HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, October 11, 1978

FOURTH SESSION—THIRTIETH PARLIAMENT—OPENING

[Translation]

The parliament, which had been prorogued on the tenth day of October, 1978, met this day at Ottawa for the dispatch of business.

The House met at 3 p.m., the Speaker in the chair.

Mr. Speaker read a communication from the Secretary to the Governor General, announcing that His Excellency the Governor General will arrive at the main entrance of the Parliament Buildings at 2.45 p.m. on this day, Wednesday, the 11th of October 1978, and when it has been signified that all is in readiness, will proceed to the chamber of the Senate to open formally the fourth session of the thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

[English]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod as follows:

Mr. Speaker, it is the pleasure of His Excellency the Governor General that this honourable House attend him immediately in the chamber of the honourable Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker, with the House, went up to the Senate chamber.

● (1542)

And being returned to the Commons chamber:

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that when the House of Commons did attend his Excellency the Governor General this day in the Senate chamber, His Excellency was pleased to make a speech to both houses of parliament. To prevent mistakes, I have obtained a copy which is as follows:

[Translation]

Honourable Members of the Senate:

Members of the House of Commons:

I have the honour to welcome you to the fourth session of the thirtieth Parliament of Canada.

During the course of the past summer Her Majesty The Queen came to visit Newfoundland and Saskatchewan, and to open the Commonwealth Games. She joined all Canadians in congratulating the thousands of volunteer workers who helped make the Games so successful, and with all of us she applauded the remarkable achievements of Canadian athletes at Edmonton.

The Duke of Edinburgh visited British Columbia as well, where His Royal Highness took part in the two hundredth anniversary observance of Captain Cook's voyage to the Pacific coast.

[Text]

My wife and I paid an official visit to the King and Queen of Spain, who welcomed us most hospitably. Through us, Spain expressed its friendship and high regard for all Canadians.

As the end of my term of office approaches, my wife and I would like to thank parliamentarians and the people of Canada for the respect and affection which they have extended to us on countless occasions over the years.

We wish also to express our love for Canada. A great country is not created without difficulty, but to see it develop and grow stronger despite every obstacle has been for us a source of great joy and pride. Our faith in the future of Canada is stronger than it has ever been.

I: Urgent Action Needed

Parliament begins today a new session which will concentrate upon Canada's two most pressing needs. They are the strengthening of our economy, and the renewal of our federation.

Those two inseparable imperatives are different expressions of the same goal: to strengthen Canada through unity: to unify Canada through economic strength.

Seldom in the past have the seriousness of the challenge, the strength of our national will, and the scope of our opportunities combined to create for Canada a moment in history so full of potential for good. Such a moment, if ignored, may not soon come again. That is one reason why you should approach your task with urgency.

Another is the legitimate expectation of the people of Canada in these difficult times. They expect their parliament to respond to their most urgent needs with insight, with action, and with a minimum of delay.

You will therefore be asked to focus your efforts upon the priority areas of the economy and the renewal of the federation.

To that end, the government has prepared over the past few months a detailed plan of action. It is designed to increase confidence in the essential health and potential of the economy, and to strengthen the bonds which unite us in one Canadian community.

II: Economic Policy Background

The economic initiatives announced by the Government in August will intensify the assault upon unemployment and inflation.

Those initiatives will further restrain government spending, stimulate economic growth, and give more assistance to those in need. They carry forward commitments made by the government in 1976 with the publication of The Way Ahead. Many of those commitments were endorsed by the First Ministers' Conference in February of this year.

First Ministers agreed to help the private sector to lead the way toward accelerated economic growth. They also reached agreement on important medium-term economic objectives.

In July of this year, Canada was a participant in the Bonn Summit Conference. There the leaders of the major industrialized countries of the free world planned a co-operative strategy against inflation, unemployment and slow growth.

Canada pledged at Bonn to do its part to restore vitality to the Canadian and world economies. After the conference, that pledge was transformed into action in a series of policy announcements.

They require action on two fronts. The first requirement is to further reduce the growth rate of federal spending.

The second is to pare down or eliminate many worthwhile but low-priority programs, in order to free the dollars necessary for a serious assault upon high-priority goals. These goals are to stimulate industrial expansion, put more Canadians back to work, and further protect from the impact of inflation those who are least able to protect themselves.

III: Expenditure Restraint

Let us examine the first of these requirements, restraint in government spending. To achieve sustained progress in the battle against inflation, the government believes it is absolutely essential for Canadians to practise restraint in their price and income demands. The government is also aware of its own responsibilities. Expenditure restraint has been a central theme of federal policy and practice since October, 1975. It was reinforced by the First Ministers' joint commitment in February to contain government spending below the trend growth rate of the Gross National Product.

In August, the government set itself a more ambitious restraint objective. Planned federal spending this fiscal year will be reduced by five hundred million dollars, and next year's projected spending will be reduced by two billion dollars. As a result, the projected rate of expenditure growth during the next fiscal year is 8.9 percent. That is well below the forecast growth of 11 percent for the GNP.

The objectives of imposing more severe restraint on government spending are two.

The first is to encourage a more vigorous expansion of the private sector by reducing governments' share of the nation's wealth.

The second is to create a leaner and more efficient government, by making every tax dollar do more work.

The government is committed to reducing the size of the federal public service. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act, designed to ensure that public service pensions are in line with the level of contributions.

The government is committed to continued wage restraint in the public sector. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act to ensure that compensation in the federal public service remains in step with the private sector, and does not lead the way.

You will also be asked to enact legislation making the Post Office a Crown Corporation, with a view to making postal services more efficient and responsive to public needs.

Because such a large portion of the federal budget is dedicated to transfer payments to the provinces, no large-scale restraint program could be successful without their co-operation. The government intends to negotiate reductions which will cause a minimum of difficulty for provincial governments.

You will be asked to consider amendments to the National Housing Act, the Unemployment Insurance Act, and other legislation in order to give effect to the program of expenditure restraint.

IV: Shifting Dollars To Priority Needs

The second major requirement is to transfer funds from lower-priority to high-priority goals. They are industrial expansion, job creation, and more assistance for those in need.

Providing those additional resources within the context of budgetary restraint is a most difficult and painful exercise. Worthwhile programs serving real needs must be cut back if the money is to be found for more pressing requirements.

[Mr. Speaker.]

By cutting back programs in virtually every department, the government intends to channel one billion dollars into programs of economic and social development.

In the area of economic development, the Government's recent proposals are intended to build upon its earlier initiatives to promote job creation, stimulate private sector growth, and encourage industrial innovation. Those initiatives included the April budget, which cut sales taxes in co-operation with the provinces, and provided a stimulus to non-conventional oil development.

Other measures were announced during June and July to encourage energy conservation and the development of renewable energy sources; to stimulate research and development; and to assist small businesses.

[Text]

Now the government proposes to devote more resources to the promotion of industrial development in 1979-80.

The primary objective is to help establish an economic climate which is conducive to private sector growth, particularly in the areas of high technology industries, regional development, and the promotion of exports. Additional assistance will be provided for tourism and for the resource and ship-building industries.

Excessive government intervention in the economy should be greatly reduced over time by initiatives to eliminate duplication between federal and provincial programs and to simplify regulatory and reporting systems.

An important element among the government's proposed new industrial development priorities is an increase in support for major capital projects in manufacturing, energy and transportation.

The major thrust of the government's employment strategy is to encourage the creation of permanent jobs in the private sector. Special emphasis is being placed on the training and job placement of young Canadians.

In this new session, the government will take action to increase support for the training of an adequate supply of skilled labour and to assist labour market mobility.

The government also proposes to introduce major changes in the Unemployment Insurance Program. These changes would achieve a substantial reduction in the cost of the program. They are intended to minimize any negative effects which the program may have on the incentive to work, or on the labour supply.

The proposed adjustments would make the program more selective in its coverage. They would also put Unemployment Insurance funds to more productive use, partly to finance an expanded Job Experience Training Program for youth. You will be asked to approve amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act to give effect to these changes.

Other new employment strategy measures will focus upon year-round employment programs for young people. A new Youth Job Corps Program will be created. This and other youth employment programs will benefit from a major increase in funding during this fiscal year.

In the field of social policy, the unfair impact of inflation upon lower-income groups calls for further protection.

The most effective way to protect Canadians against the injustices of inflation is to continue to act vigorously to bring inflation down. This requires the co-operation of everyone, and takes time. But the poor cannot wait for that. Nor can lower-income parents with children to support, nor elderly pensioners. We must give them additional help now because their need is urgent.

The Child Benefits System has therefore been redesigned. Family allowance payments will be set at a base rate of $20 per month per child for 1979, so that more aid can be provided to those whose need is greatest. The base rate will be indexed in line with the cost of living after 1979.

Funds saved through this process wili be used to provide a yearly payment of $200 per child to mothers in low and middle-income families. Also, there will be an increase of $20 per household in the monthly Guaranteed Income Supplement. This will further protect the elderly from the impact of inflation.

You will therefore be asked to consider amendments to the Family Allowance Act, the Old Age Security Act, and the Income Tax Act.

As an additional anti-inflationary measure, the government has recently reduced the special excise tax on gasoline by three cents a gallon. Negotiations are under way with the government of Alberta to defer the one dollar per barrel increase in the price of oil scheduled for January first.

V: Renewal of The Federation

Economic improvement by itself, however, will not guarantee a united country. A renewal of the Canadian federation is equally essential. It was with this conviction that the Government published its proposals for renewal last June in a document entitled A Time for Action. Later that month, the government placed before parliament the Constitutional Amendment bill. It was referred to a Special Joint Committee of Parliament as a basis for a full public discussion of constitutional change.

A Time for Action affirmed the government's commitment to four basic principles of renewal: the preeminence of citizens and their freedoms; full respect of native rights; full development of Canada's two major linguistic communities; and the enhancement of our mosaic of cultures. It supported development of the regional economies and the fostering of economic integration, so all in Canada can share the benefits of our country more equally. Finally, it recognized the interdependence of the two orders of government, and urged the clear establishment of their respective roles in a renewed Constitution.

A Time For Action stressed the need for a less contentious relationship among the federal and provincial governments, and more effective intergovernmental consultation. Other goals are freedom of action for each government to fulfil its responsibilities, and measures to permit greater accountability by governments to their legislatures and the people who elect them. Also emphasized was the need to help the taxpayers better understand the intergovernmental process; and to provide more effective services at less cost by eliminating wasteful duplication.

The government therefore proposed to the provincial governments that joint action should begin as soon as possible on the clarification of federal and provincial roles and the elimination of duplication. The premiers have responded positively. The First Ministers' Conference on the Constitution, now expected to take place at the end of this month, will consider how best to launch this major enterprise.

With respect to the reform of the constitution, the government has set out only two fundamental requirements. The new constitution must provide for Canada to continue as a genuine federation, and it must contain a Charter of Rights and Freedoms, including linguistic rights. The government has shown its deep concern that real progress toward change soon be achieved, so that uncertainty can be dispelled and unity reinforced. In particular, the government believes it essential that clear and important progress be made before Quebeckers are asked by their provincial government to vote in a referendum about their future

[Text]

Because there has been some misunderstanding about two important features of constitutional renewal, the government wishes to make its position clear once again. The first is the role of the Monarch and the Governor General. The government's view was and remains that the new constitution should describe the situation as it exists today in Canada, and the government is pleased that the provincial premiers expressed the same view during their meeting in Regina. Discussions are already in progress with provincial goverments to ensure that the legal drafting conforms to that intention. There is no intention to change or to reduce in any way the role Her Majesty plays.

Secondly, the government recognizes that the distribution of powers among federal and provincial governments is an essential part of the renewal of the constitution.

The government is prepared to begin the study of the distribution of powers at the same time as that of institutions and rights, and to give every aspect of the work a high and urgent priority. Discussions will begin at the meeting of First Ministers later this month.

However, the government believes that proposals on institutions and rights can be dealt with more rapidly than the distribution of powers, and that action on the former should not be held up if prolonged discussion is needed to settle the latter.

The public hearings of the Task Force on Canadian Unity have provided a valuable forum in which ideas could be brought forward and discussed. The government is therefore confident that the report of the Task Force will be an important contribution to the process of renewal.

[Translation]

In the course of the present session, the government will be introducing in Parliament a revised constitution bill. With goodwill and flexibility on all sides, and with the shape of Canada's future at stake, the government is confident that concrete progress will be achieved in the course of this session.

Neither renewal of the federation nor the maturity of our national structure can be considered complete until the achievement of an amending procedure permits our constitution to be vested finally and entirely in Canadian hands. In co-operation with the provinces, the government will again address itself to that question in the new session.

VI: Social Responsibility and Openness of Government

The government reaffirms its view that a renewal of faith in Canada requires an active and informed Canadian public.

It is therefore intended to continue consultations with business and labour, private interest groups, and other levels of government.

In addition, you will be asked to consider proposals to increase public access to government information.

In the further promotion of open and efficient government, a proposal will be placed before you to provide for the review by parliament of evaluations by the government of major programs.

You will also be asked to consider legislation to create a federal Ombudsman.

You will be asked to consider other legislative proposals.

Members of the House of Commons,

You will be asked to appropriate the funds required to carry on the services and expenditures authorized by parliament.

Honourable Members of the Senate,

Members of the House of Commons,

May divine Providence guide you in your deliberations.

APPOINTMENT OF ASSISTANT DEPUTY CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I move, seconded by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien):

That Mr. Denis Ethier, member for the riding of Glengarry-Prescott-Russell, be appointed Assistant Deputy Chairman of committees of the whole House.

Motion agreed to.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

ADDRESS IN REPLY, MOVED BY MRS. URSULA APPOLLONI AND SECONDED BY MR. RAYMOND SAVARD

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech delivered by His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South): Mr. Speaker, if I may, I will first make a little reference to the appreciation I feel for the presence of page girls in this august assembly. While I commend your wise decision in breaking with restrictive tradition, may I also express the hope that the presence of these young girls will herald the entry of many more women into active participation in the political life of our nation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and his cabinet colleagues for the honour extended to the riding of York South in asking me, its representative, to move the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I am well aware of the fact that this honour is given, not because of any particular merit on my part, but because of the very real interest that the Prime Minister has in the people of this section of Toronto.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: And York South is people, Mr. Speaker, and to describe them is to describe a vibrant and vital part of our Canadian community. Like myself, many of the people of York South were not born in Canada. They came here from various countries and from various cultures. I will not attempt to list them lest inadvertently I omit even one.

Their reasons for coming here were also varied: some came to escape the repressive tyrannies of dictatorial government; others came because their homes had been threatened or even destroyed by fratricidal strife; still others fled the terror of battlescarred Beirut while yet more were the victims of racism. For many, the reason was material, but all sought a measure of human dignity and individual freedom such as no other country in the world can possibly give.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: And as they observed the riches, both physical and spiritual, which Canada offered them they turned with fervent conviction to their adopted country and threw in their lot with her. In the short period in which I have had the honour of representing York South, more than 8,000 people have applied for and have been granted citizenship. All of the newcomers, Mr. Speaker, and the thousands who took that important step before them are Canadians by conviction and, like myself, humbly thank God that we are Canadians.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Conscious as we are of our many blessings, it is little wonder that the people I have just described will regard with some dismay and even distress the present climate of dejection and even despair which appears to be the hallmark of our times.

The people of York South are realistic people. They know we are living in times of crisis when the consuming flames of simultaneous inflation and unemployment are being fanned by internal dissatisfaction and even threatened secession. Awesome problems indeed, Mr. Speaker, but not insurmountable ones.

But perhaps Canada's most insidious problem of all is persistent and destructive self-criticism. I do not refer to healthy and constructive criticism which is vital to a democracy in order to correct human error, to intensify human effort and urge human improvement, but to a paralyzing and corrosive denial of the good and to an obliteration of vision to which we can all aspire if only we have the courage and the determination to grasp our opportunities.

Instead of offering to the world an arsenal of hope, we continually magnify our own problems. Rather than generate self-confidence and the momentum to be gained therefrom, we bicker, taunt and castigate our fellow man and, in doing so, we not only discourage others but we discourage ourselves. And discouragement can become a way of life and ultimately a self-fulfilling prophecy. I believe that the men and women who can lift the world upward and onward are those who encourage more than criticize. In fact, I do not believe there is a statue in the world today erected to a critic.

What we need is a calm, rational diagnosis of our ailments and in a spirit of confidence, courage and determination prescribe and apply the remedies. These remedies must not and indeed cannot be applied by the doubting and the spiritless. As Andrew K. Boyd said, there are important cases in which the difference between half a heart and a whole heart makes the difference between signal defeat and a splendid victory. And our victory over current problems will be splendid, Mr. Speaker, but to achieve it calls for the enthusiasm, co-operation and determination of every Canadian from every walk of life.

In this effort I would particularly appeal for the co-operation of the press, a word I shall use, like Aliksandr Solzhenitsyn, to include all media, and remind its members that the freedom to which they aspire and which I firmly believe is of paramount importance in a democracy will be worthless unless it goes hand in hand with responsibility.

● (1602)

At no time in history has the press had such power to inform, to educate, to influence. While the vast majority of its members accept this great power in a spirit of conscientious responsibility, there are a few who simply do not know how to report good news. Of these, Solzhenitsyn said:

There is no moral responsiblity for deformation or disproportion.

Would these people not do better to exhort harmony rather than incite discord? Is it not more fruitful to transmute despair into hope?

To return to the more concrete problems of our time, Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the main concern of most Canadians is of an economic nature. People are deeply concerned about Canada's ability to provide employment for all who want it and, more particularly, for their children. At the same time it is imperative to protect the weaker members of our society who, despite the best will in the world, cannot work.

In this instance, I applaud the government's decision to increase the amount of family allowances for lower income families and also its commitment to augment the payment of guaranteed income supplement for our elderly citizens who have little or no income other than old age security payments.

For those who can work, the emphasis on job creation is especially welcome. That many of these jobs will be different from those of the past is yet another indication of Canada's response to the needs of a modern world. High technology industries demand special skills for which the labour market must be adequately prepared. I therefore applaud the government's foresight in providing for appropriate training, for boosting its job placement services and for ensuring needed labour market mobility.

Special reference to youth employment is particularly welcome. In at least one employment centre I visited in Toronto last week the government's interest in the problems of young people entering the labour market has already been translated into fact by the establishment of a special youth desk.

The sincerity of the government's search to combat regional and provincial alienation cannot be questioned, and its desire to achieve constitutional reform by continual consultation rather than by confrontation becomes a beacon to light the pilgrimage of all Canadians towards true national unity.

In the consultations on constitutional reform, I would express the hope of millions of Canadians that the proposed charter of rights and freedoms not overlook the most fundamental right of all—the right of life—thereby ensuring protection for the weakest members of society, the unborn human beings.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Appolloni: Mr. Speaker, I look to Canada's future with serenity, with confidence but never complacency, and with passionate care. I believe in Canada's future, and to those who doubt I say: you do no service to your country!

What we need is fire, not dead embers. We need enthusiasm, not apathy. And we need faith, because, in the words of John Stuart Mill, one person with a belief is equal to a force of ninety-nine who have only interests.

It is in this spirit of belief that I move, seconded by the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard), that the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General of Canada:

To His Excellency the Right Honourable Jules Léger, Chancellor and Principal Companion of the Order of Canada, Chancellor and Commander of the Order of Military Merit, upon whom has been conferred the Canadian Force's Decoration, Governor General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada.

May it please Your Excellency:

We, Her Majesty's most loyal and dutiful subjects, the House of Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, Hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Raymond Savard (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to support the motion moved by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni). I am proud and I share this pride with the citizens of Verdun riding who showed their trust by electing me in May, 1977, as their federal spokesman. I have been a member of the House for a relatively short time and I wish to thank the Prime minister (Mr. Trudeau) for the confidence he has extended to me by asking me to support the motion for adoption of the Address in Reply to the Speech of the Throne. I also wish, at the outset of this session, to pay tribute to Mr. Speaker whose impartiality and perspicacity have so often contributed to enlighten our deliberations during the last session. I should like also to take this opportunity to thank my colleagues for the help and the support they have given me since my election to guide me in serving the citizens of Verdun to the best of my knowledge.

Since its foundation, the city of Verdun has always included—as a village and then as a city—two ethnic groups, one French-speaking and the other English-speaking. Two towers, connected by a façade featuring a large portal with raised portcullis to welcome visitors, symbolize the two groups living in perfect harmony, that is two towers for one castle. This fact gives meaning to Verdun's motto: E viribus duorum, which means through the strength of both. It stands as a symbol of steadfast and unwearied co-operation. The maple leaf that became our official national emblem since the adoption of the Canadian flag is displayed in the centre of the flag, overlooking the fort . . . as if to suggest that a common ideal must supersede ethnic loyalties. Verdun has a past; it is said that happy people have no history. In fact, Verdun has lived in peace and has only a short unruffled domestic history.

Mr. Speaker, the present city of Verdun is located on a narrow strip between the St. Lawrence River and the canal of the Montreal Aqueduct which was built only in 1852. Nowadays, Verdun is densely populated even though municipal bylaws place a ban on buildings higher than three stories. Nun's Island has been recently allowed to build high-rise apartment buildings. While pursuing its peaceful development, Verdun has had a history which is not without interest. It might be compared to an honest middle-class housewife more interested in comfort and even inconspicuous luxury than money making pursuits.

Although hemmed in, it enjoys almost all urban amenities without their many inconveniences. Over its 100 years of existence, Verdun has managed to offer the possibly unique example of a town with a population of 200 that has expanded into a city of over 80,000. The average age of Verdun residents is about 35 years, which means I represent a large number of senior citizens, and as such I am pleased to support one of the proposals contained in the Speech from the Throne which provides people least able to fend for themselves with a better protection against inflation. It is essential to give all senior citizens living conditions consistent with their dignity and their integrity as human beings and help them retain as much as possible their personal independence physically, mentally and socially.

There is an old saying that you can judge the degree of civilization of a nation by the way it treats its elders. There are more senior citizens today than ever before and they live longer than in the past but without receiving the care or assistance from younger generations that was accorded to them in primitive societies. We live in a context where old is overlooked and youth is at a premium. This represents a problem as the number of elderly people is growing. Their authority becomes weaker, their role within the family and society is reduced, not to mention uncertainty of their economic situation, their loneliness, the inadequacy of the care which their physical condition may require. The role given by modern society to the aged is not to play any role at all.

When you ask people what they think about the elderly, very often they will give you these answers: tiredness, loneliness, misery, sickness, sadness and death. The aspiration of older people is continuity, that is expectation of such things as they are familiar with or any foreseen change that they will decide for themselves, if possible. Continuity in life is expressed by the location where you live, employment, family church, social circles, hobbies, personal care. Without that desire for continuity, the aged ask that society allow them to retain from life the picture they had of it in their youth. As every human being reflects his past, he claims the right to keep during his last years what he was and what he knew of the past.

Mr. Speaker, what strikes me very much is the sudden feelings of aging. All of a sudden, at 65, people grow old as if in an instant, after a ruthless rupture, they leave adulthood and become elderly. To sum it up, all ages are not a part of life. Attitudes toward old age almost suggest that old age is for other people only. One thing we should remember is that we will get old as we have lived, we are potentially elderly. Man loses his humanity when he expects structures to be more merciful than he is. Let us appropriate funds to invest into people rather than concrete, and we will thereby provide benefits for the elderly that are chronically ill.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to commend the Minister for National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) for caring so much about the elderly. She recently announced a Bureau for the Golden Age, so that their voice could be heard. Every member in this House should look up to her as a symbol of determination and moral strength. Such an initiative will lead to more than one revolution, a fiscal revolution and a redistribution of public funds now involving $4.5 billion for old age security pensions, guaranteed income supplement and spouse benefits alone.

When we speak of the elderly, the phrase is "they" or "them', but in a few years out it will be "we" or "us". "We are always old to somebody else." The only thing that makes man grow old is his body, which constitutes an important medical problem, but it must be seen in a context which would recognize first of all that, like anyone else, an older person needs dignity, fulfilment, comfort, appreciation and most of all to be useful in one's own way according to one's own condition. Nevertheless it often happens that the older a person gets, the fewer friends he has because many of those he liked have died. To encourage older people to stay active and committed, the federal government has launched a program called "New Horizons" which grants money to older people who wish to develop new projects. New Horizons pays for facilities and equipment but does not offer a salary to older people. When this program was launched in 1972, the then minister of national health and welfare, the hon. John C. Munro, declared that he believed that participation in a mutual aid activity and others could suppress the obstacles which bring social isolation and a feeling of solitude among Canadians over 65.

More than half the projects subsidized by New Horizons deal with leisure centres for the aged. If those projects for which funds have been granted reflect the preoccupations of people who frequent these centres for the aged, which is probable, one reaches the conclusion that older men and women are mainly interested in sports and games, then in crafstmanship, leisure and cultural activities. The two main problems facing older people are housing and health. Every time the question of housing for the aged arises, somebody comes along to say that this is a relatively new problem which did not exist before, when three or four generations used to live together under the same roof. That same person will probably go on to say that before the advent of urbanization and the nuclear family, senior citizens lived with their married children and grandchildren and kept busy on the farm almost until the end. Things were never that simple. As much in the time of Shakespeare's King Lear as in that of Zola's La Terre, according to De Beauvoir, history has shown time and again that old peasants forced by old age to make over their whole estate to their children ran the risk of being despised and often of being without the bare necessities.

Furthermore, as the Special Senate Committee on Aging also pointed out, even if many elderly couples are doing their best to have their home repaired before the husband retires, the fact is that their properties are generally very old and require much more maintenance than the average.

Since accidents are a major cause of incapacity among older people, they were advised by way of precaution to alter their homes so as to minimize the risks of getting hurt or falling, for example, by improving the lighting on staircases, installing a handrail in the bathroom, lowering their cupboards, and so on. Those recommendations are useful and well-meant no doubt, but unlike countries like Denmark where the government gives grants to that end, no Canadian government has yet offered to pay the cost of such improvements.

The Canada Works and Young Canada Works programs have clearly shown a great need for general helpers to provide those services but no specific program exists at this time to meet that need. One of the problems of homeowners which particularly affects widows and may explain the increasing popularity of condominiums among senior citizens is the difficulty in finding help for chores such as snow removal, lawn and garden maintenance and eavestrough cleaning.

Mr. Speaker, after serving my city for 15 years, I am very proud to have been able to obtain, with the help of the Verdun social clubs, the money required to accommodate 350 people in a home and 300 others in low-rent apartments. I am convinced that the residents of Verdun are very grateful for this. Canadian social welfare agencies already provide professional family helpers, but there are very few of them and they are used mostly to take over from hospitalized or over-worked mothers or to look after seriously ill senior citizens.

As all those who have looked into the plight of senior citizens in Canada over the last 20 years, including the Royal Commission on Health Services, the Senate Committee on Aging and many others, have concluded, every province and territory needs family helpers. These should be specially trained to lend a hand to delicate senior citizens a few days or a few hours a week, if need be, in house cleaning, shopping and cooking. This service, as well as meals-on-wheels for all those who cannot cook for themselves, would enable elderly people to remain independent and to keep on living in their own homes.

These studies also listed other important services, such as contact programs—to identify those who are confined at home—information and reference services—to inform senior citizens about community resources and government programs—telephone services for distress centres, amicable contacts, special teams to help out in house cleaning, men and women for general chores and special transportation services. However, the provincial home care services as provided by visiting nurses, doctors, speech therapists, rehabilitation specialists, dentists and chiropodists are still inadequate as far as answering the needs of the elderly people who are too weak. The Victorian Order of Nurses and many other hygienists work with elderly people in all parts of Canada but here again as in the case of family help, the services are inadequate and mainly reserved for the seriously ill people.

Another factor contributing to the inefficiency of services is that social and health services are almost always independent from one another and as a result their efforts show a total lack of co-ordination. Besides the weak elderly people who live alone, there is another group which suffers from the lack of co-ordination between social and home care services: the families—particularly wives, daughters and daughters-in-law—with whom these weak or sick elderly people stay. Many elderly people are sent to rest homes not because their family does not like them or does not want them, but because the family does not get the trust and the support it needs to be able to take care of them.

Many older women who care for their sick husbands admit that they are terrified at the prospect of a misfortune because in such a case they would have no one to rely upon. Quite often, these women are exhausted because they never have a holiday or time off. In its report, the federal-provincial task force on public health recommended that governments provide special services to spouses and families who look after senior citizens. One such form of support would be short periodic stays in a nursing home or occasional homemaking services.

The task force also recommended that allowances be granted to these families to enable them to set up ramps for wheelchairs in their house for instance or to build small semi-detached apartments. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell our dynamic leader, the Prime Minister, that we have confidence in him and in the measures proposed in the Speech from the Throne which reflects the ideology of our party and enables our government to satisfy the needs of the people in the most deserving areas. Therefore I take pleasure in seconding the motion of my colleague the hon. member for York-South (Mrs. Appolloni) and proposing its adoption.

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR PARLIAMENTARY INVESTIGATION INTO OPERATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I would like to raise a matter of extreme urgency and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Post Office management and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers are now in an absolute state of confrontation, as witnessed by the newspaper advertisements of yesterday, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government move immediately to establish a parliamentary investigation of the deepening crisis in the Post Office, with authority to report back to parliament at the earliest possible date with solutions.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

SUGGESTED EARLY TERMINATION OF THRONE SPEECH DEBATE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the answer the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) gave in the House about terminating the throne speech debate at an early date to get on with economic measures, I hope that not only the government but the official opposition will agree with this motion. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House calls on the government, after consultation with the House leaders of all parties, to arrange for the early termination of the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, so that the House can consider economic measures which the government should now introduce to stimulate production and achieve economic growth.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ECONOMY OF MANITOBA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to move a motion on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the Conference Board in Canada predicted a year ago that the Manitoba economy would experience difficulty in 1978 because of poor economic performance in the first three quarters of 1977, the NDP era, whereas the 6,000 manufacturing jobs lost in the final year of the NDP government have been regained, and whereas employment in Manitoba grew to three times the average job creation of the previous four years under the NDP, and whereas, if the NDP record had been maintained in 1978—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am sure the hon. member would want to relate his motion to a matter which is within the competence of this parliament.

Mr. McKenzie: —I move, seconded by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Whiteway):

That this House urge the NDP to consider eight years of NDP economic mismanagement before criticizing the record of the Lyon government.

FORESTRY

PROPOSED CLOSING OF LABORATORIES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise, on a matter of urgent necessity, to seek the consent of the House under Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that among the budget cuts, announced September 8 by the President of the Treasury Board, were included the closing of the Petawawa forest experiment station, the forest products laboratory in Ottawa and several important small forest stations across the country, in light of the increased interest in forestry research at a time of energy shortages and the pressing need for new sources of renewable energy, and in view of the fact that the closing of these forestry stations will mean the loss of hundreds of talented research experts, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn):

That this House condemn the government's action in closing these forestry stations and instruct the ministry of the environment to rescind the budget cuts that have led to their closing.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

AGRICULTURE

FUNDING OF CANFARM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In light of the fact that farmers in my riding of Brant—and, indeed, across Canada—have come to depend on Canfarm for farm management services that are vital to their farming operations, in light of the fact that farmers across Canada have indicated their willingness to pay fees up to five times higher than at present for these services, and in light of the fact that the federal government has made a considerable investment in Canfarm over the past 12 years, making it one of the best farm management programs in the world, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That the Minister of Agriculture be instructed to continue funding Canfarm or, failing that, to maintain Canfarm's services at least until a suitable private or public institution is found to take over its operation.

Mr. Speaker: The introduction of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FORECASTS OF GROWTH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the statement made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce on November 9, 1977, at Winnipeg, that "we are on the threshold of tremendous growth", and in view of the fact that on October 4, 1978, in a speech at Sarnia to the Chemical Institute of Canada, the minister stated that "the Canadian economy is entering a period of stable growth", I move, seconded by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty):

That this honourable House request the minister to clarify his economic predictions and to advise the House whether or not his two views can be reconciled, and whether he now believes that we are on the threshold of tremendously stable growth or entering a period of stable tremendous growth, since many economic forecasters cannot proceed with their forecasts until this apparent discrepancy is accounted for.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

INTRODUCTION OF AMENDMENTS TO LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because of the serious omission from the Speech from the Throne of any reference to Canada's veterans or their survivors, I ask leave to present a motion under Standing Order 43. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House calls on the Minister of Veterans Affairs to introduce at an early date the amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act which were promised during the last session, and also to introduce an amendment to the Pension Act to provide for pro rata pensions for widows of disabled veterans where the disability of the veteran was assessed below 48 per cent, it being clearly recognized that these measures would be dealt with very quickly by this House of Commons.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for discussion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EFFECT OF DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that we have lost $4.7 billion of foreign exchange in the recent past, at the rate of $390 million a month which has been flowing out since the minister took office, would he indicate if he anticipates that we in Canada will have to go to still higher interest rates, bearing in mind the unemployment in the country and in view of the fact that the American prime rates are now on the way up again, with Chase Manhattan increasing its rate to 10 per cent prime this morning?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to speculate on the monetary policies of the governor of the bank. When some change is made, we will make an announcement publicly after the market is closed. No such decision is being made at this time.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my next question does not deal with any speculation. Is the Minister of Finance aware that the 1.5 billion Deutschmark loan which he arranged last May would cost $136 million Canadian more to repay if it were to be repaid today? Is he making any allowance for this type of eventuality, bearing in mind that we borrowed less than $800 million from the Germans and we would now have to repay them $936 million to make complete repayment, plus interest, on their loan?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, when we borrowed from Germany we knew we had to make some provision for the level of exchange fluctuation. Of course, the money we borrowed there was at a much lower interest rate than other money available in the market. I am not about to speculate on the level of the Canadian dollar at the time we have to repay the loan.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, as the minister probably knows, if the loan were repaid today, capital appreciation alone would be 18 per cent in five months. The government tends to support the wobbly, cheap dollar; it tells us that it has a tremendous effect on our exports. Is the minister aware, in terms of the Japanese yen, which is now almost 90 per cent more in value than that of the Canadian dollar only two years ago, that this means the Japanese can now buy our raw resources at approximately half the price they used to pay? They manufacture them and then export them back to us.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Stevens: Is he aware of this? Is he aware of the fact that Mitsubishi Petrochemical Limited, the thirty-seventh largest company in Canada, employs only 98 Canadians today?

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member for St. John's West.

FORECAST OF 1978 TRADE BALANCE

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, on September 28 the Minister of Finance predicted that Canada's trade surplus this year would be $4 billion, and on September 29, when he revealed that our surplus for August was only $186 million, the Canadian dollar declined sharply because the experts felt deceived by the minister's statement. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce predicted a trade surplus of $5 billion this year. Of course, no one pays much attention to his predictions.

My question to the minister is, could he now give the government's considered, best estimate of the likely merchandise trade balance for 1978, keeping in mind that for the first eight months of this year the surplus was $2,084 million which, continued for the rest of the year, would only give us a surplus of $3.1 billion? Can the minister give us the official estimate of the merchandise trade surplus, so that the Canadian dollar will not suffer any longer because of ministerial lack of credibility?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have said that at the time of my budget I will review the forecast which we made some time ago. However, I should like to tell the House of Commons that I am convinced the surplus in trade this year will be at a record level. Last year we had $2.9 billion. It will be substantially more than that this year: it will be a record year.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Does the minister still stick to his prediction of June 1, as taken from Hansard, that we had a trade surplus of $3 billion last year and, if the present trend continues, the surplus could be $5 billion this year? Is he still sticking to that? Could he explain how, during the last three months of this year—that is, June, July and August—our trade surplus totalled only $101 million, whereas for the same period last year it totalled $542 million?

In view of these alarming results, how can he justify an estimate of up to $5 billion for the merchandise trade surplus this year, particularly in view of the result of the last three months?

Mr. Chrétien: I did not say it would be $5 billion, Mr. Speaker. I said that if the trend remained the same—and, obviously, during the last three months it was not the same—for the over-all year we would have a trade surplus higher than last year and it would be at a record level. I hope the hon. member will recognize that good performance. In fact, Mr. Speaker, in passing let me say that the Canadian dollar, being somewhat weaker, has been of very much help to the fishermen of Newfoundland.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the dollar is now trading at just over 84 cents, which is far below what the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said the dollar should be trading at—he said par should be 90 cents—would the minister tell us what is, in fact, the policy of the government? Is it that the dollar should be 90 cents, should par be 90 cents, should it be 84 cents, or 80 cents? What is the minister's policy?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, perhaps for the hundredth time since I am the minister, I must say that the policy of the government is to let the Canadian dollar float. The level of the dollar is determined by the market and the Bank of Canada intervenes only to maintain an orderly market.

LOSS OF JOBS RESULTING FROM GOVERNMENT CUTBACKS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. On Tuesday, I asked the right hon. Prime Minister if he would confirm that an assessment had been made by the government in respect of employment consequences as a result of the more than $2.5 billion in cutbacks announced by the governement. I asked whether he would confirm that the assessment indicated there would be a net loss of something like 100,000 jobs to the economy. As usual, he did not answer.

I ask the minister, considering that Informetrica Limited, an economic consulting firm in Ottawa used frequently by the federal government, produced a report today which points out that there will, indeed, be 94,000 jobs lost as a result of the government's cutbacks, is there a federal government assessment showing similar results; and, if so, would he table it?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of such a study by the government. If you take those cuts separately, of course you can come to such conclusions but on the other hand we think that with a budget which relates more closely to the means of the federal government, we will be in better position to create a climate of confidence in the Canadian economy. Of course, if the climate improves in Canada there will certainly be more than a mere replacement of jobs by new activities in the private sector.

[English]

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I cannot believe I understood correctly what the minister just said. Is he saying we will create economic confidence in the country by a policy that results in 100,000 more unemployed Canadians? Is that what he just said? In relation to that, I would ask the minister to make it perfectly clear that he is saying, as the Minister of Finance, he is unaware of an assessment being done by his own department on the consequences to the economy of a cut of $2.5 billion from the economy. Is he unaware of any study being done showing those consequences?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, certainly I am aware of the consequences. We decided it is extremely important to create a proper economic climate in Canada and that we should show some restraint in the public sector. This was discussed at the first ministers' meeting in February and we, including the Premier of Saskatchewan, decided collectively that we must have more room in the Canadian economy in order to create the proper climate in which to have better growth created by the private sector. I do not believe all jobs in Canada should have to be created by the public sector.

Mr. Broadbent: As usual, Mr. Speaker, this incompetent Minister of Finance does not answer the question, but goes off on a tangent. He should publicly apologize, in fact, to Premier Blakeney, who said—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a final supplementary question?

• (1422)

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I will deal with that matter later today in the debate. My final question to the Minister of Finance is, if he had no assessments made about the consequences of the $2.5 billion cutback to the economy, could he tell us, since 17 independent forecasters have suggested that unemployment next year will remain in the neighbourhood of 9 per cent, if his department has done a study to indicate whether the 17 independent forecasters are correct? Does the government expect a 9 per cent rate of unemployment? If they have such studies, will they do for us what other governments around the world did a long time ago, that is, table the studies so we can consider them?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I will deal with this problem in my budget speech in four weeks.

AGRICULTURE

HEAVY RAINS IN NORTHWESTERN QUEBEC—INQUIRY WHETHER PRODUCERS WILL BE COMPENSATED FOR CROP DAMAGE

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, considering the problems derived from the economic climate I think we could also touch on problems due to the natural climate through a question directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Throughout the summer, we had very bad weather and a lot of rain in northwestern Quebec and northern Ontario. Following the discussions I had with the Minister of the Environment concerning studies on artificial rain falls, farmer groups from northwestern Quebec are asking the Minister of Agriculture whether farmers should not be compensated for the loss of production due to rainfalls in their area. Is the minister aware of that request? What does he intend to do?

[English]

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that unless requests come from the provinces in which the producers are located, we will not act. In this case, I would think all their crops would be covered by the crop insurance which is available to them. If crop insurance was available to them and they did not take advantage of it, there is no way in which the government would be involved in any form of compensation to them.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a supplementary to the minister.

Is the minister aware of the problem? Has he received representations from the APU? If so, what studies are now being made with a view to meeting the request of the APU?

[English]

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any representation, unless it has come in the last few days.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

BUDGETARY REDUCTIONS—RESPONSIBILITY OF PROVINCES

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I should like to put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, who, a while ago, announced cuts of some $580 million in the unemployment insurance budget, adding that those cuts would have little effect on the provinces.

As we heard yesterday that, as a result of those cuts, British Columbia would have to pay $105 million in welfare; Ontario, $15 million; Newfoundland, $44 million, not to mention Quebec which will probably have to spend $75 million, can the minister tell the House how it is that, when he announced his reductions he did not have those figures at hand or, to say the least, had not advised the provinces that because of reductions they would have to shoulder those heavy financial burdens?

[English]

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the ministers whom I met yesterday concurred with the report that we presented to them. It showed the impact we anticipated the cuts would have on their welfare programs, which were significantly below their worst concerns.

Secondly, in their approach they were throwing everything into the hopper and indicating that this would create an impact on welfare, that people moving from unemployment insurance programs would automatically go to welfare. That, of course, is not in accordance with the facts. But because of their concerns and because of the very fruitful meeting we had yesterday, we are establishing a joint federal-provincial committee to look at the impact as seen from the view of the provinces and the federal government, always remembering that any impact on the welfare program is borne to the extent of 50 per cent by the federal government, in any event, under the Canada Assistance Plan.

[Translation]

Mr. La Salle: Mr. Speaker, the minister says that costs will be shared. The provinces will still be left with the short end of the stick with this measure.

As there is unanimous concern among the provinces over the amendments to the act, can the minister give his commitment, here in the House—I am not asking the Prime Minister because I doubt that I would get an answer—but could the minister give his word that no amendment or change will be implemented until there has been a real discussion with all provincial ministers? Afterwards, I think that he could table the bill in the House.

[English]

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, immediately following the announcement, arrangements were made for a meeting of deputy ministers of the departments concerned. They met in early October. Some of the fears expressed earlier were allayed at that time, and we dealt yesterday with the remaining issues. The primary concern was the impact of the changes we are announcing; that is why we have set up this committee. I think the provinces were satisfied with that approach.

To suggest we could get unanimity of opinion, or approval, from them is not quite possible because ministers from Newfoundland have very different concerns and views about Canada Works than, let us say, ministers, from Alberta or Manitoba. Therefore, obtaining unanimity is very difficult. What we want to do, as well as we can, is allay the fears that have been expressed.

SAVINGS EFFECTED THROUGH PROGRAM CHANGES

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the same minister. In its economic statement, the government claimed that the tightening up of the unemployment insurance regulations would result in savings in the order of $580 million, and that would rise to some $700 million or $900 million by fiscal year 1980-81.

What are the revised savings figures, in view of the changes in the unemployment insurance scheme to which the minister has agreed with the provinces?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I think the press reports have been somewhat erroneous. We indicated yesterday the changes we had contemplated and the impact we believed they would have. Also, we indicated, as a result of the excellent representations I had from Liberal colleagues in the Atlantic provinces, that without disturbing the thrust of the legislation we were prepared to see that it has less impact in those particular areas. I discussed that matter with my Atlantic colleagues. They are not totally satisfied, even yet, and we will probably have a battle there. The changes we will make will still, I think, keep us within the ballpark figure we are looking at for savings under the UI program, making it a better and more credible program.

Mr. Epp: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my supplementary question to the Minister of Finance. The government's credibility rests on the fact that the government will cut spending. Those announcements were made during the summer. In view of the changes just announced by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, where will the government make up the shortfall in announced savings; or have the government's projected savings been reduced?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member directed the original question to me and I indicated to him that we would still be in the ballpark. Ministers and members of our caucus felt we could place better emphasis in other areas and make the changes more equitable. I have agreed to do that, provided we are able to maintain the savings from the cuts.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST FOR PROGRESS REPORT ON NEGOTIATIONS WITH GENERAL MOTORS ON PLANT IN QUEBEC

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. Could the minister tell the House at what stage the negotiations are between the federal government and General Motors on the establishment of a plant in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, my department is carrying on talks with General Motors. They may still build more than one plant in Canada, and one of those plants may well be in the province of Quebec. They have denied the rumours coming out of a Washington report that they will not build in Quebec. They have denied that rumour, and are still considering building in Quebec.

[Translation]

Mr. Grafftey: Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a supplementary question. Given the statements made by General Motors, could the minister tell the House whether or not this company is going to build such a plant in the province of Quebec? If not, would he say that the federal government will do everything possible to have General Motors build such a plant in the province of Quebec?

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, if I could inform the House of that, I would gladly do it; but, as I say, negotiations are still going on. When they are successfully concluded, I shall be glad to inform the House.

FINANCE

METHOD OF PAYING LOTO CANADA WINNERS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question follows one asked by my colleague, the hon. member for York-Simcoe, and I address it to the Minister of Finance. In view of the fact that the minister has been accusing anybody and everybody of undermining the Canadian dollar, except perhaps himself and this government, I wonder if he is aware that a government agency, namely, Loto Canada, is advertising their Halloween draw to be paid in gold, rather than Canadian dollars. Does the minister not feel that this, in itself, is damaging to the confidence of our dollar—not only here but, more importantly, abroad?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry that the hon. member does not want us to help the mining industry in Canada.

• (1432)

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, I should not be surprised at the minister making a joke of a situation as important as this.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Notwithstanding the minister's answer, the fact remains that the position this government has taken has become the laughing stock of the New York money market.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Jelinek: I wonder if he is prepared at this time to help the dollar in this respect, by consulting his colleague who is responsible for Loto Canada in order to rectify this embarrassing monetary situation.

TRADE

ECONOMIC BOYCOTTS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Halton-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. During the parliamentary recess his colleagues, the Minister of National Defence and the Secretary of State, announced at a hastily-called press conference that the government would introduce economic boycott legislation. From the details they gave, it appears the legislation will do little more than place in statute form the statistical gathering exercise which the minister's department has undertaken.

Will the minister tell this House whether the legislation will have in it a prohibition on the supply of information regarding the racial origin, religion, colour and political affiliations of Canadian citizens and/or the officers, directors and employees of a Canadian corporation involved in international commercial transactions?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the proposed legislation, lengthy discussions took place between officials of my department and cabinet ministers with the Canada-Israel committee. They are satisfied the legislation that we will be putting before the House will answer their concerns. I am sure that when it is ready to be tabled in the House, the hon. member will be able to determine whether it will allay his worry.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, can the minister tell us why he instructed the Export Development Corporation not to appear before a committee of the Ontario legislature which is considering economic boycott legislation? Will he now instruct them to go before that committee, or is he afraid to expose the weak and ineffective boycott regulations he has in place right now?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I have repeatedly said that the Export Development Corporation is of tremendous benefit to our trade and our exports. I want to continue trading with Israel and the Middle East countries.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL—EFFECT ON SERVICE TO PUBLIC

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board in his capacity as the minister responsible for public service personnel management. I would like to know if it is possible, over the next three years, to operate the Government of Canada and give the services legislated by this House to the people of Canada, with a total hiring freeze in the public service and a reduction of 60,000 public servants.

An hon. Member: Hypothetical.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I hear the suggestion that it is hypothetical—

An hon. Member: Highly hypothetical.

Mr. Andras: I think it should be conveyed to the Leader of the Opposition that it is, in fact, hypothetical. I would not consider that to be a very wise measure to take. It is a generalization—

An hon. Member: Too late.

Mr. Andras: We announced recently that we estimate there will be a reduction of some 5,000 authorized positions in the federal public service as a result of the expenditure reductions. That was a result, not an objective, of the exercise. It came about by identifying the programs we were modifying and/or eliminating the positions that accompanied them. Anyone who suggests that kind of global reduction of 60,000—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Andras: —should add to his suggestion how he would accomplish this and what services would be prevented or damaged.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REDUCTION OF PERSONNEL—REQUEST POLICY BE RECONSIDERED

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the minister's recent announcement that 5,000 public servants will lose their jobs as a result of government cutbacks, and that most of these lay-offs will occur in the Ottawa area which already has some 30,000 people out of work, will the minister now reconsider this policy and, indeed, abandon it? It is a policy which surpasses the disastrous Inco layoffs of a few months ago.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has misinterpreted the announcement, perhaps inadvertently. We say that there will be a reduction of 5,000 authorized man-years in authorized positions in the public service as a result of the expenditure changes and modifications. It does not necessarily follow that individuals in those jobs now will be without jobs, because there is an attrition factor in the remainder of the still very sizeable public service, which requires recruitment all the time.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the minister can have it both ways. Either he has to give an unequivocal guarantee that those people will still have jobs, or he has to admit that the lay-offs are real. I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister, in the absence of the minister of the environment, because it comes under the same cutback policies. In view of the decision of the minister of the environment to close the Petawawa forestry experimental station, with the loss of 68 jobs, including those of some world-renowned scientists, and the plan to transfer government laboratories to the private sector, will the minister urge his colleague to reverse this decision, in light of the fact that Canada's forest industry needs the expertise and the broad range of research carried out by government laboratories, research which is not done by private laboratories with their narrow interests?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the minister of the environment will read Hansard tomorrow and note the hon. member's comments.

FINANCE

EQUALIZATION PAYMENTS—PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT TO CHANGES IN PROGRAM

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Finance: it concerns the proposed changes to equalization payments which the minister announced on September 8. In that the equalization program is a social contract among 11 governments, it is therefore a fiscal program unlike any other fiscal program that exists in this country in the way it exemplifies the true federal nature of this country.

Will the minister tell the House whether he had agreement of the other ten participants to make changes to this program prior to the time that he announced his intention to further aggravate regional disparity in this country?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we said in August that we wanted to reduce the contribution we are making to the provinces. In transfer payments we are transferring more than $10 billion to the provinces. We are trying to reduce the gross by $370 million. We informed the provinces that we want to negotiate that kind of cut with them. There was a meeting at the level of deputy ministers.

In my travelling, visiting the various ministers of finance, we will discuss this matter, and we will discuss it further at the meeting in November. We have not said specifically that we would cut this program or that program. We have said that no program will be completely exempted.

Miss MacDonald: Mr. Speaker, the minister said, on September 8, that the cuts would take place in programs such as equalization. I would like to ask the minister if he is telling us that he is, indeed, willing to reconsider his unilateral decision to make reductions to equalization payments. This is a program which has the support not only of the recipient provinces but of those provinces which contribute the most to equalization.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in my statement I said that we were to discuss that with the provinces. It is one of the topics to be discussed. We are not planning to abolish the program of equalization payments. It is a very important program which we established some years ago. We are planning to carry on with it. From time to time we will review the programs and adjust them. Any adjustments will be discussed with the provinces.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CANADA-U.S. NEGOTIATIONS ON FISHERIES' BOUNDARY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. In view of the fact that 140 days have elapsed since June 2, the day on which Canada and the United States closed their waters to each other's fishermen, and since there are valuable fisheries and hydrocarbons on Georges Bank, the loss of which would seriously affect the economy of Atlantic Canada, can the minister indicate whether any agreement on an international boundary in this area has been reached? If not, will he briefly inform the House of the present status of negotiations between our two countries?

● (1442)

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, it is quite difficult, as the hon. member appreciates, to do this briefly in the oral question period. The talks are going amicably but, I fear, not rapidly. In other words, there is an enormous number of very complex subjects involved, particularly as these relate to the allocation of fish stocks between the two countries. What we decided—and by "we", I mean Secretary of State Vance and myself—in New York two weeks ago was to continue the mandate of our negotiators for a further period, with a view, first of all, to seeing how many of the issues still unresolved can be settled by negotiation, and also to look at the possibilities—I should add, by the way, in consultation with fishing interests and the provinces on both coasts—of referring some of the issues that are still unresolved to arbitration. This would also involve, of course, determining what form that arbitration should take.

I think I can best conclude by re-emphasizing what I have said. There is no ill feeling involved. There is a genuine recognition on both sides of the complexity of the issue and an anxiety to ensure that all parties, including fishing interests in both countries, the provinces and the states, are all fully involved and fully advised of the direction the talks are taking. As soon as there is something more specific, I will be more than pleased to let the House know.

Mr. Crouse: In view of the fact that one of the negotiators, Mr. Cadieux, has been assigned other responsibilities, can the minister indicate whether this will have any effect on our future negotiations?

Mr. Jamieson: No, Mr. Speaker, it will not—not in the immediate future, in any event. If the talks were to proceed beyond a matter of a few months, then it might very well do so. However, the arrangements for his new assignment took into account the possibility that he would continue to be involved in these negotiations. I would hope that by the end of the year, let us say, if not before, we will at least have the framework for further progress in identifying those issues which can be negotiated and, most important perhaps, trying to put into place an interim arrangement in the event that we have to go to international arbitration or something of that sort on the larger questions of great complexity.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

ARMED FORCES RECRUITING PROGRAM

Mr. R. E. McKinley (Huron-Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. It concerns the current armed forces recruiting program and the costly series of television advertisements which the minister's department has been airing.

In view of the fact that during fiscal year 1976-1977 the armed forces accepted only one of every ten applicants, and only one out of every 25 contacts, and considering that during this time of high unemployment many interested men and women have been applying to the armed forces through the normal recruiting program, can the minister tell the House how much this current advertising campaign is costing for every recruit actually enrolled in the armed forces? Can he also tell us why, at a time of announced cutbacks, this costly program should be undertaken at all, considering that so many highly-motivated job-seekers commit themselves to the recruitment process only to be turned down later after a long and expensive process?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the advertising program was, of course, contracted for long before the current cutbacks. Nevertheless, it does give us an opportunity to be highly selective. We have always had a high proportion of people applying for service in our armed forces because of the excellent reputation they have, the excellent training young men and women receive and the excellent career opportunities they have. This means we are able to be more selective.

We are increasing the number of people in the forces over-all. It is true that attrition, at the same time, has been reduced. We will, however, have in future years a need for more people. We want to maintain that interest among them and maintain the high standards which we presently have so that we can be selective and get the very best people.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration: it is supplementary to questions asked earlier. In view of yesterday's press reports, can the minister confirm that all provincial premiers are opposed to changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, particularly in light of their position at the first ministers' conference last winter? If so, will he table any correspondence he has had with the premiers on this matter.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the provincial ministers who were present yesterday expressed support for the changes we were making to this program. They did, however, express some concern about some of the sections, and the impact. However, the general thrust of the so-called tightening up of unemployment insurance, I think, won the support of those who were there yesterday. Some ministers were not there: the minister from Saskatchewan was not there. I certainly would not want to speak for his position, because I think the NDP have indicated they do not favour this tightening up procedure.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

INCENTIVES TO REOPEN LINERBOARD MILL AT STEPHENVILLE, NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. In view of the rather unusual interest the government has been demonstrating as of late in the linerboard mill at Stephenville, is the minister prepared to be more specific with the House than he was with the people of Stephenville, when he was there last month, with respect to providing some kind of industrial incentives to prospective entrepreneurs who are prepared to enter into agreement with the government of Newfoundland to open up that plant and provide 500 badly needed jobs in that area?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Lessard (Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, of course I could be very specific. However I would like to add that the hon. member must admit we have always been interested in the activity of the linerboard mill at Stephenville and, particularly in the last few months, we have received at least verbal if not written proposals from companies in the pulp and paper sector which might be interested in purchasing these facilities. So we are waiting. Negotiations have now been initiated and I trust that in the next few weeks we will receive firm proposals from at least two companies. Together with the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, we will then be able to determine seriously which one of these proposals would be the most acceptable and most likely to lead to a successful operation for many years to come and by doing so, to protect jobs that will be created again.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Considering the fact that the minister's department has shown no interest whatsoever, to this point, in the linerboard mill and the full load has been carried by the people and government of Newfoundland, and in view of the fact that as of this day negotiations are going on with the consortium to take over, or at least operate the mill, is the government prepared to make an offer to the government of Newfoundland or the consortium with regard to a specific industrial incentives grant in order to get that mill operational as soon as possible?

Mr. Lessard: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have indicated our interest and sympathy to investigate and support, if justified, a proposal that we might receive from a potential buyer of that mill. We have indicated our willingness to enter into negotiation and, possibly, assist financially in order to again get this mill operational.

INTERVENTION OF IMF TO BOLSTER VALUE OF CANADIAN DOLLAR

Mr. F. Oberle (Prince George-Peace River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance: it concerns the continuous decline of the Canadian dollar. At this point, do the minister and the government deem it expedient or desirable to ask for the intervention or involvement of the International Monetary Fund? Has the government decided to what level the dollar should be allowed to float before such intervention is sought? Indeed, have discussions been held with the International Monetary Fund with regard to possible support?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been no such discussion with the IMF. I was in Washington, and I met with the officials there. There was no suggestion that Canada should be forced to go to the IMF. We have a lot of credit available to be gained.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

WITHDRAWAL OF WEATHER SHIPS' SERVICE ON WEST COAST

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister of the environment, I will address my question to the President of the Treasury Board. It refers to the decision to withdraw weather ships off the west coast. I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether safety at sea was fully evaluated as one of the criteria used in deciding whether those weather ships should be withdrawn. At the same time, can he tell us what other alternatives were considered before that decision was taken, such as closing regional offices in the atmospheric services?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the elimination of the two Pacific weather ships was based on information that the replacement technology would be in place and would be totally satisfactory. There are discussions with regard to a thorough examination of that situation. I can assure the hon. member that before a final action or a decision is taken we will have satisfied ourselves as to that safety factor being in place. If it is not there, we will reconsider the situation.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my information is that the technology for unmanned buoys at sea is not ready and will not be ready for three or four years. In view of the fact that notices have already been served on the crews of those weather ships, can the minister tell me for sure whether that decision has been taken? It looks very much as though it has, and I wonder whether alternative sources of savings have been considered. There are regional offices there which are not operational: they are line offices and merely post offices between the operating end and—

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I find the final comment of the hon. member very constructive and interesting and I shall examine the possibility of whether or not there is a requirement for alternative savings to be sought. However, as to the Pacific weather ships, I think if the hon. member reads again in Hansard what I said, it will confirm that that decision is being examined because of the absolute importance of providing safety measures to the people concerned.

AGRICULTURE

WITHDRAWAL OF CANFARM SERVICES

Mr. John Wise (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture: it relates to the decision of the government to withdraw completely financial support from Canfarm services. What progress has been made by the government to date to ensure the continuation of this service to some 20,000 or 25,000 Canadian farmers by some other method or perhaps by some private firm?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member is aware that there have been meetings with farm organizations in Canada, with banks which use the system and with the computer people who rent or lease computers to the government. I am very optimistic that this system will be continued, and probably in a much broader fashion than it was before.

Privatization is part of the program of the government. It is our intention to get out of as many of these programs as we can. We were not in a position where we could advertise these programs because I felt they competed too much with the private sector. However, if it is taken over by the private sector—which I am very hopeful will be the case—this tremendous service can be offered not just to farmers in Canada but also to other agricultural producers. We will be exporting this tremendous service.

Mr. Wise: Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that the government is not in a very good position to guarantee this service to Canadian farmers beyond March of 1979. In view of that, would the government consider a fee increase to the membership of Canfarm sufficient to eliminate the cost to the government, at least until such time as a solution can be reached?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, we will do our utmost to have this transfer take place before the end of this year, because some of the farm programs have to begin January 1. It is not just a matter of when our fiscal year ends, but we will do everything humanly and financially possible to make sure that this worthy organization stays alive.

NEGOTIATIONS TO PREVENT STRIKE

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General. In his absence, perhaps I can direct it to whoever is responsible at the moment for the postal mess.

An hon. Member: They all are.

Mr. Dinsdale: Now that the cabinet has met on the matter, what assurance can be given that the impending postal strike, which would be disastrous to an already crippled Canadian economy, will be avoided?

Mr. D. M. Collenette (Parliamentary Secretary to Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members know, the present situation with CUPW is at a crucial stage, and this afternoon the minister is working toward achieving a settlement. That is why he is not here in the House. I suggest that the hon. member wait until tomorrow morning before he asks any further questions.

FISHERIES

PROPOSED TRANSFER OF WEATHER FORECASTING SERVICES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment and the Minister of State (Environment), I will turn to the President of the Treasury Board since my question deals with cutbacks.

In light of the recent announcement by the Department of the Environment that there will be a cut in weather forecasting services in Newfoundland and Labrador, a decision which will seriously endanger the lives and safety of thousands of fishermen who operate off the Newfoundland coast, and in view of the minister's announcement that weather forecasting services in Newfoundland and Labrador will be transferred to Halifax, can the minister assure this House unequivocally that the weather forecasting services will not be transferred to Halifax, and can he further assure the House that there will be no cut in weather forecasting services off the Newfoundland coast?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I will take notice of the question and refer it to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ASSISTANCE TO LEBANESE

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Given the government's termination of Canadian involvement in the UN peacekeeping force in Lebanon, can the minister inform the House whether the government will accede to the request of the Lebanese community in Canada for augmented humanitarian help to the people of Lebanon, and whether steps will be taken to reunite families?

Hon. Donald C. Jamieson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on both counts the answer is yes; but, once again, it is difficult to give all the details. I met with the delegation which was in Ottawa on Tuesday. I indicated that I will raise this issue with the foreign ministers of the Western Five on the Security Council this weekend in Pretoria, so that in terms of the follow-on action to which the hon. member refers, I think he can rest assured that it is in hand.

On the matter of reunification of families, we, of course, will be as forthcoming as possible. The group to which I spoke on Tuesday emphasized, however, that it was not stressing the need for or its desire to have a refugee kind of operation. The objective of the delegation is to ensure that the Lebanese people have a right to live in peace and in decency in their own country and, of course, I subscribe to that, as I am sure all hon. members do. However, we will look at humanitarian cases as sympathetically and as generously as we can.

SUGGESTED EARLY TERMINATION OF THRONE SPEECH DEBATE

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister which arises out of the motion of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby dealing with the termination of the throne speech debate and the bringing in of legislation.

On October 10, the Prime Minister indicated that the government was prepared to get down to the business of legislating, which indicated to me that it had legislation available. Would the Deputy Prime Minister consider putting notice of that legislation down tomorrow and introducing it on Monday, so that we can have an opportunity to study it while the throne speech debate is on and so we will be able to review it carefully and understand the readiness of the government with respect to this matter?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, there will be notice given of a number of items of legislation today and tomorrow so that hon. members may have an opportunity to study the bills before they are called.

I advise the hon. gentleman that with respect to terminating the debate on the address, I will possibly interrupt the debate after the amendment and the subamendment are dealt with. Perhaps the Leader of the Opposition will not propose an amendment. If he does not, that will make my life easier. However, once the amendment and the subamendment are disposed of, I may interrupt the throne speech debate and bring on legislative items.

I see no profit whatever in accepting the suggestion of the Leader of the New Democratic Party unless he combines with that suggestion an offer that whatever days are saved on the address will not be added to the already large number of opposition days with which we have to deal.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I gather from his remarks that the Deputy Prime Minister is planning a House leaders' meeting. These are meetings which I enjoy. If that is the case, can the Deputy Prime Minister inform the House, now, whether he is planning a meeting of House leaders to discuss, among other things, the length of the throne speech debate and the order of business of the House so that the House can, in fact, in the words of the Prime Minister, get down to the business of legislating?

Mr. MacEachen: Yes, Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to meet with the other party representatives on House business early in the week and get down to legislative items, probably on Wednesday because on Tuesday we will have the vote on the amendment, and I would not want to bring on legislation until we had effectively defeated the amendment and subamendment which will be brought forward by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Wednesday, October 11, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —I think that applause came from all sides of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want to begin my full contribution to this debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne by extending my very sincere congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), whom I had an opportunity to congratulate personally outside the House yesterday, and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard). I think the two members distinguished themselves in their remarks. I am sure they would not expect that we on this side of the House would agree with every nuance of what they said, but I am sure all my colleagues on this side of the House join me in extending congratulations to them for the excellent job they did in beginning this debate.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I want also to take this opportunity—the first presented to me since the announcement yesterday in the Speech from the Throne of the intention of His Excellency the Governor General not to seek a longer term in office and to relinquish his heavy duties at the end of this term—to express on behalf of all of us in this party our admiration of the sensitivity of His Excellency the Governor General to the Canadian reality and to Canadian conditions and of the leadership he has exercised with the support of Madame Léger.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: As an ambassador, Mr. Léger represented Canada in Latin America, Central America and Europe and it was at the end of a brilliant diplomatic career that he accepted a very important position in this country. Shortly afterwards he suffered a heart attack. He has shown an exemplary courage and I am sure that all Canadians have been inspired by his will to live and work.

The source of that courage is undoubtedly Madame Léger who has admirably supported her husband in those difficult times and who has taken up the many challenges that she had to face with gracefulness and dignity. I sincerely appreciate, as do all Canadians, their great contribution to this country for which they have shown so much love.

[English]

I want to make one brief reference to that struggling party to my left.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: We in this party are of course becoming accustomed to having our proposals borrowed, but not usually by the NDP. As the leader of that party will know, on September 7 the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leader of the official opposition in this chamber, made the proposal that we on this side of the House would be quite prepared to forgo the throne speech debate if the government would be prepared to start this session, as it should, with a new budget. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) made it clear yesterday—and he is most adept at evading budgets—that he is not ready for a budget after all these months of preparation and of crisis, and consequently we cannot expect one until perhaps some time in the middle of November. So we are in a situation where we have no budget and we have a throne speech which has very few proposals.

Frankly, I think that there is an obligation upon all parties in the House, excepting the government which has forgotten its obligation, to use the opportunity of the throne speech debate, in the absence of government proposals, to put forward proposals of our own on the way in which this country should be led, and measures which can bring unity, economic growth, and jobs to the country.

I recognize that it imposes a particular hardship upon the NDP to have to propose anything positive. I sympathize with the leader of that party and his colleagues, and I quite understand that they would eagerly seek the opportunity to avoid any occasion on which they might be called upon to make positive proposals for the betterment of the country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me turn now to the throne speech debate. Some of the measures that were announced yesterday, and there were very few, are welcome. Most of those that are welcome, of course, mark a retreat by the government from its previous position, but we are getting used to that—they are the government of the pirouette, after all.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: As to the constitution, we are pleased that the government has abandoned its position that the distribution of powers should take second place to discussions of institution rights and that it has now adopted the position put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald), by the opposition leader in the other place and by myself, that the question of distribution of powers must have at least equal priority. Obviously, the obligation is now upon the government to propose specific changes in power and I hope that there will be no artificial delay in carrying out that responsibility.

As the throne speech indicates, the government continues to wiggle and squirm on the question of the monarchy. The language, I think, is that it wants to makes its position clear once again.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: It says it has no intention to change the role Her Majesty plays, but the draft bill, in a number of sections, proposes precisely changes in the role established for Her Majesty and the monarchy in this country. The government should stop trying to fool Canadians about its intentions regarding the monarchy. The throne speech says that the government is prepared to change the legal drafting. The question is whether the government will change its mind about making Her Majesty a sort of assistant governor general in this country. That is the question, and we require an answer to that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: With this matter, as with other matters, we will naturally await any specific legislation the government might have prepared to determine if the government in the throne speech means anything at all.

The government knows that it has my commitment, the commitment of my party, to approach positively and to assist in the improvement of any serious initiatives that it proposes, although naturally we are going to see the details of its proposals in legislative form before making any final decision. I refer to some of the mysterious references at the end of the Speech from the Throne to public access to government information and to "the review by parliament of evaluations by the government of major programs." That might refer to some species of a freedom of information law and it might refer to some species of a sunset law, but the language is alarming. First of all, they talk of "government information". Sir, it is public information.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Until the government recognizes that fact, it will continue to be the most secretive government in the western world.

• (1512)

Any meaningful sunset law would not have parliament review the government's evaluation of what the government is doing. If it is meaningful, it will let parliament make its own evaluation of what the government is doing, and it will add to that evaluation the power to stop the program, if parliament thinks that program should be stopped.

The Speech from the Throne urges parliament to "approach our task with urgency", yet the government controls the agenda of the House of Commons. The Speech from the Throne was the opportunity to spell out that agenda and set that tone of urgency, yet there is nothing in the speech but words—no plan of action, no sense of urgency. One phrase in the speech of the hon. member for York South stands out. She spoke of burnt embers. Nothing better describes the government which has lost its force, its flame, and is simply clinging to the warmth of office.

This spring, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) ran away from a general election, he said, "It is more important to work on the fundamental problems of the economy". But there is nothing in the Speech from the Throne to deal with those problems of the economy. The Minister of Finance does what he does best. He refuses to give us a firm budget date, and he refuses to tell parliament and Canadians all of the true facts about the revenue situation, the growth projections and the basis for those projections, so that the House of Commons can judge a budget if and when it comes in. The harsh fact is that while this government has occupied office for more than ten years now, it has not been acting as a government for at least ten months. In fact, the startling thing about the state of affairs in Canada right now is that the government has given up on governing and devotes all of its attention to preparing for an election which it cannot find the courage to call.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I ask the House to consider the chaos in Canada in the last ten months. The Prime Minister started the year by calling a meeting of the premiers in February. Having called the premiers together, the Government of Canada had nothing to propose, literally nothing to propose. It ran a dog and pony show operated by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resoures (Mr. Gillespie), but had no concrete proposals to put before the premiers. Indeed, if it had not been for the initiatives proposed by the provincial governments, nothing at all would have come from that conference.

Then again the Minister of Finance bobbed and weaved through the spring and ran away from a budget. On march 17 he said, "I do not think it is useful to have a budget". Approximately 23 days later he brought a budget down, a budget which was so badly prepared it very nearly created a crisis in federal-provincial relations. The same minister keeps talking about growth rates which he cannot substantiate, while according to the columnist, Wayne Cheveldayoff, his officials privately quote different figures, figures which they consider to be more accurate than the inflated figures cited by the minister. Again, this minister claims that the dollar is floating, but he pumps out $4.3 billion in exchange reserves to support it.

As the House will recall, last year the Prime Minister refused to establish a parliamentary committee on the constitution. This year he named one. I see the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) is not in the House. Perhaps he is out looking for a fourth portfolio. One week the Minister of Justice said that there was no need to refer the Senate proposals to the Supreme Court. The next week he referred them. In the spring the government said that it had cut as much spending as possible. In August it reversed itself. Just today two different ministers abandoned two more restraint programs. The tax lawyer who is the Liberal candidate in the constituency of Westmount proposed deductibility of mortgage interest payments. The Prime Minister attacked it by saying that it only helps the rich. Then of course he went on to define the rich as being anyone who owns a home, or anyone in Canada who wants to own a home.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I would not want to forget the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), although everyone else has.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has made his usual considered contribution to this debate. He said that in Canada a home is a luxury and that it is the policy of this government to tax luxuries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: The hon. member is deliberately misquoting me.

Mr. Clark: I regret the echoes this brings to the hon. member for Crowfoot, but we have him on tape.

Facing all the difficulties of the country, in effect the Prime Minister said that there is nothing we can do. Perhaps I should put my hands in my belt loops if I am to quote him correctly, but he said, "We are a healthy country in a difficult world". Let us take a look at that difficult world and what has been happening in countries which have much less in resources than Canada but much more in leadership than Canada. When the government came to office, Canada had the second highest standard of living in the world. Today we have the seventh, after ten years of this government.

Mr. Trudeau: Name the others. Name them.

Mr. Clark: Our unemployment rate is the worst in the industrialized world. Our inflation rate is the second worst, second only to Italy. The problem is not with the world and not with this country. The problem is that we have a government which refuses to act, and wich has governed so badly in recent years that the situation in Canada is very much worse than it needs to be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Before we can as a parliament cure a condition, first of all it is necessary to know what went wrong. I believe that basically two things have gone wrong in the last several years, both of which are the direct fault of the manner in which the government approaches its responsibilities.

Despite all the talk about unity, the style of the government has been consistent: to provoke confrontation among Canadians. For example, where it was the style of the late Honourable Lester B. Pearson to try to bring Canadians together, it has become the consistent style of this government, and this Prime Minister particularly, to attempt to pose as the tough guy, picking out some group of Canadians against which the government of all the people of Canada would stand up. The victims have changed. Once it was the farmers—why should he sell their wheat? Since then it has been labour unions, businessmen, the public service, and women who want to work. Is it a terrible thing for women to want to work? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance perennially cite them as the cause of high unemployment figures in the country.

Miss MacDonald: Shame!

Mr. Clark: Also he attacks Canadians who, in the words of the Prime Minister, have gone soft. Those soft Canadians are probably the same ones as those rich Canadians who want to own homes. At one time or another he has tried to make a victim out of almost every premier in the country. For a government whose job is to speak for the whole country, this government has shown a disconcerting tendency to speak against most Canadians at one time or another. You can only do that for so long; you can only get away with that for so long. Nature made this a difficult country to govern, but the practice of picking out victims to blame has made that job immeasurably more difficult.

Secondly, there has been a fundamental failure to trust the institutions and the agencies in Canada outside government. Consequently there has been, during the ten years of this government, a steady pattern of taking power away from other agencies in our society and concentrating power in the Ottawa government. That pattern has obviously applied to the economy. Whatever it says now, this government does not trust the millions of Canadians involved in Canadian business to make economic decisions.

There has been a steady growth in the attempt of the central government to direct and control private economic decisions. That is why we have this form of competition bill. That is why the government established Petro-Can, and why it wants Air Canada to buy Nordair. That is why it keeps control of other Crown corporations like Eldorado Nuclear and Northern Transportation Limited which would operate better outside government. That is why there has been such a growth in regulations and red tape, tying up small businesses and large. That is why the Prime Minister started the new year of 1976 by publicly casting doubt on the enterprise system, and why the government's approach to controls, its approach to the northern land regulations, and its approach to the advice of the private sector have been marked by a suspicion of the entrepreneur and a determination to centralize economic decisions with government planners.

This government's pattern of centralizing control goes well beyond the economy. This government has raided the provinces, moving Ottawa into fields where local governments make better decisions. The government set up a new Ministry of State for Urban Affairs. It used DREE to impose Ottawa's plans on less wealthy provinces. Until very recently the government tried to exclude provinces absolutely from jurisdiction over communications, in spite of the primary impact of that field upon education and upon community life.

This government used the spending power of the federal government to invade provincial jurisdiction over resources, over lotteries and, most recently, in the case concerning sales tax. The government tried to change unilaterally fundamental national institutions like the Senate, the Supreme Court, and the monarchy, institutions which do not belong to one level of government alone in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The premiers of the four western provinces presented a long, long list of different instances of federal interference in provincial jurisdiction because this government does not trust the provinces to do what the constitution empowers the provinces to do.

Less evident, but just as dangerous, has been the steady draining of influence away from voluntary groups in Canada and the concentration in Ottawa of power over things that used to be done by Canadian volunteers. For example, local service clubs across this country used to play a very major role in helping develop low-income housing projects. Now the government has stopped funding them and has forced many of those volunteer agencies out.

Again, the funding practices of Sports Canada reduced the autonomy of volunteer sporting groups. The Opportunities for Youth program had a condition which discouraged support of programs that were approved by local governments. The Department of the Secretary of State set up its own hostelling program to compete with the Canadian Youth Hostel Association. The list goes on, sir, and the pattern is clear.

This government does not trust ordinary Canadians and so has developed government programs to push volunteers aside. As we, sadly, in this institution know, that distrust extends particularly to parliament. The government denies parliament basic information such as the figures on which it bases economic policy. It refuses to answer questions about the role of ministers in security matters or about the mysterious commissions paid by AECL, or government participation in uranium cartels which break the laws of Canada, or the facts of Skyshops or phone calls to judges.

Indeed, one of its first acts in office was to strip away from parliament the effective power to control spending. The Prime Minister has said, of course, that once they get off this Hill members of parliament are mere nobodies. The pattern of this government's decade in office has been to reduce the ability of this parliament to hold the government accountable.

What is as dangerous to our system of government is that this Prime Minister appears to distrust cabinet as much as he distrusts parliament. The very essence of our system of government is that policy decisions are taken by those elected members who sit in cabinet. That does not happen any more in Canada. The real decisions are taken by an isolated, appointed elite in the Privy Council office and in the Prime Minister's office.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I suppose, sir, the most dramatic proof of that change came this summer when the Prime Minister went on television to announce a so-called new economic policy, and he went on apparently without consulting his economic ministers. He called them in after he made the announcement, or he called some of them in. He sent the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce to Japan.

An hon. Member: A good safe place for him.

Mr. Clark: I now ask nothing more, Mr. Speaker, than whether a real minister such as C. D. Howe would have put up for a moment with that kind of behaviour?

One columnist, and I know the Prime Minister's abiding respect for the press, reports that even the Deputy Minister of Finance knew nothing of the new economic program until he heard the television address.

There has been abundant other evidence of the displacement of the cabinet as a place to decide. That, after all, was why Paul Hellyer left, and that is why John Turner resisted the establishment of a little nest of the Prime Minister's private economists to second guess the Department of Finance. That, indeed, is why the government is so lacking in sensitivity to regional issues or to the real life concerns that can come only from ministers who have to deal with political realities and not just with theories.

One reason this cabinet has so little talent is that it has so little power, so the strong ministers leave, and by leaving they reduce the ability of ministers to resist the dictation of the Prime Minister's little elite.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Power has passed in Canada from the cabinet and from, indeed, the regular public service to a little elite appointed by and loyal to the Prime Minister, an elite whose chief officer, Mr. Pitfield, refuses to appear before parliamentary committees. That is the final and perhaps most dangerous symbol that this government does not trust the people it is elected to serve. It is no surprise then that the people do not trust the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Nor is it any surprise that the decisions which are taken by an isolated, appointed elite fail to address the real needs of the nation.

That analysis of what has gone wrong would be the basis of the changes we would have introduced if yesterday's throne speech had been ours to write. The purpose of our throne speech would have been to demonstrate trust in the other partners of the Canadian community. The priorities or places we would start would include institutional reform to return to control of policy by cabinet and by parliament. There would have been economic stimulus by restraining the public sector and encouraging the initiative of private citizens, whether they want to start a small business, expand a large one, or want to buy a home in Canada.

There would be constitutional change by sitting down with the provinces to find areas in respect of which we could all agree on immediate changes in the status quo that this Prime Minister has established. Naturally in that process we would begin with the agreement I reached with Progressive Conservative premiers at the Kingston conference a year ago. There were four Progressive Conservative governments then. There are six today, and there will probably be seven before the month is out.

● (1532)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would also use the time of this parliament to continue the process of consultation with labour, business, the provinces, and the other partners in the Canadian economy, the process of getting agreement to the economic development strategy which this rich nation has to have to guide it toward the development it can achieve in the 1980s. We in this party began that process this summer in a conference at Montebello, Quebec, under the excellent direction of Bob de Cotret, whose decision to seek election to parliament indicates that this institution can still attract some of the most able Canadians in the land.

Let me deal precisely with the changes we would put forward beginning with the constitution. Our constitutional challenge is twofold: first, we must put an end to the deadlock in which Ottawa is opposed to all the provinces on the matter of the sharing of powers. This Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has had ten years to design the constitution he wants. He has changed the constitution and he did so in reserving more and more powers for Ottawa.

That is how he sees it. He is a centralist who cannot even trust the provinces when they use their traditional and legitimate powers. My party and myself see Canada from a totally different point of view. We believe Canada is based upon respect for the provinces and upon recognition of the fact that the nation's welfare depends on a feeling of close co-operation between a strong government in Ottawa and strong governments in the provinces.

What is needed from the outset is to restore respect for this kind of partnership. This is no time for theorizing. It is high time to come to practical agreements in order to find solutions to problems of a practical nature. I am the national leader of a party which is in power in six of the ten provinces and I have already started using this common denominator to come to practical agreements with the provincial governments on actual issues. During the meeting which was held in Saskatchewan in August last, all provinces unanimously rejected the constitutional proposals of the Trudeau government. In September last year, in Kingston, the premiers of Ontario, New Brunswick, Newfoundland and Alberta agreed with me on certain specific changes in the constitution. The Manitoba premier signed that agreement later on, while the new premier of Nova Scotia approved it in principle and will soon be discussing it with his cabinet.

I spoke of the contents of that agreement with each one of the premiers, including that of Quebec, and I am convinced that a new national government would be able to reach an agreement with all the provinces on the majority of those reforms. Among them, Mr. Speaker, there is the enshrining in the constitution of the forbidding that federal spending powers be used to interfere in fields of provincial jurisdiction without the consent of the provinces concerned. That provision would have spared us the sale tax fiasco in Quebec. Those reforms also include a constitutional guarantee with regard to the equalization principle that is essential to the maintenance of national levels in a country like Canada. They recognize officially the role of the provinces in matters concerning cultural policies; they recognize that off-shore and underground resources are a provincial jurisdiction. They provide for the participation of the two levels of government in the composition of federal bodies. Those then are the subjects on which an agreement was reached by the provinces and myself. I am sure that we will follow through on this agreement in less than six months after we are elected. Naturally, the process of constitutional changes will not be limited to that; it will be no more than a beginning in the right direction, thanks to concrete agreements on concrete problems, and the cause of federalism will be better off because we will have proved that a new federal government is not committed to maintaining the status quo of the last ten years.

[English]

That is the necessary first step, sir, to constitutional reform, to prove that governments can agree on specific, concrete reform. That would change the atmosphere of the last ten years where Ottawa and the provinces seem to meet only to fight. Of course there are going to be disagreements among governments. There will be times when I am going to have to assert national interests in ways that will not at all please the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: The difference will be in the atmosphere, in the way that we work together. And that atmosphere that has been poisoned by the determination to confront of this Prime Minister and his government can be changed by a recognition in Ottawa that the provinces are partners in confederation, not enemies. When we achieve that atmosphere of agreement I am convinced, as a Canadian from Alberta, who has worked to learn my second language and to understand the different cultures and the different conditions of this amazing country, that we can use that new atmosphere to address the larger questions of how our constitution reflects the cultural, the regional, and the national reality of Canada.

Let me turn now, sir, to the economy. It almost makes one choke to talk about it. I wish that the solutions to the nation's problems were as easy as simply taking a glass of water. What we need instead is a far more fundamental change. We are in this country now growing well beneath the potential of Canada.

Instead of real growth of 5 per cent, which with effective policies would be attainable, the Conference Board in Canada says that we will be fortunate to achieve 4 per cent this year and 3.7 per cent in 1979. We are paying an enormous price for that economic shortfall. Again, according to the Conference Board, a real growth of 4.75 per cent and an unemployment rate of 5.5 per cent would produce—and I emphasize these figures—$41 billion more in new wealth over the next two years, wealth that could be used to generate new jobs, create new investment and create growth. The board also estimates that achieving those growth and employment targets this year and next year would increase the tax revenues of the federal and provincial governments by more than $13 billion. That is one way to meet a deficit, because those are revenues which would help bring government financial accounts into much better balance.

It is not simply individual policies that are lacking now. There is absolutely no coherence to Canadian economic policy. There is no commitment to realistic economic targets. The minister and his own officials cannot agree. There is no over-all sense of direction. Yet the priorities for this economy are clear. First, Canada needs a program of major economic stimulus. I have proposed that kind of program based on the premise of putting money in the hands of individual Canadians who will spend their money more effectively than this government is spending it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have proposed a tax cut to put at least $300 per year into the hands of lower and middle income Canadians.

● (1542)

We have proposed a program, phased in over four years, to allow partial deductibility of mortgage interest and property taxes.

We have proposed significant tax incentives for research and development and small business, and the use of tax contracts for companies locating in slow growth areas.

I say in all generosity to the government: if you have no program of your own, please take ours!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Amend it if you will. You would probably want, on the question of mortgage deductibility, to consult your candidates in Westmount and York-Scarborough, both of whom agree with us. Once again, the Liberal party is split. I do not know whether it has anything to do with the Minister of Industry Trade and Commerce.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I hear the question, "What about David Crombie?" As is not going to be the case with the Liberal candidates in Westmount and York-Scarborough, David Crombie will be in this House of Commons shortly to answer for himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: When the minister puts that question—assuming he can get re-elected in his own constituency in time to come—he will find Mr. Crombie agrees completely with the program we have put forward and has said so on innumerable occasions. I wonder if the minister can say the same for his candidate in Westmount, and the same for his candidate in York-Scarborough.

I do not mind if the government, having borrowed our program, amends it, but at least it should bring some program to this parliament so that Canadians can believe this House of Commons is trying to deal with some of the economic problems the country faces.

Secondly, as well as stimulus, we need a restraint program that is real and has some purpose to it, has some permanence to it. There is absolutely no rationale to the government's so-called restraint program. For instance, in April, the government introduced incentives to research and development. But then what did they do? Now they dismantle fishery and forestry laboratories. They go out and fire civil servants, yet charge the people of Canada for the jet plane that takes the Prime Minister to talk to editors of the Globe and Mail.

Apart from the civil servants the Liberals have fired, there is no permanence to the government's so-called restraint program. It is, as the Minister of Finance said in Willowdale, the other night—we have got him on tape too—he said their program is merely a "pause"—and I quote him—before, as he put it, the government—and I am quoting again—"gets on again with redistributing wealth". That is their goal—not to generate wealth in this country but simply to slice, in decreasing and decreasing pieces, a slimmer pie.

This restraint program they are talking about was written on the back of an envelope; it can be reversed with another envelope tomorrow.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have proposed a very different kind of restraint program. We would cut into real spending, not just planned programs. Our restraint program would have a definite sense of direction. It would focus on three goals: first, it would reduce the sheer cost of operating government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I hear some shouts from the other side, Mr. Speaker. That is a policy of attrition that would involve no lay-offs, nor firings. I understand the discomfort that causes on the Liberal side because it is so different. They are firing civil servants today. What we are proposing is a policy of attrition that will naturally take its first effect on the former minister of almost everything, the temporary member of the legislature of Quebec for Verdun, the aspiring member for whatever constituency he can parachute his way into—he would be the first target of our restraint program to reduce the sheer costs of operating government.

The second focus would be getting the Government of Canada out of areas where the Government of Canada does not belong—getting it out of urban affairs—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: —getting it out of Petro-Can, out of Northern Transportation Limited.

One of the things that has been very surprising, remarkable, and worth nothing about the government's restraint program is that they are prepared to get into restraint programs and fire civil servants but they are not prepared to get rid of some of the Prime Minister's toys like Petro-Can.

Third, we would reduce the costs the government has to pay for economic stagnation through unemployment insurance and other programs which stagnation makes expensive for the government and the people of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we must have a strategy aiming precisely at job creation. According to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, there will be more jobs than workers in two years from now. That is ridiculous! I have also made a definite proposal to Canadians on that matter. Instead of spending $4.7 billion this year on unemployment insurance benefits to pay Canadians not to work, why not use the major part of that money to subsidize, as I said, some jobs so that young Canadians, men and especially women, could acquire the necessary knowledge and experience to work.

Mr. Speaker, we need a comprehensive scheme for economic development. And that scheme must cover at least the next decade. This government has no economic development strategy. As negotiators are in Geneva where they participate in major discussions related to GATT and they have no global framework allowing them to negotiate in favour of Canada's interests nor a national policy to support their demands.

A Progressive Conservative government would convene all economic partners, as we did this summer in Montebello, in order to hold elaborate discussions that would go on until a general consensus had emerged and practical decisions and committments had been made. I have already mentioned sectors where Canadians start with an advantage and from which we can progress, namely shipbuilding and its possibilities, our know-how in transportation and communications, our huge energy resources and the important market for heavy machinery represented by our own resources related industries which is now almost completely in the hands of foreign suppliers.

[English]

And finally, had this throne speech been ours to write, we would give priority to restoring some substance to democracy in this country. In some things, this government is merely incompetent. In others, it is deeply dangerous, because of its contempt, in practice, for the rights and the representatives of ordinary Canadians.

This is the first government in Canadian history to use the Official Secrets Act to bring charges against a newspaper. It is the first government in Canadian history to order a secret trial. It is the only government in British parliamentary history to have used closure to change the rules of parliament—when it deprived parliament of the power to control spending. It is a government which lets police officers testify in public, then insists that cabinet ministers, before the same commission, on the same case, testify in secret. It has let power pass to a little elite, and it delays elections when they get in trouble. The first reponse must be to get rid of that government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: But there is also a need to build into the system protection against future governments acting as badly. that is why we in this party would introduce a full freedom of information bill with narrow and precise exceptions, with an independent tribunal, probably the courts, empowered to resolve any disputes between the government and the citizen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would restore to the official opposition—the present Prime Minister or his successor—the capacity to designate two departments each year whose estimates would be examined without limitation of time, so that all of us would have to be prepared in anticipation of being scrutinized.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We would introduce to all departments the concept of zero-based budgeting so continuing expenditures, and not just new proposals, would be reviewed. We would introduce a real sunset law so that Crown agencies would be required to come at regular intervals and to justify their need to exist, before a committee of parliament. We would vest in committees of parliament the powers and the resources to start their own inquiries so that we will never again have the atmosphere of continuing cover-up that has characterized this last decade of government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We are a country in trouble but we in this House have to recognize that we are also an institution in trouble. Canadians are sceptical about parliament and, unfortunately, some of our own members play to that scepticism.

This parliament, sir, is the only Canadian institution which can reach and reflect the whole great diversity of Canada. It has been muzzled and limited in recent years. Parliament must be renewed if the nation is to be renewed. The obligation to lead in this House and in this country rests with the government. They showed yesterday, as they have shown repeatedly, that they are just too tired to lead.

My colleagues and I have a deep faith in this country. We know that there is a potential here no other nation shares, a potential for freedom, a chance to build, and an opportunity to excel. We will help this government in its dying days if it has anything to propose. But particularly after the further disappointment of yesterday's Speech from the Throne I cannot disguise our determination to form a new government, a government that is worthy of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: We have a motion before us to approve an empty program. We in this party cannot approve yet another refusal by this government to govern. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), that the following be added to the address:

This House regrets to inform Your Excellency that your government is unable to provide effective leadership for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to join the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in congratulating the movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Both movers drew their inspiration from the purest of liberal traditions, one by applying the concept of liberty developed by John Stuart Mill and the other by expressing the concern that this government has always had towards those in our society who are most in need of protection, and particularly senior citizens. Of course, I also share the feelings expressed by the Leader of the Opposition towards His Excellency the Governor General and his wife. I think that we will have other opportunities to extol the merits of these distinguished people and that we should do so some other time.

I cannot offer quite the same type of congratulations to the Leader of the Opposition. I recall the theses that were explained to us a long time ago when I was studying experimental and rational psychology and when we were told that the brain has three faculties: The first is memory, the second imagination and the third intelligence. As concerns memory, I can congratulate the Leader of the Opposition. He made a few blunders and a few mistakes about figures, but on the whole he recited his text well and his memory did not mislead him too often. As for imagination, he really took first prize for his litany of charges and illustrations. What we have seen is an overheated imagination creating a quite extraordinary fantasy in describing a situation which has no relation with reality. However, as concerns intelligence, I must say that it was left behind. There is not much food for intelligence in this text. I do not know if this is how the authors of his speech wanted to show their contempt for parliament or the Canadian people or perhaps only for the Leader of the Opposition. But whatever the case may be, it is certain that in view of the great many errors stated by the Leader of the Opposition, we must conclude, Mr. Speaker, that imagination beats intelligence every time.

Let me give a few examples before getting into the gist of my statement. Heavens, where to start? He talked about Sky Shops. We all remember of course that for several months in this parliament, opposition members were muckraking a senator who had been brought before the court. This indeed is typical of the "scandals" that the opposition is contantly bringing to the attention of parliament. As it is, the House knows, the courts ruled that the charges brought against Senator Giguère were not founded and he was found not guilty. The only use that I see in recalling this unfortunate incident is to somewhat shame the opposition which has used innuendos and slander, if not outright libel, to dirty the name of certain persons, forgetting afterwards that they were found not guilty and forgetting their accusations, but on the contrary repeating them again before the House as they have done today.

[English]

We heard a great deal about a lot of other subjects. We heard, for instance, that this is a very centralizing government. No figures were put forward by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). However, just out of memory, I am sure most members of this House could give some very clear figures. If you take the last ten years in this country, total government spending has gone from a percentage of 32 per cent of gross national product to 40 per cent. The growth of governments at all levels has increased by a margin of about eight in this period of ten years. Four of those eight points have been accounted for by spending by the provinces, two and a half by the federal government, and one and a half by the municipalities. This is what the Leader of the Opposition calls a centralizing period in our history. He should at least look at the facts.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He mentioned the policies of this government to downgrade volunteers in this country, that we were trying to take away from the private sector and from all those people who are trying to do good in this country, trying to monopolize the powers to the federal government.

I was on the Hill yesterday noon. The hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale) was on the platform with me. We learned that for the Canada Winter Games, an institution created by the federal government under Mr. Pearson in 1967, which will be held in Brandon next February, there will be 3,000 volunteers in Brandon for 2,500 athletes in order to get the games working. We learned in Edmonton just last summer that there were 9,000 volunteers.

Mr. Paproski: Ten thousand!

Mr. Trudeau: The hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski) says 10,000. I think the whole thesis of volunteers being abolished by this government falls to the ground, just like most of the other points of the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: He mentioned something about Loto Canada taking over from the private sector which is interested in sports. The Leader of the Opposition may not have all that rapport with sports, but he might at least know that it is the sports organizations which have been coming to the federal government asking us to create a ministry for sports, which we did under the very excellent minister of sports whom we have.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They asked us to, for heaven's sake, begin funding them, which we did, rather than let it be only amateurism and kitchen table organizations, where our sports people were not given an equal chance with sportsmen from other countries.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about security matters and cover-up. We have heard a great deal about that in the last year or two. When the history of this period is written, I do not think it will redound to the glory of the Leader of the Opposition or to the members of that party.

We remember that that party was condemning us in 1971-72 because we dared to put GRC along with the initials RCMP on the uniform shoulders and the cars of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. That party was accusing us of destroying the sacred traditions of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

[Translation]

The Leader of the Opposition does not even remember what the member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in the House, and what many members of his party also said. I think that at the time he was adviser to Premier Lougheed. He was not overly concerned with these things then, but he should be now.

[English]

He should realize that if these sacred traditions of the RCMP are being destroyed by anybody, they are being destroyed by the members of that party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: When it came to light that some of the officers of the RCMP had indeed been involved in some unsavoury acts, and at that time we thought they were few in number, we proposed to refer them to the courts. An inquiry was set up in the province of Quebec, the Keable inquiry. The opposition was attacking that inquiry, saying that we should set up our own inquiry, that it did not trust the Keable inquiry. They said that we should set one up because the federal government was involved.

A few months later more facts came to light. We did set up a royal commission of inquiry as the opposition had requested, the McDonald commision. What was then the position of the Leader of the Opposition and his supporters? It was to say that whatever the Keable inquiry was doing was okay.

When that provincial commission of inquiry was looking into the federal RCMP and asking the federal RCMP to table documents which were private and secret, the opposition party at that time felt it perfectly legitimate for that provincial commission to inquire into a federal body. However, it did not trust the McDonald commission, which was a federal or royal commission of inquiry to do the job. They used terms like "cover-up", which they have never been able to substantiate. As successive solicitors general have shown, we have put before the McDonald commission every piece of paper that they wanted to look into.

I cannot go into every one of the fanciful statements made by the Leader of the Opposition. There are a couple more I should draw to the attention of the House before getting on with my speech. One has to do with the Kingston conference. This is beautifully typical of the Leader of the Opposition.

He went to Kingston to prove to this country that he can get along with the provincial premiers. There were four Tory premiers meeting with him in Kingston. He was going to show that his is not the way of confrontation but one of conciliation. He came back from Kingston with a very celebrated document showing how clever, intelligent, and persuasive he has been. When you look at what he has done, he has given away the shop to the provinces.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: No confrontation, Mr. Speaker. He promised the provinces he would give them the guarantees they wanted on equalization and spending power. These are two federal areas of jurisdiction. On both, as early as 1968 and 1969, we published in white papers, suggested modifications of the constitution which would circumscribe this federal power, but it is a federal power. Equalization is a federal law. The spending power is under federal jurisdiction. The Leader of the Opposition went there and came back with a great victory. He promised to the provinces that he would circumscribe this federal power.

He came back with another great victory. He said in cultural matters he would recognize the primacy of the provinces. A great victory! He gave the provinces something. What did he get from them?

● (1612)

The Leader of the Opposition mentioned that the fourth great victory was in terms of offshore mineral rights. What did he get? He promised the provinces that, regardless of the constitution, and regardless of what the courts said, he would recognize that the provinces have a proprietary interest over offshore mineral rights. A great big victory! No confrontation in Kingston. He just lost his shirt, that's all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Even before I get into my speech it is to easy to see how this man would run federal-provincial relations. There are ten premiers and one federal prime minister. He would change it to eleven premiers. That is a fine, fine way to do it, but who would speak for Canada? Where would the strong federal government be?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Letting his imagination run wild again he came up with several other facts. One had to do with federal Crown corporations. He does not like them. He does not like Petro-Canada. He does not like it when Air Canada makes a bid to take over Nordair. He denounces this as federal intrusion, arrogance, and everything else. What about the Alberta Energy Corporation? Does he object to that? What about when the Alberta government buys into Alberta Gas Trunk Line? Does he object to that? What about when the Alberta government takes over Pacific Western Airlines? Does he object to that? Crown corporations are not good if they are federal Crown corporations, but if they have to do with some strong premier, to whom he owes I do not know what obeisance, then they are okay. Nothing is wrong with that. Has the Leader of the Opposition objected to the existence in Canada of Petrofina, British Petroleum or Gaz Acquitains, or any Crown corporations belonging to France, Belgium, Britain or Saudi Arabia, for all I know? No, no objection to that, but if the Government of Canada has a Crown corporation in the energy field, that is terrible.

