh interest in life. I trust the minister will look upon my remarks in a very positive light, and upon the people, the categories I mentioned, with considerable humanity.