I wonder what kinds of principles the Leader of the Opposition has. Is he interested in the Government of Canada and in the welfare of its citizens, or is he just trying to destroy something the federal government has set up to serve its citizens? I do not know what principle guides him.

Again I must ask the Leader of the Opposition the question which was asked from this side of the House when he said that in the life of this government Canada had slipped from second place in terms of standard of living to seventh. I think that is what he said. We asked him to name the seven. I wonder if he would name them now, or should I name them for him? Who went ahead of us? The United States was there already, and I can give figures to show that in that period we have crept up on the United States very strongly. But who are the others? Kuwait? Bahrain? United Arab Emirates? Qatar?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: That is why I was saying that the Leader of the Opposition was using his memory and not his intelligence because, if he used his intelligence, he would know that it does not describe the standard of living when you divide gross national product by the figure of population. Sure, you get a figure, and it will be higher in the United Arab Emirates than it will be in Canada, but that does not give the standard of living, except perhaps of the Emirs. They have a higher standard of living than we do, but in order to establish who ranks where, we have to look at what we can buy with that money in each particular country. I will give the Leader of the Opposition some figures on that subject in a moment, but I repeat that I am nonplussed by the series of absolute falsehoods and absolute misrepresentations put forward by the Leader of the Opposition on every subject he touched upon, whether it was the sovereignty of parliament, secrecy, cover-ups, scandals, figures, statistics or anything else. I think the best way to attempt to deal with the subject as a whole—

Mr. Clark: "Falsehoods," you said?

Mr. Trudeau: It is a falsehood to say that Canada has slipped to the seventh rank in terms of standard of living. I do not say that the Leader of the Opposition deliberately misled us. His speech writers probably deliberately misled him.

Mr. Clark: Do you stand by "falsehoods"?

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition wants to ask a question. If he wants to ask a question, let him.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, my question to the Prime Minister, perhaps as a prelude to a question of privilege, is whether or not he stands by the word "falsehoods", saying that I have lied to the House of Commons, knowning full well—and I do not have all the lists available to me—that if we were to include the Emirates, of which he is so fond, Canada's standard would probably be thirteenth or fourteenth.

Mr. Trudeau: I asked the Leader of the Opposition to give the list. He did not have it. I supplied it for him. I said that it was a falsehood to draw from that list the conclusion that Canada does not have as high a standard of living as some of the others.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Cheap!

Mr. Trudeau: He has been led into a miscalculation, probably innocently, because he does not understand the statistics.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Rather than once again trying to jump from one subject to the other in order to go into all the areas which the Leader of the Opposition has led us through, I will try to divide the remarks I have to make into two areas, the economy first, and then the subject of national unity.

The Leader of the Opposition submitted that on unemployment and on inflation in particular this government has a great deal of explaining to do, and I propose to give those explanations in the course of the next few minutes. On unemployment the Tories say that they would put Canada back to work. Well, the simple fact is that Canada has not stopped working. Canada has created more employment in the past ten years than any other industrial society.

In each of the past ten years we created an average of more than a quarter of a million jobs, and that rate is unequalled anywhere in the industrialized world. Let me give some figures. I have several to give. I would say that they concern the 15 most industrialized countries. They concern those countries with which we do about 90 per cent of our trade. Therefore, they are the most important countries. They do not include Kuwait and Bahrain, but they do include the countries with which we do 90 per cent of our trade, by and large.

These figures are OECD figures and, when possible, I have taken the period from 1968 to 1977. In some cases the OECD figures are not provided for 1968 and 1969. In those cases I start in 1970, but we do know the Canadian figures, and we do know that the tables would be even better if we had the figures for all the other countries because Canada did well indeed in those first two years, 1968 and 1969.

Percentage change in employment from 1970 to 1977, Canada, rate of growth in employment: 23 per cent. The next closest is the United States with 15 per cent, then Australia, and then those countries about which we say a great deal of good and which are sometimes named as models for Canada. Sweden is at 5 per cent as compared to our 23 per cent; Japan, 5 per cent; West Germany, minus 6 per cent; and Switzerland, minus 11 per cent. Probably they rank very high in terms of the standard of living. The reason is very simple; not only did the number of jobs not grow in those countries but it was actually reduced by 5 per cent or 11 per cent. Why was that? For the very simple reason that workers in those countries, who came from Turkey, Portugal, Spain or Yugoslavia, were sent back home when the economy slowed down, so naturally there were fewer unemployed in those countries, the governments did not need as stimulative an economic policy and therefore were better able to protect their currency.

The Leader of the Opposition understands, I am sure, that if that were the situation in Canada, if we could actually reduce our work force, it would be relatively easy to show a better exchange rate. But when we must find jobs for the fastest growing labour force in the world, it is a different problem from that in the countries I have mentioned. Therefore, Canada, in terms of the employment growth rate, is the best in the world. That is true for those seven years and it is equally true if we take the difficult years of the post OPEC crisis from 1974 to 1977. We still lead the world in terms of job creation.

Let us consider the rate of growth of the real domestic product. In that respect Canada is third. The annual average between 1968 and 1977 has increased by 4.5 per cent a year. Ahead of us are Japan and France; we come third before Germany, Australia, Finland, Belgium, Italy, Switzerland, Sweden, and the United Kingdom. If we take the three difficult years, from 1974 to 1977, we see that Canada comes second just after Norway.

Let us consider the growth in industrial production which shows that Canada has been at work these past years. In industrial production the OECD base year is 1970. In the percentage increase we come second, right after Norway. Norway is at 38 per cent; we have a 32 per cent increase in industrial production since 1970. What has happened? We have grown very fast, we have a faster job creation than any other country, but still we have an unacceptably high unemployment. Thank heavens it has not increased since the month of June, but it is still much too high, that is certain. Why is it too high and what can be done about it? Once again this is where you should not use your imagination but rather your reasoning.

If you look at the rate of growth of the labour force, you will find that between 1968 and 1977 of all the countries in the world Canada's labour force has grown the fastest. We are followed by the United States, Norway, Australia. Sweden's rate of growth in the labour force is down at 10 per cent as compared to our 33 per cent; Japan is at 7 per cent; once again Germany has a negative growth rate and so has Switzerland. Therefore, even though we created jobs at a faster rate than any other society, our labour force has increased faster than in any other industrial society, so naturally the result is a high rate of unemployment.

It is said sometimes that the government could have foreseen that. Obviously this situation is due to three things: it is due to the birth rate. After the Korean was there was a baby boom. We knew that all these young people would be coming onto the labour force in the 1970s. Second, it is due to the immigration rate, and we are happy to continue to receive immigrants in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Third, it is due to the participation rate. I am careful not to use the word "falsehood", but once again there is lack of understanding. When we talk about the participation rate and we say that more young people and more women are entering the labour force now than in a previous societal state, we are not judging, we are not saying they should not, we are just describing a reality, we are just saying that more women now are second workers in a household and that younger people are entering the labour force sooner. This explains why the employment force has gone up faster. This is not a judgment and we are not proposing to change this. As a matter of fact, just look at this side of the House, Mr. Speaker, and you will see that we put more women to work on this side than they do on the other side.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It was foreseeable that with immigration and with the higher birth rate there would be a very fast growth rate in employment. So what did we do? In the early 1970s we brought in the best unemployment scheme in the world, and we were not helped in this by the other side. We brought in a very generous—perhaps an overly generous unemployment system—in order to help those who we knew would be unemployed when these situations arose and when the baby boom emerged in the larger number of young people entering the labour force. So we brought in this very generous scheme, but since then we found some abuses of it, so we are tightening it up. Our first reaction, however, was one of intelligent compassion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We also went about creating more jobs. The growth of employment was created essentially by the private sector, but it was brought about in economic circumstances in which both the federal and provincial governments had a role to play. In our case we helped to create more jobs by way of budget deficits. Here I look askance at the leader of the NDP who always seems to be saying that we are cutting back too much. We must remind him that we will still have financial requirements for this year of some $11.7 billion. So indeed we are cutting back the rate of growth. However, we are stimulating the economy to a very large extent indeed, to a much larger extent, comparatively speaking, than is the premier of Saskatchewan whom the leader of the NDP was citing as an example.

Mr. Broadbent: What is the growth level in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Trudeau: I am talking about the economic policy. The leader of the NDP suggests that we should be more stimulative than we have been. I am telling him that we are immensely more stimulative than the Saskatchewan government. That is the point I want to make.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: We have brought in a series of other measures. I cannot go into them all in detail, but let me just mention some in passing to show that this business of stealing each other's programs seems to have gone in a different direction than the one suggested by the Leader of the Opposition.

Several years ago we brought in research and development incentives. We applied an investment tax credit to R and D, and then we gave additional R and D expenditures a 50 per cent write-off, so that the cost of a $1 expenditure in R and D can cost as little as 20 cents. The Conservative party is only now getting around to encouraging R and D in its programs.

For years we have been bringing in measures to encourage small business. Their tax rates are half the tax rates of normal corporations. Recently we have allowed family corporations to roll over $200,000 of capital gain without tax. Recently we have removed the manufacturing sales tax on the first $50,000 of sales by small businesses. In manufacturing and processing we have reduced the federal tax level from 36 per cent to 30 per cent. We have given a two year write-off on machinery and equipment. We have given manufacturers access to the investment tax credit. And on it goes in the resource sectors and other sectors where we have been helping the private sector create jobs in ways which now the Tory party feebly proposes to imitate.

We have also—and I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition said nothing about that except to criticize it—embarked upon direct employment programs. I think he was criticizing the Opportunities for Youth program and other such programs, and yet many countries have come to Canada to see how successful our programs were, and have copied them. These programs have directly created jobs for many of our young people.

Mr. Trudeau: This winter job experience training for youth will employ another 58,000 young Canadians. Next year $710 million will be spent for job creation and training. That will involve some 370,000 people. I am not sure in what way one can look at the Tory response to this situation of high unemployment. They talk about putting the economy back to work. They talk about creating more money by making more work and by getting more taxes from having fuller employment. Apart from imitating some of our schemes, the trouble is that they do not say how to do it.

Obviously they have some economic policies. We can get glimpses of them when the hon. Leader of the Opposition announces a $2,200 million tax cut. Then he has this mortgage and municipal tax scheme which will cost something in the area of $1,600 million. Then he has a whole series of miscellaneous other programs for small businesses, research and development, and other things, which are feeble imitations of our programs. They are estimated at something like $1.5 billion, for a total of $5.3 billion.

The hon. Leader of the Opposition indicated that somehow he will fund this by eliminating the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet). Right away he will get $20 million off the top. Out of $5.3 billion he will get $20 million. Then he will put an end to Petro-Canada. The saving there will be $200 million. That is a total of $220 million. Also we know he will abolish the Department of Multiculturalism. He told us that, approximately a year ago out west. That will result in a great saving of $5 million.

Where is the other saving? It will be the 60,000 public servants who will be lost through attrition. The calculation which I read in the Financial Times indicated an approximate saving of $1,200 million. I am not sure how he will work the government through attrition over three years, losing 60,000 public servants, because those who go off by attrition are not always those one wants to lose, and those who stay on are not necessarily those one should not fire. It is an easy, painless process. It is something like his approach to the provincial premiers. There will be no confrontation with the public service. He will reduce the size of government by letting people die off. Does this take a great deal of courage and organizational skill?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Out of policies which will cost approximately $5,300 million, there will be an estimated savings of approximately $1.5 billion. The simplest thing to say in response to that is that the Red Tories have been replaced by the red ink Tories. That is what they will be.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I should like to talk about inflation because those facts are also subject to criticism and analysis. We have received the criticism, but we have not received the analysis. We have not heard the Tory policies on the subjects I will discuss, but first let us look at the facts. We know that for the past two months the rate of inflation has been slowly coming down. Also we know that from August to September inflation was wrestled to the ground for one month. I dare say it will not be a permanent victory, but we will continue fighting in the manner which I will indicate.

In order to set the record straight when we talk about standard of living and cost of living, let us look at some of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development figures. The standard of living is expressed in terms of real disposable purchasing power. In 1968 we were second, right after the United States. They had $4,679 and we had $3,516. Eight years later, the latest date for which we have figures, we are still second. I am talking of constant dollars, obviously Canadian dollars brought to the 1971 base. In 1976 the United States were at $4,258 and Canada was at $4,082. Thus, we were still second, and away ahead of Switzerland, the Netherlands, Germany, Norway, Japan, Italy, but perhaps not ahead of Kuwait. I am not sure, I do not have the figures for Kuwait. If we are talking of real disposable purchasing power, probably we are pretty well ahead of Kuwait. For something which costs perhaps $50 in this country, one will pay perhaps $300 in that country. If one is not the Emir himself, who will have a little bit of difficulty maintaining his purchasing power.

The United States is listed first on the cost of living index. Putting that country on the basis of one hundred and comparing the cost of living of various countries to the United States in any of the years 1968, 1970, 1974, 1976 or 1978, Canada is always in the top little group. Let us take the two years to which reference is always made. In 1968 we were second. The cost of living index in the United States was one hundred and the cost of living index comparatively in Canada was one hundred and one. In 1978, ten years later, the United States was 100 and Canada was 102. We are still second, and away ahead of France, Germany, Switzerland, and Japan. Japan was 165 compared to our 102. Though the figures on inflation are not nice and we would rather have a lower rate of inflation, obviously the result of these years of inflation indicates that Canada has done immensely better than most of the other industrialized countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I should like to put another index before the House. Looking at food prices, calculated in current United States dollars for a given basket of food, and reported by United States agricultural attachés around the world—that basket of food is the same in Australia, Canada, United States, United Kingdom and so on,—in Canada we are second. We pay $19 for that basket in Canada. There is one country ahead of us by one cent. That country is Australia where the basket costs $18.99. After us, in terms of food prices, come the United States, United Kingdom, and further on Germany, Sweden, Denmark, Japan, and all these other countries. Thus, in terms of food also we are among the winners.

I should like to refer to another index, real personal disposable income.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I know these figures are tedious, but they should be on the record for the benefit of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Because we are neck and neck with the United States in a lot of these industries, I have compared the gains over the past ten years in Canada with the gains in the United States. Therefore, taking 1968 as 100, the real personal disposable income per capita in Canada has risen from 100 to 151.90. In other words, we have increased our real personal disposable income per capita. That is gross earnings plus all which is received in terms of transfer payments, minus all taxes. We have gained some 50 per cent. Compared to the United States, in that country it went from 100 to 124. Once again we are ahead of everyone and we are doing very well in terms of real wealth.

Some hon. Members; Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Other industries are referred to in the census and by Statistics Canada. I will refer to a few in order to show that over the past ten years this country has not really seen itself reduced from riches to rags. Let us look at a few of these indices, first in relation to personal expenditures on consumer goods and services.

● (1642)

In the case of food, beverages and tobacco, our expenditure on these items compared to our total expenditures has gone down from 21 per cent to 19 per cent. In the case of rent our expenditure has gone down from 19 per cent to 17 per cent.

The percentage has gone up in respect of recreation, entertainment, education and cultural services.

There is another way of expressing this, and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) is constantly reminding us of this. It relates to the percentage of disposable income spent on food, the assumption being that when you are wealthy you spend a smaller proportion of your income on food than when you are poor. This index puts the United States first and Canada second, away ahead of most of these so-called model countries. In the United States 12 per cent of disposable income is spent on food whereas in Canada it is 13 per cent. This means, according to this index, that we in Canada have a surprisingly advantageous situation.

Let me refer to the index in relation to households. In 1968 some 91 per cent of households in Canada had hot and cold running water. Seven years later this had increased to 97 per cent. In relation to the number with baths or showers, in 1968 there were 90 per cent and in 1977 there were 97 per cent. In 1968 some 29 per cent of households had home freezers. This increased to 47 per cent in 1977.

The opposition can look at these indices. I will send them over if hon. members are interested. These cover the point about flush toilets, sewers, and everything else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Hon. members will see that we are not really caught in the vortex that they seem to be describing. Indeed, in Canada the facts are that in spite of inflation we are doing well, indeed.

Why do we have a high cost of living? Obviously there are many reasons. We cannot say at this time that this is inflation generated in Canada. We have found that from the first half of 1975, when wage settlements on a yearly basis were at a rate of 22 per cent, they have dropped to something in the order of 7 per cent, with a cost of living of 8 per cent to 9 per cent. That means that at this time inflation is coming in from outside, very simply because of the high cost of things we import, and very simply because of the lowered value of the dollar, which means Canada is paying more for everything it imports.

In the face of this situation the Leader of the Opposition says the throne speech contains nothing and the government has done nothing. Throughout the month of August we announced cuts in government spending. From projected spending in this fiscal year we are taking $500 million. From expenditures projected for the next fiscal year we are taking away $2 billion.

In relation to growth in the public sector, and I am not talking of the provinces or the municipalities, in the present year and the next we are growing at a rate that is less than as fast as the economy itself is growing. The civil service in the past two years and in this year has been growing at less than 1 per cent, and next year that growth will be zero.

We have taken a very difficult decision in respect of Bill C-28 which was brought in during the last parliament and which will be brought in again during this parliament in a modified form. What is the position of the opposition in respect of this bill, which really is a follow-up to the commitment made by the ten premiers and myself in February when we decided that total compensation in the public sector should not lead that of the private sector? We are putting that in the form of a bill and will ask the Leader of the Opposition and his party to support it. I understand the NDP will not support us, but it will be interesting to see whether the Leader of the Opposition has a position in this regard. He will complain about inflation, but we want to know whether he will support the government's policy which has been announced but which he feigns not to know.

What is his position on this policy in view of all these matters of restraint? I can predict now what it is. Every time we bring in a bill, and there will be many, cutting federal expenditures, members of the opposition complain. Already today we have heard the complaint that we are cutting too much in the wrong places. The opposition always find some reason not to support the expenditure restraint by the federal government, but never will they propose an equivalent amount to be cut in other areas. We will just watch for their support in this particular respect.

In the face of inflation in the past this government has taken what I would say is a very compassionate stand: indexing of various pensions including family allowances, old age pensions, veterans' pensions and so on. This has been a major step in protecting those people in the weaker element of our society against the evils of inflation. These measures have cost a great deal of money.

We continued these measures of restraint in the month of August by cutting expenditures in some areas, taking away from those who have and who do not need quite as much. In this way we have been able to increase the guaranteed income supplement by $20 per month per household, and this will affect some 3,300,000 pensioners. In respect of family allowances, and I will explain it once again because the people out there watching television do not seem to have understood it properly—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: What is wrong about having open government? We are the ones who brought television into the House!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: There will be a thirteenth cheque, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) always reminds us, of $200 per child per year over and above the $20 per month that will continue, and will be accelerated in the usual fashion. This is redistribution.

I noticed that the Leader of the Opposition attacked our Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for having said this government was concerned with and would continue redistribution. We will, because that is Liberal policy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The principle of redistribution is to take from them who have in order to give to those who do not. In the case of the Leader of the Opposition he has two kinds of redistribution in mind. We have already heard talk about one, and that is redistribution of federal powers to the provinces. That can be quite painless for the Leader of the Opposition. We have had an example of the other kind of redistribution, namely, the housing policy of which he is so proud. Under this housing policy, them that has gets, and I think we can give a few examples of that.

Again let me put some housing facts on record because the opposition would seem to indicate that in this area of housing we have not done enough. Let me just indicate once again that of the 15 most industrialized countries of the world Canada was second in housing starts from 1970 to 1977. The index shows Belgium first with 152, Canada second with 126, and the United States, with its mortgage deductibility, at 116, fewer housing starts than in Canada. Norway, Japan, and the other countries follow. We have such a good record because of good Liberal housing policy in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I understand the Leader of the Opposition wants to save $20 million by abolishing the Ministry of Housing and Urban Affairs, but he should consider what has been achieved in the past ten years since we set up this ministry. The central objective of federal housing policy has been to increase the supply of all types of shelter and to maximize individual choice and to stabilize prices.

Aided by a variety of tax incentives and a near tripling of CMHC budgets from $655 million in 1968 to $1,890 million in 1977, Canada's housing industry has produced over 2.1 million starts since 1968, the best record in our history and the best record, after Belgium, of any industrialized society. In the latest four-year period, 1973 to 1977, Canada annually produced approximately 250,000 starts, far better than any other four-year period in our history. For instance, if you take from 1963 to 1967 there were 155,000 housing starts, and in 1958 to 1962 there were 134,000 starts compared, once again, to 248,000 starts for the period 1973 to 1977. That is well ahead of the Economic Council's goal of one million over five years.

Federal government programs were essential in achieving this number of starts. The proportion of starts with some National Housing Act subsidy increased from 6 per cent in 1968 to over 40 per cent in 1977. It is because of that large increase in starts since 1973 that prices for houses have stabilized. In 1976-77 the price of existing homes only increased by 3.9 per cent. There has been a housing policy in this country, Mr. Speaker. It has created houses in a number exceeding any other period in our history, and, I repeat, better than any other industrialized society with the exception of Belgium.

I understand that the Leader of the Opposition and his party are flailing around asking themselves what they can do in order to redistribute wealth in their way. They do not like the way the Minister of Finance is doing it. They do not like the way this government is doing it. So, what are they going to do to redistribute wealth? Let us take a look at the practical application of their policies. For instance, there are the renters in Canada. They are not a small group for there are 2.4 million householders in this country who rent their shelter, 37 per cent of all households. These renters are not the rich people. Approximately 60 per cent of all renters make $10,000 or less, and many of these are older Canadians or families which are starting out.

Let us take, for example, one senior citizen, a widow who is retired and renting, and what does she get from this Tory tax policy? She gets zero, Mr. Speaker—not one cent.

Some hon. Members: Shame! Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: Think of the single person, Mr. Speaker, with a low fixed income, and renting. They do not get a cent either. There is the newly married young couple starting out in an apartment—nothing for them either. Here is a $1.6 billion election tax cut promise that ignores the pensioner, the single person with a low fixed income, and the new, young family.

Let us now look at the man in the low middle income bracket who owns a home and who has no mortgage. This is not a small group either. There are 4 million householders in Canada who own their homes, and one half of these have no mortgage. That means that 2 million out of 4 million home owners have no mortgage. They are not going to benefit from this promise. What does the Tory promise say to this person, this low middle income earner who has a house but no mortgage? It says, "If you want this tax break, well, go out and mortgage your home." Of course, if they do that this will put the expenditure way above the $1.6 billion which is the calculated Tory figure.

Mr. MacEachen: Awful advice, Sinc.

Mr. Trudeau: What about these people who do own a home and who have a mortgage, the people that the Leader of the Opposition and his party are so concerned about? Let us take some of the examples given in the Tory leader's own publication. For example, let us look at the man and woman with two children who earn $10,000 per year and who own a home which is mortgaged. And let us say that the mortgage interest is $1,800 annually, the national average. Such a person would get a tax advantage of $450.

An hon. Member: Still good.

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker, it is still pretty good, but the trouble is that when you look at the man who makes $50,000 a year and who has the same kind of mortgage, he gets $933, twice as much. so, if you are richer you get more, and that is good Tory redistribution!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: All these examples can be repeated ad nauseam, Mr. Speaker. The effect of them generally is that if you are twice as rich you get twice as much money from the Tory policy. This is the kind of redistribution the Leader of the Opposition is in favour of, not the kind of redistribution he criticized the Minister of Finance for.

An hon. Member: Give more examples.

Mr. Trudeau: I would give more examples, but I have something more interesting. I have something which tries to deal with the Leader of the Opposition's answer when he is asked, "What is it going to cost the provinces?"

Mr. Chrétien: That is a beautiful one.

Mr. Trudeau: I hope I have not lost it.

Mr. Chrétien: The man of peace for the provinces, a billion dollar loss.

Mr. Trudeau: I am giving the federal cost, their estimate of $1.6 billion. I think it was the provincial treasurer of Ontario who has already complained that it is going to cost him $300 million.

Mr. Chrétien: Four.

Mr. Trudeau: Is it four?

Mr. Chrétien: Yes.

Mr. Trudeau: We know that our calculation is something in the area of $1 billion in cost to the provinces because of the tax collection agreements. The Leader of the Opposition was asked about that; if he forgot about it, or if he was trying to hide it, or if he did not understand it.

He has mentioned tapes that he has about us. We have a tape about him. It is on the CBC "World at Six", Friday, September 29. The opposition leader was asked to explain just why and how the provinces would not lose their revenue. He seemed unclear himself on just how it worked. This is the usual CBC understatement, "He seemed unclear on how it would work". Let me just read his answer. All of this is in quotes; even when I smile, Mr. Speaker.

LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION: Well, what I'm saying is that we would—the calculus that we issue, coming to a $1.6 billion total cost figure after four years of operation is based upon federal tax. That would be the cost to the federal treasury. We would only be rebating to the provinces, to use your term, something that we—an affect upon taxation that would—an affect upon their—I'm trying to put this clearly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is still in quotes. You can see how he puts it clearly. Listen carefully, Mr. Speaker, he is putting it clearly.

The rebating to the provinces would be a sum in excess to the cost to the federal treasury and we would be rebating to the provinces something that we would not have come to federal government in the first place without this program. It would not be a new—the cost would be an administrative share, an administrative cost but a very insignificant one.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: They say that imitation is the highest form of flattery, and now they do not want us to adhere to the principle of the British Empire and Westminster, where they thump and otherwise make noises, but to applaud, as the Leader of the Opposition and his party are now teaching us to do in this revolutionary move to make this parliament more open.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have given a lot of OECD figures. I would ask the House to bear with me for two more quotes. I just want to put them before this parliament because they bring another approach to our economic situation and the impending doomsday rhetoric that we constantly hear from the opposition, and that we heard about today. We hear about inflation, unemployment, or the falling dollar, a lot of dire predictions, a lot of imaginary musings, but very little is said which would create the confidence in this country which this country deserves.

Let me just put on the record the remarks of a gentleman who has criticized me in other circumstances, including the one referred to at the end of 1976, by the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Earle McLaughlin. This is a quote from the Globe and Mail of January 13, 1978, as follows:

W. Earle McLaughlin, chairman and chief executive officer of the Royal Bank of Canada, told the bank's annual meeting that 'the most calamitous thing' for business and Canada 'would be to be swept away by the waves of pessimism often displayed by too many.'

Mr. Stevens: Is Earle the poor man?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know if he is poor, but he certainly knows how to run a bank which is—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The article continues later:

Taking the past seven years—'a purely arbitrary medium-term yardstick since virtually any other reference period would do,' Mr. McLaughlin said Canadians have outperformed the Americans 'by almost any economic yardstick you might propose.'

In the period, real personal incomes in Canada had increased 38 per cent, even taking into account the weakening Canadian dollar, compared with a 17 per cent U.S. increase. Canadian material standard of living had increased more than in the United States and 'despite our unemployment, we have been creating new jobs 50 per cent faster than the United States.'

In another vital indicator, Mr. McLaughlin said, total investment spending in Canada rose by 168 per cent, compared with a growth of only 107 per cent in the United States, 'the past 12 to 24 months notwithstanding.'

And Canadian corporate after tax profits grew by 186 per cent, 7 per cent more than in the United States.

He goes on to give many other indices of warranted optimism. I would just give one more quote since investment spending is referred to by Mr. McLaughlin.

The Windsor Star of October 5, quotes Mr. Roy F. Bennett, president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada, when speaking to the Windsor Chamber of Commerce, as follows:

"I would suggest there is a real danger in the Canadian business community that we may become so preoccupied with the spectre of this pair of culprits (inflation and unemployment) that we could lose sight of the many fundamental strengths in our economy.

If we do, we may fail to take those business initiatives which, in many respects, are the solution to the nation's fundamental economic ills,"—

Later, he said:

"Although inflation is eroding our earnings, the purchasing power of Canadians has never been greater than it is today . . . the market for goods and services is booming and continuing to grow."

The article continues:

He said while the value of the Canadian dollar continues to depreciate, the international competitiveness of Canadian producers has substantially improved. "We are probably in a better position to compete in international markets than we have been for at least the past 10 years," he said.

He noted the Canadian car market is at an all-time high.

I did want to talk about the problem of national unity at some length but I think I will save part of my remarks for some other occasion, because I have taken a lot of the time of the House. I would briefly contrast our approach here again to that of the opposition, because the Leader of the Opposition did say some words about his approach to the problem of national unity and I have already commented on that a little bit.

Let me first say that we do give very high priority to the problem of national unity and to the remedies we propose, for a very simple reason. It is that the Canadian economy will not attain its full potential unless this problem of disjointed unity, of political uncertainty, is solved, and unless an investor, whether he is going to invest in Windsor or Winnipeg, knows he is investing in a country of 23 million people, not of 23 million minus six million. This is very important for the economy.

To those people who say, "Why are you tinkering with the situation? Why are you spending your time talking about national unity when there are jobs to be found and inflation on your back", that is the answer. Economic uncertainty flows from political uncertainty. It is extremely important that on all sides of the House we tackle this problem with great urgency.

The second reason why this problem must be solved immediately was stated just two days ago by the Premier of the pro ince of Quebec, Mr. Lévesque, who was speaking in the National Assembly, and I quote:

One thing for sure anyway, we do not see anything but sovereignty-association as a solution likely to break the vicious circle in which are trapped two different people.

Well, that is what we have always maintained, Mr. Speaker. Quebeckers, like westerners and maritimers, want a solution to this constitutional imbroglio which has been dragging in this country ever since 1927. Quebeckers are anxious to see this parliament not only grapple with this problem of the constitution, but solve it once and for all because we know, Mr. Speaker, and all surveys bear this out, that the option of a renewed federalism is to be preferred to any other option for Quebeckers, including of course separation or sovereignty-association.

Quebeckers want a renewed federalism, a new constitution. They are anxious to get results, and they prefer that solution to sovereignty-association. And because the people in Quebec will be called upon to express their opinion in a referendum to be held by the provincial government presumably within a year, we must in the meantime be able to show the province of Quebec that after 51 years of efforts we have finally made some progress, and that is why it is urgent to implement the government's program.

The Leader of the Opposition talked of confrontation, he said that the federal government wants to move too fast, that he, the Leader of the Opposition, would sit down with the provinces, discuss their agenda, start with the division of powers, because that is what concerns them. Has he any guarantee that eight, nine or ten provinces will agree with him on a division of powers within a year or two? The only guarantee he can have, of course, is that if he agrees to give the provinces all the powers and all the jurisdictions they want, if he wants to dismantle the federal government, Mr. Speaker, if he wants to turn the federal government into a vacuum, give the provinces all the powers, of course, he will agree in no time with the provinces on the division of powers. But we know that issue was discussed for three years, from 1968 to 1971, and as the proposals were not forthcoming—and I am talking basically about provincial proposals because the government made several proposals to improve the division, including those I mentioned earlier—the provinces, for the sake of peace and quiet, said: Well, let us get it over with and try, in Victoria at least, to repatriate the constitution and find an amending formula. Now, the Leader of the Opposition says: Hey, hold your horses! Let us take our time! Let us not act too hastily. We have to discuss with the provinces, so no confrontation. I am not for confrontation. I want a solution to be found, but once again, I remind the Leader of the Opposition and all those who are listening that the people in Quebec will have to vote within a year on the various options, and unless we have a renewed federalism to propose, I can guarantee the Leader of the Opposition that federalism is in for a rough time.

The Leader of the Opposition wants to begin with the division of powers because the provinces said that they want to begin with the division of powers. Does he have even the slightest hope that he will get the ten provinces to agree on a new division of powers within the next little while? He shakes his head yes, Mr. Speaker. He is saying that Mr. Lévesque will agree on renewing our federalism rather than pursue his option of souveraineté indépendance.

He thinks that the premier of the province of Quebec will make it easy for him, the Leader of the Opposition, to find agreement among ten provinces in a way in which we will have a new division of powers in this country. In order to pursue this will-o'-the-wisp he is going to set aside the Bill of Rights. He is going to set aside the proposition to give greater representation to the west and to the east in the institutions of the central government. He is going to set aside linguistic guarantees in order to pursue something, when he should know at the outset that the premier of Quebec will not consent. If he is looking for unanimity, as the premiers suggested at Regina last August that they were looking for, he will not find it. He will not find it this year, and he will not find it next year. At some point he will have to be courageous and take a stand which is just not a feeble echo of what the ten premiers are saying.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I have no doubt as to the reason why the Leader of the Opposition shakes his head yes, that he is going to find agreement, because he has already shown us at Kingston how he would do it. Anything the provinces ask, he gives them. And he comes back and says "What a great victory! There was no confrontation! Look what I accomplished at Kingston." This is what he would do when sitting down with Mr. Lévesque and the other premiers who want to despoil the federal government of its powers and decentralize this country to a state when there would no longer be a government able to talk for the people of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am not here to argue for any particular form of constitutional bill. We put one in front of the House last session, Bill C-60. It was our considered opinion on what a total arrangement for a new constitution could be. It could be changed. It was our considered position, but I do not think there is only one perfect solution, one particular set of federal institution reforms or division of powers which is superior to all others.

It is not vital to me, Mr. Speaker, whether the Senate is named by the political parties or whether it is directly elected. What is important is that it amplify the voice of western and eastern Canada which feel alienated.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is vital to me that it does give protection to the kind of linguistic equality that this government has put into the statutes.

It is not vital to me whether the Supreme Court has nine judges or 11 judges, whether it sits or it does not sit in civil law matters. All I am saying is that it is important that the Supreme Court of this country has the confidence of Canadians from every region. It is time that we got on with the job of finding ways by which that confidence can be established. We should not sweep that under the carpet too, and say that we will discuss division of powers, which will take us years and years and years. It is important before then to establish the Supreme Court which corresponds to the values for which all Canadians stand.

It is not vital to me whether Her Majesty is formally described in the new constitution as The Sovereign Head of State, or as Her Majesty the Queen, or as the Sovereign of Canada, or in any other way. We have indicated many times that our intention was not to change the role of the monarchy. We indicated that as far back as 1968 when we published the white paper on the constitution. We have repeated it constantly since then that that was our intention.

At one point when we were writing a new constitution we had to say something about the Queen. I think the opposition would have been the first to complain if we had written a new constitution without mentioning the Queen. Therefore we had to put in something. We had our drafters put the description of the situation of today as they see it under constitutional law in the best language they could. This is what they attempted to write, and this is what we want to be in the constitution.

I know some people on the other side who would like to write in what the position was of the Queen in Queen Anne's day, but this is not the position of this government. We want to describe the situation today following the 1947 letters patent which gave to the Governor General the power to exercise Her Majesty's prerogatives which were transferred in final resort to the Governor General about a year and half ago. This we want to put in the constitution. We are repeating, Mr. Speaker, and we have said it since 1968, that this is the intention. The intention was explained to Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace by the then minister of justice, and she saw it that way too. The people who are hollering "the monarchy" in this country are the people on that side of the House who are using it as a political football.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Trudeau: And it is not the first time!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: It is not for the Leader of the Opposition or for the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) to say what the intention of the government is. The intention of the government has been expressed by the Minister for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang), and by myself. Our intention is to preserve the monarchy and to describe her position as it is now. But the intention of the other side of the House is to try to garner votes on the subject and to try to split Canadians on this subject. I am telling them that if there is a debate on the monarchy in this country, if we do find people responding to their invitation to set up groups to protect Her Majesty, who is in no way endangered by this government, there may be other groups who will form to attack the monarchy, and then we will see a fight in this country on a political basis, a division which will have been caused by the Leader of the Opposition.

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: If they had any sense at all, if they were really concerned with the preservation of the monarchy as a symbol of Canadian unity and as a symbol of our nationhood, they would not be playing politics with Her Majesty as they are doing now.

An hon. Member: What a fraud.

Mr. Trudeau: They would sit down and try and rewrite in better words what they think we have drafted badly. But they would have the courage to try and do it themselves, or they would assist as the provinces are doing, in a new drafting to translate, the intention perhaps better. But they would not be snidely pretending that this government is trying to downgrade an institution which many Canadians feel close to their hearts, and that is what the opposition is doing.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: To make it all very simple, what I am telling the premiers and the Leader of the Opposition and his party is that if you do not like Bill C-60, that is fine. Let us sit down and revise it. It was brought in and given a first reading last session precisely so we could study it some more—

An hon. Member: With a deadline.

Mr. Trudeau: That is exactly what we said in the last session that we will bring it in for first reading only, we will set up a parliamentary committee to study it, we will ask the premiers to study it in the provinces, and we will ask them to come back with better wording, if they have it. If they want to revise it, improve it, fine. If they want a new division of powers, fine. Let us hear what they want to propose.

I see the Leader of the Opposition suggesting that we are the ones now. He will wait for us to propose some new division of powers. We are not asking for a new division of powers. I understand it is his party. It is the provinces that are asking for a division of powers. They have made some proposals. We will study them. I have already written to the premiers in that sense. We will make some counter-proposals. We will show that in some instances it is important for the federal government to have powers that are now exercised by the provinces because we believe that Canada must maintain a strong government if it is going to remain united.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: All I am saying is, let's get on with it, let's act. For 51 years, under six different prime ministers, the national government and the provincial governments have tried to tackle the problem of the constitution. They have always come up with failure. If people are fed up with politicians discussing the constitution, it is not because they do not think it is important. It is because they think the politicians should get on with it, finish the job, and not discuss it for another 50 years. That is the position of this government. That is why we have set deadlines which we will do our best to meet. That is why we will stick with them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: I am not sure of the position of the Leader of the Opposition. I do know they brought out a blue paper called "Constitution and National Unity" in April, 1978. On page one of this paper they said "the legitimacy of the existing constitution has been substantially eroded."

They go on to propose what? They go on to propose essentially constitutional changes, not division of powers. Let the Leader of the Opposition read his own position paper. They proposed institutional changes like we did in Bill C-60. They suggested we were copying them at that time because this seemed to be a good wicket to be on.

They talked about the House of the Provinces. It is our House of the Federation. They talked about federal-provincial conferences and the need to institutionalize them. They talked about appointments—another victory at Kingston. At Kingston the Leader of the Opposition gained from the premiers the right for them to name people to the Supreme Court and to federal bodies like the CBC and so on. That was another great victory.

This is what they talked about in their paper on national unity in April, 1978. They talked about the Supreme Court. They said later "we will talk about language rights, later we will publish things on human liberties, later we will talk about the division of powers, our phase II."

What happened? The premiers got together in Regina in 1978. They said they did not want to talk about the Senate, the Supreme Court, and federal-provincial relations. They said they wanted to talk about the division of powers. What did the opposition party do? They simply put out another paper in September, 1978, called "The Process of Constitutional Change" in which they denounce this frantic haste which is unwise. They said it was unacceptable for the federal government to proceed with the very matters that in April they were saying we should proceed with.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: As soon as the provinces say they want to discuss the division of powers, "Right on, Premier Lougheed," says the Leader of the Opposition, "Right on, Premier Davis, ready, aye, ready, we will discuss whatever you want, we will forget the other."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: In the September paper called "The Process of Constitutional Change", they not only reverse their position from April, but they reverse it between page 5 and page 13. On page 5 they talk about "the fundamental silliness of the Trudeau government's position which is pretending to act unilaterally under section 91(1)".

Because the premiers have said, "You cannot exercise your powers which are recognized under the BNA Act under section 91(1)," the Leader of the Opposition says we cannot exercise those powers, it is silly of the Trudeau government to try to do it.

The Leader of the Opposition is complaining about federal interference in provincial jurisdictions. Was there any greater interference ever heard of in Canada than the provinces telling us that we cannot exercise a jurisdiction under section 91(1) given to the federal government? If that is not interference, what is?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The provinces have said, "Unless there is some kind of unanimity, some consensus"—they use both words—"you should not use your right to amend the federal constitution." Nobody has ever contested the right of the provincial governments under section 92(1) to change their constitutions. If they want, they can sit down and write there shall be a Queen, there shall be a form of cabinet government, there shall be a legislative assembly, there shall be courts, there shall be an administration and so on. They can do it. But according to this party over here, we cannot do it. We cannot write a constitution which says there will be a Queen, there will be a Governor General, there will be a cabinet government responsible to parliament, there will be two Houses and one will be constituted in this way and the other in that way, and there will be courts. They say we cannot write a constitution for us which is authorized under section 91(1), but they can do it for themselves.

This is indeed a queer view of the centralized powers under section 91(1). I have heard there is a kind of chicken that lays a lot of wonderful eggs. Maybe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) can tell me more about it. There is only one problem. After it has laid the eggs, it turns around and eats them.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: After laying a very, very big egg, covering very many pages with a very learned argument about why we should not use section 91(1) and why we should not act unilaterally, the Leader of the Opposition, on the last page, comes forth as he did in his speech, and says he is going to show leadership if there is any confrontation, you can rely on him to stand up to them. There is a little weaseled phrase on the last page of this learned page which says "Clearly there are areas where the federal government can act alone, and if necessary we will do so."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, they sure did stand up to the provinces. We saw how they stood up to them in Kingston. Let us see how they stood up to them on some other occasions. Take the offshore mineral rights. We know this has been contested in this country for at least 12 years. There was a Supreme Court decision. Finally, after months and even years of negotiation between this government and the three maritime provinces and Newfoundland, which wanted to have 100 per cent of the resources on the offshore, and the courts seem to have decided otherwise, at least on the west coast, we stood up for the federal government, as it is our duty to do, to stand up for federal rights under the constitution.

There are premiers who stand up for provincial rights. That is their duty. That is their job. That is what they are elected for. I think the Leader of the Opposition has chosen the wrong House in which to sit. He should be sitting in the provincial Houses standing up for the provincial governments.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: After years of negotiation we put together an agreement with the three maritime premiers suggesting a division of the resources. It was not a judgment of jurisdiction, just a fair division of resources, actually a very generous one for the provinces. After it was put together, it was signed by the three maritime premiers and myself.

A new Conservative premier has now been elected in Nova Scotia. There is a federal by-election now, and the Leader of the Opposition went there and said, "If you want 100 per cent, we will tear up this agreement," which was signed formally in these very parliament buildings a couple of years ago, "and we will give you 100 per cent." That was one example of him standing up to the provinces. If he has to, he will stand up to them and give them 100 per cent.

Let us consider another example, lotteries. I know the history of this very well because it was back in 1967 that I introduced amendments to the Criminal Code to make lotteries legal in Canada. Incidentally, the province of Alberta was the province from which I received the greatest number of letters. Albertans were scandalized because I was introducing an "immoral" system. In Quebec there were other issues. In Manitoba the issue was gun legislation, but in Alberta the issue was lotteries. Some ten years later we tried to make a deal with the provinces. We wanted to share the lotteries, but the provinces wanted 100 per cent. Who does the Leader of the Opposition support? The provinces, of course. Why should the federal government have its lottery when the provinces want to have 100 per cent? Why should we have anything, even if it is only to help sports and amateur sports? Why should we have anything of this?

The Leader of the Opposition takes a very firm position. Using his own words, he will stand up for federal rights, but he says that the lotteries should be 100 per cent the provinces. Fortunately, the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) was able to come to an arrangement with the provinces. There will be a shared arrangement. I do not know if it is going to stick. You never know, because the new premier of Nova Scotia might meet with the Leader of the Opposition, and he might unstick it.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Shall I mention the sales tax?

Some hon. Members: Yes. More, more.

Mr. Trudeau: In very simple terms, the Leader of the Opposition accused us of infringing provincial rights, invading provincial jurisdiction and so forth. What happened? We said to the provinces that we would cut income taxes in our jurisdiction, federal income taxes, if the provinces would do something in their jurisdictions. Nobody was invading anybody's jurisdiction. We were saying, "We will do this, if you do that". Eight of the provinces said "Fine". Mr. Parizeau said: "I cannot give you an answer. I will tell you later, after your budget". So after the budget he said: "I do not want to do what you ask, but I want you to give the money as if I had done it". Who was invading whose jurisdiction? We were cutting our taxes, provided the provinces would do something. One province said it would not do anything, but it still wanted us to cut taxes in that province. We were still being told what to do with our federal income tax, but not in exchange for a deal or as a quid pro quo. Unilaterally we were being told how we should arrange our budget. A fight ensued, and we kept hearing from the Leader of the Opposition that not only was Mr. Lévesque supporting Mr. Parizeau, but even Mr. Ryan was supporting Mr. Parizeau. So naturally the Leader of the Opposition supported Mr. Parizeau too. He takes not only the position of the provincial premier but also that of the leader of the opposition in that province.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: Alberta wants international prices for its oil. Ontario wants lower prices. So does New Brunswick, and I suppose now so will Nova Scotia. They do not want to pay the international price for Alberta oil. They do not want this high price to be applied all across Canada. There is division. We have managed to settle these matters in the past several years. There have been many negotiations. When the Leader of the Opposition was on the back benches he naturally supported the premier of his province, but now that he is the leader of a party, he cannot support one premier against the other, so he does not support either. He just says: "You figure it out amongst yourselves; I will not take a position. Let the federal government do something and I will be with you, Brother Lougheed, and with you, Brother Davis".

Mr. Andras: That is going to be difficult.

Mr. Trudeau: It will be difficult because on January 1 he will have to make up his mind. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has said that we will not increase prices on January 1 if we can avoid it. That would please Brother Davis, but it would not please Brother Lougheed. Can we ask the Leader of the Opposition to stand firm on this in the interests of the people of Canada? Who will he support? I know he will not support us. He will support one premier or both, and if he cannot support either, he will say something about referring the matter to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: Well, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Trudeau.]

Mr. Clark: You have run as far as you can.

Mr. Trudeau: I have exhausted my time.

An hon. Member: You would make a good leader of the opposition.

Some hon. Members: More.

Mr. Trudeau: I remember a sixteenth century divine about whom it was said that when he spoke he exhausted time and encroached upon eternity. I will not do that. I think I will just wind up by saying that this is a time when the whole industrialized world is coming to grips with very difficult economic problems. Our own country is trying to solve these problems and, as I demonstrated, it is performing better than most, better than all, actually, if we consider the over-all total of performances.

At this difficult time we have a Leader of the Opposition and an official opposition unable or unwilling to make any of the hard choices. We have an official opposition which tries to evade its responsibility and blame the government for everything. The Leader of the Opposition talks about the Speech from the Throne and his anxiety about getting into government. The official opposition will have to learn how to accept some responsibilities. It will have to learn to do so in economic matters and in matters of national unity.

It will have to learn to accept its responsibilities in some of the areas which were referred to in the opening remarks of the Leader of the Opposition, such as matters of national security. When a member of his party was asked by the deputy commissioner of the RCMP to hand over secret documents belonging to the RCMP, the publication of which would be a danger to the security system of this country and to the operation of the RCMP, the Leader of the Opposition turned a blind eye and said, "I do not want to get involved in this". He does not have the courage to accept his responsibility in important matters like that, but he will stand up and talk about his anxiety about coming into government. Let me just say that this government accepts its responsibilities. Sometimes that does mean confrontation. Sometimes it does mean having to say no to the provinces, to labour, to big business or even to the opposition, but we accept our responsibilities.

If the people of this country listen to the siren song of the Leader of the Opposition, who seems to say, "Change the government, you have nothing to lose," let me answer that the people of Canada have everything to lose if they put into power a party which has no confidence in this country, no confidence in its ability to overcome its difficulties and which does not believe that the federal government has the right to lead all the people of this nation, even through the difficult problems which are put to them.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be debated at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne)—Unemployment Insurance Act—Request for tabling of correspondence with provinces; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Fisheries—Proposed transfer of weather forecasting services.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, in my view we have heard the best possible demonstration we could have had in ten years of why the country is in so much difficulty.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: I say completely sincerely that if ever we had a display of misguided intelligence, that was it. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made an interesting distinction which I will turn around on him in just a minute. Today, at the opening of his highly disparaging speech about the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), he launched into a personal assault making reference to the fact that the Leader of the Opposition was using notes. Of course, he himself spent a good part of his time using notes. It is all right when on one side of the House an arrogant, condescending and aggressive Prime Minister does one thing, but when someone on this side does it, somehow it is unacceptable.

An hon. Member: Oh, come on.

Mr. Broadbent: Come on yourself. Look at your side for a minute.

Then the Prime Minister went on to say that he had studied some psychology and had learned that a distinction existed between reason and imagination. He put his hands in his pockets and said, yes, that was a good distinction, and the Leader of the Opposition was very good on imagination but was not so good on intelligence. That was really the gist of his argument.

An hon. Member: That's the truth.

Mr. Broadbent: That is personal vindictiveness and a great way to "unite" this country! But that is what we got from the Prime Minister. He has taken the intelligence with which he was gifted and has governed this country for ten years, but had he used that intelligence, that is there and that is real, to mould support? Has he brought people together to try to build an exciting and decent nation? No. The only time the Prime Minister uses that intelligence is when he is in battle. We saw it in 1972, we saw it in 1974, and for the first time in four years we saw it here today. Suddenly he came alive. Why? Because he likes to fight. The Prime Minister likes to combine two contradictory attitudes: that of a philosopher and that of John Wayne. I say to him that this is a totally undesirable combination for a prime minister of a country.

Let me show what it was all about. He said that the Leader of the Opposition was not good with his facts. I will bring out a few for the Prime Minister to show how, through his distorted, twisted, misleading and false set of facts, quite a different picture will emerge from the one he tried to convey. Two can play that game. The Prime Minister has had responsibility for this nation for ten years, and that is the relevant question, as he knows. But of course he likes to win arguments. He does not like to convince, persuade, lead or give support because he is doing the good or decent thing, but he does like to be clever and win arguments.

That is just the opposite of serious statesmanship or serious philosophy. He trotted out that old canard about job creation and said that Canada leads in job creation. He compared us with other countries. But what he did not tell us was that, unlike many countries with which he was making the comparison, we have had thousands of immigrants every year. So it would seem that we would have to create a few more jobs than would other countries. Also, the other countries had lower birth rates—he did make an allusion to that—and therefore they did not have to create the same number of jobs.

The relevant economic indicator is not the number of jobs you create, for God's sake. If you have enough jobs for your people, you do not need to have a high rate of job creation—people are not insane. So the relevant indicator, which he did not talk about, is the level of unemployment. It is the level of unemployment that is the meaningful thing for comparative purposes. If you consider immigration, if you consider the birth rate and if you consider the fact that there are indeed men and women in this country who want jobs, the task of the government is to create a sufficient number of jobs so that they can work, instead of winning a meaningless statistical battle by saying that we have created more jobs than another country which does not have the same number of immigrants and the same birth rate.

When the Prime Minister came to office in 1968 there was a 3.4 per cent unemployment rate. In September of 1978 the rate was 7.7 per cent, an increase of 600,000 in real numbers in that decade. He left the impression that now we are doing much better than other countries in terms of real performance, not in terms of the average in the ten-year period. We are talking now about a government which brought down the throne speech and which has to accept responsibility for what it has done for four years and what it plans to do for the next year before it calls an election.

How does our rate of unemployment compare with that in other industrial countries? According to the last yearly average in 1977, the rate of unemployment in Japan stood at 2.1 per cent, in Germany at 3.5 per cent, in France at 5.2 per cent, in the U.S. at 7 per cent, in Italy at 7.2 per cent, and in Canada at 8.1 per cent. We are the worst of the lot in the average for 1977. But the Prime Minister did not mention that.

With regard to inflation levels he thought we were doing wonderfully. He did not tell us the current level in Switzerland, Japan or Germany, which are all doing much better than this country, and I can list many others.

As to redistribution of income, my God, I thought for a minute I was listening to Trotsky. This man who came to office in 1968, this man who alleges now that he is really concerned about the Tory housing policy because he wants to do something for the low income groups, this man who, in his combative style, maintains he is so deeply concerned about inequality, does not face the fact that after having been in office for ten years there is more inequality today than we had in 1968.

An hon. Member: Not true.

Mr. Broadbent: It is true; check your figures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Broadbent: I listened for two hours—it is my turn now. If hon. members check the statistics in the past decade, they will find that the situation of the poor in this country has become marginally worse—not a great deal but marginally worse—not better. This man who talks about inequality has done nothing about it for ten years, and yet he berates the official opposition as if really he had been centrally concerned.

The Prime Minister talks about good housing, about housing starts, as if it were some miraculous, fantastic accomplishment. He said we have created more houses than countries like Norway, Belgium or Sweden. Again I repeat that they do not have immigrant societies, they do not have thousands of people coming in every year, and they do not need to renew their housing stock the way we need to.

If ever a man should turn his own distinction back upon himself, I say it is the Prime Minister. If he wants to talk about reason and intelligence as opposed to imagination, I say he has provided a lovely set of imaginative statistics that are designed to try to convince everyone. What did he say? He said at one point that "we are doing very well indeed". I say that if you select your data carefully, you can convince Liberal backbenchers who are looking for something to get them out of their morass, but I tell you that he will not convince the ordinary person in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: In the throne speech almost no attention was paid to what I think is the central issue, and that is the state of the Canadian economy. There are other matters too. It is correct, as the Prime Minister said and also as the Leader of the Opposition has said on other occasions, that you cannot separate national unity or the problem of our federal state from the state of the economy. But may I emphasize that the central concern is the economy. The central way, but not the exclusive way, of dealing with national unity also is economic.

● (1752)

What is the major economic dispute in this land right now? No one met that dispute head on. I should like to deal with it in terms of the Prime Minister. Although my differences with the hon. Leader of the Opposition on principle are significant and real, it is the Prime Minister and the government of the day who are responsible for getting us out of our difficulties. What is the economic reality? As everyone knows, there are more than one million unemployed. The private sector is operating at 85 per cent capacity. In real terms the business sector has not indicated that it wants to invest more next year than this year. As I have said on other occasions, businessmen are not foolish or stupid. If they are operating at 15 per cent unused capacity, they will not change that now. They will not overexpand another 15 per cent or so.

If this is the reality, with our level of unemployment and the private sector not expanding, what should we be doing? For a minute I thought the Prime Minister was going to be serious instead of being polemical. He spoke about the level of government stimulus. Also he made an entirely misleading and facetious comparison with Saskatchewan. He said that the government is providing more stimulus than Saskatchewan in order to create jobs. Of course, what he did not mention was that the unemployment rate in Saskatchewan is 3.6 per cent. In the whole period he has been in government he has not achieved that level nationally. Of course, the level of stimulation must be much greater at the federal level. In managing a mixed economy with intelligence, Allan Blakeney in Saskatchewan has achieved virtually full employment. The Prime Minister should talk to him, in addition to Helmut Schmidt, if he wants lessons in economics.

The central reality in the land is whether we should adopt restraint as our principal economic policy—cutbacks, rollbacks, restraint. It all began with Sterling Lyon. I am not questioning the motives; I am questioning the policy argued by the official opposition. Now the Prime Minister, not having implemented his own promises for four years, since August 1 has been implementing the policies of the hon. Leader of the Opposition. Does that make economic sense? That is the question I want to raise and will attempt to answer.

We have a mixed economy. In my lifetime we have experienced, in Canada and throughout the world, the most sustained period of economic growth in the history of man. From World War II to the present we have experienced the most sustained period of economic growth. Why is that? I ask the Prime Minister why that is so. The reason is that precisely during that period of time governments became involved in the economy. Because of the experience of the great depression, western economies all over the world, including the Government of Canada, have seen a central role to be played by governments in fiscal and monetary policies as well as seen the advantages of adopting an industrial strategy.

The argument made by the government in its Speech from the Throne and the argument made by the official opposition is that somehow we must cut back and restrain ourselves into prosperity. It is bad economics and worse social policy for this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: It will not work. Under these circumstances we are saying that instead of cutbacks and layoffs, which would be the effect of a restraints program, of a further 100,000 Canadians by mindless and indiscriminate abolition of programs which are of benefit to Canadians, we need stimulation in the economy. We have said that taxes should be cut for ordinary people. There should be more cuts for lower income groups than high in order to provide stimulus. We have said that the federal sales tax should be cut by one-third to stimulate the manufacturing sector of the economy. Also we have said that there should be more public sector investment and that money should be put into needed energy projects, the housing sector for people who need homes, rapid transit facilities and grand national schemes. I will not go over the details of the package we proposed to the people of Canada any more precisely than I have already. This process would provide a real stimulus.

I say to the Prime Minister that the debt next year will go up approximately $1.5 billion. But if he looks at the level of private savings in this country, he will see that they are the highest since World War II. An elementary lesson in Keynesian economics would lead one to conclude that if we have a high level of saving in the private sector and by individuals, and the private business community is not expanding because of no demand, then the government should step in. If the Prime Minister looks at the record of Japan and the recent record of Germany over the last several years, their levels of debt for a number of years have exceeded ours because they stimulate at whatever level is needed in order to produce jobs and expand the economy.

Our proposal to create jobs for Canadians who want them, and to bring some real growth to the economy in the next decade, should start now with tax cuts for individuals, manufacturers and public sector investment. Yes, the debt will increase perhaps $1.5 billion next year; but according to our calculations, if the level of investment I have advocated outside the House is made, some 400,000 jobs would be created in the next two years, and in the next three years the national debt would be reduced by some $6 billion to $7 billion. That is what serious economic policy should be all about at this time.

May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

● (2002)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne must be seen and understood in the context of the economic problems Canadians are now facing. What are those problems? We have one million unemployed. We have an industrial sector that is operating at only 85 per cent capacity, which means businessmen have decided not to expand. Businessmen are not foolish and are not going to take up another 15 per cent of unused capacity when they have more capacity than they now need. Also, and this is important and crucial to an industrial country, we have already lost some 15,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector in the past year.

What response has the government made? The Prime Minister for four years has been ignoring his own commitments and promises to the people of Canada, yet since August 1 he has been attempting to implement those of the Leader of the Official Opposition. This approach to a complex economy can be summed up as a policy that amounts to nothing more than a slogan; it is cutbacks, rollbacks and restraint. According to the Government of Canada we can now in 1978 restrain ourselves into prosperity. That is ludicrous in principle and it is harmful in its effects.

We recall that at the outset of economic difficulties during the time of the great depression the prime minister of the day applied the same policy. It did not work for R. B. Bennett in the 1930s and it will not work for Pierre Elliott Trudeau and the people of Canada in the 1970s. We do not have to go back to the 1930s because, unfortunately, we have a good example already before us of what happens when you apply an across the board restraint and cutback policy.

Not long ago in the province of Manitoba a Conservative government was elected principally on that policy, and it applied it. According to the unemployment statistics which came out earlier this week, the province of Manitoba with that cutback philosophy, which has now been taken over by the Liberals and preached by the Leader of the Opposition, experienced in one year an increase of 35 per cent. The rate of increase in unemployment in the province of Manitoba over the past year was four times the rate of increase in the country as a whole. That is the kind of result you get when you adopt an economic policy that amounts simply to cutbacks.

At the national level, when we heard from the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) some six weeks ago that they were going to apply a program that was described in broader detail in the throne speech last night, we calculated that the effect on the economy as a whole would be a net loss of some 100,000 jobs.

I questioned the Prime Minister about that the other day. I asked whether he would confirm that an assessment within the Department of Finance had yielded that expectation. As usual, he was evasive and did not answer. Today in the city of Ottawa a private economic consulting firm made a report which pointed out that with the policy announced by the Government of Canada we would lose not 100,000 jobs, as we calculated, but some 94,000 jobs. That means more men and women will be collecting unemployment insurance and welfare instead of contributing in a positive way to the economic development of this country.

The President of the Treasury Board said in the House today that the federal government was really talking about man-hours and not people. Let me point out to him, and he ought to know, that already in the city of Ottawa over 1,700 civil servants have received their quit slips. They have been informed they are losing their jobs. These are not abstract statistics and not mere man-hours, these are men and women: some 362 in Statistics Canada, 250 in Public Works, 650 in National Health and Welfare and 500 in the Public Service Commission. Some 1,762 have already received notice that they will be unemployed. That is the consequence of what I think can only be described as an irresponsible and mindless economic policy. Whether this kind of program is implemented by a man named Trudeau, as prime minister, or by a man who would like to have that job, Joe Clark, makes no difference to the NDP all across Canada, and we will have nothing to do with it.

What do we propose to put in its place? I submit that what we want to do instead is not designed to create Utopia overnight and will not remove all aspects of inflation or completely obliterate unemployment within a year or two. What we propose is a policy designed to come to grips with the real world rather than some pseudo-fantasy created by the government and the official opposition.

What does it consist of? It consists of the kind of package that has worked so well in West Germany as applied by Helmut Schmidt where unemployment and inflation are at approximately 3 per cent. It has worked very well in Japan where they have unemployment and inflation around the same level. Both of those countries approached the problems of their economies not by denigrating the public sector, but by seeing in a modern economy that it plays an integral and fundamental role in the development process.

So what do we say? If you have manufacturing which is operating at only 85 per cent capacity when you want men and women to be employed on those unused machines, we say reduce the federal manufacturers sales tax by one-third. We have recommended that, and we calculate that if it is done it would inject approximately $1.5 billion of stimulus into the economy, producing some 75,000 jobs—jobs in the manufacturing sector that would benefit those in the electrical industry in Ontario, those who are producing wood products in British Columbia, those working in the shoe industry in the province of Quebec; in short, Canadians in every part of our land who are involved in manufacturing.

Secondly, we would recommend that men and women who are not employed but have sufficient income to be paying income tax be given an income tax reduction. But unlike the other parties, we say let us give a greater tax reduction to those with the lowest income; starting at the lowest level, a $400 tax cut and diminishing the higher up the income tax scale you go, finally fading out entirely at the very rich level. I include in this category members of parliament whose incomes do not warrant a tax cut. We recommend a one and a half billion dollar tax cut of that kind. The net effect we calculate would produce some 125,000 jobs.

The third element of our proposal at this time, which so clearly distinguishes us from the Conservative party and the government of the day, is that we recommend, at a time when the private sector is not investing—because businessmen are not foolish—that we inject public capital to stimulate the economy. We recommend public sector investment of $1.7 billion.

Where would this money go, Mr. Speaker? We say that we need rapid transit facilities in downtown Toronto, which the government promised some time ago. We would expand these public transit facilities thereby putting unemployed construction workers in Toronto to work. We recommend that the Hall royal commission report that the government has sat on for so long should be implemented. If it were implemented, we would not only be meeting the needs of farmers in the prairies who want improved grain handling facilities to get their wheat to export markets, but we would also be providing jobs in Nova Scotia where they make the rails and railroad cars. Instead of a 30 per cent unemployment level in Cape Breton, perhaps it would be cut in half.

With that kind of package—a personal income tax cut, a federal manufacturers sales tax cut and public sector investment—we would over a two-year period create some 400,000 jobs. This would begin to turn things around in this country in the way that the people of our land desperately desire and expect politicians who assume their responsibilities to act. These are the things which are needed right now in the short run.

Beyond the short run requirements that ought to be acted upon for the people of Canada, we must give now—and it ought to have been included in the throne speech—some serious commitment to a long-range industrial strategy. The issue is not the bogus one the two old line parties would like to con the people of Canada into believing, that it is either small government or big government. The issue is effective government. Are we going to at long last have effective government leadership in this country?

We say we need it. The NDP say we should be doing here what other industrial countries have done, what Japan did after World War II when they decided that they would become the leaders of the world in the electronics industry. They began to put their research and development money into that field, and there was co-ordinated government leadership with the private sector to make sure that money went into research and development. My party says let us start doing that long-range planning now in our country.

There are, for example, three important sectors; food, housing and transportation. Eighty per cent of Canadian expenditures are in these three sectors. Let us improve them. Let us take our food industry and make it one of the most productive and efficient industries in the world, not only to meet Canadian needs but to enable us to get into the export business. We could be developing our food processing industry abroad. There is the example in the Atlantic provinces of the fisheries industry in Newfoundland, one of the last great fisheries in the world. We should be expanding it with our 200-mile limit. We could do for fishermen what we did for our farmers many years ago.

We set up the Wheat Board for our farmers. It went into the world markets and sold wheat for Canadian farmers to Asia and Europe, and as a result our farmers are among the best paid in the world. If there was a little initiative coming from this government, we could do the same for fishermen on the east coast and on the west coast. We could be expanding sales. We have an 85-cent dollar. Let us use that to take the opportunity to get into new markets and lay the foundation for more jobs. That way the province of Newfoundland—and I do not exaggerate—within a matter of years could be self-sustaining in the fishing industry and men and women there would be collecting pay instead of handouts or unemployment insurance. That is what the people of Newfoundland and the rest of Canada as well want.

The same could be said for development in housing and transportation. But then there are certain more crucial, fundamental sectors. I say to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), who is here tonight and who should know from his own responsibilities within his department, that there are certain aspects of Canadian industry which are second to none in the world, and if we had the right kind of development at this time we could be world leaders in terms of sales, thereby providing thousands of Canadians with jobs. In this context I think particularly of our computer industry, the energy development field which includes hydro and nuclear facility developments abroad, and the plastics and food processing industries. However, we must begin now with concentration on and careful selection of certain sectors of this kind for development to provide continuing jobs in the future.

Above and beyond the selection of certain crucial areas for international development that could provide for continued and sustained jobs, there is a fundamental difference as well between members of my party and the other two parties on the question of resource development. We have said for years that it is time we stopped exporting our raw materials and buying back finished products from other countries.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: We should be exporting steel, not iron ore; plastics, not unprocessed gas and oil; wood and paper products, not raw pulp. The underlying assumption is industrial strategy at the national level. In every province where resources are the key, we must have a resource policy whereby Canadian resources are developed by Canadians for the benefit of Canadians. That is what it should be all about.

This approach at this time, a short-run program designed to provide some 400,000 jobs and get people off welfare and handouts, combined with a long-range strategy, is what we ought to have had in the throne speech instead of the cutback, restraint mentality which is essentially negative and which will eventually lead to fewer, not more, jobs.

In conclusion, in suggesting this course of action for the people of Canada on behalf of my colleagues and this party, I do not say it is perfect; I do not say all our difficulties are going to go away but I do say that it recognizes reality. It recognizes that we have a mixed economy; it recognizes that we cannot go back to some primal existence that did not work in the 1920s and 1930s in terms of economics. If implemented, if acted upon by this government even before they face the electorate in the next election, what it would do for young Canadians, for old Canadians, for men and women who want to work is restore a sense of optimism and confidence about this country.

Canadians of my generation were lucky in the main. We grew up in prosperous times. For the most part we had things better than our parents, better than the young people coming on the labour market now. I, as leader of the New Democratic Party of Canada, and all of my colleagues want desperately to create the possibilities for young Canadians that we had in our youth. That is why we are advocating the kind of policy that I have outlined tonight.

Because of these positive things that are not in the Speech from the Throne and which we think ought to be there, I should like to move an amendment to the motion proposed by the Leader of the Official Opposition. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the amendment be amended by changing the period at the end thereof to a comma, and by adding immediately thereafter the following words:

"and this House condemns the government for its lack of economic planning and an industrial strategy, as evidenced by its failure to make a commitment to stimulate economic growth by reducing the federal sales tax, by reducing personal income taxes on middle and lower income earners, and by embarking on a new program of public sector investment."

[Translation]

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. The opening of the fourth session of the thirtieth legislature of Canada went rather smoothly compared to the big demonstrations of the past, and I am pleased about this. I think the Canadian people in general prefer their elected representatives and their administrators to be less demonstrative and more efficient. Having said this, I want to congratulate Mr. Speaker for remaining in office, and I hope that under his guidance parliament will do an outstanding job and lead our country on the road to economic progress, harmony and social peace. I also want to congratulate the hon. member for Beauharnois-Salaberry (Mr. Laniel) who remains Deputy Speaker and the hon. members who will still act as deputy chairmen of the committees. I also wish to welcome the young women who will be pages in this chamber from now on. This is a good initiative, and I am pleased about it.

Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to note that the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier) and leader of the Social Credit Party of Canada is absent for health reasons. All hon. members will certainly agree with me that the hon. member for Roberval who has been sitting in this House for 16 years is a glutton for work and that his contribution to the business of the House has always been marked by an objectivity and a sincerity worthy of a good Canadian.

You will certainly notice that I do not have the advantage of having behind me many hon. members to show on television how hardworking we are, as is often the case on the government side. However, I am not here to win applause, but I want to thank my hon. colleagues opposite and other hon. members who were kind enough to applaud me when I was invited to take the floor by the Chair. It is a mark of good fellowship. It also shows, I hope, that we are all working together in the best interests of the country. After all, Mr. Speaker, what is most important is to be here to fulfil my duties, to represent the people which sent me to parliament, to represent also the country as a whole, to speak on behalf of those who cannot come here to speak for themselves, that is the little people, the workers, the small businessmen, the small merchants, the farmers, the professionals, in other words, the entire population. So, let us forget about television for the moment and try to be efficient.

Mr. Speaker, I must heartily congratulate the sponsor and seconder of this motion who did their duty. I listened to their statements and I believe that the government should take heed of the suggestions put forward, especially with regard to the well-being of our families and senior citizens. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made similar remarks in his speech this afternoon. That means that we all wish for the well-being of our families, that we all want to ensure that our senior citizens have a well-deserved security and that it is up to parliament to guarantee them that security.

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne contains the same ideas so often expressed on such occasions. And it is a good thing, because so long as problems remain unsolved, they have to appear on the order of business of the Parliament of Canada. To repeat the same things over and over again is not a bad thing; on the contrary, I think it is a good thing, since it is to show confidence in the principles that prompt individuals or political parties in the pursuit of their objectives. Does not God himself set the example by making the sun rise every morning? And when skies are grey, are we not sad because we cannot see it rise? So, why not imitate our Creator?

Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne stresses the problems caused by inflation, the resulting unemployment and Canadian unity which is going through a crisis which threatens the very existence of Canada. The majority party in the House, or at least its leaders, are aware of the seriousness of the situation, of the disorder in our economic system which brings about inflation and thus forces a great many workers into unemployment against their will.

Some will argue that some are wilfully unemployed and refuse to work. Let us say that these are exceptional cases. We must not generalize. Each week, people come and ask me to help them find a job. It is the same in our manpower centres, at any rate those in my area. Many workers go there and ask our employment officers to help them find work. In spite of their goodwill, those officers find it impossible to find a job for them.

Mr. Speaker, a wise judge has said at the hearing of an employment insurance case that you cannot expect anyone to look for something which does not exist. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that you cannot find a thing which is just not there and this is exactly what is happening now in our country as workers are looking for jobs which are not available. I have already said to the House that no good mother would send her jobless son, whom she is supporting, out to pick strawberries in October by threatening to starve him, if he does not. Everybody knows that strawberries don't grow in October. Even if the boy did try, surely he would not find any. These would be conditions impossible to meet.

A proverb says that you cannot teach an old dog new tricks. By the same token, nobody will convince me that our whole work force has suddenly turned lazy. I heard that argument during the depression years, 1929-1939, and hon. members of my own age may recall such remarks about the unemployed. People who had jobs and financial security would somehow claim that if the unemployed and the poor were in that condition, it was all of their own doing.

Mr. Speaker, as it turned out, the opposite was true. As soon as the leaders of that time, who were puppets of big business and big financial interests, declared World War II, the unemployed who were supposed to be heartless loafers answering the call of the authorities, enlisted in the Canadian army or applied for jobs in ammunition plants, to supply the European war sites. Others answered the call as farm hands. As former chairman of an intensive production committee and as a good Canadian, I wished to take part in my country's war effort to save our freedoms, so I remember appealing to my fellow countrymen for more production to feed our armed Forces, and ammunition plant workers. That call was met generously. Those so-called lazy people became model labourers, so much so that government officials boasted about our workmen's efficiency and outstanding performance both in factories and on the battlefields.

Mr. Speaker, the same causes will have the same effects. We are witnessing a flash-back to the dirty thirties and were it not for our Canadian social security programs, the current economic depression would have still more serious consequences than at that time, because prices are now higher and the cost of living has reached an all-time high. Some cabinet members are aware of that serious problem and have the courage to speak out. I am referring to the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), the hon. member for Saint-Michel, who is quoted as making a sensational statement in Langford Mills. Her comments were reported in Le Droit on May 29, 1978, and I quote:

● (1042)

Two million children live in families whose income is insufficient to meet their needs, stated Miss Monique Bégin, Minister of National Health and Welfare, speaking over the weekend to the national council of the Young Men's Christian Association.

Miss Bégin said that in the case of at least 600,000 workers' families, two-thirds of the income is spent on food, clothing and lodging——but what is left for the other things?

The share of income in the hands of our poor families has changed very little since the end of the Second World War, she said.

Yet, this afternoon, I heard statements that totally contradict the thoughts of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

This would lead us to believe that despite their good intentions, the most fortunate Canadians have found a way of pulling out of the recessions on the backs of the poor.

This afternoon, the right hon. Prime Minister said that his government would strive above all to have the neediest share in the great wealth of this country; I feel he is right and, on that score, I am of those who are ready to help him, because, indeed, where our poorest families are concerned, we often seek out in those families the persons who are the most devoted to society, who at times make a career of it in our society.

Miss Bégin ended her speech on these words:

—our economic system must be changed to encourage and not discourage work. Our economic system serves millions of Canadians poorly.

Mr. Speaker, may I, in passing, congratulate the Minister of National Health and Welfare for introducing a measure to improve the lot of our neediest families through higher family allowances. Yet, I am one of those who are in favour of universal family allowances. I do not think that the wife of a doctor who earns $100,000 a year should be penalized by receiving lower allowances than the wife of a labourer, because in my opinion motherhood cannot be assessed in dollars. I feel that we should have universal family allowances and those who earn higher incomes should automatically, as in the case of old age security, pay taxes and definitely reimburse the treasury.

Mr. Speaker, I must express my gratitude on behalf of the senior citizens who will receive an increased pension supplement of $20. I would also like to express the wish that the Minister of National Health and Welfare will introduce some amendment to the legislation providing the payment of a pension or a supplement to an individual who has not yet reached 65 years of age but whose spouse is 65 years old or over.

Mr. Speaker, many of my constituents are suffering as a result of that fact. Following the death of the older spouse, the survivor who has not yet reached 65 is no longer entitled to a pension. It is quite distressing. I think we should all agree in the House that when an individual has received that pension or a supplement, he should still get it even after the death of his spouse. I am convinced that Canada will not be on the verge of bankruptcy for that reason and the victims could thus avoid some very serious problems.

Mr. Speaker, all types of productive power can meet the needs of all human beings living on this planet. God would not be the Almighty Being of infinite wisdom in whom I believe with all my heart if He would allow more human beings to be born on this planet than there are goods to meet the material and intellectual needs of everyone. A good father would not do this, hence our Father in His infinite wisdom cannot let this happen. If there are thousands of people on our planet in dire poverty, it is not because of a shortage of goods, but rather because of the lack of adequate means of distribution and purchasing power.

I believe, Mr. Speaker, that all will agree that during the last session both the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) said that generally we must strive to raise the purchasing power of the entire population, of low wage earners, for the benefit of the whole country.

Mr. Speaker, in early September I was in Africa as a member of a delegation of the Canadian parliament. I attended all sittings of the commission I belonged to with other Canadian parliamentarians from whatever parliament they were members of. In the course of our proceedings I heard a member from Zaire deplore the fact that a lack of paper prevents his country from getting enough books printed to meet the needs of the population and this is why thousands of Zairians remain ignorant because they cannot learn how to read and write—two indispensable tools which enable each individual to get an education and learn what is going on around the world. Anyone can get an education with these two tools if he has the willpower and the desire to do his own investigations and to learn more. As a member of the Canadian parliamentary delegation I made myself a duty to intervene to demonstrate that men and not God are responsible for such a state of things. Zairians have no paper for printing books to educate their people while in Canada, in my province, in my own riding of Bellechasse hundreds of wood producers have worked hard to cut wood and pile it on the public road for shipment to the paper mill and yet they are unable to sell it so it will be shipped to its destination. Paper mills are closing their doors in several communities of our country especially in the province of Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, that is an example of human foolishness. On the one hand workers have produced pulp for the production of newsprint or other products and they cannot sell it in order to get their reward for their toil. On the other hand there are nations which cannot get the necessary paper used to produce schoolbooks to ensure the education their citizens are entitled to get as human beings. This is only one example of a bed distribution of goods due to the stupidity of an economic system which is not motivated, or rather which is motivated solely by profit and not by distributive justice. On the American continent, our workers and our industries are faced with over-production, yet elsewhere on other continents, especially in Africa, people are doomed to starvation. However, the situation is no longer what it used to be several centuries ago. The means of communications and transportation of products are very efficient and would be even more so if those who have the monopoly of finance allowed our factories and our plants to build ships, trucks, planes and produce them in sufficient number to ensure the distribution of the goods so produced thereby satisfying the essential needs of human beings throughout the world.

We have in Canada, and specifically in Quebec, shipyards which have been operating at a snail's pace for many months, and skilled workers who are laid off because of lack of contracts to build ships which could transport Canadian products throughout the world and improve our trade balance. The Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson) has repeatedly stated in the House that important shipbuilding contracts had been authorized, so what are we waiting for to execute them, to give work to our employees, our workers, so as not to be caught by surprise by a world war which could happen any day, as was the case in 1939. If we let our shipyards—and what I am about to say is extremely serious—deteriorate because of lack of contracts, we will one day find ourselves in an embarrassing situation. I think that for the welfare of Canadian industry, the cabinet should do its utmost to maintain our shipyards in operation, because a shipyard must always be working to stay abreast and maintain its expertise, that is to stay up to date.

I hope the government will take the necessary steps to reassure the shipbuilding industry and realize that we should keep that industry afloat to keep our expertise in Canada. That is why I say our interests dictate that we build up a shipping industry, which will enable us to face any eventuality and meet our responsibilities as a member of NATO.

As far as economic incentives and the fight against inflation and unemployment are concerned, Mr. Speaker, the Speech from the Throne does not propose anything of any value unless I did not understand its full meaning. Are we to believe that the government no longer trusts its own programs, namely Canada Works, and could it be why the moneys previously earmarked for that program have been considerably reduced? I thought, Mr. Speaker, the aim of the program was to create jobs and make it possible for communities to carry out essential public projects.

Last Sunday, October 8, I attended the opening of a community centre at Saint-Nazaire, a town in my riding. The organizers of that project had applied for a grant under the Canada Works program, I had recommended the project to the minister and it had been accepted. On behalf of the people of Saint-Nazaire and my own, I thank the minister for the $48,000 grant which was provided for the completion of that project. To my great surprise, and I would like to call the attention of members of the cabinet to that fact, Mr. Speaker, although that centre cost $120,000, only $16,000 is still due, the difference between the $48,000 federal grant and $120,000 has been covered by the local residents who certainly deserve full credit. Mr. Speaker, this afternoon we heard about voluntary work. In the case that I mentioned, I believe that there was voluntary action and that the people involved wanted to make a common effort to reach a certain objective.

This, Mr. Speaker, is the result of a good program when it is well applied, well administered and able to stimulate the economy. This is why I say that in view of the present economic difficulties, the government should increase the funds of the Canada Works program while being careful in selecting the projects submitted to prevent wasting public funds. It is always essential to have some control. But in the case that I have mentioned, I can assure you that I was happy to be able to help to inaugurate this community centre in a small town of 450 people. This is extraordinary. It is the proof that there are people who really want to survive and ensure the survival of their village.

I also submit that it would be a good thing to review the implementation standards of this program so as to be able to help when need be in implementing a project which has gone through a first stage and which could survive if the public authorities made a small effort. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, the employees of the Department of Employment cannot always understand the needs of the community and the objectives of a project, and on the basis of the standards which have been set, they are forced to apply the legislation and the regulations as they are told without taking into account the fact that life must go on and that, with a little help, a business can eventually provide work for the community and provide for essential needs which must be met at all levels.

I therefore wish, Mr. Speaker, to congratulate the mayor of the municipality, Mr. Claude Lachance, a young man full of ambition and courage, along with all his colleagues and the residents who participated financially and through their voluntary services, again a good example for our youth. Mr. Speaker, you cannot put a price to such a thing as giving a good example to those who watch you, giving them the wish for a better life, giving them the courage to use their energy to participate with their follow citizens in the development of their environment. I believe that when such things occur, we must talk about them so that others may do the same.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired. I am convinced that if he asks for the unanimous consent of the House, he will be allowed to complete his remarks. Is there unanimous consent in the House to let the hon. member complete his remarks?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker, for your help in asking for consent on my behalf. I am thankful to you and also to all my colleagues for their generosity. Frankly, I would not want to abuse, I will try to be brief, but I still have a few ideas which I would like to express and which should help us all, I hope, to do something really worthwhile for our country.

In continuing my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to forget mentioning that in the interests of the Canadian people it is urgent that the government increase its help to small and medium businesses for they provide 60 per cent of all jobs in Canada. These businesses might go bankrupt by competition from large corporations and from multinational companies which unfortunately secure most of the government financial assistance. Mr. Speaker, it is an area on which I draw once again the attention of the government so proper care will be given to the distribution of government funds for industrial development so small and medium-sized businesses will have their share of the pie because those small and medium-sized businesses are operating mostly in rural areas and small villages while large corporations and large multinationals are working in large centres where they have all the economic advantages of transportation and communications they can hope for.

Mr. Speaker, small businesses are an important link in the Canadian economy. While serving the consumer they meet the needs of other small and large businesses. Although they cannot match the variety or volume of production of large businesses they still remain competitive from the point of view of prices, service, geographical location, presence in specific markets. According to the statistics, the number of small businesses in Canada varies between 800,000 and 900,000, about 90 per cent of all businesses. I, for one, attach a lot of importance to these kinds of businesses which are sort of a rampart for the safeguard of private enterprise. That is why I suggest to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) that he give small businesses additional tax rebates to allow them to survive and run at full capacity.

As we were coming back from Africa, Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I were exchanging points of view on what we had seen in those countries and what we had come to realize during the parliamentarians' conference. Then a colleague said that if we let farm producers produce what they can—and the same thing goes for the industrial sector—there would be no unsatisfied needs in the world and he said the problem was with means of distribution, not means of production. That colleague is a member of this parliament. I am sure he will support what I say when the time comes and take it upon himself to exert pressures so we can improve the system of distribution that could help solve a lot of problems.

Mr. Réal Caouette, who was for many years the leader of my party and a member of this House—I refer to him with some emotion and everybody has recognized he was a great Canadian—explained often in this House the causes of that failure of our system in the distribution area in advocating measures like granting to the Bank of Canada more power to mint the nation's credit, the distribution of a national dividend to every Canadian, and a discount on Canadian products in order to increase the consumers' purchasing power and permit them to consume according to their needs to stimulate the economy of our country. I remember those words, and I am always faithful to that philosophy. That is why I recall his memory, and that is why I make a point of keeping in the same vein in order that we succeed in getting these changes we need.

As for what is contained in the Speech from the Throne about the Canadian constitution, Mr. Speaker, it is a general summary of what has often been stated by the Prime Minister. Again this afternoon we heard that policy, the statement of these principles, and I for one am glad to hear in the Speech from the Throne that another legislation will be introduced during this session as a replacement for Bill C-60 with some improvements I am anxious to know.

Mr. Speaker, I already have had the opportunity to express in the House my opinion on the serious matter during a debate on a motion of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on July 6, 1977. At that time I was hoping that parliament would review the work of the Senate committee which was appointed in 1970 to undertake a comprehensive study of the whole issue and which presented its report on March 16, 1972. And I think that if the recommendations contained in that report had been followed since 1972 we would have made much progress and we would be close to reaching an agreement on a new constitution, a truly Canadian constitution made by Canadians for Canadians.

I hope that some day this will be achieved and that following the adoption of that new constitution by the provinces and the Canadian parliament it will be submitted to the approval of all Canadians by way of a referendum. Our country will be given a fifth constitution, but it will be the first time in our history that it will be subject to approval by the people and I think that after its adoption a copy of the constitution should be given to every Canadian who should be encouraged to consider it as a credo for Canadians and to live by it and I think it is only under this condition that we shall have harmony in our country.

I say that my party agreed with the constitution. During a national assembly every issue has been considered and we should clearly establish that we are in a Christian country. We should first establish our faith in God. We should establish the rights and obligations of the individual as a human being, the rights and responsibilities of the family, the basis of our society, the rights and responsibilities of provincial governments and the federal government. If all those responsibilities and rights were established clearly it would put an end to those useless discussions on the constitution and as Canadians of whatever ethnic origin we might work more and make every effort to build and develop our country further.

We are now divided. Each side tries to pull harder than the other and we do not progress too fast. Economic problems are increasing dissatisfaction is growing and this has given rise to a critical situation which is of great concern to me. As a Canadian citizen, Mr. Speaker, I would like all members of parliament as well as members of provincial legislatures and those who are interested in solving that problem, the leaders of intermediate bodies, to make their contribution and enable us to draw up a Canadian constitution of which every Canadian would be proud.

Mr. Speaker, if we want to live harmoniously in Canada, that is what we must do. Those are the views which I cherish very deeply and after travelling throughout the country and having taken the views of the residents of other provinces, when we speak as gentlemen and as Canadians we arrive at that conclusion.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that as long as the provinces will be forced to beg the federal treasury for revenues they will complain about the invasion of the federal government in areas which are under provincial jurisdiction, and that is the main cause of the division we are experiencing in this country. I would like to remind my colleagues of two very real experiences I lived, one in 1935 and the other in 1940, but I will talk about them on another occasion in order not to abuse the kindness of the House.

Mr. Speaker, as far as Canadian harmony is concerned, if we want to achieve our objectives, we will have to change—and I stress this—our system of financing the public sector, a burden which is becoming heavier every day, to wit the 78-79 budget whereby Canadians will have to pay $6.5 billion in interests on the public debt, which is $1.65 million more than last year. Moreover, Mr. Speaker, the national debt increases by $31 million each day, which is $11.5 billion over the current fiscal year. These are figures which Canadians must know and about which we should think very seriously. The government anticipates cuts in various areas but it fails to take the means to alleviate the burden of interests. Mr. Speaker, one of the way for the government to relieve the burden of debts and interests would be to amend the legislation on the Bank of Canada so that it be permitted to generate all the money supply the country needs. As it is, it generates only 8 per cent of it, 92 per cent being created by chartered banks. It should be the other way around.

Mr. Speaker, if the Bank of Canada is authorized to create 8 per cent of the money supply and if we use it with great confidence, why would it not be authorized to create 92 per cent of it? It is not normal that a public service as necessary as a monetary system be left into the hands of institutions whose first purpose is to make profits without considering the services and the primary function of a monetary system. Governments are at the mercy of those financial institutions, and I have here, Mr. Speaker, two copies of a magazine called Le Nouvel Informateur. I came across this publication by pure chance when I was on a plane coming back from Africa. This issue is very recent as it was published in September and it contains a description of the serious investigation made by a Frenchman, Philippe Simoneau, on the powers of bankers and how they use them. I invite my colleagues in the House to read it so that, when we consider the bill which was numbered 57 during the last session and which concerns the Bank Act revision, they will be able to contribute intelligently to the study of this bill and the amendments that will have to be made.

Mr. Speaker, in closing I would like to say that when we make such proposals there are always jokers to say that we want to implement a system of funny money in Canada. To these people I would like to ask if the tragic monetary system that we are now using is acceptable in view of the present results. Mr. Speaker, this does not shock me. The same things were said 38 years ago about the proposals of the Social Credit, and I would like to quote an editorial written by a man whom many people knew and who was the head of two important daily newspapers, Le Soleil of Quebec city and L'Action catholique, and who moreover is the father-in-law of Quebec Premier René Lévesque. I am talking about Mr. Eugène L'Heureux. Here is what he said:

> After ridiculing Social Credit like so many others, we are now able to look objectively at this monetary doctrine as we believe that it deserves to be studied in view of the present serious circumstances.

That was 40 years ago, but it is still true today, and I quote:

> That is why we extend our heartfelt congratulations to those who take the trouble of investigating whether or not implementing certain Social Credit principles could help solve the ever-growing problems that classical economic schools of thought cannot resolve.

The situation has not changed today.

However, we think that one should think twice before totally rejecting this monetary doctrine without submitting it to a test as it is the only one so far that advocates a set of positive remedies to the problems brought about by the big financial interests that control the world.

It is quite possible that the solutions or part of the solutions suggested by the Socreds will prove inadequate. We hope that Social Credit opponents—who are just as convinced as we are that big money circles are responsible for the present crisis—will in their turn advocate systematic solutions and not only casual, inconsistent remedies devised only to poke fun at the Socreds.

Usually that is what they do, just for the fun of it. They cast aside our philosophy but they are not able to give us good reasons for it.

No one intelligent and honest really believes that the economic situation could go on worsening as has been the case for the last ten years without impunity and despite the bankers' optimistic hanky panky.

This afternoon the Prime Minister was quoting a banker, Mr. McLaughlin, who was just that type of optimist. Some hanky panky is pessimistic and indeed I read last year some books which were rather gloomy.

Let us hope that our fears will not be justified. But as much as the so-called utopian theories we fear the probable consequences of the lack of new ideas in the economic field and the passivity of our leaders.

As spectator interested in this human drama, neither for nor against social credit—

—he is objective, he does not suffer from tunnel vision.

—we admit that one can be against social credit—

So do I. Not just for the sake of it but as long as it is not a combat based on lies and derision. These accusations must be founded on something positive.

—on the condition that one comes up with something better to replace the social credit doctrine.

Clearly the world needs an economic revival.

It is the same thing today. I continue quoting:

—if social credit cannot provide the driving force let us propose a better medicine. We do not favour social credit all that much.

Neither do I and if some have better measures, let them bring them forward and I will support them.

It is time that the democratically elected people stop playing into the hands of high finance, directing all their efforts towards the consumption of means advocated by such and such group in order to insure their economic dictatorship.

And I will end now with these words:

This narrow negative work which could not serve better those who exploit the rest of the world probably holds in store nasty days for our society. We would like to stave off this tragic outcome.

And yet this was written 40 years ago!

We do not care whether social credit succeeds or not but the necessity, the urgency to do something to prevent monetary capital from prevailing over human capital cannot leave us indifferent.

Mr. Speaker, I agree with those words but I do not agree that government authorities should take more interest in and give more attention to the monetary capital which is soulless and lifeless, over the interest of human capital which represents life, which is the greatest wealth that God has given to mankind.

Mr. Speaker, once again I would like to thank my colleagues. I had a message to deliver and as spokesman for my party I had to deliver a more elaborate message, and I must thank my colleagues for understanding this important responsibility. I want to assure the House and all my colleagues of all my co-operation, because if there are more viable solutions to this debt problem, this situation where the dollar is overriding the importance of human capital, I am always ready to lend my support, even if that means working 24 hours a day.

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to congratulate the members for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and for Verdun (Mr. Savard) who delivered such good speeches yesterday afternoon in the House. I intend tonight to deal with some problems of government policy, especially as they concern the national capital region and the public service.

[English]

When I was a student at university, we talked about the hungry thirties, which were followed by the frightened forties and the fabulous fifties. But what happened to the economy of our country and the western world in the sixties and the early seventies surpassed everything for which we could have hoped. In this period things got out of line. As far as Canada is concerned, we are now suffering the consequences of the maladjustments which crept into our economy. Our wage rates became higher than those of our trading partners. Our productivity did not keep pace. We lived high on the hog and now Canada, along with other nations of the western world, has to make some very painful adjustments.

The economic medicine which is prescribed is not popular. It is not the kind of thing which enhances an elected government in a democratic society. As a member from the national capital region, I feel every day the consequences of the policy which was described in the Speech from the Throne—restraint—and I am sure members of every other party represented in this House do also.

This afternoon the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) very well pointed out that the room within the federal budget for reduction in government expenditures, a policy which seems to be generally accepted as the kind of medicine we must face now, can only be applied in very restricted areas of the federal budget. We cannot reduce the statutory commitment for old age security. We cannot reduce interest payments on federal debt. We cannot reduce the money that must be paid to the provinces to support the cost of hospital and health insurance and so on. However, in areas in which federal services are rendered, whether it is national defence, whether it is housing, whether it is the services of the Departments of National Health and Welfare or Public Works, the federal government can apply its economy measures.

Those of us who are representing areas very heavily populated by public servants have the responsibility of saying to the people we represent: "You must by the very facts of life reflect national decisions and the national will. As your representative, I will do my very best to see that the policies are applied as fairly as I know how, but I will not deceive you, nor will I say things which are in themselves all things to all people, avoiding the hard facts and the tough decisions that have to be made".

The government has proposed cuts that involve some 5,000 indicated positions in a federal service of 300,000. I say "indicated positions"; they are not all filled. It is hard to say, but perhaps 3,500 of those will involve positions that are actually filled and will probably be declared redundant in the process of the examination of which functions the government is no longer going to perform. I choose my words carefully here, Mr. Speaker. I say "of which functions the government is no longer going to perform".

I have received calls, as have other people, from long-term civil servants. As an example, I received a call from an employee of the department of health who has been working for many years on the hazards of asbestos dust to health and is being laid off. I have received calls from people who have served in the public works testing laboratory conducting experiments over a long period of time and are being laid off.

I look at my colleagues around me and know they can multiply the examples that can be cited. The policy of the government will be pursued through attrition as much as possible, and through transfers as much as possible, but there inevitably will be some positions declared redundant, in respect of which the incumbents will not be able to find employment in the public service itself.

The Public Service Commission has a priority program of reassigning, and every facility will be offered within the public service to see what kind of additional posts can be found. The problem here has been complicated by the government's policy of decentralization, a policy which was applauded by every other party in this House of Commons. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) was elected officially by espousing decentralization. I remember the plea by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan) of the NDP for more government services in his own backyard. Every party in this House has endorsed decentralization as an instrument of national unity. That has complicated the difficulty which public servants find now in searching for posts which are not filled and for which they would be qualified.

I note that the policy of decentralization by the Government of Canada has run into a snag which has very seriously delayed it. The province of Quebec has refused to guarantee the rights of the sons and daughters of public servants moved to that province to schooling in the language of their choice. The Government of Canada, through the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), has said that public servants will not be moved if the government of that province is not prepared to guarantee those rights. I note some members on the other side are laughing a bit about this. I personally find this a very serious and intense matter.

The first comment we have is this. The cuts in government expenditures which are part of the package of economic kmedicine will mean some layoffs, and this will hurt. We know that.

Another policy that is implicit in the medicine has regard to wage restraints in the public service. The Speech from the Throne says:

> You will be asked to approve amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act to ensure that compensation in the federal public service remains in step with the private sector, and does not lead the way.

As the Prime Minister indicated this afternoon, this commitment came out of a federal-provincial conference of the heads of government in Canada, and at that conference, as the Leader of the Opposition so eloquently pointed out, the opposition parties were well represented by the heads of the provincial governments.

The commitment which was unanimously given to that conference and accepted was that there should be some kind of restraint in excessive wage demands in the public sector. As a result we had Bill C-28. In the form in which that bill was presented to this House I could not support it; nor could many of my colleagues on this side. A number of us worked during the summer, and we have made a number of suggestions. I cannot speak for others, but I will speak for myself. I believe the government will bring in a much better bill.

The bill as originally drafted would have given guidelines to arbitrators to bring down awards recognizing total compensation comparability. It did not talk about the option of conciliation, which is the second option available to staff associations in the public service. Adoption of Bill C-28 in the form in which it was presented to this House would, in my opinion, have forced every staff association to have chosen the strike route, and would have very seriously undermined arbitration, which most of us consider to be a more desirable way of settling disputes.

The bill had other defects. It did not recognize the inequality of pay for women which the private sector has very seriously embedded in it. The Human Rights Act would perhaps have overruled the original draft of those clauses in Bill C-28. Bill C-28 had a technical error in the assignment of duties to individuals as well as to positions.

When we talk about the private sector we must remember that there is not just a nice neat little package with the label on it "private sector". There are all kinds of employers in the private sector, good ones and bad ones. There are sweat shops and well paid positions. Which employers are you going to make the comparison with? And if the objective is comparison of the public service, it should be with more than the private sector. It should be a comparison with outside employment. For teachers that would mean the municipal school boards, and for our nurses it would mean municipal and provincially operated hospitals.

Those of us who have looked at the act feel that the legislation dealing with total compensation comparability has to be much more sophisticated. There are over 100 elements involved in pay. What is the monetary equivalent of the public servants' superannuation plan for the private sector in your comparison? Those of us who have looked at the act feel there has to be an agreement through the pay research bureau for a means of working out that kind of comparison in dollars and cents terms.

Therein lies the possibility of compromise and negotiation. If there is not agreement on the method of doing the calculations, there can be no agreement on anything else and the arbitrators will not get meaningful instructions. We say this kind of a package is acceptable in principle. We know there are some sections of the public service that are under-paid as well as some that are over-paid. In any organization with 300,000 men and women there are bound to be maladjustments, particularly if you are trying to make a rational standard of comparison in order to develop salary and wage scales that can be applied generally.

I feel confident that the new bill which is coming in will be a much more acceptable bill, a much more humane bill, and those of us who are supporting the government on this side are doing our very best to make it so.

I want to say something with regard to a problem in the national capital itself. The relocation of some offices across the river involved some difficulties which seems to have been worked out. Most of the public servants that I know are very pleased to have such excellent working conditions in the new structures. The difficulties of transportation, income tax deductions and parking have all been worked out. Parking problems are no worse there than in many other places. However, there are still problems that have resulted from this move concerning vacant office space in the national capital. This could have been avoided through better planning and anticipation. I am hoping that the municipalities will not suffer an abrupt loss in revenue they would have received otherwise by way of grants or in lieu of taxes, and that the government will see its way clear to some adjustments which the Minister of Finance in a conference meeting with the municipalities this spring so clearly promised.

On Monday there are going to be a few by-elections. There is going to be a by-election in the constituency of Ottawa Centre which is next to mine. At the reception last night a charming lady came up to me and said, "I hear there is going to be a by-election in your constituency." I assured her that I was still there and that that report was something like the report of Mark Twain's death, which was slightly exaggerated. However, the voters in the constituency of Ottawa Centre will have to make a choice on Monday.

Let us look at the position of the official opposition party in this House. Nobody could have put it more eloquently than the Prime Minister when he said: "The desire of the official opposition party is to do everything painlessly; 60,000 public service jobs out of 300,000 are going to disappear and nobody is going to feel it." It reminds me of the old fable of the man with the sword who swung at somebody's head and the fellow said, "You missed", and he said, "No, just shake your head." The suggestion that this can be done by attrition is an insult of the intelligence of any student. The Government of Canada has indicated 5,000 positions will disappear. If it is difficult for hon. members on the other side to think that 5,000 positions will not be absorbed by attrition, how can they absorb 20,000 a year by attrition?

The Prime Minister pointed out that attrition occurs in the wrong places, that it does not come where you want it. The policy of the government was to determine that certain functions would no longer be performed which would then eliminate the jobs in those areas. The policy of the Tory party is to say through this magic word, attrition, so many people are going to retire and we are going to have a full freeze on hiring for three years. At the end of three years the public service will be just as efficient and all vacancies are going to be in the right places, the total payroll at the end of three years will be down by $1.2 billion, and public servants won't even feel it. I do not think that the public servants of this country are going to buy that for one minute.

Mr. Francis: I hear some members on the other side saying something about pensions in the government service. I know there has been a great deal said about the public service superannuation plan. I placed some questions on the order paper, and I received my answers just yesterday. In the public service superannuation account there is in excess of $9 billion as of March 31. The rate of interest is approximately 7.8 per cent and approaching 8 per cent. It is a weighted formula related to the interest rates on new borrowings.

The last time the Minister of Finance went to borrow money he paid 9.5 per cent for 20-year Government of Canada debentures. So the interest rate will still be rising. Over $700 million per year is coming in by way of interest payments, and the disbursements for basic pensions and escalation are scarcely more than half that, maybe $370 million. Out of this some people have made a disastrous scenario, but it has not been the professional people, the actuaries such as the Tomenson-Alexander firm which people were so worried about. They said that if we left the fund alone and did nothing it would exceed $40 billion by the turn of the century and if you did nothing with it eventually go over one trillion dollars.

The fund was set up with interest rate earnings of 4 per cent, and interest rates are now approaching twice that. The Conservative candidate in Ottawa Centre was "Mr. Conference Board" who led the attacks on the escalation of public service pensions, stating along with the national citizens coalition that they would wreck the country.

I understand that the Tory candidate said today in an open line program that he really approves of the escalation of pensions. Well, Mr. Speaker, he sure kept that a secret and managed to unveil it at the last minute, just before going to the polls on Monday in a civil service constituency. I raised the question with the voters, "Is this the man you want to represent you when it comes to negotiating on legislation affecting public service superannuation?" The Speech from the Throne said that it is coming, that we will have amendments to the Public Service Superannuation Act designed to ensure that public service pensions are in line with contributions.

I remember the statements of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that day in March when the President of the Treasury Board made his declaration on what government policy would be. He said at that time that there would be some changes, that the government was going to stop the nonsense of having everybody retire on December 31 to get their escalation, and that it was going slowly, in a year by year process, to raise the escalation from age 55 to 60, and every three years they would look at the fund to see how much money was in it. With a 9½ per cent interest rate in the last government bond issue, I am not worried about whether there will be enough money in the fund to pay for escalation.

I say to the people of Ottawa and to the public servants that the government put escalation according to cost of living on the books on a fully actuarially funded proposition, in a fund that is basically so over-funded that it is almost scandalous, rising at a rate of over one billion dollars a year. There is protection for the retired pubic servant to ensure that the cost of living will not slowly steal a little bit each year from the pension that he or she has to live on. I am proud to be a member of the party that legislated this.

I said that there was a choice the voters would have to make, and it is a very significant choice. I invite them to consider the issue of the cost of pensions. They say that there is a third choice, another candidate for the New Democratic Party in that riding. The program which that party is putting forward is one where they are also promising everything painlessly. They do not accept the analysis of our economy and/or the economic medicine that we prescribe.

The weakness of the New Democratic Party is its lack of discipline. I remember the last time we had a Post Office strike—Lord forbid that we have another like it. At that time the Liberal candidate for Ottawa Centre was the postmaster general. I remember the debate in which the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) got up and said of the postal workers' demand for a 40 per cent wage increase that they should get it. There was not one word of criticism in that debate of anything that the union asked for. I can remember when Joe Davidson said that the public be damned if the union did not get what they wanted. I can remember Joe Davidson coming before the committee of the House of Commons which was looking at the amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act and saying that our postal rate should be 25 cents a letter.

It was a joint committee which included the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I am sure that he can confirm that what I said happened. Nobody from his party said one word of criticism. Nobody. If we have a problem with comparability today in the public service, if we have some areas that are out of line, if we have some very aggressive unions abusing the right to strike—and I say that if post office workers go on strike again they are abusing the right to strike, testing the public and elected representatives—then the members of that party have some responsibility for the encouragement they have given, their failure to condemn and their failure to be responsible in the position they took. Again I say to the people who are going to have to vote—

An hon. Member: It is true the employer is pretty good there.

Mr. Francis: I am not defending everything as being perfect on one side or the other. I am saying we have a tough proposition before us and the people are going to have to make a choice. If we are facing a policy of restraint, if we are facing a policy of some rates of pay being out of line, then we must ask why it happened and who the people are who encouraged it to happen.

The Public Service of Canada is crying for certain things to be done. The public service will serve the public. They know they must respond to a national will. They ask that they be recognized when they do a job well. They ask that they have the dignity they feel they should possess as human beings because they do a job with pride and with decency. They are embarrassed when there is waste; they are embarrassed when things are not right. They want the Public Service Staff Relations Act amended, and amended in a humane way. They are going to remember who it was put collective bargaining on the books in the first instance.

I submit that the amendments this House will finally carry will be more in the spirit of the original legislation than in the spirit of Bill C-28. Public servants are going to remember that the Public Service Employment Act also calls for substantial revision. They will await the report of the D'Avignon special committee of inquiry, on which there is not only Mr. D'Avignon as chairman but Mr. Davidge representing the employees and Mr. Bruce Brittain representing the employer. They are going to remember that this government enacted legislation according the full cost of living escalation to their pensions.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): After 25 years of prodding!

Mr. Francis: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says "after 25 years of prodding." I give him full marks for his consistent interest in this area, but he has never had responsibility for government or responsibility for applying tough economic medicine such as the government has to do now. The same is true not only in our country but in many other countries of the world. It is going to fall heavily on those of us who have the responsibility to be speaking for the national capital and the public service at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleagues for that generous applause, which I know is heartfelt and appropriate under all circumstances. I want to spend the few moments I have this evening addressing some remarks to the Speech from the Throne specifically and to look at some of the reasons we are back in parliament rather unexpectedly.

Before doing that, however, I want to extend to the mover, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), and to the seconder my sincere congratulations for the manner in which they carried out this very traditional and important function. The hon. member for York South spoke with great ability, perception and grace. She had a most difficult function, defending the indefensible, and I give her full marks for the way in which she presented her speech and attempted to carry out this almost impossible task.

Today is what is known colloquially as leaders' day. This afternoon and this evening I have been contemplating what the effect might be on someone who came into this chamber, as they might, to observe the speeches made this afternoon, particularly as far as the two main speakers were concerned. I think it is fair to say, and I believe most members would agree, that if any person who was disinterested in the affairs of this House had come into the chamber this afternoon, he would have been under the impression that the Prime Minister was the person sitting directly in front of me—the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in actual fact—because he spent his whole time charting the course of action as he saw it that had to be taken regarding the important issues in the country at this time.

What did we have from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)? We had a speech that could only be assessed as a scandalous personal attack on the very constructive suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition. It was the kind of attack that might be considered appropriate for an opposition leader, but the tone was set by the Prime Minister for the way in which this government is going to look at things in this session. The Prime Minister came forward carping and criticizing what I consider to be the very responsible and constructive suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition.

If this is the kind of atmosphere that the so-called leader of our country is going to create in this institution, what kind of progress will we make in the days and weeks ahead? I have to commend my leader for the way in which he conducted himself at a time when we have no business being in this parliament, a time when we should at last be going to the people for a new mandate, for a new government.

I want to point out to hon. members opposite that a provincial election is taking place in Saskatchewan right now. Maybe the Prime Minister should observe what is going on there. The premier, who was embattled and felt considerable pressure with respect to his office, started his campaign with a serious and uncalled for attack on the leader of the Conservative party in that province. I anticipate as a result of this uncalled for and unsubstantiated attack that in Saskatchewan after October 18 another will be added to the ever-growing list of Conservative governments. There will be seven after October 18.

I want to consider why we are here, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister spoke today of leadership and the kind of qualities he thought, in all modesty, that he could present to this country. He has given us examples of that kind of leadership over the last few months. We have no business being here now. There is nothing in the Speech from the Throne that warrants this government continuing in office. Can anyone in this House seriously suggest that there is anything of substance in the Speech from the Throne that will deal with the issues in the country at the present time? Are any new initiatives of any consequence being taken by this government with respect to the economy? Are there any suggestions with respect to the great so-called issue of national unity in our country?

It is simply a rehash, sir, of helter skelter announcements made by the Prime Minister over the course of the last few months without consultation with members of his cabinet. Unilaterally, as is his custom, he came forward with suggestions he thought would be politically appealing at this time. Quite frankly, in my estimation these suggestions were ones that he felt were necessary in order to save his political scalp.

I was elected in 1974, along with the Minister of State for Small Business (Mr. Abbott). Those of us who were elected in 1974 may be people who are going to make history because of the fact that we may be in this parliament a sufficient number of years to qualify for a pension. The kind of leadership we have from this Prime Minister is the pre-empting of programs on national television. He has done this on two or three occasions. On each occasion the great announcement for the Canadian people who have been waiting for this television appearance is: "I am sorry, but I am the leader of the country and there will be no election".

I am reminded that over the course of the summer the Prime Minister went to Bonn for the summit meeting, along with other leaders of western countries. I could only come to the conclusion that while he was there he must have done some good. I think what he did for Canada was possibly sell his now patented speech to Mr. Callaghan, who gave a similar speech in England not too many weeks ago. The only accord that I have seen come out of the Bonn summit is to say that those who were involved in the deliberations possibly agreed that there would be no more elections.

Let us remember the Prime Minister has a basic contempt for this institution to the extent that he rarely, if ever, participates in the debates in this House. In fact during the time I have been here he has only been seen in debate on one occasion each year, and that is on the occasion of the Speech from the Throne debate. That is the way in which he regards the institution of parliament. That is the way this Prime Minister feels about obtaining advice from members of his own party, or indeed members of the opposition representing, as we do, every region and part of Canada.

Undoubtedly members on his side of the House will be quick to point out that he comes in during the question period with his idea of answers to questions. But he is really setting a precedent as far as prime ministers are concerned, in terms of our parliamentary history, by the way in which he ignores and disregards this House. He does not participate in debates. He ignores members on his side, refusing as he does to take advice from them respecting the issues of the day.

It is no secret, and I know members on the other side will agree, that the Prime Minister is seeking less and less advice from caucus. Indeed, long ago he stopped taking advice from his cabinet. He has surrounded himself, and continues to do so, with a small clique of advisers in the Prime Minister's office. This is the ruling class in Canada today. This is the kind of participatory democracy we now have in Canada, participatory democracy, as we all recall, being promised by the Prime Minister at the time he started out in politics and at the time he started out as Prime Minister. Members on the government side know full well that if they want anything done, if they have anything to say or anything to ask for, they have to get permission and clearance and go through this clique of advisers to the Prime Minister.

I hope to demonstrate in the course of my remarks that the Prime Minister is withdrawing more and more from the traditional parliamentary system and proceeding into a system more akin to a presidential system, one where his word, and his word alone, his opinion and his opinion alone, are given consideration. The cabinet and his own parliamentary group are mere appendages to suit the convenience of the "philosopher king". I say "philosopher king" with the emphasis on the "king". The leadership given by this Prime Minister is the leadership of fear—fear of facing the electorate. That is the kind of leadership we have experienced. Notwithstanding his histrionics and rhetoric today and his attack on the suggestions made by the Leader of the Opposition, one thing that has marked his particular time in office is that which demonstrates he is very wary and reluctant to face the electorate.

We are here for the purpose ostensibly of dealing with some of the great problems that we have. We are now faced with a Prime Minister who is more concerned with his own survival than he is with the real needs of our country. I say that more out of a sense of chagrin than a sense of criticism. If this Prime Minister really had the interests of Canada in his heart he would go to the people.

What we need now is not short-term policies put forward, of whatever type, but a fresh government with a fresh mandate. Anyone who has any concept of planning the economy and as well national unity would understand that a fresh government of whatever stripe after an election would have at least four years within which to put in reasoned and planned policies and programs that would be instituted over a period of time. Difficult decisions could be made because there would be a new mandate for the new government.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are about to rise. Therefore may I call it ten o'clock and continue my remarks tomorrow?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE ACT—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I put a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) during question period today. I think it is important that all members of the public know where their political representatives stand on issues as important as unemployment insurance. I was somewhat reassured by the minister's reply. However, he did not address himself to that part of my question in which I asked for the tabling of any correspondence between the provincial premiers and himself. I want to have that information tabled, if it exists, in the interests of providing to Canadians the positions of the premiers.

It is well known that at the first ministers' conference last winter the premiers approached the conference with a very tough stand against increased government expenditure. It was a stand for cutting the fat and cutting back on employment by government, etc. I am not criticizing that stand at all, Mr. Speaker; there are obvious areas where cutbacks can and should be made. However, this is the time of elections in some parts of the country. The Tory premier of New Brunswick does not have much of a record of his own to run on, and to date he has been running on federal issues, issues which he does not seem to know much about. He forgets that over half of the money his government spends comes from the federal government. He did not talk about that during the campaign. He talked about false issues. From what was said by that government's representative at the conference with the Minister of Employment and Immigration yesterday, he does not know what the proposals with regard to unemployment insurance are all about.

The principle of unemployment insurance is extremely important. It is a principle to which this government is and must remain firmly committed. Other principles are involved which must not be violated. One of these is relatively new. In fact, it is only about 18 months since the principle of variation of benefits and, more particularly, qualifying periods in the Unemployment Insurance Act was brought in. Those regional variations must remain. In fact, there should be more of them. We must not carry on with this fetish that everything must be the same in all parts of the country, because the same conditions do not exist at any given time in all parts of the country. Therefore, we must protect and enhance the idea of regional variations. There are many changes that could be made in the Unemployment Insurance Act without reducing benefits to those who really need them.

There is something which must be said, and it cannot be emphasized too much. There are some abuses of the unemployment insurance scheme. However, all of those abuses are blamed on the employees. In many cases, the employer is as guilty as the employee. An employer too cowardly to write on a separation slip that an employee left without cause or was fired without cause is as guilty of ripping off the unemployment insurance scheme as the employee who takes the money. I see no difference in the situation. However, it is always the employee who is villified by the critics of unemployment insurance.

One change that could be made in the program would be to write into the act very tough penalties for employers who falsify separation certificates. That would take away some of the stigma from those who, through no fault of their own, receive unemployment insurance benefits, benefits to which they have contributed.

This is not a welfare scheme as many people seem to think. No doubt there are those who try to use it as a welfare scheme, but it is not that. Those who draw unemployment insurance benefits have paid into the scheme for the benefits they are receiving. I do not pretend that they pay premiums equivalent to the benefits they receive. Many people pay premiums all their working lives and never receive any benefit except the termination benefit when they retire. It is important to remember that this is an insurance scheme.

It is essential that the information I asked for earlier today be made public so that people will know where their political representatives stand. Certain premiers could not then raise false issues, taking one stand at a conference at Ottawa and then taking the exactly opposite stand in their province because it is convenient to do so during an election campaign.

Mr. Frank Maine (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in this afternoon's question period the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi (Mr. Dionne) asked whether, in view of yesterday's press reports, the minister could confirm that all provincial premiers are opposed to changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act. I take it that the hon. member was referring to provincial ministers with manpower responsibilities because these press reports related to a federal-provincial conference which took place yesterday in Ottawa dealing with proposed changes to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I am not aware that the subject of changes to the unemployment insurance program has been raised at the prime ministerial level in any of the provinces. I happened to be at the federal-provincial conference which took place yesterday, so I can assure the hon. member that I am in a position to set the record straight.

It is fair to say that there was a frank and open discussion about the changes which are being proposed and, as the minister himself indicated in the House earlier today, there was support for the notion that the unemployment insurance program must be tightened up in view of its tremendous cost and its disincentive effect. There was dispute about how this ought to be done, but no proposals made by provincial ministers were offered which, in our view, would have had any different results. No matter what you do, when changes are made to restrict the unemployment insurance program, inevitably you are going to impact on people. I can confirm that the minister gave a clear undertaking that he was willing to consider a softening of the proposal having to do with repeaters in order to take account of the severity of unemployment in particular regions. The minister has not yet worked out the details of this, but he was very sympathetic to the views collectively expressed by the ministers present at the conference.

In so far as any correspondence is concerned, I do not know what the hon. member is referring to. If he can clarify that for me, I will undertake to discuss it with the minister.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. The government's failure to resolve disputes in the Post Office appears likely to disrupt postal services to all Canadians. Since legislation appears to be the only way to protect the public interest, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale):

That the government introduce, today, emergency legislation that will ensure continuation of the postal service and continuation of negotiation; and that the House leaders of all parties meet immediately to arrange for the House of Commons to deal with that legislation in all stages today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

MANPOWER

CUTBACKS IN RETRAINING PROGRAMS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, in order to seek the unanimous consent of the House for the following motion. In light of the fact that among the budget cuts announced on September 8 by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) were cuts of some $62.5 million in funds for several Manpower retraining programs, and that these cutbacks reduce the level of support for adult education retraining programs to the level where many people, especially married women with children at home, will be unable to take advantage of them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the President of the Treasury Board be informed by this House that it finds such cuts at a time of rising unemployment to be unacceptable, and that he be instructed to rescind these cuts and to restore the level of funding to all Manpower retraining programs to the level that prevailed before his announcement.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL RESOURCES

EXPLOITATION OF OFFSHORE RESOURCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the continuing refusal of the federal government to deal with Atlantic provinces, like Newfoundland, in a more equitable way in recognizing their historic and legal claims over their social and economic destiny with respect to development of offshore resources, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Annapolis Valley (Mr. Nowlan):

That the Prime Minister and his cabinet modify their policies in this respect to recognize the rights of the provinces to develop and exploit offshore mineral and petroleum resources, which will be done in any event as in the case of the western provinces, under the aegis of national energy policy guidelines, National Energy Board regulations and environmental policy.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

S.O. 43

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43. It relates to the multimillion dollar developments studied by the Standing Committee on National Finance in the other place and is a matter with which members on this side have been concerned for some time.

Mr. Bill Perks, National Capital Commission vice chairman, indicated in late 1974, when the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière proposal was presented to the NCC planning committee, the following:

The committee was not asked if this was appropriate; what we were asked to do was tinker with something that was a fait accompli.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, on motions, explain how the Campeau project could have been a fait accompli in 1974 when the Campeau corporation's only holding in the entire six-block pole west area was a $100,000 option to purchase one property in one corner of the area, and what role any cabinet ministers played in this becoming a fait accompli over 1½ years before the contract was signed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion at this time requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENERGY

CUTBACK IN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity in order to seek the unanimous consent of the House for the following motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the fact that among the budget cuts announced on September 8 by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) was the reduction of some $110 million in funding for the Canadian Home Insulation Program, which will result in less insulation being installed in Canadian homes this fall and winter and will lead to a higher consumption of oil and natural gas, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources be directed to provide this House with an explanation of this blatant rejection of his policy, and that he be directed to provide to this House any estimates available in his department of the extra cost to the economy in both lost jobs and the increased consumption of fossil fuels as a result of the destruction of the home insulation program.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

URBAN AFFAIRS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE PROJECT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the refusal of someone on the other side of the House to allow the motion of the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott).

Questions have been asked in the House, on numerous occasions, about the squandering of public money on the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project. The Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) has always said that this giveaway was good value. Now that the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance has studied the matter thoroughly and concluded that the government lost its shirt, it is time for this House to see that everything is done to get to the bottom of this gross waste of public funds. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That in view of the statement of the Senate finance committee in the report entitled "The Accommodation Program of the Department of Public Works" that "the decision to proceed appears to have rested on other than purely economic considerations", this House requests the establishment of a royal commission on government accommodation procurement procedures with particular reference to all negotiations and agreements leading to the lease-purchase agreement for Les Terrasses de la Chaudière complex in Hull.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

NATIONAL SECURITY

RCMP FILE "CARTE BLANCHE"—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of pressing necessity concerning the reports of a top secret RCMP file named "Carte Blanche", bearing the number D 929-2-32-6-2-1, and reports of RCMP internal telexes dated November 25, 1971, and December 8, 1971. I would ask permission of the House to move a motion as follows:

That the Solicitor General immediately confirm or otherwise the genuineness of these telexes, that he outline the reasons that no apparent steps have been taken by the government to deal with serious espionage information that may have been uncovered and, finally, that the minister confirm whether or not the telex of December 8, 1971, states RCMP security distrust of the federal government by declaring that Jean Pierre Mongeau was supplying information to the then Quebec Liberal government's minister of cultural affairs on the Parti Québécois while at the same time he was working with the Prime Minister's then principal secretary, Marc Lalonde, and the then solicitor general, the member for Dollard.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister will recall that his Postmaster General—who is occasionally in the House—gave the clear undertaking that he would be prepared to meet his responsibilities. We gather that means to ensure that the mail is delivered and to act as quickly as possible.

Since we now know that this morning mail service stopped in Charlottetown, Montreal, Windsor and Calgary, with a threat of more stoppages to come, will the Prime Minister today introduce emergency legislation in this House to guarantee the continuation of postal service and also guarantee the continuation of negotiations?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is unkind of the Leader of the Opposition to suggest that the Postmaster General is not in the House. He should know that the Postmaster General has been dealing very efficiently with the letter carriers' strike in the past week, and that this morning he is meeting in an attempt to settle a strike which, if it has not been called officially, seems in effect to have stopped the Post Office across Canada.

There is a meeting going on at this time, and we expect government representatives to meet with the postal union, CUPW, at two o'clock this afternoon. We hope they will call off the strike, which is premature in the sense it was not called by the union executive. If they do, then the question of the Leader of the Opposition remains hypothetical. If they do not call it off, the government will have to take very urgent steps indeed.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the efficiency of the Postmaster General and the government is particularly evident today in Charlottetown, Montreal, Windsor and Calgary, where the mail is not being delivered. I assume the Prime Minister has some contingency plans in respect of what will happen if there is yet another failure this afternoon. Will he tell the House of Commons what those contingency plans are, and will he also tell the House how long he intends to delay taking action to ensure that Canadians can count upon their mail being delivered?

Mr. Trudeau: You will have recognized, Mr. Speaker, the hypothetical nature of the question. I am asked what will happen if the meetings at two o'clock are not successful. I can tell the Leader of the Opposition that he should stay around this afternoon to see if the meetings are not successful—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, of course, the nation will recognize the continuing evasive nature of the Prime Minister's answers. I have asked the Prime Minister, does the Government of Canada have any contingency plans in the event that the policy of failure as usual continues with the Postmaster General; and what are those contingency plans?

● (1117)

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether the Leader of the Opposition insists on the policy of failure as usual, when last week the letter carriers continued, without a strike, and signed a very good contract with the government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: This is what we hope the meeting at two o'clock this afternoon will achieve. The House will be convened until at least 4.45, Mr. Speaker, for the vote. I urge the Leader of the Opposition, if he is so anxious to see what the government will do, to stay in his seat and he will see.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I know that the Prime Minister has very little use for this institution.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I will wait until it is quiet on the other side of the House, Mr. Speaker. The Prime Minister will not give the House of Commons information which we have a right to receive. Will he at least agree to act on an undertaking which was given by the Postmaster General several months ago, in response to a suggestion from this side, that there be established a special parliamentary committee to look into all the operations of the Post Office—a parliamentary committee established along the same lines as that set up in relation to the penitentiary service, a committee that produced some very useful recommendations at that time?

Since the government has a record of quite consistent failure in ensuring delivery of the mail in this country and ensuring peace in the Post Office, will the government and the Prime Minister agree today, at this moment, before delaying anything to another two o'clock meeting, to establish a committee along those lines and let this parliament take a look at changes that might guarantee more effective delivery of the mail in this country?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I find the Leader of the Opposition strangely self-effacing this morning. Just after I suggested he stay in his seat until 4.45, he says that I have very little use for parliament. It seems that he does not have a very high opinion of it himself.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Trudeau: The Leader of the Opposition knows—and I repeat it for the third time—that meetings are taking place at two o'clock this afternoon. We hope that there will be a recall of the strikers and resumption of work. I can assure the Leader of the Opposition that if there is not, the government will be prepared to announce what measures it intends to take.

NEGOTIATIONS TO AVERT STRIKE—GOVERNMENT INVOLVEMENT

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, the Postmaster General has just arrived in the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

An hon. Member: Special delivery.

Mr. Dinsdale: Yes, special delivery.

Mr. Paproski: Pony express.

Mr. Dinsdale: I would like to direct my question to the hon. gentleman. I see that he has a smile on his face; perhaps he is the bearer of good tidings. We certainly hope so, because of the critical importance of a reliable, efficient postal service to the people of Canada.

Is the Postmaster General aware of the statement that was made on television this morning by the president of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers, that not once during the long, drawn-out period of negotiations has the Postmaster General or his deputy met with the union officials, either formally or informally? Could the Postmaster General deny, or confirm, this allegation; and could he explain, in view of the critical importance of a reliable postal service, this dereliction of duty if the statement is true?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, as far as my smile is concerned, if the hon. gentleman was on this side of the House he would always have a smile.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: It is not a question of negating or affirming whatever statements Mr. Parrot has made as president of CUPW. I can assure the hon. member that I have met with him on many occasions in a friendly way, discussing matters relevant to the Post Office and trying every time to establish some kind of agreement as far as the operation of the Post Office is concerned.

• (1122)

I can assure the hon. member that my staff and officials at the Post Office have spent hours, days, weeks and months trying to find solutions to our problems: we have done all that is necessary. If it happens that we do not get what we expected, it is not because our staff did not do their duty and did not take responsibility.

MEASURES TO RESOLVE PROBLEMS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The Postmaster General obviously has no good news for the House at this moment: this is to be regretted, because the situation is deteriorating very rapidly. Let us take a longer-term look at the matter. We cannot blame the current Postmaster General, as the situation has deteriorated gradually.

Is the Postmaster General aware, in view of the current total breakdown in labour management relations in the Post Office Department, that next week in the city of Washington the postal, telegraph and telephone international unions will be meeting in a world congress and that the major theme of the congress will be industrial democracy in the postal service? I read directly from the union bulletin on the matter—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Does the hon. member have a supplementary question?

Mr. Dinsdale: My supplementary question is this: is the minister aware that this meeting is taking place to discuss joint consultation and workers' participation in the management of postal services and telecommunications as a solution to the postal problems arising out of mechanization and automation, and is the government considering this procedure as a long-term solution to the growing postal mess in Canada?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. gentleman that we are aware of what is going on in the United States. We are in contact with the post office there. We had British officials of the post office here to discuss the matter with them.

I want to rectify something. When the hon. member refers to total breakdown of labour-management relations in the Post Office, I would point out that we have 28 bargaining units who negotiate from time to time in the Post Office, and there is only one that is not in agreement at the moment. Twenty-seven others are all settled.

HEALTH AND WELFARE STAFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. On the issue of the cutbacks in employment in the public service, can the minister give the House an unequivocal assurance, as the Liberal candidate in Ottawa Centre has tried to do, that all of the 650 employees of the Department of National Health and Welfare who have been given their termination notices will still find jobs within the public service?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if you will allow me to answer, I can confirm to the House that some 400 surplus notices sent by my department have been supported by unions representing the employees of my department as giving an early chance to the employees to find another job in the pool of unfilled positions. I therefore hope to rehire those people in other jobs in my department which have been left open for about three quarters of them.

[English]

DEPARTMENTAL STAFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I asked for an unequivocal assurance and I did not receive it. My question is, again, for the President of the Treasury Board. Can he give an unequivocal assurance that the 250 employees of the Department of Public Works, the 500 employees of the Public Service Commission, the 362 at Statistics Canada and the 300 at Central Mortgage and Housing, will still be able to find jobs within the public service?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I answered the same question yesterday in more global terms. We are seeking every avenue to re-employ those public servants whose jobs may be declared redundant, but I will not give an unequivocal guarantee that every single person who is affected can find a job. However, we expect the vast majority will and we will bend every effort to that end.

Mr. Symes: A supplementary question. I ask the minister if he can explain the rationale in firing employees with up to 20 years' experience and those with particular skills. I am thinking of those particularly in the scientific field who obviously will not be placed in positions for which they have been trained and for which they have developed special expertise.

● (1127)

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the exercise of expenditure reductions is a very difficult process. It is, in fact, a painful process and not one which arouses any joy or happiness. However, in our view it is a necessary action for us to take, as a government, at this time.

As I said before, we will do everything we can to alleviate the effect on people directly affected. It is possible that we will not be able to accommodate some people in other jobs. We will institute other measures to make any separation as decent and painless as possible.

PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION STAFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Gérard Laprise (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the President of the Treasury Board who in August last announced a budgetary cut of $15 million from the budget of the Civil Service Commission; $12.5 million of that cut was made at the linguistic program directorate. Considering that a commitment had been made in September, 1977, to the effect that this program would end only in 1983, could the President of the Treasury Board tell us why he does not abide by his commitments and why that budgetary cut applies only to one of the few French units based in the national capital?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Public Service Commission reductions to which the hon. member refers in the area of language training came about as a natural progression of the lessening requirements for such facilities. In fact, regardless of the statement made last fall to which the hon. member refers, it was then apparent that these facilities, as they existed, in fact included a considerable degree of redundancy. The requirements had lessened; therefore, we took the necessary action. The alternative is to keep people employed or to keep facilities occupied which are totally unused, and that certainly is wasteful.

Mr. Laprise: I would like to ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Considering that the government delivers a severe blow to the French fact in Canada when laying off more than 600 French teachers in the civil service, thus retreating in its program of bilingualism, would the President of the Treasury Board reconsider this policy since there are requests for linguistic training from more than 2,000 English-speaking public servants at the present time?

[English]

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, again, I think the figures used by the hon. member are somewhat exaggerated. My information is that closer to 400, rather than 600, people will be affected. In essence, what the hon. member is suggesting—if I interpret his comments correctly—is that people, whether they are French, English or whatever, are kept at jobs that are no longer required, thus carrying an expense to the taxpayer which is no longer justified. It has certainly nothing to do with the continuation of our commitment to bilingualism, national unity, or anything else. To suggest such a thing is, I think, very, very wrong.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

LABOUR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the Postmaster General. I remind him that he has indicated to this House on a number of occasions that he would accept his responsibility and act quickly. However, referring to a press release of his dated June 7, 1978, he indicated there were two problems with the Post Office, one of which involved labour-management relations and the other being how to achieve a faster and more reliable mail service. The press release went on to say, "The discussions of the past three days by the—"

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a question, perhaps he would get to it.

Mr. Alexander: I will put it this way: the Postmaster General has been most ineffective in discharging his responsibilities. What happened? Why did the proposals and the measures that the Postmaster General indicated he had on June 7, 1978, fail so miserably?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, it is difficult to answer a question like that. If the hon. member wants to see what we have done with the Post Office during the last year or so, I will be tabling within the next three days the annual report of the Post Office. In that annual report will be everything that has been done in the Post Office in the last year, so the hon. member will see that we have been efficient.

● (1132)

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, we know what the Postmaster General has done to the Post Office. Let me just say, as he stated in his press release, that he was on the right track on June 7 and had every confidence in the proposal that had been placed before him for consideration. There is a quote by the Postmaster General in the Ottawa Journal of October 10—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member realizes, I am sure, that we are not engaged in debate.

Mr. Alexander: The Prime Minister indicated that he thought a Crown corporation was the answer to the problems that exist in the Post Office. The Postmaster General now says that a Crown corporation is not the answer because of the attitude of the postal workers and because of the mistrust, to use his word, of the government. Does the Postmaster General now say that? In other words, how can we introduce a Crown corporation if there is still this attitude of mistrust of government? Will he kindly answer that question?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I said, and I repeat, that the institution of a Crown corporation in the Post Office is not the solution to all the problems. I said, and I repeat, that it is a step toward finding a better solution for having a more efficient Post Office.

[Mr. Andras.]

Mr. Alexander: I want to remind the Postmaster General of comments he made as a result of questions on March 7.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. If the hon. member has a supplementary question, will he put it directly.

Mr. Alexander: On March 7, the Postmaster General indicated that in the event the solutions he had failed, he would agree with the implementation of a parliamentary inquiry into the problems in the Post Office. Will the Postmaster General keep his word in that regard, because apparently all the solutions the Postmaster General had on the table failed? Will he now implement his undertaking and institute a parliamentary inquiry in order that we can look into all the problems of the Post Office prior to the introduction of a Crown corporation, so we will know just what we are doing? Will he be a gentleman in that regard?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I do not think I ever said that I wanted a parliamentary inquiry, or that I even suggested that. I said that we can take our responsibility as it is. When we table the bill establishing a Crown corporation, the hon. member will have all the latitude he wants to discuss the Post Office. At that time he will be able to make his remarks.

MEASURES TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Considering that indeed we do have a strike right now in the city of Montreal and in the province of Quebec generally, that on numerous occasions in the past the minister told the Canadian people that he is prepared to assume his responsibilities and that yesterday evening he could see that the federal government will not tolerate another strike in the Post Office, what immediate action can we expect this morning on the part of the federal government, in view of the statement made by the minister last night?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, you know very well that it is my duty to be here to answer questions from members of the opposition to enlighten them on the circumstances prevailing in the Post Office at the present time. As the hon. member on the opposition side said, it is true that there is a strike in Montreal and in several other places. I also said, I think, that the government would accept its responsibilities and I take the Prime Minister as witness when he said here yesterday he would take his responsibilities. I think that we did so this morning. I had a consultation with my colleague the Minister of Labour considering that his department has a lot of experience in negotiations, to try a last time to bring the parties together, to try to see if we can come to a negotiated eleventh hour agreement. If we cannot, we shall then take the necessary steps.

Mr. Grafftey: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Like every member of this House, Mr. Speaker, I sincerely hope the minister will succeed in his negotiations this afternoon. But given the statement he made last night to the effect that he will not tolerate another strike in the Post Office and given that, in the province of Quebec, there is a strike going on right now, does the minister have a bill to introduce in the event he should fail in the negotiations this afternoon to solve the problem which now exists in Quebec?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member of the opposition we will take all necessary measures if we fail in this afternoon's negotiations. I would urge him to remain in the House until five o'clock to see what happens then.

AGRICULTURE

FINANCING OF FARM CREDIT CORPORATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. Will he inform the House whether the government is considering making any substantive changes to the Farm Credit Corporation in the coming months?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the chairman of the Farm Credit Corporation. As I said yesterday, we have talked about privatization of those programs in which the government is involved. We are considering different ways. I have asked them to come up with ways and means of financing the Farm Credit Corporation other than by government financing. We hope to come up with some suggestions with regard to that.

The Farm Credit Corporation would still be under the authority of the Government of Canada. However, we think a better job could be done by finding the finances outside of government—at least some of them—and thereby provide an even better service to farmers than at the present time.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I thought the minister would say. With regard to the privatization that it appears will take place within the Farm Credit Corporation, does the minister envisage the Farm Credit Corporation working in far closer concert with the chartered banks and the credit unions in Canada, in terms of the total amount of money that will be loaned to farmers? Also, will the amount of government money going into the Farm Credit Corporation be reduced from the present level?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. member knows there will be a $23 million cut in funds to the Farm Credit Corporation for the next fiscal year. Applications for farm credit loans are greater than my advisers expected. It appears that many people have tremendous confidence in this Minister of Agriculture and this government and want to continue on in agriculture, borrowing sums, buying more land, and so on. The number of applications is far greater than we had anticipated. We are running out of money at this time because of the confidence expressed by their desire to enter agriculture at this time.

FINANCE

REPEAL OF PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER ACT—CONSULTATION WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. In September of this year, the President of the Treasury Board announced the repeal of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. In view of the fact that this action is clearly discriminatory taxation, detrimental to thousands of consumers, particularly in Alberta but in other provinces as well—Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, Quebec and Ontario—will the minister say whether consultation took place with the provinces before this decision was made, and will he also say whether he is prepared to reconsider this action on the part of the government?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, whenever we have to cut expenditures, some programs, of course, are hurt. I am glad the opposition now realize that it is not easy to find areas in which we can make cuts.

On the precise question, I will be meeting with my provincial colleagues at a finance ministers' meeting at the end of the month. I have received notice from some ministers that they want to discuss this matter, and we will certainly be willing to discuss it. Of course, they must realize that we have to find this money because transfer payments to the provinces are very substantial. No area can be exempted from the cuts on which we decide.

Mr. Bawden: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. If the minister is aware of the government's proposal to repeal this act, will he say whether he is familiar with the argument of a former minister of finance, Mr. Sharp, when the legislation was originally passed, that the purpose of the act was to avoid giving inducement to any province to nationalize its utilities, due to the disadvantages of privately-owned utilities compared with publicly-owned utilities?

Does the minister believe the arguments put forward by the government at the time the bill was passed are no longer valid, and will he tell us whether he feels any concern about the possible elimination of privately-owned utilities as a result of this action by the government?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am fully aware of the arguments put forward at that time and now. I have made my representations to the cabinet and to the Minister of Finance, and my colleague has assured me he will discuss this matter fully with his counterparts in the provinces.

FUNDS FOR RESEARCH AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the minister responsible for scientific research, I will address my question to the Minister of Finance. Some months ago the minister responsible for scientific research announced a substantial increase in government support in that field, setting a goal according to which 1.5 per cent of the gross national product will be spent on scientific research and development by 1983.

The budget cuts involving scientific research announced by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board range between $50 million and $60 million. Has the government set a new target date by which time this country will be spending 1.5 per cent of the gross national product on scientific research, as the minister announced several months ago?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, there has been a reordering of certain priorities in that field. In the month of June we did, of course, announce incentives to the private sector to carry out more research and development. We are, naturally, very interested in research and development, but we have to work within the finances available to the federal government.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Speaker, in view of the stated intention in the Speech from the Throne to give increasing support to industries in the fields of manufacturing, energy and transportation, could the minister explain to the House the rationale which has led to cutbacks in research facilities affecting forestry, fisheries and agriculture, areas which provide some of the most important opportunities for employment in this country?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there have been no budgetary cuts, for example, in the field of agricultural research facilities, as the hon. member has suggested. The minister concerned or the responsible ministers have tried to establish priorities in their departments and they have decided to implement some minor changes. However, I must reaffirm that we are still interested in helping Canadian research as much as possible, but in the present economic situation, we must obviously impose budgetary restrictions.

BROADCASTING

CBC NATIONAL NEWS

Mr. Marke Raines (Burnaby-Seymour): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. Is the hon. gentleman concerned because the national news normally broadcast at eleven o'clock on the CBC network seems to have been replaced by coverage of American sports events? Would the Secretary of State consult the CBC to see whether the national news can some day be reinstated and broadcast at the usual hour of eleven o'clock? We are giving a half billion dollars a year to the corporation, yet we are failing to get our national news on schedule.

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I should be happy to draw the representations made by the hon. member to the attention of the CBC authorities.

DEVALUED CANADIAN DOLLAR—EFFECT ON TRADE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Would the minister tell us whether he is content to see our dollar hovering around 84 cents American, bearing in mind that his colleague, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, welcomed a 90-cent dollar?

Does the minister feel an 84-cent dollar is even better, taking into account that the Japanese yen is now 90 per cent higher, that the Swiss franc is 90 per cent higher, and even the Italian lira is 20 per cent higher by comparison with our dollar than was the case two years ago?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian dollar is a floating currency—

An hon. Member: It has sunk.

Mr. Chrétien: —and its value is determined by the market. There are some side effects which are not welcome, but the lower Canadian dollar has some good effects, too. Many people believe the Canadian dollar is undervalued, but in the meantime present levels are helping to make Canadian goods competitive in foreign markets, thus benefiting the economy.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, among the factors contributing to the decline of the dollar are the confusing statements issued by the Minister of Finance. On September 8, for instance, he indicated at a press conference that expenditures anticipated for fiscal 1980 were $52.6 billion, but he refrained from indicating what the government anticipated would be the revenue for that year. Would he inform the House whether it is true that revenues will amount to only $39.3 billion, leaving a shortfall of $13.3 billion in relation to the expenditures he disclosed at that press conference?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I stated at that time that the cash requirement would be $9.7 billion next year. I am planning to make a statement in my budget which will include all the forecasts available to us.

The other day, when the hon. member was not in the House, I explained that the opposition is completely wrong in trying to project a deficit for this year, because hon. members on that side do not keep in mind that we cut income tax at the beginning of the year, that we have compensated the provinces for the cut in the sales tax and, in addition, paid in one payment the unemployment insurance for the month of April. So it was the case that the gap was big at the beginning of the year, but at the end of the year, as my colleagues and I have said so many times, the cash requirements for this fiscal year will be $11.8 billion.

SALE OF GOVERNMENT GRAIN ELEVATORS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture. According to information supplied by his department on January 24, 1977, respecting profits and losses incurred by government inland terminals, during the period 1959-1960 and 1975-1976 the five elevators showed a profit of more than $4 million. If one includes the operation at Prince Rupert, the profit was more than $9 million.

Could the minister advise whether prior to the decision to sell the elevators he discussed the matter with the minister in charge of the Wheat Board? Is the decision to sell, his decision or is it the decision of the President of the Treasury Board?

Hon. E. F. Whelan (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, earlier I answered a question about privatization. I am sure everyone in the good old Conservative party wants to see more of that. The elevators can probably be used to their fullest extent if they are taken over by a private organization. So far, they have never been used to their fullest capacity mainly because grain was directed to them; the private operators would object to grain going through the government-owned terminals. We think the move to which the hon. member refers is a move in the right direction, and this has been a government decision.

Mr. Neil: Mr. Speaker, I think the reason the elevators were not used to their fullest capacity was that the Minister of Agriculture and his colleague, the minister in charge of the Wheat Board, did not take any steps to use them. In view of the fact that employees at the terminals have now received notice to the effect that their positions are surplus, will the hon. gentleman undertake to make it a condition of any sale that the jobs and pensions of these employees will be guaranteed?

Mr. Whelan: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has just made an accusation about the use of the terminals. I am sure he is fully aware, as I am, of the way in which grain is handled and distributed. He knows the reason it was not directed to the government terminals. It was because the elevators in the private sector had to be fully utilized and these elevators were, in most cases, only used when there was no room anywhere else.

As to the other part of the question, yes, we are concerned for these workers and we shall do everything in our power, within our authority, if we are able to make a proper transition of these elevators into the private sector, to ensure that their welfare will be looked after.

LOTO CANADA

CONTRACT FOR COMPUTER SERVICES

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport). In June of last year the hon. lady told the country and the House that Loto Canada had entered into a $24 million contract with General Instruments in the United States to provide computer services for its new gaming procedures. We found last week that Loto Canada had withdrawn from that contract and is no longer proposing that game.

Can the minister tell us how much money was expended by either Loto Canada or the federal government in adopting the sole-source approach it did and then withdrawing?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the matter is presently under negotiation with the contractor and the provinces. Consequently, I cannot state a figure at this time. However, I shall be pleased to advise the hon. member when I do have a figure available.

DEPARTMENT OF TRANSPORT STAFF REDUCTIONS

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the President of the Treasury Board: it arises out of the cutbacks announced affecting the Department of Transport.

• (1152)

With regard to the $72 million proposed cutback which will be generated through increased revenues which will be credited to the air transport program, can the minister be more explicit on how the federal government intends to generate this additional revenue?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport will be making some comments on that matter on the appropriate occasion.

Mr. Mazankowski: Since this seems to be a rather unique method in the application of restraint, simply increasing taxes rather than cutting back expenditures, I ask the President of the Treasury Board whether consideration is being given to increasing the airport user fees, is consideration being given to raising the airport tax, or will it be a combination of both, all of which will have the effect of increasing the cost of air travel in this country?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, when and if those decisions are taken finally, they will be announced by the Minister of Transport.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

RCMP REPORT ON ALLEGED WRONGFUL CONDUCT OF SENATOR LUCIER

Mr. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice, but in his absence I should like to direct it to the acting minister, who I assume is the Solicitor General. In view of the fact that the RCMP investigation was completed several months ago into the alleged wrongful conduct of Senator Lucier of the other place and Commissioner Pearson of Whitehorse in respect of the alleged offences of forgery and swearing of false affidavits, has that police report been submitted to the Crown attorneys in Whitehorse for consideration of whether or not charges should be laid, or has it been referred to the department in Ottawa for such consideration?

Included in that reply, may I be advised whether that decision will be made by the Crown attorney in Whitehorse or by the department in Ottawa?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Acting Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Justice I will look into the question directed to him by the hon. gentleman and will provide him with a reply on Monday.

Mr. Nielsen: Could the minister also respond to the question of whether or not a decision, if charges are to be laid, will be withheld until after the election in the Yukon, which will be on November 20?

Mr. Blais: It is my information that the investigation is ongoing and, as I understand it, full details will be made available. I will be pleased to ask the Minister of Justice to report to the hon. gentleman on Monday.

ALLEGED POLITICAL PRESSURE ON CBC

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State. This week, Mr. Peter Kent, former news reader of the CBC national news, repeated his very serious charges that officials of the Prime Minister's office had pressured the CBC management, which had the effect of intimidating or manipulating them.

I ask the Secretary of State, who is responsible to parliament for the CBC, whether he is prepared to accept his responsibility and move a motion in the House of Commons that the whole matter of the allegations made by Mr. Kent be referred to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts, where officials of the CBC, of the Prime Minister's office and Mr. Kent can be called upon to testify?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, of course, I am always prepared to accept my responsibilities, but I am not sure that the course of action suggested by the hon. member would be the most responsible one in the circumstances. After all, the statements to which the hon. member has referred have been very strongly contested by the representatives of the CBC before the CRTC hearings. I think it is proper for CRTC to make its assessment and present its report.

The hon. member, as indeed all members of the House, will have ample opportunities for questioning the CBC on its view of the matter when the estimates of the CBC are before the committee of the House. I doubt very much that the kind of special reference which the hon. member has requested is appropriate at this time, but I will take his representation into consideration.

Mr. Beatty: I wonder if I could have clarification from the minister. Is the Secretary of State saying that because the management of the CBC has not accepted Mr. Kent's statement that they have been manipulated or intimidated, it is not necessary for parliament to look into this matter? May I ask the Secretary of State whether he feels that the CRTC has the authority to police the actions of officials of the Prime Minister's office to ensure that those actions are always proper and above board?

Mr. Roberts: No, I do not think I did say that, to reply to the first part of the question. In reply to the second part, I simply suggested it would be reasonable to see what CRTC's assessment is.

PROPOSED CHANGES TO PROGRAM—EFFECT ON PROVINCES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I should like to direct my question to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the fact that the provinces have estimated the impact of the proposed unemployment insurance changes on the cost of provincial welfare budgets to be something in the order of $200 million, in view of the fact that yesterday the minister admitted that the federal government would pick up 50 per cent of any adverse impact on the welfare budgets of the provinces, and in view of the fact that the minister also stated in the House yesterday that he has set up a joint federal-provincial committee to consider the impact of such changes, can the President of the Treasury Board assure the House that, instead of doing things arse backwards, we will not bring in legislation before—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I think the hon. member should re-examine his choice of words.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON DRILLING IN DAVIS STRAIT—EFFECT ON ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question relates to the report on the news program "The World at Eight" this morning. In the absence of the Minister of the Environment, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, may I ask the appropriate acting minister whether the environmental assessment review panel has approved drilling activity in the Davis Strait, off the coast of Baffin Island; and if that is the case, would the minister or the acting minister agree to table that report today in the House?

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I understand that the environmental review panel is preparing a report following public meetings in the eastern Arctic, but this report has not been made available either to the Minister of the Environment or to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development and, therefore, we cannot comment on it.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INVITATION TO PRESIDENT SADAT TO VISIT CANADA

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. In light of his commendable expression of views on the Camp David meetings, can he now advise us whether President Sadat has accepted an invitation to visit this country; and, if so, for what tentative date?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The President was invited and has accepted to come in principle. At one point he had considered coming here after the Camp David meetings, but now he has asked that the visit take place some time later in the course of the present session. The initiative is up to them now to fix a date. They are welcome to come.

URBAN AFFAIRS

INQUIRY WHETHER GOVERNMENT INTENDS TO INCREASE FUNDS FOR RRAP

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. The government indicated in the Speech from the Throne that they wanted to continue their policy aimed at helping the poor. Since RRAP is, first, at least in my region, a program which is used by people who have not been able to keep their houses in a good state of repair and who would like to take advantage of this program since there is financial assistance attached to it and, second, because that program permits workers to work at renovating those houses, could the minister tell the House if he hopes to have additional funds earmarked for that program in order to meet the great number of applications which have already been made under that program?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, this is a program we would like to make universal to enable every citizen wherever he lives in Canada to take advantage of it. As hon. members know, that program now applies only in certain designated areas and certain city districts; yet we hope to be able to make it universal within the next few months and of course to have in hand additional funds to meet the demand.

Mr. Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the minister's desire to expand this program. I commend him for this. However, my question and my concern are more immediate than the project the minister just mentioned. I would like to know what will happen. Representations have been made to me again last week since they have taken charge of the administration of this program at the level of the riding council. They receive a lot of applications and do not have enough money to meet them. I would like to know whether the minister can tell us if additional funds will be set aside for this program in the immediate future.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the program budget has been doubled in the last few months. This obviously allows a good number of applications to be met, but you have to realize the demand is so high we cannot meet it immediately. So priorities must be established, that is answer first the applications filed by the more indigent people, those living in the oldest houses that are the most urgently in need of repairs, and then consider the applications of those living in areas that have already been designated for renovation purposes. We would like to have billions of dollars and I believe we could spend them all. Unfortunately, in a context of budgetary restrictions, it is impossible for us to obtain as much money as we would like.

POINTS OF ORDER

MR. LAMBERT (BELLECHASSE)—RADIO-CANADA

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I will make it short. I want to do justice to Radio-Canada. I have occasionally had some very harsh criticisms for Radio-Canada's management, and I have always made them known. This morning, I learned that it accomplished its information role fairly yesterday by broadcasting the speeches of the four spokesmen for the political parties of this House. I would ask the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), who is accountable for Radio-Canada in this House, to tell them of my satisfaction and to encourage them to continue in this direction.

MR. COSSITT—ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, while it may seem early in this session to draw attention to questions on the order paper which have not been answered, I feel justified in bringing to the attention of the House questions which are presently listed as Nos. 9 and 19 on the order paper. Question No. 9 has been on various order papers for several years, and No. 19 has been on the order paper for approximately the same length of time.

Question No. 9 concerns the fingerprinting of public servants and asks why this invasion of privacy has taken place. Specifically it asks why public servants are being fingerprinted, especially those who are in positions not of a sensitive nature; how many have been fingerprinted; and how many have refused to be fingerprinted. Perhaps it is common knowledge on Parliament Hill that the number runs into the thousands. It is time the government provided us with this answer, because it has been outstanding for approximately a year or two.

In regard to question No. 19, it concerns the probable misuse of the Unemployment Insurance Commission computer in the city of Montreal by certain individuals employed by UIC. Originally I raised this in the House, and subsequently the Royal Canadian Mounted Police appointed an investigation to be officially carried out on this matter. I was contacted by the RCMP for information, which I supplied to them. Presumably the investigation has been proceeding for about six months to a year. It is finished, and I would think by now that the government would have the answer to this question in its hands. Yet, I have information from people within the department indicating that the minister has issued orders to stonewall the answer to this question. This is a very, very serious matter if it is true.

Any member has the right to rise, after a year or two, and ask for an end to the nonsense we are receiving from the parliamentary secretary and others in the government that questions are being answered so well, giving high percentages and so on. The government only answers questions which do not embarrass it politically. It is time for the government to commence telling Canadians the truth. It talks about freedom of information and what should be done about it, but the government sets the poorest example Canadians will probably ever see. Can the parliamentary secretary tell us now what he is going to do about questions Nos. 9 and 19?

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the member can rest assured because, budgetary restraints notwithstanding, it is not our intention to restrict our customary performance in answering the many questions on the order paper, and I think that the hon. member has every reason to believe that he will once again be spoiled by parliament in this new session.

Let me only remind the House that during this past session 78 of his 106 questions were answered, that is about 75 per cent, and that he has no reason to expect unfair treatment in the coming period. As for his suggestion about the minister's attitude towards one or several questions asked by the hon. member or other members of the House, I trust that the hon. member did not really mean what he has implied. There was never any question on the part of the minister or anybody else on this side of the House to intervene to ask our staff to delay or even refuse answering the members' questions. It is important for parliament to know that we do all in our power to answer as precisely, as completely and as often as possible the very many questions on the order paper, which often require very lengthy and costly research. However, it is not on account of high costs to the taxpayers that we are reducing our efforts to answer the very large number of questions put by hon. members, especially the very many questions from the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt) requiring much research. There has never been any interference by the government about those questions even if, in my opinion, the Canadian public could do without them. Still it is not up to me to judge the matter, Mr. Speaker, so I wish to reassure the hon. member that parliament is doing its utmost to answer all those questions as thoroughly as possible.

It is physically impossible during a session to answer all questions, Mr. Speaker. However, as I mentioned the day before yesterday, we have answered almost 75 per cent of the questions in the last session and even more and the hon. member particularly got answers to 75 per cent of his questions in the last session, and God knows he did ask an awful lot. Nothing is top secret in our business. We will resume serious consideration of his questions. We will not make any obstruction and he will continue to enjoy the outstanding treatment that parliament has always given him in the past.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 12, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 27), and the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent) (p. 45).

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I was in the process of pointing out an obvious fact and truth about the leaders' day presentation. We witnessed a situation where the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) gave a prime ministerial direction, an inspiring address about the direction in which he felt the country should be headed. On the other hand we had the unusual situation where we found the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) again preoccupied with carping criticism. As the former vice-president of the United States, Mr. Spiro Agnew, once said about a certain enemy of his, "He was a nattering nabob of negativism".

Canadians have had enough of this Prime Minister and the manner in which on every occasion, whenever there is a difficult time or difficult issue to face, he rises and acts as the critic and complains about the proposals of other people, blames Canadians, the press, or anyone he can; but accepts absolutely no responsibility for his leadership as Prime Minister of the country. I commend my own leader for the manner in which he filled the void we have in Canada and in parliament, as far as presenting concrete, constructive, and positive proposals for the recovery of our economy and our national unity.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I should like to continue with my observations concerning why we are here at this time. We are faced with an unexpected parliament, a time when most of us thought we would have an opportunity to place our positions before Canadians. It is a parliament which was called by a Prime Minister who, quite frankly, was afraid to deal with the electorate at this time because of a certainty of being defeated at the polls.

● (1212)

At the conclusion of my remarks last night I was making the suggestion that what we need now is an election to clear the air, with an opportunity for a new mandate. The problem resulting from the extension of this parliament is, and continues to be, that the proposals by the government in power at this time tend to be those very heavily weighted in favour of political consideration. Regardless of who the victor is at the polls, I am certain that, following such an election, a new government would have the opportunity of introducing an economic plan, as an example, in the context of carrying the plan forward over a period of four or four and a half years. I am sure that we in this party will have that opportunity as a result of being successful.

All we have before us now in the Speech from the Throne is a series of suggested so-called cutbacks, completely out of context with what we need in this country at this time. My leader pointed out that we need not only a period of restraint but some fundamental changes in terms of government restraint. On the other hand we require some economic stimulus in order to get our economy moving, to increase our productivity performance, bringing us back into a competitive position with other industrialized nations of the world.

The fact of the matter is that the options open to this government and this parliament are severely and seriously limited. We simply do not have any room in which to operate. This government, when it intends to make fundamental changes, must always consider the political consequences. Therefore it is unable to bring forward the kind of fundamental program my leader outlined in his speech yesterday, and to which the Prime Minister took such great exception in that most negative and unfortunate demonstration he put on here in the House yesterday.

Let me recall to the memory of hon. members of the House that at the time of the last election the Prime Minister made a great issue of the question of leadership. He is again in the position of a sort of macho figure, standing on the train platform, indicating the kind of leadership he could give as opposed to that of the Leader of the Opposition. He did that in respect of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) in the past. I am sure hon. members on the other side have been hearing the same things I have heard, about how unfortunate it was that the hon. member for Halifax did not have the opportunity to serve as prime minister as opposed to the man now filling that post.

At the last campaign the man who has led our country into the position in which it now finds itself used the same tactics he displayed yesterday in the House. He believes he can go back to that well a number of times, using the same tactics. Let me inform the Prime Minister in no uncertain terms that, from my reading of the electorate, I am sure this particular ploy will not work again, except, perhaps, with those rapidly diminishing hard-bitten supporters he has in this country who still have some faith in the Prime Minister and his party.

In his speech yesterday afternoon the Prime Minister indicated, at least to me, a certain desperateness, particularly in the way in which he spoke and in the negative approach he adopted. Having regard to the position the Prime Minister will occupy in this area in terms of our history writers, I am sure he must now wonder what will be his outstanding contribution. I wonder if he has given any thought at all to what will be the outstanding aspect of his period of office, now something over ten years. The only thing I can think of would be the Prime Minister's unfortunate implementation of the War Measures Act. How would you like to go down in history as the prime minister of this country whose only claim to fame was the implementation of the War Measures Act, much to his own and his government's disgrace? If you were in his position now, what would you want to do in order to leave some sort of legacy?

In my estimation the Prime Minister is withdrawing more and more from a consideration of advice, and is becoming more than preoccupied with the whole matter of constitutional reform. This is indicated by the urgency of implementation and the arbitrary deadline set and reiterated by him again yesterday. This whole matter has become an obsession with him. It is my belief that he intends to move in this area, notwithstanding the consequences to the country, with the idea that somehow only he should have the opportunity to decide what kind of a constitution we should have in Canada.

Let me point out the danger inherent in this attitude demonstrated by the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister is becoming more and more isolated, particularly in matters relating to the constitution and matters concerning the economy of our country. He has become more and more withdrawn, seeking the advice of perhaps only two or three people on his own staff. He no longer consults to any degree with his cabinet. His cabinet colleagues have become superfluous to the whole process. What we are observing in Canada is a breakdown of what we term the traditional parliamentary cabinet system.

Incidentally, I was amazed yesterday to hear the Prime Minister's comments as to how the hand applause from this side was a terrible departure from British parliamentary tradition. Apparently the Prime Minister is unaware that in the United Kingdom members do not have desks to pound. That fact has obviously escaped his attention. Of course, he attempts in his rhetoric here to be an expert. He tries to appear or pretend to be knowledgeable on all such matters.

We have observed this obvious breakdown of cabinet government under this Prime Minister. What have been the consequences of that breakdown? I suggest there are four basic consequences. One of the great virtues of cabinet government is that its structure lends itself to decision-making after all the major points of view have been considered. The quality of decision depends on the extent of prior adversary discussion. When discussion formerly took place in full cabinet it was likely that most of the available options were considered.

What we have now is unilateral action by this Prime Minister. He has made apparently serious statements on national television about the future destiny of this country in terms of the economy, without prior consultation with members of his cabinet. This fact is supported by the surprise shown by cabinet ministers on being told about his statement, and by the bumbling and stumbling effort of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) to justify the position adopted by the government in the last months.

This withdrawal from the traditional practice of cabinet government in our country, together with his authoritarian, arrogant, and insular attitude, has resulted in a reduction of consultation with his own cabinet to almost none. Members of his own party sit back, not to their credit, and continue to support this man with his non-consultative leadership.

We do not have to speculate about his supporters' attitude toward his actions in terms of the constitution. A long-time supporter of the Prime Minister's party, Senator Lang, outlined this very eloquently at the Joint Committee on the Constitution. He said that the constitutional proposals in the bill were never discussed in Liberal caucus at any time prior to presentation by the Prime Minister in this House. That is the kind of consultation we get from the Prime Minister. That is the shoddy way in which he treats the backbenchers in his party as well as his cabinet ministers. As a result, they are now becoming a laughing stock in terms of government throughout the world.

Where is this sense of leadership that we have heard about? Where is this great Prime Minister leading us to, aside from his carping and criticism at the first opportunity he has to demonstrate leadership when he comes into this House and gives us no specific, constructive direction as a country? We got nothing but an act which did him shame.

Cabinet government has meant in the past that cabinet has had to contain a number of able and strong-minded ministers who have the trust and confidence of the Prime Minister. In this changed reality it seems no longer to be a political advantage to have strong and able ministers in the cabinet, but rather something of a disadvantage to this Prime Minister. Such a man seems to interfere with the plans and wishes of the Prime Minister and his personal entourage. This is why, in the last three to four years, we have had the situation where one after the other of the stronger—that is a relative term respecting this government—ministers left this particular cabinet. It is hardly assuring that the most prominent departing ministers were those responsible for the government departments dealing with the finances and economy of our country.

I recall very vividly the umbrage taken by a past minister of finance, I believe it was Mr. Turner, when the Prime Minister surrounded himself with his own set of economists, the group of seven, and simply superseded the advice and decisions made by the minister's office and Department of Finance officials. This is the kind of leadership that this man gives.

In a federal country the minister has always had a role to play in representing his region. The danger with the breakdown we are now experiencing in cabinet rule in this country is that, more and more, we find the situation where ministers are having less and less influence in the important decisions with respect to our country. It is no wonder we are suffering the greatest stresses with respect to regional dissatisfaction that we have ever experienced in the history of our country in the time that we have had this government in office.

Cabinet solidarity is an important concept which has gone by the board with this government. Cabinet solidarity is important because it means that the decisions made, notwithstanding their difficulty, have only been arrived at after difficult, internal, adversary discussion. We have lost that now and are being ruled by one man and a small clique of his own personal staff which he has built up consistently since he came into office, a rather elaborate and large apparatus in his own department.

I want to deal briefly, Mr. Speaker, in the time I have available to me, with some other examples of the kind of leadership and disgraceful performance put on by the Prime Minister yesterday afternoon, a time when he had the opportunity to deal with current issues of some importance. We in western Canada have been forgotten and left out absolutely in the Speech from the Throne. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) may smile, but he well understands that there are serious problems in western Canada because he is one who has had a long association with that part of the country. The fact of the matter is that there was no attention whatsoever paid to the important matters relating to transportation when you consider the grain transportation problems we are facing and the way in which the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is attempting to undermine the excellent recommendations of the Hall commission. It is a disgrace that there is nothing set forward in this extended parliament by the government with respect to the difficulties we are experiencing in grain movement.

Another example of the Prime Minister's poor leadership is the way he has handled the resource issues, the way in which he simply and arbitrarily dismissed the right of the Atlantic provinces to offshore resources and minerals. This was an insult to every person and coastal province in this country. The Prime Minister will be extremely sorry, notwithstanding the rhetoric of the position he took yesterday which was further evidence of his arrogant and, indeed, impudent attitude toward both sides and both ends of this country. He has written off Atlantic and western Canada. He understands now that he must concentrate on seeking support in the two central provinces or he will be gone, and that is what we will be seeing in this parliament. We will be seeing an absolute dismissal of these two important regions, Atlantic and western Canada.

What about the Post Office, Mr. Speaker? What kind of leadership has he given there? On August 1 he was full of vim and vigour, "We are going to act with respect to the Post Office." They have done nothing but taunt the union in question, CUPW. They put big ads in the paper saying to the effect, "What a bunch of buffoons these people are for making these demands." Is that the kind of leadership we want, an attempt to create a confrontation before a parliamentary session so that the Prime Minister can walk into parliament and say, "Here is legislation, bring them back to work"? Is that strength in leadership?

I mentioned the area of resource development. The way this government has dealt with the provinces with respect to taxation matters in resource areas has led to some serious questions with respect to provincial rights in the resource field. The Prime Minister takes the attitude somehow—and we in western Canada are very cognizant of the importance of resources to our economies, particularly Alberta and Saskatchewan and, indeed, any area where there are resources—in a unilateral and arbitrary way that we are responsible for the infrastructure and management of our resources, but we have no powers with respect to benefits from and royalties on those resources.

As one pollster indicated, he would have only five members from western Canada. If he is not careful he will find he will have absolutely zero members, because the message will be brought back to him very clearly. In the very short time I have left, I would like to deal—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may, however, continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: For reasons which I indicated earlier, I must tell this House of my party's feelings about the necessity of a new mandate for a new government to look at economic policy and context. The NDP party has, over the course of the last few years of this term of parliament, supported positions with respect to economic policies and initiatives which we have taken, and have had divergent points of view on others. We have welcomed their support when they have come on board with us, even though their basic philosophy is somewhat different from ours.

With regard to the subamendment put forward in the name of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent), I would like to say that under the present circumstances and context of our economy, and in view of what we consider to be the proper attitude with respect to development of our economy, it seems we would be unable to support the motion. The heavy emphasis which that party places on embarking on a new program of public sector investment is one which we in the province of Saskatchewan have particular knowledge of and one which we in Canada, in view of the present involvement of government in every aspect of our lives, have every reason to want to question. In conclusion I simply say that we in this party do not propose to support the subamendment of the NDP in the context of some of the suggestions and proposals put forward in the course of the subamendment, at the time of the vote this afternoon.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the additional time that was given to me.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, it was a joy to listen to the member for Saskatoon-Biggar (Mr. Hnatyshyn) speak on the philosophy of that policital party he belongs to, because it was never very clear when I was a member of it.

• (1232)

The new leader of that political party was known for his leftist tendencies, and if he is attempting to project what might be called a small "c" conservative philosophy now, it does not fit him very well and can be seen through very easily. I was amused by the speech he gave to the House yesterday afternoon which was very well orchestrated. He must have practised it beforehand quite a bit. He seemed to get run down in places from time to time and had to puff himself up to keep going.

It is rather amusing to me that in the speech he indicated several times that when he is prime minister things will be different. Here is a boy wonder who flunked out of law school, who has not made a five-cent piece in business since then, and who thinks that automatically the people of Canada should choose him to run the country. I find it impossible to comprehend how one could have that much confidence in oneself when it is so shallowly placed.

The basic thrust of the Speech from the Throne will be continued through the thirtieth parliament—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the hon. member, for purposes of clarification that he, possibly innocently, has misled the House again. His allegations with respect to the law school history of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) are completely unfounded. Maybe the minister would want to outline how many degrees he has, before he starts criticizing other people.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I suggest to the hon. member that this is a point of debate, not a point of order.

Mr. Horner: If he did not flunk out he proceeded to get out, because he knew he could not pass. With regard to my degrees, I guess they are well known all across Canada. The school of hard knocks is one of them. If anybody wants to look up my debt picture and the attempts I have made to borrow money and raise money and make a dollar, that also is well known across Canada.

Mr. Woolliams: How is your credit?

Mr. Horner: My credit is still pretty good, financially and politically.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I did not put my money in the Bank of Western Canada which was promoted some years ago by an hon. member on the other side of the House. I had more faith in western Canada.

As I was saying, Mr. Speaker, one thing is clear in this debate and will probably run through the entire thirtieth parliament, and that is that we have a healthy economy and a strong, confident, private sector in our country. We will be taking a number of measures to assist private enterprise as we believe that it can effectively do the job and provide many, many more permanent jobs in Canada. Certainly we intend to give responsible leadership, and I think the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) demonstrated that in his speech yesterday. Certainly it was an expression of confidence, not like the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) who, as I said, puffed himself up from time to time with one complaint after another, and seemed to have a split personality. Not long ago I read about somebody who had 12 personalities and woke up and found himself another person. I would not accuse the Leader of the Opposition of having twelve personalities; as my colleague here suggests, he has not even got one good one. I guess that is true.

Confidence and responsible leadership go together. The business community is becoming more and more confident, as can be seen in investment figures and surveys of investment intentions in this country because this government has demonstrated that it is committed to assisting private business growth. We have done so in a number of ways which add up to a co-ordinated set of policy directions toward a growth oriented economy. As a result, while unemployment and inflation still are too high, Canada is working its way through the difficult world economic problems better than are most countries. Certainly the Prime Minister dealt with that subject at length yesterday. It was nice to see some honest admission of this fact instead of the old myths that we cannot be competitive and that our industry is not competitive with the rest of the world. Instead of crying the blues, as we hear from time to time from the other side of the House, it was nice to see someone admit their confidence in the businessmen of Canada and say that businessmen are not a group of dummies who must have their hands held when they go to the bathroom. I would rather build confidence than confusion.

Another myth spread by the "fearful Freddies" opposite is that our businessmen cannot compete, unless it is in raw resources, because they are too backward, too inefficient, too unsophisticated in their products. I will be releasing in a few days a factual study of Canada's export performance from 1960 to 1977. It will make remarkable reading, and I commend it to members of the opposition parties.

They talk all the time over there about our rising deficit on so-called end products or fully manufactured goods yet our exports of end products have increased much faster than our imports of end products. In 1977 we exported nearly 20 times more of end products than we exported in 1960; we imported in 1977 less than five times the imports of end products in 1960. Instead of a rising deficit in end products, it has fallen from about 21 per cent of our total trade turnover—exports plus imports—in 1960, to 12.7 per cent in 1977.

Canadian export growth was stronger than the world average during that period that we studied, the period from 1960 to 1977 when the average annual increase of Canadian exports was 13.2 per cent, which is certainly far higher than the growth of the total economy. This is of vital importance to Canada when we consider how important export trade is to our country in relation to other countries. Approximately 25 per cent of our GNP is dependent upon our exports. If we wanted to relate that to what many people consider to be the great trading nation of the world, Japan, it must be noted that 13 per cent of their GNP is dependent upon exports. In the United States less than 6 per cent of their GNP is dependent on exports.

We must and we have paid strict attention to our exports, and we can be proud of the rate of growth of the export of finished products over the years.

Over the same period there has been a strong shift in the composition of our exports toward manufactured goods, with a decline in the shares of farm exports and metal ores. There has been a major increase in the export orientation of Canadian manufacturing at the same time as we have had an increase in imports of manufactured goods. Without trying to present too many statistics to the House today, I would point out that the proportion of our trade in manufactured form rose steadily from 8 per cent in 1960 to 46 per cent in 1977. This shows the steady increase in our ability to sell fully manufactured goods on the world market. The share of manufactured products as a whole, including fabricated goods such as aluminum ingots, rose from 60 per cent in 1960 to 77 per cent in 1977.

Last year alone this country exported $1.3 billion worth of machinery and equipment to the developing world, not to mention billions of dollars worth to the United States, Europe and Japan. We are out there and we are active. Probably no other industrial country in the past 15 years has seen so remarkable a transformation of its commodity trade pattern, and all the while our timid friends opposite were saying that Canadian businessmen could not hack it. Some of them are even saying we must go back to being hewers of wood and drawers of water. We need no longer depend upon that fact at all. While I have nothing against hewers of wood and drawers of water, it is clearly recognizable that you cannot employ too many people if you confine yourself to those types of industry, and we are not.

Let us talk about industrial output and the use of the International Monetary Fund and the OECD as our sources. Since before the recession of 1973-74, Canada and the United States have had about the same growth in industrial output, that is, mining, manufacturing and utilities. This is far ahead of any other major industrial nation, and far ahead of all of our largest export markets.

From 1973 to 1978 we have been second only to Japan, and not by much in growth in our gross national product in real terms. We have had by far the strongest growth in employment of any industrial country, and the Prime Minister dealt with those figures yesterday. Even in prices we have done better than most industrial countries. West Germany has done better, and the United States moderately better.

Those are Canadian businessmen out there, scoring remarkable achievements. Certainly they deserve some confidence from the politicians, and we are prepared to give them all the confidence we can. We have confidence that they really know what they are doing and that they can do their jobs best. What are their opportunities? They have useful views as to what the government can do to help them so nearly a year ago I went to the private sector and the provinces to find out what the most responsible actions would be for the federal and provincial governments to take in order to encourage industrial growth.

We set up 23 individual industry sector task forces composed of business and labour, with the provinces and the federal government having modest representation. They have sent their reports to me and to the provincial ministers of industry. The federal government is now going over all of them with a fine tooth comb.

A second committee has been composed strictly of senior business and labour executives, along with a neutral academic. They are assessing the complete role of the 23 sector reports in order to draw out the common threads of policy recommendations. The second tier committee report will be coming to me very shortly, and naturally it will be sent to the provincial ministers as soon as possible. In fact, we expect it next week.

Federal and provincial deputy ministers of industry will be discussing the second tier and the sector reports in a few weeks. Provincial ministers and myself will follow their example early in November, and the first ministers of Canada will be meeting at the end of November to discuss and identify the policy recommendations that are made. All of this, in my opinion, is a responsible and competent building agenda for action, based upon the best assessment of men and women out there as to what government can do, or can stay out of, to help them grow.

While this process was going on, the government was moving in areas where there already was a consensus that changes were needed, and indeed, the views of the individual sector reports found expression in our recent economic announcements.

Hon. members know from the screams they hear that the government is seriously cutting back its spending, and cutting back the size and intervention of the public service. Most of the screams are coming from the other side, which cries out for cutting government spending but which whimpers when, inevitably, someone is hurt.

Hon. members know that federal government employment is being held at zero growth. However, some layoffs are occuring. Public service salaries will be legislated to prevent them outpacing those in the private sector. The Economic Council of Canada is working at practical means to try to reduce the extent and cost of government regulation to industry. We are spending more on job creation with money saved through the more selective application of unemployment insurance payments and family allowances.

In the past year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) introduced means and measures to stimulate employment, production, and investment, for example, the reduction of sales taxes, extension of the investment tax credit, the introduction of wage subsidies, and the incentives for industrial R and D. My own department and agencies reporting to me have made very large increases in our support to Canadian industry. I might mention we are assisting Canadian industry in all parts of Canada, including western Canada. We have done a great deal to help the oil and gas industry, particularly in Alberta, within the last year.

The announcements made by the Prime Minister, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), and the Minister of Finance, in August were a further demonstration of our commitment to economic growth and prudent management. The Minister of Finance announced total new cash outlays of $300 million in 1979-80 in support of economic development. There will be $65 million in new money for tourism and the resource industries. There will be about $28 million for industrial support programs, about $70 million for shipbuilding and repair facilities, and further amounts of money for more major capital projects.

I have taken some time to illustrate the responsible and the united or co-ordinated nature of the government's economic approach, Mr. Speaker. Reducing the economic shares of the country demanded by government, freeing resources to give private enterprise more room, providing supportive government policies in an attempt to improve investment confidence, all these were objectives worked out by federal departments together. The policies mesh, and they mesh within the context of six main policy directions that this government keeps before it. It is a framework for upgrading the position of the private sector as our economy heads into the competitive challenges of the 1980s.

First, Canadian growth and expansion should be fuelled as much as possible by private Canadian funds. That means government restraint and budget cutting will continue to free more resources for yet more growth.

Second, government policies, both provincial and federal, must be directed at growth. I am talking about a whole range of policies regulating quality control, environmental issues, competition, intellectual property, and paper burden requirements. The federal government will protect the legitimate objectives of these policies, but we will strive to design them to keep to a minimum the constraints on industrial growth.

Third, we will see that the required economic infrastructure is in place. This will include transportation facilities such as roads, harbours, railways, pipelines, power and energy facilities. We will contribute in three ways: we will facilitate and speed up the approval of private sector projects for the Alcan pipeline; we will increase our support for infrastructure projects through the Department of Regional Economic Expansion; we will make direct contributions to certain important projects. A list of major projects which could move ahead in the next two years is being reviewed.

Fourth, to be successful in the competitive 1980s, Canada will need very highly trained and skilled manpower. Federal manpower training programs are being revised to increase substantially the amount of skills and on-the-job training support. We are working on improving manpower mobility in Canada.

Fifth, because of the dependence upon new technology for future growth, the government has already enriched its R and D incentives in the tax systems. Now we are committed to a further program that will increase Canada's R and D expenditures toward 1.5 per cent of the gross national product in the early 1980s. The program will be designed to ensure that most of the new R and D will be done within industry itself.

Sixth, and maybe closest to my heart today, is the improvement of industrial support programs and services. I will complete my speech by expanding upon this point.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Intelligence! Yesterday, the Prime Minister spoke about the intelligence over there.

My department was one of those that escaped rather lightly with regard to budget cuts, I am happy to say. On the contrary, we are increasing our spending in the area of industrial support programs. The $28 million I mentioned earlier will be spent next year. We will double our expenditures in the year 1980-81 in this area again, to $100 million, and the increases will go on substantially throughout the first half of the new decade.

The federal government is increasing its spending while cutting back elsewhere, precisely because of our policy commitment of placing first priority on industrial growth through private enterprise. This government's priority is not new. It is being deepened by my department. Last year we authorized projects worth $125 million, and we are moving well ahead of that this year. In fact if one goes back, September to September, we have authorized projects to a total of about $159 million. In the fiscal year we will well exceed the $125 million of the last fiscal year. The Federal Business Development Bank last year made loans of $479 million, 25 per cent of them to the manufacturing industry, up 13 per cent from the previous year, and they have greatly increased their management consulting services.

The Export Development Corporation signed more than $1 billion in loans to foreign buyers for Canadian manufactured goods, directly increasing and maintaining something in the neighbourhood of 200,000 jobs in Canada.

The changes in our funded program within my department and related agencies reflecting the additional $28 million, will come into place in 1979, after consultation with the provinces on administrative details.

One of the most important changes that I am announcing in the House today is that we will make available under the enterprise development program up to $1 billion for insuring loans at the chartered banks for private industry Up until this time, the enterprise development program had a limit of $350 million. We are expanding that to $1 billion.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: Before some members opposite run off and say that we are spending $1 billion, I want to emphasize that what we are doing is insuring loans that the banks make to enterprises which can prove that they are justified. We insure 90 per cent of the loan and, in some cases, if it is an innovative, new idea, 100 per cent.

This is an expression of confidence by this government in the business community and in their ability to meet the challenges of the eighties. This might be called last resort financing in the form of government loss insurance for loans made by private lending institutions. Since it is a revolving authority, as loans are repaid new insurance can be provided. As a result, more than $1 billion will be made available in term debt to help companies expand or go into new activity.

I might say that last year some 256 companies were helped by this program. Only seven of those 256 were not of Canadian ownership. I want to point that out, because we are helping Canadians. It is an expression of confidence by Canadians in the Canadian economy that we are helping.

The enterprise development board is a central board. It is here in Ottawa. In addition, we have set up ten boards in the provinces, all led by businessmen who spend their funds through direct loans and grants and also through such high level devices as loan guarantees and risk insurance. An additional $28 million for 1979-80 will actually provide support to the industry of about $100 million. Through the first half of the next ten years, it is projected that the funds will provide more than $1.3 billion worth of support.

The enterprise development program, of course, is not all that the federal government does to encourage industry in Canada. As I mentioned, the Export Development Corporation, the Federal Business Development Bank and the Small Businesses Loans Act, together with the Department of Trade's other services, in 1977-78 provided support to Canadian industry of $3.7 billion and were directly involved in 197,000 projects, mostly smaller and medium-sized businesses in Canada.

A new and improved enterprise development program will broaden this criteria to include more smaller and medium-sized businesses. My colleague, the Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott) has been successful in arguing their case. He will now have the enjoyable job of explaining to small businessmen what there is and how they can get it.

The flexibility of the enterprise development program to encourage mergers and acquisitions will be increased by several new measures. Support for research, design, and development is going up markedly. More money is being provided for export market development and sales promotion, particularly in areas of the United States. The department will implement a $100 million contingency liability authority to provide risk re-insurance that will further assist Canadian companies to participate in major capital projects.

There are several other measures, all geared to assist business in Canada, to streamline, modernize, and grasp the opportunities. We are entering a period of great change in technology, trading patterns, and consumer demand. We are entering this period with many strengths, our resources, our expertise, despite the unconfidence expressed from time to time by the opposition parties.

Mr. Woolliams: Like selling wheat.

Mr. Horner: Yes, we will sell a tremendous amount of wheat. The industrial support program improvements fitted into all of these measures and directions. As I discussed earlier, it provides government support to the margin of—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Horner: In the short time remaining to me, Mr. Speaker, I shall attempt to sum up what I have been saying, and make a few further comments upon our economic performance and potential.

As I said, we are entering upon a period of great change in technology, trading patterns, and consumer demand, and we do so with many strengths both in resources and expertise. Some have expressed a lack of confidence in the businessmen of Canada, but we on this side certainly have great confidence in them. We recognize that as a result of freer trade some Canadian firms may find themselves in difficulties. However, we expect that more opportunities than difficulties will arise as a result of negotiations. The lower tariff barriers and the removal of non-tariff barriers in Japan, United States and Europe, will definitely help Canadian business firms and improve the economic climate. The industrial support I have outlined has been designed to assist companies to restructure themselves so as minimize difficulties which may be foreseen in the early 1980s.

We will be setting up a special MTN-related panel to advise the enterprise development program as to which particular industries will be hurt and the way in which we can help those industries to take advantage of the lower tariffs which may come about as a result of the negotiations. I believe that any who read my speech carefully would agree we have been showing tremendous economic leadership over the whole range of Canadian industry. We have received the co-operation of labour—some 40 different unions have worked on the production of those task force reports and most of the provinces have also been involved in their preparation. We are engaged in a concentrated effort to help Canadian businessmen because we believe the private sector is really the engine by which economic recovery and development will be brought about, along with an extensive effort by my department toward trade promotion.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) mentioned my visit to Japan. As hon. members know, I went to Japan and Korea this summer and was greatly heartened by what I saw, by evidence of our opportunity to increase sales to Japan. Recently, with the help of my department, an extensive, high-powered group of Canadian businessmen visited mainland China. They have reported to me in detail concerning their hopes for additional sales to China.

Canadians concerned with oil exploration both from the private sector and Petro-Can formed part of the group which made that business trip, and they believe a tremendous amount of good will flow from that visit. Intensive work is being done in Indonesia as well as in many countries of South America. Trade shows and trade promotion throughout the world have made people more fully aware of the competence of Canadian businessmen and of their ability to compete in international markets. As one example I might refer to an article which I saw in a newspaper only this morning—Canada is selling cameras to Japan. That certainly sounds like sending coals to Newcastle, I suppose, but it is certainly evidence of our competence and capability.

Much remains to be done, of course. We are working very hard in connection with the automobile industry, the biggest single employer in the province of Ontario. We are devoting a great deal of attention to the shipbuilding and repair industry on both the east and the west coasts. Everybody knows there is an overcapacity in the world as far as shipbuilding is concerned but we can, and should, nevertheless, improve our facilities so that we can carry out a good deal of the repair work which is necessary to enable the shipping industry to move our goods throughout the world.

I end by expressing my confidence that the business community will appreciate what we are doing. We shall continue to work with them. Meetings are to be held later this month involving my provincial counterparts in both industry and tourism. Canada is healthy, well, and working.

● (1412)

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate on the throne speech, and my first words will be to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address who, through their presentation, did honour to their constituencies.

"A Tale of Two Cities" by Charles Dickens was first published as a volume in 1859, some 119 years ago. In chapter one of this classic story, Dickens wrote:

> It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair. We had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to heaven, we were all going direct the other way.

Although published in 1859, Dickens used these words to describe conditions in 1775 as they existed then between the people in Europe who spoke English and those in Europe who spoke French. His words pointed out the national disorder which existed.

Unfortunately, things have not improved very much since those days. The words of Dickens in 1859 could well be used today to describe aptly conditions in Canada as they exist at present. We have a throne speech opening the fourth session of the thirtieth parliament which is repetitive and misleading. I say it is repetitive for it speaks of strengthening the economy and of helping the private sector to lead the way toward accelerated economic growth. We have known about this requirement for many years. In fact the government has been saying the same thing for some time, but unfortunately no action has been taken.

For example, on February 17, 1972, the throne speech stated the following:

> This country fails in its essential purpose if it does not ensure that its most precious resource, human talent, is not wasted away.

How very true those words are!

On January 4, 1973, the throne speech stated:

> It is timely to provide to parliament a full report on Canada's financial and economic situation and to propose fiscal and other measures for the effective management of the economy.

On October 18, 1977, the throne speech stated:

> The human hardship imposed by the current level of unemployment in Canada is deeply disturbing in that there should be so many men and women deprived of the dignity of self-supporting work, unable to meet their financial commitments and plan confidently for the future.

Obviously the present Liberal government while in office was well aware of the problems, but unfortunately it took no corrective action during the past ten years.

I say the throne speech is misleading because it states:

> The projected rate of expenditure growth during the next fiscal year is 8.9 per cent, which is well below the forecast growth of 11 per cent for the gross national product.

It is this type of economic governmental double talk over the years which has brought Canada to the brink of economic ruin. The Prime Minister's (Mr. Trudeau) own pledge of a 5 per cent economic growth as made at the Bonn economic summit is now open to question. I say it is open to question because all of the economists in this country and all the financial papers in this country tell us that we will do well if the rate of growth achieved is at around 4 per cent, not the 5 per cent pledged by the Prime Minister or the 11 per cent stated in the throne speech.

What we are witnessing today is a cruel con job on the Canadian people perpetrated by the present Trudeau Liberal government. In the throne speech we are told that the government will intensify its assault upon unemployment and inflation, carrying forward commitments made by the government in 1976 with the publication of "The Way Ahead". Time will not permit me to deal today with all the words of good intent, the pledges and promises broken since the present Liberal government printed the booklet entitled "The Way Ahead". Obviously the government knew the problems and their cure, as witnessed by the words on page eight, paragraph two, under the heading of "Inflationary Process", which read:

> Increased government spending can lead to higher prices if the government simply prints the money or if additional taxes levied to finance these expenditures are passed on to others through higher wages and prices. Excessively high wage settlements and pricing decisions impose higher levels of cost, leading directly to higher prices. Expectations escalate and inflation continues to feed upon itself.

The debilitating effects of inflation extend beyond economic considerations to threaten the very nature of our institutions and traditions. The problems that unrestricted inflation creates were spelled out in the budget speech of June 23, 1975:

—inflation ultimately inflicts grievous damage to the fabric of society. It lowers the living standards of those on fixed incomes, including pensioners. It leaves people without reliable, understandable guideposts by which to arrange their economic affairs. It injects grave uncertainty into decisions on family budgets, housing, savings and provision for old age. It provokes deep frustration, social tension and mistrust of private and public institutions. Collective bargaining is embittered. Industrial relations are damaged. We in Canada are already beginning to live some of these experiences.

That was printed in October of 1976. Those are the words printed by the Trudeau Liberal government in "The Way Ahead", and yet this government proceeded, under finance minister Turner, finance minister Macdonald, and under the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), to do exactly the opposite.

Obviously this government intentionally kept printing more paper money to cover their blunders in a direct attempt to destroy the Canadian economy. I charge this government with the deliberate destruction of the stability and endurance of our economic system, with the deliberate destruction of the social and cultural traditions on which it is based, for reasons known only to a select clique who sits beside and around the Prime Minister of this country.

I listened to the Prime Minister yesterday when he spent most of his time berating my party, my leader, and our policies, instead of putting some flesh on the bones of his proposals in the throne speech. There is not a word about fisheries development in the throne speech. The Prime Minister could have spent some time telling us of his concern for the fishermen in Atlantic Canada and in the western part of this country and in British Columbia. He said not a word about that.

An hon. Member: He has done it all.

Mr. Crouse: The hon. member says he has done it all. He has obviously not done his own homework.

It seemed obvious to me yesterday that the results of the Nova Scotia election had finally got through to the Prime Minister. I say to him, sir, through you, that if he feels a little chill wind of anti-liberalism blowing his way from the west, he can expect a hurricane of anti-liberalism blowing his way from Atlantic Canada. Campaigning with my provincial counterparts throughout Nova Scotia was most informative. It was also most rewarding since we turned out a Liberal government in that province that had been in power for eight years.

An hon. Member: Why don't you look at the Gallup poll?

Mr. Crouse: You cannot stand the truth. We have turned out a Liberal government that had been in power for eight years, and yet no one in the press gallery or in the information services across Canada had even predicted this. So much for Gallup polls! So much for public opinion polls!

● (1422)

Mr. Crouse: Some of these Grits can talk, but I have been given a fairly strong voice by the Almighty and I do not mind interruptions. When the hon. member has something to say, I hope she will stand up.

Obviously the Prime Minister is unaware of the controversy which he alone has stirred up over his proposed constitutional amendments. Yesterday he twisted and turned in his efforts to make a political issue out of the monarchy, and in his efforts to make it appear that the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and my party were opposed to the Queen. In this regard his efforts were divisive, distasteful, insulting and disgusting.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: Of all of those in opposition to the proposals of the Prime Minister, it seems to me that Senator Eugene Forsey—

Mr. Collenette: Which honourable Senator?

Mr. Crouse: If the hon. member opposite would listen, perhaps he would learn something. The hon. Senator Eugene Forsey put into words perhaps the most concise and forceful objection to the proposals of the Prime Minister. Unless I am misled, I have no recollection of Senator Forsey making application to be a member of the Progressive Conservative party.

The honourable Joseph Smallwood served for 23 years as Liberal premier of Newfoundland. Neither can he be called a Tory. Yet in September when opening the Nova Scotia Fisheries Exhibition in my home town of Lunenburg, Nova Scotia, Mr. Smallwood stated his strong opposition to the constitutional proposals of the government. He stated, to roars of approval from thousands in the exhibition audience, that whenever the next federal election is called, and if he is required to make a choice between his party and the monarchy, he will vote for the Queen.

It is one thing for the Prime Minister to say in this House, with tongue in cheek, that the role of the Queen in his constitutional proposals is unchanged. However, Bill C-60 tells a very different story. I for one do not accept the position of the Prime Minister that there is no need to refer to the Supreme Court proposed changes respecting the monarchy, just because he said that it is not the intention of the government to propose changes of substance.

For example, by clause 30 of Bill C-60 the government states that the sovereign head of Canada is Her Majesty the Queen. But clauses Nos. 42 and 43 provide for the Governor General to represent the Queen and exercise for her the prerogatives, functions and authority belonging to her in respect of Canada. Other clauses of the bill substitute the Governor General for the Queen. For example, the opening words of clause 91 vest in the Governor General on behalf of the Queen the executive government of and over Canada. I disagree violently with the Prime Minister and the deceitful position which he is taking on this matter. I believe strongly that these proposals contain substantive elements which raise serious questions about the right of the federal government and parliament to act unilaterally on this issue.

Under our present federation, Her Majesty is the head equally of our federal and provincial governments. There is substantial doubt in my mind that her position can be altered by one level of government, especially this lame duck government in the dying stages of this parliament. This is only one matter which is of serious concern to the people in my area.

Another important issue is the ownership of 100 per cent of the mineral rights off the coast of Atlantic Canada. Shortly after assuming the leadership of my party, my leader, without any equivocation or provocation, made it abundantly clear that he would, upon obtaining the position of Prime Minister of this country, give to the Atlantic provinces complete control and the revenues resulting from the development of any oil, gas or mineral discoveries off our shores. Naturally this announcement was greeted with great enthusiasm, not only by the Conservatives in Atlantic Canada but also by the Liberals, and if there were any labour or New Democratic Party members down there, they were rejoicing as well. Why? They were rejoicing because we in Atlantic Canada have found it necessary for years to fight hard for our place in the sun, to fight against the centralizing powers of the federal government and the tariff walls which favoured industry in Ontario and Quebec, while working to the disadvantage of industry in Atlantic Canada.

Everything we buy in Nova Scotia, and in Atlantic Canada generally, costs much more than it does the citizens of Quebec and Ontario due to the 1,500 mile haul from central Canada to our area. The freight rate on automobiles from Oshawa to Halifax makes a difference of approximately $350 in the price paid for a vehicle by a Nova Scotian as compared to residents of Ontario. Truly we in Atlantic Canada are the victims of the ruinous user-pay policy enunciated by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Over the years we have borne the burden of higher costs, higher freight rates, higher unemployment, and lower scales of wages than the workers of Ontario, Quebec and western Canada. Naturally we had high hopes for any benefits which may accrue to our area as a result of offshore mineral or oil development. However, yesterday as I sat and listened intently to the words of the Prime Minister, I am sure that the high hopes of the citizens of Atlantic Canada could not help but be dampened by his words and attitude. He went out of his way to ridicule and heap scorn upon my leader and my party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: I hear hon. members opposite saying, "Hear, hear". Will this go down well with anyone in Atlantic Canada who has thought favourably of the Liberal party? I doubt it! He heaped ridicule and scorn upon my leader and my party for the concern we have expressed on behalf of the citizens in Atlantic Canada.

The Prime Minister said that my leader had no trouble getting on with those provincial leaders because he did so by giving them the shirt off his back. Apparently it has not as yet occurred to the Prime Minister that the time has arrived when that is the kind of prime minister this country needs, namely, one who shows concern for the citizens living in the disadvantaged areas of Canada.

When I look at the bloated expenditures by the Liberal hierarchy in the Ottawa-Hull area, I believe it would be better for Canadian taxpayers generally if more of their tax dollars were left in the hands of provincial and municipal officials because these authorities, being closer to the people, will spend their money more judicially. For example, Les Terrasses de la Chaudière in Hull had projected costs of something like $148 million, with no tenders called. An escalation clause costing Canadians hundreds of millions of dollars over the next 35 years in rental payments is an expenditure which was strongly condemned by the Senate Standing Committee on Finance. Every effort to get the true facts and the true costs of this project has been stonewalled by the government, as was evidenced today when the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) called for a public investigation. This is what we mean when we say that there is no leadership given Canadian people today by this government.

When quoting statistics in his speech, the Prime Minister implied that the Liberals were setting new records and that everything would be all right, Jack, if only the official opposition would shut up.

Mr. Collenette: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: The hon. member opposite said, "Hear, hear". I know members opposite would like a government of complete dictators. We are not far from that now, but dictatorship by the Liberals will not be tolerated in Canada. We will do our part to see that this does not happen, if that outfit opposite ever screws up enough courage to call another federal election.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crouse: I agree with one of the statements made yesterday by the Prime Minister. He said that they are breaking all records. Well, that is true. Our economy is breaking all records. All records in unemployment are being broken. If the truth were told, there are well over one million people unemployed in this country. All records in inflation are being broken, as well as the records in the devaluation of our currency. All records are being broken in work stoppages, in the flight from Canada of investment capital, in declining productivity, in falling exports, in our soaring national debt and in our budgetary deficits. In these and in all related areas we are indeed exceeding all the other western industrialized countries.

• (1432)

It is true that our labour force has had an unusually high growth rate, due in part to the post-war baby boom and continuing immigration. But considering Canada's enormous advantages—we are the second largest land mass in the world, we have coal in every province of this country from British Columbia to Cape Breton, Nova Scotia, we have untapped mineral wealth and every day we are finding new sources of uranium, and we have oil and gas, in fact more natural resources than any other industrialized democracy in the world,—and with a small population, it is surprising we are in our present difficulties. We have substantial production capacity and we should really have no baffling economic problems, and would have none were it not for the crisis this country is suffering today in leadership. We have been like a rudderless ship sailing around in circles; a ship whose captain has lost his sextant, his chart and his compass and does not know which way to turn.

Since we are sinking into a steadily worsening mess, in spite of all Canada's unmatched blessings, the trouble obviously lies with the mismanagement of this country, no matter what the Prime Minister may say to distort the facts and confuse the people. I would ask you, sir, what other explanation can there be for a government which came into power in 1968 when we were a nation of 20 million people?

I hold in my hand a booklet entitled "How Your Tax Dollar Is Spent", put out by C. M. Drury, president of the treasury board in February, 1974. There are many figures here but I am only going to quote one. It shows quite clearly that in 1968 when the present Liberal government under Mr. Trudeau was elected we had 20 million people, and the cost of running this country at that time is shown here as $9,872 million. That was in 1968. Today we have the 1978-79 proposals showing how your tax dollar is spent, brought forward under Robert Andras, President of the Treasury Board. It gives some very interesting figures.

It shows that the 1973-74 expenditures were $24,532 million, an increase of 22.7 per cent in one year. That just happened to be the year that Mr. Turner was minister of finance. It shows that in 1974-75 we were spending $31,483 million. He even outdid himself. He managed a 28.3 per cent increase in that one year. In 1975-76 expenditures went up to $37,278 million, an increase of 18.4 per cent. In 1977-78 expenditures were $44,450 million, an increase of 8.2 per cent, and for this present year, 1978-79, we have total expenditures at $48,800 million, an increase of 9.8 per cent. Those figures have now progressed upwards to something like $50 billion.

These figures clearly indicate the deceit and deception as practised by Liberal speakers when they try to deceive Canadians into believing that during their period in office they have ever practised restraint. The trend of their deceit is evidenced in our declining dollar, our inflationary spiral, and headlines that scream that our small businesses are going bankrupt as never before.

I wish the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) were in the House. I will not say he intentionally misled the House, because that would be unfair. I would say that in his ignorance today he misled the House because he implied that everything was okay with small businessmen. Last year 4,131 Canadian firms were placed in bankruptcy. By way of comparison, the ten times as large U.S. economy had only twice as many failures. The trend has worsened in the first four months of 1978 when Canada had 1,742 business failures as compared with only 2,303 in the United States.

These figures say nothing of the lost hopes, the spent dreams, and the lost lifetime savings of the men and women who worked to put together these businesses. This is a direct result of the mismanagement of our economy by the present Liberal administration. Small businessmen do not have the expertise to deal with currency fluctuation and foreign exchange, or their eventual impact on prices. Unfortunately the figures show that Atlantic Canada again bears a heavy burden with bankruptcies up from 114 in 1976 to 190 in 1977.

Recent government restraint proposals will not, of course, improve the situation. While I am in general agreement that government expenditures must be curtailed, I find it disconcerting, for example, to hear the proposal to close the Vancouver and Halifax fish technology laboratories. This will save the government less than $2 million annually. I find this difficult to understand when at the same time there is no mention of curtailing services at one of our international airports, the deficits on which since it opened in 1976 total $115 million—almost $1 million a week.

The two laboratories in question have served the Canadian fish industry for some 54 years. Their scientists are highly respected not only in Canada but throughout the entire length and breadth of the world. They are respected for their research and development. This action, of course, brings into question the government's entire list of spending priority.

The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan), for example, when speaking in London, Ontario, on April 4, 1978, stated that Canada's poor performance in industrial innovation is threatening its competitive position in both domestic and foreign markets. He said that research and development are vital to the future of Canada and that some of the issues of most pressing national concern at this moment, such as economic stability, unemployment, and even national unity, are directly linked to our investment in research and development.

Since the Hon. Judd Buchanan holds these views, it is obvious he was not consulted by the Prime Minister before the announcement of the cuts, particularly those that are of vital concern to our fishermen and our processors both in Atlantic Canada and in British Columbia. If he had been consulted I am sure he would not have agreed. This points up the fact that we have almost a dictatorship in this country today—a one-man government under Pierre Elliott Trudeau.

On the east coast the extension of the 200-mile limit, the scarcity of some fish species, the environmental quality regulations, food safety and nutrition, plus the necessity to examine non-traditional markets, non-traditional fishing grounds, and the marketing of non-traditional species, have all placed new demands on our fisheries laboratories and our scientists. Without basic planning, dismantling the technological laboratories will drive some of the work toward our universities which are understaffed and hard pressed financially. In my opinion this will result in the work becoming fragmented and more and more remote from the practical world of industry.

Our fish exports play an important role by bringing into Canada scarce and vital foreign exchange. Some 75 per cent or more of all the fish we catch is exported, and Canada's need for foreign exchange is greater than it has ever been in our history. We can only export fish profitably by maintaining a high standard of quality, and this can only be done through the aid of our scientists. From a financial point of view, exported product which is rejected by the buyer is a financial loss which must also include the cost of shipping. The reputation of the shipper is at stake, as well as the reputation of Canada.

It is also well to remember that the export market is open to the small processors, as well as the large, and that overseas markets are specialized and require new skills in processing, freezing and packaging which can only be provided by our fisheries scientists, especially for our small processors. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce spoke today of his department's efforts to aid research and development. This will be helpful to the large companies, but without the scientific laboratories to help the small, individual packers and processors, they are bound to go out of business because they cannot compete. This is the problem that the small operator is facing today. At a time when we in Atlantic Canada are seeking new markets for expanding catches, closing the fisheries labs appears to me to be penny wise and pound foolish. No matter how you look at it, we have made one step forward and three backward in our quest for a stronger financial base in Canada as a whole, and Atlantic Canada in particular.

This action, of course, places in doubt the future benefits which should accrue to our people from the extension of our economic zone to 200 miles. To realize the opportunities available from this action, it is necessary to establish a climate leading to continuity of investment. As the Minister of Finance has put it, "We will encourage risk-taking and willingness to spend in the private sector that is essential to get the economy going faster." Unfortunately, to date this has not been done.

In my opinion, there are a number of problems that are not creating a favourable climate for long-term investment.

I will be finished in a moment, Mr. Speaker.

For example, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. LeBlanc) has adopted a go-slow, stand-pat attitude toward the fisheries. He wants to wait until fish quotas are plentiful before establishing a long-term policy that would lead to modernizing and rebuilding our inshore, midwater and offshore fleets. We believe such waiting to be detrimental to Canada's interests, and we are not alone in this belief. A spokesman from one of our leading processors has publicly stated that we should be acquiring freezer trawlers now.

[Mr. Crouse.]

In addition, Mr. Speaker, the fishery development plan prepared by the Atlantic provinces warned that, unless our fishing industry is rapidly developed, a large part of the potential economic benefits from our 200-mile zone will be unnecessarily deferred and possibly lost to Canada while foreign nations will continue to reap significant benefits.

With clearcut, long-term policies in place, developed in consultation with the industry, and which recognize the separation of government and industry roles, I feel certain the Canadian fishing industry can realize its potential both in economic and social terms. However, the time to act is now. For all these reasons I am pleased to support the amendment as moved by my leader.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I enter this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne because I have a very deep concern about certain trends, certain ideas that are abroad in this land, and I think that there is a message that some of us are duty bound to give to this House. Someone has already said that we live in a time of paradox. On the one hand Canada is a wealthy country, our people are tremendous and the things that are around to make life good in this country are many, but, yet our time is marred by despair and fear. One wonders how we can be so afraid, living as we do in such a wonderful country.

I suspect that the despair and the fear relate, not so much to present conditions, but to the future. There is concern as to whether the good things that we have will continue or whether we may run into some kind of downturn that would make life in Canada less enjoyable than it is today. Having said that there are good things about life in Canada today, I want to say something about how those good things were achieved. I realize that I must be careful not to make myself out to be any older than I am, but I am 70 years of age. I have seen a good part of this century that Sir Wilfrid Laurier said would belong to Canada, and in many ways that prophecy has come true.

I also belong to the generation of Canadians that came of age, that started to get active in life generally and in public affairs in particular just as the depression of the 1930s was beginning. I know that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) likes to refer to some of us as "leftovers from the depression", but I suggest that those of us who remember those days have a message that we must give. The thing I remember most about the thirties; perhaps even more than the suffering, the unemployment, the hunger and the poverty, was the consensus among our people that cut across party lines and religious lines; people in all kinds of organizations and groups were not only horrified by what we experienced in that decade of depression but were determined to bring such conditions to an end. We were determined that it must not happen again.

As a member of a political party I am prepared to state the role that my party played in those years and in the years that have transpired since; but if I may speak more objectively and more historically, I am happy to say that that generation that was alive and active in the 1930s was a generation with a determination that was implemented in legislation to make Canada a better country. The characteristic of social and economic life of that period, the 1920s and the 1930s, was a minimum of government concern, a minimum of government intervention in the economy, and a minimum of government services. What we who belonged to the generation that got started in that decade were determined to do was to get the government into the economy and to provide services that private enterprise was not providing, and to establish social programs that would end forever the day when people would starve and die because they could not afford medical attention, or be impoverished in their old age.

I pay tribute to those who were older when I was just moving into the 1930s and to all who were part of that generation, that we stuck with it and achieved the things that we knew had to be achieved to make Canada the good country that it is today. The government got into things. It established legislation respecting labour relations, trade, industry, and many other things. It got more heavily into transportation—land, sea and air; it got into the activity of the Canadian Wheat Board and the marketing of other agricultural products; it got into housing; it got into the building of highways; it got into education by means of assistance to the provinces and by means of grants to enable people to take special courses; it got into social security in terms of old age pensions, family allowance and unemployment insurance and then, finally, as the crowning achievement of all, it got into hospitalization and health care.

I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that one of the reasons we can say that today life in Canada is good is because of these things that were fought for by the people of the generation to which I am happy to belong.

As I have already said, I could put this into political terms and talk about the parties and their particular role in achieving these things. But that really does not matter; what does matter is that a generation that knew what it was like to have a society in which there was non-intervention by the government, a society in which there was that lack of social services and lack of social programs—that generation saw to it that all of that was changed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the deep concern to which I referred in my opening sentence is over the fact that there seems to be abroad in Canada today the notion that the government must get out of the economy, the notion that we must cut back, the notion that there must be restraint, and the notion that we have gone too far in terms of public services and social programs.

In the last two or three days I have heard on both sides of the House the word "privatizing" as though it is a sacred word or a new idea. Mr. Speaker, it is not new; it is as old as the poverty and suffering that some of us saw when we first became active in the life of this country.

I contend that if this country is going to make the mistake of turning back the clock, of going in for less government intervention in the economy and giving things back to private enterprise and the private sector, if the government is going to cut back on public services and refuse to continue to raise pensions and family allowances, or cut into programs for hospitalization and health care, a generation from now the government that took that backward step will be severely criticized. And rightly so!

I know that this hits both ways, Mr. Speaker. Certainly there is no doubt about my friends in the Progressive Conservative party. They want more to be left to the private sector. I heard a prominent Conservative talking outside the House the other day as though he were Adam Smith come back to life. He was saying that what was needed was more opportunity for great wealth to be made at the top so that more would trickle down to those at the bottom. That is a good Tory position. What bothers me today is that the government, the party that has the majority, is talking in those same terms, with two or three exceptions. There are two or three Liberals in the House who have their priorities straight, but for the most part the government today, and this House generally, seem to have forgotten the lesson some of us learned because we have seen several decades of life in this great country.

I call on this House not to fall for the notion that by privatizing services, by increasing unemployment through laying people off, by cutting out programs that the government has got into, by putting the lid on social programs, this will somehow get us on the right track. Mr. Speaker, that will put us back into conditions that may be quite satisfactory to corporation directors in the boardrooms of the nation, but they will make a serious difference so far as the ordinary people of this country are concerned.

That is what I like about what we have achieved in the last 40 or 50 years. People now count. I have stood in this House on previous occasions and told the story—something I shall never forget—of my younger days when I was a minister. I had the experience several times of going into the homes of people who were in my congregation and discovering older people, parents or grandparents, of whose existence I was not even aware. This was in the days when the pension was $20 a month and older people were kept somewhere in the backrooms. Often they just did not have the clothes to go out, and there was no life for them.

Over the years, by establishing the universal pension, by raising that amount, by lowering the age for receiving that pension and getting other pension improvements, by going in for senior citizens housing of various kinds, by getting universal hospitalization, health care and medical programs established, we have changed life completely for our older generation.

There is no comparison between what older people experienced 40 or 50 years ago and what they experience today. That has not come about by any privatization of things; that has not come about because we have left it to private enterprise and all that sort of nonsense. That came about because the people of Canada, all of us through our collective institutions of government, saw to it that the economy was told to provide pensions and services and to make life better, not just for those who look at the balance sheets but to make life better for people themselves.

I say, Mr. Speaker, that far from speeches being made calling on us to get the government out, to privatize and so on, we should recognize we were right in the last 40 or 50 years—whatever party was in power—we were right in moving in the direction of more and more public concern, social concern, government concern for the economy and for what it does to our people. So, Mr. Speaker, that is why we have before the House at this time the subamendment moved yesterday in the name of my leader, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). It calls for the government to take steps to improve the employment situation and also—and this, I gather, is the phrase in the subamendment that turns off my friends in the Progressive Conservative party—it calls for a new program of public sector investment.

Maybe for a short while we shall be the voice crying in the wilderness, but it will not be long until it is recognized that we are right and that those who have followed this viewpoint for the last 30 or 40 years were right, especially on the Liberal side of the House. They were the ones who seemed to go that way the most, thanks to our prodding. What bothers me about the Liberals is that they are retreating from that position. They are talking about privatization, about curtailment; they are talking about more unemployment and uncertainty for the people so that they will appreciate what they have and get back on the track. That will not take us out of the difficulties we now face. Instead of doing that, we should do what is proposed in our amendment, take the economic steps to increase employment, and take steps to increase investment in the public sector.

Along with that I think this is the time when we should be improving our social services and social programs. If some of my colleagues have wondered if, in this speech in the address debate, I was not going to get to the subject of pensions, they now know there was never any intention of my not getting into that subject. Instead of talking about putting on means tests and giving only to those who supposedly need it and so on, we should be increasing the amount we pay as old age security. Let the income tax take it back, and let us make the changes in the income tax that are necessary for those who do not need the additional amount, but one way to make sure that more money will be spent on the purchase of consumer goods is to put more of it into the hands of our senior citizens.

Another way is to put more of that money into the hands of the families of this country. I quite approve of the part of the program having to do with children which provides an income tax credit of $200 a year per child to families whose incomes are below $18,000 a year, but I see no reason for cutting back the amount of the family allowance from its present $26 to $20 a month. It would be far better, Mr. Speaker, if that amount were doubled. Put that money into the hands of the mothers of this country who need food and clothing for their children. The spending of the money will in itself have a beneficial effect on the economy of Canada.

So, I say, Mr. Speaker, this is not a time for cutting back on social programs; this is a time to be expanding those programs and to be confirming the judgment of four or five decades of parliamentarians who have sat in this place—that Canada is a better place in which to live because of what the government does. Therefore, this is not a time for the government to get out of our economy.

As I have already indicated, the amount of the old age pension should be increased, and not just for those who draw the guaranteed income supplement. There are hundreds of thousands of Canadians, senior citizens, just over the line, who have just enough with their old age security and some other income not to qualify for the guaranteed income supplement. Because they do not qualify for the guaranteed income supplement, there are certain other benefits that they do not get, and they are having a rough time. I welcome the increase in the supplement to $20 a month. But as I say, there are hundreds of thousands of people just over the line, and the same is true with respect to family allowances. That is why across the board increases are so necessary.

While we are saying something about these benefits, particularly old age pensions, I think the argument that this is a time of restraint and that we have to cut back is no reason for not solving some serious problems that stand out in our pension program. I think the most unfair is what we do to single women who are between the ages of 60 and 65. That spouse's allowance, which is fine for those who get it, says to women between the ages of 60 and 65 who are spinsters, widows, divorced, or unattached in any way, that there is nothing for them. We go even further and say to the spouse who might be getting that allowance that because she is 62 or 63 and has a living husband, if he dies before she is 65 what she has is taken away from her. That is of a piece with other things in our pension program which are grossly unfair to the older women of this country. I want pensions improved across the board, but the more I study the situation, the more messages I get from people in trouble, the more I realize that the group which is most disadvantaged in their older years is our women, especially those women who are unattached because they are single or widowed.

This morning I was answering questions on one of those radio stations that call us sometimes from our constituencies. A woman had phoned in a question about her pension from the Canadian National Railways. It is the same whether the person is receiving a CNR pension, a public service pension, or what-have-you. Her husband had retired, gone on pension and died a month later. She discovered—she did not realize it would happen this way—that one month's full pension was paid in respect of her husband, but then for her it is cut in half. And yet, Mr. Speaker, as I had to say on the radio this morning to Winnipeg, if the reverse had happened, if she had died first, her husband's pension would have continued at 100 per cent. That applies to public service pensions and it applies to pensions of all kinds. Somehow or another it seems all right to continue the man's pension at its full amount, but we say to the woman, "You have to get by on 50 per cent or 60 per cent", or in some cases it is even less. That idea is for the birds. If pensions are defensible, as I say they are, if they are part of our structure, they should be there for our women on the same fair basis as they are for men.

I also made the point that pensions, generally speaking, should be put on a very firm and adequate basis so far as escalation is concerned. There are some who argue that the escalation is too much and want to cut it back. I point out that the escalation relates only to the rise in the cost of living, that in all plans it is already several months behind by the time a person gets it. It does not relate to the things pensioners have to buy. Actually we should be giving serious attention to putting our escalation of pensions on a basis that relates to our rising standard of living, one that relates to the increase in the gross national product.

These things do not appeal to those who draw up balance sheets and to those who sit in corporation board rooms. But that is not what this country is for. This country is for people, men, women and children, and it is for their benefit, just as by government intervention in the economy, by government programs, by social programs, we have made life better for our people over the years. We can make it still better in our time. We started these programs when the budget of the country was a great deal smaller than it is today. Of course, we were told then that these things could not be afforded, but we managed to afford them, and not only did we manage to afford them but life is better and the economy is better because we did so. So I call for increases in the old age pension, increases in family allowances and improvements in the escalation of all such programs.

I call upon the government to take steps to make sure that Canadian National Railways and Canadian Pacific Railway pay decent pensions along the lines that have been recommended time and time again. I also call on the government to take steps to ensure that pensions in private industry are made subject to escalation even if it has to involve some kind of government addition to those pensions to make that possible.

I go back to my reference to the experience I had 30 or 40 years ago of finding, in homes I visited, older people of whose existence I was not aware. We have made life a lot better for them but we can make it a lot better still if we stay with the philosophy that has made this a good country, the philosophy of government concern—not the philosophy of government non-intervention which is being preached in this House day after day and which in itself means disaster down the road.

While mentioning pensions, and just in the minute or two before my time runs out, I want to say a special word about the pensions of veterans and their survivors. I think we have done well in the last few years in terms of winning improvements and getting the disability pension related to wage levels in the public service, getting those pensions up, getting prisoner of war compensation and so on. But there are still some things which must be done. The Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) told us last session that the War Veterans Allowance Act was being reviewed and he hoped to have legislation brought in this fall. I trust that that will be done.

There still remains as an unfinished item the question of what happens to a widow of a disabled veteran if the disabled veteran's disability pension is below 48 per cent. Take the case of two widows. One was married to a veteran whose pension was 50 per cent; he died and she gets a full widow's pension. Next door is a widow whose husband when he died was on a 45 per cent pension; she gets no pension at all. It can be argued that she can qualify for the war veterans' allowance, or welfare measures of one kind or another, but why the distinction? Why do we carry it on all down the line? As the veterans who have survived World War II, let alone those from World War I, get older, they realize how important this is. They are calling for action to be taken on this issue of adequate pensions for their widows.

In that connection, may I just say, even if it is not quite related to the theme of my remarks this afternoon, that there is great concern among the veterans of this country over a case that happened a few weeks ago. A disabled veteran, an amputee, a man whose condition was very serious, such that he was getting a good deal of money from the Canadian Pension Commission, was denied the extra amount of money that was needed for the extra care that was required in his home. The day he got the notice that his request had been turned down, he died.

This has raised questions among veterans as to whether there needs to be a review of the terms and conditions under which disability pensions and the attachments thereto are awarded. I hope this will be done. As I said the other day, I think it was a mistake that there was no reference to veterans in the Speech from the Throne. Despite that, I hope the Minister of Veterans Affairs will join with us in seeing that something is done, and that it is done very soon.

I see, Mr. Speaker, you are taking the position that you take when a member's time is about up. I will not make it necessary for you to tell me that my time is up. I am glad to have had this opportunity to speak again. As I say, I hope I have not sounded older than I am, speaking for my generation, the senior citizens of Canada today who did something tremendous for this country. The country owes them a lot for resolving to build back in the thirties the kind of country in which the government would care. I plead for that to be continued. It is on that basis that I call for support for our plea for increases in our social programs, and for support this afternoon when the vote comes on our amendment to the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have the opportunity to participate in this debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne and to echo some of the concerns expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

We must be extremely concerned about those in our society who are having a tough time getting along because this is a very rich society. I certainly agree with many of the concerns the hon. member expressed about pensions. There are many who are just marginally getting along, although with a great deal of difficulty.

The philosophy espoused by the hon. member is one that I accepted for many years, the idea that the state can do everything. However, I have changed my views a great deal. In recalling the thirties, forties and fifties, the hon. member recalled the need for the kinds of solutions he mentioned. However, he should understand there are massive changes occuring at the present time. These changes mean we have to move in different directions.

The solutions which he outlined are solutions that I accepted in the fifties and sixties but which do not at this point pertain. We must understand that we are in a new economic age. Once we understand that, we can begin to take steps to cope with it.

It is particularly disturbing at this point in our history that parties like the New Democratic Party, which have shown the way for so long, should be dealing with problems of the fifties and sixties and not the problems of our present time. There are three essential factors which are responsible for this great change in global economic thinking. This change has not occurred to a lot of economists' thinking, but should occur.

First, there has been a quantum jump in the problems that face all governments. For the past 100 years this country and other nations could expect inflation rates in the order of 1 per cent or 2 per cent, perhaps even less. Today, when our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) attends a meeting of the big seven or our Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) attends a meeting of the IMF, they look at 5 per cent as being a zero point. It is from plus or minus zero after five that they start working. This is a totally new concept globally. There have been high inflation rates for short periods of time in some countries, but 5 per cent plus has not been a global phenomenon in the past.

Unemployment problems are rising in all parts of the world. The past ten years has been a period of very substantial growth. That is now changing and we are getting growth rates of 2 per cent or 3 per cent per annum. We see a rise in social problems in most communities throughout the world. We see a significant change in the policy of governments to cope with currency problems. This is because the nation state no longer has the power it used to have given the fact that so much of our liquid assets are controlled by global or multinational corporations. This whole series of events in the past six or seven years has been summed up in this quantum leap in the problems that face all nations.

The second factor is the introduction of an almost totally unique phenomenon, scarcity. I was taught to believe that was something bankers or some other group dreamed up, and that if we could only get rid of that notion we could solve all problems.

For the first time in the history of mankind we are facing a real scarcity, possibly not in the immediate future, but certainly in the next ten to 15 years. I refer, of course, to shortage of energy. Already the energy problem has created some massive economic problems. This is one of the reasons for the present state of the American dollar; the American economy has a very large deficit in its oil account. I believe last year it was in the order of $45 billion to $50 billion. This is a flow of money from the United States to the Arab states and the OPEC countries. We face the same problem, although not to the same degree.

There are other problems along that line which we face. We have been told that in the next 15 years we will need approximately $180 billion of capital for energy projects, that the percentage of our capital expenditures that go into energy will increase from 10 per cent to between 30 per cent and 40 per cent. That is a unique factor, something we will hear a great deal more of as time goes on.

The third factor in terms of a new economic thinking is that techniques used in the past no longer obtain. They do not work the way they used to. There are two reasons for this. First, the magnitude of the problem makes it impossible to use monetary or fiscal techniques to solve it. Second, the Keynesian techniques, both monetary and fiscal, tend at this point to be counter-productive. It was always a theory that if one increased the amount of money that goes into people's pockets, this would create jobs. However, where you have a situation of high inflation and high unemployment, a parallel situation, very often increases in demand will increase inflation, increase unit costs, decrease sales abroad as well as locally, and possibly result in more unemployment.

I give that one example to show that measures considered effective in the past do not work in today's conditions. It is important we should realize when looking at the problems of our time, especially when we are facing an election, that one cannot come up with old solutions and expect good things to happen. This applies particularly to spokesmen for opposition parties. I do not think one can come up with old solutions and expect Canadians to accept them.

Dealing specifically with the Canadian scene, I should like to outline two or three of the major problems we face and, possibly, suggest some solutions. I shall speak, first of all, of unemployment, because in my view unemployment is at the heart of our difficulties as a country. There are certain features which are unique to this country, features which do not obtain in other countries, and for this reason many of the actions the government has been obliged to take and which tend to disturb the economy have been taken because of the constraints of unemployment.

If we assume 1965 to be the base year and equate the number of people available for employment in each of the major countries in that year to 100, we find that for every 100 people in the labour force in West Germany in 1965 there are 96 in the labour force today. For every 100 in the labour force in the United Kingdom in 1965 there are today 103 or 104. In Italy the figure is around 100, in France it is 110, in Sweden 112 and in Japan, 114. The figure in all of these countries is between 96 and 114, so that in most of them the increase amounts to six or seven per hundred compared with the figure 12 years ago.

Three countries are rather different, however. One of them is the United States, where there were 28 more people per hundred in the labour force at the end of 1977 than there were in 1965. In Australia there were 30 more people in the labour force. Now, when we turn to Canada we find that Canada is in an entirely unique position, the labour force having grown from 100 to 146 on the basis I have outlined. In other words, over that 12-year period no other country has shown this astonishing increase.

Now, Mr. Speaker, even on the basis of an 8.5 per cent rate of unemployment, or 9 per cent as New Democratic spokesmen tend to assert, we would still have a shortage of people to do jobs if we had done just as well as the United States in creating jobs.

This situation has caused great concern and difficulty for industry in the private sector and for governments at federal and provincial levels. First, the cost of our massive unemployment insurance scheme is running at between $4 billion and $5 billion—something we would not need were it not for the rapid growth in the labour force to which I have referred.

Moreover, massive amounts of expenditure are involved in DREE, in internal payments to provinces, in the Canada Works program and in various incentive programs designed to create jobs. All these expenditures are connected to the one dominant problem I have mentioned.

I find myself terribly disturbed that these facts are not better known to Canadians generally, because it is only when we understand them that we can do something about them. It is certain that the deficit on the national account is dictated largely by this single question of unemployment. I would estimate that in round terms our $11.5 billion deficit would disappear were it not for unemployment, and were it not for the massive rise in the labour force.

I should like to deal briefly, now, with some of the other problems we are facing. I refer to inflation. We are all to blame in one way or another for what has happened. We could expect a normal inflation rate of 1 per cent or 2 per cent over the years but, as hon. members know, it is running at between 7 per cent and 9 per cent, likely in the order of 7.5 per cent this year. Most other countries are in a similar situation; anyone who has travelled outside Canada and the United States will certainly be aware of that. While we are experiencing a higher inflation rate in Canada than, say, in Switzerland, the cost of everything in Switzerland is much higher in real terms than in Canada.

I believe that over the years the government has made a real effort to lower the inflation rate. When wage settlements were running around 22 per cent in 1975, we thought it necessary to impose controls and we did, against the advice of a great many people and in spite of the concern expressed by some spokesmen for the labour movement. The result was that in two or three years we were able to reduce those increases to something in the order of 7 per cent. As a matter of fact, the increase in the cost of labour in this country is running at a considerably lower rate today than it is in the United States; the unit labour cost in the U.S. went up by 6.4 per cent last year while in Canada the increase was only 5.6 per cent. So we have had some luck, or we have been effective, perhaps I should say, in reducing our inflation rate and bringing it down to a figure which is at least equivalent to that of some our friends and neighbours.

The continuance of inflation is the one single problem over which the economists I speak to worry most in terms of the possibility of a world recession. They are particularly concerned about what is happening in the United States where the rate of inflation is rising sharply at this moment. If the situation gets out of hand we might very well face a major depression as a result.

Another area I wish to deal with concerns government spending. The government has been accused for many years of spending money outrageously and many hold the opinion that most of this country's problems, including inflation and the weakness of the Canadian dollar, are directly attributable to government spending. In particular, they blame the federal government. This is not necessarily the case, of course.

It is important to understand the way in which government spending is distributed. In other words, who benefits from the money which the federal government collects? The major expenditure is, of course, on transfer payments.

Because of inflation and all kinds of other reasons, we transferred 52.3 per cent of government expenditures in the form of pensions and family allowances and in the form of various subsidies to other levels of government.

The next item has to do with the government debt which costs in the neighbourhood of 15.8 per cent. Then there are some payments to Crown corporations, costing 3.3 per cent, which gives us a total of 71.4 per cent of all the money that the federal government spends in transfer payments, on the public debt and money which goes to Crown corporations to keep them in operation. The rest of the money, which amounts to only 28 per cent, runs the whole operation of the government.

So when the opposition, particularly the Tory opposition, refer to government cuts, they are talking about this 28.6 per cent. Because I do not think they dare go very far into the other areas. I do not know how you can get these kinds of cuts out of 28 per cent. Sure, there are some things we can do, but it is difficult to say that we can cut massive sums out of government spending unless we go into the transfer area or unless we take it out of people's pensions or out of the money that goes to the provinces.

The other thing of which we are accused is that we are that part of the government which grows the fastest. In other words, all the problems are caused by the federal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McRae: I should like to indicate that since 1961 the federal government's portion of the GNP has risen from 18.1 per cent to 20.2 per cent; in other words, roughly an increase of 10 per cent. We bit into more of it than we did in the past for many reasons. However, the provinces' and municipalities' share has gone up from 12.7 per cent to 20.1 per cent, roughly a 70 per cent increase. The other levels of government have increased their expenditures at seven times the rate we have. So let us not ascribe all the difficulties to the federal government, as the Tories in particular would want to do.

The other point I would like to mention about government revenues, and this is of great concern, is the large deficit we have at present. I would like to indicate one of the reasons why this deficit is growing at such a rapid rate. If one looks at the chart showing the expenditures of the government alongside government revenues, one sees that the two lines run parallel and are very close together going all the way back to 1970 and through 1974. But all of a sudden, about the end of 1974, the revenue starts to decline.

I think that if we are looking at the reasons for the deficit we look for the reason for that decline, why the revenue has fallen off. There are many factors, but I would say that one of them was that when we were indexing family allowances and pensions we also indexed taxation in the sense that the tax break, the money people got back in allowances and so on, was indexed so that each individual was able to claim a larger break in the taxation area. Of course, this resulted in an increased deficit. I recall the time in 1974 when we were bringing down the budget which brought this provision in, Mr. Turner's budget. The real push for this came from the Tory opposition during the minority parliament.

Those are just a few thoughts I have on government expenditures. I agree that for many reasons we have to cut back and operate more efficiently than we have; but I also think that Canadians should understand that it will be very difficult to make effective cuts in government spending because we control less than one third of what the government spends. The actual expenditures, 70 per cent of them, are going to transfers, over many of which the government has little control because they are legislated.

The last point I want to mention, and I will do it very briefly, has to do with the Canadian dollar. From discussions I have had with many economists and from my own research I have come to the conclusion that the Canadian dollar is seriously undervalued at present, especially in view of the fact that in the last several months manufacturing capacity in this country has increased from 81 per cent to close to 86.5 per cent. We have had a slow but steady growth in our manufacturing capacity. We have had a much slower growth in the cost of labour than have some other countries, and our productivity has increased in comparison with other countries.

I think that for this and for many other reasons the Canadian dollar will tend to seek a higher level over the next short period. In the meantime, this fall has been a definite advantage to some Canadians, and I can cite two reasons. One is an increase—in spite of what the previous Tory speaker said—in the level of our exports to other countries simply because, by having a lower dollar, our exports have become more competitive. Another factor which has affected this increase in capacity in terms of our manufacturing industry is that our Canadian producers, producing for the home market are in a much more favourable position and are able to compete better with the higher cost imports. This is a factor which tells me that our trade balance has improved fairly rapidly. Because of the effect of these two factors on our trade balance, we will find that the dollar will improve its position over the next several months.

Finally, I should like to deal with some of the solutions that I hear offered by members of the opposition. I am concerned, particularly in the context of my introductory remarks, about the approach that the opposition parties, and sometimes some of our members on this side, are taking to these problems. If we assume we are in a period of new economics, if we assume, for instance, as Mr. Callaghan said, that we cannot buy our way out of this, then why are we concentrating on these kinds of approaches like the Tory approach of a couple of billion dollars in tax savings in the area of mortgages and other taxes? This is done partly to give some relief to the taxpayers, but it is mostly done in the name of creating jobs. We seem to assume that by cutting back a couple of billion dollars and increasing the deficit, all of a sudden we will start creating jobs.

Anyone who has any understanding of the new economic thinking or of what is happening in our times realizes that this kind of action does not have this effect. I do not care whether it is our own finance people or people on the other side to whom I am talking. I am saying that in the new economic era a couple of billion dollars will not make any difference, partly because we have a level of savings which is five times what it was in the early 1960s. Approximately 10 per cent of the GNP goes into savings, as opposed to a little over 2 per cent in the sixties.

The other thing we should remember when we talk about saving a couple of billion dollars is that we used to talk about that figure in the sixties—just throw another couple of billion dollars in to stimulate the economy. That was at a time when the G.N.P. was approximately $50 billion. Now we are talking about $220 billion and something less than 1 per cent as a stimulant. We should begin to understand the kinds of changes which are occurring in our economic systems. For instance, for the benefit of the hon. leader of the New Democratic Party, Keynes is dead. Keynes is finished in terms of any serious movement toward changes in economic positions. We should start to look at a new way of approaching the thing. The problems have changed. The techniques we used in the past do not work today. When we realize that, we will stop seeing the answers as a simplistic increasing of the deficit by another couple of billion dollars.

All governments are facing much more serious problems than ever before. We have the notion of scarcity which was not there before. Keynesian techniques which have been so convenient over the last 35 or 40 years just do not work. We must look for different answers if we are even marginally to correct the problems which face us.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, once again I am pleased to be able to take part in the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. However, I am saddened after six years of participation in these debates that matters have not changed very much. In fact, there is a sense that one has heard it all before.

When I witnessed the Speech from the Throne as a new member of parliament some six years ago, I was impressed and excited with the multitude of promises made and the many words exulting success and hope for Canada and Canadians in every field and walk of life. Unfortunately my naive glimmer of expectation at that time was short-lived. My hopes were shattered when I quickly realized that this administration was outlining in the Speech from the Throne a series of hollow words and false expectations of which very few, if any, would materialize.

The Speech from the Throne six years ago was not an isolated incident. One can simply look at the record of subsequent speeches, many budgets and many Liberal campaign promises, such as we are faced with right now, and conclude that time after time the present government has not lived up to its promises. It continues to make them and it continues to break them to the point of misleading the public.

Of course, we do not have to go back six years for examples. I am sure all hon. members and all Canadians will recall the 1974 election campaign when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) shouted and yelled at the top of his voice that income and price controls would never be implemented in this country. At that time we proposed a 90-day price freeze in order to establish a positive and realistic economic policy. We all know what happened as soon as the Prime Minister received his mandate. He slapped wage and price controls on Canadians far more stringent than those proposed by my party. That is but just one example. There are many, many others too numerous to mention at this time in view of our time limitations. It is because of this continuing attitude that our country is deteriorating from what was once a healthy, unified, free enterprise nation to the divided, socialist-stricken state which I believe exists today.

Turning to a more personal note, I came to Canada in 1949 as a child, having left a depressed nation where the freedoms of speech, hope, opportunity and enterprise were snuffed out by a government dedicated to socialism. I came to Canada with my family, along with many new Canadians, because Canada was a young, vibrant, growing country offering opportunity, hope, diversification and freedom of all kinds, including that of enterprise. Included in this bountiful and beautiful country were governments which offered a work ethic atmosphere that was the envy of nations around the world. They were governments which offered an incentive to its peoples and industries and rewarded them accordingly.

At that time Canadians were proud of a hard day's work, and new Canadians were honoured to come to this country in order to join that work force. Canada grew and prospered in a united front. In the last decade, a decade which has been governed by our present Prime Minister, unfortunately this trend has reversed itself. Government incentives have disappeared, only to be replaced by handouts and give-aways. Frustration has taken over from pride. Hope and opportunity have been replaced by confusion and despair.

Yet there is no reason why our country cannot be the leader in the industrialized world. As we all know, Canada is the wealthiest nation per capita as far as natural resoures are concerned. Our human resource is surpassed by none. Our technological know-how is the best in the world. Yet our country is falling apart. Our productivity is at its lowest level in years. Unemployment and inflation rates are far too high and climbing. I will not refer to the figures at this point because they are common knowledge. Our currency has lost the confidence of international money makers and of Canadians as well. Canadians have stopped investing in Canada because the incentive is not here. Even the government has lost confidence in our dollar. One of its agencies, Loto Canada, whether inadvertently or not, decided to give away gold as its million dollar prize rather than the Canadian dollar.

Mr. Rodriguez: Let's give nickel.

Mr. Jelinek: I had occasion to be in New York a few weeks ago. The people of that city involved in the money markets are laughing at this government. The government has become the laughing stock of the world because it is afraid to give out prizes in Canadian dollars and has reverted to gold. Just yesterday when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was asked about that, he laughed it off jokingly and said that the government was supporting the Canadian mining industry.

There is no question in my mind that we have reached the critical crossroads where we will either continue to slide down the Trudeau trail to social, political and economic disaster, or make an abrupt change and return this nation to what it was built upon, namely, an incentive-oriented, free enterprise system. We can no longer allow our Prime Minister to tell Canadians that the free market system will no longer work in Canada. That is precisely what he told Canadians less than two years ago. It is not because the free market system in Canada will not work; it is because the government is strangling that system with bureaucracy, controls, regulations, directives, etc. Clearly it is obvious that under our present Prime Minister the only decision government has taken is the decision to change this country.

Of course, there is no doubt that changes must take place in the history of any nation in order to keep pace with the ever-changing world around us.

Mr. Rodriguez: Free enterpriser.

Mr. Jelinek: I stand here today not only as a member of the official opposition but as a very concerned citizen of this country. I can see where changes brought about by the Prime Minister are leading us. Along with millions of other Canadians, I do not want this country to change from the political, social and cultural greatness it was built upon.

I hear an hon. member of the New Democratic Party calling me a "free enterpriser".

Mr. Rodriguez: Right on!

Mr. Jelinek: He is correct. I am a free enterpriser and I am proud of it.

● (1552)

Mr. Paproski: Not like you, turkey.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, sadly we are no longer the envy of the world. While many other nations strive for togetherness, we squabble amongst ourselves about all aspects; the economy, unity, labour, etc. One province fights against another, the west against the east, the French against the English and one against another, all resulting from the short-term, ad hoc political indecision of this government in the name of change instead of in the name of harmony and co-operation.

Let me give one example. Why do we not cater, since we cater to socialism in this country, to the development of the secondary manufacturing sector? Our secondary manufacturing sector has virtually disappeared. Even the auto parts industry is suffering. The deficits within that industry are phenomenal.

The government has shifted its obligation. The governmet has shifted its priorities to handouts and to increasing UIC benefits to such an extent that it is bankrupting our economy. This government is loaning millions of dollars interest-free to other countries. We must continue to sell some of our natural resources abroad, I agree, but we certainly should not sell them all. Surely we shoud take advantage of some of those natural resources which make this country so wealthy by utilizing them in secondary manufacturing at home. Instead, we ship them to Japan, the United States and elsewhere where those resources from this land create jobs, productivity and healthy economies. We then in turn buy the finished products, often at inflated prices, and most often made from materials that were dug out of this country.

When the Prime Minister and the government are able to show our trade deficit being close to balanced, it is only because we are so rich in natural resources. Yet we are exporting our natural resources and importing the finished goods. That is not a healthy situation for any country, and certainly not for one that operates within a free enterprise system. We loan millions and even billions of dollars interest-free to foreign countries, yet we cannot afford to assist our small businesses at home. We make these loans to countries such as Algeria, Cuba and others.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

Mr. Jelinek: Again a member of the NDP says "hear, hear". They would love this country to be turned into a socialist state such as Cuba, China, the Soviet Union, Czechoslovakia or Bulgaria. They would then be happy. But that is one reason why the NDP will never become the official opposition in this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jelinek: The beneficial results of increased secondary industry would take the form of the greatest boost possible to our economy. This would resut in a great number of new jobs, more exports and cheaper prices for many items that now have to be imported but which could be manufactured here by secondary manufacturing. The development of secondary industry would give the small businessmen of this country a much needed boost.

Proposals such as this, coupled with tax cuts, government spending restraints—an important factor—the elimination of indexed pensions, reduction of the money supply, the introduction of mortgage interest and property tax deductions, along with the many other proposals which this party and other interested groups in Canada have been making, would all help to reverse the downward economic trend in Canada.

During the last few months the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) has been outlining in detail many such specific and realistic recommendations toward just such a goal. Indeed, I was proud yesterday to hear him reiterate many of those proposals during his eloquent address to this House. It would be redundant, therefore, for me at this time to repeat all the measures that Mr. Clark so eloquently proposed to this House and to the Canadian people for months.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. Would the hon. member refer to an hon. member of this House by his riding, or as the Leader of the Opposition, not by name.

Mr. Jelinek: Everyone knows he is no longer "Joe Who", Mr. Speaker, but rather the Leader of the Opposition. Instead of reiterating those proposals our leader has been making for some time, I should like to dwell briefly on that area of my responsibility on behalf of this party, namely, the area of small business.

As hon. members know, this vital sector of our economy is responsible for the employment of roughly 60 per cent of the labour force and, therefore, is a sector that can make or break the economic fabric of our nation. In view of the continual disturbance throughout my remarks caused by the NDP, perhaps I should suggest that they would like to nationalize even the small businesses of this nation.

Although the Prime Minister did appoint a member of his cabinet over two years ago to look after the affairs of the small businessman in Canada, and this at our urging, the fact remains that this sector continues to be sadly overlooked. It was the initiative of the Conservative party that prompted the first full debate on small business in parliament on March 28, 1977. We have had the opportunity to repeat that debate on several occasions since, each time outlining in detail the many specific recommendations beneficial not only to the small business community but to our economy as a whole.

It is true, of course, that as a result of our insistence, as well as the urging of such small business interest groups as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, chambers of commerce and others, the government was shamed into taking some belated steps in the proper direction. Unfortunately, with each little step the government has taken forward in respect of small business it has taken a giant step backwards in general economic matters.

It is not just specific small business policies that affect small business, as I hope to outline quickly in just a few moments; it is also the lack of general long-range programs that adversely affect the over-all economy of Canada. One example is this government's inability to act decisively in respect of labour situations. Instead of trying to unite labour and management with government, it creates a spirit of confrontation. Each time Canadians are threatened by an essential service strike, which unfortunately is regularly, the government panics and ends up by legislating the strikers back to work. Unfortunately, the economy suffers and Canadians are inconvenienced. In addition, when you legislate an essential service union back to work you in fact take away the right to strike.

We all know we are once again faced with a postal strike. I refer again to this matter because such a strike has an adverse effect on everyone, but on no one more than the small businessman. The small businessman depends on daily mail delivery. Postal strikes have been regular in this country as a result of the inability of this government to establish some long-range policy. Small businesses have suffered drastically, to the extent that every time there is a postal strike many small businesses go bankrupt. This adds to our unemployment situation, to our poor productivity and our inflation, not to mention the millions of dollars lost to our economy and the inconvenience caused to all Canadians.

Indeed, it was a surprise last August 1 when the Prime Minister went on television without telling anybody in his cabinet, in the civil service or anywhere else, and said that he was finally fed up with what was going on within the Post Office. He must have been the last Canadian to be fed up with the post office situation; I do not know where he has been for the last few years. That was August 1 and since then he has not done one thing about it. Already we have had one rotation of strikes and now we are on the eve of having a national strike once again, after the Prime Minister finally decided that he was fed up with the Post Office situation.

The Post Office is not only to blame for this matter, because it is a fact that the government has no long-range, realistic policies in that regard, that there is trouble within the Post Office, and, indeed, within the civil service and the whole labour situation throughout Canada.

Our party back on May 18, 1977, was concerned to such a point with the Post Office situation that we used one of our opposition days to discuss it. I will read the motion from that day under the name of my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Brandon-Souris (Mr. Dinsdale). It reads as follows:

That this House notes with alarm the government's continuing inability to provide Canadians with an efficient postal service, its obsession with secrecy, its illegal use of orders in council to set postal rates, and its chronic ineptness in the field of collective bargaining and industrial relations, and recommends that the operations of the Post Office Department be referred to a special joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate.

That was in May of last year, a year and a half ago. It was a good recommendation that received good debate from everybody. Yet for a year and a half the government have sat on their rumps without taking one positive step to deal with the situation; hence we are stuck with a forthcoming postal strike.

Two days ago I took the opportunity to move a motion under Standing Order 43 similar to this motion made by the hon. member pleading with this House to form a joint committee to study the proposals and recommendations that have come forward and to deal with the matter once and for all, rather than dealing with the Post Office on an ad hoc basis. Again it was rejected by the government because they would rather wait until the country was hit with a postal strike and with the disruption it causes the country, the small businessman and every industry from coast to coast. My recommendation falls along the same lines of that of my colleague from Brandon-Souris. I would like to see that committee formed, a joint committee of members from the House of Commons and the Senate.

What would that committee study, Mr. Speaker? Recommendations from many people. Very quickly, my recommendations would be as follows. First, we should study within that committee the possibility of sector bargaining. I have a secret cabinet memo of two years ago where this was discussed in cabinet after the government was questioned on sector bargaining. It makes so much sense because each industry within our economy has three, four, five or more different unions within it. The Post Office is no different. The letter carriers went on a rotating strike last month. That issue was settled and now we have CUPW going on strike.

Another example is the airlines. First we had the pilots threatening to strike. That issue was settled after a lot of money was spent on negotiations. The airlines went back into operation and then it was the baggage handlers who struck. I am not sure if I have it in the right order. After the baggage handlers it was the stewards and stewardesses. Next will be someone else, another union within the airlines. There are too many unions within each industry. It would be far simpler and make more sense to deal with each sector as one unit and in that way at least Canadians would be free of strikes in essential service sectors for the duration of the contract.

Talking about the strike, I am sorry to report to the hon. members present that on the four o'clock radio news, ten minutes ago, Mr. Parrot of CUPW walked out of the talks that were in progress. This is the attitude we get. There is no doubt in my mind, now that Mr. Parrot has walked out, that we will be in a strike situation. I will support back to work legislation as soon as it is presented to us, but that is not the solution for the future and neither is the proposal of making the Post Office a Crown corporation. Air Canada is a Crown corporation. What is the government trying to do before an election? It is trying to fool the people into thinking that if the Post Office is made a Crown corporation, the situation will be resolved. There is no way that can happen.

Another area that I would like to see studied in committee is secret ballot voting. Hon. members will recall that last year the postal strike in Toronto took place because the majority of the rank and file members in the Toronto union did not get a chance to vote, and when they did vote they were afraid to go against the self-proclaimed radical leaders within that union. And they were self-proclaimed; it was public knowledge.

If the union is not afraid to follow the wishes of its rank and file members, they should not be opposed to secret ballot voting within the unit. For that matter, if the unions were not afraid of dealing directly and positively with the situation, I do not think that they should be afraid of a government-appointed overseer within the unions so that baseball bat tactics would be eliminated. I am not making things up when I say this because we all know that this is the case with many of our militant unions, whether it be the seafarers union or others.

Our party has been prompting the government to create such a committee instead of dealing on an ad hoc basis and saying, "Oh, yes, we are going to legislate them back to work." I would like to speak longer on this subject, but I said that I would move to different matters, and I know that my time is running out.

Briefly, I would like to refer to our small business policy. As the Leader of the Opposition said, "We don't mind the government stealing our policies as long as it is for the well-being of the country." Certainly the small businessman needs to be looked after. We would recommend two things to help small business. First, we recommend the removal of as much government regulation, directives and controls from small business as possible. Let small businesses operate on their own. The minister must be commended for finally taking steps to reduce the paperwork burden.

This is a small step in the right direction, but it does not go far enough. Our party would create, and it will create after the next election, a small business secretariat which is independently operated through the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Minister of State (Small Business) (Mr. Abbott), sincere as he may be, with the small business community, has his hands tied behind his back in trying to deal with the problems and potential of small business because he has to go through the massive bureaucracy of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, which is run by the old cowboy—who will no longer be here after the next election.

Under this independent secretariat we would pass a small business act which would, first of all, define what small business is. Ironic as it may seem this government does not yet know what the definition of small business is. We have asked time and time again and each time they have given a different definition. This confuses small businessmen in the country even more than they are already because they do not know into which category they fall.

Third, we would pass a small business act which would encompass the over-all problems of the small business sector and create such incentives and policies as tax incentives for investment in small business, the creation of an export and import consortium operated through the government and assisted by the government, a "set aside" program that made sure that a certain portion of products, management and so on, would be purchased by governments rather than just big business. I will not go over our whole policy again as we have stated it on many other occasions.

I should like to close by reading one editorial, if I may, Mr. Speaker. I am not one for reading editorials but I think this one sums up the wastefulness of this government—the wastefulness of borrowing money and lending to other countries and the fact that we are not taking care of ourselves before we take care of others.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the consent of the House. Does the hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek) have consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Pierre De Bané (Matane): Mr. Speaker, I would like to seize this opportunity to talk about my area, eastern Quebec. It is my sincere belief, Mr. Speaker, that if Canada were to experience today the intense problems facing the Gaspé peninsula we would have an open revolution on our hands. You have no idea of the degree of suffering and misery to be found in that area which I am proud to have represented for the past ten years. And if you allow me, I would like to begin by quoting some figures on this all at once so beautiful and so battered area which hardly represents 1 per cent of the Canadian population. But the better to show the acuity of the problems plaguing that area I will put them into perspective with those of the province of Quebec.

From 1961 to 1971, the population of Quebec has increased by 14.6 per cent while at the same time the population of the Gaspé peninsula, more precisely that of the Lower St. Lawrence and the Gaspé peninsula has experienced a decrease of 6.8 per cent. These figures would take a more dramatic significance if I mentioned that the Gaspé peninsula is the only area of Quebec which has had a decline in its population over the past 15 years. All areas of Quebec have had an increase in their population and in four of these areas—As everyone knows, Quebec is divided into ten administrative regions and once again only the Gaspé peninsula has experienced a drop in its population during the past 15 years. As for the other regions, four have experienced an increase in their population above the average rate for Quebec and they are the Montreal area, the Outaouais region, the city of Quebec and the North Shore. It is also the Gaspé peninsula which has had such a negative balance in migratory trends that it has offset its natural increase. As a matter of fact nearly 140,000 people have left eastern Quebec since 1961.

It is also the most rural area in Quebec with the majority of its people, 53 per cent, being considered rural people. Furthermore, we have barely 4 per cent of Quebec's labour force. To further illustrate how our area is shrinking I will mention that the number of people working in 1961 was higher than the number working at the time of the last census in 1971. In fact the number of people who had a job decreased by 1.3 per cent. Indeed, in 1961 there were 84,267 people working as against 83,150 in 1971. It is the only area in Quebec to have experienced such a drop. I remind you, to put those figures in a national perspective, that every year in Canada we have 250,000 more people working than the previous year while in my area, even in absolute figures, there are fewer people working today than 15 years ago.

On the other hand, if we look at the participation rate, that is the relationship between the labour force and the total population 18 years of age and over, we see that in the Gaspé area the rate is the lowest in the province with 45.6 per cent while in Quebec it is 52 per cent. In other words we consider a good part of the people in the Gaspé area as part of the labour force while we all know that if work were available there would be no reason why we should have a lower participation rate than the national average.

However it is the less educated area not because people do not go to school but quite the contrary because every year about 7,000 youths as soon as they are out of the Polyvalente or the CEGEP leave the area because of a lack of work. It is also the area where the average income per worker is the lowest in Quebec. According to the latest statistics of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, incomes were about 60 per cent lower than in the Montreal metropolitan area.

As concerns unemployment, I find it most surprising and discouraging that while we have the lowest activity and participation level in the province of Quebec we also have the highest unemployment rate. I shall quote a letter dated September 23, 1974 from the then minister of manpower and immigration, the hon. Mr. Andras, now President of the Treasury Board, who wrote me:

> As you mentioned, there is no doubt that the general unemployment level in Gaspé is higher than in Newfoundland.

So, as concerns our unemployment rate it is the highest in the province of Quebec and I would even say in Canada. Contrarily to the province of Quebec as a whole, unemployment is higher in the male population to the extent that the male labour forc has decreased between 1961 and 1971 in spite of an increase in the male population 15 years old or more. According to the statistics bureau of the government of Quebec, personal income in the province has soared by 130 per cent between 1961 and 1971. If you do not take Montreal centre into account, it rose during that decade by 160 per cent for the whole province and by 124 per cent for Gaspé. So, even in light of those figures which are somewhat less dramatic than the first I quoted, you see that the gap is still widening.

On the other hand, the per capita personal income is the lowest in Quebec. Indeed, it should be noted that this area has the lowest rate of activity and the highest average family size. What is even more surprising, Mr. Speaker, is that transfer payments represent 22 per cent of personal income, and this is where we have the highest per capita percentage. It is not in our area that transfer payments are the highest. In our area, in eastern Quebec, they are $405 per capita while they amount to $464 per capita in the eastern townships, for example. There are many reasons for this. For instance, unemployment insurance is based on the wages earned during the employment period and other such factors.

I mentioned earlier certain population shifts. The population of eastern Quebec was at its highest in 1961 with 349,000 people, but since then it has been going down regularly to such a point that today, even with a very high birth rate, it reaches only about 318,000. Of course, the area has long been the victim of negative migration, but with the fall of the birth rate, there is no natural increase to compensate for these negative migration figures. Once again, the characteristic which I find most eloquent and most depressing is that the number of workers in the Gaspé peninsula is lower now than it was 15 years ago. In absolute numbers, there are 1,000 fewer workers today than in 1961. Yet, during that same period, we have created several million jos in Canada and, each year, the labour force increases by over 250,000 people. Some will say to this that the answer for an area with as many resources as ours would be to rationalize the various resource sectors.

In this regard, the Economic Council of Canada recently published a remarkable study by Mr. Michel Boisvert on the correspondence between the urban system and the economic base of Canadian regions. This paper includes a study on eastern Quebec, and I must say that this effort of rationalization and consolidaton of basic and resource sectors of traditional sectors has been going on in the Gaspé area for a few years. However, I do not believe that we can hope to increase the number of jobs in these various sectors in the future for the simple reason that most of the effort and the progress have already been made. So, in forestry operations for instance, it is noted that on Crown lands, the coniferous forests west of the Matapedia Valley are developed to the extent of almost 100 per cent of their potential. In the eastern part of the region, because of a more rugged topography, the potential is not fully developed. However, the development of coniferous forests on Crown lands is comparatively intensive. As far as private wood lots are concerned, conifers seem to be overexploited throughout the territory.

As regards farming, it seems that more than an economic acreage has been cleared up. Although farming on the coastal plain and along the Chaleur Bay is definitely profitable, several hinterland farms are switching to beef cattle production or are sold to city dwellers who leave them in fallow.

The area is not exempt either from the problem of getting young farmers to take over, rampant throughout Quebec. Marine fisheries went through a strong expansionary period in the early 1970s, but the level of catches has been declining since because of a significant decrease in resources. In mining, there is a marked slowdown in copper-related activities. Caused by unfavourable pricing conditions on the international scene, this slowdown has been mainly featured by the closing down of the Madeleine mines and also by declining activities in Murdochville.

In the tourist industry, the yearly volume of clients varies between 350,000 and 500,000, and apparently that level is difficult to exceed. All this suggests, Mr. Speaker, that the traditional ways of managing resources in eastern Quebec may have reached their maximum potential. The exploitation of resources leaves little room for additional job creation and limits expansion in the manufacturing industry. Barring changes, unemployment will remain high, emigration will continue and the population will decline. This tendency toward an extensive use of economic resources is coupled with another factor of equal significance to our area, namely the specialization of productions. The agricultural effort was directed mainly towards dairy production. Forestry went progressively towards pulp and paper, while our mineral production is still strongly concentrated on copper.

But this specialization in production leads necessarily to dependency. This dependency is particularly felt on our regional economy which is very sensitive to any change in government policies and to international market fluctuations. For example lower copper prices on world markets forced closure of the Madeleine mines. The entire agricultural sector is being affected by changes made in dairy policies and in policies on feed grain movements. The future of the forestry industry will have to be revised in light of tighter international competition for the production of pulp and paper and in view of the higher cost of imported energy.

Finally, a generally unfavourable economic context directly influences tourism. This phenomenon of specialization makes the economy of the region even more vulnerable, all the more so when the exploitation of its resources is already close to its maximum. And what is more remarkable, Mr. Speaker, is that these efforts of normalization still brought a decrease in labour or a rise in skilled labour but over-all it meant a smaller labour force.

For example in 1971 agriculture, forestry, fisheries and mines accounted for 17 per cent of skilled labour in the area and for 13.2 per cent of the gross domestic products at factor cost. For the whole of Quebec, this ratio was 5.6 per cent and 6.2 per cent. Nevertheless between 1961 and 1971, the effects of serious strengthening of our primary industry and of the development of secondary and tertiary industries were being felt and the economy of eastern Quebec was undergoing substantial strutural change. In 1961, 30 per cent of the skill employed in the area and 20 per cent of the gross domestic product were corrected to primary industry. In terms of labour, between 1961 and 1971, agriculture lost 52 per cent of its strength, forestry 66 per cent and fishery 23.7 per cent. Mines were the only industry with a growth of 5.6 per cent between April 1961 and 1971. To conclude these statistics on the region, Mr. Speaker, eastern Quebec is still the area with the lowest employment rate and the highest unemployment rate in Quebec.

In 1971, only 45 per cent of all men and women over 15 were in the labour force. For Quebec as a whole, I repeat that this percentage was 52.9 per cent. Moreover, that year, some 5,300 eastern Quebec residents, that is 6.3 per cent of the active labour force, were working outside the province. In spite of this, 16 per cent of the labour force was unemployed in June. Unemployment statistics also show clearly the importance of seasonal activities: agriculture, fishing, forestry, peat bogs, tourism.

One notes a sharp difference between June and October, when the unemployment rate goes from 13 per cent to 17 per cent, and betwen November and May, when it goes from 20 per cent to 26 per cent. No other region shows such sharp fluctuations. For Quebec as a whole, the gap between the best summer month and the worse winter month is less than 2 per cent. On the other hand, considering government investments per capita, one realizes that they were less than the Quebec average for 1976-77.

Mr. Speaker, after having drawn such a picture, I think the conclusion is quite clear: new means of action will be required. In the last ten years or so, since 1968 to be more precise, the federal and Quebec governments have invested together $411 million to upgrade the various sectors in the Gaspé peninsula and equip that region with infrastructures. About $300 million out of those $411 million came from the federal government.

Unfortunatey, one finds today that despite the offer made several times to the Quebec government, the one now in power in that province, they still refuse to enter into another general agreement for eastern Quebec, even though under the first agreement the Quebec government was responsible for identifying, defining, developing and implementing the projects, while the federal government was paying almost three quarters of the amount. Today they refuse to enter into another agreement and I think the federal government should, under the circumstances, amend the Department of Regional Economic Expansion Act in order to allow that department itself, within our own jurisdictio, to take action in this area by other means than sectorial agreements which have little impact on the area or again through industrial incentives.

So that is, in my view, my first recommendation. The second, Mr. Speaker, is that the Department of Finance should introduce fiscal measures giving the private sector such a marked advantage that it would compensate for the drawbacks inherent in establishing a business in such a remote area. There are only a few paths open to us, Mr. Speaker. Either we let the people continue to emigrate reluctantly from an area which does not alow them to earn a living, or the state becomes a providence state, an employer state, or else, as I just said, the Department of Finance should drop its uniform income tax schedule across the counry. For instance, if we were to tell businessmen considering the possibility of operating in such an area that they would not have to pay any income on profits for a period of ten or 25 years, provided the profits are reinvested in the area, I feel, I am convinced such a solution not only would cost the government less than the transfer payments we are making now, but also would give back a sense of dignity to the population.

I see that very large amounts of money were invested in all kinds of social programs in my area, Mr. Speaker, and that the population is deeply humiliated to have to accept those handouts. I say to the Department of Finance that as long as there are fiscal measures, and to the Bank of Canada that as long as there are monetary measures like those we have today, regional inequalities are going to increase in Canada. I gave statistics, Mr. Speaker, to show that the economic situation in my area has been getting worse for 15 years and the very timid efforts made for one or two years by the Department of Finance to regionalize fiscal policy are not sufficient.

Recently I asked federal and provincial civil servants in my area how many businesses have established themselves in Gaspé in the last ten years. Even though we have invested over $411 million to build roads, harbours, airports and industrial parks in that area during that period, they could not mention the name of five outside firms which had come to settle there. I would like someone to tell me why any industry would establish itself in that area, once again an area with less than 1 per cent of the total population of Canada and which is so far from the markets?

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that, all things being equal, and market pressures being what they are, no manufacturing industry will ever settle in our regions. The rationalization of the resource sectors was done at great costs. We do not think we will be able to go much further. So either we accept that our young people leave eastern Quebec at a rate of 7,000 a year, or else we innovate and do what other countries have done, that is offer such tantalizing tax advantages that private enterprise will want to settle in those areas.

What I am suggesting is that in the budget that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) will present within two months, we try such an experiment in two or three areas which in total would represent 3 or 4 per cent of the Canadian population. I am thinking, for example, of eastern Quebec, northeast New Brunswick and maybe another region in the maritimes. Let us try this experiment. Let us drop these measures which are not only extremely costly for the government but are also a source of profound humiliation for the people. Mr. Speaker, people do not want unemployment insurance, they do not want social welfare. They want work. I say that in the market system we have in North America, the best one, it must be recognized that in areas far from the market, the government must introduce new policies and the tax schedule must be the same at the other end of the country as in Toronto or in Montreal. This is complete nonsense. And it is certainly not through industrial incentives which businessmen must finally pay back within three years that we are going to encourage investors to establish themselves in the maritimes or in Gaspé.

My colleague, the hon. member for Bonaventure-Îles-de-la-Madeleine (Mr. Béchard) was telling me that the major industry now operating in New Richmond would not be there if it had not been offered considerable tax benefits at that time. It has been a decisive factor for its establishment in that area. And once again I urge the Minister of Finance to try this experience when he presents his budget next month. It would be much less costly, Mr. Speaker, than the $50 million spent each year in my constituency on unemployment insurance and social welfare. I have suggested that idea. I know that the Department of Finance and the Bank of Canada are reluctant to take different financial and monetary measures, but to show you what happens when the Bank of Canada wants to ignore something and to indicate how far things have gone I would point out that the biggest and wealthiest bank in Canada, the Royal Bank of Canada, does not have even one branch in my constituency which has more than 60,000 people. How can they say that private enterprise is concerned about regional disparities when this same bank is going to open branches on every street corner in Toronto, Ottawa or Montreal, yet not a single one throughout my riding?

This demonstrates, Mr. Speaker, that it will be absolutely necessary to innovate and to reform our monetary and fiscal policies. I know that the new system will be more complicated but there is no reason why we should sink into pessimism or gloom. In the face of a difficult situation, I think that politicians should be able to react positively and the deterioration my constituency is presently going through is simply unacceptable. We have been elected on a just society platform. We promised justice at the national level to the two main ethnic groups—French-speaking and English-speaking Canadians—and justice at the economic level which will allow all Canadians to enjoy the same advantages.

Mr. Roche: Mr. Speaker, may I call it a quarter to five?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. It being 4.45 p.m. it is my duty pursuant to Standing Order 38(3) to interrupt the proceedings and forthwith put any question to dispose of the subamendment which is now before the House.

The question is, therefore, on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Broadbent). Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those in favour of the amendment to the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Call in the members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have been given to understand that the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) has laid upon the table notice of the intention of the government to introduce legislation. If that is the case and if a bill is available, I wonder whether it might be available to all members of the House in order to expedite matters, and so that all members of the House know what the government's legislative intention is respecting the postal strike. We would be prepared to give unanimous consent now for the first reading of that bill, so that it could be printed and distributed immediately in order for all members of the House of Commons to be fully apprised of the government's intention.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I should like to report to the House that this afternoon I discussed with Mr. Parrot and Mrs. Carr possible procedures which could lead to the resumption of negotiations. Mr. Parrot will have discussions with his national executive over the weekend. He has undertaken to study these proposals. Also he has undertaken to meet with me on Monday. In light of this, I would appreciate no further action being taken until these further discussions with Mr. Parrot take place on Monday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we all appreciate receiving the minister's statement because this is an important matter. I am sure he spoke seriously. Before he leaves, I wonder if he could tell us, whether, in the course of the discussions he has had with his colleagues, the Postmaster General and the president of CUPW, there was the assurance that postal services will be continued until Monday and while these negotiations are taking place.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I should like to give the full details of the discussions which took place, but in a spirit of mutual co-operation and goodwill, in order to achieve a negotiated settlement, hon. members of the House will appreciate that I cannot divulge the total conversations I have had. Indeed I have expressed the concern of members on both sides of the House regarding the fact that there has been a partial disruption of postal services, and that I was hoping these partial disruptions would cease. Obviously the union will know that the government already has served notice, if a settlement is not reached, to bring forward a piece of legislation to deal with the situation. It is my hope that this will not be necessary.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at eleven o'clock in the morning, pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 5.14 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ANSWERS TO ORDER PAPER QUESTIONS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising from the practice of the government to cover-up and conceal information from parliament on questions asked by the opposition, in particular when the answers might be embarrassing to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) or any of the ministers. An indication of this is, among other things, that at the conclusion of the last session there were many unanswered questions—some on the order paper for weeks and months—which, unless placed on the order paper for this session, will remain unanswered. To ensure that they will be answered, I move:

That all of the said questions be added to the present order paper, in order that the answers thereto shall be given without delay.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The former solicitor general, Mr. Fox, at the time the McDonald commission of inquiry was established, with reference to the commission's right to decide what was or was not to be held in camera, said the following:

Whether or not the commission would do it in camera or in public depended on the decision of the commission itself in conformity with those terms of reference and powers.

Considering that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was quoted in the Ottawa Citizen last Saturday, October 14, as having said, the commission "shouldn't have the right to tell the public what a minister said to me about the operations of the RCMP" both contradicts what the former solicitor general said and completely undermines the integrity of the McDonald inquiry, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House instructs the government to live up to its original commitment by accepting Judge McDonald's decision as announced last Friday that it is the commission itself which has the right to decide what testimony and evidence is to take place in public and what is to be kept in camera.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADA ELECTIONS ACT

SALE OF ALCOHOLIC BEVERAGES ON ELECTION DAYS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning a section of the Canada Elections Act pertaining to the requirement prohibiting the serving of alcoholic beverages in restaurants and the opening of retail liquor stores while a federal election or by-election is in progress, thus resulting, as an example, in the ridiculous situation existing in the Toronto riding of Rosedale, where restaurants may legally serve alcoholic beverages today on the west side of Yonge Street from the waterfront to Merton Street but may not do so on the east side of Yonge Street because it is in Rosedale.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie):

That the government immediately bring before the House an amendment to the Canada Elections Act, following the example set by the Ontario Progressive Conservative government with regard to provincial elections, in order to allow licensed establishments, etc., to remain open on federal election days, and thus remove this Victorian anachronism not in accord with present-day thinking.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time can only be done with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

GRAIN

MOVEMENT THROUGH CHURCHILL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Due to a two-week strike at the port of Churchill this summer, grain movement through the port will be down by seven million to nine million bushels. This will place the port in a loss position. The port has a storage capacity of some four million bushels. It is my understanding that there are no plans to utilize this available storage. Therefore, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil):

That the government instruct the Wheat Board to use the port of Churchill storage, which will give the farmers a break in increased quotas and place the port in a break-even cash position.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time, pursuant to the Standing Order, only with unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

TRAIN SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I ask for unanimous consent, under Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. Last week, CN informed the unions of its intention to reduce train service in the province of Newfoundland. This constitutes a major breach of the undertaking given to this House by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) that there would be no reduction in CN train service in Newfoundland during the life of the royal commission on CN's operations in that province. That commission, sir, has yet to submit its final report. I move, therefore, seconded by the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie):

That this House directs the Minister of Transport to order CN to continue the present level and frequency of train service in the province of Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate at this time requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY

REQUEST FOR AMENDMENT TO LEGISLATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, and seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas), I move:

That this House urges the government to introduce, without delay, an amendment to the Old Age Security Act to end the discrimination therein against persons of single status between the ages of 60 and 65 by providing for the equivalent of the spouse's allowance to be available to all persons between the ages of 60 and 65, regardless of marital status, provided they are out of the labour market.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

PRESENCE IN GALLERY OF SECRÉTAIRE GÉNÉRAL DE L'ASSOCIATION INTERNATIONALE DES PARLEMENTAIRES DE LANGUE FRANÇAISE

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and relates to the unanimous view of the McDonald royal commission that in so far as the confidentiality of testimony is concerned, the same rules that have applied to the police should apply to politicians. I wonder whether the Prime Minister would tell us if he continues to contest that unanimous view of the royal commission?

● (1112)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, in terms of access by the commission to anything ministers or senior officials may have said or thought or written, there is absolutely no distinction between them and the ordinary policeman, to use the expression of the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows very well what he is attempting to do now, and that is to say that where it is within the discretion of the royal commission to publicize the testimony of police officers, it is not within the discretion of the royal commission to publicize the testimony of politicians. In other words, he is proposing a double standard: one standard for the police, that of openness, and another standard for politicians, that government people who might have things to hide have the ability to take away from the commission the right to decide what is made public.

Are we correct in assuming that the Government of Canada will continue to contest the idea that there should be the same standard applied to testimony relating to ministers of the Crown as is applied to police officers?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition has made a little speech and I can say that it is quite incorrect. The rules will be the same in both cases, whether it is a policeman, minister or senior official of the RCMP, as they apply to the commission.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, what the Prime Minister is saying, as he says so often, is that black is white. That is clearly not the case. There has clearly been a misrepresentation here. Since counsel for the government, Mr. Nuss, is reported as saying, after he received and heard the unanimous position of the royal commission, that there are other remedies open to the government, I wonder if the Prime Minister would tell the House of Commons what those other remedies are.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition is probably talking about hypothetical situations. As far as I know, in every case where the commission has wanted to have access to something or to publish something, it has been discussed with counsel for the government and an agreement has been reached. I know of no case where the commission has wanted to do something and has not been able to do it.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Prime Minister will rule that this question is far too hypothetical for him to have to answer to the mere House of Commons, but would he give us an undertaking, now, that if the Government of Canada intends to change the terms of reference of the McDonald royal commission, and to do that by order in council, it will refer the proposed change in the order in council to this House of Commons for review and debate?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the question is hypothetical and it is based on a complete misconception of what the commission itself is saying. It said, quite clearly, in its statement issued last week that in every case where it has asked something of the government, it has been satisfied. For example, on page 3 of the statement it says:

> —all documents requested by the commission, or photocopies of them, have been transmitted by the RCMP to the commission.

On page 4 it says:

> The examination of witnesses to date has not been hampered by the failure to resolve—

There is no case where the government and the commission have not seen eye to eye in everything that has happened in front of the commission. If the Leader of the Opposition is worried about what is going to happen down the road, let him stay around and ask his questions when they happen.

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Solicitor General, who told the House last week that there had been absolutely no change in the government's position vis-à-vis secrecy in the McDonald royal commission, despite the fact that his lawyer argued for approximately eight hours, covering 315 pages of testimony, advocating a very dramatic change of position.

In view of the statement of some 33 pages in length released by Mr. Justice McDonald last week, does the Solicitor General maintain the view that he, through his counsel, has not substantially and dramatically changed the government's position toward the openness of the hearings of the McDonald commission?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated to the hon. gentleman, and as I have made quite clear on a number of occasions, there has been a great deal of openness. The right hon. Prime Minister has substantiated that by quoting chapter and verse from the statement of the commission. There is another statement that I would call to the attention of the hon. gentleman. It is on page 23 of that statement:

> The commission is optimistic that in the future, as in the past, a spirit of reasonableness will enable counsel and the commission to arrive at a result in a particular case which achieves the commission's desire to hear as much evidence as possible in public while at the same time ensuring both that the national security is not endangered and that the public interest is served.

That is exactly the government's position.

● (1117)

Mr. Jarvis: A final supplementary question to the Solicitor General, Mr. Speaker. I am sure the commission's optimism is based on its faith in its own integrity being far greater than the government's in this instance.

With reference to the statement issued last Friday wherein Mr. Justice McDonald said other options were open to the government—one of those options, obviously, is recourse to the infamous provisions of section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act—may I ask the minister if he is considering recourse to that insidious section, or is he considering as an alternative section 41(1) of that act where an application to withhold documents can be made to a superior court judge?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, again, the hon. gentleman is speaking of purely hypothetical cases. I would suggest that he hang around with his leader and ask the questions when they arise.

Oral Questions

PUBLICITY OF McDONALD COMMISSION HEARINGS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his earlier answers to the Leader of the Opposition, he left the impression that the matter to be resolved in this dispute was the question of accessibility of information which, of course, is irrelevant.

The Prime Minister knows that the contradiction which exists between his position and that of the royal commission concerns the question of publicity—open sessions, or closed. Since, in my view, this goes to the root of the issue, I should like to ask the Prime Minister if he stands by what the former solicitor general said on July 6, 1977, in this House: he said that whether or not the commission would do it in camera or in public depended on the decision of the commission itself, in conformity with its terms of reference and powers. This is contradicted by what the Prime Minister said, when referring to the commission and according to a quote in last Saturday's Ottawa Citizen, as follows:

—shouldn't have the right to tell the public what a minister said to me about the operations of the RCMP—

I ask the Prime Minister: has he, or has he not, contradicted, clearly, the right of the commission to decide whether it is going to have its proceedings in public? If he has as is my view, contradicted this basic principle, will he withdraw that and allow the commission to make its own determination, as was promised at the outset?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the New Democratic Party says the problem of access is irrelevant. I do not think it is. I think it is very relevant for the people of Canada and members of the House to know that the government is not only, as the commission says, giving everything to them that they have asked for, but we have even given more. We have led them to files; we have shown them things they should know. I think this is very basic to people judging whether the government is trying to cover up or not. We have confidence in the commission and its independence. We have done everything we could to make sure it got what it wanted, and more than what it wanted was in front of it.

The second aspect of the question is, what can be made public? The commission has taken the position in a statement it issued on Friday, and either through coincidence or happenstance I had no knowledge of what the commission was saying on Friday when I was asked a question in the high school. Therefore, my comment was not on what the commission said, even though the Leader of the Opposition said it was published on Saturday. That is pure coincidence. I had no knowledge of what the commission was saying.

What I was saying to a group of students is that the ultimate responsibility in matters of security and in matters of privy council secrecy cannot be discharged by the government. It is an ultimate responsibility that we must bear. I still stand by that, but as regards the operation of the commission, I want to make it quite clear—as the Solicitor General has, as I have, and as former solicitors general have—that we will co-operate in every way, as the commission says we have, and we do not see any disputes arising. If there are disputes, we will try to resolve them between us, as we have in the past.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I did not, of course, say to the Prime Minister that the question of access was irrelevant to the broad consideration of whether the commission would be able to do its job. Of course it is relevant. I said it was irrelevant to the dispute. The Prime Minister has not clarified that in his answer to me. I should like him to make it very clear. The former solicitor general, Mr. Fox, assured the House that in matters to be decided—whether to be in camera, or not in camera—it was not the government that would decide whether it was on security matters, or other, but it was the commission.

I ask the Prime Minister, now, because according to the statement he made as quoted in the press on Saturday he certainly took a contrary position: is the Prime Minister now assuring the House, and therefore the people of Canada, that the commission will have the right to decide, even on security matters, after it assesses the information in advance, whether testimony or aspects of legal procedures are to be in camera or not. Is the Prime Minister going to say, in certain matters, that the government is still going to insist that it will decide?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am saying that I know of no case in which there has been a difference of opinion, in fact, with the commission.

An hon. Member: Then what?

Mr. Trudeau: Therefore, the question is hypothetical about something which might happen down the road. Right?

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Trudeau: There has been no case of disagreement in terms of what should or should not be published. The commission makes that quite clear, and I repeat it. Therefore, in fact, there is no difference of interpretation about any specific cases.

About the hypothetical case in the future where the government would try to absolve itself of its responsibility—

An hon. Member: Argued by your counsel.

Mr. Trudeau: —argued by our counsel, and argued by myself, that we do have the ultimate responsibility in matters of Privy Council secrets and in matters of national security, we will stand by our responsibility.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I think the Prime Minister has made himself clear. He is now denying what the former solicitor general committed himself to in the House on the very day the commission was set up. The Prime Minister is saying that the government is going to be the judge of itself because of the fact that one of the purposes of this commission was to investigate the possibility of cabinet wrongdoing, a possible illegal wrongdoing.

The Prime Minister is now asserting it is going to invoke the Nixonian document, that it is going to be the final arbiter in a case involving itself, which is totally unacceptable.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, not at all. That is not a question; it is a comment. If I can make a comment in exchange, it is not the position of the government that the leader of the New Democratic Party has stated. I have said that we have the ultimate responsibility. I went on to say that we will discharge that responsibility in every way we can to satisfy the commission. I have said in the past that we have succeeded in doing that. Certainly, if the commission finds some evidence of wrongdoing, fraud or crime by some high official, we will not hide behind the Official Secrets Act or anything else. We will find ways of declassifying documents and co-operating with the commission in the future, as we have in the past.

I am just saying that no doctrine can absolve the government of its responsibility for Privy Council secrets. There are cases where we do make those secrets public, and we have done so in the past. We could in the future, if the commission were to argue this was necessary.

TESTIMONY OF CABINET MEMBERS

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I believe in a simple question being asked of the Solicitor General, and I do so accordingly. There is nothing hypothetical about it. If a police officer—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: There is nothing hypothetical, because it is going to happen.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: If a police officer gives evidence to the effect that the instructions came from a minister of the Crown—and a minister of the Crown, naturally, will be called—will he be permitted to say whether or not he gave the alleged statement that the police officer indicates, or will he hide behind the Prime Minister's smokescreen?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that question is quite hypothetical. I draw to the attention of the right hon. gentleman that ministers of the Crown have been quite adamant in appearing before that commission and in making the evidence related to any of the matters quite open.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Hiding, as usual.

SOCIAL SECURITY

QUEBEC—PETITION RESPECTING WIDOWS' PENSION

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. A petition now being circulated in Quebec is requesting the pension for widows at age 60. Has the minister received a copy of that petition and what does she intend to do about the matter?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a copy of that petition. All I know about recent developments in Quebec in that field is the resolution presented to me at the annual congress of the FADOQ, the Quebec Federation of Golden Age Clubs some three weeks ago. I then told the 800 delegates that it was financially impossible for the government to accede to their request but that it was essential for me to be aware of the public view on the possibility of having widows and widowers who lose their spouse allowance kept on the roll for a few months to give them time to readjust to their new way of living.

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary.

As in several cases that is the only income those people have, what does the minister intend to do to solve their problem since she suggests the pension might be paid for a few more months? What about the following months until they reach 65; what are those people going to do?

Miss Bégin: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is misleading the Canadian people through his question. Those people represent a number of spouses aged 60 to 65, whose mates, on retirement, have been receiving for three years only a supplementary pension in case of need. The real problem is not so much those people, but all the needy aged 60 to 65. We are now paying—and perhaps the hon. member does not agree with our way of going about it—hundreds of millions of dollars each year in taxpayers money in the form of global financing to the provinces, of which that of Quebec, precisely to help pay welfare benefits to those people. The hon. member would like a supplementary pension to be paid by the federal government; in other words, he is telling me that Quebec wants still more money from the federal. There already are programs through which those people get money, programs of which we contribute more than 50 per cent of the cost.

USE OF PENSION FUNDS

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, another supplementary.

I know very well that the federal government transfers fairly important amounts of money to the provinces. Is the minister certain that the provinces do indeed use those funds as intended?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this question enables me to make a correction. I said "under the block funding system". Block funding applies only to social services; the amounts transferred under the Canada Assistance Plan represent exactly one half of each payment made to individuals and under the law it is impossible for Quebec or any other province to put that money elsewhere.

EFFECT OF INCREASED INTEREST RATE—PRESENTATION OF BUDGET

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. On Friday the thirteenth—a bad luck day for Canada—the Bank of Canada, with the consent of the government, raised the central bank interest rate to 10¼ per cent. This is the fifth increase in seven months—a 28 per cent increase since March 9, and the largest single increase at any one time since 1935.

In view of the viciously damaging effects this will have on economic growth in Canada, can the Prime Minister advise the House what the government's plans are to overcome those damaging effects and to reach the 5 per cent growth rate that he promised at Bonn last summer? Will he tell us how the government plans to overcome the discouraging effects this will have on business investment in plant and equipment, already down this year, on small business and on construction? The whole truth is needed now. Is a budget going to be brought down now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Crosbie: What does the government plan to do to overcome these things?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there was a great deal of commentary in that question. Most of it would have been solved for the hon. member if he had read what the governor of the Bank of Canada said when he announced this increase in the bank rate. He said very clearly, at a time when the dollar had been holding steady that day and, I think, even slightly improving, that he suddenly found himself faced with an American bank rate which had increased drastically, and therefore had narrowed the spread between the American and Canadian rates. He responded to that situation in the United States by creating a spread between them which had been reduced by the action in the United States. Therefore, it was not an action based on the performance of the Canadian dollar on that day or days, but it was based on what happened in the United States: the governor said so in as many words, and I would refer the hon. member to his statement.

As to the question asked by the hon. member, yes, there will be a budget; the Minister of Finance has indicated that it will be brought down in the middle of November.

Mr. Crosbie: Is the Prime Minister saying, then, when he refers to the statement by the governor of the Bank of Canada, that this was done because of the increase in United States interest rates, that Canada is now a prisoner of U.S. interest rates policy, that we no longer control our own monetary policy and that the government is content with that position? Is that the situation? Will the Prime Minister comment on that aspect?

Will he tell us, also, whether a statement is to be made on the present issue of Canada Savings Bonds which is obviously not likely to sell well at an interest rate of 8.9 per cent, with the central bank rate up to 10.5? When will new rates be announced for that issue?

Mr. Trudeau: I do not know whether the hon. member is serious in asking that question about our being a prisoner. He must have heard by now that Canada does not operate in a vacuum and that there are other countries in the world whose economic actions influence Canadian bank rates, and so on. There has been traditionally a spread between American and Canadian bank rates, as the hon. member knows or should know. What the governor says is that he is re-establishing that spread after the United States acted in the way it did.

Mr. Crosbie: If he is not a prisoner, then, would the Prime Minister explain to the House how he intends to achieve the 5 per cent real growth rate he promised at Bonn; how he proposes to increase our business investment; how we are to improve the economy if the interest rate continues to go up and up? If we are not a prisoner, how is the Prime Minister going to demonstrate that we are not? When will he break these bonds and show us how he is going to bring the country forward economically?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member will recognize the argumentative nature of that last question.

CANADA SAVINGS BONDS

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Minister of Finance, the President of the Treasury Board. Is it the intention of the government to withdraw the present issue of Canada Savings Bonds and reissue it in a more realistic form? If so, will a statement be made on this matter today, in view of the impact the present rate is having on the sale of these bonds and the position in which people who have already bought this issue find themselves?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (Acting Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I will refer the question to the Minister of Finance under whose jurisdiction this matter properly falls.

Mr. McGrath: My final supplementary is addressed to the Prime Minister. Given the effect this increase in the prime interest rate will have on inflation and unemployment, particularly in areas which are already suffering from regional disparity, and since there will not be a budget for at least another month, what steps will the government take now to offset the disastrous impact of this increase of the prime rate on inflation and regional disparity?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): We have brought forward many legislative measures which will directly affect all parts of the country, particularly those which include less developed areas, and I urge the hon. member to get on with voting support for them.

BANK ACT

FIRST READING OF AMENDMENTS THERETO

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the President of Privy Council in his capacity as House leader. Could the hon. gentleman advise us whether it is the intention of the government to give notice immediately of the first reading of the revisions to the Bank Act? Would he, at the same time, advise us when he will be ready to put a motion on the order paper referring the contents of that bill to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs so that the committee might resume at the earliest possible date its interrupted hearings with regard to those revisions?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): It is the intention of the government to bring forward the revisions to the Bank Act very early in the session. With respect to the method of dealing with the bill, I would be glad to have the assistance of the hon. member and of other hon. members, as we did in arranging the procedure last session.

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. G. W. Baldwin (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister arising out of the first question asked by the Leader of the Opposition in relation to the McDonald royal commission. Bearing in mind that the situation is not hypothetical, as can be seen from the nature of instructions given by the Solicitor General to his counsel and made public to the commission, obviously in anticipation of an attempt by government ministers to hide some information, I should like the right hon. gentleman to assure us that when a conflict arises between the government and the royal commission as to whether or not evidence is of a security nature, the government will not make use of the outdated and infamous doctrine of Crown privilege to hide evidence, as President Nixon used executive privilege in the United States.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): That is a silly question, Mr. Speaker. If the hon. member had taken the trouble to read the statement by the McDonald commission, he would have seen that the commissioners themselves do not make light of what he calls Crown privilege.

It is recognized by anyone who operates in government, or who has any chance of operating in government, that there are some things that are of a nature to be concealed by the state. Let me just quote what the McDonald commission itself says on page 15: they are quoting from a case in 1968, Lord Reid, in the House of Lords: "I do not doubt there are certain classes of documents which ought not to be disclosed whatever the content may be." That is a very clear statement, and this has been a tradition of parliamentary government as long as it has existed. The hon. member pretends that this tradition, this legal doctrine, does not exist. It does—unfortunately for his case.

Mr. Baldwin: Is the Prime Minister not aware that that statement by Lord Reid was related to a decision by the House of Lords that the court would make the final decision with respect to particular evidence, and not the government?

Mr. Trudeau: I am well aware of this case in 1968, but I wonder whether the hon. member is not now changing his whole argument. He is not saying that the McDonald commission should decide; he is saying that the courts should decide. That is exactly what he is saying now, and perhaps that is what the McDonald commission is saying. I see hon. members shaking their heads. Is that not what the hon. member for Peace River has said; that the courts would decide? That is what I am saying, too. There are some cases where privilege may or may not be involved, and it is for the courts to decide whether it is right or not.

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is on the same subject and it is directed to the Solicitor General. The mandate which was given to the McDonald royal commission clearly provided, and I am quoting from it, for the commission to "conduct such investigations as, in the opinion of the commissioners, are necessary to determine the extent and prevalence", and so on. That mandate allowed the commission, in its own wisdom, to conduct whatever investigations it deemed were necessary.

Bearing in mind the Prime Minister's statement today, that he intends to continue to rely on the inherent privilege not to release Privy Council secrets—

Mr. Trudeau: I did not say that.

Mr. Leggatt: —can the hon. gentleman tell the House how the public will ever know what was withheld from it? How will the public ever know that executive privilege has been exercised in any particular case?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): If the hon. member would read the statement made by the commission, he would see at once that the commission intends to proceed in calling such evidence as it deems fit and to decide which of that evidence it wants to make public. At that point the commissioners will be receiving representations from counsel on behalf of the government and the Solicitor General. Undoubtedly, if the commission can make a statement such as it did on Friday, it will subsequently take measures as it deems fit with respect to any representations the government may wish to make.

Mr. Leggatt: Given the fact that the entire investigation deals with matters of national security—the inquiry has been set up to look into this specific subject—and given the fact that the government continues to exercise its inherent privilege, my question is still a simple one: how can the public ever know whether that privilege has been exercised, or that there has or has not been a full investigation into this particular subject in view of the statement of the former solicitor general who said, "whether or not the commissioners would do it in camera or in public depends on the decision of the commission." Does the Solicitor General still stand by that statement?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have a great deal of difficulty following the mental processes of the hon. gentleman. However, as I understand it, the question is exactly the same as the one he posed to me initially: the reply, therefore, is still the same.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

SALE OF SACCHARIN

Mrs. Simma Holt (Vancouver-Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now that the head of the health protection branch has found that he erred in causing the hysteria and panic among Canadian diabetics and obese people that he did over his 1968 statements about cyclamates causing cancer in rats, can the minister tell this House whether the head of the health protection branch has indicated whether he will allow the minister and members of parliament to advise their constituents that this safe sugar substitute can be used in food and soft drinks?

Further, now that the head of the health protection branch considers cyclamates and saccharin safe for sale at the high price of medical exclusivity in drugstores, will the minister release them to the normal and less costly grocery store outlets?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the recent findings of private laboratories on the exact relationship between cyclamates and cancer have permitted the scientific community to determine the acceptable daily intake of cyclamates for humans, which we did not know some ten years ago when we first restricted cyclamates in order to protect people. Based on that new knowledge we are therefore permitting—and I issued a press release, I think last week—the use of cyclamates in prescription drugs only. The safe daily intake is too small, according to scientific knowledge of today, for me to take any decision to liberalize the use of cyclamates in all soft drinks and diet foods. I am not yet in a position to do that.

TRANSPORT

AIRPORTS—EXTENSION OF RUNWAY AT TORONTO

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The coroner's jury inquiring into the Air Canada crash of last June on runway 23 in Toronto in which two lives were lost has recommended that the runway be extended over a creek at the end of the runway. I would like to ask the minister whether he is going to act on the jury's recommendation. I point out to him that the pilot stated that the runway is disastrous.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as in every case of a coroner's decision and recommendations, we will look at these seriously, of course. At this point I do not have an analysis of the cost of the recommendation made in that report, and I obviously cannot make a judgment upon it without knowing that.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, the jury recommended that the runway be extended immediately. If the minister does not have the necessary funds at this point, will he be closing down the runway? The director general of civil aeronautics pointed out in 1976 that there are ten other airports in Canada which are not up to acceptable standards. Have these ten airports been brought up to acceptable standards, and will the minister be closing runway 23?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the work of ensuring that airports are safe and that facilities are safe is ongoing. We take a very serious view of the matter, and I can assure the hon. member that in every case where there is any kind of limitation upon a runway or other feature at an airport which causes us concern, steps are taken. Those steps may include limitations on runways or other facilities. They are taken to ensure the complete and adequate safety of the travelling public. That has been done in this case, and if one compares our standards, our runways and our facilities with those in use in countries all over the world, one will find that ours come out very favourably indeed. I think that should be a real reassurance to the travelling public and I do not think we should be overly concerned about the way in which the hon. member has put his question.

INLAND SHIPPING—LABOUR DISPUTE INVOLVING MARINE ENGINEERS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. My question involves 800 marine engineers who apparently could tie up the inland shipping fleet. I do not have to remind the minister what this would mean in terms of the movement of ore, grain, oil and coal. This matter affects some 2,000 members of the SIU. Can the minister bring us up to date as to the present status of this very important dispute? If these people go out on strike, the effects on the economy will be disastrous.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make it clear that I could not agree more with the hon. member about the serious impact of a strike on the lakes upon many, many sectors of the Canadian economy. I think, as late as midnight last night mediators from the Department of Labour were attempting to work with the parties in order to resolve the dispute which is apparently leading to this shutdown. Later today I will be discussing this matter with the Acting Minister of Labour. However, I can assure the hon. member that the significant impact upon the economy of any prolonged shutdown will be very much on our minds as we look at the present state of play.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, am I to understand, just as the Postmaster General has revealed, that the minister will accept his responsibility with respect to strikes and that he will act quickly and with a sense of urgency? This is what the Canadian people want to hear. Will this minister accept his responsibility and act quickly and urgently? As he has indicated, any strike will have disastrous effects on the Canadian economy. I think the minister knows what I am talking about.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, not only do I know what the hon. member is talking about; I said so just a few moments ago. The Acting Minister of Labour and I have been in very close touch with the parties in the final stages of trying to reach an agreement after a conciliator's report came down. We are fully aware of the seriousness as far as the economy is concerned and, in answer to the hon. member's opening words, I will say, yes, indeed we will continue to accept our responsibilities and attempt to make sure that damage is not done to the Canadian economy.

PUBLIC WORKS

LEASE-PURCHASE AGREEMENTS

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. The minister says he has thoroughly studied the files of two projects in Hull, Place du Centre and the Chaudière project. Does the minister accept the finding of the national finance committee of the other place that in entering into these two lease-purchase agreements the department, with the approval of Treasury Board, failed to observe the cautions taken as a regular course in all other projects for the acquisition of space?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, that is certainly not my understanding. I was very pleased with this report. It zeroed in on several areas such as cost recovery, revenue dependency and the monitoring role of Public Works Canada, which I thought was extremely useful. However, on the question of the lease-purchase which the hon. member is raising, the committee compared our 35-year cost on these projects with five-year lease costs here in Ottawa and across the river in Hull, and on that particular issue I intend to take issue with the members of the committee when I appear before it some time early in the new year.

Mrs. Pigott: Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the minister agrees in certain areas, and I hope he will comment on the conclusion that "the economic benefits of these agreements were questionable". Does the minister agree that the decision to proceed appears to have rested on other than purely economic considerations?

Mr. Buchanan: No, I do not, Mr. Speaker. As a matter of fact, I just indicated to the hon. member that I very much challenge that particular assertion. The rate of increase in this decade has run between 4.5 per cent and 10 per cent in lease rentals in this area. We have projections which show very clearly that on the basis of this, by 1983 we will be many millions of dollars in pocket on these particular lease-purchase arrangements. We think they are sound business ventures.

McDONALD COMMISSION—ROLE OF GOVERNMENT COUNSEL

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Justice in light of answers which have been given today with reference to the McDonald commission. As a basis for my second question I would like to ask whether Mr. Nuss and Mr. Robert act for the Solicitor General or for the Privy Council as a whole. I ask this in light of Mr. Nuss's argument to the commission on Friday and in light of the decision as to who is a compellable witness, what is enforceable evidence, what is admissible and what is irrelevant. Who do these two counsel act for—the whole Privy Council, or just the Solicitor General?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, generally speaking, counsel before the commission are acting on behalf of the government as instructed by the Minister of Justice in consultation with various departments. The role of the Attorney General is special and, of course, his position is special in relation to this, and I will reserve that.

Mr. Woolliams: Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to be clear, in light of that answer. Before the commission, he said that he and Mr. Robert appeared on behalf of the Privy Council and that it was far from clear to them. We know what the commissioner's ruling was as to what is enforceable and compellable evidence. Since the commissioner thinks that it is far from clear, and if there is a dispute between what was said by the commissioner and the Privy Council, the government, is that a matter which will be decided by the courts, the commissioner or the commission?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, once again, the hon. member seems to raise a hypothetical question. The commissioner has observed how completely co-operation and argument before the commission has resolved all these issues. This is how we expect it to continue. Clearly, counsel for the commission is acting for the government. That is a unified whole and not a divided part, with the single exception of the very special role of the Attorney General. However, it should be clear that questions which arise before the commission as to such issues as witnesses or confidentiality will be argued before the commission and then finally decided before the commission. That is the general position we are taking.

There is no great point in looking at questions of ultimate responsibility and hypothetical situations. I think it is better for the general public to recognize that this commission will be operating, making its decisions, and will not be fettered in that regard.

PUBLIC WORKS

LES TERRASSES DE LA CHAUDIÈRE—STATEMENT BY NCC VICE-CHAIRMAN

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Public Works. It is prompted by the following statement of the vice-chairman of the National Capital Commission, Mr. W. T. Perks, which appeared earlier this year in the Ottawa Citizen:

The committee was not asked if this was appropriate.

What we were asked to do was tinker with something that was a fait accompli.

Could the minister explain how the Campeau project could have been a fait accompli in 1974, when the corporation's only holding in the entire six-block pole west area appeared to be a $100,000 option to purchase one property in one corner of the area involved?

Hon. Judd Buchanan (Minister of Public Works and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, this issue was discussed at some length several months ago when it was raised by the hon. member for Capilano. If my memory is correct, at that time I indicated that the contract was signed some time in November of 1975. I will have to verify this. Thus, the comment attributed to Mr. Perks rather puzzles me—the comment to the effect that the matter was a fait accompli a year and a half earlier. It was not a fait accompli until the deal was finalized. At that time there was no question that the Campeau corporation controlled by far the majority of space in the proposed project. Again from my memory, it was somewhere in the area of two-thirds of the space involved in the entire project.

Mr. MacKay: Mr. Speaker, the entire matter continues to puzzle a lot of people. That is why we are attempting to get more facts on the genesis of the entire operation. Does the minister accept the following statement made by Mr. Robert Campeau in a letter to the standing committee on finance of the other place?

Patronage is always involved in the choosing of architects and other consultants for government projects.

Would the minister indicate whether Mr. Campeau's suggestion of patronage would extend, in his opinion, to paying without tender $15 million a year for 35 years for accommodation which, as the Senate report indicates, could have been obtained more economically by following established practices? It is rather an extensive package.

Mr. Buchanan: Mr. Speaker, on previous occasions we have compared Crown construction, lease-purchase and straight lease. As far as comparison with Crown construction and lease-purchase, using the present value we came up with a difference of less than 5 per cent, which at that time we suggested was very much a judgment call. As I indicated to the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton, even with a 3 per cent increase in rental rates—and we have been running in excess of that—we project that by 1983 we will be money in pocket on these transactions.

EFFECT OF INCREASE IN BANK RATE

Mr. T. C. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister: it arises out of an answer he gave a few moments ago respecting the increase in the bank rate. I understood the Prime Minister to say that this action was taken in order to protect the dollar. There have been four previous increases already this year which have resulted in increased consumer and small business loan rates, escalated mortgage rates and discouraged investment. Thus, economic recovery has been hindered.

Why does the Prime Minister believe that this fifth increase will be any more beneficial in protecting the dollar and stimulating the Canadian economy than the four previous increases?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was not expressing the opinion the hon. member indicates. I indicated what the governor gave as a reason for increasing the bank rate.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that supposedly there is a constant relationship between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada, I can hardly separate the governor from the Government of Canada. The Prime Minister referred to the traditional formula of keeping a 1 per cent to 1½ per cent spread between Canadian and American interest rates on the thesis that the higher rate in Canada would attract foreign capital. Also, this discourages Canadian investment in equity capital and tends to direct it into loan capital. In view of those facts, can he tell us why it seems advantageous to the government to attract foreign capital, discourage investments by Canadian investors in their own business activities and direct them into loan capital?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, there would be two effects of the operation. Not only will it attract foreign capital but also it will prevent Canadian capital from going to seek higher returns in the United States and other countries. The effect of an increase in the bank rate is not merely to attract foreign capital, but to keep Canadian capital here. Once again, I am answering the general question of the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands.

In so far as the actions of Friday are concerned, I repeat, as far as I know they were not made in response to anything but the actions in the United States. The behaviour of the Canadian dollar on that particular day did not call for that action. Apparently, it only came very late in the day after the American banks had acted.

AIR TRANSPORT

HIRING OF CONSULTANTS OUTSIDE CANADA—POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES BEING LAID

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. As part of the settlement reached with the American securities and exchange commission, the Boeing Aircraft company admitted that in at least one instance it concluded dual agreements with a Canadian consultant, resulting in the payment of large sums of money to the consultant outside Canada.

Has the Minister of Justice requested assistance from the United States Department of Justice, and when can we expect charges to be laid in connection with these incidents?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not looked at this matter since I returned to this department, but I will inquire as to its state. I presume my officials will have taken note of that. I should like to check it before replying more fully to the hon. member.

Mr. McKinnon: Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Defence. When this subject was being discussed in the House of Commons in March, 1977, the minister said the following:

> Until there is evidence of impropriety, there is no point in holding a full-scale investigation . . . However, my officials are making the files secure so that they are available, and all evidence of people who were involved at that time is collected—

Certainly there is evidence of impropriety at the present time, which impropriety has been known for over two months since the Boeing revelations. What have the results of the investigation been? Who is in charge of it?

Hon. Barney Danson (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, at that time the issue was looked into, and we cannot find any evidence, record or indication of any impropriety involving Canadians or from Boeing itself.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. COSSITT—WORDS IN STANDING ORDER 43 MOTION RESPECTING MR. GOYER

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order in regard to a motion under Standing Order 43 which I moved last Friday, October 13, as reported on page 61 of Hansard. Subsequently it was drawn to my attention by the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Dollard (Mr. Goyer), that a remark contained in that Standing Order 43 motion could be open to misinterpretation with regard to himself. I should like, in all and complete fairness, to correct this situation immediately. The words in question were:

● (1202)

> —that Jean Pierre Mongeau was supplying information to the then Quebec Liberal government's minister of cultural affairs on the Parti Québécois while at the same time he was working with the Prime Minister's then principal secretary, Marc Lalonde, and the then solicitor general the hon. member for Dollard.

I should have said, Mr. Speaker, that Jean Pierre Mongeau was special assistant to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), working with the Prime Minister's then principal secretary, Marc Lalonde, but not in any way working in the office of the solicitor general of the time, the hon. member for Dollard.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S.O. 26

[English]

CONSIDERATION OF EVIDENCE IN PUBLIC

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 26. Your Honour, I would say in advance that, whatever other considerations you may have had on this matter, I hope the opportunity for debate during the throne speech debate will not have been among them, because in this particular case, as Your Honour knows, it is the executive branch of government itself that is being called into question, and to rule in favour of the opportunity to debate this matter of fundamental importance to our system of government during the throne speech debate, while providing the opportunity for the executive to participate, would not, of course, obligate it to do so, and, given its past tradition, we could not expect it to enter the debate.

Having said that, I would ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), the adjournment of the House, under Standing Order 26, for the purpose of discussing a specific and important matter requiring urgent consideration, namely, the statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made in Ottawa last Friday that it will be the government and not the McDonald commission which decides what matters or evidence are to be considered by the commission in public, the consequences of such a position being completely contrary to the integrity of the commission, which the commission itself recognizes.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) has given the Chair notice of his intention, under the provisions of Standing Order 26, to seek a special debate on the subject he has now put forward.

In answering his preamble I would, of course, want him to observe with me that, even if his argument were to have the full weight he desires, he must recognize at once that he is perfectly correct in that the Chair has no power by which the executive, as he describes it, could be compelled to participate during the throne speech debate in respect of this or any other matter.

The hon. member will recognize at once, of course, that neither does the Chair have the power to compel participation by the same executive in any debate if I were to grant the motion under Standing Order 26. I am not sure that this advances the argument. In either case, members of the executive may or may not participate in any debate, as they see fit, whether the debate is under Standing Order 26, or in respect of the throne speech. Therefore, the conditions seem to me to remain the same.

In any event, and this I suppose will be to the hon. member's regret, the fact is that the very paragraph to which he made reference in his preamble is one that does weigh upon the Chair in deciding whether or not the subject he is putting forward should be debated. Several days remain in the throne speech debate. It is, of course, a very jealously guarded right of any member that he may encompass during the course of discussion any subject which relates to the performance of the government, certainly over the past while, or as intended in the future. Therefore I would have to ignore totally the provisions of that subparagraph of the rule if I were to say on this day that we should set aside a particular aspect of want of confidence in the government in respect of one subject.

I must say that I am also concerned with another aspect, and that is that the Chair must decide whether the matter is urgent in nature. In so doing I cannot brush aside the fact that there is a very strong hypothetical tone to all of these questions that were put today. Everyone will have noticed that the Chair did not intervene on the ground that the questions put sought the intended stance of the government if and when in the future a certain event occurred before the royal commission. Those questions are, by their very nature, hypothetical, and certainly anticipate a situation in the future.

I did not interfere with those questions, for two reasons. First of all, a slight change in the form of the questions would bring them to a present consideration, that is, whether or not the government has formed any plans. In addition, I do not think the Chair ought to intervene where, in circumstances of this sort and of this importance, there is an obvious desire on the part of members of the cabinet to give answers, even though the questions do have a hypothetical tone, as was the case today.

However, I cannot ignore the fact that the statement to which reference has been made is a statement about intended conduct in the future. It has raised concern in the minds of members of the opposition, as expressed by this motion, that in the future the McDonald commission will request certain evidence to be given and members of the cabinet may take a certain stance opposed to that, or different from it.

This has been a matter of dispute today which is also difficult for the Chair. Even if this were not in dispute, the fact remains that the crisis to which reference is made in this motion remains in the future. Until the McDonald commission takes certain steps, and until the cabinet has made certain specific responses, upon which this parliament can focus, indicating that there is in fact a difference between them of a critical nature, I think it would be premature for me to accept the basic proposition that a crisis has been arrived at now which warrants the consideration of this rule, instead of at sometime in the future.

For the two reasons I have cited, I would indicate at this moment that I am not prepared to grant the application pursuant to Standing Order 26.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Friday, October 13, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 27).

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, during the summer, three events occurred in Alberta that underscore why I come here with such pride as a representative from that great province.

First, in my own constituency of Edmondon-Strathcona we were honoured to receive the Governor General and Madame Léger who opened the Old Srathcona Foundation House which is dedicated to the preservation of our historical and cultural heritage in Strathcona.

Second, the city of Edmonton's performance in hosting the Commonwealth Games, a magnificent event seen around the world, revealed what a truly friendly and dynamic community we are.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: Third, the opening of the Syncrude plant at Fort McMurray, a $2½ billion project of tremendous complexity, is the leading edge of the economic shift westward in Canada today. All three of these events indicate the extent to which Strathcona, Edmonton, and Alberta as a whole, have been able to progress in all aspects of life, cultural, social and economic. Our life is enhanced by the accomplishments of so many Albertans, the films of Fil Fraser, the novels of the award-winning authors, Pauline Gedge and Aritha Van Herk, the drama productions of the Citadel, Walterdale and other groups. The 10,000 volunteers to the Commonwealth Games are a testimony to our quality of life.

Mr. Paproski: Hear, hear!

Mr. Roche: With our vast resource base, we contribute substantially to the economy of all of Canada. As Canadians first, we Albertans are vitally concerned with the performance of the national economy, for it is only with a strong and vital economy that Alberta or any other province will realize its full potential. The story of Alberta today is one of growth and accomplishment. We are the new builders of Canada. We have the fastest growing gross provincial product in Canada. Per capita spending on education, health, and other social areas is the highest in the country. We have strength and potential and an attractive investment climate. That is why Alberta is now the financial centre of western Canada. Is it any wonder that we attract more than 3,000 newcomers every month, most of them fellow Canadians from other provinces looking for new opportunities?

One would think that the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Trudeau) would at least share in the pride of accomplishment of one of the provinces, but the Prime Minister is blind to Alberta. That blindness cannot be corrected, as a careful reading of his speech last Thursday in the throne speech debate reveals. Every reference he made to Alberta was negative. He had nothing good to say about a province that has been succeeding despite the policies of economic discrimination practised by the federal government. The fact is that the Prime Minister cannot stand any province, especially a strong one, standing up for its rights.

When the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) brings to this House his concern for the erosion of provincial rights, and we have certainly seen this in the government constitutional package, the Prime Minister tells him he should be sitting in a provincial legislature, not here. What gall! In that one remark, and his speech is full of examples, the Prime Minister revealed why he should no longer be in charge of Canada: he does not understand that regional growth and strength are what make this country.

The Progressive Conservative leader recognizes that the provinces are partners in confederation, not enemies. And he said clearly in his speech:

> There will be times when I am going to have to assert national interests in ways that will not at all please the provinces.

Yet the Prime Minister, who seems to interpret co-operation as subservience, ignored this analysis because he cannot imagine an alternative to himself in protecting national unity. The Progressive Conservative leader knows intuitively that Canada is the sum of its parts; the Prime Minister continues to suffer under the delusion that Ottawa is the country. For the Progressive Conservative leader, the issue is ways to have Canada prosper in all regions, not just certain regions. For the Prime Minister, the issue is battling over who has power and jurisdiction.

In his leader's day speech, the Progressive Conservative leader presented economic and constitutional proposals to truly unite Canada. But the Prime Minister spent the bulk of his speech attacking the Leader of the Opposition and deriding provincial premiers. He has used his histrionic "zap" style once too often. For the Prime Minister, it is not jobs, inflation, the falling dollar, regional growth and national unity that are the problems; it is the man who sits 18 feet across the aisle in the House of Commons, the man whom Canadians are turning to as the next Prime Minister.

The present Prime Minister apparently cannot understand what has gone wrong. What has gone wrong, Mr. Speaker, is that he has lost the trust of Canadians. Under our democratic way of life, trust in government is absolutely basic. No nation can aspire to greatness if its government does not command public respect. "If the people can't trust their government," President Harry Truman declared, "the whole works will fall apart." We may or may not always agree with the decisions of government, but our system demands that we at least have confidence that the government is acting honestly.

[Mr. Roche.]

Unfortunately, trust in the government of this Prime Minister has deteriorated so seriously that it has become the root cause of much dissatisfaction in Canada today. The cynicism toward Ottawa, found coast to coast, is traceable to the manipulation practised by this government. In fact the issue of trust in the leadership of our country has become the core issue of our time.

A long series of misadventures has characterized this government's decade in office; the Sky Shops affair, dredging contracts, phone calls to judges, questionable payments by Crown corporations, the uranium cartel, a blacklist of extra-parliamentary opposition. We have learned to live with these shabby scandals and improprieties. But the government's own sense of morality has been undermined from within. Consequently a weakened commitment to principle for its own sake has infected the larger area of policy formulation. Here the examples become more serious.

The Prime Minister legislated wage and price controls after having campaigned in the 1974 election against them. He forced an abolition bill on the country when the majority of Canadians, fearing that violent crime is out of control, wanted capital punishment retained. Having divided Canadians by a heavy-handed application of the Official Languages Act, he tried to force upon parliament in the last months of his mandate constitutional changes, including diminishment of the monarchy, that are opposed by all ten provincial premiers.

Is it any wonder that people everywhere are asking, "Can Ottawa be trusted?" My answer is that the Ottawa of the present Prime Minister cannot be trusted. This is a government that once paid farmers not to grow wheat, that opened the door to 55,000 abortions per year in the name of "health", that made a welfare scheme out of unemployment insurance. This is the government that gave us LIP and a host of make-work projects that vanished in the night while undermining investor confidence in private industry which creates permanent jobs. And this is the government that attempts to abrogate energy agreements with Alberta, reneged on urban transit assistance to Edmonton, and refused the structural enlargement of the Edmonton international airport urged by the government's own engineers. The grounds for mistrust of the federal government are piling up all around us.

One principle is uppermost in the minds of the government—the principle of holding on to power. The fear of losing power is the reason Canadians have been denied the general election the country needed this fall. Now, in an effort to befog that public opinion, the Prime Minister talks of future referenda as instruments of direct democracy. In my judgment, the direct democracy Canadians want is an election now to throw out this unprincipled and untrustworthy government.

If the government really wanted to change its ways and promote national and economic social progress, it would pay attention to the legitimate evaluations made by Premier Lougheed concerning the Ottawa-Alberta relationship. In his address opening the new session of the Alberta legislature on October 11, Premier Lougheed said that many Albertans look on the federal government "as an adversary rather than an ally." He also said:

> Federal policies have been negative and not positive, for young Albertans ... in terms of opportunity ... We are no island here in Alberta. We're part of this country in the fullest sense of the word, and it's simply not possible for us to maintain our prosperity in the face of a sluggish or weak economy in the rest of Canada.

The overwhelming message coming from Alberta is one of frustration with the way the federal government handles federal-provincial relations. It is almost as if the federal government is trying to dig itself out of the economic mess by using Alberta's wealth. And in so doing, Ottawa is affecting Alberta's ability to plan its own economy.

The latest example of this is the attempt to delay the $1 a barrel oil price increase scheduled for January 1. A series of four increases in oil prices was agreed upon between the two levels of government in 1977. On August 1 of this year the federal government approved the last of the increases. By August 26 it had changed its mind, causing great confusion in Alberta. Now the throne speech says negotiations are under way to defer the increase. Is it any wonder that Albertans have become cynical about the government's intentions?

Alberta provides over 85 per cent of Canada's oil and 80 per cent of Canada's natural gas. The only way to bring about self-sufficiency in energy, which is in the national economic interest, is to promote vigorous development, with all the high cost technology that this entails.

Another significant example is the federal government's repeal of the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act in the hastily conceived restraint program last summer. This act provides for a rebate to the provinces of 95 per cent of the federal and provincial income tax collected from privately owned utilities. It was designed to provide equal tax treatment between customers of these privately owned utilities and customers of publicly owned utilities which do not pay income taxes. Alberta is the only province to return this tax to the utilities in full. Repeal of the act will therefore mean increased prices to the consumer, an estimated $25 annual increase per capita.

Albertans, therefore, will be the ones most seriously affected because most of Alberta is serviced by privately owned utilities. Of the estimated $48.9 million which would have been transferred next year, Alberta's share is $33.9 million. Rather than a reduction of federal government spending, this move represents an additional taxation, and Alberta is the primary target. It will have a depressing effect on Alberta industries and agriculture, and will indirectly pass through to higher costs for all consumer goods.

Here we might note the so-called clout of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) on behalf of Alberta. When, as the hon. member for Crowfoot, pleading that he could do more for Alberta, he ran across the aisle in lustful pursuit of a Liberal cabinet post, we were told that Albertans would benefit. As the question period revealed last Friday, the minister had no impact whatsoever on his cabinet colleagues when the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) repealed the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act. No one in Ottawa listens to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and, as he will find out shortly, his supporters in Crowfoot are becoming hard to find.

As for the Minister of Finance, his action continues the long tradition of doing business with Alberta: decide unilaterally, then consult. The Progressive Conservative way of doing business is: Consult first, then decide.

The Edmonton Chamber of Commerce put the importance of the utilities problem succinctly to the Prime Minister in a letter on October 4, as follows:

> The future electric energy projects in Canada require large sums of capital and it can only be generated in a stable environment where the private sector can compete on an equal basis with provincially and municipally owned utilities. This proposed action is in direct contradiction with the announced intentions of your government to reduce the demands on government spending at all levels and discourages the long term planning of the private sector so vital to meet ever growing demands for power.
> We are also concerned that this particular action seems to be slanted against Alberta, which province has the largest percentage of its utility services provided by the private sector. We feel that this can be construed as another in a series of actions made against the people of our province; moves which, in the final analysis, will not be conducive towards the type of atmosphere in which the constitutional debate can best be held.

Incredibly, there was no prior consultation with the provinces before announcing the repeal of the act, or perhaps not so incredible when one considers this government's record over the past year. Sales tax cuts were sprung on the surprised provinces; expenditure cuts were announced without any consultation; constitutional amendments have been reserved for the federal government acting alone.

The western premiers' conference in April was sharply critical of the unilateral and intrusive way in which the sales tax cut was initiated. The joint communique states:

> The federal budget directly contradicted the spirit of federal-provincial cooperation and consultation which the February conference (of First Ministers) had been intended to foster and could be prejudicial to ongoing discussions on national unity.

At the February conference, Premier Lougheed called upon the federal government to recognize that its existing policies had not worked and needed to be significantly altered. This required, he said, "not only a change in policies but also a distinct change in attitudes." What the premier was looking for was new economic directions which would help all of Canada to "begin to move ahead again with renewed confidence."

He summarized the Alberta viewpoint on the formulation of a national economic policy as follows: First, the private sector is where the jobs are really created and where the multiplier effect is; second, we have to control the public sector in this country in terms of wage and salary settlements; third, we have to eliminate duplication in levels of government and within governments themselves; fourth, we have got to do more in our country, and press the media to do more,—to recognize the achievers and the doers in Canada today; and fifth, the real key to strengthening the Canadian economy is to encourage private sector risk investment by developing a climate that is encouraging.

This is also the view of the Progressive Conservative members of parliament from Alberta. For years we have been saying in this chamber that national unity depends on the economic strengthening of all regions and cannot be obtained by linguistic policies alone. We share Premier Lougheed's conviction that a stronger Alberta, and a strengthening of all provinces, are good for a united Canada. The leader of the Progressive Conservative party and the Progressive Conservative premiers have been working together to develop a common approach. But, of course, anyone is out of step except the Prime Minister who marches to the lonely beat of the Ottawa drummer.

Despite the call by the premiers for a co-operative approach, the federal government brought in yet another budget that distorted provincial economic and fiscal priorities, and it proceeded unilaterally with constitutional reform.

Premier Lougheed has rightly noted the deterioration in good relations between Ottawa and Edmonton as a result of the federal government's heavy-handed approach. Recently he said:

> We have been making some progress in Alberta and it was in the best interests of Canadians working together with the federal government and other provinces, but we can get pretty disturbed, as we are today, with a series of steps that have occurred in the last number of months—of broken agreements, of tax discrimination towards our province. It is as though they said, 'Well, let's cut Alberta down to size.' There is also a continued intrusion in all provinces and a constitutional bill that literally throws down the gauntlet.

● (1232)

For telling the truth, for standing up to the federal government, Premier Lougheed is derided in this House by the Prime Minister. Instead of belittling the Premier of Alberta, the Prime Minister should be pointing to Peter Lougheed with pride. In Alberta we know that Premier Lougheed is a great Canadian. And Alberta will not tolerate the undermining of this sterling advocate of co-operative federalism.

Let it be said clearly for the nation to hear: Alberta is committed to Canada. In the Alberta Speech from the Throne in March, Lieutenant Governor Steinhauer ably expressed this when he said:

> Our citizens are fully committed to a strong and united Canada. The flexibiity of our federal system should prove to be our strongest asset as a new federalism begins to evolve. Alberta will continue to play a leadership role in strengthening the unity of our Confederation.

What Alberta wants to see in any constitutional change is the promotion of Canadian unity, the achievement of the aspirations of the new west, a strengthening of the position of the provinces, and the safeguarding of the traditional and historic rights of the provinces, particularly with regard to natural resource ownership.

The Prime Minister notwithstanding, the message of the real Alberta is starting to be understood in central Canada. I congratulate the Hamilton Spectator for its editorial of October 5 which commended Premier Lougheed for opposing greater concentration of political power in Ottawa. The editorial noted:

> The fact is that the economic advance of Alberta is good for all of Canada, very good. And the development of more political power on the prairies would also be good for Canada. Ideally all the provinces from Newfoundland to British Columbia should share Alberta's aspirations and confidence.

What Canadians are looking for is a healthy and hopeful society. We must recover a sense of purpose for our country. The world needs our vigorous participation in economic partnerships.

This past summer I went around the world on a foreign policy mission and I saw the opportunities, and the challenges for Canada in a changing world. We are closing our eyes to problems and opportunities for Canada abroad because we are so beleaguered at home on the economy and national unity questions. We must solve our internal problems so that we can get on with a constructive and responsible role in the modern world. The recovery of trust in Ottawa is essential in this process. Canadians desperately need effective, co-operative leadership, not more political confrontation. Only in this way can our country express fresh recognition of the basic values in life, such as truth, honesty, and decency, that never change.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to participate in this debate in reply to the Speech from the Throne. Particularly I would like to compliment the mover and the seconder, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard), both of whom gave strong and articulate statements. I was most impressed with the statement made by the hon. member for York South, a colleague of mine who comes from the same region of Canada. Hers was a thoughtful, warm and compassionate statement, not surprising to those who know her as a warm, compassionate, and concerned Canadian.

I was less impressed with the speech which I have just heard made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona (Mr. Roche). He has made a number of good speeches in this House and we have listened to many of them with great admiration. This was not his finest hour. Indeed, for a man who is espousing the cause of Canada, it seemed to me to be a speech which was aimed at fanning the flames of resentment and building upon a sense of alienation in the west. I know that alienation is there. I grew up in the west, just as the hon. member did. I probably sense it as well as most people in this House.

I was not impressed when the hon. member used his position as a member representing a very important part of the country to fan those flames and suggest that somehow or other we were not treating one province, the richest province in this country, the same as the others. There was a suggestion that we were trying to take advantage of Alberta through tax discrimination, and I think tax discrimination was the phrase he used. We have introduced tax measures which affect the province of Alberta and its citizens, but those tax measures have been introduced to assist them and other Canadians to develop the resources of Alberta for Albertans, in fact for all Canadians. I am referring to the new measures which were introduced this past year with respect to depletion allowances and other measures aimed at bringing on the tar sands and the heavy oils.

The hon. member referred to the Syncrude project, that gigantic national resource which was formally opened this year, a Canadian first by any standard. But he did not mention that it was only made possible because the federal government provided a particular kind of tax treatment for that project, because the federal government moved in to help salvage the project along with the Alberta government. It was in fact a combined enterprise of the federal government, the Alberta government and the Ontario government which, without the assistance of these governments, would not have taken place. That was not the cast of his remarks. The cast was of grievance, of resentment, of dividing, not building. As I say, it was not his finest hour.

I quote the words of the Governor General in the Speech from the Throne where he stated:

1: Urgent Action Needed

Parliament begins today a new session which will concentrate upon Canada's two most pressing needs. They are the strengthening of our economy, and the renewal of our federation.

Those two inseparable imperatives are different expressions of the same goal: to strengthen Canada through unity: to unify Canada through economic strength.

I do not think we are going to find the clues to those particular policy directions in the sentiments stated and unstated that I listened to in the speech made by the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona.

Mr. Whelan: No way.

Mr. Gillespie: The two themes of strengthening the economy and of strengthening our country and confederation were themes which were picked up by the Prime Minister in his memorable speech last week.

I would like to add another perspective, a perspective as the minister responsible for energy policy, because no policy area seems to me to be more important to these two objectives than the energy policy area.

● (1242)

Quite simply, our economy, economic security, future economic growth, and future prosperity as Canadians will depend upon adequate and reliable supplies of energy at competitive prices.

Second, our sources of energy and our consumption of energy are often thousands of miles apart in this country. Nowhere is the economic and political interdependence of the regions of Canada more manifested than in the energy policy areas, areas of production, transportation and consumption of oil, natural gas, coal, uranium and hydro power. However, it has not always been that way. That has not always been the perception in Canada.

As recently as five years ago, Canadians were unconcerned about security of supply. That was hardly a word that we heard in the lexicon of Canadian economic policy. That was the time when we felt we had lots of cheap energy. The issue was not security of supply. The issue then was: how do we get the United States to take more of it?

That perception started to change in 1973 when the OPEC nations raised the price of oil four times and the Arab OPEC nations decided they would embargo the greatest nation in the world, the United States, that they would cut off supplies to the United States.

Quite clearly, the Arab nations, which produce most of the oil in OPEC, gave the Americans and the industrialized world two simple messages. The first was that the era of cheap energy is over. The second was just as important a message. It was that in the future "you would be unwise to count on us for your energy needs." There have been other events since 1973 and 1974 which have tended to highlight the insecurity of supply to the western world and to Canada.

Venezuelan production, for example, has been declining. The government of Venezuela has decided to cut back on its oil production. There have been some big finds such as the North Sea, Prudhoe Bay, and re-examination of the Mexican reserves, but not many other significant big finds. Big finds have been rare.

At the same time there has been an increasing perception that the technical producibility of existing wells is going to peak within a very few years. The World Energy Conference in their book entitled "World Energy, Looking Ahead to the Year 2020" published in the last few weeks by the Conservation Commission of the World Energy Conference, covered the input of thousands of experts from dozens of countries around the world for a period of three years. It contains the best estimates in the industry, in the countries, the bureaucracies and the universities. It is the most comprehensive that I have seen to date. It indicates that the producibility of world oil reserves will start to decline very shortly after 1985 at a time when the world will continue to be increasing its demand for oil.

During this period of time, as well, we have seen social unrest and tensions between countries in the Middle East start to increase. I refer, of course, to the tragic events in Lebanon, and the assassinations in the two countries to the south of Saudi Arabia, South Yemen and North Yemen, to the events on the Horn of Africa, to the internal events in Iran, to the almost silent takeover from a non-Marxist regime to a Marxist oriented one in Afghanistan, to the PLO, and to the Arab-Israeli conflicts. There is a whole pattern of instability in the Middle East, the centre of the greatest source of world oil.

During this period of time we have also noted a stiffening resistance on the part of Saudi Arabia, the greatest oil producer, to continue its production of oil. This view was put forward again when Ahmed Zaki Yamani, the petroleum minister of mines and resources of Saudi Arabia, was in Canada this summer.

I have taken a few minutes to put this matter in context. I think it is important that the security of supply arguments be understood by Canadians and all sides of the House. During this period of time, of course, the perception also changed in another very important respect. That was that Canada was no longer a net exporter of oil. Canada had become a net importer. Quite clearly the sense of urgency with respect to security of supply has increased very quickly and very substantially.

Quite simply stated, the major population centres of central and eastern Canada were perceived to be vulnerable as never before. Approximately 50 per cent of the primary energy source of this part of Canada is supplied in the form of oil. That oil has been increasingly imported oil. Without that oil, our economy will not function. Indeed, it will literally run out of gas.

During this period of time there has also been confusion among some people about gluts. There have been temporary gluts because of the Prudhoe Bay find and the discoveries in the North Sea. However, they are not going to answer our problems. The new discoveries in Mexico may help to buy a little time, but that is all they will do, because these discoveries together probably do not add more than a few years to the consumption pattern of the world.

That confusion continues to bedevil the energy policy formula in this country, as it did in the United States. However, there are other reasons for putting this in context, not just for Canadians to appreciate the importance of the issue but to understand the initiatives the federal government has taken and, indeed, to challenge the official opposition to come forward with their own policy positions in these important areas.

As I go through the rest of my remarks there will be a number of cases where I will want to challenge them to respond to important energy issues facing this country at the present time.

Mr. Paproski: We will after the next election.

Mr. Gillespie: The hon. member says they will tell us after the next election. Judging by the kind of statements his leader made in the House on leaders' day, I think we can expect more. He invited Canadians and members on this side of the House to expect more. He invited us to expect that he is prepared to put his party's position forward on these issues. We have been waiting a long time to hear from him on some of these issues. We hope we will not have to wait very much longer.

The issue of energy policy is not whether there will be a shortage, nor is it when will that shortage occur. The issue is, given our opportunities and the urgencies facing us, what can Canadians do? What can we in Canada do to protect our own interests, our own economy, integrity, and the interdependence of our own country? What can we do to develop our own energy resources?

We are very fortunate as a country. We have options which most countries lack—large resources in western Canada, in the Arctic and offshore. We believe there is a major role for private industry to play in finding and developing those resources.

We also believe there is a role for the national oil companies in various countries. We believe there is a role for the Canadian national oil company, Petro-Canada, to play in the exploration and development of Canadian resources. But that is not the position of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). The Leader of the Opposition has clearly stated that he would invite the national oil companies of other countries to come to Canada to look for Canadian resources and develop them, but that he would not permit the Canadian national oil company to do so. He made it clear he would dismantle Petro-Canada. Mr. Speaker, that is an absurd position for any thinking Canadian to take. It would be absurd the eyes of any foreign thinking government.

Can you imagine the President of France saying, "Well, I wonder whether the national oil company of France" which is presently exploring off the coast of Labrador, "would be able to form a joint venture with the Canadian national oil company in the same area in which it is now operating?" Would he not be bound to conclude that were the Conservatives to form the government he would have to find a multinational partner or deal with the oil company of another nation but that he could not deal with a Canadian company in the development of Canada's national resources?

If some other government, for example, the British government through BP, or the German government through its own company, wanted to get into the development of the vast tar sands of western Canada, they could not do so by dealing with a Canadian national oil company; they would probably have to deal with the national oil company of Japan which has already made an application to work out a joint venture with the Canadian national oil company, Petro-Canada.

I think Canadians will increasingly ask what is wrong with having a Canadian national oil company develop our resources. Why would the Leader of the Opposition not wish Canadians to participate in the development of our own country?

I should like to deal briefly before the lunch break with two other important developments which have taken place since the House rose last July. I should like to deal first of all with measures to reduce the inflationary impact of oil price changes, and to follow this with some comments on the measures we have taken to develop security of supply of energy resources for Canadians in the future.

I wish to refer particularly to measures we have in train with respect to certain major capital projects referred to in the Speech from the Throne. I wish to touch on the importance of maximizing eastern Canadian markets in particular for Canadian natural gas as a means of reducing dependence upon foreign imported oil. I should like to deal as well with the program which was introduced in connection with the development of solar energy, an important program which has a strong Canadian orientation looking to the development of Canadian industry and using Canadian firms. This program is in marked contrast to the one which was trotted out—that is probably the most charitable way of putting it—some months ago by opposition spokesmen, a program which seemed to be more concerned with providing tax credits to persons who have installed solar heating some eight years ago than in dealing with the future or with the development of the Canadian industry; nowhere was a preference given to the development of solar systems by Canadians, which is in complete contrast to the approach taken in my party.

The measure to reduce the excise tax on gasoline by three cents will have the effect of enabling consumers to pay a price for gasoline which would be lower than otherwise. It is a measure aimed at trying to contain the price escalation which we became increasingly concerned about as it approached double digit figures. It is aimed at all Canadians.

With respect to the oil price change on January 1, I should like to spend a minute or two discussing the implications, but I shall probably have to do that after the lunch break. However, I want to make it clear that the agreement we have reached with Alberta with respect to the oil price increase on January 1 was conditioned by the level of prices in the United States. Our position was that we have to protect the competitive position of Canadian industry, as well as move prices up in an orderly way to ensure that development will take place and take place expeditiously. We do not think there will be sufficient head room on January 1 for a price increase to take place, but we are saying that in any event we believe it is in the national interest that the price increase should not take place at that time.

Mr. Speaker, I should like to call it one o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being one o'clock I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): At one o'clock the Minister of Energy, Mines, and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) had the floor, with eight minutes remaining.

Mr. Gillespie: Mr. Speaker, I would like to spend just a moment to recap some of the themes of my earlier remarks. I had been talking about the importance of security of supply. This is a relatively new concept as far as Canadian perceptions are concerned. It is important because we have received a message from the oil exporting countries that we cannot continue to count on their supplies. They are, quite clearly, not prepared to guarantee an ever increasing amount of oil for Canadians and others. We are a net importer of oil, not a net exporter of oil. We have very substantial resources in Canada which we should be developing and, so far as possible, developing ourselves. Yes, we should be developing those resources, with the help of others when we can, and developing those resources by ourselves when we can.

I pointed out that a number of other free enterprise countries around the world also recognize the serious security of supply problem, that they have developed national oil companies to assist them in obtaining security of oil supplies, that many of those national oil companies are active in Canada in an exploration and development way and in some cases in a production way as well, and that the Canadian government formed Petro-Canada to assist in the exploration and development of Canadian resources.

Petro-Canada has been very active in the Arctic and in the offshore. Indeed, last year one half of all the wells drilled in the Arctic and offshore areas of this country were drilled with Petro-Canada participation. However, the position of the Leader of the Opposition is that he would keep those foreign national oil companies in Canada and dismantle the Canadian one. He would go further than that; presumably he would invite those national oil companies which are not now in Canada to come to Canada, but he would dismantle the Canadian national oil company. He would have no answer for the governments of other free enterprise economies when they would say to him that through their national oil companies they would like to deal with the Canadian national oil company in Canada for their purposes and for Canadian purposes.

He would have no answer because he would already have announced, if not already dismantled, the dismantling of the Canadian national oil company. This is a ludicrous position to Canadians. One might also observe that it is a ludicrous position to those outside Canada who would want to do business in Canada. They would ask why the leader of the country, which the Leader of the Opposition hopes to be, has so little faith in Canadians that he would not be prepared to maintain and develop a national oil company as other countries have done for their own security?

I went on to point out very briefly that other free enterprise economies are also heavily involved in the exploration and development of uranium. I referred to Germany, Italy, France, and Spain. Yes, there are companies in Canada with very heavy British government investment as well. There is one national Crown corporation, Eldorado, in which the people of Canada, through the Government of Canada, have an interest. That too, however, is something which the Leader of the Opposition would dismantle or peddle. He has not yet told us how he would deal with it, but he would get rid of it. He seems unable to put Canadian interests first.

It is questionable whether the Leader of the Opposition is a captive of an earlier dogma of the Conservative party or whether he has been talking to interests, perhaps in the uranium industry, who would like to make a bid for the most profitable of the Canadian Crown corporations.

I was about to go on to the oil pricing question. I want to provide a little background on this because the pricing of oil has always been a trade-off of a number of conflicting interests and objectives. Canadians will remember that we did not move immediately to the international price for oil in 1973-74. Instead, we decided to move up in measured but orderly steps toward world energy prices. We did so because we were concerned about the impact on the economy of such a massive change. We were concerned as well about ensuring a competitive advantage, where possible, for Canadian industry. The Conservative party has yet to state its position with respect to this pricing policy for oil.

As much as possible we have tried to reconcile the interests of the economy, on the one hand, by a pace of change toward international prices which will be slow enough to minimize any adverse impacts, and particularly to contain inflationary pressures. On the other hand, however, we have also tried to move fast enough to produce a favourable conservation impact and favourably stimulate the exploration and development of oil and other petroleum resources in Canada and, as much as possible, to limit budgetary requirements, because the subsidy which has been paid under this program has amounted, or will amount, to better than $5 billion by the end of this fiscal year. This is the subsidy which has been paid—because we import; we are not a net exporter, we are a net importer of oil—to hold down oil prices in a very large section of the country.

We felt that there would not be sufficient head room, that is to say, the difference between the Canadian average price and the American average price would be less than one dollar come January 1—so we took the position that there should not be a one dollar increase come January 1, a position which had been fully discussed and negotiated. Indeed, it was one of the conditions of the oil price increases negotiated a year and a half ago with the producing provinces that if there is not that head room, that there should not be a price increase. In our view there will not be that head room.

We have gone further: we have said that in any event we think it is in the interest of the national economy not to move up that one dollar come January 1. We believe this is a responsible position for the Canadian government to take. We would like to hear from the official opposition, which has been silent on that, as it has been silent on many important and contentious issues. Can the official opposition put its own particular regional concerns behind the national interest?

There are some major capital projects which we hope to complete during the life of this parliament. I am referring, for example, to the Maritime Energy Corporation. Negotiations are continuing favourably, although one must recognize that there are two new leaders in those provinces at the present time, as well as the fact that the third province is involved in a general election. That particular project is important to the maritimes and Canada. It will have to wait just a little longer for fruition. I am hopeful we will be able to bring it off with the cooperation of the leaders of those three provinces. Similarly, the formation of the Lower Churchill Falls Development Corporation in conjunction with the province of Newfoundland has moved along well. We should be in a position to announce the formation of the corporation very soon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): I regret to interrupt the hon. minister, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. James Gillies (Don Valley): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in congratulating the mover (Mrs. Appolloni), and seconder (Mr. Savard), for their very fine statements in the House the other day. I was delighted to listen to what the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) had to say, as well as what he neglected to say. Particularly I am pleased that he did not make a forecast about the prospects for the Canadian oil and gas industry. Ever since the government has been in power, we have received nothing but different forecasts. Every time the minister speaks, the net result is that we are more confused about the situation.

I was not astonished to hear a restatement in ringing tones of the commitment of the Liberal government that the enterprise system cannot solve the energy problems of this nation. It is a commitment for more government and bigger government all the time.

Many Canadians must find it absolutely incomprehensible that the energy policy of Canada should be one based upon the principle of self-reliance, rather than the principle of self-sufficiency. Surely if we learned anything during the OPEC crisis, it was that we must move as rapidly as possible to this position of self-sufficiency in energy. We are one of the few countries in the world which is capable of achieving a position of self-sufficiency. We have the largest known proven reserves of oil. We have larger proven reserves in our oil sands than the Middle East. It is a measure of the failure of the government that we are not self-sufficient in the production of energy.

I should like to speak for a moment on the contents of the Speech from the Throne and the participation of the Prime Minister the other day. The Speech from the Throne was most unusual and disappointing. Unlike most occasions when the government uses the Speech from the Throne to outline plans for the forthcoming session of parliament, and the participation of the Prime Minister to fill in the details, the government provided us with little vision, and practically nothing was said about the plans for governing this nation during the next year. Moreover, the Prime Minister used his time not to elucidate and expand, but to defend, explain, attack, and condemn, to the point where anyone listening to the debate would think that the Prime Minister had assumed already his position as leader of the opposition.

Perhaps the unusual nature of the government's performance can be explained by the fact that the House of Commons is a political arena as well as a forum for governing, and that we are in the last stages of parliament before the calling of an election. Under such circumstances, the last gasp attempts of a Prime Minister to absolve an administration which is dying, and which, like a sick animal, should be put out of its misery as soon as possible, are understandable. Given the fact that the nation is looking for leadership, is aching to have confidence in its institutions and wants to know what plans this interim government has, clearly there has been a mammoth political miscalculation on the part of the government and the Prime Minister in abdicating the responsibility for providing leadership and offering hope to the people of the country.

Defence of the past is not what the nation is looking for. It is plans for the future and solutions to problems which people are looking for, and deserve to have. Politicians who have been on the hustings during the last few weeks and months know that at the present time Canadians are somewhat fearful of their future. They are distrustful of the inability of their institutions to solve the problems of the day. Probably faith in politicians is at an all-time low. For the Prime Minister to use one of our time-honoured occasions, to attack the opposition, not to put forward ideas and not to say how the government will operate in the forthcoming session, is an additional indication of the inability of the government to lead.

As unusual and misguided as the tactics of the Prime Minister may be, they are understandable at this time in our history. However, what was missing from the Speech from the Throne and the elucidation of the Prime Minister was an appeal and a challenge to Canadians to look at problems as opportunities and to have confidence in their nation. An omission such as this is inexplicable and unforgivable.

I had occasion to look in Bartlett's famous quotations for noteworthy contributions in the House of Commons, and found only the one made by Sir Winston Churchill in the Canadian House of Commons during World War II. Perhaps it is un-Canadian to provide the nation with any resounding statements of aspirations—I do not know. But if ever is a time when Canadians are looking toward the government for leadership, surely it is now. Where in the Speech from the Throne, or in the contribution by the Prime Minister, can an equivalent of John F. Kennedy's ringing declaration of his first inauguration be found? Mr. Kennedy said:

Ask not what your country can do for you but what you can do for your country.

At a time like this, Canadians have a right to expect such statements in the Speech from the Throne or from their Prime Minister. Where can an equivalent of President Roosevelt's comforting words in his first inaugural address be found? He said:

The only thing we have to fear is fear itself.

Or the words of Sir Winston Churchill when he said:

Do not let us speak of darker days; let us speak rather of sterner days.

Surely the essence of leadership is to be able to use the language in a sentence, to infuse the hopes and aspirations of a nation. Is there no one in the office of the Prime Minister who is capable of putting together such statements in order to distil for Canadians the leadership they require?

I would not suggest that we only need more rhetoric or more studies. What we really need is action on the pressing problems facing us. Warren Bennis has pointed out in his study entitled "The Unconscious Conspiracy: Why Leaders Can't Lead" the following:

Nothing ensures the status quo so much as putting the best minds and best talents to work diligently on blue ribbon task force committees. For their reports continue to get better as our problems get worse.

In this session of parliament we do not need more studies and more commissions. We require urgent action on parliamentary reform, economic reconstruction, and constitutional reform. We need to get on with the tasks we have been elected to perform—to provide a legislative framework within which people can live with freedom and opportunity.

We got nothing innovative and nothing new from the Prime Minister in his rambling speech. One expected and hoped for much more, because every Canadian who has been following our history knows that the Prime Minister has recently turned his personal attention to the economic problems of our time. This was dramatically illustrated on August 1 when, on his return from Bonn, he personally took hold of the economic management of the country, apparently without extensive consultation, some would say with no consultation whatsoever, with his officials or his colleagues, appearing on national television to announce the new economic policies of the government.

What was indeed lacking and threatening in the speech he made here, which we thought would develop the details of that statement made on television on August 1, was that the government, it is clear, has no fundamental grasp of the interrelationship between the various economic activities that go on in a nation and the need for an interrelated series of policies to solve them.

Unfortunately in his remarks in the House the Prime Minister said absolutely nothing to alleviate the fears of those who believe that economic policy-making in this country has collapsed, that the government has no program for dealing with the problems of high unemployment, has no program for dealing with high inflation, has no program for dealing with the low value dollar, and has no program for approaching the crisis in confidence which is apparent around us.

Indeed, the entire economic portion of the Prime Minister's speech, a speech which was awaited with keen expectation by people both inside and outside Canada so that they could assess the government's plans, was not a speech at all. Instead, it consisted of citations and recitations of statistics which appear to come from OECD press releases, and which were well orchestrated to demonstrate that the Canadian economy was probably outperforming any other economy in the world.

There was no awareness that 900,000 Canadians are out of work, no awareness that Canada has the second highest inflation rate of any industrialized nation of the world, no awareness that the dollar is selling at about 84 cents, no awareness that there is an outflow of capital going on in an unprecedented amount, and no awareness that the general attitude of the people in Canada is that the economy is completely out of control.

It has been long held that statistics can be used to prove anything, and that maxim was never given a greater testing than last Friday when the Prime Minister spoke. How irrelevant to take ten years of statistics to demonstrate, I am not sure what, when we have these problems before us at the present time! How devastating that the Prime Minister, who has taken over and is in charge of economic policy making at the present time, appears to believe that the recitation of statistics for a ten-year period has any relevance whatsoever with what we have deal with in this parliament at the present time!

There is no debate in Canada at the present time about the goals of economic policy making. All parties believe that what we want in this nation is reasonably full employment and relative price stability. What we do have a debate on is how to get there.

The New Democratic Party is convinced that the traditional Keynesian policy of spending more is the way to solve our unemployment problem, to spend our way into prosperity, and if there is something less than full utilization of capacity in our nation, and a short-fall in investments, the government should take up the difference and in this way solve our economic difficulties.

The problem is we know that this, what has become the truly traditional approach, is not working any more, and it has not worked since 1972. The only way that public investment of a greater amount can be financed in Canada at the present time, with the present state of Canadian capital markets, would be with a greater deficit. The government could not finance a greater deficit at the present time and, therefore, would have to print more money. We know that in the structure of the economy we have now, and with the conditions we have now, the only thing that would happen with the printing of more money would be more inflation, and with more inflation there would be less investment, and with less investment there would be more unemployment.

The fact of the matter is that the policy advocated by the NDP, appropriate as it might have been for 1936, and as appropriate as it might have been for some cyclical slowdowns in 1950, is simply inappropriate and would not work under the circumstances we have at the present time. It is somewhat sad to me that a party which has been in the forefront of reform many times would propose such old fashioned, outmoded propositions to deal with our economic problems at the present time. They are almost as unworkable as the nationalization of resources which they have preached since the time of the Regina manifesto.

Unfortunately an analysis of the positions of the present government is more difficult because they are so incoherent one does not really know what they are intended to accomplish. Again, the goals are clear. We want to bring about reasonably full employment and relative price stability, but how do we do that?

The government seems to say that what it wants to do is cut, at least in planning if not in reality, its spending plan. Presumably the reason for doing this is to instil confidence in investors, lower the deficit, and slow down the rate of inflation. But at the same time the government raised interest rates. Last Friday it raised interest rates to the highest in this country since, I think, 1934. The result of raising the interest rate is to create unemployment because it slows down the rate of investment. This is exactly the opposite to what the government said it was trying to do with its budget cuts.

The government's stated budget cuts are highly irrational. The government has said, for example, that it wants to increase exports. Our advantage in exports is in respect of many of our basic resource industries. The government cut expenditure on research and development. It has cut expenditures on research in the fishing industry. It seems just incredible it would do this after spending several years negotiating a 200-mile limit in order that we could exploit fisheries. The government now cuts research in that area just when we need it so badly. It has also cut expenditures for research in respect of forestry products and in other areas where we must continue to develop efficient and effective methods if we are going to be able to increase our exports. This makes no sense whatsoever.

There has been no rational explanation on the part of the government as to what kind of deficit it wants. What is the appropriate deficit, the appropriate fiscal stance for this country during the next few years—the next five years, for example? How will it be funded? There are no explanations because there is no policy. Moreover, the government does not seem to have any understanding whatsoever of the fact that a deficit results not only from extravagant government spending but also from a decline in revenues.

The government does not seem to understand that one of the ways to increase revenues is by cutting taxes, strange as that may seem to some. The evidence is in from all over the world now that if you have an intelligent tax cut program which stimulates economic activity your revenues will increase. This has been pointed out by Professor Laffer, and it has been supported by the fact that when President Kennedy adopted tax cuts in the United States in 1960 he converted a federal deficit of $4 billion in 1961 to a surplus of $8 billion in 1965. The government has no policy on taxation in an attempt to stimulate the economy so that revenues will grow again.

The policy of the government in respect of the management of the dollar is so puzzling it defies explanation. Everyone knows that the credibility of this government has been weakened, almost beyond recovery, by the way in which the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has handled the decline in the value of the dollar on foreign exchange markets.

Certainly it is clear, in an economy such as Canada's, where we have 27 per cent of our gross national product generated by foreign trade, compared to 6 per cent in the United States, that whatever happens to the dollar has an immense effect on domestic inflation and on employment. It is simply impossible to make economic policy to achieve full employment and price stability without having a policy about the dollar. Every time our dollar goes down one cent against the American dollar, we have four-tenths of one per cent change in the inflation rate in Canada. Are the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister trying to tell us that the government has no position with respect to the dollar, that any level of the dollar is satisfactory for the making of economic policy in this nation? This is absolutely ludicrous.

If our goals are to have reasonably full employment and reasonable price stability we must have a policy with respect to the value of the dollar. While the government argues that we are increasing our exports through the devaluation of the dollar, it should never forget that this is a very short-run gain. The last country that used this policy for any extensive period of time was Britain, and everyone knows what happened to the British economy from the period 1955 to 1965. In short, because of domestic inflation effects, the advantages that are gained in the export market by the devaluation of the dollar are soon wiped out.

I do not propose to argue today, because it is not the time or place, the merits of a fixed exchange rate versus the idea of a floating rate. Many economists believe that the great depression of the 1930s was caused because of fixed exchange rates when economies were held to the gold standard. Certainly after World War II, when ministers of finance of the world met together at Bretton Woods, it was determined that they would operate with a much more orderly international market. The reality is that the Bretton Woods program for handling international stability is no longer viable. Countries are breaking away from it, and we need new approaches.

Part of that new approach is for countries to demonstrate that they have an understanding of the interrelationship of their currency, if it is an open economy as in our case, and the economic policies that they are trying to propose. For the Minister of Finance of Canada to say that where the dollar is, is irrelevant to economic policymaking in this country, is doing nothing to achieve any gains in this direction. In short, elementary as the lesson seems to be, this government does not seem to understand the monetary, fiscal policy, that is, spending and taxing, and its exchange rate policy, must be integrated and they must work together.

Over the past few years we have experienced exactly the reverse. On the one hand the government does something on exchange rate policy which increases unemployment, then it does something on fiscal policy to decrease unemployment. Then it puts up interest rates by half a per cent, which lowers employment. There has been absolutely no program whatsoever. It is as if from day to day the Mad Hatter, from Alice in Wonderland, were making economic policy in this nation, a policy which can best be summed in Churchill's phrase that the government has, "decided only to be undecided, resolved to be irresolute, adamant for drift, solid for fluidity, all powerful to be impotent". It is the best summary one can make of economic policy making at this time in this nation.

The agony of the current economic situation is that it is unnecessary. Canada is a rich country, probably one of the richest in the world in terms of resources and potential. Remember that when the OPEC cut off energy from industrial countries, Germany and Japan did not have any oil at all, and yet they managed to have enormous recoveries and strong economic performances. The only thing we have succeeded at in the past few years is failing.

Why would that be true, Mr. Speaker? Well, there are many reasons. Part of the failure flows from the general inability of the federal government to work constructively with provincial governments toward mutual solutions of problems. Part of it is clearly in the inherent contradictions in the constitution, written 111 years ago, which gives the strong taxing power, and therefore the largest source of revenues, to a central government, but leaves in the hands of the provincial governments the expensive things to pay for, health, education, and welfare. Part of the problem comes from an acceptance on the part of the government in power of spending programs that it has no way of financing and the naive belief that the economy will constantly grow. This is probably based on the euphoric notion that economic growth will always be with us no matter what we do, and possibly in part on a failure to realize that what is a right economic policy for one period may, indeed, be the wrong one for another. Of all these reasons, the latter is often forgotten.

We have been a country locked in policy making based on the programs Lord Keynes developed in and for the 1930s. John Kenneth Galbraith, in his essay "How Keynes Came to America", points out that of all western industrialized nations the most Keynesian is Canada. Tragically, our policy makers have never realized that in a diverse nation such as Canada, with the great differences among our various regions, we need a different approach to our economic policy making. The essence of policy making in this country during the last few decades is that, by changing general tax policies and general expenditure policies, we can achieve the growth we want to have. Under certain circumstances this was true, but in a nation such as ours it is not always true, and it is not true now.

In this country economic policies must be made on the basis that if we make the components strong the total will be strong. What we need to do in this country, and this is more than lip service to some sector analysis, is to have a real belief that if we want to have full employment in Canada and want to have price stability we must be certain that the various sectors of the economy are prosperous. That means doing for the fishing industry what we have to do to make the fishing industry prosperous and doing the same thing for agriculture, manufacturing, and small business. When they are prosperous the nation as a whole will be prosperous. We can no longer go along with the budget making which I have seen in the six years I have been here, where every single budget has been based upon a false perception. Until that changes, we are going to have serious difficulties in this nation.

To solve the economic problems of this country we need not be limited by lack of knowledge. Economists have been much maligned during the past few years, and perhaps properly so. But new economic theory is not needed. What we must have is the political will to do those things which must be done to turn this economy around. We must begin the task of economic reconstruction and development, not only for the obvious reasons of creating the wealth which is available to Canadians, but as a cornerstone for solving our social and constitutional problems.

This country this year is maintaining its record as being among the top one or two countries of the world in the number of days lost through industrial strife, and I wonder why. There are many reasons, but surely one of the most important must be the latent discontent with the management of the economy as a whole. People know, and their common sense tells them, that this is a country that does not have to have high levels of unemployment and inflation, that we should not have under-utilization of our resources. They know when they hear of inflation rates of less than 5 per cent in Germany and other industrialized countries, and when they hear of situations where there is full employment of resources in other countries, they know that it does not have to be this way. They know that there has been mismanagement at the top and, they have become discontented and are determined that they will get their share. If they have to strike to do it, they will do it. They are disillusioned and quite willing to question the very social structure of our nation and the way our institutions operate.

That is one of the main reasons why we have so many strikes and lose so much production in this country. It has been said before, and I am sure it is true, that the alienation of the nation is immense. All we have to do is remember that in the province of Quebec we have an elected government that is dedicated to the proposition of taking the people of that province out of confederation. One only needs to go west to see the alienation all the way from Thunder Bay to the Pacific Ocean.

Why should that be, Mr. Speaker, in a nation endowed with the resources and history that we have had in this country? Part of it, as I have suggested, is because of the fact that the economy is not working the way it has previously, and part of it must lie in our constitutional difficulties.

If there is one thing that we must do in this parliament it is to bring in institutional reforms so that we can make parliament operate more effectively. Solving our institutional problems will not mean that all our problems will be solved. They will not, but we must make an attempt to do so and create understanding on the part of all Canadians.

I am speaking for myself but I sense that, particularly among my French Canadian friends, there is often a feeling that those of us not from the province of Quebec may not understand, may not care about what happens in that province. I would remind them, with the best spirit in the world, that the greatest study ever made of American democracy in the 19th century was done by Thomas deTocqueville who did not live in the United States. The social consequences of the policy of the United States of America toward blacks was written by Gunnar Myrdal, a Swede, in his book "The American Dilemma" in 1936. Those of us not from Quebec can also understand the problems of Quebec. I know my colleagues in this party and the leader of this party are bringing insight and understanding to the aspirations of the people of Quebec, even though they may not live there.

I would implore all sides of the House, particularly those responsible for developing policies and constitutional changes, not to ignore what might be said by those who may not come directly from Quebec, because we care, Mr. Speaker. I am sure we care as much as they that this nation survives after 111 years—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Don Valley, (Mr. Gillies), but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gillies: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. These are the days for the forecaster of the apocalypse. People as disparate as Robert Heilbronner in his book "An Inquiry Into the Human Prospect", or William Simon in "A Time for Truth", or Richard Goodwin in his analysis of the future of the United States, are saying that the democratic system as we know it is not going to survive unless people have confidence in their institutions.

The institution of parliament is a product of 111 years of history in Canada; it is a product of our history and of what we do, but every institution is also the sum of the people who are in it. I cannot subscribe to the theory that those of us who are privileged to be members of this institution of parliament cannot, in this period of crisis in our nation, make this institution work in such a way that we can solve our problems. Surely we do not want to leave this place thinking that we have not done everything, regardless of our political pursuasion, regardless of our personal interest, to make sure that it rises to the challenge presented by the Canadian people today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gilles Caouette (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, it is with pleasure that I welcome this opportunity to speak on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, and I want to join the others who have spoken so far to commend the mover (Mrs. Appolloni) and the seconder (Mr. Savard) who did outstanding work.

What can readily be said about the Speech from the Throne is that is is a heap of old statements made by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) outside the House and before the Speech from the Throne, which really comes down to two main points only, that is, first lower government's spending and, second, the constitutional change being proposed by the government. Apart from that, the most important problems are not mentioned. The economic problem is not mentioned. So we waited for the Prime Minister's speech to see if he could at least explain the Speech from the Throne and make it clearer. Unfortunately, we witnessed a two-hour attack against the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), but we were not offered any valid solution, any precision as to the attitude taken by the Prime Minister or the government concerning the remedies to be applied to the problems we are now confronted with.

The Prime Minister spent some time asking us to review his scholarly knowledge when he was speaking about experimental and rational psychology and he said that in his opinion the human brain has three different faculties: memory, imagination and intelligence. He said the Leader of the Opposition does have some memory despite a few mistakes, that he has plenty of imagination, but as far as intelligence is concerned, it is lacking in his speech.

I think Canadians in general will find it easy to agree with me here and that they recognize that the Prime Minister is indeed an intelligent man. But the fact is his administration lacks imagination and above all memory. The fact that once again the government has increased the rate of interest by three-quarters of one per cent two days after the Speech from the Throne is evidence of a lack of imagination because that was the fifth time the government did that since January. It is a lack of memory as well because such a move has always had the same results. Each time the government thought it would help our economy and each time it has caused a surge in inflation and unemployment.

The Prime Minister had just noted in his speech that the chairman and chief executive of the Royal Bank, Mr. McLaughlin, says we should not be too pessimistic, that things are going fine. If I were the chairman of the Royal Bank, I would certainly have said the same thing. When the government increases the rates by three-quarters of one per cent, the bankers feel allowed to raise theirs by 2 per cent or 3 per cent on the loans they will make. In their place, I say that there is no reason to be pessimistic. But people, the individuals who tomorrow will have to pay 15 per cent interest rather than 12 per cent on their loans, they have grounds to be pessimistic. And the Prime Minister is telling us: things are not that bad, the unemployment rate is going down.

According to Statistics Canada and the latest figures published on October 10—they are always a month old—as of September 16 then, the number of people receiving unemployment insurance benefits had indeed diminished. That is true. On the other hand, what they fail to add is that in some areas like mine, in northwest Quebec where we had 20 per cent of our people unemployed last summer, the unemployment rate went down to 16 per cent. Some will say: things go better, there are fewer unemployed! There are indeed fewer people who receive unemployment insurance benefits. On the other hand, there is the working population, the percentage of those on the labour market, not the population generally but people working, those who are on the labour market and looking for work. In my area, some 57 per cent of the people indeed are working which means that 43 per cent are unemployed, 16 per cent of whom are drawing unemployment insurance. Consequently, some 30 per cent are unemployed and do not receive any unemployment insurance. Where are they? Are they on social welfare? Is that a valid and buoyant economy, as suggested by the Prime Minister? I would say that we are right in the midst of a depression, but the Prime Minister's response is to say that the Leader of the Opposition lacks intelligence. That was his response in his speech.

In Quebec as a whole, we find 10 per cent unemployed 30 per cent of whom do not draw any unemployment insurance. Can you say then that the economy is booming that business is is thriving and that those who will be compelled to borrow and pay 15 per cent in interest will be happy while the Canadian economy will be expanding? No way.

The lack of imagination and memory of the government squeezes the worker more and more while allowing financiers to tighten their hold on him. Anti-inflation measures which we have lived with were aimed at limiting salary increases for individuals. For instance, in my riding and in three others throughout the province of Quebec, when Molson Company employees obtained wage increases, the Anti-Inflation Board came forward with a study and said to these employees: You are not entitled to those higher wages. And then they forced the employees to reimburse the company. That is what the government sitting in front of us is all about! Yes, I say they forced the employees to hand back to the company the increases they had obtained but at the same time this very company was allowed, as were other breweries, and this by order in council, to increase beer prices on the market.

Imagine! They authorize an increase for a big company and afterward crush the worker, even forcing him to give back the increase he has received. This is what the present government has done! What corrective measures have been proposed in the Speech from the Throne? None! Again there is some talk about reductions. In a letter addressed to the provincial premiers, the right hon. Prime Minister informed them of his decision to reduce public spending by $2 billion. But where does he intend to make those cuts? First, we are told that a personnel reduction affecting 5,000 jobs, will take place at least progressively. Will that affect big companies or the financial world? No. The workers will have to bear the consequences of the reduction of 5,000 jobs.

As I have said earlier, high finance has been allowed to boost interest rates. If this is how the Prime Minister wants to cut back $2 billion in government expenditures, I could suggest to him other ways of saving this $2 billion. My colleague, the hon. member for Abitibi (Mr. Laprise), asked a question concerning the decrease in language training, since 477 Francophones will lose their job in the public service here in Ottawa. The minister's reply was that we had to try and please the other provinces. But we also know that the Liberal party is not very strong in the other provinces. So here are some gifts, because we all know that elections are coming. That is the reason for staff reductions in the areas of language, bilingualism and French positions.

The minister also replied: There is no demand for it. Yet we know that there are 2,000 applications for language training. Still, the minister has the indecency to tell us: There is no demand for it, so it is logical to cut back. Yet, at the very same time the decision is made to do away with 477 of those jobs, we find that some officials of the department are in the process of negotiating contracts with the Berlitz school of languages to give those same courses. That is the attitude of the present government: it would have us believe, on the one hand, that it is reducing the staff to cut down on expenses while, on the other hand, planning additional expenses in another field. We have often seen it happen.

We saw it in the budget of the Minister of Finance last March with regard to the sales tax; we were told that the people would be given goodies, that is a cut in sales tax. After ten weeks of debates in the House of Commons, it was finally discovered that the federal government was giving out $100 provided the provinces increased their own taxes by the same amount. That is making politics on the backs of the provinces. That silly little budget that was brought down at that time offered Quebeckers $85 and $100 to the other provinces. Do you know that, overnight, that increased the national deficit by $11 billion? Do you know that, overnight, the interest on the national debt was being increased by $2 million a day?

When the Prime Minister talks about cutting government spending by $2 billion, my suggestion is one Social Crediters have always made: that government be financed through interest free loans from the Bank of Canada based on Canadian and not American production.

At noon, questions were put to the Prime Minister on the increase of three quarters of one per cent announced last Friday by the governor of the Bank of Canada. The Prime Minister, having no memory, as I suggested earlier, and particularly no imagination, still had the audacity to answer that it was not to solve Canada's economic problem that the governor of the Bank of Canada had decided on that course of action. It was in reaction to the U.S. attitude. Who are the bosses in Canada? Is it the government? Is it Canadians or Americans in front of whom the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) stands on all fours as well as the Prime Minister, as he did this morning? It is the rate increase—and it is a reaction—and it is not a solution to the economic problems, that we know. It is a reaction to the American attitude. That is the attitude of the government now—flat on all fours before the Americans. That will not solve the problem.

Inflation, government members say, is beyond our control. They are not responsible for it. It is due to the Arabs who increased the price of their oil. It is due to other countries from which we import. We have called many times for a reduction of imports. Then we are told that we must have a trade balance. During that time we, stupid Canadian taxpayers, have to support that policy and reduce our production at home to maintain imports to please other countries and destroy our own production.

I am coming back from the riding of Lotbinière where an election is under way and a number of furniture industries are closed or must reduce their operations. They are operating at 30 per cent of their capacity. During that time we in Canada bought in 1976, $177 million worth of furniture products from the United States. that is the attitude of the government now. In the footwear industry it is the same thing. For three years we have proposed footwear imports. Finally, the government accepted last winter to impose a quota on imports. Recently the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) took delight in sending every member in this House a letter informing us we had an invitation from the Bata Corporation. They started making sports shoes, which used to be made here, except that the industry was completely destroyed by imports. We welcomed at that point such a step, notwithstanding the fact we had been requesting import curbs for three years. In the other areas, beef, ham, butter, the same thing goes. We are getting millions of pounds of imports from other countries, while we are destroying our own production. Such is the government's attitude. It solves nothing. Neither the Prime Minister nor the throne speech bring any solutions for that.

As I said earlier, the budget brought in by the Minister of Finance in March increased debt interests by $2 million a day with an $11 billion deficit increase. This is no joke. When the Prime Minister tells us government spending is to be cut by $2 billion at the expense of public servants, do you not feel it would make more sense to reduce government expenditures at the expense of financiers, who go on rising their prices, their interest rates instead of saving $2 billion? If tomorrow the government decided to do their own financing, if they financed provinces with loans without interest, this would mean that tomorrow the government would be saving $18 million a day we are paying in interests only on the national debt. And our debt is increasing by $20 million a day. This is not a joke. These debts must be paid by the taxpayers. Canadians have to pay $18 million a day for the bad administration of the government. Do you know that instead of saving $2 billion Canada would have saved $6.7 billion by the end of the year? We could let the Prime Minister have his $2 billion and redistribute the other $4.7 billion in the small business sector to give it a new life, to create employment and to create other production levels to replace those that have been destroyed.

Earlier, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) said that this would help the import of foreign capital, the development of new gas deposits, the establishment in Canada of multinational companies to develop our natural resources and perhaps job creation. There may be some value in having foreigners invest in Canada, but as long as we do not have ourselves the means to buy the production of those machines, what have we gained?

We should therefore start by giving some purchasing power to the individuals. The Conservatives laughed ten years ago when the Social Crediters demanded tax reductions. They found this laughable, but today they are the ones who are demanding what we requested then, who are demanding a tax reduction so as to give a new impetus to the economy and increase individual purchasing power. If I have $5 more to spend, these $5 will certainly result in an additional production, and if all Canadians have more money to spend because they have fewer taxes to pay, they will certainly create a demand for new production, and this will necessarily result in new jobs or a demand for new jobs. This is how we can solve our present economic problem, not by continually allowing inflation to multiply.

It is not necessary to be a genius or an Einstein to understand that if I buy a house tomorrow morning at 5 per cent interest a year, it will take 20 years before the price of my house has doubled. You do not have to be a genius to understand this. If I purchase the same house at 10 per cent interest, its price will be doubled in ten years, which means that in 20 years, it will have increased fourfold, and after this you ask where inflation comes from? The Prime Minister says it does not depend on us but on the Arabs, that we are not responsible. We know that the Liberals are irresponsible, we know that. But when we come to pay 12 per cent, it takes ten years, and then eight years to double the price of a house and soon, next week probably, you will see the rate go up to 15 per cent, which means that it will take six and a half to seven years to double the price of a house. And we ask where inflation comes from? And we do not know where it comes from?

At the present time, because of its approach the government multiplies, creates that inflation; through its policy it allows the Bank of Canada to raise its rates, thereby enabling chartered banks to boost theirs on consumer loans and increase the pressure on the Canadian people to reduce their expenditures. At 15 per cent, people begin to be far less inclined to build themselves a house than before. How much is a $30,000 house going to cost them after 25 years? $89,000! We wonder where inflation comes from just like we wonder about energy. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources talks about the problem of energy. We can see little stickers everywhere on the walls saying "Save energy!"

We still encourage the massive consumption of energy in our cars and heating systems. I raised the issue in 1973 when I was the member for Charlevoix in the House of Commons; I asked the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources: Before talking about an energy crisis, a shortage of raw materials or a shortage of oil in the years to come, at least did you go to the patents office in Ottawa to enquire about the registration of any patent that might reduce gas consumption in our cars or oil consumption in our heating systems? The minister gave me the following answer: No, we did not. This was not interesting. They said to Canadians: Tighten your belts, we are going to increase the price of gas in an attempt to reduce our oil purchases, but we cannot protect the individual or protect our resources by reducing energy losses, it is impossible.

In 1956, as I was 16 years old, I was driving an old wreck. A mechanic had fixed my carburetor so that my old wreck was going 65 miles a gallon, Mr. Speaker. I am not joking, 65 miles a gallon until that mechanic applied for a patent. The RCMP came and said that the system was dangerous because it was using preheated gas. At that time, I did not know exactly what it meant but I finally discovered that in all planes the fuel is preheated before it reaches the engine. It is not dangerous in a plane with 300 passengers but it is dangerous in a car.

Today, with catalytic systems on cars people are no longer allowed to go anywhere near oil companies' lands as the oil tank 150 feet away might explode because of the high temperature of the converter under the car. That shows how this government is prepared to accept anything: It allows companies to encourage excessive gas consumption in cars so that they make money with such dangerous gadgets as catalytic converters. That is the attitude of the government. Then they come to tell Canadians: You are wasting energy. There are little stickers on walls saying: Turn off the lights, do not over-heat yet at the same time the government does nothing, not even to market patents which have been duly registered in the patent office and make their use mandatory. My predecessor in the riding of Témiscamingue and the House of Commons, Mr. Réal Caouette, had been asking in those days for competitions to be held throughout the country for technicians and engineers to find ways to reduce consumption so as to save energy.

One must not penalize individuals but allow them to put their brains to work to find means and solutions to improve everybody's lot. The present government does not see it that way and all it intends to do is to penalize Canadians while putting the blame on others. If there are problems, it is never its fault. It is not responsible for inflation. It is not the government which allows the Bank of Canada to decide anything, it is the United States, the real bosses are the United States. The government has been elected for the fun of it. It has no decisions to make. We have just been treated to a Speech from the Throne in two parts: cutbacks in government spendings and, second, the constitution. It is true that there is a problem of unity in Canada. I listened earlier to the member for Don Valley (Mr. Gillies) expressing his views on the Quebec issue. He was referring to books written in 1936 and dealing then with the American issues and also with Latin America. As to the problem of Quebec, and also Canada in answer to the member for Don Valley and to government members I would say that in my opinion it is neither a language issue nor a constitutional problem. Indeed the constitution creates frictions but tomorrow I do not know of any Canadian who is going to want the constitution to become his daily bread.

I never heard about one single family going every week to the corner store to buy a new constitution, never. The problem is the right to live honestly and honourably here in Canada. In our provinces it is also the right to live honestly and honourably. That is what Canadians want. Unfortunately, in Quebec many Canadians do not even earn enough money to eat two decent meals a day. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) said so herself before a group of students recently. There are 600,000 poor in Canada now. They do not even have enough money to eat two decent meals a day. We must admit it, there are people in Quebec who are unhappy, that is true. They do not even have enough money to eat two decent meals a day in French, in Quebec. Is it not terrible, in French, Mr. Speaker? I went to western Canada, on the Vancouver docks where I saw poor people; I went to the maritimes where I saw poor people there also. In Ontario, I went to regions where I also saw poor people who do not have the means to eat two decent meals, not three, we are used to talking about three meals, but here it is not even three, but only two decent meals a day. In other provinces, it is funny, people speak English, it is not terrible? And there are poor people among the English, it is terrible, it is horrible. Is it a language problem? Is it a constitutional problem? It is like I told you: be it in English or in French, nobody wants to eat constitutions, never! Poor people want enough money to go and buy food, for example. That is the problem. It is an economic problem that could be solved by giving to everybody a sufficient income to meet personal needs.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): D'accord.

[Translation]

Mr. Caouette (Témiscamingue): I thank you, Mr. Speaker, as well as all my colleagues. I have only a few more words to say.

Indeed there is a solution to that issue and we should not continue a confrontation between Canadians and we should not say what the Prime Minister said the other day in his speech about the Leader of the Opposition capitulating before the provinces. What we need is a strong government. But we cannot build a strong government without opposing each other. That is not the way. You do not build by confronting people and telling them to toe the line.

A good father does not spend all his time arguing with his children and saying to them: I am the boss and you will do as I say. However, if you have a conciliating father who is prepared to listen to any one of his ten or twelve children or to consider their needs, I am sure that father will raise a friendly and peaceful family. Anyone who spends all his time confronting his children or his colleagues will surely have the results we have in Canada: discontent in the west, dissatisfaction in central Canada as well as in Atlantic provinces. In his speech, the Prime Minister failed to indicate the solution, and in introducing again Bill C-60, he wants to maintain confrontation.

To conclude my speech, Mr. Speaker, in spite of what government members have to say, the Speech from the Throne does not contain any new or valuable suggestions. The Speech from the Throne will only complicate the complex issues we have to face now, it continues undermining the confidence people may have had in their government. As federal civil servants will have to pay for reduced expenses, that will destroy the confidence civil servants had in government.

Mr. Speaker, let the government start once and for all to recognize the rights of people, their right to earn a normal and valuable living and then, if individuals are to be replaced by machines in industry and find themselves jobless, let the government be intelligent enough then to find ways and means to give those individuals a purchasing power which will allow them to buy this machine-made production. It is precisely what the Social Credit party suggests as a solution to these problems to ensure a guaranteed annual income for everyone so that people will have enough purchasing power.

To conclude, the only suggestion I can make now to the minister and to the government is to stop clouding the issue with a smokescreen, to stop telling us stories and giving us all that hot air. They should start to roll up their sleeves to tackle the economic problems. It is a matter of urgency as more and more people are really fed up to be taken in, really fed up to lose their job and to have to live not even on unemployment but on social welfare.

[English]

Mr. B. Keith Penner (Thunder Bay): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) certainly distinguished themselves by the manner in which they moved and seconded the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The hon. member for York South expressed her love for Canada, her adopted country, and she did so in a most moving way. It was a tonic to hear our country praised for a change—so frequently it seems that Canada is described only in the most negative terms, quite contrary to the evidence around us. Of course there are some problems, and I shall spend most of my allotted time talking about a few of them, but there are many good things to which we can point with pride. I took much delight in the fact that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) devoted part of his speech to doing just that, and doing so most effectively.

I was pleased the hon. member for Verdun used a portion of his speech to talk about the senior citizens. After all, the prosperity and success of modern Canada are in large measure due to their contributions at a time when, as a rule, rewards for achievement were much less than they are today.

The government's New Horizons program has given all hon. members the opportunity to become more closely involved with senior citizens groups, and those of us who have done so are greatly impressed by the way in which these grants are being used, and by the appreciation shown for them. If the government really wants an example of how to carry out a restraint program, it should observe with some care how these senior citizens' organizations take those grants under the New Horizons program and do so very much with them.

When the hon. member for Verdun was speaking, I recalled a visit of mine to his community at the time when he was contesting his by-election. A youth group from Verdun had invited me to participate with it in a seminar on development in northern Canada. The request came at the time when Mr. Justice Berger's report had just been released. I mention this incident only in passing because it illustrated for me that as long as there are Canadians in one part of the country, like Verdun, who take an active interest in and show concern about Canadians in another part of the country, like those living in the Mackenzie Valley, then somehow I feel that we do not need to become unduly disquieted about the depth and strength of this nation's unity.

During the month of August while parliament was in recess, the government announced its determination to reduce its expenditures. At one point, the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) expressed the view that perhaps today in Canada people have become too dependent on government and that they look to government for nearly everything. "What is the government going to do about this? What is the government going to do about that"? I am sure all hon. members have heard that question time after time when they have been in their constituencies. Of course there will always be considerable scope and need for collective action. This is the way in which a civilized nation is nurtured and built. The cost of creating a humane and decent society is considerable. In fact it is immense. At the same time, and in the process, it is also possible for well-meaning governments to assume too much unto themselves and thereby stifle or discourage the initiative of individual persons or of the private sector. Too much involvement of government in people's lives may and, in fact, does, as most of us can testify, cause resentment and bring about a reaction against government generally.

Throughout the 1960s and into the 1970s it is true that governments at all levels increased their shares of the gross national product. It should be noted, however—and the President of the Treasury Board has done this—that increases in government expenditures have come most significantly at the provincial and municipal levels. The figures are there, provided by the President of the Treasury Board, showing that the increase in total government expenditures by the federal government has been much, much less.

Any restraint program, however, must begin with a determination to eliminate waste, extravagance, and inefficiency in government. A restraint policy should not set out to destroy programs, facilities or agencies which are required and essential for the common good, that is, unless or until some private concern is prepared to take over the service and do it as well or perhaps more efficiently at less cost. A case in point is the announcement by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to axe Canfarm, an important and essential electronic management tool for many farmers. Canfarm has been described as one of the most progressive programs that the government provides in agriculture. It has become indispensable to the most efficient of Canada's farmers.

If the Minister of Agriculture fails to find a private company or organization to take over the Canfarm service, then I think some consideration should be given to doing a number of other things. Consideration should be given to increasing user-fees, which now are really only nominal, amounting to $30 per year per farmer. Perhaps there could be some cutting back on the developmental work which comprises such a large portion of the total program expenses, and possibly the operation at Guelph could be made more efficient. Let the financial burden on the federal government be reduced, yes, but I say to the Minister of Agriculture, do not let Canfarm die.

The decision to close the Petawawa forest experimental station falls into the same category, another possible casualty of government restraint. My colleague, the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East (Mr. Hopkins), will, I am sure, have much more to say about this particular matter in his speech, and I commend him for his dedicated endeavour to reverse what seems to be a questionable decision.

The forest products industry is the major employer in the constituency which I presently represent. I am advised that this industry directly employs 300,000 people in Canada, and indirectly there are another 700,000 who owe their jobs to forests. Forest products contribute significantly to our merchandise trade surplus—to the extent of $4 billion a year—and the federal government derives revenue from this industry to the extent of $1 billion annually. In the light of these statistics it is easy to understand why people in the industry resent the proposal to close a forest experimental station or a forest lab. In a letter, one of my constituents expressed it this way:

> If I had to change my personal budget because of monetary restraints, I would look at unnecessary expenses and tighten regular expenses, but, I would not stop wearing shoes so I couldn't get to work, to save a few dollars.

Forest research in numerous areas is urgently required in order for our Canadian industry to survive. It must survive against competition which is rapidly developing in other countries which have much better climatic conditions than we have, and where trees grow much faster.

The announced government restraint program is surely a welcome invitation to parliamentary committees to become sharper and more effective in their examination of spending estimates. Those of us who serve on these committees are supposed to be the watchdogs of the public purse. I think that is the way it goes, in political science anyway. Well, if we are the watchdogs, seldom has our bark frightened anyone, and rarely has anyone been bitten for squandering public funds. It seems to me that a time of restraint is a good opportunity for parliamentary committees to prove themselves.

An exercise in restraint is also an opportunity for the government to redirect its efforts toward more desirable social and economic goals. In a time of high unemployment one of those goals must be job creation. In a time of high inflation one of those goals must be to redirect income to where it is most needed, to the elderly and to low-income families. These are measures which we will be debating during this session of parliament.

Above all, restraint will only hurt—and not help—unless the end result is a stimulus to economic growth. Since the early 1970s Canada has been suffering from a very serious lack of economic growth. Advocates of a no-growth or slow-growth economy have been notably silent these past few years. They have been silent because the results of that kind of an economy are not acceptable. The results are a rising rate of unemployment, especially among young people who are the newest entrants into our work force, and very large deficits in our international payments. Canada's current account balance has, with the exception of 1973, deteriorated every year since 1970. The major reason for this deterioration in our current balance is the rising deficit in the service account which escalated from $1.4 billion in 1966 to an estimated $8 billion in 1977. The service account deficit is the consequence of very heavy borrowing during the mid-1970s and an increasing shortfall in our tourist account. The devalued dollar has increased the cost of servicing our foreign debt, but unfortunately it has not generated as much additional tourism in Canada as it was expected to do. I say unfortunately, because the region in northern Ontario which I represent is one of the prime tourist regions of the country.

Looking at our merchandise trade account, the picture is much, much brighter, at least upon first glance. This year, our trade surplus in goods is expected to be $4 billion, which is up from $2.9 billion in 1977. But I would remind hon. members that it is our trade in primary resources and semi-fabricated goods which has made this trade surplus possible. Our trade in finished, manufactured goods or end-products continues to decline. It was minus $3 billion in 1970, and last year it was minus $12 billion. Canadians are buying foreign made goods at the rate of $42 billion a year, which is approximately $2,000 per person, or $8,000 per household in Canada. It is the sale of our wheat, forest products and minerals in large measure which makes it possible for Canadians to buy so many imports, much of which are in the luxury class.

As a member who represents one of the major resource regions of the country, of course I am delighted that our minerals and forest products are helping so much to provide Canadians with a high standard of living. I am pleased that we are able to contribute so significantly to Canada's trade surplus. But there are dangers for us if we continue to rely too extensively on our natural resources to keep us afloat.

[Mr. Penner.]

The manufacturing trade deficit reveals that there is a serious lack in the processing of our natural resources. Natural resource exports have been a redeeming feature in our merchandise trade account, but selling unprocessed materials abroad also means the exportation of jobs, jobs which we badly need in Canada at the present time. For example, it has been estimated that when we export $1 billion worth of natural resources, we generate 60,000 jobs in Canada. In turn, when we buy $1 billion worth of manufactured goods from abroad, 240,000 jobs are involved. This is the situation in Canada which is leading to more and more discussion by people in the univerisities, by economists and by other groups of concerned citizens, more and more discussion about the need for policies to encourage further processing and manufacturing.

Those of us who live in resource regions favour more on site processing. We would like to see more jobs created in the regions from which the natural resources come. We believe that this is the key to genuine, long term and lasting regional development. Coming from a region which depends heavily upon the forest products industry, I appreciate the positive results which flow from the increased processing of raw materials. For example, increased processing of pulp has meant a steady improvement in Canada's account for fine papers. Imports of fine papers are expected to decline substantially this year, and exports will grow appreciably. Canada's improved performance in the fine papers industry has occurred because of increased rationalization and specialization. Paper mills have concerntrated on fewer grades, weights and colours. Rationalization and specialization seem to point the way toward a more productive and competitive manufacturing sector in Canada. Those who know say that this sector is now plagued by duplication, excess capacity, and short production runs.

A recent visitor to my office put it this way in describing what should be done to improve the industrial situation in Canada. He said:

> We are putting our money on too many horses. We should pick the winners.

I would argue that the winners must include those industries most closely connected with the development and processing of our natural resources. Those industries, as well as others, would add value to the raw materials we produce and the energy we consume.

In the report by the Sector Task Force on the Canadian Nonferrous Metals Industry, recently released there were some rather startling figures concerning the value added content in Canada's export of metals. The report indicated that approximately one half of the copper, lead and zinc mined is exported in its concentrate form; only one half is smelted and refined into primary metal. Some two-thirds of the primary aluminum, copper and zinc are exported; only one-third is used in Canada's secondary manufacturing, and over 90 per cent of the nickel produced in Canada is exported.

While I have argued this afternoon for policies which would encourage, as a part of our industrial strategy, rationalization, specialization, and incentives for increased processing, I would not favour any policy which would act as a disincentive to mineral exploration and development. Much to the contrary, to discourage resource development would not aid manufacturing. Failure to encourage capital formation for resource development means that capital will go elsewhere in the world, and our Canadian resource regions will remain underpopulated and economically depressed.

Since the three main industries of northern Ontario are forest products, mining and tourism, I was extremely pleased by the announcement of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) indicating that there would be increases in economic development programs amounting to $300 million in 1979-80. Approximately $65 million of that total increase will be to provide support for tourism and resource industries. Of equal interest for me was the announcement by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) which outlined government support of $400 million for renewable energy technology and industries founded on the commercial use of such technology. He stated that over the next five years the government plans to devote a large chunk of this total to the utilization of foreign wastes which are now by-products of the lumber, pulp and paper industries.

With regard to the mining industry, there have been two fairly recent reports pointing to the less than buoyant conditions for the industry in Canada. One report is entitled "The Decline of Small Mineral Enterprises in Ontario". It maintains that higher exploration costs, falling returns, and increased risks have had a negative impact on the small mineral enterprises in the province of Ontario. That report was published by that provinces's ministry of natural resources.

The second report is one of our own. It is the Sector Task Force on the Canadian Nonferrous Metals Industry to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, a report to which I referred earlier. The task force was one of the 23 commissioned after the first ministers' conference last winter to examine various sectors of the economy. The report maintains:

> Unless measures are taken by all concerned to revive mining exploration in this country, there will be a spectacular decline in the production in this sector over the balance of the century.

There are some recommendations, one of which has to do with capital formation. It states:

> With capital formation the issue of overriding importance, an early resolution of the dispute between the federal and provincial governments over mining taxation would produce more rational tax structures and create an environment more conducive to capital formation.

Secondly, the report recommended:

> In order to encourage increased resource processing and trade the report recommends further incentives for research and development.

I was going to comment about Canada's position at the present time with respect to research and development as compared with that of other countries. However, hon. members are so familiar with these figures that it would be redundant on my part.

I will leave that and move on to the third recommendation in the report, which is as follows:

> A problem of increasing importance in the mining industry is labour retention, particularly at Canadian mining operations remote from urban centres. There is often an excessively high turnover rate for the work force in these locations. In order to encourage the movement of people from urban areas in the south to isolated areas in the north, the government should give serious attention to a form of income tax relief for employees in remote areas in Canada who remain on the job for more than two years.

I have made this suggestion in the House before. The response has been that the government, at the federal level, cannot deal with regions, but must deal totally on a national basis. We know that in recent budgets the government has moved more and more toward a recognition that there needs to be special policies for particular regions in order to meet the needs and solve the problems which exist there. I do not think the old argument will stand any longer.

Those who live and work in remote communities located in resource regions are, in general, under-serviced. In some places this is far more serious than in others. Many must travel considerable distances for medical and dental care. Post-secondary education requires moving away from home, and there are additional costs for parents. In view of this additional travel I must not fail to point out to the House that these people pay anywhere from 15 to 20 cents more per gallon of gasoline than do people in urban areas. Yet, the products of our resource regions, as I have demonstrated this afternoon, contribute a disproportionately large amount to the national economy. Our tax system, it seems to me, should provide some tangible rewards for those who work and live in these regions.

If time allows, and I believe it does, I should like to point out that some people in the mining industry have expressed concern about the activities of the Export Development Corporation. Those concerns are based on serious misconceptions as to the purpose and function of the EDC. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has pointed out that the corporation's role is to facilitate the sale of Canadian goods and services to foreign buyers. EDC loans are tied directly to the sales of Canadian equipment and services, so they create jobs for Canadians.

Neither the Government of Canada nor the EDC has the power to prevent a sovereign nation from developing its own natural resources. If we do not arrange financing for the sale of our equipment and services, then some other nation most certainly will, some other nation such as Japan, Germany, France, Great Britain or the United States. As the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has said:

> If Canadian exporters are to be prevented from selling to such buyers, we will lose not only their jobs, but tomorrow's competition—and we shall be worse off for it.

To conclude, we are being told today that Canada must learn to live within its means. We must import fewer luxuries, we must buy more Canadian products, we must divert more production facilities to exports, and we must spend on consumer goods only what has been earned. In the short term, the lower Canadian dollar can help, but in the long haul it will not solve our problems of unemployment, of inflation or of sluggish economic growth. Nor can we expect that our natural resources will help to balance our accounts forever and ever. This simply will not be, and it is time to turn our face to the future.

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to participate in the debate in respect of the Speech from the Throne, such as it was. Before commencing my remarks I should like to congratulate and commend the mover of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. memer for York South (Mrs. Appolloni), and the seconder, the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard).

At the outset I would certainly like to echo the question a vast majority of Canadians are now asking, and that is, which way are we heading? This question has come to haunt an increasing number of Canadians with the entrenchment in power of the Liberal government over the last decade.

Canada is at a unique juncture in its history. We are facing many challenges, with over a million Canadians out of work, a distressingly high inflation rate which threatens to become a double-digit phenomenon, a miserably slow growth rate, impending constitutional changes, and a national unity crisis. One views the state of the nation with grave concern. I must register these concerns even at the risk of being termed an alarmist by government members who prefer not to be reminded of their record over the last ten years of Prime Minister Trudeau's government.

We require renewed faith in the ability of Canadians to surmount any obstacles on the road to making this country an example to the rest of the world. We need dynamism and farsighted leadership to inspire Canadians to place their faith in our country. Lack of effective leadership has led to haphazard and shortsighted policies being pursued by the government. The result of such policies is evident in the economic malaise that afflicts us today, political uncertainty, and an increase in social stress as reflected in the persistent state of labour unrest.

Last week the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) made a flamboyant speech in the House. It was a lot of sound and fury, and I think, as Shakespeare said in one of his plays, it signified nothing. The highly entertaining performance relished by his own party members left many Canadians questioning the seriousness with which the current leadership is viewing the problems facing us.

An hon. Member: They liked it.

Mr. Darling: Certainly, they liked it. The Liberal side really liked it, but did the Canadian people like it? According to a poll taken across the country and the marks given out, the Prime Minister, because he did come on particularly strong in the last few minutes when he left his notes, was given a five out of ten for his performance, while our leader was given an eight, and that was an unbiased poll.

[Mr. Penner.]

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Darling: That is just an example. I can assure my government colleagues across the way that the people of Canada who were listening in on live television probably were not able to get the same out of his speech as we were sitting right across the way, and they probably marked the Prime Minister's performance even lower.

The current leadership is indecisive. No one needs to be reminded of the guessing game the Prime Minister engaged in earlier this year about calling an election when he was faced with adverse reports from internal sources which indicated the unpopularity of the Liberal party. The fact is that the Prime Minister got cold feet and stalled. The government cannot tolerate the thought of facing the electorate. The wrath of the voters will deliver judgment on the government policies that have plunged Canada into serious economic and political trouble.

This is a rather unique day because a mini-election is being held. I know a great many people will be watching with interest when the polls close at eight o'clock and the results begin to come in. I am not one to forecast any election results—

Mr. Cullen: Go ahead.

Mr. Darling: All right. I will say that the Progressive Conservatives will come out with at least nine seats, and I am being very conservative with a small "c". We will see what that forecast brings.

Mr. Young: Would you resign if you are wrong?

Mr. Darling: Hardly, but that would be one bet, if I was a betting man, that would probably be safe to make. Would the next speaker from the government side of the House be willing to make a guess and put his seat on the line for the number of seats he will stipulate that his party will win in the by-elections today?

Anyone who examines the record of this country over the past decade would wonder just what is happening and what direction the economy is taking. The most obvious and highly embarrassing situation that confronts us today is the value of our dollar on the world market. This is a vote of non-confidence cast by the international financial community on the policies of the present government. The disastrous economic policies of this government continue to plunge the value of our dollar further downward. The government continues to find scapegoats to blame for the decline, but it would be well advised to examine carefully its own record and policies rather than to blame the Canadian public.

The Canadian dollar has hit an historic low. Surely the Prime Minister will agree that this is not a reflection, as he states, of a "healthy country in a difficult world". The decline of the dollar has led the government to engage in foreign borrowing to prop up its value. It pays out heavily in interest charges which further prevent us from attaining a balance of payments equilibrium.

One obvious advantage of the devaluation of a country's currency is that its goods and services become attractive to foreign markets. This was brought home to me in my own particular riding, in the village of Burks Falls where I live. There is a woodworking industry that is working at full capacity there because a large amount of their production is exported to the United States. But that is the exception to the rule, and there is no question that that firm is doing very well. While in attendance at a social event in the town of Powassan on Saturday night I spoke to a lumberman who also informed me that his firm is doing exceptionally well at this time. As he said, "They are just waiting to grab the lumber as it comes off the tail saw and send it direct to the United States." So, there are some advantages, but in the long run it is not in the best interests of Canada as a whole. Unfortunately, as I mentioned, the value of our dollar has defied traditional economic wisdom in so far as not providing a boost for many more exports than the examples that I gave.

I could go on endlessly listing the failures of this government. For instance, inflation has more than doubled from 4.5 per cent in April, 1968, to almost a double-digit figure. Similarly, housing costs have doubled in the last ten years and the unemployment rate has risen drastically from 4.5 per cent in 1968 to 8.6 per cent in 1978. I am aware that the present minister of employment is greatly concerned about this and is endeavouring to do something to alleviate the situation, and we are hoping that something can be done to turn things around. I am very pessimistic as to what is going to happen during the coming winter.

I mentioned that housing starts are down. The government, in its wisdom, has cut expenditures on a great many departments, something which will make many Canadians very unhappy. I am thinking in particular of those in the low income bracket, who are living in houses which are not in good condition and who had hoped to benefit from the government's current insulation program. The provinces of Nova Scotia and Prince Edward Island receive $500 per house under this plan and the people in the other provinces receive $350 for insulation. With the $110 million cut, there will certainly be a great many applications submitted that will have to be turned down. I am still receiving applications from some of my constituents and, of course, I will have to write them in the course of the next day or so telling them to get their applications in in a hurry because the chances are not as good as expected.

Another concern to me is the great exodus of Canadian capital for housing investment in other countries. It is estimated that over $1.4 billion has left Canada for the United States. Much of that money is being invested in apartments and buildings there because Canadian businessmen and developers feel they will get a much better return for their dollar. This is most unfortunate for our country where housing construction is needed, as well as other building construction.

What surprised and further depressed many Canadians was the Speech from the Throne and in particular, the Prime Minister's theatrical performance that failed to provide any concrete solutions or suggestions to deal with some of these problems. None of the other members of the cabinet have come forth with any policies either. One would have thought that this would be an ideal time for the government to indicate in some small measure what remedies it may be contemplating for our ailing economic situation. Instead, the cabinet and the Prime Minister have engaged in a frantic effort to convince Canadians that all is well, but the Canadian public knows otherwise for they face inflation in the supermarkets every day.

The Speech from the Throne is full of promises. It is littered with the same repetitive and unkept promises that one found in the previous nine Speeches from the Throne. However, it contains no plan of action. On the other hand, I highly commend the leader of my party for delivering a very eloquent address outlining in concrete terms what my party intends to do when elected to govern the country at the next election.

We on this side, for instance, have advocated a proposal to provide tax deductibility of mortgage interest and property taxes on personal residences. I, for one, have long advocated such a move in order to ease the tax burden placed on the individual homeowners.

As reeve of a small community for over a quarter of a century, and as a vice president and member of the executive of the Association of the Ontario Mayors and Reeves, I know that time and time again they have brought in a resolution to the effect that a tax on tax was unfair. The United States have done it for a number of years and, certainly if it is successful there, it can be just as successful here. I would not be surprised that the government, through its lack of policies, ends up by stealing that policy from us. If they do, more power to them.

The Progressive Conservatives have also proposed tax credits for research and development and cutting waste and inefficiency in government. These are, Mr. Speaker, but a few of some very specific proposals put forth by the leader of my party. These policies will be implemented in the very near future when the Canadian public is offered an opportunity to go to the polls to chase out the ineffective Liberal government and replace it with a responsible Progressive Conservative government.

For one who hails from picturesque Parry Sound-Muskoka, it is gratifying to note that one of the promises contained in the throne speech is to provide additional assistance for tourism. I sincerely hope that the promise does not become one of a string of earlier unkept promises. For instance, the government has been promising more aid to small businesses for the last five years. However, by the Prime Minister's own admission, small business is still being strangled in this country; evidence of this is reflected in the 49 per cent increase in business bankruptcies in August over the same month last year.

The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley (Mr. Jelinek), this party's critic on small business, outlined at some length our position on small business and its importance to the economy. Small business employs over 55 per cent of people in the country and generates over 60 per cent of the gross national product, so it is a most important part of the economy. I wonder how the many small businessmen view the recent increase in the prime rate of the Bank of Canada to 10¾ per cent today, a jump three quarters of one per cent. That just makes it more difficult to borrow money or, if you can borrow it, it is more difficult to pay it back.

This morning I had a telephone call from the operator of a sawmill in my riding who needs additional financing and is finding it difficult to get. I suggested that he contact the nearest branch of the Federal Business Development Bank where I hope he will be able to make satisfactory arrangements. Its interest rates are not the best, but many Canadians are delighted to be able to deal with it as a lender of last resort.

Tourism is Canada's largest single employer and the sixth largest source of foreign exchange. Furthermore, the combined value of visitor expenditures and domestic travel spending amounts to a $11 billion industry which accounts for 5 per cent of gross national product and yields governments some $5 billion in tax revenues. Yet for too long tourism has been denied the necessary recognition as an important economic and social element in our society.

I have said before, but I will place it on the record again, that I think any department or business that generates $11 billion worth of revenue should be given prominence and, therefore, I feel there should be a minister of state for tourism. Even in this time of cutting back expenditures that would not mean that one additional person need be hired. There are plenty of people in the branch of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce responsible for tourism who could do an excellent job. Tourism is vital to the economy of Canada and, I must say in all fairness, to the great riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka where it is the main industry.

It is ironic that it was in Bonn earlier this year that the Prime Minister first became fully aware of the seriousness of our domestic problems. The Prime Minister took some heed of the concern expressed by leaders of other industrialized nations about the state of the Canadian economy.

The Prime Minister suddenly became aware of the high rates of unemployment and inflation, and of the astoundingly high federal spending spree. Federal spending has increased by 400 per cent since the present government came to power ten years ago. Upon his return from the Bonn economic summit the Prime Minister hastily arranged to make a nationally televised address to enunciate a new economic policy. The announcement contained the usual promises to do something about everything. It is understood that a majority of the cabinet members were not even consulted before the address. The Prime Minister is not only isolated from the aspirations of Canadians but from his own close cabinet colleagues. Later, in a string of dramatic pronouncements which invoked images of a theatrical performance, about half a dozen cabinet members appeared on stage during the month of August to seek economic credibility. Now that the dust has settled from the summer activity, Canadians find themselves faced with no brighter economic prospects than before all the August announcements. Once again the government failed to offer any long-term solution or suggestions and most of the cuts announced are to take effect in the 1979-80 fiscal year.

The Prime Minister came to power a decade ago promising a united Canada. Canadians justifiably ask themselves today whether we are any more united or further torn apart.

The Prime Minister wonders why Canadians are questioning his intentions vis-à-vis the monarchy in the package on constitutional reform. When one observes the Prime Minister vacationing in North Africa on a purely private holiday and not at hand to welcome the Queen as the head of state, one questions his real intentions about the kind of role, if any, he would like to assign to Her Majesty the Queen.

The process of constitutional change is a very fundamental one for any nation, with far-reaching effects. It came as a surprise, therefore, when the Prime Minister, in introducing the constitutional proposals, placed a deadline on the passage of these proposals. I commend the joint Senate-House committee which did not agree to head the Prime Minister's authoritarian whims.

A joint effort by the federal-provincial governments is essential to tackle the constitutional issue. Unfortunately, statements by a number of federal cabinet members to the effect that the federal government could act unilaterally in implementing some of the proposals, seriously jeopardize the healthy working relationship that must prevail between the two levels of government. As a result of the statements by the cabinet members, the ten provincial premiers meeting in Regina unanimously denounced the Prime Minister's approach in dealing with the ten provinces in constitutional matters. I believe that the provinces must be included as equal partners in any discussion affecting the future of Canada. The Prime Minister will be well advised not to rush through some haphazardly constructed policies that may come to haunt the nation in the not too distant future. A constitution is meant to unite and inspire a nation. Let us hope to achieve the same in our constitution.

I convey my sincere congratulations to the leader of my party who is engaged in maintaining a sustained dialogue with the provinces. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister finds himself in confrontation with the provinces most of the time. After all the reason may lie in the fact that the Liberals are in power in only one province, and by a mere one seat.

These remarks will not be complete without some reference to the deplorable state of the Post Office. Canadians are once again faced with a nation-wide postal strike. The Post Office, which now ranks as the twelfth largest user of government funds, has, over the years, grown into a monstrous bureaucracy plagued by labour-management problems resulting in crippling strikes at too frequent intervals. The strikes create not only inconvenience but massive economic hardship for small businesses so heavily dependent on the services of the Post Office.

The Progressive Conservative party has for long advocated the transformation of the Post Office into a Crown corporation before the Prime Minister consented to the idea in August. It is my sincere hope that the structural change will result in a more efficient operation of a very vital service. One hopes that a settlement will be reached by both parties to the current dispute and thereby avert another strike.

I am well aware that serious talks are going on at the moment between Post Office management and union officials. Let us hope, in the interests of the Canadian public at large, that both sides will give serious consideration to continuing the service, thereby making it unnecessary for this parliament to bring in legislation to keep the CUPW workers at work. If they do go back to work and things are not satisfactory, to put it mildly we will not be getting 100 cents on the dollar from the employees who are back at work because we know that they will not be working as enthusiastically as they would under normal circumstances.

I had the privilege of attending a postal users conference in Toronto during the latter part of September. It was very interesting, as a member of parliament, to hear the many speakers. The figures quoted were really astounding. Those people in attendance numbered some 500 and were the wholesale users of the Post Office. Their business lives depend on an efficient postal service.

I believe a representative of the Bank of Montreal commented on the amount of money paid by them for postal services. The spokesman stated that about two years ago the bank spent $9 million on postage. I believe this year, because of increased rates the amount is up to $12 million, but he mentioned the terrible postal service in operation between Montreal and Toronto. It is so bad the bank has given up on the Post Office. Instead there is now a special courrier who leaves the bank in Montreal with 300 pounds of mail at 3.30 in the afternoon. This mail arrives in Toronto by 9 a.m. the following morning. The bank's representative was asked why the bank did that. He answered that mail between Montreal and Toronto was taking as long as five, six or seven days to reach its destination.

Here we have a very important department of the government which is losing close to $600 million this year. If this department were run efficiently and without confrontation between management and labour, it might be able to recapture a lot of that lost revenue.

Another speaker at this conference was the vice-president of Maclean's who patted the Post Office on the back with one hand and then by saying they gave reasonably good service, he gave them a kick with the other. I believe Maclean's spent $6 million a year on postage. He went on to say that Maclean's spends another $1 million a year for courrier service in order to get their magazines and periodicals to certain key locations to be distributed by the Post Office. One can see that Post Office management could get even more business from that particular user.

There is no other department of government that is more important to the people of Canada. Certainly National Health and Welfare is a high priority department. However, I believe there are more people concerned with the Post Office and with its efficiency.

I can see that my time is running out. I wish to thank you for your courtesy in allowing me to conclude my remarks.

Mr. Hugh A. Anderson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, before I get to the text of my remarks I would like to make a few comments, following from what the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling) said. In my opinion many hon. members do not believe that should the Post Office be off for one or two weeks that will create a hardship for the people of Canada, and one which they cannot tolerate—

An hon. Member: Tell that to them.

Mr. Anderson: My Conservative friends, being reactionary as usual, would like to put everybody in jail who thinks of going on strike—

An hon. Member: Who said anything about that?

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Anderson: In this country we do have certain basic freedoms.

People I met this summer on Vancouver Island were quick to point out that they were not against the basic right of people to go on strike, but with the right is a responsibility. People in my area on Vancouver Island were saying that if the Post Office and CUPW were responsible, then obviously they should have the right to strike, and obviously this is a right which should not be taken away from them.

People in Canada over the last several years have come to look at CUPW as an example of all bad that happens in unions because of a series of actions.

During times of relatively high unemployment and during times of concern about the direction our economy is headed, people tend to look at organizations, such as those in Sudbury which recently went on strike, as not being realistic. They tend to look at the labour movement as the culprits in our society. I do not believe they are. I believe the people of Canada would best be served if CUPW were a moderate group of people who could negotiate in a meaningful manner.

I do not think it is meaningful for CUPW to say, for example, that they wish to go from a 40 to a 30-hour week in one fell swoop, and then add approximately 18 hours of travelling time, tea breaks, and a few other breaks as well which would mean that the Government of Canada would have to hire an additional 46,000 workers. If CUPW want to have the support of members of parliament and the people of Canada generally, they will have to be responsible in their demands. I am not opposed to CUPW per se. However, I am opposed to irresponsibility, whether it be on the part of CUPW or the official opposition. Irresponsibility on either count is something with which we all disagree.

Many members have been told at the present time that if the public service unions are not responsible, the people of Canada would like the Government of Canada to take away their right to strike. I am not advocating that. I am saying that if you talk to people across this country, you will hear that said. I think it is wrong. We should not have first and second class citizens in this country, with one group of people having the right to strike but not another.

I fear that CUPW gives a black eye to the labour movement, whether it be private or public, and that it is fermenting disrespect for the labour movement. I do not think the labour movement can afford it at this time. I hope my fear is unfounded. However, from speaking with people in my area, as well as with those in other provinces, I find that subject is raised again and again. They feel that disruptions in our carrier service, police service or postal service, should not be allowed to take place and that legislation should be brought in regarding essential services.

I am not sure that is the answer. I believe it would be more profitable to attempt, through meaningful negotiation with responsible groups, to find solutions that do not cause inconvenience to the public. I hope that union leaders in organizations such as CUPW which have a higher profile recognize the danger they may get into, not only with regard to the right to strike but in another important area. If poor service is provided, less and less people will use it and less and less people will be required. I suppose CUPW could be put into the position of cutting its own throat due to poor service and interruptions in the mail service with private institutions taking their place. I did not want to get into that except to carry on with what was said by the hon. member who preceded me.

I would like to discuss briefly what has happened since August 1 of this year on the return from Bonn of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), who pledged at that time a major re-ordering of government priorities. If I am not mistaken, on August 10 in his national address, the Prime Minister came across saying that new, bold, innovative measures would have to be taken. I could not agree more. I very much support the statement by the Prime Minister that this is the time for bold, new measures to be brought forward.

Mr. Dinsdale: Things are in a mess.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Why not ten years ago?

Mr. Anderson: When the group across from me came into the House the other day and politely applauded their leader, I thought they had perhaps adopted a new form of manners which would carry on throughout this session. However, I see they are still unwilling to listen to anyone from the other side of the House. I would ask them to hold their remarks until I make my few remarks. We would then be pleased to hear them.

In the context of what the Prime Minister said in his address, on August 10 I wrote to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I observed that over the years I have been in parliament, and even before I came here, when ministers of finance came before parliament with measures to last for six months, a year or sometimes two years, it was not in keeping with what we in Canada are facing today.

I think it is a fair criticism of governments past and future, and present I suppose, that they have always taken a short range approach. At the same time, it was not more than a year or two ago that the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) announced to the House a five-year program in which the government would encourage the construction of one million housing units in that period. In other words, he told the construction industry that the Government of Canada was bringing forth a plan which would allow them to dovetail their plans with the five-year plan. That gave the construction industry a certain amount of security with regard to the purchase of equipment and expansion of facilities. They knew there was a five-year direction in which they could go on unimpeded, knowing that we would not change our minds six months or a year later.

That was a very positive statement by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. For the past two years he has been on target. In fact, he has been above target, which indicates it has been an attainable plan. Also, with various programs, the construction industry, governments, provincial and municipal, are delivering that project. At the end of the five-year period, we will in fact have had one million housing starts.

Something similar took place not too long ago. The Minister of State for Science and Technology (Mr. Buchanan) announced a long-term program for research and development whereby tax credits would be allowed up to 150 per cent. It is to be a 15-year program.

Important as urban affairs, research and development and new housing construction may be, is it any less important for the consumers of Canada, the investors, banks, manufacturers and other segments of our society, to have a plan similar to those brought forward by the two ministers I mentioned? In this way investor confidence and consumer confidence could be established. The government could announce that in a five year period it would come to such and such a point and this is the blueprint to be followed.

I have not been converted overnight to the five-year plans of our socialist friends, the U.S.S.R. and so on. However, I believe this is a day and age when governments can put blueprints before the country, to be discussed as to whether it is the proper direction to be going, and whether the government method of getting there is the correct one. In looking over past parliaments, I have yet to find it the case that a minister of finance or government brought forth that sort of comprehensive plan. It may not be that important to follow exactly a five-year plan. However, everyone would at least know in what direction we are going.

One objective that might be considered is for the Government of Canada to strive for a balanced budget at the end of a five-year period. It may be that we cannot achieve such an objective within a one, two or three-year period. However, is it not feasible to say to the people of Canada, our investors and manufacturers, that this is the direction that we want to go and these are the steps we will use to implement our plan? It seems reasonable to have an objective for more than a six-month or one-year period. There would be more confidence in this country if everyone were aware of the objectives we had for our economy. Moreover, business as well as consumer interests could make their plans in keeping with the objectives of the federal government so as to achieve what we all wish to achieve.

It is also obvious to me that in order to accomplish a plan of this sort we require the cooperation not only of provincial governments but also of municipal governments. The opposition does not often mention this, but the provinces and the municipalities spend more of the tax dollar in Canada than does the federal government. I think it is time we recognized that the municipalities do have a role to play in economic planning. After all, they are one of the three partners which, as far as governments are concerned, spend the money. It would be ridiculous to have a five-year program to reduce federal and provincial spending by 5 per cent, for example, if the municipalities were not brought in and did not agree to follow the plan.

I hope the present government or some future government, when discussing the national economy, will arrange for a tripartite meeting which would include not only the provincial governments, God bless them, but also their captives as they are sometimes called, the cities and the municipalities, which in some cases are very important in economic terms. Vancouver, Montreal and Toronto, for instance, spend almost as much as do some of our provinces or territories, yet they are not allowed to take part directly in this sort of enterprise. It would not be a particularly revolutionary idea to arrange for these people to be consulted as to the steps which ought to be taken to improve the national economy.

If we are to aim for a balance between revenue and expenditure over a period of years it will be necessary to identify those projects which are essential to the Government of Canada and determine which can be reduced without causing dislocation unacceptable to the people. It is all very well to talk about balancing budgets and exercising restraint, but every time action is taken by the government in this area our good friends opposite criticize the spending cuts as ill chosen. I think it would be in the best interests of us all to review a number of areas of expenditure with a view to determining whether they could be financed in greater measure by user groups rather than by the federal government. I would give hon. members an example. As one who comes from the boondocks, a small populated centre, I could find it very easy to talk about the Toronto Symphony Orchestra or the Vancouver Symphony Orchestra. I could ask whether the people of Vancouver Island were deriving any benefit from these activities. One could say, I suppose, that the people of Canada in general were benefiting, but I suspect it is the people of Toronto or of Montreal or of Vancouver who receive the most benefit from institutions such as these within their areas.

Is it heresy to suggest that those who are the principal beneficiaries should provide the most support? The government can put out seed money, as the Canada Council has done, but must the people of Canada provide the majority of the funding of such organizations for the next 50 years? Is there not a greater community responsibility? In situations where user groups are the main beneficiaries I believe the federal government should say, "We shall continue to make part of the funding available but the majority of money must come from the community. In the absence of support from the community the federal contribution will not continue indefinitely." Maybe the response in the area will tell the government how highly the service or the activity was valued. If people in the area where benefits are received do not wish to support these activities, should the federal government continue to make finance available? One could, of course, apply this principle too narrowly, but there are surely some non-essential services with respect to which a decision could be reached and expenditure reduced over a period of years in the interest of a balanced budget.

Incidentally, I have never heard spokesmen for the official opposition tell us whether they favour a balanced budget. The only programs I have heard of theirs in the last several months are programs which would cost more money and add further to the already high budget deficit. This subject is one upon which the official opposition has been silent in the last six or seven months during which they believed there was to be a federal general election; they never once declared it was a policy of a Conservative party to balance the budget. I am rather surprised at this because the message I have heard from the official opposition seems to be this, "We are the party of financial responsibility, while the Liberals are the spendthrifts and wastrels." The Liberal party has always considered itself financially responsible. At the same time I have never heard a statement from the official opposition that it would be their object, if elected, to bring down a balanced budget within, say, five years.

Does a party of financial responsibility go into an election promising the people of Canada further debt of approximately $4.6 billion? On the other hand, is this government, which is reducing government expenditures, the financial wastrel of this parliament? I can only judge by actions and deeds. I cannot judge by rhetoric. It is of no use to talk restraint when all you can come up with is added debt amounting to $4.6 billion. I suspect that there are people who have watched the charade which has gone on over the last few months.

The Government of Canada has been preaching restraint, not just for three or four months but for the last several years. Our friends in the opposition, who criticize us for throwing away taxpayers' money, have come up with programs which would cost an additional $4.6 billion. Although I would never accuse hon. members opposite, I suspect that that $4.6 billion program was proposed only as a political ploy in the hope of gathering a few votes from people who have not looked at our budgets. I am rather disappointed that people with apparent capability in financial matters suggest that they might save this country from Liberals who madly throw away money. I do not think my party has ever thought of throwing away money as the Conservatives have. I hope the people of Canada watch, and listen to what is being said, because I suspect that hon. members opposite cannot get away with that any more.

People in Canada are a little too sophisticated to be taken in by this boondoggle which it is patently obvious is designed to do only one thing, and that is to get in and out of an election by making as many promises as possible. I suspect that the people of Canada are not quite naive enough to say that we are spendthrifts when hon. members opposite are prepared to put out some $4 billion with no recovery, and when we should be talking about saving money, not finding new ways to spend money we do not have.

The other boondoggle is the proposed expenditure of $1.6 billion or $2 billion to reduce taxes for homeowners in Canada. If we are serious about helping people—not just owners of big houses who can afford $50,000 mortgages, but also renters and people in many other situations—I hope with the co-operation of all parties we will find an equitable system for all Canadians rather than just for those to whom the Conservative party usually appeals, people on high incomes who probably do not require tax assistance in the first place.

I hope that parliament will continue to assist people through such programs as AHOP and others. Recently it was proposed that the government provide low income families with $200 a year in addition to $20 a month starting in January of next year. It seems to be reasonable and equitable that people who have the greatest need receive greater government assistance. There is no point for a breadwinner who earns $50,000 a year to receive the same benefit as a family earning $8,000 a year. I am very happy about that proposal of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin). She brought in something everyone said would never be accepted, a means test with regard to the family allowance.

I hope one further step will be contemplated. Although the guaranteed income supplement will be increased by $20 a month starting in January, 1979, perhaps serious thought could be given to the fact that there are people over age 65 who do not require government assistance. If it is our aim that people at lower income levels do not suffer further from disparity between rich and poor, surely this parliament in its wisdom could bring in programs, not to eliminate totally moneys paid to people over 65 who do not require it, but which would be equitable and which would assist those in greater need, and reduce moneys going to people who do not require it.

I do not think that is revolutionary. I have heard people complain that they have paid a lot of money into income tax, that they have employed people, and that they are the ones who are not getting the benefits. They complain that we always give money to people on welfare and people on unemployment insurance and that those people are the beneficiaries of the system. They complain that they make $100,000 a year and it is all going out to other people. I say that that is garbage, because we have a system which allows people to make $100,000. Our system does not level everyone down with regard to income, as is the case in some other societies.

When a person has made his stake and has done very well in this country, it is two-bitting to say, "So what if that woman's husband left her; give her nothing." It is two-bitting to say, "It is my money you are giving away". I find that to be a contemptible attitude.

Some people who have done well in our system do not recognize the very simple fact of life that it is the system here which has allowed them to do this. The opportunity has been there, and the fact that moneys are taken by way of income tax and in other ways is really not the point in question. I hope that in our society we have enough tolerance to accept the fact that social programs are not demeaning to recipients because they are forced to be recipients.

There is a feeling among some that if a person, through illness or ill fortune, requires assistance, he is somehow taking advantage of the system. I think that for every ten people who would take advantage of the system there are a thousand who would not, and I find it demeaning that some of our citizens, not only in this House but also in other sectors of society, assume that undeserving recipients of assistance are the majority rather than the minority.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, I must say that it is an interesting challenge to participate in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne in the fourth session of the thirtieth parliament. I really am not going to take any time to comment on the words of the previous speaker, the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Anderson). I was not quite sure what he was protesting about toward the end of his speech. As perhaps with other Liberals from western soil, he certainly gave a great demonstration of why they are an endangered species, especially in terms of messages. Without playing the role of a seer or a prophet, I think there will be a message tonight from coast to coast which will show that Canadians have not been fooled by government protestation and declaration.

● (1652)

The government talks about restraint and then cynically selects for cutbacks some of the high profile, very specific programs which receive a lot of press coverage, but in actual terms of savings make little difference in the federal treasury. The hon. member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has much more knowledge of fisheries than I. I will not deal with the specifics of some of the protestations or statements of restraint made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and subsequently by other ministers. Contrary to what the hon. member for Comox-Alberni attempted to suggest, my party has been talking about restraint for the last ten years since I and the Prime Minister have been here.

Mrs. Holt: What have you done?

Mr. Nowlan: It is not what we have done. When one is in opposition he cannot do very much. Canadians will not be fooled by conversion on the road to Damascus. One cannot compare two or three months of speeches since August to several years of very deliberate policy. We have attempted to point out, by criticizing legislative programs, that some of the things we voted on would result in financial ruin. I am sure the message will be loud and clear tonight.

Without being detoured on some of the byways of some of the speeches which have gone before, let me congratulate the mover (Mrs. Appolloni) and the seconder (Mr. Savard) for their addresses in reply to the Speech from the Throne. I found it somewhat ironic that the seconder was the hon. member for Verdun in view of ongoing activities in the Canadian electoral process. Certainly the hon. member for Verdun deserves credit for his participation, but it is somewhat an ironic twist of history that his predecessor is being judged by the people today. The shadow of Verdun will be on some of the results tonight and, like some of the battles of old Verdun, the tale will be told very loud and clear.

The Speech from the Throne and the various speeches of the last few days have provided a contrast between the opening of this fourth session of the thirtieth parliament and that of the third session a year ago. Both speeches took place in the month of October, with autumn leaves, beautiful fall sun, and the painted hills of the Gatineau. Last year we were honoured with the presence of the King and the Queen—

Some hon. Members: King and Queen?

Mr. Nowlan: Well, the Queen and the Prince. After the Queen is dead, long live the King. Royalty continues. We had the benefit of Her Majesty and the Prince coming to Parliament Hill in the landau. This caused an air of excitement and anticipation. Regardless of past evasions, we thought the Speech from the Throne by Her Majesty the Queen would be the final act and the final Speech from the Throne, leading into the general election which the country wanted.

I find it somewhat hollow for certain speakers to say, "what are you going to do, why have you not done more?" How can restraint be preached? Perhaps from a bookkeeping point of view certain programs will produce certain dollars in deficit. If a program is carried out as intended and defined, hopefully our stagnant economy will be stimulated. I will not deal with those areas, but I should like to point out that the contrast is invidious.

If one looks at the British history of parliament, he will realize that there has been a long parliament, a short parliament, and a rump parliament. But I do not believe in Canadian history that there has ever been such as lame duck parliament as the present one. We are going through the motions of staying here until the Prime Minister decides to issue the writ. The Prime Minister had more sharps and flats and starts and stops than an organ grinder on a merry-go-round when attempting to make up his mind. A poll from Goldfarb would provide him with a hint, and then he would find out that the hint was not too good. Then he would turn to the Gallup poll for guidance, followed by a return to Goldfarb. He sent Keith Davey to Vancouver, and had someone else fly to Halifax. If the business of the country was not so serious, we could all laugh at it.

One of the greatest testimonies to not calling an election was when finally the Prime Minister indicated that there would be no election and that the House would resume in October. On that day the dollar took one of its largest falls in the decline which has been ongoing for several months. That indicates the confidence of the outside world. It was realized that the chance to restore some confidence to the economy was going to be delayed a further six to eight months while a pantomine was conducted in the form of a forced session of parliament. When the Prime Minister finally decided to play his organ, he indicated that there would be no more flats or sharps; he pulled out the plug and continued the charade.

We have had the benefit of two interesting speeches, those of the Prime Minister and the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark). Those speeches were diametrically opposed. If one was a man from Mars, perhaps he could be forgiven if he did not appreciate who was the Prime Minister and who was the Leader of the Opposition upon hearing those speeches. There is no doubt that the Prime Minister put on quite a performance in terms of attack, ridicule, and contempt. Years ago I said that the Prime Minister is one of the thespians of the political stage. He makes the bard of old, Mr. William Shakespeare, seem like a piker. He put on a tremendous performance, the purpose of which was twofold. It was to buck up his troops who were feeling somewhat low, with just cause. Also it was to tell a certain lawyer on Bay Street to stay away, that this preserve is still prohibited because the Prime Minister would remain in office for a few more months. He told John Turner to stay away, that he was still in charge. In terms of the morale of his troops in the House and for the benefit of those who were sniffing winds of change, he put on a tremendous performance. From that narrow point of view he deserves credit.

In effect, the hon. Leader of the Opposition came forward with a draft Speech from the Throne in terms of positive things to be done. The Prime Minister's attack on my leader confirmed the fact that he felt endangered and is almost on the endangered species list. The performance of the Prime Minister will not go away, no matter what great theatrical performance follows his. The Prime Minister himself is one of the fundamental issues which confront the country from coast to coast. There are the problems of inflation, the economy, unemployment, and the weak dollar. Also we have a Prime Minister who has been in power for ten years, leading a government which has been in power for 15 years. The federal government is the oldest government in the western world in terms of continuity of office. Is it any wonder why Canadians will demonstrate their feelings at the polls? People realize that the federal government can be changed, as is the case with provincial governments and other world governments, if and when a general election is called.

The demonstrations which have occurred in the last few days illustrate my point. Our theatrical Prime Minister over the last ten years has highly personified his office. Whether offshore or onshore, he has performed before the cameras dramatizing his office. I sympathize with hon. members opposite who cannot understand and do not yet believe. Perhaps the results of the by-elections will show them better than I.

The members from Nova Scotia were the last ones to come from the political trenches approximately two or three weeks ago. I do not care about the columnists in Ottawa and the inner sanctum of the ivory tower, but they should realize that in Nova Scotia there was a strong anti-government and anti-Trudeau feeling. If they do not understand that, then they are just whistling Dixie. The longer they whistle Dixie, the better the tune for us to take over when Trudeau, if he is around, does call the next election. What has happened is understandable. This is human nature. My friend, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), understands this. He and I came here pretty much at the same time, and we know this has happened before. We know this is historic, that there is precedent for it.

I remember an earlier time when Canadians put their faith and trust in a prime minister who was very colourful. When difficulties arose in a certain economic climate Canadians took out their ire on that prime minister with a vengeance. Between 1962 and 1963 the Conservative party lost more seats than it had previously won, and it dropped from 208 seats down to the minority government of 1963. The same thing is happening again. We have had the great expectations of 1968, the beginning of the love affair on the part of many Canadians, if you want to call it that. Canadians who were not committed to politics then saw the prime minister as a new man, a new politician. That was a love affair, but we all know what happens when a love affair goes sour. Rationale and logic go out the window and are replaced by criticism and complaint. The individual, and sometimes the public collectively, acts in an unreasonable way.

I suggest in all seriousness that is one of the reasons there is an almost virulent anti-prime ministerial mood in some parts of the country today. At one time the feeling was warm and close, almost a love affair; now it has gone sour and people want to get in their licks. I do not know how many people really love the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield), but when he was leader of the Conservative party no one hated him. There was respect for him from coast to coast.

Seriously, there is a sort of unfortunate feeling in the political domain today that, while the people may have loved the Prime Minister a few years ago, perhaps ten, because of a multiplicity of factors, including general economic conditions, there is no longer a love affair; and those on the negative side will not go away as a result of a parliamentary theatrical performance on the part of the Prime Minister, even though that performance was a boost to the troops and perhaps accomplished what the Prime Minister intended.

I say no more than that, except that what happened in Nova Scotia was not an aberration. I do not think that what will happen tonight in the by-elections will represent an aberration. I would almost go so far as to suggest that what will happen in Saskatchewan a few days down the road will not be an aberration. I hope there is another performance by the Prime Minister before the next election in New Brunswick in order that the troops stay bolstered, because I would certainly like the next election to be run against that Thespian north of the 49th parallel, that present incumbent prime minister.

The Prime Minister put on that performance, and at least part of that performance again would explain why the public in Canada is rather negative in its appreciation of his talents. How could a responsible Prime Minister, trying to exert leadership in this country at this particularly difficult time, make the statement he made in his speech that we in Canada "are performing better than most, better than all, actually, if we consider the over-all of total performances"? He then went on to divide up the total performance into job creation, inflation, real income and housing starts.

I do not want to cast stones, but I will use that old maxim that figures do not lie, but sometimes liars figure. In a political, allegorical way, you define your own figures, your own total performances and thereby paint a rosy picture. It does not take the rhetoric of the House of Commons, or any speech from any of us, to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, what you found out when you were home this summer. It certainly does not take a speech from my colleagues here to tell me what I found out when I was at home and in other parts of this country during the summer. We all know that no matter how selectively you define the term, certainly the general confidence of the people in this government and in politicians generally is sadly lacking.

Inflation is historically high in many areas. We have extremely high interest rates, even higher following the announcement over the weekend. The public can no longer be duped. You can cite the job creation programs, you can talk about inflation and real income after taxes, and you can even point out housing starts, as the Prime Minister did; but you cannot fool the public because the people are living with these things every day. Every day the people are having to shell out.

The Prime Minister conned the public once in 1974 when he said there was not to be any control package because inflation was offshore; but then within a year, we heard that famous and memorable Thanksgiving speech on television. He told Canadians, many of whom were eating turkey, or those who could afford it were—he was eating crow and doing a flip-flop—that we were going to have a controls package. The people knew then they were conned but they will not be conned again. They know that these statements of rhetoric represent a con job because they are actually facing and confronting day by day the economic difficulties of life today.

It was only a day after the Prime Minister's speech that someone more knowledgeable of economic figures than I, Mr. Donald McGillivray, the business editor of Southam Press, took the Prime Minister's selective figures and wrote in a most conservative way:

> Trudeau is incredibly careless in the conclusions he draws from his numbers.
> It is simply untrue to say, as he did, that "Canada, in terms of the employment growth rate, is the best in the world."
> According to the statistical Yearbook of the United Nations, 15 countries had faster rates of employment growth between 1970 and 1975.

An hon. Member: Which countries?

Mr. Nowlan: I have them here. They are Mauritius, Jordan, Malawi, Kenya, Turkey, Syria, South Korea, Malaysia, Yugoslavia, Romania, Spain, Swaziland, Tunisia, Fiji and Pakistan. Let me tell the Minister of Employment and Immigration that this takes us up to 1975. Perhaps those are exotic countries that started from a very slow base, and perhaps it is easy to play with those figures. But this statement was made by the Prime Minister who is supposed to be accepting some responsibility when dealing with these figures, instead of playing footsie with them.

Mr. McGillivray goes on to state:

> Since then, Canada's rate of job creation has fallen behind other countries, including the U.S. Statistics published by the Paris-based Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development show that between 1975 and 1977 the U.S. created 6.4 per cent more jobs while Canada was creating only 4.2 per cent more.

He then asks rhetorically how the Prime Minister can cite these numbers to back his claim that we "still lead the world". Then he dissects the process of how the Prime Minister did this, namely by playing with figures. He states:

> First, by restricting his "world" to 15 industrial countries and second, by mixing the slow recent rates of job creation with faster rates recorded before 1975.

He then continues by stating:

> For proof, Trudeau cited figures for the period 1968-76. And 1976 was, of course, the year when food prices slumped and gave Canada a relatively good year against inflation. Even so, Canada's performance was so-so, not immensely better.
> More recent figures do not bear out the impression that we are doing better at all. The Economist, the British-based journal of business and current affairs, does a regular check on 10 "major economies" including Canada.

● (1712)

They are not the exotic countries which the Prime Minister had fun playing with the other day. This shows that eight of the ten countries, Australia, France, Germany, The Netherlands, Japan, Sweden, the United States and Britain, did better than Canada against inflation in the past year, and that only Italy did worse. My point is that while there was a great theatrical performance the other day, you did not have to question other prime ministers, be they Conservative or Liberal, and their statements when dealing with facts. We have found out to our sorry experience and to even the sorrier, more collective experience of Canadians that we have to question and check the facts and statistics quoted by the Prime Minister.

More serious than just playing with the figures in an attempt to make a parliamentary debating point, is the frame of mind and the premise the Prime Minister reflects when he suggests we are performing better than we actually are. Because if you believe that frame of mind, then how can the Canadian people expect that there will be any change in policies which every objective outside observer has said are bringing economic despair, and in some cases ruin, to a good many parts of this country?

It is the frame of mind of the Prime Minister which has to be indicted here. It is not just three months of preaching restraint that is at issue here. When we go into the election campaign, as eventually we will, at issue will not be just the last three months or the six or seven months before that, it will be the ten-year period. He will not be playing around with different time periods and different countries then; he will be playing with our own country and defining his actions during the ten-year period that he has been in office. That is the time frame which will be relevant to Canadians when it comes to making their decision at the polls.

When he took over the government in April, 1968 unemployment was at the level of 375,000, or a rate of 4.5 per cent. Now it is 8.4 per cent or over 900,000. The youth unemployment rate has gone from 7.4 per cent in that ten-year period to over 14 per cent. These are some of the relevant facts and figures that will have to be considered and will not be easily sloughed off as they were here in parliamentary fashion the other day. The rate of inflation in 1968 was 4.5 per cent; as of August, 1978 it was 9.2 per cent. I could go on on this topic forever.

The unfortunate thing is that the just society of 1968 has become the sick society of today. It is sick on unemployment figures no matter how you count them up. The dollar reflects the sickness in terms of investor confidence outside this country. Some of our modes of transportation are in a sick state as, for example, Air Canada with its labour and management problems. Just today we received notice that the seaway workers are going to strike, and right now, as was pointed out earlier, the postal workers are negotiating in a situation where they may go on strike. You could almost take every facet of our economy—be it interest rates, strikes, inflation, unemployment—and see that in effect we have a thermometer that is registering rather high. It is a sad commentary that the just society has now become the sick society of ten years later, and this is another reason why I would think that the public of Canada wants a chance to make a value judgment on whether to extend the mandate of this government or to give it to some other party that will change the fundamentals of government.

The two speeches given by the leaders were so different. The Leader of the Opposition gave a very controlled, positive and constructive contribution with a few political sallies and barbs from time to time, which we should always have in a partiamentary debate in a political atmosphere. But the Prime Minister had a change in roles. From playing with figures and using sleight-of-hand as though he were in a shell game and defining his own time reference in office, he turned to concentrating almost solely, in terms of theatrics, on heaping scorn and contempt on the Leader of the Opposition. Obviously, he feels threatened and can feel the warmth of the Leader of the Opposition's breath on his neck.

Had I been from Mars, I would have wondered if these two men were talking about the same country. It takes me back approximately 119 years to the "Tale of Two Cities" and a fellow called Dickens, who wrote, as many will remember:

> It was the best of times, it was the worst of times, it was the age of wisdom, it was the age of foolishness, it was the epoch of belief, it was the epoch of incredulity, it was the season of Light, it was the season of Darkness, it was the spring of hope, it was the winter of despair. We had everything before us, we had nothing before us, we were all going direct to heaven, we were all going direct the other way—in short, the period was so far like the present period that some of its noisiest authorities insisted on its being received for good or for evil in the superlative degree of comparison only.

The comparison of the speeches by the two leaders illustrates in fairly graphic form what Mr. Dickens said 119 years ago in his memorable "Tale of Two Cities". The two different leaders stood in this national forum, but one spoke and addressed his remarks to the problems of the nation and tried to give some examples of where he, had he written the Speech from the Throne or been the leader of the government, would be moving to try, with all the imperfections of any policy—because no policy will bring overnight redress or correction to 15 years of mismanagement, let alone the galloping mismanagement of the past ten years—to put this country on its feet again. The Prime Minister went into his selective figure routine where, by intellectual, dialectical, classical thinking you can prove almost anything. You could prove that the town of Wolfville, which I had the good fortune to come from, in terms of growth is most likely growing faster than the city of Toronto. That is the type of dialectical debating exercise that we got from the Prime Minister the other day. There was nothing in his speech directed to the problems of the nation.

The Speech from the Throne talks about the general state of the economy. We have had some press statements and undoubtedly there will be some bills proposed to plug the dike, like the Dutch boy many years ago, who saw the water starting to come through. There was also mention of the constitution. Unfortunately, Canadians have heard so much about the constitution that many of them are turned off by it. I could make a whole speech on the constitution and Bill C-60 as it then was. Certainly in terms of the economy there is no objective outside observer who does not say that something will have to happen.

The subject of the constitution—and I want to be kind here, for I have not said publicly what my thoughts are on the late, lamented bill, which frankly will not be lamented that much since it died with the old session—you would think would be the Prime Minister's forté since he apparently taught constitutional law at one time. However, in cabinet making it has happened that the person with the expertise makes the worst cabinet minister if he is appointed to the portfolio which is related to his field, because he thinks he knows all the answers. This can be borne out, for example, where generals have become ministers of defence. Perhaps the Prime Minister has a blind spot. Indeed, I suggest that he has several blind spots in the area that was his professional expertise—the constitution.

• (1722)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Arnold Peters (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, I find it rather odd to be speaking on a throne speech in this session of this parliament. A few weeks ago I was asked if there was to be a throne speech and a budget in the new session and I said: "Not in my opinion". I thought the government would not want to drop the bills they have on things like constitutional change and that they would not want a throne speech because they did not know where they were going. I did not think they would want a budget either because they would not want to make a financial accounting unless they had to. The last session had gone on so long that most of us forgot when the last throne speech was.

Of course, I thought there would be an election last spring. I have never seen such preparation for an election by a government. Everything was arranged. They did not get their bills so far advanced that there had to be discussion of them to the point that opposition might develop. Programs were introduced that could be discussed without a conclusion being reached, so it seemed to me the best possible situation for an election.

When I heard that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had added six or seven vacant constituencies to the list of by-elections, I was sure there would be a general election, that nobody would be foolish enough to have 10 per cent of the population vote in a mini-election. But all of these things came to pass and here we are in the middle of a throne speech in a new session in the fifth year of a parliament.

I listened to the mover and seconder of the debate on the throne speech and I should like to congratulate them on their presentations. It seemed as if they felt, as I did to some extent, that this is the first session of a new parliament—that this parliament will go on forever. Maybe there will be changes to make that possible and this is the beginning of a new era. They sounded like the speeches of totally new members, although neither of them are and one, I know, has made some very good contributions over the years. But I congratulate them both on their speeches.

Next we heard from the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the Prime Minister. I am in complete agreement with those who say the roles have been reversed. It was very surprising how much the Leader of the Opposition has learned about running a government—the necessary finesse, the rhetoric that is necessary to allow him to go in any direction after he finds out what the public will say. The Prime Minister then came along like a schoolboy debating the subject of parliament in high school. In the best tradition of an opposition leader he presented his role in politics.

After travelling around the country, Mr. Speaker, I have come to the conclusion that the only issue that remains for an election is the Prime Minister himself. There are those who think he has done the best he could given the international implications and difficulties being experienced in monetary and fiscal areas throughout the developed and undeveloped world. On those items I think he performed very well, but he must have scared some of the people sitting in their living rooms watching the program, waiting for answers to their problems. They are in a major depression and they do not know what to do about it. They looked for leadership which was not forthcoming; all they got was a tirade saying how bad the other guy was and how bad things were in general.

There are two things that bother the public, Mr. Speaker. The first is the fact that jobs are not available for newcomers on the labour market. Some have been helped to a small degree with make-work projects, but there are no continuing jobs for them. This applies to a large percentage of the age bracket 15 to 24, those just entering the labour market. Some are drop-outs who in the past have been able to find manual work, jobs driving trucks or any job they are equipped for. They are willing and ready to do those jobs but what are they offered? They are sent back to school for retraining and then have to wait till something is available. Sometimes when they enter the labour market they are told they are too highly qualified for the work available and are entitled to more money than an employer can pay. In both cases they are sitting at home waiting for jobs. How long can they wait? I am not sure how long society will allow them to wait and unless there is a great change in our economy they will not find the employment they are trained for.

These young people know that they will be given a hard time by people in the community and that they are going to have difficulty making ends meet. In my community and others some young people have committed suicide because there is just not any future for them and there is no way of getting a living other than stealing or living off their parents. In many cases young people do not want to live off their parents. They did it for years when they felt it was the obligation of the parents to support them, but then they believed they had an obligation to make their own contribution. They are ready to do so but there is no opportunity for them to participate.

Some welfare officials advise young ladies of 18 or 19 years of age to live at home because welfare benefits are not available for them. Just this week I had a case of a father who said to his daughter, "I have six other children to raise; I cannot afford to feed and clothe you and supply you with cigarettes." What is she to do? There is only room for a certain number of prostitutes and there are only some young women who are qualified to be prostitutes. Yet it is the only kind of job that many 17 and 18-year-old girls can get if they leave their community and go to the city. It is not a nice situation but it is part of our society today, as any police officer will tell you. Where do young ladies go who leave the community? Most of them are found in that profession. It is not entirely their fault. We have a responsibility as well and we are shirking it.

Mrs. Holt: Perhaps there should be a quota system on prostitution.

Mr. Peters: Perhaps there should be; it depends on the market. It is a free enterprise system and there are a lot of people in that profession who do not want to be but are because there is no alternative. We are not providing opportunities for our young people. I think that is a field in which governments, provincial and federal, have to get directly involved. If there are no jobs, then we should be increasing those kinds of operations that most of us are not completely in favour of but should be looking at, if that is the only alternative left. For example, I think of youth camps or Army training, if that is the only type of training possible. But this winter, with the curtailment of unemployment insurance, and particularly in Ontario where the municipalities themselves quite often make the decision as to how they treat young recipients of welfare, unless parliamentarians do something about the job situation many of the injustices concerning the young will be much greater than before.

● (1732)

I am told that we are in a period of austerity. We are going to cut back on this, and we are going to cut back on that. We have been operating a country for many years on the basis that we were a subsidiary of the United States. The parent company at home could not make enough of the product to sell throughout the world, so they allowed the subsidiary to do some selling as well.

Canada did get into the export market with some manufactured goods and I think we did very well. As soon as there is difficulty in selling manufactured goods, no matter the value of our dollar, the parent company will say: "We want to do the selling; the market is not big enough for you and me, it is only big enough for me." As a result Canadians have not done very well in that regard.

We must think, Mr. Speaker, about some of the things we are doing to provide a better life in this country. All Canadians had better take a look at how we are balancing our trade today. We are balancing our trade today, to the extent we are, by selling raw materials. We are selling our birthright. We are depending on agriculture, on forestry and on mining to balance the budget accounts of our nation. And we are not making it even at that. No other country in the world gives away the amount or resources we give away in return for so little.

I am amused by some of the suggestions I hear for increasing production in Canada. It was interesting to note that the government of Ontario and the federal government got together recently. They wanted the new Ford plant built in Canada because it would provide jobs. That is very nice. We would like those jobs and we would like that new plant in Canada but did we really have to provide $75 million to get Ford to come here and help us out?

I checked some of the figures published in the Financial Post. I find, looking up these corporations supported by Liberals and Conservatives—the free enterprise system—that Ford of Canada actually owns dollar shares worth $8,294,000. Of that number, the United States owns 88.4 per cent, or $7,336,603 worth. In December of 1977, the last available figures, the dividend paid was $8.35 per share or $61,227,235. The amount paid to the American company was 88 per cent, or $61 million.

At the same time as we allow them to transport out of Canada, as a dividend, $61 million plus a few thousand dollars, we allow them to blackmail us into supplying them with a further $75 million. That amounts to a whole year's dividend. We are going to bring that money back in, but since we do not have that money we borrow it from the Americans. We pay interest on money provided to Ford Canada to come back into Canada, though we have already in one year, given them almost sufficient money to have done that themselves had they wished.

The situation is no better in the case of General Motors of Canada. General Motors of Canada has very few shares, some 703,250. These are all held by General Motors Corporation in the United States. Their earnings are $227.24 per share. They paid out a dividend of 53.9 per cent, which is $122.48 per share, with a total of $86 million and some odd going to the United States. What are we going to do with that money, Mr. Speaker? We are not going to let General Motors build a plant in Canada with that money, which they have already taken out of Canada. We are going to give them some more money and use that as a carrot to bring them back into Quebec to build a casting factory in that province. The Quebec government will give them some money and the federal government will give some money.

The Financial Post tells us there is $66,000 in dividends leaving Canada each hour for the United States. This money comes from American owned corporations in Canada. It would seem to me that unless we really loved those Americans a better deal than that could be obtained. Either there would be some way of stopping those dividends from leaving the country or there would be a tax on them.

With that kind of monetary drain out of this country in dividends to Ford and General Motors, we should be able to buy American Motors and set up our own automobile industry in Canada. Maybe they do not produce the best car in the world, but the price is right now. It is likely to go broke in the next few years. Why do we not buy it? It has the patents which are necessary and their cars could be built in Canada and we could use all of the dividends which are going to the United States. Some of them come back to Canada. We could tax those dividends. We could do a lot of things with them.

Recently we decided to cut back, so what did we cut back on? As I said before, there are two things this country is running on as far as exports are concerned. One is mining and the second is forestry. On a television station that I watch I see an advertisement from a lumber company every few days. It says that 23 cents out of every dollar that each Canadian gets comes from the forest industry. It may be right or it may be wrong, but if it is right 23 cents out of every dollar is a lot of money.

We have cut down the experimental stations in the forest industry. I come from what was one of the best forest areas in Canada. Now there are no trees. We are now cutting about 10 million acres of budworm infected forests and do not have any trees. Canada has never done better in its reforestry program than harvesting one tree out of every ten. We plant ten trees, one lives. If it does not burn down in the next 60 years, someone will harvest it. In my area they are harvesting trees now that are probably not more than six inches at the butt and they are drawing them in tree lengths to Quebec. We in Ontario are so generous we can give them away. Yet we can cut back the stations that are our only hope of developing a perpetual yield forest. It is not like the mines; anyone will tell you that you should plant a tree every time a tree is cut. However, that has not been done. This is a good time to fly over Ontario to see the trees. The leaves cover the ground. It is like a mat. However, in most places there are no trees of any size.

In my area there is a tremendous fight about whether one particular sawmill or the other will get the new cut. Whichever mill gets the new cut will be able to expand; the other will have to close. In other words, there is enough cut for one sawmill, or a little for each of the sawmills to try and get along with.

The forests of Ontario are not being regenerated. This is probably true in British Columbia and, in fact, across the whole of the North American continent. There are no forests for tomorrow. We will be hard pressed to get along for the next ten or 12 years.

A new project has been started. It reminds me of when the hon. member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) was minister of agriculture. He talked about the ARDA program, taking eastern Ontario out of farming, where they only farmed stones and little sections, and putting it into forests. I understand that at the experimental stations in Guelph and Petawawa a hybrid tree has been developed that will grow a foot a month.

Mrs. Pigott: The Ontario government did that.

Mr. Peters: The Ontario government is the main force behind it, but the federal government is certainly involved in it too.

Mr. Hopkins: Don't let her lead you.

Mr. Peters: It does not matter who developed it. I could give the name of the man in Guelph who did develop the hybrid poplar tree. The point is that this is an area in which there appears to be a breakthrough. In ten or 12 years you can get a tree the size of a 60-year tree. Therefore, this is not the time to cut off grants to the experimental stations. We would be cutting off our potential for the future in a field where there appears to be some resource. After all, you only need someone with a chainsaw to cut trees which can then be trucked to the United States or somewhere else to help our balance of payments.

All across northern Ontario, including my area, there are headframes and rusty fences indicating where there once was a gold mine. I suppose that 20,000, 30,000 or 40,000 of these operations have been developed over the past 50 or 60 years. Most have a small shaft that goes down 200 or 300 feet. When they were in operation, they operated on a shoestring. Some of these mines operated when gold was $28 an ounce. A lot more operated when it was a maximum $35 an ounce. It is true that wages were not as high then.

Both the forestry and mining industry are labour intensive, other than in areas such as Elliot Lake or Sudbury where very large quantities of ore are taken out. Gold or silver is mined in a vein 40 or 50 feet wide. Therefore, we do not need a great deal of width to extract a considerable quantity of ore. These mines could be developed if there was some leadership given by the federal government. I am not in the position to say what kind of help should be given. Possibly a penny market could be established. There is no question that in most communities the money is available to develop these mines; what is needed is leadership.

Most Liberals have not followed the example of the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer). When he attended a committee meeting not long ago, he was asked by the mining industry to provide gold coins that would contain exactly one ounce of gold with a fineness of .999. I was at that meeting. The minister stated that he would like to have a $100 commemorative coin put out annually but with considerably less gold content than that. However, he agreed with the mining industry he would be willing to have a bullion coin put out. Brokerage and securities people say there is a market for such a coin, one with about twice as much gold as that in production in Canada today. However, the framework to provide such gold coins has not been looked at.

The operation of the gold mines in my area would not require elaborate structures; it would be merely revitalizing a lot of holes already in the ground. A man could mine a few tons per year. In many cases, the gold would be worth $400 or $500 a ton of ore. During the depression, I worked in gold mines for $4.64 a day. Everything has gone up quite a bit since then, but not in proportion to the price of gold today. Today I could get $46 a day, not much in today's terms, working at hard labour in a mine.

People could be found to develop and work in the gold mines in these communities. There are already developed mines that could again be mined. Some of the present mines have extra mining capacity. Kerr Addison Mines in my area is operating at less than 1,000 tons a day, although it has a mill that will handle 5,000 tons.

Not long ago a man who had mined in Boston Creek died. He had operated a mine for ten or 12 years and had made enough money to live on. He went underground, drilled off, blasted, mucked it out, put it in buckets and hauled them to the top. He made enough money to get by for ten or 12 years. That kind of gold mining is available in literally thousands of places in my constituency. In addition, silver is available.

I suggest the Supreme Court ruling told us something. It told the federal government that it has an obligation to see what happens with gold when it comes out of the ground. In Timmins, Kirkland Lake and Noranda there is an opportunity to create 5,000 jobs within six months. The people there are available and willing to work. Most of them are not qualified to do anything but the job they had been doing for a number of years but which is no longer available.

I now want to deal with the Lakeshore mine. There is more gold in the top 200 feet today than there has been during most of the lifetime of that mine. That gold has increased in value from $35 an ounce to $275 Canadian. Maybe the Americans will only pay $225, but in Canada it is $275 an ounce, almost ten times the amount it was worth when the mine closed.

These mines closed because there was not enough money with which to pay wages, though the most I ever got in the industry was $1.19 an hour in one of the best paid jobs and I really do not think the workers were overpaid. But if you paid the workers ten times that amount today there would still be a good deal left over from the sale of the product; the government could take that gold to any country in the world and get value for it. They could go to Germany or the United States and borrow on the strength of it. Why not develop the gold industry here?

I would have no objection to the federal government setting up a national mining corporation, as did Quebec at the provincial level, paying so much for the gold and getting it processed. I do not care what procedure is followed but I think a country is stupid, stupid, stupid when it fails to take advantage of the price of gold in these circumstances. I am not sure gold will always be at its present price. After all, the world might be broke tomorrow; it is already up to its ears in debt.

A few years ago the United States took out a loan from Germany and agreed to pay back that loan either in gold or in Swiss francs. Several months ago the U.S. Treasury went to Switzerland on bended knees asking the Swiss to put more Swiss francs on the market where the U.S. could buy them to pay off part of this debt. The Swiss authorities declined, saying there were not enough Swiss francs in the world to pay off that particular debt, nor was there enough gold in the U.S. Treasury, or anywhere else where the Americans could get hold of it, to pay that debt off. So, in due course, if the regular procedure is followed, the Germans will own the United States because they will take over its assets by default.

As I was saying, the price of gold may not hold up forever, but right now it is at such a high level that we should be mining it in northern Ontario, in British Columbia and, yes, in the maritimes. I am sure the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) could tell us a great deal about the history of the mines which were developed in that province and the reason many of them were unsuccessful, mainly because of the lack of sufficient capital. In those days gold was fetching about

It is possible for us to ignore the studies which have been going on at our forestry stations, though we do so at great risk to the future. If present experiments turn out well—of course, there is no guarantee that they will—we can expect a perpetual yield from our forests. Young people today are not as stupid as we were. They believe in the value of preserving the ecology and I am confident they will find ways through experimentation to maintain a perpetual yield from those forests.

The Liberals and the Conservatives are always talking about free enterprise. I am not suggesting that mines should not be managed by free enterprise; my socialist friends would have a fit if gold production were to be nationalized. It has been done before without too much success because the price of gold was not very high and my friends did not think there was very much sense in digging a hole in the ground, taking out the gold and then burying it again in a vault or some place else. Of course, those who need it can use the gold to fill their teeth, though today one has to be very rich to afford gold fillings in teeth; I suppose people can only afford to have them gold plated. But surely we can find a way of helping to develop Canadian gold mines if only for the purpose of providing employment. Even if we are interested in helping our southern friends—we help them by sending our savings down there and by allowing them to put up factories in our country and take out the dividends—there are some things we can do very well here; for example, long-distance transmission of electricity.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue, however, with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have unanimous consent?

An hon. Member: Agreed.

Mr. Peters: I will only take half a minute more, Mr. Speaker. I was pointing out that we do have certain resources in this country, that we had better quit playing around and make sure that we use them. I told some of my young people who are smart at developing things that they would be able to get a grant for development of solar energy, but when I sent them all the information they found that without a "gross" of half a million there was no point in even applying for a grant. Mr. Speaker, development in this country will come as a result of innovations by young people with knowledge of these subjects, not from companies of size. Let us begin doing the things we can do best, and develop skills and resources internationally, particularly in mining and forestry because those industries could employ a lot of people.

Mr. Ralph Stewart (Cochrane): May I call it six o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair until 8 p.m.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

• (2002)

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. At six o'clock the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) had the floor.

Mr. Stewart (Cochrane): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to join with those who spoke before me in congratulating the mover and seconder in this debate. In particular I would like to underline the important contribution made by the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and her courage in expressing her opinion regarding respect for the lives of the unborn. I agree with her stand and I congratulate her.

The main concern in our country today is the economy. Reasons for the difficulty facing us are many and varied, but there is no doubt that work loss caused by strikes and so-called working to rule must bear a good share of the blame. We have seen what has happened in England and in Italy as a result of frequent work stoppages. Surely no loyal Canadian can wish for the same thing here.

In August the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that Canadians are fed up with the nonsense going on in the Post Office. I can say without a doubt that my constituents are fed up and, indeed, so are many, many others who have spoken to me on this subject. In fact, the attitude of many Canadians is "fire the bastards"! While I can understand this kind of frustration, I do not personally advocate mass suspension; but it is obvious to me that a much tougher stand has to be taken, and this stand must extend to all essential services.

I do not know who coined the phrase "the right to strike". How can it be called a right to disrupt a country? Some people refer to the right to strike in the same way they talk about the right to free speech and the right to freedom of expression. The term I prefer to use is the "option to strike," and I say there should be no such option, at least in essential services.

I think an analogy can be made between a strike and a declaration of war, because in both cases they are a last resort when everything else has failed. In addition, they both create a great deal of disruption, one destroying the physical environment and the other creating havoc within the economy.

I have always felt that a strike should be the very last resort, but in recent years it has become far less than that and is used even as a tool for arbitration. Obviously, something had to be done to change the present system because it simply does not work.

Perhaps strikes have become outmoded. Perhaps they should be set aside in favour of some other means of settling labour disputes. Indeed, the prominent American labour leader, George Meany, said a few years ago that strikes no longer served the purpose they had in the past and were becoming obsolete. It is abundantly clear to me that strikes serve no useful purpose when regarded in the over-all context of the disruption that is created in our country as a result. If we do not go as far as doing away with strikes entirely, the least this parliament can do, if it is to act responsibly, is to legislate against strikes within the public service and in other essential services to Canadians.

When a strike or walk-out causes a necessary industry or service to grind to a halt, the public indicates its displeasure. However, too often the degree of their disgust is strictly proportional to their own discomfort or loss. Too few citizens think or feel beyond their momentary personal or family inconvenience.

The average resident of Montreal or Winnipeg, for example, fails to realize how much more terrible an interruption of rail-ferry service becomes for the people of Prince Edward Island, Newfoundland or Vancouver Island than for himself. If he lives in Nova Scotia or Alberta, he may not think about how interruption of air freight in the Northwest Territories or to the isolated settlements of James Bay and Hudson Bay may threaten the health and the very lives of those in the hinterlands.

The householder of Saskatoon and Fredericton does not get terribly upset if the sanitation work forces of Hamilton stay at home so that garbage piles into hills while flies and rats hold festival. If he lives in Toronto, suspension of electric or gas service to Hull, Quebec or Vancouver is not nearly as despicable a thing as the same thing happening in his own city. What is it to Mr. Average Citizen in Charlottetown or Victoria if a strike of telephone operators cuts off emergency messages to doctors, hospitals, ambulances, firefighters or police in North Bay or Windsor? Does it matter if a business in St. John's or another in Calgary is forced to close its doors and send its employees home because a postal strike has suspended transmission or sortation of mail?

If the significance of an industrial dispute weakens with its distance from home base, one should not be surprised that remoteness in economic terms is even less well realized. Interruption of stevedores' work in Thunder Bay or pilots' duties on the St. Lawrence seaway may cause grain to choke elevators and pile up on farms. Beyond that it may wreck an international agreement with Great Britain or China, or it may even bring hunger closer to helpless millions on the other side of the world.

Every disruption of utility or production line inevitably and inescapably raises the cost of goods and services throughout the whole market area, usually beyond that area, and prices rise with costs. Reduction or disappearance of income in any segment of the economy results in the slowing of business, an increase in unemployment, the disappearance of profits which would otherwise be available for investment in expansion of existing enterprises or the founding of new ones. New cost burdens are thrown on the welfare apparatus of municipal, provincial and federal governments, forthwith translated into bigger levies upon every taxpayer. The strike to obtain higher wages simultaneously and inevitably is accompanied by higher costs and higher taxes, leading to the next round of demands and strikes.

Are we in Canada waiting for a general strike which strangles the entire population before doing something about it? Are we to endure forever this pattern of big or little blows, of short or prolonged agonies? Are we to endure everyone facing another work stoppage? Are we to endure some new example of injustice hitting first one group of workers, then some employers, then whole communities of consumers, and even the entire nation?

Most Canadians would agree that when a nationwide strike cuts a service from the Atlantic to the Pacific, the government has to step in. Indeed, any hesitancy on our part would be regarded as weakness by the majority of Canadians. Quite aside from the widespread hardship for the whole population which may be imposed by a work stoppage in a vital industry or service, also the following should be considered. It is ridiculous that the practice should have grown up in this country of meeting the more serious crises by the adoption of special legislation put before a specially convened session of parliament or legislature. Surely it should be beneath the dignity and reputation of a sovereign state that the parliament of Canada should be summoned to end a railway strike or an air controllers strike; that the legislature of the province of Quebec should be convened to get teachers and public servants back to work or the government of the province of Ontario should end a transportation paralysis. Laws should provide a structure within which foreseeable disputes can be settled in a just and orderly manner; they should not be improvised to meet sudden emergency.

The laws of the modern state may not yet give adequate support to unions seeking to fulfil their functions under such conditions, but constantly they are being improved as experience accumulates and as a clearer concept of social justice is achieved. Present standards have not been reached easily. Unions look back upon a history of struggle against odds. However, unions are long passed the stage when they should feel threatened, harassed or unprotected. Now they are part of the establishment, whether they wish to admit it or not. They are not government and should never be permitted to act as if they were.

The state is the instrument which serves the entire society. The whole society must guard jealously against being used by non-political powers, wealth, labour unions or pressure groups based on religion, sex, race, ancestry, professionalism, education, or by the idle, the criminal and the violent. The point is that unions are no longer oppressed but are a part of the estblishment. They can even look down on the non-union labour in some instances. In the over-all picture the only group that is sacrosanct is the whole of society, for whom the political state must be able to speak and act.

It follows then that the state must limit the powers of the corporations so that its citizens may remain politically free. Similarly, it must limit the power of worker organizations to whom some of these citizens belong. No class or group within our nation should be in a position from which it can hold the whole population or large segments of it to ransom. Unions must be controlled for precisely the same reasons that corporate entities within society must be controlled—so that they may not obtain a stranglehold upon the political organism which alone must think, speak and act for all.

Those who find their jobs eliminated by the cessation of essential operations, who find their costs skyrocketing as efficient industrial and merchant activities are halted, and those who find health and education threatened for themselves, their families and neighbours by disputes utterly beyond their control, can find protection only in their instrument and servant—the state or government. Unemployment, reduction of food supplies, a halt in the building of homes, are just as painful if they result from union action or are imposed by slum landlords or corporations.

If we were looking for a place to lay the blame for labour problems, one could blame the government, management or unions. Regardless of whose fault it is, the important thing is to find a solution, one which is better than what we have at present. I believe the solution is known and it can be imposed justly. The way to impose it is through the control of law. On this matter I wish to quote Abraham Lincoln as follows:

> The reign of law and the maintenance of the machinery for the administration of justice, inadequate as they are, are man's only possible defence against the reign of violence, tyranny and unqualified injustice. Without these the weak man and society as a whole become prey to the unscrupulous and the strong; the individual becomes the victim of the mob.

I repeat, the rule of law is the only way to a solution. There is scarcely any activity of men and women in society which is not brought within the scope of law. Whether it be the quality of food or clothing bought for the family, a commercial form of recreation, the manufacture, sale and purchase of vehicles, all aspects of housing or the production of utilities, all are within the ambit of law.

Codes set standards of health and working conditions, outlaw discrimination, provide a structure of rights for unions and their members, establish obligations for employers, set out procedures for negotiation and conciliation. But strangely when it comes to strike action, the one form of action which affects every man, woman and child in a multitude of ways, it substitutes anarchy for order and actually legalizes a form of blackmail aimed at employers, fellow workers, the state and the whole of society; it is left completely open-ended.

Outside of criminals, it is difficult to think of any segment of society which is not brought under the control of law. It seems odd that whenever we discover leaks in the structure of protective law, such as juries or other public bodies, an attempt is made to plug the leak. But in the case of strikes, it seems that society simply stumbles on from one strike crisis to another.

At the beginning of my remarks I indicated that all strikes should be brought within the rule of law in the same way as other activities which affect society. But all strikes are not equal in importance and a least those which affect society seriously should be brought under the law. To categorize that which is an essential service is relatively easy. They include all industries and services, the uninterrupted maintenance of which has become essential to the survival of the modern western community. Those industries and services which are categorized by law as being essential to society would not be permitted to strike.

Compulsory arbitration may be anathema to all orthodox unionists. But since the existing methods have not worked, it is time that we choose this course and stick by it. The fact is that our society has continued to take great risks in permitting services and industries, which are vital to survival, to be interrupted time after time, while the dangers and costs of interruption multiply.

It is immaterial whether the fault lies with the employer, the employee or the government. The time has come to call a halt to disruption. No one should be compelled to work in essential occupations, but if one prefers to do so one must forgo the option to strike in return for compensations guaranteed by law and administered by arbitration courts which are as far above influence and interests as are the skilled courts of criminal jurisdiction.

It deserves to be repeated that while social action of this sort may have a shock effect, it is really not sudden or revolutionary. We have been moving gradually along a straight path for many years. That path has had to be cleared of trees and underbrush like any other pioneer road in new country. The route has had to be explored and blazed before it could be cleared. But it has been apparent to any discerning eye that the path is marked "Law" with a capital "L" and that the destination point is "Justice" with a capital "J".

For labour peace and social order the price which unions in the essential services must pay is the relinquishment of the so-called right to strike. The price which management must pay is a levelling up of compensation, not only in dollar terms but in guarantees of job security. Both labour and management must learn to live with compulsory arbitration as the seal of the customary processes of negotiation, conciliation, mediation and procedural rules. All elements, including society, will be rewarded by escaping the incalculable costs and the ever-threatening hazard of periodic interruption of production and distribution.

Other reforms must follow and I should like to mention some of them briefly. One is mobility of labour. If a large and important class of workers is to be deprived of its major escape valve, job security alone is not sufficient compensation. It must also have improved opportunity to move into different types of work. Some of this mobility is already in place and is facilitated by such things as retraining programs, employment finding organizations and by means of the payment of costs of moving to new occupations. Such programs must be sufficient so that a worker feels confident of being made mobile.

The second pathway to be brushed and paved follows as a corollary to the first. A worker moving from one job to another must be assured of the portability of his pension rights, whether he moves into a new type of work or into another province. Considerable progress has taken place in Canada already but the provinces which have not acted must do so to assure the maintenance of full pension rights.

It is time that new methods be put into practice for the settlement of labour-management relations. I contend that to strike is not the God-given right that some people advocate. If society suffers to the extent that it has in some countries, let us learn from the mistakes of others and establish a system of arbitration which will obviate work stoppages in the future. There may be circumstances in which the strike weapon is a legitimate one, but others in which its use is a crime. In the case of essential services, such as the postal service, it is a crime and should be treated accordingly.

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, at the outset, of course, I want to congratulate the hon. members for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and Verdun (Mr. Savard), respectively the mover and seconder of this Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. They have done an admirable job under difficult circumstances I would say, sir. I also wish, as other members have done, to pay very sincere tribute to His Excellency the Governor General and his good wife who have carried out, with such distinction and warmth, their responsibilities during their term of office.

This particular Speech from the Throne was almost obsolete, I would suggest with deference, about 30 minutes after its release. Talk about a sense of déjà vu; this particular one in its antecedents and in its premises simply cries out for non-acceptance and for scepticism. It does little to meet the challenges of our country. It does little to meet the needs of our country. Nor does it signal the end of the posturing and the economic failure of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

I was very interested in the remarks of my friend who just spoke. He castigated big labour, he castigated big business, but he ignored the biggest villain of all in this country at the present time, and that is big government; a government which has failed so signally to protect its citizens from the excesses of either big labour or big business. It is obvious that the Prime Minister in his visit to Bonn, Washington and other places did not really learn anything as far as the need for a different posture in his approach to leading this country is concerned.

He and his cabinet should refer to a very interesting book written by a former secretary of the treasury of the United States, Mr. William Simon, called "A Time for Truth". Mr. Simon points out that the reason for discussing economic issues is not to inspire a national passion for bookkeeping, but to inspire a national awareness of the connection between economic and political freedom. The connection is real and it is unbreakable, and to lose one is to lose the other.

In this country that is exactly what is happening to a government that favours manipulation and intervention. They are creating economic alternatives which are practically inescapable. Such government can confiscate, it can redistribute what is confiscated, it can spend more than it possesses, but there is one thing it cannot do, and that is produce wealth. That is what this government has not yet learned. It has not yet learned that the productive partner in our society is the private sector.

The government has maintained, belatedly, that the private sector does have some responsibilities, and the private sector does have the capacity to produce wealth and to spark a recovery in this country. But the economic climate that has developed under the Prime Minister and his cohorts, a climate which is so terrible and has resulted in such unprecedented high interest rates and deficits, is one which discourages and not encourages the private sector, which this country and this government belatedly is now depending on to right the harm it has done over the last ten years.

The cutting of taxes and the untangling of red tape is absolutely essential if we are to make any progress. One possible answer lies in the theory of potential budgeting. That is one possible answer to these difficulties. Governments must rearrange their priorities. They must consider the necessity in some cases of spending money in order to make money. The difficulty is, this government has been spending money for all the wrong reasons. There is a big difference between buying a Cadillac and buying a dump truck. With one you can make money and deliver something of value. With the other you can drive around, perhaps back and forth to the House of Commons or to your place of business, but that really does not do very much for the economy, unless you are pushing a consumer economy and trying to consume energy.

You can spend money wisely to make money. You can reduce taxes and get more revenues as a result. President Kennedy proved this when he, over the objections of many of his financial people, reduced taxes in the United States by approximately $10 billion and was rewarded by almost double that in increased revenue.

The Chancellor of Germany, Ludwig Erhard, quickly realized after the last war that if you reduce taxes to an acceptable level it will produce an unprecedented response from the people. Andrew Mellon did the same thing in the 1920s in the United States. This government is absolutely incapable of recognizing that it is taxing our people right into the ground. This government does not even have much interest in indexing the capital gains tax, or experimenting with any of the equity that is possible when taking a look at our tax system. All this government can do is have a Pavlovian response when someone on this side of the House puts forward some positive theories in this regard.

It is very amusing to see what happens when the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) try to counter the criticism. I think sometimes that the Prime Minister must be a bit of a baseball player. He is leaving his Minister of Finance in the House of Commons under considerable fire from the heavy hitters and the arbitragists in the financial centres of the world while that gentleman throws his verbal knuckle balls around the House of Commons and gets wracked up and our poor economy sinks lower and lower, just like the batting averages of some players in the World Series. I would not want to try to negotiate next year's salary on the batting averages in the economic league of either the Prime Minister or the Minister of Finance. The only thing we can be thankful for is that he is not a playing coach and tried to assume the portfolio himself; otherwise we would probably be even worse off.

The concerns of this country, as reflected from the part of Canada that I come from, are growing steadily more pronounced. We have not seen anything constructive being done to cure our transportation inequities, and we have not seen any responsible capital intensive projects of a major nature to help us. Little has been said about a corridor road, although Maine, an idea which has been brought up from time to time—it has been brought up, in order to be fair, by members on the other side as well—a road which would, by its very nature, cut a couple of hundred miles off the journey and greatly improve our accessibility to markets in central Canada. Such a road could be built in partnership with our friends in the United States and do a great deal to help our economy and to straighten out inequities in a very practical way.

We should have had a far greater and more gracious acceptance of our historic rights for our offshore resources than we have had. Under some prodding the government finally conceded that Nova Scotia could have three-quarters, subject to certain of their own claims coming off the top. This is absolute nonsense and a denial of the rights and the traditions of Atlantic Canada.

For example, the province of Newfoundland is a province that has the capability, right, capacity and historic claim to its offshore resources. This government, however, will not even concede that, subject to the powers of the National Energy Board, national energy policy, environmental standards within a federal jurisdiction, the province of Newfoundland has the right to proceed on its own level to develop and exploit these resources, knowing full well that that province, as my own province of Nova Scotia, can handle this development far better than a centralist government. To make matters even worse, the government does not appear to be willing to apply customs and immigration and other federal statutes to the point where it is protecting the rights of Newfoundlanders, against off-shore drilling, particularly at this time, for the benefit of inshore workers and producers of local products. It is nothing less than a disgrace.

As far as the fishing industry is concerned in Atlantic Canada, time after time the member for South Shore (Mr. Crouse) has pointed out to this government the ludicrousness of its policies, the inequity of its quotas, the fallacies of the ICNAF arrangement, and that hundreds of thousands of tons of the very best fish in the world are being dumped by fishing captains to avoid these silly laws. The government has refused to listen to the hon. member despite the fact that he is one of the few members in this House who has the practical experience to back up what he is saying. He has actually operated a fishing fleet and therefore knows of what he speaks; but these people opposite still do not listen.

[Mr. MacKay.]

Regional disparity in the past has been a buzz word with this government. In some of the Speeches from the Throne in the not too distant past, it has been said that there is no higher priority than solving regional disparity. Well, Mr. Speaker, one would never know that. As the failure to solve regional disparities becomes more and more manifest, so does the mention of its continuing support become less and less obvious in successive Speeches from the Throne. Right now we have energy costs that are almost prohibitive for any industry that would seek to establish itself there, yet this government up to this point has not been willing to press ahead with any meaningful, large capital cost projects that would see as their objective the solving of this problem by making it possible to take in electrical energy from parts of Canada where it is available by means of a national power grid.

This government has commissioned yet another study of Fundy tidal power. I do not know how many studies we have had, but it is good business for the consultants and that is about all. That is another sore point, consultants. For the money this government spends on consultants, we could probably fuel an economic recovery in at least one of the Atlantic provinces on that expenditure alone, which sometimes has approached $1 billion on an average over the last few years. This government absolutely refuses to spend its money and marshal its priorities in a way that is good for the country.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is an interesting man for he is practically a one-man cabinet. He is minister in charge of the Wheat Board, Minister of Justice and Minister of Transport. The people of Canada have not seen an act like that since Harpo, Groucho and Chico Marx, and he has done it all by himself, just he and his JetStar. The Minister of Transport and his departmental associates have paid out, for example, over $1.5 million, as evidenced in a belated answer I received to a question on the order paper that is over a year old, to consultants, Phillip Binehaker and his group and a well known Toronto law firm, for some work having to do with the Pickering airport.

They are still beavering away at this project, despite the fact that the government of Ontario and the people of Toronto have indicated that they do not want another Mirabel, a monstrosity that not only is an economic drain, having run up a deficit since it opened at the average of approximately $40 million a year, and which is an international model of how not to build an airport. This may result in the closing down and curtailing of a perfectly good airport in Montreal which continues to make money. That kind of use of our tax revenues and how to get value for money spent is what is causing a great deal of the difficulty in the past ten years in those areas of the country where there is a real need for sound infrastructures. Such examples as the corridor road, the development of minerals offshore and improvements that are required in our fishing industry are only a few of the projects that could have been funded.

The government, despite pleading from their own members as well as members on this side, has steadily refused to provide even the most rudimentary of amenities to the fishing industry, as the hon. member for South Shore I am sure will agree. They could in a few of the communities around our coastlines put in a few slipways, a few lights on the wharves, a few things to hoist heavy crates off boats, and this would do a tremendous amount.

Mr. Crouse: A little more dredging.

Mr. MacKay: Yes, a little more dredging. That is another story—the millions and millions of dollars over the years that were wasted on dredging. We wonder if the dredging in some cases was ever done, but that matter is being proceeded within the courts, and perhaps some day we will have the answers.

There is no point in going on ad nauseam about examples of government waste, but the refusal of the government to come to grips or even to admit that this is occurring is a reason for the tremendous animosity that is building up, not just toward unions and business, as my friend from Cochrane (Mr. Stewart) said, but toward the government itself.

The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Buchanan) said today in the House that he is quite satisfied with the report of the standing committee on finance in the other place, as if that report justified and vindicated the things that his department was doing. He must be either so unaware of the practical realities or so regimented that he does not understand what is going on in his own department. Let me put on record some of the statements made before the committee which took a look at the Les Terrasses de la Chaudière project, which is only one of many projects that one could choose. Page 90 of the Senate report states that the Department of Public Works—> —with the approval of the Treasury Board, failed to observe precautions taken as a regular course in all other projects for the acquisition of space... The committee's inquiry into the details brought out evidence that these agreements have committed DPW to pay rates for the space involved well beyond the prevailing private sector level.

It states also on page 89:

> The committee's inquiry into the details of the four lease-purchase agreements made in the Ottawa-Hull area brought out evidence that these agreements have committed Public Works to paying rates for this space well beyond the prevailing private sector level. The two agreements for the buildings in Hull have brought the department's judgment into question in parliament and the press. In entering into them the department, with the approval of the Treasury Board, failed to observe precautions taken as a regular course in all other projects for the acquisition of space. No tenders were called and proposals made by the owners for space not yet in existence were accepted.

If that kind of commentary can be interpreted as a vote of confidence in a department, then there must be a new standard of acceptance.

As far as matters of security are concerned, the government has again failed to be honest with the people; they have failed over the years and months to answer a very simple, rudimentary question about what they intend to do with this iniquitous section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. This section has become so infamous that it really does sanction executive privilege without judicial review in this country. Sum it up anyway you like, that is the bottom line. Any country that would allow a statute like that to remain on its statute books in times like these, having consulted and been in touch with the attorneys general of the provinces, as the former minister of justice indicated to me in this chamber that he had, and without making some modification to it, has got to be extremely unrealistic and insensitive.

This government has not lived up to its responsibilities in the way that the Canadian people have a right to expect. Rather, it has shilly-shallied, delayed and asked people to have confidence. What the government is really saying is, "Let us be your confidence men." There is no reason why they should extend this parliament—if they had any confidence in themselves. If they had real confidence they would have called an election. The fact that we are in this chamber at this time indicates their tremendous lack of confidence in themselves.

How can the people of Canada extend to this Prime Minister that which he appears to want more than anything else—a mandate to change our constitution? Supposing someone hired the Prime Minister to run a large business—and I do not think many people would—and then over the last few years the corporation had systematically fallen into a deficit position—had lost large markets, good will, its credit rating had been damaged, its retained earnings depleted. In other words, it had been weakened to the point that its stock in the business community was in the same state as our dollar is in the international community. Then he came up with the great idea of radically changing the way of doing business. He proposed to computerize everything, change the distribution methods, turn the thing upside down and make a lot of money, saying, "I want you to have faith in me." If he had done a good job during the past ten years and had increased the retained earnings, held his own in a challenging market and demonstrated a grasp of practical realities, then I think one would be justified in saying, "It sounds unorthodox and it is untried, but based on your past record, we have confidence and we will authorize you to take us into these uncharted waters."

I can see you doing that, Mr. Speaker, because you are logical, reasonable and an admirable individual, but I cannot see our permitting anyone with his record to do anything further, he having demonstrated his incompetence under the present set-up. Yet that basically is what the Prime Minister is asking the people of Canada to do.

His reach for constitutional reform is frustrated by his lack of grasp of practical realities. That is the greatest frustration that I think the Prime Minister and this government will have to face. They have failed miserably in their stated objective of reducing regional disparity and of bringing us a more open society. They have even welched on the solemn commitment to do something about the War Measures Act. I believe the anniversary of that infamous occasion is today. A solemn commitment was made that it would be discussed in this House and steps taken to do away with it, but as usual nothing has come of it. Yet the Prime Minister and his government are asking the people of Canada and members of this place to trust them to lead us into uncharted waters and change the very basis, in many respects, of our constitution.

If the government wanted to do something constructive and work with the other place, they should take one step at a time. First of all, they could make the Senate an elected body and no one would quarrel with that. At one time the United States Senate was an appointed body but it ran into difficulties in the early part of this century. It is now a very admirable institution and I suspect part of the reason is that it has become an elected body.

I sincerely hope that in the few months left in this parliament the government will bring forward some concrete legislation which will be handled with dispatch. We on this side would be pleased to do that. Mention was made today of the Bank Act which needs to be reviewed and I think the government and the Prime Minister would find us very co-operative in that regard.

Many other things need to be done, such as tax reform. Let us experiment a little with reducing or at least indexing some of the capital gains taxes which are the noxious glue gumming up the wheels of free enterprise in this country. We cannot afford a capital gains tax in this country. Anyone who has examined it can see that it is a regressive tax which stops people from taking a chance and doing things which they could do with a more reasonable approach to taxation.

The government could recognize that many people who purchase stocks in Canadian companies wish to provide for their retirement or to educate their children and should deal with them differently from the speculators who deal in non-Canadian securities. Instead of that, the Prime Minister, as he clings to office for the last few months, is going to continue to be obsessed by his constitutional pretentions. As far as I can see he has never demonstrated that he is particularly qualified for this task. Certainly some of his colleagues and some distinguished senators from his party have been most savage in their criticism of what he is attempting to do.

I would hope that his proven lack of capacity to lead this country along the road to success and prosperity which some of his own predecessors in his party who held the highest office predicted for us will be a strong warning, a red flag and all the other warnings that are necessary to the people of this country and members of this place so that they will not permit him, of all people to vary our constitution. Let us wait until we have a new parliament, a new leader, a new prime minister; let us wait until the present cabinet, which, as someone said, is probably the largest collection of pygmies outside the Belgian Congo, has had to go to the people and try to get another mandate. Let us then talk about making changes to this constitution of ours.

Mr. Art Lee (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to extend my sincere congratulations to the mover and seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Having had the distinct honour and privilege of doing so myself, I know how proud their constituents must feel in having their members move and second the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. It is a privilege not only in recognition of the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) of their own particular talents and capabilities. It is a distinct recognition of the particular constituencies and people they have the honour to represent in the House of Commons.

I also extend greetings on behalf of my constituents to His Excellency the Governor General and his wife on the excellent Speech from the Throne. I wish him well. I hope he will be able to continue in his portfolio and that we will not be seeing the end of the fine work he has done in serving Canada over the past few years.

It was very interesting to listen to the speeches delivered last Thursday by the leaders of the various political parties. I listened very attentively to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), the leader of the New Democratic Party the spokesman on behalf of the Social Credit party and, of course, the leader of our party, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau).

There is no question that the Prime Minister did an excellent job. It showed this country and those in this House that he is truly a leader of distinction. He showed in which direction this country should go. The economic program and the discussion about the constitution and national unity were excellent. His speech really hit the nerve of what Canadians want to hear.

The speech by the Leader of the Opposition was rather interesting. He raised the spectre of many old scandals about which we have heard off and on over the past few years. All the opposition wants to do is talk about scandals.

We in this country have a unique and sound tradition with regard to our judicial system, how it is thought of and how we approach it. A person is always thought to be innocent until proven guilty. The Leader of the Opposition raised the old problem of Sky Shops and Senator Giguere. He stood trial and was cleared, yet the Leader of the Opposition raised the matter again. I sat in amazement. These people talk about our very fine traditions and what is fair. However, in his speech the Leader of the Opposition did not once mention that Senator Giguere had been cleared.

The Leader of the Opposition talked about the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. As Parliamentary Secretary to the Solicitor General, I had first-hand experience with the way the opposition attacked the government on this matter. They talked at great length about the need for a royal commission and the rightness of the Keable commission in the province of Quebec. When evidence brought forward showed there was need for a royal commission, one was established. During the fall and summer the opposition attacked the government, saying that all it had done was create a royal commission to cover up and that it was not going to do the job. They even questioned the appointment of the head of that commission, Justice McDonald, a very fine person.

The opposition has attacked the government with regard to the independence of the judiciary. I recall the so-called alleged judges affair. There they attacked the independence of a member of the judiciary, Justice McDonald of the Supreme Court of Alberta. I really wonder about the duplicity of the kinds of arguments raised by the official opposition. They must realize that once a person is appointed to the judiciary, we have to respect him as an independent person.

During the alleged judges affair, there was lecture upon lecture and question after question in question period about how the government was upsetting the independence of the judiciary, tampering with their integrity and the principle of independence of the judiciary. The official opposition keeps coming down on one side of an issue and then on the other, as it suits them.

The whole issue of the RCMP is an excellent point. It is a very fine institution in this country, well respected in Canada and throughout the world. The opposition soon found that the people in this country were asking what they, the opposition, were doing. They were told that they could not win elections and gain power by riding on the backs of the RCMP. Canadians were telling them to cool off.

For the last while, the opposition have not been attacking the RCMP. I think the opposition found that by attacking that institution they were attacking the men and women who make up the RCMP, some very fine people. I have had the opportunity of meeting members of the RCMP in the smaller communities in my province, the Northwest Territories and the Yukon. They not only perform the duties of the police force but become involved in the community. One often finds the local constable directly involved in community affairs by acting as coach of the local baseball or hockey team. They help to solve the serious problems of juvenile delinquency in the communities. They are involved in diverse programs. This is what the opposition members faced when they returned home.

By attacking this very fine institution, the opposition found they were attacking the people. When they were told they were not going to be elected by attacking the RCMP, they backed off. We have not heard much complaint about the RCMP from the opposition recently.

We have heard about any number of scandals from the official opposition in the four years I have been here. The hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) said that the government could put forward a big economic program if it tallied up all the dollars that have been spent on consultants. At the same time the opposition complains that the government does not listen enough to outside people, that it listens too much to the civil servants.

The Leader of the Opposition complained about the so-called elite in the Prime Minister's office running this country. I wish the opposition would make up their minds. Which side are they on? Are they saying the government should not listen to anyone other than civil servants? There are many good deputy ministers who are advising the government. Are they saying we should not have outside consultants, people who are expert in their field and close to the regions or specific problems they are asked to deal with?

On one hand the Leader of the Opposition says that all we have is a group of elitists in the Prime Minister's office who are running the country. I really do not understand this. The opposition comes down on one side of an issue and then within a month, week, day or even an hour comes down on the other side.

This is the party which hopes to replace us in leading and governing this country, but I certainly do not think it will. We hear members of the official opposition complaining about the restraint program announced by the government in August and discussed in great detail in the Speech from the Throne. They say it is not a real program but just cynical politics to gain votes, yet I have heard a number of opposition members who represent constituencies in my province complaining about some of the cuts. I have heard them complain about how the cuts will affect the province of British Columbia. They have complained about cuts with respect to weather ships. I have heard opposition members from the Atlantic provinces complaining about cuts which will affect weather reports there. In my own city I have heard opposition members complaining about the cuts because they will affect federal programs, particularly public works projects. There will be cutbacks with respect to the federal government building which is planned to be built in the federal riding of Vancouver Centre. These are the same people who talk about cynicism and about the government restraint program not being a real program, yet they ask why we are cutting this and that.

We talk about tightening up unemployment insurance, and hon. members opposite ask why. I remember that they often used to complain that it was too generous, but now we are cutting back. Perhaps we were too generous, so now we are trying to divert some of those funds to job creation programs. In this regard members of the official opposition and of the New Democratic Party complain that we are being too tough.

I think that the government's program boils down to three R's, restraint, reallocation and renewal. Restraint means even tighter controls on government spending. We have slashed $500 million from current expenditures while slicing another $2 billion from next year's budget. As well as making government leaner and more efficient, our belt-tightening exercise will leave more resources with the private sector for job creation.

This is exactly what the hon. member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) was talking about. He says we are not leaving enough to private enterprise not allowing private enterprise to produce. He says that private enterprise is the one sector which truly generates wealth and that we should allow it a little more freedom. The hon. member talked about indexing the capital gains tax. Why not examine the possibility of eliminating the tax entirely? Why even talk about the question of indexation? Why not examine the recommendation of the Bryce commission which talked about the elimination of the capital gains tax? Hon. members opposite like to tinker around. They like to be on the one side as well as the other. Perhaps they should decide whether they do want elimination of the capital gains tax.

The second of the three Rs of the federal government program is reallocation. Within our reduced budget we are taking away $1 billion from certain departments and programs in order to spend it where the present need is greatest. I think this will mean more jobs for the unemployed, more help for elderly Canadians with low incomes, more help for low and middle-income families with children and a faster growing economy.

The government's economic package does not signal a radical departure from previous policies. I think it has been labelled by members of the official opposition and by some members of the media as a deathbed conversion.

At a convention of my own party I once delivered a speech about restraint, and I can see that since 1975 the government has followed a program of restraint. It has limited increases in government expenditures to a level below the rate of growth of the gross national product. In the same period we have fought inflation in order to cushion the most vulnerable of our citizens against the ravages of inflation. Finally, we have given a high priority to economic growth and the creation of jobs for our young people. What cutback and reallocations really represent is a strengthening of existing programs and a reaffirmation of our long-standing goals.

I listened with great attentiveness to the hon. member for Central Nova when he spoke about turning everything back to free enterprise. I do not think we have really had free enterprise in this country, unless the free enterprise about which members of the official opposition are talking is the free enterprise of the days of the robber barons or the Carnegies. I do not think I particularly want to return to that era. In that era free enterprise did not really care about the working people. Working people did not have pensions or health plans. When people were unemployed, there was no such thing as unemployment insurance.

This is the kind of thing which leads me to think that members of the official opposition want to throw out the baby with the bath water. They want to turn to the old, free-style free enterprise where the needs of average working people are forgotten. Such needs are medicare, unemployment insurance and the job-creation programs which this government has undertaken and, I think, very effectively. I do not know what members of the opposition are attacking when they ask for more cutbacks and more restraint. I think if we were to do things the way they want us to, we would throw the country into a tailspin and cause a recession the likes of which this country has never seen.

Members of the official opposition talk about redistribution of income. They talk about their mortgage plan. I must agree that the principle behind the plan is not bad, but judging by the way the hon. members opposite are talking about it, the program would be ludicrous. I come from a working man's riding, and I do not see anything in the plan to help working people. Many people in my riding are renters. The program would do nothing to help them. How would it help people who rent? Should those people not be allowed to deduct something from their incomes? Should they not be allowed to deduct part of the payments they make to their landlords?

Because of the marginal rates and the effective rates in our Income Tax Act, those on higher level incomes usually receive a better advantage from any proposal which does not really take into account the effect of marginal and effective rates. That is why the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) announced changes to the family allowance and tax credit of $200 per child per year.

I remember reading about this in the Carter royal commission report as well as in the report of the Advisory Council to the Department of National Health and Welfare. The Carter commission and the advisory council were involved in the area of national welfare, and they advised the government that it should implement a tax credit program.

We do not find that in the program of the official opposition. It is very clear that the proposals of the official opposition would not help people on low and middle incomes. Those at the top who earn $50,000 and who have large mortgages would really be laughing, but the proposals of the official opposition would not help the average working Canadian. The mortgage interest deduction program has to be the greatest political gimmick I have ever seen.

I remember explaining to some people in my riding the effect this program would have and how it would not really help them. They were quite amazed. They said, "Perhaps this is really an election gimmick". That is what many people really think when they study the proposal of the official opposition. There are many people in my riding who cannot afford down payments, and I do not think the program would help them.

In the process of trimming our budget and redistributing dollars it is clear that some very good programs will suffer. We do not like to cut back on those programs, but we should redirect our tax dollars to areas of the greatest need. We have no choice.

I have spoken about the family allowance. We are cutting it from approximately $25 per month to $20. I think that is a positive step, when we take into account the tax credit of $200 per child for those families which earn $18,000 or less. For those families which earn more than $18,000 the tax credit will not be as high. I think this is an excellent way to approach the matter. The approach should be to help those who really need help. If we are to use the family allowance program effectively in this time of restraint, we must reduce monthly payments to some families. The monthly cheques will still go out to every family with children, but in a reduced amount—$20 per month per child instead of the current $25.

The money saved by that reduction will finance a refundable tax credit of $200 a year for each child under the age of 18, in cases where the family income is below $18,000. Above

$18,000, the amount of the credit will diminish and gradually disappear in the high-income brackets. That credit will be paid to the mother of the family, effective January 1979, and it will be paid even in cases where the family pays no income tax. While the greatest benefit will go to the 1.5 million children who live in poor Canadian families, the tax credit will also provide greater assistance to middle-income families in caring for their children.

Our unemployment insurance measures tell the same story. We are reducing the benefits of the program and tightening up its administration. But with the money saved, we are offering enriched incentives to the private sector to create permanent jobs. Young people have trouble finding jobs because of their lack of experience; the federal government will now pay the cost of a $1.50 an hour wage subsidy to those employers willing to take a chance on hiring a young worker. We will also give a subsidy to business to train the workers it needs. We are aiming to have these measures in place before winter.

And we have other proposals, likewise aimed at combatting inflation, fostering economic growth, or improving the lot of needy Canadians. The old age pension supplement will rise by $20 per month per household from January, 1979. An additional $300 million has been alloted for industrial development. The federal excise tax on gasoline has been cut by three cents per gallon. Postal service will be improved by the Post Office's conversion into a Crown corporation. Taken together, these initiatives and announcements add up to a comprehensive agenda of economic and social action.

This brings me to the third R, renewal. Our economic program aims at something beyond more jobs, better social services and leaner government. Ultimately, we are seeking to establish a renewal, a strengthening of confidence in this country and its future.

Canada still has boundless potential in its natural resources, its skilled manpower and it growing industrial might. We also have a solid record of past economic performance. Whether the measurement is the rate of growth in employment, the number of new homes, or the increase in real disposable income, Canada comes out first among the western industrialized nations in over-all performance. Nothing but a lack of confidence can hold us back from economic recovery.

Spending restraint and the reallocation of existing resources are now fact. What remains is for Canadians everywhere, in their response to the government's new economic program, to display the renewed confidence which will allow them to achieve the future they deserve.

The other issue I would like to spend a few moments talking about concerns the area of constitutional change. During the summer, along with colleagues from all sides of the House I served on the special joint committee of the House and the Senate with respect to the constitutional proposals. I think it was a very interesting exercise and I think it is noteworthy that the committee was able to come down with what I think is a unanimous report in some aspects, shedding light on how it feels about constitutional change and constitutional proposals.

I listened to the hon. member from Central Nova saying there was no urgent need to change our constitution. Well, I think there is. I think we have to demonstrate to the people of this country that parliament is not going to stand by and maintain the status quo. I can see the hon. member across from me shaking his head. They keep on saying we are going about this the wrong way, that we should not just be making changes with respect to institutions but that we should also be talking about the division of powers.

The premier of my own province, British Columbia, delivered a speech last spring, in May of 1977, to the Canadian Men's Club in Vancouver. He said—and I believe my memory serves me correctly—that the two most important and urgent problems facing this country were the national economy and the question of constitutional reform. In that speech, Premier Bennett went on at great length to express the view that we did not really need wholesale changes affecting the division of powers; and what we need is a change in our institutions to ensure that the various regions within our country, and the west in particular, do have the power and the ability to influence what is going on within Canada by changing federal institutions. He agreed that maybe we should change the upper chamber as it is not really doing the job of properly reflecting regional interests and regional needs.

As for the particular proposal of the government with respect to the House of the Federation, which was tabled for discussion purposes only, I certainly do not think that proposal is that sound. But it started off a very good discussion on how we could change federal institutions to meet the needs of the west and of the Atlantic provices so that we would get away from this feeling of alienation, this feeling that there is too much power within central Canada.

That was certainly brought out by the people who spoke and testified before the committee and in particular by the representatives of the Canada West Foundation. I think they are a very articulate and good group headed up by Mr. Stanley Roberts, the former vice president of Simon Fraser University of my home province. What he was saying was: Yes, we realize that this government has in fact taken into account the various regional interests. Whether through appointments to various quasi-judicial bodies like the CRTC, the Canadian Transport Commission or administrative bodies, or with respect to appointments to the cabinet, we do take into account regional interest. But he was saying that it is the appearances that have to be changed and that institutions like the upper chamber really have to reflect truly regional interests within this country. He said after having attended a number of symposiums in major centres across western Canada—in Winnipeg, Banff, Calgary and Victoria—that most people did not like the concept of the House of the Federation in that members of various provincial governments, whether they be premiers or ministers or delegates of those governments, could come down to Ottawa and in effect block or veto legislation passed by the House of Commons, a body which is elected on the basis of a national mandate at each federal election.

This is exactly what the concept of the House of the Federation really amounts to. It is unacceptable that an upper chamber, particularly one made up of people who represent the various provinces could come here and block federal legislation passed by the House of Commons consisting of people who represent the will of this country. I think it was Professor Mcquinney, one of the witnesses who testified before the committee, who called it the "Bundestag caper". He said that provinces like the province of British Columbia were not really addressing themselves to the issue. He also pointed out that one of the constitutional courts in Germany held that the Bundestag really was not a bicameral house in a true federal state, that it was only an extension of the executive form of government.

I think the area in which we should work much more closely is that of having proper and full discussion at the first ministers level. Provincial governments are elected to represent provinces. The Prime Minister very adequately pointed out last Thursday that as the Prime Minister he is elected to represent the nation as a whole. That is the area upon which we should concentrate.

Some of the other witnesses who testified before the committee indicated that in times of war, at the end of war or in times of great need or emergency all the component parts of the constitution can be changed, whether it is the actual make-up of government or the division of powers. Many of the witnesses said that the government is taking the right approach by adopting a rather pragmatic approach to the entire issue of constitutional reform. It is dealing with the issues of institutional reform, the upper chamber, the constitution of Canada, the charter of human rights, and then seeking a consensus respecting the division of powers.

I see that my allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity of entering into this debate. I am very disappointed that the debate has reached such a low level. Of course, this trend was commenced by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last week when he used selective statistics and handed out false information.

The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Lee) was respected on this side of the House, but this evening he has completely destroyed any respect members on this side had for him, especially after such a ridiculous speech. He touched upon Sky Shops as if it was a mischievous matter raised by the Conservative party. The Quebec government laid charges against four men. There have been court cases, and Senator Giguere has been acquitted, which acquittal is being appealed by the government of Quebec. If the hon. member thinks this man is making any contribution in the Senate, I advise him to look at Senate Hansard. In the ten years he has been a Senator, he has done absolutely nothing other than being involved in the Sky Shops matter. I will not defend anyone like that, and I do not know why the hon. member would.

[Mr. Lee.]

There are three ongoing inquiries into the RCMP. They were not instigated by the Conservative party; they were instigated by other governments. Obviously there is something wrong when the hon. member indicates that the Royal Canadian Mounted Police are against us. Those statements are completely false.

An hon. Member: Order, order.

Mr. McKenzie: I have many friends in the RCMP. I should like to tell the hon. member about the RCMP. Representatives of that force came to my home in 1968. They wondered what was happening in the country because the Liberal leader was to become the Prime Minister of Canada. They could see Trudeaumania occurring and they said, "What on earth is happening in this country? Is a man with that background going to become Prime Minister?" The RCMP has not forgotten that.

The hon. member for Vancouver East expressed concern about bringing expenditures into account. On February 7, 1978, we presented a motion in the House to review the entire government structure, to bring in sunset laws, and to make every government department justify their existence in order to conduct proper examinations and bring expenditures under control. I suggest the hon. member read the speeches in that debate. Every one of your members over there, including the NDP, ridiculed that debate. You are no more interested in bringing expenditures under control than flying to the moon. You are such an irresponsible group that you changed the rules in 1968.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. McKenzie) but I would suggest that he direct his comments to the Chair. He should be speaking in the third person rather than addressing the hon. member and his party directly. He seems to be directing his accusation toward the Chair.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, I apologize for that. I will direct my comments through Your Honour. Of course we have no control over expenditures. This is due to legislation brought in by the Liberal government in 1968. At that time they stopped proper examination of government expenditures and reduced the role of parliament to the point where government estimates were not examined properly. This legislation was rammed through the House of Commons under closure by the Liberal government. My party did not support that particular motion.

Today we are in such a financial mess that the Auditor General has indicated that he cannot certify the accounts. This has resulted in the necessity for a Comptroller General, which will cost the Canadian taxpayers $6 million. That department will be set up in order to find out where the money is going, yet the hon. member for Vancouver East told us that the government is interested in controlling expenditures, as well as speaking other silly nonsense.

He mentioned the mortgage interest deductibility program. The manner in which that program has been criticized by the Prime Minister and other government members is very interesting. It is evident that we have come up with something good. A similar program is working in the United States and Great Britain. Why on earth cannot it work in Canada?

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) was out in Winnipeg making a series of irresponsible statements concerning the mortgage deductibility program. I should like to make a few comments regarding the financing of such a program. The minister indicated that the federal budget deficit was expected to reach $11 billion this year and perhaps go as high as $15 billion. He wondered how we could afford a new program at this time. We stated that a Progressive Conservative government would offset the cost of these major tax incentives by instituting a program of restraint to reduce current government spending.

On February 2, 1978, we raised this matter but it was opposed by the New Democratic Party. The privatization of Petro-Can will result in the sale of assets with a current book value of $900 million. Also that will result in an end to advances to Petro-Can which amount to $200 million a year.

Also we mentioned that there was no need for the Department of Urban Affairs. We are not backing down on that suggestion. That would result in a saving of another $20 million.

The Liberal government stated that the program made no provision for Canadians who are not home owners. Because mortgage interest and property taxes are deductible business expenses for landlords, renters already receive these benefits. The majority of Canadians aspire to owning their own home. We want to assist Canadians in buying their own home. Young married couples want to own their own home. They do not want to live in apartment complexes all their lives. The rich are able to buy homes. It is the low income earners who are unable to buy homes. Renting for many, especially the young, is viewed as a temporary condition until they can afford to purchase. This program will make the dreams of these renters come true. Renters should realize some spin-off benefit from the program.

As middle income Canadians encouraged by the tax deductions move into their own homes, the amount of rental accommodation will be increased, thus removing some of the pressure from renters. We have come up with a program that will be worked out with the provinces, though certainly some technical aspects will have to be worked out. It is a plan designed to help people purchase homes. The hon. member for Vancouver East has ridiculed this plan in his riding, yet he offered no alternative.

Also the Liberal government indicated that the program benefits only the rich. The tax proposals are not intended as a social program. Their primary purpose is to provide a major economic stimulus in order to get the Canadian economy going again at a satisfactory rate. From time to time we will outline more detail, but I have touched briefly upon the matter now.

We can obtain money in order to finance this program by a reduction of consulting and other contracts which have risen by 650 per cent, or $1.4 billion a year. Canada has the benefit of having approximately half a million public servants who have some of the finest brains in the country. They are educated and have degrees, yet $1.4 billion a year is spent on outside consultants. This work could be done within the public service. Perhaps some highly specialized consulting work will have to be done by consultants outside the public service, but a lot of money can be saved in that area.

In the area of information and advertising, expenditures have increased by 100 per cent, or $180 million a year. I would suggest that propaganda would be a better term to describe this area. We do not need all this advertising. This is another area where we could find some money for the program.

During the 1975-77 period the administrative and other operating costs of the government increased by 45 per cent. If during that period the Trudeau government had lived by its own AIB guidelines, its own spending would have been $3 billion less in 1977. What on earth is this government doing with operating costs going up 45 per cent? Hon. members opposite stand here and tell us what brilliant administrators they are. If they are brilliant administrators the costs would not be increasing to the extent of 45 per cent.

A PC government will cut the waste and inefficiency from government operating costs without reducing efficient service to the public. If hon. members want to find out about waste and mismanagement I suggest they just read the Auditor General's reports. On and on this goes.

I am not going to read out our whole program tonight, but there is another point I want to make. The PC program of tax deductibility for mortgage interest and property taxes would be of particular benefit to the Canadian housing industry where unemployment is currently running at double the national average. Housing starts this year are running at 230,000 units, yet the Canadian house building industry has a proven capacity of producing at least 275,000 starts a year without significant pressure on housing prices. By stimulating demand to at least that proven capacity the PC program would generate 75,000 new jobs. What has that to do with a program for the rich?

Let me say to renters and everybody else in this country that unemployment here is costing Canadian taxpayers a great deal. Whether one lives in a home, rents or lives in a hotel, unemployment is costing $8 billion a year. I am quite sure that many renters would like to pay a lot less to welfare and UIC programs.

Members on the Liberal side have said that house prices would inevitably rise with our mortgage tax deductibility program. A colleague has just informed me that this mortgage deductibility program has been in effect in the United States for the last 40 years and the price for a house there is a lot less. Let me give an example. A Winnipeg home must have a basement and be properly built for a particular climate. The same home in North Dakota or Minnesota costs $10,000 to $20,000 less, and they have had this program in being for years. But in this regard we have had absolute nonsense from the government side.

At the present time there are 70,000 unsold homes in Canada. Is that not some record? Have we heard one speech from the other side since last week saying what the Liberals are going to do about those 70,000 unsold homes? Some builders in my riding have held these unsold homes for a year or a year and a half. They are going bankrupt. Isn't that wonderful? What is this government going to do about it? I suggest it will do absolutely nothing. We have come up with a program; let us get it off the ground, get it going and do something.

As usual, the Liberal party is divided all over the place. I have an article here from Montreal which indicates that the Liberal candidate in Westmount likes this Tory policy. I understand there are two or three others in Toronto and one in St. Boniface who support the policy. Someone referred to the former mayor of Toronto in relation to housing. I recall that gentleman coming down here and appearing before a parliamentary committee in respect of housing and urban affairs. That is a man very concerned with housing and he appeared before this parliamentary committee with a lot of constructive ideas regarding housing. Thank God he is going to be here in this House to make his contribution in respect of housing in Canada.

At the commencement of my remarks I referred to the climate of the debate, and what a sorry thing it was that the Prime Minister is leading by giving us a lot of false statistics. It is incredible that the man in the number one position in Canada, the leader of the government and the country, would make a speech at this particular time using a lot of improper statistics.

This whole matter was covered very well by Don McGillivray of Southam News Service. I have mentioned a lot of the false information being spread about our mortgage interest deductibility program. Let me read what Mr. McGillivray has said in reference to the Prime Minister's speech:

> Trudeau is incredibly careless in the conclusions he draws from his numbers.
> It is simply untrue to say, as he did, that "Canada, in terms of the employment growth rate, is the best in the world."
> According to the statistical Yearbook of the United Nations, 15 countries had faster rates of employment growth between 1970 and 1975. Those were years when jobs were appearing in Canada faster than they have since, but Mauritius, Jordan, Malawi, Kenya, Turkey, Syria, South Korea, Malaysia, Yugoslavia, Romania, Spain, Swaziland, Tunisia, Fiji and Pakistan did better.
> Since then, Canada's rate of job creation has falled behind other countries, including the U.S. Statistics published by the Paris-based Organization for Economic Cooperation and Development show that between 1975 and 1977 the U.S. created 6.4 per cent more jobs while Canada was creating only 4.2 per cent more.
> How then, can the prime minister cite numbers to back his claim that we "still lead the world"? First, by restricting his "world" to 15 industrial countries and second, by mixing the slow recent rates of job creation with faster rates recorded before 1975.
> Has Canada really done "immensely better" against inflation than most of the other industrialized countries?
> For proof, Trudeau cited figures for the period 1968-76. And 1976 was, of course, the year when food prices slumped and gave Canada a relatively good year against inflation. Even so, Canada's performance was so-so, not immensely better.
> More recent figures do not bear out the impression that we are doing better at all. The Economist, the British-based journal of business and current affairs, does a regular check on 10 "major economies" including Canada. This shows that eight of the 10—Australia, France, Germany, The Netherlands, Japan, Sweden, the U.S. and Britain—did better than Canada against inflation in the past year. Only Italy did worse.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

The Prime Minister stood up in this House and told us we are licking inflation. Mr. McGillivray concluded by stating:

> But perhaps we should not expect Trudeau to be candid.
> But it does seem that a prime minister who sets out to correct the "absolute falsehoods" uttered about the economy by the opposition leader should avoid the tricks described in a book like How to Lie with Statistics.

How can we have any credibility at all in any the government's proposals to cure unemployment or anything else?

Then we heard the ramblings of the hon. member for Crowfoot, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner). Good heavens, I remember his speeches and statements about the 92-cent dollar. He was raving in here about how we could not live with a 92-cent dollar. Now he says that the 84-cent dollar is the greatest thing that ever happened to Canada. I don't know, but I think I would call him the Christine Jorgensen of Canadian politics. I have never seen such a transformation in my life. I do not know how he lives with himself.

Let me read a very interesting statement made this week by the British secretary of state for trade who talked about the British experience with the devalued dollar. He said:

> The British experience with a falling currency is that it helps trade but with "serious costs" in rising domestic inflation—
> While Dell refused to comment directly on Canadian dollar problems here, he said the declining value of the British pound in the mid-1970s "did give us certain advantages and competitiveness" in trade. "But there are costs in this and serious costs," he said to reporters after talking with federal ministers. Among these are costs of inflation caused by depreciation. It is better if one can be less dependent on the price factor in selling one's goods and services and more dependent on quality.

● (2142)

We want our dollar to be worth a dollar, or at least within a couple of cents either way.

I read with great interest the statement made by the premiers last August at their conference in Regina. They seemed to identify all the problems and wanted to take some particular action, but so far no action has been taken on the recommendations. The bulletin from the Manitoba Information Services Branch says:

> The provincial premiers reviewed the state of the Canadian economy and the progress which they had made towards achieving the goals established at last year's conference in St. Andrews, New Brunswick.
> They noted that as provincial governments they had made some fair degree of progress in the areas which they had established as important in coming to grips with the dual problem of unemployment and inflation.
> The provinces had restrained their operating expenditures, with the growth of provincial expenditures falling below that of the federal government.
> Provincial public sector wage and salary settlements have been comparable to or less than those in the private sector.

The premiers also stated that they urged the development of a joint national economic strategy.

The February conference was a step in this process. The premiers reaffirmed their commitment to the principles agreed to but expressed their concerns about the lack of progress on specific policy directions and projects also agreed to.

It would have been wonderful if this government had dealt with the issues raised by the premiers at this conference in August, Mr. Speaker, instead of spending the last few months debating the constitution. You could debate the constitution for the next 20 years but it is not going to create one job or stop the best of money from leaving Canada. It will not correct the debt or do anything. These are things that should be debated these next few months by the federal government and the premiers. The bulletin goes on:

The premiers agreed that the review promised by the federal government in February should proceed and be concluded with dispatch.

We have seen no dispatch at all, Mr. Speaker.

The premiers also came up with an excellent suggestion in regard to UIC:

The premiers agreed that the UIC Act be changed, if necessary, to provide for new uses of UIC funds which would be more conducive to job creation. In this respect they urged the federal government to co-operate with the provinces, in devising more creative use of the UIC funds.

This is an excellent suggestion and I am sure that we all support it, but nothing is being done about it. We, the opposition party, support it and all the premiers support it, but where is the leadership from the government? It goes on to say:

They agreed that, for instance, where a temporary economic crisis disrupts employment patterns, a strategic disbursement of unemployment insurance moneys could maintain a work force intact and hasten its re-employment.

The premiers also agreed that there should be an immediate program of restraint and proper management of our financial affairs. This was even agreed to by the NDP premier of Saskatchewan.

I would like to give an example of what happens when expenditures are brought under control and waste is eliminated along with mismanagement. We have experienced this in Manitoba over the past year. Before I begin to explain how we have made such a successful gain in the economic scene in Manitoba, I just want to point out the figures for September. They showed that there was a 35 per cent increase in unemployment. This is some kind of phenomenon for Manitoba. In September, 1977, unemployment was up by 29 per cent, but it is just for this particular month that this happens, and I cannot explain it fully.

The poor economic performance of 1978 has its basis in the economic environment established by the previous NDP government. A poor performance for this year was forecast in November, 1977 by the Conference Board, with the dismal economic performance of the first three quarters laying the groundwork. The groundwork of our problems was laid by the previous NDP government and has nothing to do with what the present Conservative government is doing in Manitoba.

This research completely counters the false statements the federal members of the NDP have been making about the economic conditions in Manitoba. The Conference Board has said:

As the Manitoba economy has borne more than its share of the general national economic slowdown in 1977, the 1978 projections show a recovery that is significantly weaker than that for the nation.

There are two variables which affect the level of unemployment in an economy. One variable, labour force growth, is not controllable. The other variable, employment growth, is influenced by economic performance.

I have just received a note on how things are going in the riding of St. Boniface tonight. The NDP spent most of their campaign on attacking the present Conservative government of Manitoba, but I would like to point out right now that the Conservative candidate is 2,100 votes ahead.

The memorandum which I have been referring to goes on to say:

The Manitoba labour force has grown by 18,000 in the past year—a growth rate above the national average, and far greater than had been experienced in any of the NDP years. This factor is not controllable.

Employment growth is controllable. Employment in the past year has grown by 10,000 jobs. Employment growth in the last four years of the NDP government averaged only 3,000 per year. This year's job performance is actually better than was forecast by the Conference Board.

So, by properly controlling your expenditures and cutting out a lot of wasteful programs, the private sector can be attracted to invest once again in the province. In the last year of the NDP government, 6,000 manufacturing jobs were lost. There was a loss of 5,000 jobs in transportation and communications. The 6,000 lost manufacturing jobs have been more than regained, for manufacturing employment is up by 8,000 over this time last year.

That is quite an enviable record for just one year considering what the Conservative government inherited after eight years of complete mismanagement of Manitoba's affairs. Of course, we have another parallel in this House with the present government. When the NDP was first elected, the Manitoba unemployment rate was 2.6 per cent. Within a year it had jumped to 6.4 per cent. The first year of NDP government in Manitoba was a disaster in terms of unemployment as the 8,000 jobless in June, 1969 almost tripled to 22,000 in June, 1970. They did not waste any time in destroying the economic situation in Manitoba.

The NDP also talk about the fact there is no building or construction going on in Manitoba, that everything has ground to a halt. I would like to point out that $300 million worth of construction permits have been issued so far this year. The city building permits department has reported that it issued $40.2 million worth of permits last month, a 69 per cent increase over $23.8 million total for September, 1977. This is an enviable record in just one year, and it shows what can be done. If this government, adopted these policies you can imagine what an enviable position we would be in today, Mr. Speaker.

I would like to explain why we have such a high unemployment rate in this country and such a high level of investment leaving it. According to figures published in the first quarter, $18 million of investment money left Canada daily. Canada today is probably the best friend that the United States ever had to help them with their economic problems. Of course, with eight years of New Democratic Party government in Manitoba, they were the best friends Alberta every had too.

I have some statistics here, Mr. Speaker, provided to me by a financial consultant who assisted some 24 businesses to move out of Manitoba. He says that countries, or for that matter provinces, which have nationalistic, leftist or extremely strong bureaucratic tendencies make striving and successful entrepreneurs feel uncomfortable. That also described this government. It is why we have such a mass exodus of business and investment money from Canada. This financial expert stated that the movement of this $40 million out of Manitoba would cost the province 4,000 jobs. When I spoke to him last week, he said the trend is definitely changing. The provinces are not going to correct this situation by themselves but will need co-operation from the federal government.

The Prime Minister and members of the government who have spoken in this debate have upbraided us for having the audacity to criticize the government. I challenge anyone to show me a document that supports this government. Even the Senate is issuing studies describing its failures, and that goes for a lot of Liberal senators too. Everybody in Canada is writing some sort of document to support the things we have been saying for the last five years. Newspaper articles and statistical information offered by experts around the country confirm what we have been saying—that this government's handling of the economic problems of Canada is a disgrace.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne.

Tonight I want to say something about rural development in Canada. We live in an urbanized society today. Cities are growing larger and larger and unless we develop the rural communities into places where people can live without the need and high cost of law and order, as is required in highly urbanized or centralized areas, we are going to pay the price in years to come in the same way as the Chicagos, the Detroits, the New Yorks and the Bostons are paying the price today.

Our nation was built on three main staples—the fur trade, the timber trade, and wheat. Since then it has bloomed in many different directions and to a large degree we are now a technological nation, particularly in the field of electronics.

The region I come from, the upper Ottawa Valley, was one of the original fur-producing areas. It was also among the first of the timber-producing regions. Parts of the valley can grow wheat and other parts are good only for forest lands. Agriculture, forestry and small community development are therefore of great interest to me. The tall pines, the spruce, the hemlocks and the hardwood stands are part of the proud heritage of eastern Ontario and western Quebec.

After the turn of the century when the "boom timber days" were declining, a great vacuum grew in the economy. The forest industry continued at a reduced level of production and the federal government moved in to take up some of the slack. In 1907, Camp Petawawa was established under the Laurier government. The land was purchased from local farmers, many of their ancestors had come to cut the pine off the sand and rock of the uppermost valley area, and had stayed to farm as best they could.

There are some interesting stories about this in the upper valley. During the days when the military were having firing practice they would move families out of the farm houses to what is now known as the historical Matawa Trail along the Ottawa River. Then they would fix up the houses and move the families back in for the night.

In 1909, settlers were totally moved off this land. There is an interesting editorial in one of the local newspapers of that time which says what an economic disaster it would be to have this farm community moved off what was Camp Petawawa, because it would be a great detriment to the business of merchants in the nearby town of Pembroke. Today, about 10,000 people have replaced those farmers whose families were moved on to better nearby lands with their families.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): It being ten o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(2).

At 10 o'clock p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ELECTION OF POPE

CONGRATULATIONS ON ELECTION OF POPE JOHN PAUL II—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity which is of particular pride to me. It concerns the election yesterday of Pope John Paul II as a spirit of inspiration to all those of Polish descent and a unifying force for the universal church and all Christians and those of goodwill everywhere.

Therefore, I move, seconded by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark):

That the Speaker offer the congratulations and prayers of this House on the election of His Holiness.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion, pursuant to the Standing Order, at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Motion agreed to.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

CIDA ASSISTANCE TO LEBANON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I have a motion pursuant to Standing Order 43. In view of the continuing crisis in Lebanon, the increasing number of wounded requiring medical attention and displaced persons requiring food and shelter, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That this House urge the government to provide additional emergency humanitarian assistance to Lebanon out of CIDA's emergency relief fund; such assistance to be channelled through the International Red Cross for the provision of medical supplies, tents and blankets and, further, that the government increase the level of food aid to Lebanon to augment Canada's commitment of $3.6 million in food aid last year.

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REINSTITUTION OF SUBSIDY ON GROUNDFISH—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an urgent matter of pressing necessity.

In view of the fact that coastal fishermen of groundfish in the Atlantic have received a special subsidy of two cents a pound up to October 1, 1978, which meant an assistance of $1.5 million in 1977-78, considering also that those coastal fishermen, as is the case in the Gaspé peninsula, cannot take advantage of the 200-mile zone and that they cannot always make both ends meet solely with fishing and finally owing to the unemployment rate in that group of the population, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House enjoin the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) to take all necessary steps to have that special subsidy of 2 cents a pound which expired on October 1 last extended for another year, that is until October 1, 1979.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

EXPLORATION

CONGRATULATIONS TO CAPTAIN BOUVIER AND CREW FOR COURAGE AND INITIATIVE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to move a motion dealing with an important matter of pressing necessity.

Considering that a Canadian sailboat has succeeded in travelling from the Atlantic to the Pacific through the North-west Passage, a sailboat led by Captain Réal Bouvier with a five-member crew, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That the House congratulate Captain Bouvier and the crew of the J.E. Bernier II for their courage and their initiative and extend to them its best wishes for the remainder of their trip around North America.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. There was a very notable exception in a motion under Standing Order 43 put forward this morning by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski). I refer the hon. member to my rulings on previous occasions when Standing Order 43 has been used in an effort to congratulate people on particular accomplishments. It makes a very difficult situation. With the one exception which was raised this morning, I think the rule ought not to be used in that way. If there is argument to the contrary, I will be glad to hear it at another time.

COMMUNICATIONS

CLOSING OF CN TELECOMMUNICATIONS OFFICE AT BROCKVILLE, ONT.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning the city of Brockville, in my constituency, and the arbitrarily ordered closing of the CN Telecommunications office without a public hearing, despite the fact that the Brockville city council, as well as myself, have strongly protested the matter to the Minister of Communications (Mrs. Sauvé), protests to which she has given absolutely no acknowledgement or reply whatever over a period of some weeks.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the government order the immediate reopening of the CN Telecommunications office in Brockville and that such remain open until a public hearing is held, allowing all those objecting to air their views, and that a decision be made whether the office can continue to remain permanently open in the future after that time.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of this motion for discussion would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE—LABOUR DISPUTES IN PUBLIC SERVICE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. The Canadian Union of Postal Workers has now formally declared a national strike. Ministers at various times have indicated that legislation would be introduced in this House to deal with that strike. As the Prime Minister will know, it is the normal practice of the government, when introducing emergency legislation of this kind, to consult the House leaders of the other parties and provide those House leaders with an advance copy of any legislation that is intended. That has not been done so far in this case.

Can the Prime Minister indicate to the House of Commons, now, whether it is the intention of the government to introduce legislation that will restore postal service in this country, and can he indicate whether the normal courtesies will be followed and an advance copy will be made available to the representatives of the other parties in this House?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, at the normal moment during orders of the day we will give first reading to a bill dealing with the postal strike. The House leader will be consulting with the leaders of the other parties to see if we can obtain the consent of the House to proceed with that bill later today after members have had an opportunity to study the bill at first reading.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister knows, from the undertaking given by my colleague, the opposition House leader, last Friday that this party is certainly prepared to give unanimous consent today to second reading of that legislation. I would hope that it would be possible for us to see that legislation, as is the normal practice, well enough in advance so there can be serious consideration of its implications prior to any debate.

My question relates to the more general problem of strikes in the public service and in essential services. The Prime Minister will know that since 1971 there have been 93 strikes by unions under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. He will know that on eight separate occasions since 1972 this parliament has been brought back to resolve disputes in the public sector.

● (1112)

In 1968, the Woods commission proposed the establishment of a Public Interest Disputes Commission. Against all this history, in the legislative agenda that the Prime Minister has said he has prepared for this parliament—of which we have seen very little evidence so far—is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation that will establish in practice a Public Interest Disputes Commission or some other forum that will reduce the extent to which parliament has to intervene in labour management disputes affecting essential aspects of the public interest?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition, as usual, put a lot of remarks in his question which have to be dealt with. First, he said his party would give unanimous consent to second reading even before seeing the legislation.

An hon. Member: He did not say that.

Mr. Trudeau: Then he said he wanted to see the legislation; he reminded us that the House leader indicated the other day unanimous consent to legislation. All I said in my answer was that we would give first reading in a moment and that later today we would go to second reading. I do not see why the Leader of the Opposition has to make the point that he wants to look at the bill: that is exactly what I said we would do.

With regard to the strike record in the public service, there have been hundreds of settlements, without a strike—I believe the percentage is well below 10 per cent and is in the area of 5 per cent—of collective agreements which have had to go the strike route. Therefore, I think that situation does not reveal any note of panic.

The government has been called upon to act in certain circumstances. We have called parliament and even recalled parliament to deal with particular strikes which were deleterious to public order and the common good. We have dealt with them, and we intend to continue doing so in the future.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I would suggest to the Prime Minister, with all charity, that this is not exactly a day on which he should carry on in his general, traditional, disputatious way.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

LABOUR RELATIONS

INLAND SHIPPING—LABOUR DISPUTE INVOLVING MARINE ENGINEERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Labour, if the echoes of agony on the other side would subside. I noticed he is sitting in front of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, who was responsible for the Liberal campaign in St. Boniface.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: My question to the Minister of Labour is this: the Minister of Transport indicated yesterday that discussions were under way between mediators and ministers with relation to the dispute on the Great Lakes. Can the Minister of Labour report to the House the results of those discussions?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, the discussions are still taking place today. We hope to make progress in this field in the very near future.

EFFECT OF STRIKE ON MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport, who is in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board. In view of the fact that stocks of grain in the country elevators are up 35 per cent this crop year, deliveries by farmers to the country elevators are down 33 per cent, and in view of the disastrous effects of a strike on the inland waterways on the movement of grain, can the minister advise the House on the meeting that took place yesterday between the minister and the Minister of Labour with respect to this strike?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, obviously, as the exchange in this House yesterday indicated, we are very conscious of the importance of the Great Lakes movement, and so is the Minister of Labour. That, of course, is the reason he is having discussions with the parties in an attempt to resolve the dispute as quickly as possible.

Mr. Neil: Yesterday, in response to a question put to him by the hon. member for Hamilton West, the minister said that he was going to meet personally with the Acting Minister of Labour with respect to this strike. In view of the serious consequences of the strike on the economy, not only of western Canada but all of Canada, can the minister advise what specific steps he is taking personally with regard to the strike?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, that is a rather extraordinary question, to attempt to determine exactly what conversations went on. I think I have made the point very clearly, that we know the importance of the continuing service on the Great Lakes. The Minister of Labour, therefore, is in possession of the problem and is in discussion with the parties. The object is, obviously, to find a solution and have the ships moving as quickly as possible.

EMPLOYMENT

PUBLICATION OF STATISTICS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. On May 15, 1978, an assistant deputy minister in the minister's department sent a directive to local Manpower offices throughout the country instructing them to cease putting together and publishing "labour surplus rates"; that is to say, to stop publishing the real unemployment levels in the regions. For example, considering that in New Brunswick the official rate is 10.6 per cent but the real rate is 17.7 per cent, and in Newfoundland the official rate is 14.6 per cent but the real rate is 23.9 per cent, I ask the minister if he will now take the opportunity to withdraw that directive even if such figures are embarrassing to the minister.

Will he not agree that truth is more important than burying it, particularly where it concerns regional unemployment levels?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, I must congratulate the Leader of the New Democratic Party for the breakthrough in Newfoundland—albeit temporary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Cullen: Secondly, I say to the hon. member that he has again misinterpreted the purport of that memo. We are indicating that we have absolute confidence in the professionals at Statistics Canada who provide us with the figures so that they have comparability right across the country. For our officers in the individual offices to interpret particular results, such as unemployment, labour and surplus figures, is counterproductive to the figures we receive from Statistics Canada from the professionals in the field. For that reason, it did not seem appropriate to give that kind of interpretation.

An hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that the reason given in the memo to the regions for the cessation of this activity was described as being embarrassing to himself.

An hon. Member: By the deputy minister.

Mr. Broadbent: Would the minister clarify what he said in reply to the first question? Is he saying that regional assessments done by people in his own department, showing that local levels of unemployment were much higher than the general statistics provided by Statistics Canada, were inaccurate, false and misleading? Is that what he is telling the House? If so, how does he square that with the reality that other economists in the region and officials working elsewhere outside government departments are, in fact, in full agreement with those local statistics?

Mr. Cullen: No, Mr. Speaker, the figures collected by officials in the field are for internal use, so that we will know the number of people we have to put in a particular region if there is a lay-off in an area where they suddenly have several registrations in the Manpower office; things of that nature. Those statistics are valuable and accurate and are collected by our officials. However, to interpret them as unemployment figures is incorrect and inappropriate.

The only embarrassment problem is the fact that we rely on StatsCan for the figures that we are given. If they are at odds with the local figures which are a misinterpretation of the local situation, then to that extent it is embarrasssing—not personally, but embarrassing in the use of statistics.

Mr. Broadbent: The minister cannot define out of existence real levels of unemployment that are twice as high as he says they are at the official level. I would like to ask him about another aspect of unemployment concerning women. Just four weeks ago his department issued a directive with regard to the Outreach program which included the following directive, "Projects which have been developed to serve women are no longer included as target groups under the current policy guidelines".

Can the minister explain why, at a time when the real level of unemployment of women in Canada is 18.7 per cent—much higher than the unemployment rate for men—he has issued a directive which takes them out of the special target category, precisely at a time when they should be getting more assistance?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the Outreach program, as the hon. member should know, will affect not only women in the work force but a whole series of people who have some disadvantage or disability with regard to getting into the work force. We have many other programs in place that can help women. Our affirmative action program—in fact, every program of the 16 or 17 that we have, including the training programs—are all directed toward seeing that women are helped to get back into the work force if they have been out of it for some time, or to get into it in the first instance, as are young men. To that extent, targeting in this one particular group did not seem necessary at this time, because we are looking to target them and others in that particular area.

FISHERIES

REQUEST FOR REINSTITUTION OF SUBSIDY ON GROUNDFISH

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries.

Given the fact that the Atlantic fishermen have received a subsidy of two cents a pound during the year ending October 1, 1978 and that they have no access to the 200-mile zone, does the minister intend to maintain that assistance to fishermen next year?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, assistance has been discontinued for two reasons. First, American rates would be imposed against subsidized products. That is one of the major reasons the program has been discontinued. Second, catches and the price in particular because of the situation of the Canadian dollar are such that I did not feel necessary to maintain that assistance. But I am prepared to look into regional cases as I understand the hon. member is suggesting.

REQUEST FOR ASSISTANCE TO FISHERMEN TO COMPENSATE FOR LOSSES

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I want to ask a supplementary question.

In view of the answer given by the minister—I understand that will benefit exporters mostly but not the fishermen—so, following the answer he just gave, is the minister planning another form of assistance to make up for the fishermen's lost revenues?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, the prices being paid for fish, combined with the advantage of the Canadian dollar on our external markets, are very high. There is no doubt the fishermen would stand to gain by organizing to get their share of the benefits paid, and that is one of the reasons I have suggested many times they should do so to protect their interests. Of course there are instances where fishermen get only very low prices, and in those instances I think we will have to examine at the end of the season if there is a need to develop an assistance program.

INCREASE IN BANK RATE—EFFECT ON SMALL BUSINESS

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. In view of the recent hike in the bank rate, making the prime rate in Canada 11 per cent—as indicated by the Prime Minister yesterday, this was done in consequence of rising rates in the United States—would the minister tell us whether any overtures have been made to banking companies in this country with a view to having them take it easy on small business in Canada, bearing in mind that according to Dunn and Bradstreet we now have a bankruptcy rate in Canada, mainly among small businesses, at 75 per cent of the level in the United States and that our bankruptcy rate went up 41 per cent in the first six months of this year compared to last year?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I shall be talking with the governor of the bank, who meets regularly with the presidents of the banks, and I shall ask him to let them know of the problem raised by the hon. member. It is one which preoccupies me. I hope the present interest situation will not last very long, but there was no other choice open to the governor of the bank than to move as he did on Friday.

Mr. Stevens: A second group in Canada which may feel hardship as a result of our high interest rates are the home owners. Would the minister tell us whether any overtures are to be made to the mortgage companies with a view to keeping mortgage interest rates reasonably down, bearing in mind there are already thousands of people in Canada who are unable to buy homes because of the high interest rates on mortgages?

Mr. Chrétien: I would think the market has more or less taken care of that situation. Generally speaking, increases in interest rates on mortgages have been much less than the increase in the bank rate upon which the governor of the bank decided in February. Also, there is a lot of money available for mortgages and competition is keeping interest rates as low as possible in the circumstances.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Davidson, president of the Mercantile Bank of Canada, a subsidiary of the Citibank in New York, has indicated that the prime rate in the United States might go as high as 12 per cent. He says it might peak at 12 per cent, which would mean a corresponding 13 per cent in Canada. Would the Minister of Finance, as the responsible minister, tell us whether he would be willing to see our prime rate go to such an astronomical height—13 per cent compared to a current 5½ per cent in West Germany?

Mr. Chrétien: I would not wish to speculate on the level of interest rates in the future. There are, of course, some people who think the Americans could increase their rate even higher. On the other hand, a statement was made yesterday by Mr. Miller who was hoping that the interest rate in the United States would go down by the end of this year.

MEASURES TO ENCOURAGE PURCHASE OF SAVINGS BONDS

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer to the press release issued yesterday by the minister concerning the sales campaign of Canada savings bonds. Would the minister tell us when he will announce the measures he intends to take to encourage the purchase of these bonds which will be less profitable than before because of the increase in the Bank of Canada interest rate? Will a premium be granted and when will we know about it?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I issued a press release to the effect that I was reviewing the interest rate on the savings bonds actually sold on the Canadian market. I hope to give more details about that today or Thursday at the latest.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF BY-ELECTIONS

Mr. J. P. Nowlan (Annapolis Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State in his capacity as the minister answering for the CBC. I should like the minister to personally compliment the officials of the CBC responsible for the Radio-Canada coverage of the elections last night, coverage which certainly seemed to be competent and complete. This contrasted sharply with coverage over the English network, which was incomplete, inaccurate and darned deplorable.

Since the CBC is presently applying to the CRTC for a renewal of its licence, could the minister, in all seriousness, check with officials to try to get some explanation of why the English network cut off at 9.20, before returns came in from one of the areas of interest, Toronto?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, the CBC has received brick-bats from hon. members opposite, so I am sure they would be very happy to have the bouquet presented in the first part of the hon. member's question. I would be happy to transmit that to the authorities of the CBC. At the same time, I will transmit the brick-bat contained in the second part of the hon. member's question and get back to him as soon as I possibly can.

TRANSPORT

RAIL SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport: it involves the 3,000 jobs in Newfoundland on the Newfoundland railway operated by the CN but owned by the government.

Last year, the minister announced on March 28 that he was setting up a royal commission of inquiry into transportation in Newfoundland, and he said then that there would be no lay-offs by the CN and no changes until the royal commission made its final report.

Has the minister received telegrams from the Newfoundland government and from the railway transportation unions advising him that CN has now cancelled certain trains between St. John's and Corner Brook and is going to lay off 20 men as a result, and will the minister order CN to follow his directions, to put that train back as scheduled, to stop the lay-off of these 20 men and to observe his directions as they were given in March of 1977?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, rather more exactly, the instruction was that there would be no lay-offs during the course of the commission except those which were related to changes in the level and flow of business of the ordinary sort because, of course, there are lay-offs of a seasonal and load-related nature throughout the system.

I have made it clear to Dr. Bandeen that the commission's work will continue until approximately the end of January and that, therefore, we could expect the understanding to be continued through that period of time. I would be glad to investigate whether a specific lay-off is under the exceptional category which may either be permitted or is of such significance that it actually contravenes the understanding.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, the minister will recall that the Sullivan commission made an interim report and recommended that the Newfoundland railway be done away with over a period of ten years. That was rejected by everyone in Newfoundland. In September, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the Canadian government agreed and that it would not accept that recommendation.

Is the government now advising CN that the government will meet its annual losses on the Newfoundland railway branch, and is the minister advising CN that it should try to get the Newfoundland railway back in business to attract freight and business and to put some oomph into it? What position is the government taking? Is the minister going to meet with the Newfoundland government and the railway unions which have been requesting for months now to discuss these issues with the minister?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Sullivan commission recommendation itself indicated that for at least the next five years every effort should be made to cause the railway to run effectively and efficiently—or more so than in the past—in Newfoundland and that the final decision about the future of the railway should be taken at that time. Obviously, the implication of the Sullivan commission recommendation is a matter which will be discussed with the provincial government in relation both to the railway and to the highway as well as many other matters, so that these matters will be given very close attention in the very near future. We, of course, will want a final report from the Sullivan commission in connection with those discussions.

IMMIGRATION

ADMISSION TO CANADA OF LEBANESE

Mr. Robert Muir (Cape Breton-The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would like to raise with him the tragic situation in Lebanon. I refer to many who have lost everything except their lives.

Is the minister in a position to advise the House if there is any extra, special effort being made on behalf of those who would like to join their brothers, sisters and other relatives in Canada?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for this question and I thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis for his persistent efforts on this particular subject.

As the hon. member well knows, the special measures we took in 1976 involved the admission of some 10,300 Lebanese. We are prepared to again put those special measures in place. Those who are in Canada as visitors will be allowed to apply for landed-immigrant status from within the country. If they are unable to gain landed-immigrant status, they will be permitted to stay as visitors. Depending on individual circumstances, work visas will also be made available to the Lebanese community.

Mr. Muir: Mr. Speaker, I understand that our embassy is in the Moslem area of Beirut and those who are in the Christian area are having great difficulty making contact with our office there. Is there anything that can be done? There is great difficulty in the sense that some are being charged $500 to $1,000 to get through to our embassy, at the risk of losing their lives. Is there any way in which some arrangement can be made so that those who have already made contact with the embassy, but who cannot get back to it, could meet with our officials in the Christian area?

Mr. Cullen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct: our embassy in Beirut is located in the Moslem area and there are the practical difficulties which the hon. member has indicated. To the credit of Department of External Affairs staff and our own staff, they are still in place endeavouring to do a very difficult job under very difficult circumstances. I think it is to their credit that they have been able to process as many as they have.

If there is to be a move of an embassy office, that would be more within the purview of my colleague, the Secretary of State for External Affairs; but we are aware of practical problems and we are endeavouring to do everything we can to alleviate the difficulties of people in that very tragic situation.

ENERGY

NORTHERN PIPELINE—FABRICATION OF PIPE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Deputy Prime Minister. In view of the passage of President Carter's energy bill last week, the closing of tenders for steel pipe some two weeks ago for the northern gas pipeline and the importance of these contracts to the Canadian steel industry, I wonder if the minister can say if Canadian steel companies have been successful in winning these contracts. Can he say how soon the northern pipeline committee will be organized, so that it can get on with its role of monitoring this massive project?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, on the second part of the question, it is my intention to set up a committee as quickly as possible. As I understood it when I checked it last week, we were still waiting for some names to be recommended by parties in the House. Just as soon as all the committee names are in, we will bring forward the necessary reference.

On the matter of the steel pipe, I know that Foothills has asked for tenders and they have been returned. At a certain point after Foothills has made its decision, a procurement plan will be put forward to the minister for approval. It is not possible, until that comes, to know exactly what Foothills has in mind.

WAR VETERANS ALLOWANCE ACT

LEGISLATION TO AMEND—LEVEL OF PENSION FOR WIDOWS OF DISABLED VETERANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Veterans Affairs. During the last session of this parliament, the minister indicated that he and his department were undertaking a thorough review of the War Veterans Allowance Act.

Can the minister say whether legislation to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act will be introduced at this session, or at least that the results of that review will be referred for study to the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs?

Hon. Daniel J. MacDonald (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the study conducted on the War Veterans Allowance Act, I expect an interim report probably later this month or early next month. At that time I will see what the report says and a determination will be made at that point.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as a supplementary question may I ask the minister if he and his department are still giving consideration to the introduction of an amendment to the Pension Act to provide for pro rata pensions for widows of disabled veterans where the disability pension of the veteran was below 48 per cent?

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member realizes, this has been under study. As far as introducing legislation, I do not envisage that at this time.

FISHERIES

RIGHTS OF INDIAN BANDS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. Under the Indian Act, certain bylaws have now been passed which give to Indian bands the right to control fisheries on rivers which go through their reserves. I refer specifically to bylaw No. 10 in British Columbia.

Can the minister tell the House whether that bylaw now supersedes the powers of fisheries officials under the Fisheries Act? Can the minister advise the House whether it is expected that other such bylaws will be presented either for consideration or confirmation by the government, and can he indicate what effect that will have on our capacity to control our fisheries?

● (1142)

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, yes, there is some difference in legal opinions as to which of the acts would supersede the other. The hon. member should know that the band regulations are subject to disallowance by order in council within a period of 40 days if they are technically faulty or if, for some other reason, cabinet chooses to disallow them. We are looking at this and my colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and I have had lengthy discussions on the matter.

No one wants to see a breakdown in the management of fisheries, and no one challenges the over-all authority of the Department of Fisheries to manage the fisheries, but it is obvious that there is potential for complication if the bylaws of one department are in conflict with those of another, and that is what we are working on.

Mr. Fraser: Can the minister advise the House why, with respect to bylaw No. 10, no objection was raised within the 40-day period by his own department? How is it that it was allowed to go through?

Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent): Mr. Speaker, I think this is a matter of public record. My own department was not informed of the fact that this bylaw had been presented. Many of these bylaws are approved as a routine matter. I suspect that someone goofed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TELEVISING OF WHA GAMES

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, who is in charge of the CBC. It is four or five months since I asked the minister, on behalf of the worthy people of western Canada and of Edmonton in particular—why the CBC public network has not brought the WHA games into their viewing. Has he any answer for them now?

Hon. John Roberts (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I am not in charge of the CBC; I am responsible for reporting to parliament for the CBC. There is a distinction there which is important and which I hope has not eluded the hon. gentleman. I will follow up to see what has happened in relation to the coverage of WHA games.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should like the minister to report, if he is in charge of reporting. In view of the statement by the president of the CBC that private companies are not using the Canadian fabric other than for programming of trivia or ESP, when can we expect a definite answer, because the season is just about to start? Will it be in about a week, or two weeks?

Mr. Roberts: Within a week, Mr. Speaker.

[Mr. LeBlanc (Westmorland-Kent).]

FINANCE

LOAN REQUESTED BY WILLIS & COMPANY—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, in view of the double theme of bankruptcies in Canada and the unemployment rate, in the absence of the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, I will direct my question either to the Minister of Finance or the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

In view of the number of past and potential bankruptcies in Canada, and in view of the impact that massive imports of pianos into Canada from the United States and Japan may have on a well known Canadian piano industry, the Willis & Company of Canada Ltd. of Sainte-Thérèse, is the government now prepared to grant this company the loan guarantee for about a hundred thousand dollars which it has applied for?

[English]

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in reply to the question dealing with the piano company, let me say that my department has made a number of attempts to assist that company, but we always insist that the companies themselves keep their money in play. It happens that from time to time, when my department assists a company, it thinks that it can withdraw its own funds. We insist that this is not allowed.

[Translation]

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, we are talking about a loan guarantee. In any case, before reaching the decision already mentioned, has the government taken into consideration the impact on employment in the Sainte-Thérèse area, the number of employees in the Willis & Company of Canada Ltd. having decreased from 168 to 45 in two years?

[English]

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, there are a number of avenues through which they can still apply. They can apply through my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. When they come to my department, however, we insist that the company uses its own money and not withdraw it. That is the point on which the negotiations broke down.

GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Lloyd Francis (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. Is the government considering amendments to the formula for grants in lieu of taxes to the city of Ottawa to compensate for the loss of tax revenue due to vacant office space as a result of moving public servants out of the city?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had the occasion to discuss this problem with the mayor of Ottawa. We are looking at the problem at this time. Of course, it is not only a problem of the federal government. I believe that if such taxes as the business tax were not of that nature, if perhaps the provincial system were changed, it would help the municipality. I am looking into that matter.

Of course, at this time it is difficult to make any promise regarding new money because of the cuts in all government departments, but I am looking at some inequities in the act which could be corrected, and I will take this matter to the cabinet.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. An undertaking was given by the Minister of Finance at a meeting with the regional municipality of Ottawa-Carleton on January 18, 1978, that a meeting would be held shortly with the municipality and with the ministers concerned, particularly the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It is now October 17 and that meeting has not taken place. Is the minister contemplating convening such a meeting?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not there was a decision that such a meeting be held. I have dealt with the problem. I said that in light of government restraint at this time, no new money is available for that purpose, but I will look into the act because the act is quite old.

We could set the pattern by establishing that when the federal government is in better shape, we could perhaps make some improvements. But for the time being, I do not think we can take substantial action in this respect. However, I am willing to look into the act and bring it back to the House.

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Finance who has spoken in relation to the question of grants in lieu of taxes, the possible need for changes in the provincial law and, consequently, I gather having discussions with the various provinces. Does his undertaking extend to the situation of the town sites of Banff and Jasper within the national parks and the government of Alberta?

[Translation]

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I had the opportunity to study the problem of Banff and Jasper for a very long time. I think that the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development is studying the problem very seriously, and I remember that when I went there people were in general rather happy to live in the national parks of Canada which are certainly the best parks in the world.

NATIONAL SECURITY

FOREIGN SUBVERSIVE ACTIVITIES—COUNTER-INTELLIGENCE

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General on the subject of national security. Will the minister tell the House—by way of a straight yes or no answer, rather than by beating about the bush and saying that it is harmful to national security to ask such a question—and will he acknowledge that the government has been aware of the 25-year security operation by French intelligence known as Operation Ascott designed to promote Quebec separatism, and is he or the government also aware of the success of the counter-intelligence operation of our own security services known as Operation Carte Blanche?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the matter being one that touches national security, it has been the tradition in this House, which I hope the hon. member for Leeds will honour, not to discuss such matters in the House.

Mr. Cossitt: Having listened to the usual reply in favour of motherhood, may I ask the Solicitor General a further question? Will he confirm to the House the authenticity of security service telexes dated November 25, 1971, and December 8, 1971, in regard to Operation Carte Blanche and its objectives which are reportedly in the hands of certain Canadian newspapers, and will he in particular confirm to the House that a top secret document is missing from RCMP files containing a list of undercover agents and informers, and what action the government is taking to recover this shocking leak which could endanger severely many loyal citizens?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the same reply is advanced in this instance. I only hope that the Leader of the Opposition will now reconsider receiving briefings on national security matters so he can better inform members of his caucus of the sensitivity of these matters.

CHANGES TO UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE PROGRAM—GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration and it relates to the changes to the unemployment insurance program. Considering that the minister finally recognized the problems pointed out by spokesmen for the Progressive Conservative party six weeks ago, when he announced the changes in the program, can the minister inform the House as to when he will give the details on the changes and whether he obtained the support of his cabinet colleagues having stressed the necessity of such support last week?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, in order to be flexible, I must discuss all the changes with my provincial colleagues and also with the caucus and my colleagues in cabinet. When I have an opportunity, I shall introduce the bill for discussion in the House.

FISHERIES

REGULATION OF OFFSHORE LOBSTER FISHERY

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. The Northeast Marine Fisheries Board in the United States recently completed a very comprehensive management plan for the lobster fishery along the coast of the United States. Their studies indicate that both inshore and offshore lobsters should be managed as one group.

I therefore ask the minister, since I believe his department initiated a study this summer to determine the relationship between offshore and inshore lobster stock, whether he is now convinced that offshore lobsters annually migrate from the outer continental shelf toward shoal waters, where they spend the summer, and what steps is he prepared to take to regulate the offshore lobster fishery in order to protect and improve the basic inshore lobster fishery which is so important to Atlantic Canada?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is a matter of being convinced. I am awaiting the final recommendation of scientists who have been working, in co-operation with the Americans, on this matter. There is an indication that there is a relationship. However, I will await the final debates of scientists who will assemble as a group to make recommendations. Obviously, if there is a direct link, we will manage both as a unit, and, as I have indicated in the past, my bias would be clearly for the inshore fishermen.

FINANCE

GRANTS IN LIEU OF TAXES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. If the minister is, indeed, looking at legislation regarding grants in lieu of taxes in respect of the national capital region, I would point out to him that many other federal institutions across Canada are freeloading on the backs of local goverments. I refer specifically to the Fraser River harbour commission in Surrey. Is the minister entertaining an investigation of other federal installations across Canada, and does the government plan to pay grants in lieu of taxes in respect of facilities outside the national capital region?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am looking into this question and will be discussing it again with the government. We will look not only at the properties of the government in the national capital region, but also at all properties across Canada. As I have said, let me warn members of parliament that we are in a squeeze in terms of the budget, with everyone claiming we are spending too much. I should like to note that the hon. member is asking the government to spend more.

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Yesterday, the hon. member for Perth-Wilmot asked the Solicitor General about the provisions of sections 41(1) and 41(2) of the Federal Court Act. The hon. member for Greenwood has introduced a private member's bill which would delete that section, leaving the discretion in the federal courts, and not the government allowing the courts to determine which documents may or may not be classified and withheld.

Having regard to the McDonald commission inquiry, will the Solicitor General now give a commitment to the House that he supports in principle the effect of that private member's bill, and that where confrontation exists between the McDonald inquiry and the government he will always give effect to section 41(2); in other words, allow the courts to determine whether a matter is within a national security question and may not be released, or does he still intend to take the position taken yesterday by the government, that this is an inherent jurisdiction which he will not abandon under any circumstances?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, I have not yet seen the private member's bill of which the hon. member speaks. I will read that bill with a great deal of interest. In terms of section 41 that he refers to, undoubtedly he meant, would I concentrate on section 41(1) and not 41(2). In my view, after looking at the sections of the particular act, they deal with production and discovery. As I indicated previously and as has been made known publicly, there is no question here that the documents have not been produced and are not available to the commission for discovery.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, would the Solicitor General go at least this far with the House? His predecessor gave a commitment to the House very recently, by which he committed the government which he represented at that time, that decisions as to what would be heard in camera would be decisions entirely within the discretion of the McDonald commission. Can the Solicitor General at least give the House the assurance that he will meet that commitment given to this House by the previous solicitor general, or is he still going to abandon that position taken when the House was given some assurance that it would be the McDonald inquiry which determined these matters and it would not be at the discretion of the Prime Minister?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I would recall to the hon. member's attention the exchanges that have taken place in this House in the past two or three days.

Mr. Leggatt: That is why I asked the question.

Mr. Blais: I would call his attention, as well, to the Prime Minister's reply and my reply to the effect that it is our intention, as it always has been, to make full light in respect of all these matters that have been referred to the McDonald inquiry.

TRANSPORT

GRAIN SHIPMENTS THROUGH CHURCHILL, MAN.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Even with the historic trip of the m.v. Arctic to Churchill on November 15, grain shipments through the port will be down from some seven million to nine million bushels this year, placing the port in a cash loss position. I should like to ask the minister why the four million bushel storage facilities in Churchill will not be utilized this winter for the storage of grain?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member has noted the kind of attention the government and the Wheat Board have been giving the port of Churchill. The voyage of the m.v. Arctic there is historic and again demonstrates that attention. The decision as to how to store grain and where to store it is made by the Canadian Wheat Board, taking account of many things including the transportation needs of the moment. The Wheat Board, of course, recognizes the desirability of having grain in position at Churchill if that does not interfere with other movements. However, if rail cars are needed at a given point in time to move grain to Thunder Bay or Vancouver while those ports are still operating to their full capacity, obviously that has to come first. I am sure, however, that the Wheat Board will give full consideration to the timing of the movement of grain to Churchill.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, it is my understanding that cargoes have already been sold for next year's shipments out of Churchill. In light of that fact, would the minister consider directing the Wheat Board to put at least three million bushels in storage at Churchill, as this would put that port in a cash saving position?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated that the Wheat Board is fully aware of the advantages and the interests of having grain at Churchill. The board is also aware of the other reasons it may not be able to do that at a particular point in time. I leave it to the Wheat Board to make the best judgment for the farmers. I have found over the years that it does that, and that the farmers have confidence in the board. I would not, even at the urging of the hon. member, try to interfere with the day to day operations of the Wheat Board.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RESUMPTION AND CONTINUATION OF POSTAL SERVICES

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-8 intituled "An act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services".

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

[English]

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would like to explain to hon. members that it has not been possible to give any advance copies of the bill even before first reading because the final form of it was decided upon at a meeting just before we came into the House. It would be unreasonable to ask the consent of the House to deal with a bill on second reading without giving members an opportunity to study its contents.

What I am suggesting is that a representative of the government might get an opportunity, say at three o'clock, to rise on motions, after members have had an opportunity to look at the bill, and ask whether we could proceed to second reading at that time. I am not asking for consent to proceed to second reading now because members have not seen the bill. What I want is to have prearranged consent to rise at three o'clock and ask hon. members whether they are then ready to proceed with second reading of the bill.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we are quite prepared to agree to the proposal by the minister.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the request the minister has now made is in accordance with the request he made to us at 11 o'clock this morning, and we are prepared to agree that at three o'clock we revert to motions so that the question the government House leader just indicated can be considered. Perhaps it could be left to consultation after we have seen the bill as to what precise hour second reading might be commenced.

Mr. Laprise: We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Accordingly, the House has agreed that sometime later this afternoon a representative of the government shall have the opportunity to revert to motions at that time, to seek the consent of the House to proceed with the bill. Consent, of course, will be determined at that hour then, instead of at this moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, so that all members may see that bill, not just representatives of the parties, could it not be distributed now?

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. With the bill having been filed for first reading at this time, we are already moving to print as many copies as we can and distribute them at the earliest possible moment.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Speaker: Questions on the order paper.

Mr. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like the deputy House leader to know that there are questions on the order paper and that we would like a little bit of action on them. I do not think that he should be sitting there in the hope that these proceedings are going to be a continuous practice every day. We have questions on there, and I am sure that he can answer some of them.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, it is regrettable that the hon. member was away or absent-minded last week when I gave explanations to the hon. members for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty) and Leeds (Mr. Cossitt). I then proved to them what magnificent work the government had done in the last two sessions in answering questions on the order paper. The average, in the penultimate session was 90 per cent, while in the last it was 88 per cent. The least we can expect of the hon. member is surely that he show elementary patience at the start of the current session when we are doing the necessary research to give the most complete and best possible answers to the questions asked by all hon. members of the House. I do not think I am being disrespectful towards hon. members, and more specifically towards those who are impatient, when I ask them for the minimum of patience and restraint needed to give us a chance to supply them with sensible and complete answers.

[English]

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. May I ask the parliamentary secretary if it is his intention to place some priority on the 10 per cent of questions emanating from the last session that were not answered, most of which have been placed back on the order paper, and many of them dealing with matters of a statistical nature? For example, there is a question on there relating to the number of jobs created by the FLIP program and the number of jobs created by the employment tax credit program. What is the government trying to hide? If they have nothing to hide, then let them answer these questions.

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary in his remarks referred to the question which I posed to him as the last session came to a close. I would like to draw to the parliamentary secretary's attention the fact that I have had a question on the order paper for several months inquiring about a trip made by the former minister of labour to western capitals with regard to the CFL. What I have asked is straightforward. I have asked what the purpose of the trip was, who accompanied the minister, and what his point of destination was. I have asked about a statement that was made by the minister indicating that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was thinking of providing funds to Ivor Wynne Stadium in Hamilton for additional seats. I would think that over the course of several months it would be possible for even the parliamentary secretary to have gotten some action in answering these questions.

It is simply not acceptable for the parliamentary secretary to quote statistics as to the percentage of questions answered, when it is very clear that questions which could be answered today if the government wanted to have been left for weeks and weeks. Surely something has to be done.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): I would like to remind the parliamentary secretary that I have had a series of questions relating to the senior officers of crown corporations which have been on the order paper for almost two years and that I would appreciate it if he would make good on the promise that he has made to me, month by month that the answers would be forthcoming in the near future.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, after the remarks of the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), it is difficult for me to set my priorities for the order in which replies must be given to the questions. I have no idea whether other hon. members will put more intelligent, more important, or easier questions in terms of research than those put by the hon. member for Leeds (Mr. Cossitt), for instance, or by the hon. member for Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo (Mr. Beatty), but I must point out that some questions require less research than others and that some cost the Canadian taxpayers a mint because they require a tremendous amount of work; therefore, under those circumstances, it is not up to me to set priorities as the hon. member for St. John's East would have me do.

In closing, I think I had best reply to those insinuations by pointing out the performance of the government in the last two sessions. When 90 per cent of the questions are answered, I wonder what honest man can claim that the government hides the facts.

Mr. Speaker: I should like to point out to the House, as it has been pointed out to me, and correctly so, that our practice in the past has always been that questions on the order paper are not called during the currency of the throne speech debate, obviously recognizing that a few days ought to elapse at the beginning of the session to collect the questions and attempt to answer them. I have called questions since we resumed, but really I should not have called them until the conclusion of the throne speech debate, obviously recognizing by our own practices over a considerable period that there ought to be a bit of time yet before questions begin to be answered. Perhaps it would be better to revert to the practice we have followed in the past.

Mr. Paproski: On that same point of order, Your Honour, I see that you have realized that some of the questions had not been answered. I am glad you brought that to our attention. We would like to have these questions answered. We appreciate that you have brought this to our attention.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Monday, October 16, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 27).

Mr. Leonard Hopkins (Renfrew North-Nipissing East): Mr. Speaker, at ten o'clock last night I was discussing the decline of the timber trade in the Ottawa valley at the turn of the century. I went on to discuss how, at that stage, the federal government started moving in to fill the economic gap and how, in 1907, Camp Petawawa was established.

Forest research started on a 38-square mile area of Camp Petawawa in 1917. This contradicts many reports I have read in the media where the area has been reported as 36 acres or 38 acres; it is exactly 640 times that, being 38 square miles.

In the mid 1940s the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, under the St. Laurent administration started what is today the Atomic Energy of Canada Limited nuclear research laboratories at Chalk River, with Deep River as a major residential community for that Crown corporation. In 1970 the area was designated as a special area for growth incentives by the Department of Regional Economic Expansion. Much of this development program was based on the forest products industry. A general development subagreement was signed for the upper Ottawa Valley by the federal and provincial governments on December 7 last year to provide for infrastructure and special projects for economic development. This has been of major importance to the economic base of the Ottawa Valley.

Additional employment programs were introduced and applied by the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen), many of which are related to the major developments already mentioned, and have meant a great deal to us.

At the beginning of my speech I mentioned the original three staples on which Canada was founded, fur, timber, and wheat. As a result of the recent public demands for cut-backs, with which I agree, as governments cannot go on spending at the expense of the private sector forever, the Petawawa Forest Experimental Station has been proposed as one of the cuts. I disagreed with this specific cut very strongly from the start, and still do so. Forestry research in Canada is essential if we are to plan responsibly for future generations of Canadians.

It is well known that the Minister of State for the Environment (Mr. Marchand) is a very strong supporter of forestry, and it is unfortunate that his department should suffer so much from the cutbacks in research. It is in the public interest that he be assisted by myself and other members of parliament, by the provincial governments—and the public, in this difficult financial position, and I intend to do everything possible to that end. This must be done in a rational and responsible manner. Part of that rationale must be that the forests of Canada be looked upon as a continuing strong staple product of our country. We cannot afford to lose our expertise and technological know-how in the forest research field, any more than we could afford the cancellation of the Arrow aircraft by the last Conservative government with the resulting loss of experts and technologists to the aviation industry. If the Arrow had been allowed to go ahead this government would not now be in the position of having to spend the $2.34 billion in 1977 that is proposed for the purchase of new fighter aircraft because the Arrow would still be considered a modern aircraft.

The argument can be made very effectively and realistically that the investment, which a federal or provincial government puts into forestry research and management is returned several times over in revenue dollars, employment, and international trade. If our forest research and development and management research programs are allowed to go ahead unscathed, it will spell a greater future for the forestry industry in Canada and will mean more revenue for the government.

Just what does forestry mean to Canada and its provinces? In this respect many of the letters I have received show that provincial governments that have a large interest in forestry have not gone unscathed either. Before I deal with what the forestry industry really means to Canada I would like to inform the House and the people of Canada that the mail I have received as a spokesman on this issue—

Mr. Peters: How did you get it?

Mr. Hopkins: I can tell the hon. member that I am delighted to have received it. It outnumbers the total amount of the mail I received on the issue of the death penalty by five to one. This is a healthy sign, as it shows the people of this country are still concerned about their forestry, that they want research and development, good forest management, and that they are right on key on this subject.

At a glance, what does the forest industry mean to the economy of Canada? Three hundred thousand people are directly employed in the forest industry in this country, and the total number of people employed directly and indirectly is one million, or 11 per cent of the total labour force in Canada. The value of products from all forestry industries is $4,600 million. The forest industry accounts for 20 per cent of our total exports or international trade. In other words, 20 per cent of all of the exports from this country are from forest based industries.

We produce 40 per cent of the world's newsprint. As far as the balance of trade is concerned, the forest products of Canada provide $4 billion toward our balance of trade in international sales. Revenue Canada receives approximately $1 billion in revenue from the forest industry in Canada. The provincial governments receive approximately $650 million in revenue, and it cannot be forgotten that they control the Crown lands and the timber sales. The federal share of total forest revenue, and this is made up by taxation on corporations and income taxes from employees etc. represents two-thirds of the total revenue from this industry the remainder is taken in by the provinces. The percentage of total revenue for Canada is 4 per cent in that one industry alone.

The budget of the Canadian Forestry Service is approximately $35 million. Herein lies the basis for my argument that with the federal treasury receiving $1 billion in taxation from forest based industries, and the provincial governments receiving $650 million from the forest industry, we have only about $35 million going into the Canadian Forestry Service which makes up the total research programs.

The Petawawa Forest Experimental Station is the oldest forest experiment station in Canada. It has a world-wide reputation in forestry. This is why it is no local matter. It is even becoming a matter of national and international discussion. Indeed it would be a tragic loss to forest science. It is the best documented forest in Canada, and this is quite in keeping with the traditional timber trade and the economically based forestry industry of the valley. If the station is closed there is no way that the upwards of 61 years invested in time and research could be recouped.

In my earlier days as a teacher—I started teaching in an area where the forest was the very basis of the local economy. That took place in some of those beautiful hill-covered townships of Lyndock, Brudenell, Sabastopol, Radcliffe, Raglan, Griffith, etc. in the county of Renfrew. If we are going to renew those forests on the hillsides, and if we renew the forest on low grade land in the traditional forest areas of Canada, we must have timber based on the more rapid growth system. Some of this work and advice has come from the Petawawa Forest Experimental Station. They deal very closely with provincial governments and their natural resource departments. In particular, they have been in close liaison with the Department of Natural Resources of Ontario. The recent general development subagreement announced for the lower part of the Ottawa Valley in Eastern Ontario with regard to rapid growth wood for the pulp and paper industry was developed partly on scientific and technological advice from the Petawawa station in co-operation with the Department of Natural Resources in Ontario.

We get all kinds of mail today about every phase of Canadian life and every issue that arises. So, because I have a very sentimental and in depth feeling for the forest resources of our country and for the people who make their living there, I must say that I appreciate to the nth degree all those many letters I have received from elementary school children who print or write their letters, through to high school students, and university students who have studied at the experimental station and who are interested in the Canadian Forestry Service.

I have received three letters from abroad, also many from people who have visited the station and people who have done experimental work at the station. I have received letters from the professional foresters' groups, as well as from the general public across Canada. This mail has been largely generated by the public awareness program operating at the station. The station can be seen as you drive up the valley. Tours are available. Last year 15,000 students came through the forestry station. I have also had letters from people across Canada who happened to be travelling through and visited the station this year or other years. They read in the press about the cutback and that the station was to be closed. These people are totally in disagreement with this decision.

The Petawawa Forest Experimental Station is concerned with research into management of natural and manmade forests. Forest fire is a very important part of their research work. This is important. What is the use on the one hand of developing very rapid growth of trees, or developing a better quality of tree, if we do not at the same time upgrade our ability to fight forest fires?

There is a strong program in tree genetics. They are known internationally for their tree seed. The Petawawa Forest Experimental Station is concerned with research into interpretation techniques and audience response, and also the use of forests for energy production and conservation, which is another important phase of our modern-day life. They go into interpretation, demonstration, technology transfer, and consultation.

Provision is made for facilities for research, recreation, conferences and education for the following: federal government centres, that is the Insect Pathology Research Institute, the Forest Fire Research Institute, and the E. Forest Products Laboratory; universities and schools; and the local community. This includes swimming, fishing, hunting, skiing, etc. because it is located in one of those lake and woods areas of the valley. Provincial governments deal with them constantly, as I mentioned, as well as the commercial forest industry.

If there is one thing I want to make clear it is this: I do not feel that there has been enough co-ordinated effort in Canada with regard to the forest industry on the part of those interested in the forests of Canada to form a proper lobby. This lobby is not only needed for a big crash campaign or at a time when a crisis arises in the Canadian forest experiment stations, but it is needed on a continuing basis to support and promote the Federal Forestry Service and provincial programs.

I understand the province of Ontario has drastically cut back on its budget for the department of natural resources. We cannot go on this way forever and still expect our forests to remain viable for future generations.

My point is simply this. After this debate is over, we cannot stop there. There must be a strong lobby by professional foresters. Strong corporations must also be involved. Surely their interests are tied up in this as well. Possibly they are going to neglect the forest industry and put their money in some other business.

In addition, there are the small sawmills and veneer plants in designated and depressed areas. In northern Ontario, 82 per cent of the people gain their livelihood from the forest industry. The components of the forest management policy are many and varied in nature. The Reed report entitled "Forest Management in Canada" made the following recommendations:

1. Tree Improvement: The introduction of genetically superior stock is intended.

2. Protection: Fire protection is reasonably well cared for now.

I would add, Mr. Speaker, that it must be continued.

Protection from insects is inadequate to cope with large scale epidemics such as the spruce budworm.

In this day when we are talking about conservation, it bothers me to see elm trees along our rural roads, victims of Dutch elm disease, being left to rot. They should be harvested. This is another reason—masses of dead trees—why forest research programs must be continued. With $35 million going into the Canadian forestry service and $1,650 million going into the federal and provincial treasuries, surely we could do better. It would not take that much more and the return on investment would be many times the original expenditure.

I again quote from the Reed report:

3. Research and Development: Primary research should be stepped up and in some cases redirected. There is an additional need for applied research and large-scale operating trials of various silvicultural treatments.

4. Canadian Forestry Service: This agency requires a status in accordance with the contribution of forestry to the national economy and its budgets should be restored in order to play its legitimate role in an expanded program of forest management.

That is precisely the point I was making a moment ago.

An expanded program of primary research is called for across the board. Stand improvement and tree improvement hold great promise, but related research has not kept pace with regeneration studies. The federal government should re-establish the priorities in this area which were sacrificed in favour of environmental studies.

Reed further calls attention to serious regional problems in five provinces aggravated by the ravages of spruce budworm, by forest area withdrawals resulting from environmental pressures, and by shortfalls in forest management.

In making these recommendations, Reed alludes to many constraints in achieving improvements in forest management intensity. He alludes to the complexity of planning framework, the lack of general expanded commitment in forest management, and the existence of intense rivalry between federal and provincial governments. That is unfortunate. It should not be. There should be a total spirit of co-operation, with the provinces playing their role in co-operation with the federal government.

There is open friction interdepartmentally in Ottawa and in the separate provincial capitals, and even within individual resource ministries at the provincial level. There is a need for a mechanism to co-ordinate forestry programs of private industry and senior governments with identification of management priorities through to implementation and funding.

There is a need for appreciation of the forest sector as one of Canada's most important generators of activity. That is something I alluded to as a long-term program. It has been with this country since day one. Only a rational approach to research and development in forest management, pest control and disease control will continue this growth.

Net imports of the United States, mostly from Canada, are expected to increase from a roundwood equivalent of 1.6 billion cubic feet in 1972 to 2.8 billion cubic feet by the year 2000. Canada is presently the world's largest exporter of forest products, with approximately 10 per cent of the world's productive forest land area, and growing stock reserves. The forest land must be replanted with upgraded timber.

If we can succeed in improving the quality of our timber resource in Canada, the manufacturer will have lower production costs at his mill or plant. This in turn will make him more competitive on the international market. It will help retain that 20 per cent of the international market. Indeed, for the first quarter of 1978, forest products in Canada represented something like 32 per cent of our international trade.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member, but his allotted time has expired. He may continue only with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member have consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, the feeling of speaking in the House of Commons was once described by Sir Winston Churchill as that something above everything else that touches the heart and sometimes silences the individual. I am not here on this occasion to speak with regard to some of the recent events.

I am very happy that there are two ministers present. They will be able to convey my thoughts to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who, knowing I was going to speak, followed his usual course of disappearing because he always feels that one should never, never criticize him. I was not going to do that. It is the last thing I had in mind.

All I have to say in that connection, without going into the election results, is that the most lonely position anyone can occupy is being the only living former Prime Minister of Canada. I am looking forward, after the events of yesterday, to having company soon.

● (1242)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a hope and an expectation, and I am sure the Prime Minister was not just talking when he said on several occasions that no one should remain Prime Minister of Canada longer than ten years. I won three elections as the leader of this party, and he has won three. His terms were not as short as were mine. I came in in 1957 with a minority. However, last night's results indicate that the Prime Minister had unusual prescience, and I know he will carry out the undertaking he has given over and over again regarding the danger of one remaining Prime Minister longer than the period I mentioned.

From time to time the Prime Minister quotes Scripture. That has developed recently. He needs the kind of help he believes the Scriptures will provide. I am reminded of the words in the fifth chapter of Daniel. Oh, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald) knows what the words are! That was when the handwriting was on the wall. You will recall that, Mr. Speaker.

There was Belshazzar. Suddenly the words Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin appeared. I can pronounce them very well. The words, of course, interpret, "God hath numbered thy kingdom, and finished it". The Tekel part of it interprets, "Thou art weighed in the balances, and art found wanting". No more applicable words could be applied to the circumstances of today than those which were used in the Holy Scripture of thousands of years ago.

As I rose to speak, I saw the Prime Minister disappearing. He referred to me the other day when I was not here. Naturally, I am honoured to have been referred to by him, and I must pay tribute to him. Being a philosopher, he is always quoting fifteenth century philosophers. He doesn't always give their names, nor the authorities, so that they can be looked up. However, there is one statement he has made over and over again, "Indeed, the universe is unfolding as it should". Those words could not be more applicable to what is happening in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not going to speak at length today. I would have, had the Prime Minister been here, because I want to be of assistance. I had wanted to remind him of some of the mistakes he has made.

There was a strange atmosphere in the House of Commons today. As I looked over at the treasury benches today, I saw the shadow of another John. In light of the turn of events it is obvious that the Prime Minister has the same view. I made a prediction a few days ago that when things went bad the Prime Minister would have to resign, or would resign. That was made clear as a result of what hon. members supporting him did the other day when he finished his speech. They stood and applauded. The press reported that they stood for three minutes. In the days of Hitler, Goebbels said that two minutes is long enough. It is strange that hon. members opposite should stand up to applaud. I have only seen that once, and that was in a casual way when the war ended.

Where are we going? What of the future of this nation? I think also of the immortal words of Lincoln. One of the most unusual fakers in history was P. T. Barnum. The fact that the initials are the same has no applicability to what I am about to say. Lincoln said that you can fool some of the people some of the time but that you cannot fool all the people all the time. All across this nation today there is a deep feeling of revulsion against the government of this country because of the stands which have been taken by the right hon. Prime Minister.

I am going to mention one or two of those stands, but not at great length. I was not here the other day when the opening speeches were made. I read what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) said. It was a masterly speech.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was a speech which deserves commendation. Then there was the speech of the leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent). It was thoughtful and considerate. Then there was the Prime Minister's speech. I did not read it all; I measured it. It was the most unusual speech ever made in this House under similar circumstances. How many votes did he get as a result of that speech? I will not mention many of the constituencies, but I think of Parkdale and Eglinton as examples because of the large ethnic makeup of those constituencies. One could say that the voters in those constitutencies told the Prime Minister what they thought of him in most of the unofficial languages of this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The mills of the gods grind slowly, but they grind exceeding fine. I can understand that the Prime Minister would go astray. I will mention the monarchy a little later because the Prime Minister lost more votes for endeavouring to strip Her Majesty the Queen of her prerogative rights than for any other reason.

I am concerned about my country, and I can understand how the Prime Minister could be led astray. A few moments ago the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) was in his seat—he has gone now. He is one of the heavyweights of the government of this country. What did he say when he was in Washington attending the seminar on world hunger? He complained to his hosts that the breakfast they served him was lousy. "Just some old buns," he said. He went on to say the following, which indicates the thinking of this government. He said that Canadians do not have any economic problems and that unemployment is not so high—so high as what—and that Canadians do not know poverty. He said it is the media which are ruining Canada's reputation. Do you realize he said:

—I walk up the driveways and see two cars in the garage, ranch type houses, so much money in the credit union, just come back from a trip to Europe and some other place. How many other people in society are doing that?

I could read on, but it is the view of the government, and apparently it is the view of the Prime Minister, that everything is well. Take that article from Washington—its heading is "Problems Are A Myth".

We have, as well, another minister who illustrates their thinking, that is, the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen). Why do we not get the facts here? I have never known a government—and I have been here for almost 39 years—that has concealed the truth to the extent that this government has. Anything that is embarrassing is not answered.

A little while ago there was a discussion regarding the several hundred questions that were not answered in the last session. I cannot read them all now but I have them here. So long as they have to do with the Prime Minister and so long as they have to do with appointments he has made connected with anyone respecting whom the question is asked, there is no answer. So along comes this minister and says that there are some facts that cannot be revealed. Now to me a fact means something that is true, but the minister says they are good facts when they behave themselves. So there are good facts, and there are others which lead to misinterpretation. I imagine this is a government which divides facts into those that can be allowed the people and those that cannot. In other words, the minister revealed the fact that the kind of information we are getting is whatever has been disinfected, dry cleaned or, to adopt a new word, "cullenized." That is where we are. Views like that, sir, indicate a government in disarray.

I will not say some of the things I would have said had the Prime Minister been here in order to answer me, because I like that type of assistance, but I will say this: That today is a happy day for Canadians who believe in the maintenance and preservation of freedom in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to say anything that might in any way be considered as being uncharitable or as knocking down a person who is down and out, but, sir, all the things that for months and years we have been saying, have brought about a change in the thinking of Canadians, and they are beginning to realize exactly what their position is.

At a time when this nation was in great difficulty, the Prime Minister was in Morocco. I had to find out where he was, but I could not do it. I was not going to tell this. The hon. lady opposite was in Edmonton at the time. I was invited to Peking for September 23 and I wanted to find out whether there would be an election at that time. I came into a room in which there was quite a number of people gathered following the official opening ceremonies. Suddenly somebody said to me, "What are you doing here?" It was the Prime Minister of Canada. I satisfied his curiosity and I said I had been endeavouring to communicate with him for 20 days so as to obtain information from him concerning the possibility of an election, because, after all, the date of the election changes with the political atmosphere.

One thing that the Prime Minister wishes for today is that there would be an amendment to the law which would extend the period of five years between elections. He said he had been in Morocco for 20 days. I said that it seemed even longer than that. I had wanted to find out, just between us, privy councillors, if he would tell me whether, if I went over to Peking, there might be an election here. Do you know what he said to me? He said, "As far as I am concerned, you can go to Peking and go to hell". That was the clearest answer that I have ever had from him. For his edification I had to point out to him that in the hereafter I expect to be up there, but I said that we will not be in the same constituency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I placed before you a few generalities. Now I will deal, not with the economy, because it has been dealt with by my leader with exceptional ability, but I will deal with certain matters that have caused the people of this country—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until 2 p.m.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I said that I was going to deal with the economy, but I am not, because it has been fully dealt with already. However, I do not think that Canadian people fully realize what a spendthrift government there is in existence. The Prime Minister speaks of restraint. Last year the deficit was $13 billion. This year it is expected to go as high as $15 or $16 billion. It will take years for this country to re-establish itself in so far as national finance is concerned. The government has earned the description of "Trudeau squandermania". That is what it has done, and that is why the Prime Minister leaves the House so quickly, because he knows he cannot face a debate. It is easy for him to make general statements, but I would have liked the opportunity to ask him some questions so that he could answer them immediately.

I come now to a question that is of great concern to me, and that is the monarchy. He has endeavoured all through the years to destroy the monarchy and to bring about a republic in Canada. The other day in the House he stated, as reported at page 37 of Hansard:

> We are repeating, Mr. Speaker, and we have said it since 1968, that this is the intention. The intention was explained to Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace by the then minister of justice and she saw it that way too.

That statement is false, because the Queen must accept whatever recommendation her prime minister has made. To pretend that she was in favour of this indicates on his part a desire to contravene the basic principles of parliamentary government. Now he says that he does not intend to have the right hon. member for Prince Albert along with the Leader of the Opposition misinterpret his views as to what he intends to do. If that were true I would be the first to admit it.

Let us look at the views of Senator Eugene Forsey, a Liberal and one of the great constitutional experts of Canada. He said, as reported in the Toronto Globe and Mail of July 24, 1978:

> —he will fight Prime Minister Pierre Trudeau's proposed constitutional changes to the limit.
> Mr. Forsey . . . called the constitutional package such a "weird concoction" . . . Mr. Trudeau's proposals would turn Canada into a republic and make the Queen a sort of deputy to the Governor General—

That is the view I have been expressing and that is the view of the constitutional experts.

The Prime Minister set out to get rid of the Senate because he knows he cannot abolish the monarchy and have both the House of Commons and the Senate. So, he starts this institution which will be neither fish nor fowl but will end the Senate. Where do the senators stand? I quote from an amendment to the motion by the Special Joint Committee on the Constitution:

> That this committee report to the Senate and the House of Commons its concern with the position of the government to the effect that it can proceed unilaterally, that is, by a mere law of parliament, with the provisions of Bill C-60 respecting the Senate of Canada and the position of the Crown, and—
> [The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner).]

Let us see how many of the Liberal senators voted yea: Forsey, Fournier, Bird, Denis, Lang, Langlois, McIlraith and Neiman.

Mr. McIlraith came into the House of Commons at the same time that I did. He is a man for whom I have had intense admiration all through the years. He never deceived or used double language, and I do not mind being associated with people like that at all. All these Liberals said that the plan was wrong.

The Prime Minister has said that he is going to make the Senate an extinct species. Now, however, he says that he loves the monarchy, that, "Why, the very suggestion that he is trying to tear it down shocks his finer sensibilities". I will read what he had to say, because he has not changed from 1940 to 1978. All through the years it has been condemnation of the monarchy. He said on March 5, 1976, while speaking to the provincial congress of the Liberal Party of Canada in Quebec city in effect that as long as he is around all will be well.

He goes on to say that there are three sides to the constitutional question. There is a division of powers that we have not been able to solve, there is the amending formula, but most important of all there is what people call the repatriation. Basically, this means we are going to take away from England, the United Kingdom, this foreign country, although it is a friend—he actually goes that far—the right to make laws for Canadians. They have never made any laws for Canadians; the British North America Act simply provides that the amendments asked for by the Parliament of Canada will be accepted. In the next sentence he says:

> Do you think that the Queen of England will tell Bourassa: admit that Trudeau is right or tell me, admit that Bourassa is right? . . . We must agree to tell the English to stop making laws for us.

That is a dastardly statement and very false.

● (1412)

> I am going to get the constitution back and when I get it back we'll be able to form in this country a new kind of government and I shall be the first to appoint the first President of Canada in the person of Jules Leger, or of Hughes Lapointe.

That is what he said. That is his purpose. The other day he falsified his position, because he can turn somersaults faster than anyone who has ever occupied the position of prime minister.

What does he do? He gets caught and, whenever he gets caught, he follows Machiavelli who is referred to as his patron. Machiavelli says if you have to change your views, people forget. He says today he will get the constitution back, but let me read what he said on May 20, 1964. He and the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde), he and a group of French Canadian intellectuals, produced a manifesto, translated by Michael Pitfield who is today, among other things, the secretary of the Privy Council.

> The derangement resulting from nationalism is particularly revealed today by the exaggerated importance given by our leading citizens to constitutional problems.
> Constitutional problems in Canada are far from being so serious or so important as some would have us believe. The obstacles to economic progress, to full employment, to an equitable welfare scheme or even to the development of French culture in Canada, are not principally the result of the Canadian Constitution.

The restraints are not judicial but social and economic in nature. It is an exaggerated conception of the power of the written word that believes that these restraints will be wiped away as a result of mere constitutional change, whatever its magnitude.

The so-called building of a new constitutional structure is as futile as a a huge game of blocks and the effort devoted at the present time to debating such a reform takes up a great deal of energy that could be profitably spent in solving much more fundamental problems in our society.

Take your choice; one statement today, another tomorrow.

I am going to make a prediction, Mr. Speaker, and I do not often do that. He is scared out of his wits over the Senate. He is frightened. Those senators—Forsey, almost immortal while yet a mortal—and others who stood with him—I have named some of them and there are more—they have him frightened. I have no doubt whatever that one of these days he will withdraw that portion of the so-called constitutional package connected with the Senate.

What else is he going to do? No longer is there going to be a cabinet. It is not going to be called a cabinet but a council of state. That is the French expression.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I regret to interrupt the right hon. gentleman but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Chair sought unanimous consent but there is not unanimous consent. I therefore recognize the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard).

An hon. Member: Who said no?

Mr. Clark: Le député de Longueuil.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister runs for cover because the government does not want to hear the rest of it.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, if the right hon. gentleman's time has expired, I should like to raise a question of privilege. With all due respect to the right hon. gentleman whom I have heard speak many times, and whose views I respect, as well as his wisdom, and I want to compliment him on his remarks, some references were made to Her Majesty, the Queen, our sovereign. There are many on this side, a lot of us on this side, who have a very deep love for Her Majesty, and the things said today by the right hon. gentleman—

Mr. Diefenbaker: —are true. I quoted the Prime Minister exactly.

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): One second please. I want to say to the right hon. gentleman that when quotations are taken from speeches—

Mr. Diefenbaker: I took it from the Prime Minister's own statement in Quebec—

Mr. MacDonald (Cardigan): I understand that the right hon. gentleman did that. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, may I therefore also quote from the Prime Minister's speech?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. minister seeks the floor on a question of privilege but I have doubts as to the validity of the question. I do not think the hon. minister was attacked in any way. If he has something to bring forward at a later time to clarify a point with which he is in disagreement with the previous speaker, we may consider that, but right now I do not regard this as a question of privilege.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, may I—

Some hon. Members: Order, order!

Mr. Diefenbaker: What are you so frightened of over there?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The hon. member for Rimouski.

Mrs. Sauvé: May I ask a question, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras).

Mrs. Sauvé: Will you allow a question, Mr. Speaker?

An hon. Member: No questions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I just recognized the President of the Treasury Board.

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I want to start by congratulating—

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I thought the hon. member was seeking the floor on a point of order. I had already recognized the hon. member for Rimouski.

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I am grateful for this opportunity to take part in the throne speech debate. Like the previous speakers, I would like first of all to congratulate the co-movers of the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, the hon. members for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and for Verdun (Mr. Savard). I also wish to express my admiration for His Excellency the Governor General and Madame Léger who performed their duties with a selflessness and a simplicity that warmed the hearts of all Canadians. I also want to congratulate the new generation of House of Commons pages. I hope that every one of us will give them the attention they deserve.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments about the rhetoric and the criticisms aimed by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) at the Leader of the Opposition. While we were beginning to see the right hon. Prime Minister as a financial wizard going into battle, as he has said so often in English, with his three weapons, the three Rs, that is Restraint, Reallocation and Renewal, we now discover a philosopher who tells us about the three Fs, that is the three faculties of the brain: memory, imagination and intelligence. He generously granted the first two to the Leader of the Opposition but kept the third for himself. As the saying goes, "Charity begins at home".

Mr. Speaker, the opposition may well have a lot of imagination, but it would perhaps be wise and not such a bad thing if the government also had some. As for memory, since I have been in this House, we have not stopped telling the government what its duty should be in view of the present economic situation. To go on in the same spirit, I would like to speak about what I myself call the three Fs, that is the three failures of the government—unemployment, inflation and the endless federal-provincial conflicts with the federal government imposing its will on everyone without ever trying to obtain a consensus. What is there in this Speech from the Throne that deserves our confidence? After reading it several times, I still wonder where we are going. As concerns the most serious current problem, unemployment, even though we may try reading between the lines, we can foresee little hope of improvement. The government says that it will help the private sector, even though it is badly weakened, to give a new impetus to the economy. We are told that at the summit meeting held in Bonn, Canada committed itself to give work to all Canadians. We are told that the objective of the government employment strategy is to encourage job creation in the private sector. The employment strategy, Mr. Speaker, is something new. At last the government has an employment strategy. We do not know much about the way it works, but there is actually an employment strategy, and that is reassuring, Mr. Speaker. There are 946,000 unemployed in Canada, including 301,000 in Quebec. Given the fact that out of that number 263,000 are going to be withdrawn from unemployment rolls and increase the number of people on welfare, Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) still intends to go ahead with his project of cutting expenses, the government of Quebec might find itself, after these cuts, with a substantial additional burden in the area of social assistance. But which type of industries are going to be granted these additional funds that the government is going to invest in job creation? That is the big question. Heavy industry, oil industry and major industrial centres. What will happen to economically underprivileged areas like mine, and the whole Gaspé area? I would like to quote the Quebec minister of labour who said on September 7 last:

The funds intended for those programs could be directed toward the areas most likely to attact them, namely Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia.

The dilemma would be that the benefits of 90,000 unemployed Quebeckers would remain in Ottawa and end up in the richer provinces. We had a small example recently in the Ford Company which located in Ontario with a subsidy of $68 million. So, Mr. Speaker, we should ask the provinces, the 946,000 unemployed, the civil servants or the have-not regions what they think of the government's employment strategy. I think that yesterday about 10 per cent of the people answered flatly what they thought of the government's strategy and the present situation. Of course, the Prime Minister keeps repeating that everything is fine, thank you. Inflation is less severe here than in other countries. We are creating more jobs than any other country. We have a high standard of living. And he throws a bunch of figures our way, as he did in Winnipeg on September 18, and as he did once again in the House last week, telling us that 91 per cent of households in Canada have hot water, 90 per cent have showers, and 29 per cent have home freezers. And then he tells us that he has figures on flush toilets and sewers.

Mr. Speaker, I think that we have to be more serious than that. It is not a matter of knowing whether Canadians have outhouses or flush toilets but of knowing whether there will be jobs for our 946,000 unemployed. That unemployment is the very consequence of the economic slump we have been in for the past ten years. There will always be politicians like the Prime Minister to tell us that in spite of staggering unemployment, runaway inflation, a weak private sector, bankruptcies, endless labour conflicts, like at the Post Office, government quarrels like that sales tax business which made us lose two months in sterile debates, to tell us that in spite of all that, everything is fine.

I would like to take this opportunity to point out once again the growing gap between have and have-not regions. Last Friday the hon. member for Matane (Mr. de Bané), depicted a gloomy picture of the real situation in the Gaspé Peninsula. It is a sad reality, Mr. Speaker. What the hon. member from Matane tried to tell people in the area is that because they have been blindly loyal to an old party, particularly the Liberal party during the last 30 years, they should stop voting Liberal and change their political philosophy if they want to see better days. Indeed all the difficulties they are now facing, including unemployment and inflation, are the prize they get for their faithful loyalty to the old party, particularly to the Liberal party.

It is altogether inconceivable that budget cutbacks concerning government offices and unemployment benefits shold not be used to launch some make-work program. According to a Statistics Canada report, eastern Quebec had a 15 per cent unemployment rate. If we want to be more realistic, we should talk about an actual and permanent unemployment rate of 25 per cent. In some municipalities 50 per cent of the labour force is idle. That is because of lack of economic planning, investments, basic equipment, closing of plants, seasonal activities and so on. Those are some of the reasons for our difficulties.

For instance, in eastern Quebec we have mining, forest and marine resources that can we develop only if we have a share of foreign markets. The few industries and mines we have either reduced their production or ceased their operations because of that lack of opportunities. Many sawmills have closed down. As concerns fisheries, Gaspé does not benefit from the 200-mile limit as its industry is still based on inshore fishing. This is why this morning I put a question to the minister and proposed a motion asking him to maintain the 2 cents a pound subsidy to the Atlantic coast fishermen.

The tourism industry has a period of operation of no more than two months which tends to discourage potential investors. What hopes have we left if the government does not offer a tax incentive policy to industries that might be tempted to open plants in those areas? Not only is our unemployment rate the highest in the province of Quebec but it is also the highest in Canada according to the latest figures published by Statistics Canada. We are the champions of unemployment, a title we share without any pride with another Quebec region, Abitibi-Témiscamingue. This situation has many serious economic and human effects. Lives are ruined, opportunities are lost, there is bitterness, shame and we even had suicides. The economic consequences are very serious too: the loss of a countless number of man-years, a heavier welfare and unemployment insurance burden. It is the same on the social aspect: exodus of young people, the aging of the population and poverty.

Mr. Speaker, I have dealt almost exclusively with unemployment as I consider this problem crucial and urgent if we want to ensure the economic future of our country which is looking ever less promising. Unemployment reaching alarming proportions, inflation, the fall of our dollar, the highest interest rates in our history, those are many reasons for concern. And the right hon. Prime Minister tries to convince us that nevertheless everything is fine. I know that the Prime Minister has made several trips to the eastern Quebec region and admired all the natural beauties of Gaspé. I strongly suggest he should go back to our area and discover that other Gaspé peninsula he does not seem to know. Hopefully he will come back with other figures than those concerning flush toilets. We have good people, people with a lot of memory, a sincere memory, creative imagination and fruitful and honest intelligence, people still haunted by promises of a just society.

● (1432)

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to commend the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) who moved concurrence in the throne speech. Thousands of Canadians heard that speech filled with sincere hope and dignity. That speech, made by the hon. member from York South in the name of millions of citizens who also chose to emigrate to Canada, where they could have a full measure of human dignity and civil liberties, reminded us we need real strength rather than dead wood, Canada needs enthusiasm and belief rather than apathy to keep on developing its potential. I am so much prouder of that contribution that as a member I also repesent a constituency with a number of ethnic groups. They chose Canada for the same reasons. Some wanted to escape the tyranny of certain dictatures, others came because their home had been threatened or destroyed by wars, or to flee racism. Whatever the reason or reasons for leaving their country of origin and coming to a new country, there is unanimity that Canada offers them the opportunity of full development.

This is why on October 8, 1971, Prime Minister Trudeau tabled in the House a document on the main programs related to maintaining and developing multiculturalism across Canada. This document contained the decisions taken by the Liberal government following the recommendations in the report of the Royal Commission of Inquiry on Bilingualism and Biculturalism. By creating a department to implement the recommendations made by the commission, the Liberal party proves that multiculturalism in a bilingual framework seems the best way to preserve the cultural freedom of Canadians. Thanks to this type of policy, discrimination and jealousy between different cultures should be eliminated. If national unity is to have a deep personal impact, it has to be based on each individual's feelings about his own identity. This might pave the way for mutual respect and views sharing among Canadians. A dynamic policy on multiculturalism will help us acquire this self confidence which could be the linchpin of a society which would guarantee equality and respect to all its people.

Consequently, I would like to point out that the Liberal government considers that multiculturalism in a bilingual society contributes to ensure the individual his freedom of choice.

[English]

I would like to point out a statement made by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) relating to this important matter. I quote from a Canadian Press news report on the front page of the December 30, 1977, edition of the Toronto Star, under the headline "Joe Clark: Here's what I would do if I were PM" The following paragraph will be of concern to all Canadians on non-English, non-French origin:

> Clark vowed to reorganize and trim the federal bureaucracy. He said he would take a hard look at abolishing the departments of fitness and amateur sport, multiculturalism and urban affairs.

That is the official statement by the Leader of the Opposition concerning the importance of multiculturalism.

[Translation]

We are free to be ourselves but we cannot rely on chance, we must protect and seek that freedom. If it is jeopardized among some ethnic groups, it can be jeopardized everywhere. In Canada and in the world, liberalism rests on the protection of the rights of the individual. Individuals will be able to attain maximum fulfillment only if they are allowed to fully exercise their rights in a climate of freedom and equality, the very idea of liberalism. Personal freedom, political freedom, equality and economic justice are all conditions favouring and garanteeing those rights. They are at the core of the concern of the supporters of liberalism and the main subject of attention on the part of the Liberal Party of Canada.

The government, in creating the position of a minister responsible for multiculturalism, wish to encourage the development of our various ethnic groups, recognizing their contribution to the fabric of the Canadian nation. It is obvious that success in the development of such a program depends on the co-operation of the provinces as well. In my opinion, a legislation such as Bill 101 in Quebec does nothing to support the objectives pursued by the Canadian government. I seriously wonder about that and it seems that unfortunately this legislation tends to polarize French-speaking Canadians against English-speaking Canadians, not only in Quebec, Mr. Speaker, but across Canada. We just have to listen to comments, to read editorials and to study our financial pages to realize the importance of this situation.

Canada is now at the crossroads. It is regrettable to think that the future of this extraordinary country, a country where freedom is part of our heritage owing to various people who settled here, can be jeopardized by a possible separation of Quebec, a possibility which I hope will be rejected by the majority of Quebeckers who are looking for security, for the protection of their democratic freedoms, for social stability and for economic progress and by all those who intend to live from coast to coast in their own way, and as fully as possible, sharing Canadian wealth together.

The hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) who has had the privilege to second the Address in Reply to Speech from the Throne has made us aware of the matters which concern his voters, of the particular interest he has for the elderly and of the importance of a continued improvement by joint efforts with the provinces, in the services to which they are entitled in the field of housing, transportation and medical care.

Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and some of his colleagues and I have been disappointed by the rather gray image they cast throughout Canada. They project the image of a country plagued with unemployment by not mentioning the fact that 240,000 new jobs have been created in Canada every year over the past five years. Members of the opposition are much quieter and even mute when it comes to explaining the causes and suggesting remedies.

[Mr. Roy (Laval).]

This situation must be clearly straightened out. Let us quote figures, absolute figures. One must consider that the labour force has grown by 308,000 in 1977 and 248,000 in 1976, which represents an increase of 3 per cent for 1977 and of 2.5 per cent for 1976.

Between 1965 and 1970, while the overall Canadian population increased by 1.6 per cent, the labour force expanded by 3.3 per cent. Between 1970 and 1975, the total population went up by 1.4 per cent while the labour force, people coming onto the labour market for the first time, grew by 3.5 per cent.

What are the projections for the period from 1981 to 1986? The total population is expected to go up by 1.3 per cent and the labour force by 1.7 per cent. In other words, a decline of more than 50 per cent in the labour force over the previous years. Statistics reveal that by 1985 we will probably experience a labour shortage.

Three quarters of this increase can be traced to the growing number of people old enough to work, the rest can be explained by the higher participation rate. Adult women in 1977 were the most important group in the 131,000 increase in the labour force; these women joined for most legitimate reasons, but they nevertheless increased its size. In other words, the labour force expands faster in Canada than in any other country in the world.

In a particularly difficult world situation we can proudly say that this country—every Canadian not only governments—has done as much, if not more, to create jobs and personal revenues, growth, development and investment as others in most countries of the world. But that has not been enough. Canada's performance has been remarkable compared with those of all OECD countries, the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, which includes North America, Western Europe and Japan, and that was done in spite of the days lost through strikes in 1976, when we registered a loss of some 11,609,890 work days. We were one of the most affected countries in the world at that time and if we look at the situation in 1977, this figure was down to 3,829,750 days lost, which represents a rather significant improvement for 1978. Therefore we hope Canadians and unions will co-operate so we can continue to improve this situation.

On October 12, the right hon. Prime Minister quoted a series of statistics to establish a comparison with the United States and other OECD countries as regards job creation, social policies, real available net income per person living in Canada as compared with our American neighbour while the real disposable income per inhabitant increased from 100 to 151.9 per cent taking 1968 as the base year. In the United States that real net income increased from 100 to 124 per cent. Therefore, it means that we are ahead of our American friends. I do not intend to tell you that everything is for the best and that the government is not conscious of concerns in Canada.

The eight-point plan announced by the Prime Minister on August 1 last on his return from the Bonn summit conference and the contents of the Speech from the Throne make up an emergency plan for action combining several aspects of the government policy. It advocates speeding up action rather than taking a leap in the dark. It finally shows that the government is strongly determined to take imaginative measures recognizing that the priorities should be shifted, advocating restraint in government expenditures, the reallocation of funds in our social schemes and the renewal of funds used to urge private enterprise to create permanent jobs.

As for restraint, the government of Canada has always been blamed for the expansion of its budget. I have myself discussed during a review in committee the reasons warranting such and such an expenditure or questioned departmental officials about increased staff. I even asked for the establishment of productivity standards through an annual assessment of the staff, which is made today. You were right in making such a criticism. I was also right when I asked questions to the officials of various departments. We decided to reduce public expenditures by $500 million this year already and by $2 billion next year. For some people, it is not enough but it is an enormous amount for those who are affected. It was not easy if you consider the distribution of those funds.

For your information, let me point out that in the years 1961-1976 the distribution of the increases at the various levels of government as a percentage of the gross national product was as follows. In 1961, all the expenditures of the federal, provincial and municipal governments amounted to 30.8 per cent of the GNP whereas in 1976, they represented 40.3 per cent, an increase of 9 per cent. Now, let us have a look at federal expenditures including transfer payments to the provinces. That proportion was around 18 per cent in 1961 and became 20.2 per cent in 1976—an increase of only 2 per cent. Let us have a look now, if you want, at the increase in spendings at provincial and municipal government levels, excluding transfers. In 1961, these spendings represented 12.7 per cent of the gross national product whereas in 1976 they represented 20.1 per cent, that is an increase of 7.4 per cent. These figures may seem too high, but I think that public expenditures are also high. Here again, let us be careful before charging Ottawa for that situation, before thinking that all these finds are going to public servants who have nothing to do, or that it is just wasted money. Let us give back to Caesar what belongs to Caesar, especially when Caesar has slowed down that alarming trend.

One sometimes hears certain people make comparisons with the situation in the United States, be it about taxation or other fields where Americans show a much more glossy picture than ours in the area of public expenses. Let us not forget that the main difference between Canadian and U.S. public service figures lies in the fact that health care in Canada rests with the public sector whereas in the United States it rests mostly with the private sector, which accounts in the United States for a difference of 5 per cent to 6 per cent of their gross national product.

So I revert to this fact: for fiscal year 1975-76, federal payments to individuals amounted to $7.7 billion, of which almost 90 per cent paid as old age pensions, guaranteed income supplement, family allowances or unemployment insurance benefits—in fact, payments to individuals, to all Canadians, represent 22.8 per cent of the total federal budget.

We therefore had to cut back expenses without raising all sorts of objections, and we have redistributed funds among the lower income earners. This amendment allowed us to increase the garanteed income supplement by $20 a month per family, and some 3.3 million people will benefit from this measure. As the time allotted me is limited, I will not be able to complete the outline concerning family allowances, which have also been reviewed with a view to redistributing funds. I would recommend reading the leaflet that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) will send and in which she gives all the advantages and changes that have been brought to the family allowance program. Changes were also required in unemployment insurance. There are some people out of work who are really looking for a job, we are aware of that. However, upon further examination of the situation of unemployed people in Quebec, we have found that over 75 per cent of households affected by unemployment earn wages, that is to say, they have two sources of income, unemployment insurance benefits and wages which were not declared.

In fact, the latest data published by Statistics Canada on unemployment indicate that out of the 243,000 families, or 270,000 people, affected by unemployment in Quebec in the month of August, 184,000 had one or more sources of income and in 165,000 families, the breadwinner had work. This means that 59,000 families had no income at all, including 16,000 childless families. So we brought changes in the unemployment insurance scheme precisely to stimulate the development of Canada a little more.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with industry. I more particularly wish to thank the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for the initiative he took when he was minister of industry, trade and commerce by talking the cabinet into signing the agreement with Canadair, an initiative that allowed hundreds of people of Laval and Montreal to work in the aeronautical industry and to participate in the development of the well known Challenger jet aircraft now being built by Canadair. That was a very important initiative for the metropolitan Montreal area, since 70 per cent of the total number of manufacturing jobs in the province of Quebec are concentrated in Montreal and since the economic health of the city has a considerable influence on the over-all economy of the province.

In the manufacturing industry, the jobless rate in Quebec has increased by 50,000, 41,000 of whom in the Montreal area. This proposal is particularly worthy of attention because in the transport and aeronautics industries the Montreal area already has the basic facilities for further development of aircraft production. It will hopefully become a major centre for the transportation of all kinds of goods throughout North America.

Mr. Speaker, I will strongly support the proposal of the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Comtois), providing for further expansion in the northern area of Montreal in particular in Ste-Thérèse or the opening of a new Quebec General Motors plant in North Montreal. Considering that the bus plant will be built in Deux-Montagnes and that General Motors has already set up a car factory in Ste-Thérèse on the North shore, I will strongly support that move and call upon the municipal governments to back this very good proposal which will contribute to developing this sector of the motor industry in the northern part of Montreal.

Mr. Speaker, I also want to thank the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lessard) who has agreed to designate the city of Laval, and include it in the special Montreal area which is eligible for industrial development grants of up to 25 per cent of the capitalization rate to set up new businesses and 20 per cent more to expand industries already existing, provided these businesses contribute $100,000. Already, Mr. Speaker, five new industries have received offers for a total amount of over one million dollars from the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, for a total investment of approximately $10 million for the city of Laval.

I see my time is running out, and in conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I remain optimistic for the future because the government has taken economic measures to meet the present needs, and with the determination of all Canadians, whether they work for private industry or the government or labour unions, we all have a part to play in meeting this challenge, in order to foster a real economic growth which will reflect the aspirations of all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. Eldon M. Woolliams (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, my first pleasant duty this afternoon, a matter of tradition in this House, is to congratulate the mover and seconder in this throne speech debate, but although they made excellent speeches they did not seem to influence the by-elections of yesterday.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe they did.

Mr. Woolliams: My good friend from Winnipeg says that maybe they did.

I am always very happy to follow the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), whom I have known for many years. He is a master in this chamber and one of the top orators who has entered this chamber in my time and, I am sure, in the experience of all others as well as in the experience of those who were here before me. Having listened today to his witty good humour and noting his penetrating method in debate, there is no doubt that hon. members opposite listened very carefully. However, I must say that I was disappointed in the Minister of State for Federal-Provincial Relations (Mr. Lalonde) and other backbench members of the Liberal party. When the right hon. gentleman asked for an extension of time, those hon. members said no to a former prime minister of this country. The right hon. member for Prince Albert is the only living former prime minister in this country, and the action of those hon. members was inexcusable.

Yesterday was quite a day. It was the day for by-elections. I suppose this might be a time for some elation and some celebration for our party, but above all it is a time to appreciate the democratic process of government. Many people in Canada, both inside and outside this House, believed that there would be an election last spring or this fall, but for one reason or another the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) lacked the courage necessary to call one. No doubt the people spoke with a loud, clear voice yesterday.

There is one thing about by-elections I like. They can be differentiated from Gallup polls. When voters speak in by-elections, the result is accurate, assertive, and assessing. Therein lies the difference between the Gallup poll, which is often used in this nation, and a mini federal election of 15 by-elections. In the by-elections yesterday the people elected ten Progressive Conservatives, two New Democrats, two Liberals, and one Social Credit.

Thousands of words will be spoken and written about yesterday's by-elections, but for the Progressive Conservative party this is a time for sober thought. It is a time to appreciate that as a national party and the party of confederation we are on the verge of forming a new government for Canada. It is a time for us to accept the fact that governing this country will be very difficult. As described by our leader and also by the right hon. member for Prince Albert, at this time Canada is in an economic mess. The whole country seems unsettled, and disunity seems to be found everywhere.

I felt that the Ottawa Journal put it very accurately and adequately as follows:

● (1502)

On the basis of yesterday's returns, that challenge is simply beyond the reach of the Liberals under Mr. Trudeau. He could hardly have been more emphatically rejected than in the decisive loss of all five Liberal seats the party held in Ontario or in the sharp loss of popular vote strength shown across the board. The brave face Mr. Trudeau put on the matter of his personal acceptability as a leader was to be expected. But whether he takes the opportunity to reassess his own position, his party can hardly avoid facing the leadership question, and with urgency—

The result in Ottawa Centre, a smashing victory for the Conservatives, typifies their best hope in the months to come; to attract more high calibre candidates such as Robert de Cotret, and David Crombie who won so well in Rosedale, to leave the voters with no doubt that this is a party getting ready to govern. Finding such candidates will be a great deal easier starting today.

Therefore, I say at the outset, this is the time for this party to assess itself, it is the time to be most responsible and, above all, it is the time to continue—and I use the word advisedly—to be credible, which we are. The proof that we are credible is the voters' confidence which was given to our national leader and to our party yesterday.

This is the time to appreciate our victory, but also the time to be humble—

Mr. Leggatt: That is hard now, come on.

Mr. Woolliams: —because we will have thrust on to us the responsibility for cleaning up the mess of the last ten years.

Mr. Alexander: Yes, and there is a lot of it, and it is deep.

Mr. Woolliams: I am proud to say that much credit must be given to our national leader, a young man with great ability and lots of experience, a young man who has served at least two national leaders, the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, our former national leader, and a premier, as well as serving his constituency here in the House of Commons. However, I was most disappointed when I heard here the other day the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), a former member of this party, a man whom I know very well, a man whose first nomination was held in Hanna in the constituency of Acadia, where I was guest speaker, now Crowfoot, who, I thought, sank to a new depth when he attacked personally the national leader of our party and referred in particular to his educational qualifications.

If you check very carefully you will see that our national leader has a Bachelor of Arts degree and a Master's degree in Arts. This seems to top the qualifications of the critic from Crowfoot. We do not know what grades he had in high school, but I do know he enjoyed a six weeks' extension course in the school of agriculture at one of the universities. At any rate, I suppose that when we come to discussing education, whether university or other, perhaps the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce can take some comfort from the fact that the late Sir Winston Churchill was not a university graduate, in spite of which he was probably one of the greatest leaders the world ever saw at a time of great crisis for the western world.

Now I would like to turn my attention and make some remarks with reference to the administration of justice. I was most disappointed to see that both in the Speech from the Throne and in the recent answers of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) it is evident that the question of law reform is now a forgotten chapter with this government. I should like to review with you, Mr. Speaker, for a few minutes the whole subject of crime and its causes.

When crime is on the increase, the notion that it can be described in a single category is erroneous. Violent crimes create a climate of fear in the streets of our growing cities. White collar crime, in economic terms, is much less visible than violent crime. The material cost of crime such as petty theft, consumer fraud, violations of the Combines Investigation Act, or embezzlement, dwarfs all crimes of violence.

Proper laws and proper law enforcement cannot be underestimated in the control of crime, but I have believed for years, not only as a member of parliament, but as a lawyer, that we must launch an attack on the breeding grounds of crime. Crime breeds in the cesspools of injustice and poverty in the urban slums of our fast growing cities. The law must be just to be respected and obeyed. Urban poverty makes people who dwell in these cities the victims, not the masters, of their environment. Bad environment becomes the inheritance of the next generation. In order to launch a major assault on crime, we must attack conditions of despair and the denial of opportunity to people, which result in a growth in the incidence of crime. Today we have one million unemployed in Canada. That is a condition of despair. However, crime still thrives under conditions of affluence, and it is the white collar economic crime which erodes the capitalist system and which promotes more controls and less freedom, as can be observed day by day. In brief, the police, courts and prisons alone cannot control crime. We must also deal with the underlying cause of crime. The immense and stubborn forces pervading our environment determine the quality of our lives and are a challenge to us.

Through long range efforts in a new land of bountiful resources we can conquer poverty, ignorance, disease, discrimination, family breakdown, injustice, social tension, and despair. But while we must strive to approach the causes of crime, we must put our mind to work in a practical way to amend the various sections of the Criminal Code to guarantee that the law is respected and is not shaped and planned so as to protect the rich only and be unjust toward the poor. Crime is a national problem under our constitution, while law enforcement is the provincial and local responsibility. This parliament must direct its processes so as to ensure justice through the Criminal Code. It is for us to bring excellence to every aspect of the administration of justice—to corrections, the courts, and to law enactment in every jurisdiction in Canada.

Let me turn my attention now to the administration of justice. I was disappointed to see that two bills, Bill C-51 and Bill C-52, which were brought forward by the former minister of justice, died on the order paper. Bill C-52 contained the new definition of rape and indecent assault or aggravated indecent assault. Although I cannot say I agree with all the clauses of the bill, I think that the purpose of the bill was good. The purpose of the bill was to correct the procedures of the courts which sometimes allow the victim to suffer more than the accused, and cross-examination procedures which allow the victims to be cross-examined on their past sexual behaviour.

The Council on the Status of Women for Canada met with our committee and with the caucus of our party and discussed that very problem. One of the things they asked was that this parliament take steps to assist victims of rape, a crime which is on the increase in this nation, particularly in the highrises, on parking lots, and in the streets and alleys.

Bill C-51 was a large, omnibus bill. Our all-party committee on justice and legal affairs met to study the question of pornography, and for once members from all parties agreed to a report, because as pornography is defined in the Criminal Code under section 159(1) at the present time there have been few convictions. The problem was the meaning of the definition on obscene written matter and whether it met community standards, because the standards of one community can differ from that of another. I could deal with facts in some of those cases in which there were commitals. There are pictures showing the greatest kind of perversion of mankind, but I do not want to get into that.

The point I wish to emphasize is that the definition of pornography under the Criminal Code as it exists is inadequate and does not serve society. If there is a problem I get more letters on, it is the problem of pornography across this nation. It arises in part in the local corner store where young children can go in, sit down and read or see the weirdest kind of pornography dealing with both mature adults and children as young as two and three years of age. One distributor admitted that he made over $1 million in the maritime provinces alone in selling and peddling pornography. He could not tell us what amount was made across Canada because he did not have the figures.

Under that bill we were able to convince the Minister of Justice to change the definition of pornography. Under that bill section 159(8) in the Code was to be repealed. It was defined as follows:

A dominant characteristic of the matter or thing is the undue exploitation of sex, violence, crime, horror, cruelty or the undue degradation of the human person; or

(b) the matter or thing unduly depicts a totally or partially nude child

(i) engaged or participating in an act or a simulated act of masturbation, sexual intercourse, gross indecency, buggery or bestiality, or

(ii) unduly displaying any portion of his or her body in a sexually suggestive manner.

That bill died on the order paper. It would seem that this government has now forgotten its mandate, which it thought it had, on reform.

In dealing with the Criminal Code we have referred to the expertise of the Law Commission. It has been sitting for a number of years, and I was very pleased to see Mr. Francis C. Muldoon, QC, a member of the Manitoba Bar, take over the chairmanship. He came before the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs and I spoke to him. I said that for a number of years the Law Reform Commission has done an excellent job but they have been philosophizing. Every report they put out is philosophical and I felt that it was time they, in spending the $2.5 million of the taxpayers' money they receive for this year, came to grips with some of the amendments in the Criminal Code.

One of the matters which should be looked at is the definition of insanity which determines whether a person is insane or not. This law was written over 100 years ago and is known as the M'Naghten rules. A person is said to be insane if he or she does not know (a) the nature and quality of their act, or (b), if the act is wrong. Surely that should be reviewed in light of new knowledge in psychology and psychiatry.

Section 41(2) of the Federal Court Act should be repealed and a new subsection enacted to empower a judge of the Federal Court or other superior court to decide whether documents should be admitted as evidence in a court of law rather than leaving the matter to be determined by a minister of the Crown. This section has been used in reference to the McDonald inquiry. However, now the government has decided that it will determine what documents this national inquiry will see, that it will make the decisions and keep the facts from this inquiry. How can the inquiry come out with a report that is looking into wrongdoing? We do not know today, particularly when we talk about Section 41(2), what instructions were given by the many solicitors general that have come and gone. In fact they come and go as often as I wear out overcoats.

Laws must be examined, and enacted if necessary, to preserve always the jury trial system in Canada. There is a suggestion from the Law Reform Commission that we do away with juries. In all important cases I believe that every Canadian should have the right to be tried by his peers, and I would not want any other system to develop in this country in our jurisprudence. There has been some recommendation also in reference to the abolition of preliminary hearings in criminal offences. Preliminary hearings must always be preserved in reference to charges under the Criminal Code dealing with serious crimes such as murder, rape or robbery, because it gives the accused's counsel a chance to determine what the Crown has in evidence so that he or she may properly prepare their defence. This eliminates the risk of mistakes, and there are mistakes made.

Divorces are far too costly. The law regarding grounds should be extended and therefore amended to streamline the procedure which will cut the cost to the average person.

All writs of assistance must be renewed every six months by a judge's order, not issued by some bureaucrat or official, to carry any legal force and effect.

I would like now to turn my attention to something which amounts to a complete abuse of law and the fundamental principles of jurisprudence. Parliament in its wisdom—some would question that—enacted legislation to abolish capital punishment. I am not here to discuss the question of capital punishment, I am here to tell the government and the Department of Justice that what they did when they changed the definition of murder and the procedure in dealing with this crime usurps the civil rights of those people charged with the offence under the old definition.

In bringing forth this legislation they changed the definition for the crime of murder. Formerly, murder was described as capital murder and non-capital murder, and it was changed to first degree and second degree murder. In comparing capital murder and first degree murder there is no difference in definition, and the same is true for non-capital murder and second degree murder. The legislation that was approved by this House was described as transitional and came into effect on July 16, 1976, and was to apply to deeds previously committed. Putting it simply, if a person committed an act on Monday and the new law is enacted in reference to the same crime on Friday, how can that person be asked to be a law-abiding citizen?

With this new section a person could be committed for trial under the old act, tried and convicted before July 16, 1976, then appeal his case and take it to the court of appeal where it is heard after the new legislation has been enacted. There are three cases that I am aware of like this, two of which I will name, the Pineault case of Ontario and the Budic case of Alberta. The third one is presently before the courts, and I will not mention it because I do not wish to deal with something now before the courts in reference to this question. All three individuals received new trials.

The trap was sprung. Section 27(2) of the Criminal Code which was approved by this House—I was a member at the time but I do not think anyone thought it would be used this way—reads as follows:

Where proceedings in respect of any offence of treason, piracy or murder, whether punishable by death or not, were commenced before the coming into force of this act, and a new trial of a person for the offence has been ordered and the new trial is commenced after the coming into force of this act, the new trial shall be commenced by the preferring of a new indictment—

What does that mean, Mr. Speaker? When a person committed an offence before the law was enacted by parliament, he was tried under the old law and found guilty under the old law. The court of appeal directed that the conviction be quashed and a new trial ordered. Then the Crown comes along—when the person has been charged with non-capital murder and is successful in the appeal—and prefers an indictment of first degree murder. This is retroactive legislation of the worst kind and is against all the principles for which jurisprudence ever stood.

I have already referred to Regina vs. Pineault (1977) 32 CCR, page 391, Court of Appeal of Ontario. I will skip the next one because I know something about it, and it is before the courts. The next one is Regina vs. Budic. The Court of Appeal of Ontario split two to one on the interpretation. It does not say an indictment under the old act or under the new act, and that has never been settled by the Supreme Court of Canada. If you do a deed, no matter how evil, and it is on Monday, surely this parliament in its wisdom should not pass an act on Friday and make it retroactive to what you did on Monday. If that is the law of the land, God help the citizens of this country. This is legislation drafted by this government, brought in by this government, rammed through by this government which is now running slip-shod over people who get new trials in the court of appeal.

The following statement by Mr. Justice Brooks, a dissenting judge in the Pineault case, is the most serious I have read in the administration of justice for many years. He said:

Having regard to the whole of s. 27 of the act, it seems clear that parliament set a cut-off date. It said that after the coming into force of the act all charges of murder would proceed as murder in the first degree or murder in the second degree and an accused not yet tried and one for whom a new trial had been ordered by an appellate court would accordingly be similarly treated. To this extent parliament has declared what is fair and just. However, the important distinction (and really it is a safeguard) is that where a new trial has been ordered the appellate court was under a duty when directing the new trial to make any order that Justice requires. It is the presence of this obligation that is perhaps an answer to Mr. Greenspan's submission that his man's successful exercise of his right of appeal from his conviction for non-capital murder is no more than a sham.

In other words, if a person appeals to the court of appeal on a serious charge of non-capital murder and obtains a new trial, he is in worse shape than had he never appealed at all, even if there is a mistake in law or a mistake in evidence. That is what we call retroactive law. This has not reached the Supreme Court of Canada. There may not be many cases on the point.

Another change in the Criminal Code is that you can only appeal from a conviction or acquittal, so that means you cannot go to the Supreme Court of Canada on a motion. Mr. Justice Brooks also said:

Having regard to what has happened in this case and for the reasons which I have stated, I think the court should act and direct that the new trial be upon an indictment which charges the appellant with second degree murder and I would so order.

However, the other two judges decided the other way. So I say that for a person who committed an evil act before this legislation became law, if he is successful in appeal, the retroactive legislation means he finds himself charged on an indictment of first degree murder, rather than second degree murder as punishment for winning his appeal. If that is the law of Canada, I do not even want to be an honorary pallbearer at its funeral.

Mr. Driedger, the director of legislation for the federal government, has said:

A retroactive statute is one that operates as of a time prior to its enactment. A retrospective statute is one that operates for the future only. It is prospective but it imposes new results in respect of a past event.

He goes on to say that retroactive legislation should never apply to criminal matters. If there is any ambiguity, it should lean toward the citizen rather than the state.

Finally, this new law, in the guise of abolishing capital punishment, appears to have changed the whole process of the fundamental principle of justice, that a person must know the law as he sits, as he walks, as he runs, and as he acts, not some law that comes into force after the fact. I ask the House to take a hard look at that.

I want to deal with one more thought, if I have time, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the hon. member but his time expired at 3.28 p.m.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard).

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, after consultation with the House leaders of every party, it has been agreed that at four o'clock this afternoon we will interrupt the current debate and proceed with second reading of Bill C-8, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services and that the motion include a provision stating that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole House. That is the unanimous consent we have reached so far.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): That is correct, Mr. Speaker. We are ready to begin debate now, if that be the case, but I understand it is necessary we begin at four o'clock. That is agreeable to us. The matter of moving into committee of the whole is also agreeable to us.

I should point out, and perhaps the parliamentary secretary could indicate it to the government House leader, that if we reach the stage during the course of the day we are prepared to consent to move immediately into third reading of the bill. If that is disposed of tonight we are prepared to agree now to extend the time of the House this evening in order that this parliament get on with the job of restoring postal service to this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council is correct, namely, that there is agreement among all of us to commence the debate on second reading of Bill C-8 at four o'clock and that the bill be referred to a committee of the whole House.

I suggest that any consent or agreement that might be needed for other stages should wait until we reach those stages. There could also be the question of what would happen to the vote on the Conservative motion that was scheduled for tonight. At this point we are prepared to commence the second reading debate at four o'clock as stated by the parliamentary secretary.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, we have agreed to hold a debate at four o'clock. I do not know whether we want to start the discussion earlier than that, however we were ready for four o'clock in order to refer the bill to the House committee and at least try to put the question tonight.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the point I think I should inform you that there have been some informal discussions between the government House leader and myself as to the appropriate time and method by which we should settle the time to deal with the vote on our amendment in the throne speech debate. That matter is under active discussion.

Mr. Speaker: At the moment the House has been asked for, and I take it has given, its consent for second reading of Bill C-8 to commence consideration at four o'clock. That point is now settled by consent, and so ordered.

It is also agreed that the motion which will be taken under consideration is a motion that the bill be read a second time and referred to a committee of the whole House. Insofar as other consents which may be required to deal with the matter are concerned, those consents will arise at the time when those stages are reached. The subject of the vote which is set for 9.45 is under discussion, and presumably the House can be informed as early as possible as to what arrangements will be made with respect to that vote.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is correct. I just rise to express the hope that any discussions about the timing of the other vote should be among all four House leaders and not just between two of them.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 27).

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I believe it is appropriate to say, if at first you do not succeed try, try, try again. First of all I would like to congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) as mover, and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard) as seconder of the motion, both of whom spoke with compassion and clarity. I was very proud to have them as members of the House and members of my party.

The events of last night and the clear knowledge that we are facing an election within the next few months are very evident to all of us. I would like to say at the beginning of my comments that, be that as it may, this parliament must work in the meantime. I want to speak this afternoon with what I feel will be considerable candour. As my colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), stated we will be having a budget in November. Today I would like to place before the House some facts on the fiscal position of the government so that we may all, in our responsibilities as parliamentarians representing whatever party, have that knowledge when we consider what might or might not be done three or four weeks from now, and indeed from now until the spring, in meeting our responsibilities collectively for the Canadians we represent.

I was tempted to divert from those comments, but I will not go too far, by the incident that took place when I tried to speak previously, when the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) made some comments before the end of his remarks.

I would like to say that there was some outrage felt here about the personal comments concerning the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), which I think were taken out of context and which were registered by my colleague, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. MacDonald). I will deal with another comment which the right hon. member made and which I do not feel is personally outrageous, but incorrect, when he stated that the borrowings of the government last year were $13 billion, I believe he said, when in fact they were $7 billion. As well he forecast $15 to $16 billion in borrowings this year. Instead they will be $11.8 billion. I suggest to you that that inaccuracy is equal to the inaccuracy of his comments about the Prime Minister's views on the constitution, which the Prime Minister clearly set forth when he spoke so eloquently here the other day.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: I will resist the temptation of further diversion because in the time that is available I want to set forth some views and some facts that I have. The economic problems we face are international in scope. Governments all over the world are grappling with inflation, with unemployment, with trade problems, and with currency difficulties.

No industrial nation that I know of is isolated from the other industrial nations, and indeed nor is Canada. Objectively we are doing better than most, but Canadians are concerned and we are concerned. We are concerned as a government, and as members of parliament, about the persistent and pervasive nature of continuing inflation, unemployment, growth below our potential, and currency devaluation; we know the litany.

These days it seems economic theories that were well accepted are being challenged, be they Keynes or even our old friend Adam Smith, Freidman, Samuelson or whoever. It is my experience that if there are ten economists in the room, eleven different ideas of what should be done will be voiced. Governments in Canada of all stripes and at all levels since the 1960s have been intervening increasingly in the private sector. We see more spending, and more regulations. The growth of government in many people's view has begun to encroach, psychologically if not substantively, and it has begun to stifle the initiative of the private sector. The curious thing is that even with this growth in spending of governments, hon. members should know from their analysis and research that tax revenues have not kept pace with spending. This government is not alone in that case. Government spending at all levels in Canada, federal, provincial and municipal, is on the same scale.

In 1961, about 15 or 16 years ago, collectively in our various administrations we took about 31 per cent and spent about 31 per cent of the gross national product. By 1976 in Canada that figure had reached 40.3 per cent, an increase of 9.5 per cent, of the economy going through government hands, federal, provincial and municipal. The federal government, including the transfer payments to the provinces, accounted for 2.1 per cent of that 9.5 per cent. And the other levels of government, even before the effect of transfers to them, actually spent the money and accounted for 7.4 per cent.

If you exclude the transfer payments to the provincial governments, that money we collected through the federal tax revenue system and sent by way of cheques to the provincial governments, our share of that 9.5 per cent increase in the GNP was 0.5 per cent their's was 9 per cent. I do not say that as a criticism of the provincial and municipal governments. Indeed, let us be honest about it. Some of these programs for which we transferred funds were initiated at the federal level, medical and that kind of thing. Nevertheless we have to put the facts before us, and hopefully before Canadians as they judge this question of taxation and spending. It is important to know where that distribution is. It is also interesting in terms of the arguments of centralization and decentralization in this country.

That is where the spending increase took place in the main, at the provincial and municipal levels. And incidentally those seem like small percentages, that 0.5. I often hear that our expenditures have gone from $16 billion to $50 billion—"Isn't that shocking"? and "Indeed that is startling." But nobody adds to that that next year the gross national product of this country will be $250 billion. It has to have a form of relativity, one to the other. It is the standard, internationally speaking, by which government expenditures are judged. That is the relative position vis-à-vis the national economy. It is not the only criteria by which spending should be judged, by any stroke of the imagination. Efficiency, effectiveness and value for money are very good things. But in the macroeconomic effect of it that is the standard by which internationally, governments are judged in terms of their spending.

Even with that increase to which I have referred, which in my view was too much and too rapid, we are still in the low quarter of western industrialized countries as to the degree of public spending. I am talking about governments collectively. At any rate we have certainly contributed, as a federal government and in this House too, in my view and that of many others, to too rapid a growth.

It took place in the main in the period 1972 to 1975, a very responsive and quite expensive period of minority government. We were increasing our spending year by year at a rate which was clearly unsustainable. However, in 1976, and the facts are there, we changed course. We made a public commitment to reduce the growth of our spending to something below the growth in our economy, the gross national product.

I am talking about spending including transfer payments to the provinces, to people, budgetary, non-budgetary, capital, non-capital spending, the total over-all cash flow of the government. We met that commitment in 1976, 1977 and 1978, and we will meet it in 1979.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hogan: What about unemployment?

Mr. Andras: I will come to that. It is a legitimate question.

Spending by governments and taxation by governments is of concern to the populace. Proposition 13 in California is not as alien or foreign as it may be considered by virtue of not being in this country.

More recently, spending in Canada by governments received more attention by virtue of the fact that in August we announced certain steps to cut our expenditures more significantly than we had up until then. I am quite aware of the cynicism as to, first of all, is it the right policy. I know that the New Democratic Party, I think in sincerity, might challenge as to whether it is or is not. Others challenge it through general cynicism.

I know there is cynicism as to whether the cuts are real or not. In the few minutes left to me I would like to establish why I and my colleagues believe it is the right policy and is necessary. I hope we will not have to waste a lot more time as to whether the cuts are real or not. I do not think the people in Ottawa have much doubt about that.

That was not a recent conversion on the road to Damascus. It began as a policy stated, followed through, committed and met in 1976. Granted, on August 1 it escalated and took on considerably more significance. About two or three years ago in a white paper called "The Way Ahead" we said that we had come to the conclusion that it was time the government backed off a little from the private sector, stopped stifling them and began giving them more room.

We had a series of ex-budgets and cuts, three or four which I, as President of the Treasury Board during my regime, had to administer, and a couple that my predecessor, the Minister of Finance, had to administer. I grant you that in those times and at those stages we were trying to make those reductions and that restraint as painless as possible. It is not a natural instinctive desire on the part of governments to cut back. None of us came to parliament simply to balance books. We all came to try and do something.

In our wisdom in those days, we put programs together which we thought were right. Collectively, I am afraid, they added up to an overkill and so we had to cut back. We were doing it as painlessly as possible.

On April 1 of this year, the April problem I call it, my people did a tally for me about the inexorable and inevitable growth of spending for next year. As I said publicly, my hair went white. It was far too high. It would have broken through the commitment to stay within the GNP trend line. Something significant had to be done.

We began right away, with full concurrence of my cabinet colleagues, to begin the cutbacks. They were larger than in the past. We had achieved a fair amount of that by the time the August 1 date came along. However, it was slow, painful, and somewhat tenuous as to whether we were going to get that last few hundred million we figured we needed to get to certain ceilings we had agreed to at that stage, ceilings which I felt at that time were still too high.

The Prime Minister returned from Bonn, having had the opportunity to talk with leaders of other countries, probably in private, commiserating on similar problems, saying what in the devil do we do about this? They talked frankly with each other away from the glare of the television spotlight, away from newspaper reporters and everybody else. There were discussions.

When the Prime Minister returned, he called me and said that we had to go further than we had planned. I subscribed to that position. He made it public that we were going to fulfil our commitment, that we were going to get our spending levels in line as we publicly committed in August. Indeed, our objective at that time was to go even further, because to get to lower spending ceilings was not enough. It did not give us one dime to reroute, reorder and put into new and more required initiatives of the current needs of this country, funding for new programs that we thought were necessary. Therefore we went further and rerouted another billion or so dollars back into the system in certain ways.

We took $500 million off this year to cut our ceiling to $48,300 million. We have taken $2 billion off for next year to get from $54,600 million to $52,600 million.

I have talked about inexorable growth, the inevitable spending levels that would have hit us. People say we are setting up a straw figure of $54,600 million simply to knock down, so that we can say we cut it. Not so. We have built into federal spending some inevitable growth pressures by law and federal-provincial contract.

Let me describe spending in four main areas. We have hundreds of programs. We cut or modified 189. I refer to transfer payments, transfers to persons, UIC, old age security, family allowance and the like, as well as transfers to the provinces, established program financing, equalization payments, post-secondary education, medical care and that kind of thing.

Those are the programs that are growing. Those are the programs that have absolutely the highest degree of commitment that parliament can give. As we know, our social programs, transfers to persons, are by law indexed to the cost of living. That is the least of the escalation formulas.

Many of our contractual obligations to the provinces are contractually committed to growth escalation formulae, the nominal growth of the gross national product which includes real growth and inflation. Socially, that may be right or that may be wrong. However, it is very, very expensive, and it is there as a commitment.

Let me give a sense of the degree in terms of the $52,600 million ceiling next year. Half of it, $26 billion, will be in transfer payments. The over-all annual growth rate of the transfer payment portion of our expenditures, where we collect taxes and send cheques, is around 10 per cent. It varies from about 9.8 per cent to 11 per cent on some of them. That huge portion of our expenditures carries with it legislative or contractual commitment to escalation formulas.

You cannot cut those back unilaterally. They take legislative amendment and we are going to propose some of those, or they take negotiations with the provinces and we have indicated to the provinces that we must sit down together and jointly try to get this thing in line, not vindictively I hope but practically for this country. We hope they will see, as we see, that it is time to make some of these adjustments.

I now come to the servicing of the public debt. Anybody who blithely says today, "Spend more", or "Consider tax cuts", had better clearly understand thay every dime of that will be borrowed money. I regret the statements by the right hon. member for Prince Albert and his leader over the last little while about the $16 billion deficit. It is not true and, in my view, is damaging. Nevertheless, $11.7 billion is not peanuts, and interest on that has to be paid. We are going to have a $9.7 billion cash requirement next year even with the lower ceilings.

In 1973 we indexed taxation downwards; revenue is indexed downwards and expenditures are indexed upwards. Thus we were accumulating deficits over the past few years in a Keynesian application which, in my view, is no longer working. So when we talk next year, or when we get to budget time, about stimulating the economy, let us together as parliamentarians face this one fact, and make our decisions with this one fact before us, that we are borrowing money at interest rates which, as we know, are currently high, and that more of that borrowing is in the 20-year markets. So it is our children and grandchildren we are talking about, and that public debt service cost is accounting for more and more of our gross expenditures. So we are being squeezed. Hon. members should bear this in mind when we, as parliamentarians of any party, consider what should be done in the area of stimulation by the federal government one way or another.

I also want to say that the end-effectiveness is probably unsustainable at some stage in the kind of expenditure cuts we are making. I have had the painful and difficult task of assuming some responsibility for the $2 billion cuts scheduled for next year and the $500 million for this year, in addition to other cuts we have made. I tell you frankly, Mr. Speaker, that because of the nature of the commitments under transfer payments and because of the inevitability of debt repayment, unless we are to go bankrupt these cuts can only be made at the expense of the direct operations of the federal government in the field of transportation and so on which come clearly under federal jurisdiction.

Next year, out of the $4.3 billion increase in spending, something like $2.5 billion will be in the transfer payments and around $1.5 billion in the interest charges. I invite hon. members to do a little arithmetic and see how much room there is left for an increase in the operations of the federal government itself, or even for the maintenance of direct federal programs. Only 0.8 per cent of the increase in our spending next year will be spent in the direct operations of the federal government itself. If we go on for three or four or five years—and I believe in the maintenance of reasonable ceilings—we cannot continue to take it out of our own hide or we shall end up as a cheque-writing institution just sending cheques to the social programs, which are fine in principle, and to the provinces.

These observations should be taken into account by all of us, I say so candidly, as in the remaining days of this parliament we try to come to grips, apart from our adversary roles, with what can be done. Is adherence to some kind of ceiling sound, or should we go on and on? Well, Mr. Speaker, we cannot go spending or cutting taxes in that sense and borrowing money because we are mortgaging the future of a lot of people, not just ourselves but those who come after us.

Mr. Hogan: What about the private sector?

Mr. Andras: Well, I know it is said, often sincerely, that we should increase public spending. I am not worried about the ideological label attached to it but I do not think it would work. I do not think governments are that good at doing things. There is no question the private sector has got to get off its butt and start doing things. But we have to give it the necessary encouragement and the stimulation.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andras: I have a quotation here, if I can find it, which I thought was pretty apt. The retiring managing director of the International Monetary Fund—his name is Witteveen—summed up my feelings on the matter. He said:

> I do not think that I have had to change my economic views in any major way. Perhaps I have seen more clearly, as have a number of economists and politicians, that in many situations it may no longer be possible to increase employment by more government spending. To get a more healthy growth it may even be necessary to reduce government spending and to give more room to the private sector.
> That is, I think, a feature that we have seen in a number of member countries, and at first sight it might seem to be a contradiction of Keynesian prescriptions. In reality, I think it is not. In the mixed economy, the private sector needs sufficient room to live, and to breathe, and to grow. That is a lesson that I have seen clearly.

That statement comes from a man who was in an excellent position to judge. I do not think this is an ideological argument. I think it is a practical argument. So I place these views before hon. members. There is going to be an $11.7 billion cash borrowing this year and, subject only to the possible fluctuation of revenue, $9.7 billion next year—not the larger requirements or deficits which have been touted about, but still sizeable. So, as we deliberate about what the economic stance of the federal government should or should not be in terms of stimulation, let us be very sure we know the consequences of that stimulation in the long term.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order. It being four o'clock, pursuant to the order made earlier this day the House will now proceed to consideration of government order No. 8, second reading and reference to the committee of the whole of Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

POSTAL SERVICES CONTINUATION ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR RESUMPTION AND CONTINUATION OF POSTAL SERVICES

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour) moved that Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, be read the second time and referred to the committee of the whole.

He said: Mr. Speaker, my first words must be to place on record how regrettable I find it to take the time of this House to request that parliament bring an end to a labour-management dispute. It should not be necessary for me to reiterate the faith both this government and my predecessors in the Labour portfolio have in the free collective bargaining process. Canada's industrial relations system reflects our heritage which rests on fundamental western values and on our belief that the workers' well-being can best be promoted through free collective bargaining and the constructive settlement of disputes in a spirit of compromise.

The state has assumed the task of establishing a framework of rights and responsibilities in which management and organized labour are to conduct their relations. That framework places the responsibility for resolving labour-management disputes clearly on the parties to collective bargaining. Hon. members will recall recent examples where this responsibility has been fulfilled by parties to labour-management disputes involving the public interest. I have in mind the three separate disputes between Air Canada and representatives of its ground personnel, its pilots, and its flight attendants. I also have very much in mind the recent negotiated settlement, with mediation assistance, between the Letter Carriers Union of Canada and the Treasury Board.

Unfortunately, however, there are times and situations when the spirit of compromise and the demonstration of good faith, so necessary on the part of all concerned, are found wanting. In such circumstances the federal government, as custodian of the economy and protector of the public interest, must assume its responsibility. This is the case at the present time in the dispute between the Post Office and the Canadian Union of Postal Workers. Parliament must, unfortunately, be resorted to today if we are to bring to an end a situation which the public finds intolerable. Parliament must legislate an end to this dispute if we are to take seriously into account the public interest and the extent to which the citizens of this country will continue to be affected by a prolonged stoppage of postal services.

It might be useful if I were to review the sequence of events which has led to this stage, and to remind hon. members of the extended efforts employed over many months to resolve the dispute.

[The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier).]

It is clear from a review of developments leading up to the present impasse between the inside postal workers and management that there has been a complete lack of meaningful communication and dialogue between the parties and almost no real bargaining; that is, the necessary compromises and counter-proposals on which a viable collective agreement and bargaining relationship can be based have been completely absent.

Without attempting to cast blame on one party or the other, it would be useful to set out some of the important events in the present dispute.

The previous collective agreement between CUPW and the Treasury Board expired on June 30, 1977.

In the early months of 1977 several pre-negotiation meetings took place between the parties, without any progress being made.

On May 4, 1977, the union served formal notice to bargain, with Treasury Board replying on May 6, 1977.

The first formal meeting, which took place on May 19, 1977, lasted one hour and was the only one for several months.

Negotiations were finally held again in October and November. However, little progress was made.

On November 30, 1977, the employer filed an application with the Public Service Staff Relations Board for the appointment of a conciliation board. Mr. Roy Heenan, on behalf of management, and Mr. Irving Gaul, on behalf of the union, were named to the conciliation board on December 17, 1977. Mr. Louis Courtemanche was appointed chairman of the board on February 2, 1978.

There were many public conciliation hearings from April through to July, 1978. Closed conciliation sessions involving both parties began in the early part of July and continued through to the end of the month. During these extensive conciliation board proceedings, the parties were able to agree to only a few minor clauses.

On August 16, 1978, the union gave notice that it wished the conciliation process to terminate and asked the board to prepare its report.

The conciliation board handed down three separate reports, which were released to the parties on October 6, 1978. The lack of agreement among the three members of the conciliation board is an indication of the intense feelings of the parties and the wide differences between them on a very large number of complex contract items. Notwithstanding the very exhaustive efforts of the conciliation board from April to August 1978, little was achieved in bringing the parties closer to agreement, and since the handing down of the three separate board reports it is apparent that very wide gaps between the parties still exist.

Hon. members will have learned that yesterday I and senior officials of the Department of Labour made what is called a last ditch effort to resolve this dispute in a spirit of conciliation and compromise when we met twice yesterday with representatives of the union, along with a representative of the Canadian Labour Congress, in order to explore all possible avenues leading to a settlement.

Following intense exploratory talks I proposed two possible means of resolving the dispute, which were given to the parties for their consideration. The first proposal called for the application of the mediation-arbitration process, "med-arb" as it is called in labour jargon, in the resolution of this dispute.

This process has been used successfully in other cases, not too long ago with the longshoremen at the port of Montreal, and also not too long ago on three different occasions with grain handlers in western Canada. This process involves agreement by the parties to refer their dispute to a mediator-arbitrator who would seek to mediate all outstanding issues originally referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the conciliation board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche. This process would also require the parties to agree further that the mediator, should he not be successful in mediating the whole of the collective agreement, would then make an arbitration finding on all remaining unresolved issues. The parties would agree to be bound by the arbitration awards rendered. In this process the mediator would be appointed by the Minister of Labour and would submit his report to the parties not later than 90 days following the date of his appointment.

The second proposal put forward by myself for consideration by the parties would require that the employer and CUPW return to the bargaining table with full authority to settle all issues in dispute, under the auspices of a special commissioner appointed by myself to mediate the dispute.

The issues to be dealt with would be those that were referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the conciliation board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche. The commissioner would be required to attempt a resolution of all such issues within two weeks of his appointment. If, at the end of the two-week period, any issues remained unresolved, the commissioner would then report to myself stating, in his opinion, what further steps or procedures would be required to finalize an agreement.

Both of these proposals which were presented to the parties yesterday evening included the stipulation that during either of the processes, if accepted by the parties, the government would put aside its intention to bring in legislation, and the union would agree to withhold any strike authorization and to direct its members to return to work. Such conditions are necessary to allow mediation to take place in a spirit of good faith and without threat on either side. I must say that it is regrettable that the union felt its objective would be best accomplished under the duress of a strike.

Unfortunately, the national executive board for the union rejected both of our proposals for the resolution of this dispute and called a national strike last night. Needless to say, I am very disappointed in the national executive board's reaction, as we have made every possible effort to resolve this dispute through a negotiated settlement in the spirit of conciliation and compromise.

There appear now to be only two courses left open to the government: either to allow the strike to continue with no hope of settlement available to the parties in the foreseeable future, or to legislate an end to the work stoppage and bring about a resumption of postal operations while providing for a resolution of the dispute.

We have opted for the second resolution because we have exhausted, over a protracted period of time, all statutory procedures under the Public Service Staff Relations Board, together with all good offices, including those of the Department of Labour, to resolve the dispute, and because we have failed to convince the union to accept either of the proposals for the resolution of the dispute which I presented to them yesterday evening.

It is the fundamental belief of this government that when an individual right becomes a public wrong, parliament should terminate the dispute. It is in keeping with this philosophy that this urgent matter is now before you.

This act, to provide for the resumption and continuation of the postal service, orders, therefore, the immediate resumption of the postal services, and provides for a determination of a collective agreement between the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and the Treasury Board of Canada relative to the Canada Post Office.

The bill calls for the appointment by the Minister of Labour of a person who will deploy every effort to mediate the outstanding issues originally referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the conciliation board chaired by Mr. Courtemanche. Should there be items that cannot be mutually agreed to in this mediation process, the bill provides that this mediator will then make an arbitration finding on all remaining unresolved issues. His award on these items will be binding on both parties concerned, and will be rendered not later than 90 days following the date of his appointment.

In its final report to parliament, the Special Joint Committee on Employer-Employee Relations in the Public Service stated the following in respect of prosecutions under the Public Service Staff Relations Act:

> The present two-stage process with its substantial costs, delays, fragmented administration, absence of precedents, and inconsistent penalties has led all parties to agree that the present system for dealing with unlawful activity is not working well and is inappropriate.

The government has indicated on previous occasions that it will be bringing forward comprehensive amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act which will include a response to the recommendations of the joint committee concerning prosecutions and penalties for unlawful activity.

It is important, however, that the bill with which we are dealing now be not frustrated in its application by the enforcement deficiencies of the Public Service Staff Relations Act which were recognized by the joint committee. The government, therefore, proposes that the intent of the joint committee's proposals on prosecution for unlawful activity be incorporated into this act.

In particular, clause 10 of the bill includes penalties which directly follow those recommended by the joint committee. The joint committee also envisaged a single stage process whereby prosecutions would be brought before the Public Service Staff Relations Board. Since it would not be feasible to set up exactly this process in the short time required, the government is proposing that a single stage process be provided by eliminating the necessity for consent to prosecute offences under this act.

Hon. members will note that the bill provides for a term extending to 1979. The main reason for that is to prevent an early occurrence of the present situation and to ensure an uninterrupted postal service during the transition period of the planned conversion of the Post Office to a Crown corporation. We believe that is necessary in order to effect a good transition without impairing the efficiency of the Crown corporation.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the government faces two alternatives: it can let this strike go on without any hope that the parties will come to an agreement in the near future, or it can legislate to end this work stoppage, thereby ensuring the resumption of postal services and a settlement of the dispute.

We have, of course, chosen the second alternative, after having exhausted during a lengthy period of negotiations all procedures provided for by the Public Service Staff Relations Board as well as all other means, including the intervention of the Department of Labour, and also because we have been unable to convince the union to accept either one of the two offers I submitted to them yesterday in an attempt to arrive at a negotiated settlement of this dispute. The government staunchly believes that public interest must override personal interest and that it is up to parliament to implement this philosophy. That is why this vital question is before the House today.

[English]

In closing I would like to say that I sincerely hope that the parties will take advantage of this interim period to re-establish a climate of confidence conducive to improving labour-management relations and leading to the restoration of the high calibre of postal service of which this country has been rightly proud in the past.

With these explanations, Mr. Speaker, and in full realization of the seriousness of the situation which confronts us all, I trust the House will give full and speedy approval to this legislation.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, in rising on behalf of my party to respond to the words of the minister, I want to make several things clear at the outset. The first is that while we too regret the necessity for the legislation which is put before us, we will support it and we will not delay the passage of this law unduly, because it is our opinion that at this time the country cannot afford, not just the inconvenience, but the gravest damage which it will suffer in the case of a prolonged cessation of postal services.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

[Translation]

The Canadian economy, shaky as it is, cannot sustain an extended postal strike. Financial losses would be enormous and totally unacceptable. It would impose great and undue hardships on those people whose monthly cheque, sent to them by mail, is the only means they have of making both ends meet.

Mr. Speaker, our position is quite clear; this legislation must be passed immediately.

● (1622)

[English]

It is also important to point out that, while our position is clear, the position of the government is hard to comprehend. We had a postal strike just a few years ago, and this government, through the minister responsible for maintaining postal service, allowed service to end for a period of 43 days. During that time the then postmaster general said that he did not mind if it went on until Christmas, and the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) indicated that he did not mind if it went on until Easter. I point this out because something—and it is not for me to say what it is—has certainly brought about an amazing difference in view on the part of the government as to the value of postal service in this vast land of ours.

Through you, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the minister—and I know that he would not mind being reminded—that my leader on October 6, 1978, called for the government to act swiftly and indicated then our full co-operation, provided of course the bill was essentially a fair bill, even though we would prefer to have the matter solved in some other way. Again on Friday, October 13, the House leader of my party reiterated our determination to co-operate and to move swiftly in the public interest, and that of course is what we are doing.

Parliament has been called to end strikes twice in 1972, 1973, 1974, 1975, 1976, and a special bill was passed in 1977. In some instances it was not a long or difficult debate, but each time that this has happened the government has said that this does not mean that we do not agree with the right of free collective bargaining and that it has always deplored the necessity to do this. The response of our party has been that there must be a better way.

It will be of interest to all hon. members to note that on August 31, 1973, when there was the long debate in this chamber as a consequence of the rail strike, my colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), said, as reported at page 6175 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, I merely want to say on behalf of our party that we hope this is the last time we are called upon to pass this type of legislation, because we feel there is a better way.

There is a better way, and it has been advocated by our party since the submission of the Woods Royal Commission on Canadian Industrial Relations, that there should be established a public interest disputes commission in order to reduce as much as possible the necessity of parliament interfering in these matters. There should be no doubt in anybody's mind that this has been our position, and I say this, in the hope of solving the problem, to my friend the hon. minister, that we have maintained this position consistently for a number of years. In fact there has been favourable comment recently in labour circles that perhaps this recommendation by the Woods commission should be looked at further.

In closing, I would like to remind the House of what my colleague and friend, the hon. member for St. John's East, said on August 30, 1973, in this regard, as reported at page 6074 of Hansard:

Our party has put forward a proposal based on many of the recommendations contained in the Woods report. We have said we would establish an essential services disputes commission which would define essential services and prescribe the procedure for settling disputes within these essential services. Accordingly, our party endorsed the recommendations made to the government back in December, 1968, in the Woods committee report for the establishment of a public interest disputes commission. This commission would advise whether particular services are essential, set out procedures for resolving differences where the public interest is threatened and, where it is unsuccessful, would report to the government for possible parliamentary action to end a strike or lockout. That is the kind of leadership this country needs.

It has been my responsibility to speak on behalf of this party on a number of occasions when we have resorted to parliamentary measures to end strikes, and I am sure that hon. members will remember I have repeatedly stated that there must be a better way and that it is time, after these ten years and after the experiences which are there before us, to consider alternatives. I see the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) and the Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) sitting together. I am sure that they will agree that our experiences can lead us to only one conclusion, and that is that it is time to find, along the lines of the Woods commission, a better way.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Some years ago, Mr. Speaker, parliament passed the Public Service Staff Relations Act. If I remember correctly, it was passed almost unanimously. That act gave the public service employees working for the federal government the right to collective bargaining through unions of their choice, and it gave those unions two choices to settle their differences if they could not settle them through meetings with the employers and they were either through the process of arbitration or of taking strike action.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) mentioned earlier today that in more than 95 per cent of the cases the employees used the arbitration method to settle their differences with the government peaceably. The postal workers' union chose, as they had the right to do under the legislation, to avail themselves if necessary of the right to strike. I find it strange that this parliament and this government, having given workers in the public service the right to strike, is now asking parliament on the first day of the strike to take that right away from them.

There have been other occasions, both federally and provincially, where after a strike has gone on for some days or weeks the government, as represented at various times by all the political parties in Canada, has brought in legislation ordering the workers back to work because of the adverse effect of their strike on the public.

To my knowledge, this is the first time that legislation has been brought in to stop a strike on the day it began. If this government believes that this group of workers, or any other, is involved in operations so vital to the public of Canada that it ought not to have the right to strike, it seems to me it should have the courage to bring in that kind of legislation. We believe that in a democratic society all workers should have the right to strike. We would propose such legislation, but to give workers the right to strike and then take it away the first day they go on strike seems to us hypocritical to say the least.

If one did not live in Canada, one would have believed, listening to the minister, that this was an isolated case and that we had got along fine until now. One would think that we have a group of unreasonable people who, despite everything this generous government has done, and despite its human approach to its employees, are so unreasonable that they have gone on strike and the legislation is necessary. This is not an isolated case, Mr. Speaker. The difficulties in the Post Office have existed at least since 1965. I would remind the acting minister that after the 1965 strike the government established a royal commission of inquiry into working conditions in the Post Office. It was headed by Mr. Justice Montpetit, who made 262 recommendations dealing with all aspects of employment in the Post Office. Many of those recommendations still have not been implemented, Mr. Speaker.

I should like to read a couple of paragraphs from that report dealing with the attitude, not of the postal workers, but the attitude and approach of the management of the Post Office. The report reads:

A large number of the post office employees' grievances are first and foremost, human relations problems.

—The attitude of some supervisors and postmasters towards their employees leaves much to be desired. These people have only a vague notion of the importance of maintaining good relations with their staff.

The action of those in authority has and always will have a tremendous influence on the reactions of employees and on their productivity. Complaints arising from their behaviour can be sometimes difficult to explain.

Nothing much has changed since Mr. Justice Montpetit made that report in 1966. He pointed out that the Post Office Department did not have the authority to deal satisfactorily with its employees' requests because of the divided authority it had with the Civil Service Commission and the Treasury Board and certain other organizations. He certainly implied, if he did not say directly, that what we needed was probably a Crown corporation.

In 1968 a report was commissioned by the then postmaster general. It was entitled "A Blueprint for Change." I should like to put on the record part of what it said, as follows;

We believe that the Crown corporation status is the organizational form best suited to the attainment of these objectives.

These are the objectives of a good operation. The report went on to say:

As a Crown corporation, the Post Office should have full authority to bargain with the unions representing its employees. It should not be required to seek the approval of any government agency before concluding an agreement with unions.

With such freedom, a strong effective staff relations function would be required to guide management in its relationships with the unions.

That was ten years ago, Mr. Speaker, and the government did not act until a few weeks ago when it proposed to set up a Crown corporation.

I know that the minister will not deny that the Post Office and its senior officials have not been able to conduct negotiations with postal employees and that in effect the shots have been called by the Treasury Board which has been worried about the effect of a settlement achieved by postal workers on other employees.

For ten years this government has ignored the recommendations contained in a study made for it by a committee which it set up. Now it wonders why it is in trouble.

In 1969, in a dispute between postal workers and the Post Office Department, an adjudication decision was made by Mr. W. S. Martin, a well-known and competent person in that field. He said:

As assessment of employer attitudes in this matter shows that the employer position is characterized by arrogance and high-handedness. There is lacking a genuine desire to work in the atmosphere of mutual respect and understanding. Hostility, vindictiveness, and possibly distrust, appear to frustrate any opportunity for effective inter-relationships. It would appear that the senior officials in the Post Office Department have not as yet reconciled themselves to operating the postal facilities within a progressive collective bargaining atmosphere.

Nine years later the government has not learned anything.

A few years ago the union filed a grievance—they have filed between 30,000 and 60,000 grievances in all. This particular grievance was on behalf of a member, Alan O'Toole. It went through the grievance procedure provided in the collective agreement, and the union lost. Then they went to the adjudicator under the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and won. The employer did not accept that, and appealed to the Federal Court, where the union won. The Post Office did not accept that decision either, and filed an application to appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court rejected the application and refused to hear the case.

Mr. Speaker, that is not the way to conduct labour-management relations; it is not the spirit of trying to settle matters. That is the way to conduct things if you want to break the union by getting them involved in legal expenses they cannot afford.

In the dispute which took place in 1972 a conciliation board was involved. Mr. Justice Owen Shime was chairman. He said:

In these negotiations one felt that each time the employer was required to reach a decision that it was looking over its shoulder at the remaining government employees. That was an impediment to sound negotiations with respect to the needs and problems of the Post Office and its employees.

In 1975 the assistant deputy postmaster general, J. E. Uberig, submitted a report to the then postmaster general, Mr. Mackasey, in which he stated:

—although the Post Office Act states that the Postmaster General shall administer, superintend and manage the Post Office, the constraints imposed by other pieces of legislation acted to severely limit the ability of the Postmaster General to deal with problems. As a department of government, the Post Office has to conform to standards which, while applicable to other departments, serve only to restrict the ability of Post Office management to deal with problems particular to postal operations.

He went on to be critical of the way the Public Staff Relations Act applied to the Post Office. Similarly, in a 1975 report prepared by the joint Post Office and Treasury Board committee, known as Canada Post '75, it was stated:

● (1642)

It was clear by 1975 that the program of regionalization begun in 1970 had been a dismal failure both financially and in respect to its impact on labour relations. Echoing a complaint of postal workers that regionalization had resulted in a destruction of a uniform criteria upon which disciplinary decisions were based, Canada Post '75 traced this unfortunate situation to the refusal of the government to implement the recommendations of A Blueprint For Change in their entirety.

A similar position was taken by the 1975 Conciliation Board headed by Judge Moisan.

The minister talked about what he had proposed to the postal union and suggested that they were not being very realistic and not considering his offer fairly. What the minister has failed to tell the House today is that for 18 months negotiations went on between CUPW and the government with no offer at all, no meaningful offer at all from the government. There was no offer on wages, nor on working conditions, technological change, staffing, or discipline, in fact, on nothing. It was the exact reverse, Mr. Speaker.

The government was proposing to take away from the workers the very important clause dealing with technological change which was negotiated in 1975. I think the minister knows, although he may not want to admit it, that the clause in the 1975 agreement dealing with technological change was imposed on the government and on the Treasury Board by the then postmaster general, Mr. Mackasey. As soon as Mr. Mackasey left that post the Treasury Board set out on a deliberate policy to sabotage and kill that provision of the contract. It is because of the insistence of the Treasury Board not to live up to clauses, such as the one concerning technological change, that thousands of grievances have been filed.

The whole question of technological change is not something which arose suddenly in the report. In 1966 Mr. Justice Montpetit made the following prophetic statement:

We should admit we were surprised that little mention was made of mechanization and automation by the postal clerks who will evidently be the first ones affected. Possibly they see this problem only far in the future. We believe this is a problem of prime importance which should be looked into immediately by all interested parties, since its effect will be very serious not only on job security but also on job classification, seniority, etc.

That was 1966, 12 years ago, and the government still has not faced up to the problem which Mr. Justice Monpetit said was so important. The government still has not accepted the basic principle that when an employer, government, or private enterprise, brings in technological change, it will mean that fewer workers will be needed, on that it should be done in such a way that workers at the time the technological change is brought into effect will not lose their jobs. It should be done on the basis of attrition.

In 1969 Mr. W. S. Martin in his adjudication said:

> It is quite clear that this conduct has resulted in creating unrest, the undermining of morale, and the development of hostility between the parties. Fairness and good faith must be in evidence to have a genuine willingness to consult. The autocratic issuance of directives and the unilateral determination of dates of implementation, do not provide requisites for the attainment of these results.

Let us take a simple illustration of how the Post Office management sees this whole question of technological change and classification. I am not a time study expert, and neither is the acting minister. I think he will agree with me that there is a vast difference between sorting mail by hand, as it was done for many years, and sorting mail through one of the new computerized operations in which thousands of letters flow through the machine every minute. There is no doubt in my mind that the highly automated operation is much harder physically and mentally on the worker than sorting mail by hand. And yet when the Post Office set the rate for the workers sorting mail automatically they set the rate at 75 cents less an hour than for those who were sorting by hand. Does the minister wonder why the workers in the Post Office are unhappy? Does he wonder why they do not have much faith in the Post Office or why they stopped work? They are completely frustrated.

In 1975 the agreement reached at that time spelled out the rights of employees with respect to the introduction of technological change. Clause 29, as I said earlier, was negotiated by the then minister, Mr. Mackasey. It has been constantly sabotaged by the government at the insistence of Treasury Board. The union filed a complaint which was heard by the vice chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Mr. Jolliffe, who found for the union.

There has been real bargaining in good faith by the government. On the problems of technological change, of discipline, of staffing, of the use of casual employees, the government has failed to make any real offers or offers of significance in the months in which the negotiations were supposedly taking place. It was not until the workers had exhausted all their legal avenues, and had decided to set a strike date because they could not get anywhere without that weapon, that the minister entered the picture.

We are very unhappy that the negotiations conducted by the minister did not succeed. But I find it strange that there were more real negotiations in the last two or three days the minister entered the picture than in the 18 months before that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Orlikow: Where was the former postmaster general? Where was the present Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne)?

An hon. Member: Hiding.

Mr. Orlikow: Why did they not meet with the employees and the union? Why did they not do what they should have done ten years ago and get rid of most of the senior officials of the Post Office Department who do not have the foggiest notion of what real, sensible, honest collective bargaining means? That is what they should have done.

Because we believe there have been no real negotiations and because we believe the government has failed over a period of more than ten years to think through what is needed in order to improve the relationship between employee and the management of the post office, and that workers should have the right to strike—in which case they should not be legislated back to work on the first day or they do not have the right to strike in which case the legislation should say they do not—we cannot and will not vote for this bill.

I might say in conclusion that a brilliant job of public relations has been done by the senior officials of the Post Office so that the public has come to believe that the reason for the bad service and the delays is because the workers in the Post Office are not interested, because they are not working, because they are malingerers.

There may be a few workers in the Post Office, as I am sure there are a few workers in any organization, not putting out 100 per cent. However, I want to put on record my belief, based on the facts, I am certain, that the real difficulties in the Post Office, and the poor service people believe they are getting, are not the fault of the workers but of management. Let me put, in a very few papagraphs, what I mean.

● (1652)

Some ten years ago the senior people in the Post Office Department looked at the annual sharp increase in the amount of mail that was being handled. They decided that if they did not find some automated electronic way of handling mail to meet the increase, the number of people working for the Post Office would grow at a fantastic rate. A few of them travelled around the world looking at systems in other countries. When they returned, they persuaded this government that we needed the best system in the world.

The best system in the world is expensive. Therefore, we spent a billion dollars on new electronic equipment. That system is in operation, or should be in operation because it is in place, in Toronto. Through it moves 70 per cent of all the mail in Canada.

The computerized automated system is not working because all of its parts are not working. Some of those parts, including the computer system which costs between $150 million and $200 million, are still not working. The facilities in Toronto and Montreal are not functioning properly. The Montreal facility will not be finished until next year.

There are three plants in Toronto, the east plant in Scarborough, the south central plant, and the Gateway plant. Gateway has two plants, the west letter processing plant and the entry bulk mail facility. The second plant, the bulk mail facility at Gateway, is not working. This means that all mail arriving from Air Canada, from trains, from other cities in cartons and boxes and so on, is in trouble.

For example, all mail should go through Gateway, then on to other plants, but at Gateway's bulk mail facility section, the mail handling computer does not work and the receiving pans did not line up mechanically properly. They are working on this second problem with some success, but there is no solution yet on the electronic computer problem. Its cost rose from $2½ million to $7 million, yet the Post Office is not suing the company but absorbing the extra cost as developmental costs. I wish it would treat its employees as generously as it treats that company.

They had to vacate the old Terminal A. Now they are using the old arsenal building, and some other mail is being sorted in the letter processing plants which were not designed for this purpose. The result of these mistakes in planning is that all mail is moving slower than should be. Staff is inflated to handle the 50 per cent to 60 per cent of mail being sorted manually. Some mail is being semi-processed mechanically.

A lot of street letter mail does not have the code, or the code is not in the right place, not typed, or wrong letters and numbers have been used. This screws up the automatic system. The amount of mail being machine processed is lower than it is supposed to be or than the Post Office admits. The Post Office says it always expected to sort 27 per cent of the mail manually. The real amount being done that way is much higher. Therefore, they need extra help, I suppose the casual help about which there has been so much dispute.

Supposedly first class letters were to be processed mechanically, but this will not happen until the whole system is operating. Why did the Post Office let development time take so long? It will not be ready till next year at the earliest. Originally it was programmed to be ready last year.

Of these mistakes, let me say one thing. I hope the Postmaster General will correct me if I am wrong. I am told the system is operating so badly that mail which should be sorted in Toronto is being shipped to Cornwall where it is sorted and brought back to Toronto. That may not be true now, but I am told it has happened. If it is happening, those who should be in trouble are not the postal employees who belong to CUPW, but the postal management.

We were told in the Speech from the Throne that we are going to get a Crown corporation and this will solve all the problems. If it is run by the same people who have been running the Post Office for the past ten years, we will have more trouble with the Crown corporation than we have had up until now.

Let me conclude by saying that it is sad we have to discuss this kind of legislation. However, we have to discuss it because the government, postmasters general and presidents of the treasury board have been remiss in getting their act together. They have not worked out a policy for collective bargaining which is workable and acceptable to the employees, one which would have obviated the difficulties we have had. Had they done so, we would not require the kind of legislation we are debating today. For those reasons, we intend to vote against this bill.

[Translation]

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a few remarks on the bill introduced this afternoon by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services. Mr. Speaker, the House of Commons is faced this afternoon with quite a delicate problem, as we must choose between two priorities: on the one hand, the public's right to postal services, and on the other hand, the union's right to call a strike. On the one hand, we have 23 million persons entitled to postal services, and on the other, 23,000 workers to whom the government has granted the right to strike and is asking us today to take it away from them through Bill C-8.

Mr. Speaker, I have always believed that the rights of the majority should prevail over those of the minority, which does not prevent us to pass special legislation to protect minority rights.

In the public service we constantly see strikes which are brought to an end by special legislation. Often those special pieces of legislation entail large expenses. Fortunately we are in Ottawa today, but if we were in our constituencies we would have to leave and come to parliament to vote such a legislation to order Post Office strikers back to work. Moreover, I find it rather strange that the government has waited so long before telling us how serious this problem is.

I was listening a moment ago to the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Ouellet) who outlined to the House all the meetings he had with union leaders. In the course of those discussions, he told us that he had appointed conciliation boards, mediators, arbitrators and what have you. According to him, he did his utmost to try and arrange a reasonable solution, implying that the unions are the ones which are not reasonable. As for the spokesman for the official opposition party, all he said was: We have no other choice than vote for such a legislation since we are faced with a fait accompli, and he wished that legislation be brought in the House to avoid all those conflicts.

As usual, the New Democratic Party is in favour of upholding the right to strike and of giving unions everything they want in an attempt to calm them down. Well, it is the same old story and we find ourselves today in the same dilemma once again.

Mr. Speaker, if we pass this bill, is it going to solve the problem? If we were at least sure of it, it would not be a waste of time, but I am rather sure that the passage of this bill will not solve anything in the Post Office, as it has never solved anything in the public service in general. It is precisely that sector, of all public and extragovernmental sectors, Mr. Speaker, that has been the most troublesome in recent years and that has most affected our Canadian economy and hurt the Canadian people.

I wonder, Mr. Speaker, whether parliamentarians will finally understand that it is impossible for a government which will be the judge to settle honestly a labour dispute while being both the employer and the accused. It is impossible, because too many interests are at stake. That is why we have always advocated and still do a non political organization beyond the control of the government which would settle those collective agreements. I have just found a newspaper report dated September 2, 1973, and there is nothing new, Mr. Speaker. Our demands are similar to those made by Réal Caouette at that time, according to that article signed by Claude Lavergne and entitled: "The Prevention of Conflicts" in which reads, and I quote:

Anyhow, every time parliament is forced to step in and pass special legislation, the dispute is suddenly referred to an arbitration board whose award is binding and without appeal.

To be practical, one has to set the facts in their true light: either an agreement is reached through negotiation or arbitration and, then, the right to strike is of no use whatsoever, or a strike is called and then this right is withdrawn by a special legislation, which again makes it inoperative.

Why not take the easy way and set up regular and on going mechanisms in order to prevent a recurrence of the same problems?

The present policy is aimed at patching things up. The solution suggested by Réal Caouette seeks a social and orderly peace through the prevention of conflicts.

That is why, Mr. Speaker, I say again—and with this I know the unions will agree, for let no one think that I blame them alone—I say again that in any quarrel both sides are often wrong in some regards and right in others. It is up to the arbitrator to decide who of the two is right. I am all for protecting the right of the worker to his job. That is why I say that in the case of a civil servant, there can be no justice when the employer is the state which is both the accused and the judge at the same time. It cannot be both. That is why a court is an absolute necessity.

We demand the creation of a permanent court of arbitration whose decision would be binding and could not be appealed, a tribunal composed of three judges, one appointed by Parliement and not a political party, another by the unions and the third to come from the public at large. That tribunal should be completely apolitical. In its actions, it could not be influenced by any political or union wave. It seems to me that would be the ideal tribunal for ensuring that justice is done in such cases by both the worker and the employer. And so the rights of the 23 million inhabitants of this country would be protected while those of the 23,000 postal employees would be respected.

Mr. Speaker, to my mind, that is the only way we can avoid coming back constantly to the House to pass back to work legislation for civil servants. That is the only way, there is no other. But which government will dare introduce such a bill? I wonder. We have been asking the Liberals for one for ten years now. Will another government finally give it to us, so that we can have both peace and justice in Canada at the same time? That is what I hope for as I ask the government if the time has not come to act, to act now, and create such a tribunal?

Mr. René Matte (Champlain): Mr. Speaker, I will say just a few words during the presentation of this legislation. I just want to remind hon. members that when we are considering such a proposal, we should stop and think and ask why, for instance, in 1978, in a civilized country as advanced as ours, in a civilization which has some claims to progress and to development in every respect, how it happens that we have again to resolve through coercion such a simple problem as the services to be provided to a population. We should wonder why we have not yet found a means to prevent so many workers from relying on blackmail, which is what all those strikes are, as well as to prevent the government from resorting to more or less honest procedures which are very often childish, to say the least.

Mr. Speaker, we should certainly have found by now the means to prevent this situation from occurring. We should not try to find someone to blame. We should not try to find out precisely who is responsible for the situation, but rather, Mr. Speaker, we should find the means to settle this once and for all. This kind of blackmail should not exist in 1978. Such childishness should not occur in negotiations in 1978. Both parties should understand that there are strict rules that must be obeyed concerning ethics, respect and basic good manners. It is possible to assert your rights and even request certain privileges without annoying millions of people who need their mail. It is very well to request all that you desire, whether it be salary increases or better working conditions, but there is no need to do so by causing all sorts of disastrous problems for your neighbours.

Mr. Speaker, we must be sufficiently civilized to discover finally a basic formula which can eliminate all strikes in this country, to develop formulas, laws and regulations which can command respect. We now have a problem because our legislation and the principles behind it are inadequate and because no one wants to respect them. If only we really wanted to solve not only this problem and the present postal conflict, but all other similar problems because of which our population could not care less about problems! It is terrible, but this is what we have come to. How many times in the past have we seen people prepare themselves in anticipation of a future strike? For instance, the present strike does not bother at all those who have enough money to use special paid messenger services. Yes, we are so used to this situation that we have finally provided all sorts of alternatives in our own system. And while this goes on, we, the legislators duly mandated by the people, discuss another band-aid solution. Once again we discuss the means to solve a problem in the short term without thinking about the need to find a permanent solution.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that all this had to be said in this House during the debate on this bill. Of course, I agree that this problem must be solved. I agree completely as to the need to do so. However, what I want most is for us to insist from now on on finding the means to eliminate this situation so that we shall have fulfilled in this House our true responsibility towards the people we represent.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: All those opposed to the motion will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In my opinion, the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Ouellet), which was agreed to on the following division:

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: Order. House in committee of the whole on Bill C-8, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services.

● (1752)

Clause 2 to 4 inclusive agreed to.

On clause 5—Term of collective agreement extended

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I would like an explanation as to why the terms of this contract apply from July 1, 1977, to December 31, 1979. Obviously we are considerably past the commencement date. I gather it has a relationship to the position that will be taken by the AIB in relation to that period which came under the ambit of that board. I would like explained why it goes back to that date when we are putting into effect not a collective agreement but a back to work order in lieu of a contract.

Contract discussions will take place subsequently. There will then be a decision by both parties on a collective agreement or the arbitrator will decide on the terms of the contract. We are in effect writing in a term of a collective agreement which, at least, is misnamed. In my opinion, there is no merit for putting in either the commencement or termination date. If we wish to say that the contract will run until December 31, 1979, that is one thing. Normally we do not set the term of the contract in back to work legislation. In this case we are doing that.

If we are taking away the right of this union to strike up until December 31, 1979, fair enough. However, we are either negotiating a contract to establish a collective agreement on behalf of the workers by legislation, or putting into the act the provision that no strike will take place before the termination date of December 31, 1979. That is considerably different from negotiating the beginning and ending of a collective agreement.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, as I indicated in my speech earlier today the main reason for this is to prevent an early recurrence of the present situation and to ensure, if possible, uninterrupted postal service during the transition period of the planned conversion of the post office to a Crown corporation.

The current collective agreement that we are discussing is one that will normally end at the end of the current year. We are dealing with this legislation today, in the middle of October. In order for the mediator-arbitrator to at least try to have genuine mediation take place, we feel we should give him a certain period of time to bring the parties together and try to mediate, if possible, particular clauses of the settlement.

This legislation states that if for certain reasons the mediation is not successful, this person will no longer act as a mediator but as an arbitrator in order to deal with the unresolved questions. In order for this mediator-arbitrator to do a fair job, we are giving him three months. That takes us into the early part of 1979.

We believe that extending the agreement to the end of 1979 will, as I said earlier, create a good climate for 1979 while parliament during the course of that year passes legislation to turn the post office into a Crown corporation. Another good reason for this extension is to allow the mediator-arbitrator some time to carry out his assignment and allow some time for the resulting collective agreement terms to take effect.

I appreciate that it is an unusual measure, an extraordinary measure in certain respects. However, I do not think it would be correct to ask parliament to pass such a provision at this time for an agreement that would be terminated in just a few weeks. This is why we recommend that the current collective agreement be extended to December 31, 1979.

I want it to be clearly understood that the mediator-arbitrator will not be subject to the anti-inflation clause for the year 1979. He will obviously be assisting the parties in a mediation role, trying to bring about a mutual agreement. If he cannot succeed, then he will assume his latter role of an arbitrator and recommend clauses that will be binding on both parties.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I can only guess because I have not been involved in any of the negotiations, but it is my understanding that the parties were negotiating a one-year contract back in July, 1977. One of the parties, either the union or the post office, may have wanted a two-year contract, but that is part of the negotiations. If we throw in another 15-month period, or it will be a period of 30 months, much of which is retroactive, we will then be making proposals for a three-year rather than a one and a half-year contract.

This seems to be related to clause 8 which applies to the AIB. We were assured by the Minister of Finance that none of this would apply after the end of this year. However, it is obviously going to apply if we negotiate a three-year contract instead of a one-year contract.

I am not familiar with what the two parties were negotiating. However, by this clause we are setting the terms of the contract, what the length of it will be and so on.

May I call it six o'clock?

The Chairman: Order, please. It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock tonight.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, before the dinner hour we were discussing clause 5 which appears in the bill under the heading "Collective agreement" and carries the description "Term of collective agreement extended".

It is not unusual for the terms of a contract to be extended for a short period. This particular agreement ran out in July of 1977, I am told, and negotiations have been going on to the present time, the fall of 1978. Thus, a year and several months have gone by. In some cases when a contract has been extended we have specified that an agreement had to be reached within a certain period. The bill before us does say there has to be an agreement or at least a report on the terms of an agreement within 90 days. That would normally be within the terms of the contract agreed to under this type of legislation; anything beyond it would have to be worked out by the parties themselves, possibly with respect to a longer period. In this case though, we are in effect writing in the termination date of the contract.

There are those who would argue that the terms of the contract under this collective agreement should go beyond 1979 and that it might be possible to get a contract which would last considerably longer. I am told there is a willingness on the part of the workers to see it to run for a longer period, especially if they are able to get protection under that contract, something they have not enjoyed up to the present.

I am concerned that we should be negotiating the length of the contract. The minister intimated that we as politicians and legislators are looking to the establishment of a different form of administration for the post office, probably some type of Crown corporation. Most of us would agree there is likely to be great difficulty in the way of establishing a satisfactory Crown corporation given the present atmosphere and the present attitudes of both management and workers. If there is to be a Crown corporation we must be in the position to guarantee peace in the post office over a period of time and it might be as well to extend the contract beyond 1979.

Normally when a conciliation board or a mediator deals with a labour-management problem involving collective bargaining they do not go beyond the terms which were established before they were asked to intervene. In other words, the collective bargaining unit is not allowed to add new demands and the company is not allowed to reduce the value of what it had offered.

We are talking now about a contract which the bargaining agent probably drew up early in 1977. It is usual to begin negotiations two months before the contract expires, so I presume these demands by the union were made in March, April or May. I take it also that the union was negotiating a year's contract, a contract which would have expired in July of 1978. Even if it had been a two-year contract it would have been due to expire in July of 1979. We are asked to extend it for a further three months but the union has not been allowed to put in any submissions to cover a three-year contract. For this reason I am reluctant to see established by law a continuation of the contract on the basis of proposals put forward under the assumptions the agreement would end on July 1, 1978.

You, Mr. Chairman, as an old trade unionist bargaining on behalf of your fellow workers are well aware that in some cases disputes make it impossible to sign a contract; sometimes the year for which the contract is being negotiated goes by without an agreement being signed. In one case in which I was involved I remember giving the company a bargain, though I did not wish to become known for that. I said: What will you give me for a contract today? They offered considerably less than they had done a short while earlier, but to their surprise I accepted their proposals. What they did not realize was that I was already in the process of preparing our demands for a second contract and the proposals we were making in that contract sure made up for the first.

If the negotiations cover the one-year period of the contract, they will not really cover the proposals which might be put in. We are obviously talking about other proposals.

I would not be opposed to this clause if the minister were to withdraw the words "collective agreement" and put in something else, because I do not disagree with the proposition that we must try to obtain peace for at least the period of transition to a Crown corporation. The date does not seem to me to be unreasonable, but it seems to me that we are using legislation to make people negotiate a two and a half-year contract instead of a one-year contract, the proposals being the same as if it were a one-year contract. I think my friend, who has also had some experience in the labour movement, is aware that there will be a hardship unless we make some change either now or in the clause which will allow those things to go before the arbitrator or the mediator. It seems to me that we are imposing an undue penalty on the union because of the use of this termination date, and I would like the minister to indicate whether he would consider changing the wording in order to remove what seems to me to be a hardship.

We are adding an additional year and a half, and it seems to me that that is unfair. Let us look at it from a trade union's point of view. It is predicted that this year the cost of living will go up 10.5 per cent. If the union negotiator is negotiating a contract, he will ask for an increase of at least 10.5 per cent. Last year the increase was perhaps only 9 per cent, but negotiators put these amounts in because those are the predictions the government itself makes. If unions do not want to lose, they must at least get an increase which corresponds with the cost of living. We are talking about a period in which there will be a considerable increase in the cost of living, but that is not being considered because through legislation we are extending the life of the contract.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, earlier today I explained to the hon. member the reason we are suggesting the extension to include the year 1979. The hon. member is obviously right when he says that the original collective agreement would have covered the period from July 1, 1977, to December 1, 1978, and I explained why it was felt that it would be better to extend the period to December 31, 1979. There is a desire to create the best climate possible during the period in which the post office becomes a Crown corporation. I am glad to see that the hon. member agrees with this objective.

There is another element which must be taken into consideration. In a very few days the union will be in a position to serve notice of new demands for the current collective agreement not yet agreed to. Therefore, the union could be in the hypothetical position of being able to serve notice of its new demands for the next collective agreement while the current one has not finally been dealt with and while the mediator-arbitrator will still be subject to his mandate under this legislation. That is why it was felt that it was better to have this extension to December 31, 1979.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, the minister probably said it better than I did. If we look at another clause of this bill, we find that it would appoint a mediator-arbitrator. The minister's advisers have had more experience than perhaps the minister and I put together, but I cannot see how it would be possible to put in a new set of proposals in the middle. I can foresee that causing an impossible situation for the arbitrator. Because of this legislation and because of there being an arbitrator one might have a chance to ask for the kitchen sink and have the arbitrator at least look at the request.

I just warn the minister that it would be much better to change the wording from "collective agreement" so that there will be a period during which this union will be prohibited from taking any strike action, without playing around with the terms of the agreement itself. There probably are lots of them, but I know of no case in which, after a labour dispute was on, management has ever allowed a union to include proposals for another year's negotiations while still negotiating the first contract. I think that would create chaos in negotiations. The arbitrator would be worried about whether he was handling the first set of proposals or the second set; to all intents and purposes he would have to handle two sets of proposals. But I am sure that is not what we want to do here. I think we want to settle this dispute on a reasonable, legislative basis, but we also want to make it impossible, for the purposes of the transitional period, for this union to have the right to strike.

I should think that the date could be December 31, 1979, but as long as we refer to a collective agreement, I fear that other proposals not yet considered might have to be considered in trying to settle this dispute. It is hard to say what those proposals might be, but I think we have enough difficulty without creating more.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I think the hon. member and I both see the difficulties, but the advice of experts who know much more than I do is that the only way to obtain peace is to extend the collective agreement and to establish a fixed date. That is the course that it is suggested we follow.

Mr. Peters: But they will also agree that we are not talking about the original one-year contract. We are talking about a considerably extended contract. The proposition put forward by the minister about having a second set of proposals would have to be dealt with in the legislation and made possible by the legislation.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, there are just a couple of points I want to make on this clause.

Mr. Fraser: We have worked all day. You just got here.

Mr. Rodriguez: If you have worked all day, I am surprised that you have not seen some very obvious things. I want to point out to the minister that the collective agreement will end on December 31, 1979. If the employees and the employer continue negotiations on a new contract, not on the one being imposed by the arbitrator as set up in this bill, then in effect they should be covered by some collective agreement. In other words, the rights and privileges they enjoy under the collective agreement should not end on December 31, 1979. If they try to establish a contract after that date, they should be covered under the provisions of the previous contract or agreement.

● (2022)

With that in mind I would like to move an amendment to clause 5 as follows:

That clause 5 of Bill C-8 be amended by adding at the end thereof the following words:

"It shall then continue to be in full force and effect until the signing of a new collective agreement or until seven days have elapsed after receipt of a report from a conciliation board for the renewal of the collective agreement."

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: The committee has heard the amendment of the hon. member for Nickel Belt. Is the committee ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Amendment (Mr. Rodriguez) negatived: Yeas, 8; nays, 42.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 5 carry?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, it seems reasonable to me to have expected the minister, if he thought the amendment out of place or if he had a reason for thinking the amendment did not hold water, to rise and give some response to my proposal. Surely one has reason to expect, when workers are negotiating a new contract, for it to be spelled out very clearly that they are covered under some sort of agreement. What we were trying to do was to write in a logical and obvious provision that workers should be covered under the previous collective agreement until such time as they sign a new agreement. It seems to me to be a reasonable suggestion and I wonder whether what has just happened is not another display of the kind of haughty attitude taken by the Post Office Department; I noticed that the minister did not even rise to reply to what I think is a reasonable proposal. Surely when workers enter into negotiations for a contract, in that hiatus period they should be covered by the provisions of the previous contract.

This attitude does not surprise me because we saw the same kind of attitude displayed when this parliament was asked to decide on Bill C-45, a piece of legislation which took away the right to strike from the inside postal workers during an election period. Lo and behold a bill was thrown together hastily and rushed into the House. It was only after we, on this side of the House, had read the bill that we recognized immediately that the workers were left without the coverage of any collective agreement. While that may be fine and dandy for management, it certainly did not provide any sense of security for those who have to live under the provisions of a collective agreement.

It seems to me that I have spotted the same sort of gap in this bill as existed in Bill C-45 at that time. I think the minister owes this House and owes the post office workers an explanation. After all, we are forcing them into compulsory arbitration which they will have to abide by until December 31, 1979. I think the minister owes an explanation to the workers and to the public because, as I have said often enough, you can take a horse to drink, but you cannot make it water.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rodriguez: I like it the way I said it! That is the way they run the Post Office. It would appear to me that this sort of attitude needs an explanation from the minister. We want to know why the Liberals and the Tories react like trained seals.

The same old gang stood up and voted against what appeared to be a reasonable proposition. I hope the minister will explain.

Mr. Ouellet: The proposal put forward by the hon. member was a hasty amendment. He came to see me at the start of the proceedings and showed me his amendment. I indicated to him that such an amendment was unnecessary because the legislation was already quite clear on this. It is probably true that I should have risen and, immediately following the reading of the amendment, given a reply. Unfortunately, I was looking at some documents and the proceedings went by quickly when the vote took place. I apologize to the hon. member for not having risen in my seat and explained to the House that section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act covers the intent of the hon. member's amendment. The hon. member has no reason to fear that after that period elaspses the employees are left with nothing. The matter is totally covered in the act; he can find it at page 29 of the act.

● (2032)

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I should like to have this clause stood. The minister has agreed that what we are doing is in fact changing the length of the contract. He has indicated there would obviously be a period during which new contract proposals under normal circumstances could be presented and referred to the mediator-arbitrator or whatever. After reading the clause over I do not think that is possible. What will be referred to arbitration are those matters in dispute that were referred to the conciliation board. It refers to issues remaining in dispute between the employees and the employer at the date of the appointment.

This really touches upon one of the problems unions have in that they are of the opinion that all the important matters were not referred to arbitration in the first place, and they would like to have these matters referred. This part does not indicate that those things or issues are to be thrown in as matters of dispute. We are now talking about the change in time of the one-year contract. As I see it, unless we amend clause 6 this will not happen and those important matters in dispute will not be referred. I would not like to lose the opportunity of curtailing the length of the contract, but not the length of the peace. If we are going to attempt the Crown corporation idea I would like to see the length of peace extended until that time, and then let the parties fight it out in the normal way. I would not like to see an extension of the time of the contract because that is not what we are considering.

If the minister's suggestion could be written into the bill so that new proposals could be added, that would cover the situation; but I think this must be done in respect of clause 6. I would like to have clause 5 stood because it hinges on what we describe or indicate as the matters to be referred to the board for an extended length of time. If additional matters can be referred, then I guess it will be okay; but if they cannot I would like to be in a position to oppose this. Therefore, I would ask that clause 5 be stood.

[Mr. Rodriguez.]

The Deputy Chairman: Is it agreed that clause 5 shall stand?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, there is something in respect of clause 5 I would like clarified. The minister said that the provision for the extension of the collective agreement is covered under section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, it is my opinion that clause 5 was stood.

The Deputy Chairman: There was not unanimous consent to stand clause 5.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I was just trying to get some clarification. The minister said the provision for extending the collective agreement while the employer and employees were negotiating a new agreement was covered in Section 51 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. This is also covered in 40.02 of the collective agreement between the post office and CUPW. This whole question is in dispute. In fact, that is one of the issues on which the arbitrator will have to make some sort of decision. If he is to make some sort of decision in respect of 40.02, this may very well affect the extension of the collective agreement while the workers are trying to negotiate a new contract or new agreement. This is why we felt the amendment we proposed would spell out very clearly what was intended, so there would be no opportunity whatsoever for misunderstanding in respect of the coverage of the collective agreement while the new contract was being negotiated.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall clause 5 carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Clause agreed to.

On clause 6—Appointment of mediator-arbitrator

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Chairman, it appears to me that in clause 6 we are introducing a new concept, the meaning of which I perhaps fail to grasp. I refer to the concept of mediator-arbitrator. Since I have not seen this provision in any other legislation—and perhaps I am not thoroughly informed in this regard—I wonder if the minister could explain it to me. It may well appear in other legislation, but how does he reconcile the two hats this party must wear, the one of the mediator and the one of the arbitrator? Could the minister explain what exactly are the parameters of this position?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the mediator-arbitrator concept is not brand new but has been in existence for many years, perhaps six, seven or eight. It has been used more often in the United States than in Canada. This approach has been used recently in Canada in relation to the longshoremen's settlement in the port of Montreal. It has also been used on three occasions in western Canada in respect of the grain handlers. It is called mediation-arbitration, and it is a procedure whereby the parties arm a very skilled mediator with the power of an arbitrator, to be used if necessary.

The most important factor of this concept is that labour and management, while parties to an arbitration proceeding, still have the opportunity to carry on with the negotiation process. It seems to me there is great potential for this technique in situations where the parties realize that a strike will result in severe adverse effects on a country or on a community, and will in fact inflict more punishment on the public than on a party to the dispute. I must say that this dispute would come within that category.

This is obviously a relatively new concept and is not something that is used normally. However, it is a concept that allows parties having difficulty in arriving at negotiated settlements to receive the help of a third party who acts as mediator. He is a person who tries to obtain the co-operation of the parties to the dispute in arriving at a collective agreement. This third party is armed with clout in the sense that the third party is a person active in the course of the mediation taking place between the parties.

The parties must always remember in discussing aspects of the collective agreement that if they do not agree or do not furnish substantial evidence or do not argue successfully their case on why they advocate a clause or reject a demand the mediator will act later on in the process as an arbitrator, keeping in mind the positions advanced by both parties and rendering a decision which will be binding on both parties.

It is a new technique in Canada, but it is a technique that has been very helpful and useful in many respects in disputes in the United States. It is a technique which has become more and more useful in Canada, and we think that it will serve very well in the circumstances we are facing now.

Mr. Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the minister's answers. Will this mediator-arbitrator which according to clause 6(1) will be appointed by the minister, be one who will be acceptable to both parties? In other words, will you be naming or appointing this person subject to consultation with the other parties?

Mr. Ouellet: Yes. Before appointing such a person, there will be consultations with the two parties.

Mr. Fraser: Clause 6(1) of the bill says:

> The Minister of Labour shall, forthwith after the coming into force of this act, appoint a mediator-arbitrator—

It seems to me there is an inconsistency here. The minister has said that there will be consultation. I am wondering what he means by forthwith, and I am wondering if the minister can assure the House that the government already has someone in mind. I would be very surprised if we had reached this stage without some thought as to who might be doing the job. I would also like to know if the minister could tell us how long we would have to wait before the mediator-arbitrator is actually appointed.

Mr. Ouellet: The government does have in mind certain persons, but I would not like to volunteer a specific time for the nomination. I will be acting as quickly as possible to proceed with consultations tonight if this bill is passed, or at the latest tomorrow morning, but I am in the hands of the person that will accept this job. Indeed, hon. members can understand the task that is ahead for the chosen mediator-arbitrator, and I cannot assure the House that I will be in a position to appoint someone immediately in the minutes following the passing of this bill; but I will undertake the appointment of someone in the hours following the passing of this bill.

Mr. Hogan: I would like to introduce an amendment to clause 6 of this bill:

> That clause 6 of Bill C-8 be amended by deleting lines 40 to 44 on page 2 and lines 1 to 5 on page 3, and by substituting therefor the following words,
> "are in dispute between the employee association and the employer."

If such an amendment were introduced it would improve the possibility of getting better mediation.

Mr. Alexander: I would like to be advised, Mr. Chairman, as to what the hon. member is really talking about, which is the usual practice in this House. I hope that he will have the courtesy to pass over copies of his proposed amendment so that we may give it the attention which I know that he thinks it deserves. I do not mean to be facetious, but we should have a look at it so that we will know what the hon. member is attempting to do.

The Deputy Chairman: I would like to suggest to the hon. member that that is not a point of order but a point of debate.

Mr. Ouellet: I think that I understand the proposal made by the hon. member, Mr. Chairman. I appreciate that he is repeating what has been echoed earlier by the hon. member for Timiskaming, that some aspects of the discussions between the employer and the employees have not been referred to the conciliation board chairman. Indeed, this is quite true. It is the union's contention that there are a number of issues which they would like to see dealt with that have not been referred to the conciliation board by the public service staff relations board.

The reason the PSSRB has not referred these issues to Mr. Courtemanche is that they are items which are outside the jurisdiction of the board. They may be items which are very legitimate for unions under the Canadian Labour Code and which could eventually be considered after parliament has approved a bill turning the Post Office Department into a Crown corporation, but until the employees of the post office are working under a Crown corporation, they cannot entertain some of the items they would like to see referred to Mr. Courtemanche for the conciliation board findings. We are no more in a position to deal with this issue today than the PSSRB was when they referred it to the chairman of the conciliation board.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, just to be perfectly clear, the minister has used the word "some" of the items fall outside the purview of the bill. Is he saying that none of these contentious issues that the union has raised can be dealt with by the mediator-arbitrator as set forth in this bill, or is he saying that some of them cannot be? I would like a precise answer to that.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that someone will correct me in this statement if I am wrong. It is my understanding that all the issues that could be entertained by the Public Service Staff Relations Act that apply to the current collective agreement and that the union wants dealt with, were referred to the conciliation board chairman. Those issues that were not referred were those that in the mind of Mr. Brown, the chairman, of the PSSRB, were outside the jurisdiction of the board and therefore not referred to Mr. Courtemanche.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Chairman, in the debate this afternoon we heard about the findings of the many royal commissions and inquiries into the difficulties in the post office, about the number of grievances and outstanding disputes that have not been resolved. The minister is arguing for this bill on the grounds that it will bring peace or some stability to negotiations in the post office until December 31, 1979, yet I heard him admit tonight that there are serious and contentious issues that this arbitrator will not be able to deal with.

I have difficulty with his argument that this legislation will bring some stability to management-worker relations considering the fact that some of these long outstanding and contentious issues will not be examined by the arbitrator. I see a contradiction here and I worry that even with this legislation the bad feelings, grievances and frustrations will remain and so will our problems. That is why my colleague, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, was trying to broaden the scope of the bill. We do not have a list of the grievances or a precise definition of the act. I cannot see that the arbitrator would not have the scope to deal with them. Could the minister give us some more details and explain what I see as a contradiction?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member is right in indicating that there are a number of non-bargainable items that the union would have liked to bargain at this time. They are non-bargainable because under the PSSRB they are considered like this. This is one of the reasons it has been said that the post office should become a Crown corporation and that the employees would rather be under the Canada Labour Code and no longer subject to the more restrictive labour relations provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

We indicated that the bill that would create a Crown corporation will be presented in parliament as soon as possible, perhaps in the early months of the current session. That would mean that by the middle of next year we would have a Crown corporation.

If we do not extend the terms of the current collective agreement before a Crown corporation is established we could be faced with two labour disputes in the post office—the one we are facing now and a potential dispute similar to this some time next year, perhaps coinciding with the passage of a bill to create a Crown corporation or perhaps just before the establishment of this Crown corporation. It was felt that in the best interests of everybody, particularly in the best interests of the public, we should take measures in this parliament to make sure there would not be another postal dispute in the days preceding or coinciding with the creation of a Crown corporation.

I think it is extremely important that we recognize that some of the items important to the union ought to be dealt with, unfortunately for them not at this time but when they will be negotiating their new collective agreement with a Crown corporation. At that time the union would be in a position to negotiate all of those items that they consider important. I accept their judgment on this. They will then be in a position to negotiate them. At the present time they are non-bargainable but would become bargainable in the next collective agreement after the creation of a Crown corporation.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, I fail to see the minister's argument. What he is really doing is proposing not the resolution of one dispute but looking forward to another when the post office Crown corporation act is brought in. It seems to be that the purpose of any legislation of this kind should be to resolve the dispute between the employees and the employer. This is so narrowed down to certain specific rules that it makes it difficult for any arbitrator, mediator or employee association to get their teeth into what has to be resolved. Surely they cannot act in good faith if they are hampered by certain rules. Certainly this parliament must be over that board to which the minister referred. We make legislation here and we should make legislation which is able to resolve or help resolve situations between an employer and employee for all times.

I think the proposal made by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond makes sense. If we are acting in good faith as parliamentarians, surely we want to resolve this matter. We cannot go in with our hands dirty, realizing we are not giving the mediator the full powers he should have. I suggest the amendment is a proper one if we are to act in good faith as parliamentarians.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I think all hon. members should keep something in mind: this legislation is before us because there is a very difficult situation which has existed for a long time. I am not going to take the time of the House to throw brickbats tonight about why that legislation is so bad.

In response to the hon. member for Moncton, I must say that there is noway in the world that this emergency type of legislation, imperfect as it is, will solve all the problems of the post office. This legislation is only in front of us because we have an awful mess. I am anxious that it be passed so that there can be a resumption of service for the Canadian public. The question of how we solve all the difficulties in the post office is too complex for us to tackle tonight.

I say this in fairness to the acting minister of labour and his colleague, the Postmaster General. This bill has not been brought in front of us tonight in order to solve the problems of the Post Office. What the minister has said is that in view of the length of time this collective agreement will last, this legislation might help to achieve some of the things the government has in mind and which have been urged upon it by this party.

I urge all hon. members not to lose sight of the fact that tonight we are dealing with a situation which is almost out of control. The purpose of the legislation in front of us is to resume postal service to the public at the same time as arriving at a fair settlement of the dispute between the inside workers and the employer. It is not intended to be legislation designed to solve all the problems in the Post Office. I ask all hon. members to keep this in mind.

Mr. Hogan: The hon. member for Vancouver South is a good friend of most of us in the House. He should not let this matter go to his head. We are as interested as he in restoring the postal service and solving the problems. But these problems cannot be solved by a band-aid. We must remember the associated problems. It is our duty to attempt to receive explanations from the minister. In the process of doing that, perhaps we will take an extra hour. But is that not part of the democratic process? Should we push everything through and then find out later on that we made a bigger mess? It is our duty to do more than solve the difficulties in the short run.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, the point made by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is an important one. I found it somewhat difficult to comprehend the comments of the hon. member for Vancouver South, that we should run legislation which will somehow or other result in peace in the Post Office through the mill tonight.

Mr. Alexander: He did not say that.

Mr. Rodriguez: I do not think hon. members realize the importance of this legislation. We are dealing with 23,000 law abiding employees of the Crown. Surely it is the responsibility of hon. members not to precipitate the situation where law abiding citizens find themselves in the position of breaking the law of the land. It is not just a matter of passing legislation and ordering CUPW back to work tomorrow. I do not have to remind the House of the comments made in the press, which comments recommended that workers disobey the law of the land. Therefore it behooves us to take as much time as is necessary to include clauses which will ameliorate much of the dissatisfaction workers would face upon returning to work because of compulsory arbitration.

The amendment of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond is a wise one. There were some issues which PSSRB did not refer to the conciliation board because they were outside the ambit of the negotiations. Can the minister table a list of the particular items which were not passed on to the conciliation board? Was the renegotiation of the technological change clause one of those items? Was overtime one of the items? What about the employment of casuals? If those are some of the items, then we are back to the very crux of the problem. Telling Canadians that what we pass tonight will solve the problems is a pipe dream which Conservatives and Liberals would like to propagate. That only compounds the problem rather than solve it. I am prepared to stay here until six o'clock in the morning. Will he table the list for the benefit of all members? Since we are being asked to legislate compulsory arbitration, will the minister table the list for our benefit?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, indeed the hon. member has a very keen interest in this dispute. Perhaps he should have a look at the report which was published at the time of the reference by the chairman of the public service staff relations board, which reference gave the mandate to the chairman of the conciliation board and which made reference to a number of issues. I asked one of my officials to underline the items in the 85-page document which were not referred because they did not fall under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. That document could be tabled tonight. It is a public document. I doubt the hon. member will have the time to read the entire document. I should like to refer to a few examples of items which were not negotiable under the act, for example, the classifications, the pensions, the staffing and lay-off benefits. These are some examples. That document can be tabled for the benefit of all hon. members.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I am aware of the particular issues which could not be negotiated under the Public Service Staff Relations Act. One problem was the question of technological change and its effect on members of CUPW. As the minister has stated, lay-off and classification of employees were excluded from the negotiations. Because of the technological change clause in the contract, the view of the employees is that the area is opened up. We should have the right to examine and make a decision on this issue. That is what the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond was driving at in his particular amendment.

The minister is very optimistic if he thinks passing this piece of legislation will solve the problem. It does not, because the festering will continue within the Post Office and we have until December 31, 1979, under the agreement brought down by the arbitrator in this legislation. I ask the minister to reconsider his position and to have these matters referred. Let us have peace in the Post Office until such time as we deal with the Crown corporation legislation for the Post Office.

Mr. Ouellet: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, for not being in a position to acquiesce to the suggestion made by the hon. member. I appreciate on some of these points if the employees were under the Canada Labour Code, they could negotiate. However, at the present time Post Office employees are not under the Canada Labour Code.

Postal Services

When the chairman of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, Mr. Brown, prepared the terms of reference of the conciliation board and referred items to the attention of the chairman, Mr. Courtemanche, and the other members of the conciliation board, he precisely indicated those issues which could be referred and those which could not. He indicated the reasons why they could not be heard. We cannot do contrary at the present time.

When this parliament passes legislation to create a Crown corporation, the union will rightfully negotiate a collective agreement in due course under the schemes that apply to Crown corporations and then these items can be the subject for bargaining.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to fight the battle of the inadequacies of the Public Service Staff Relations Act; there will be a time for that. Some of us predicted at the time the bill was passed that excluding subjects such as classification from the union's right to bargain would create problems. I do not want to debate that whole question.

I am concerned about one very important clause in the 1975 agreement. It was probably the most important reason for the strike in 1975. That clause dealt with technological change and the right of the union to discuss that question.

The question I want to ask the minister is very simple; I think he can answer it very easily. When the mediator-arbitrator sits down to deal with the employer and the union, will he have authority to take out of the present agreement the section dealing with technological change? I ask that question because it is no secret that the government representatives, at least those from Treasury Board, were very much opposed to the inclusion of that clause in the agreement. Before I agree to this, I would like to know whether the mediator-arbitrator, if the employer proposes that that section be eliminated or changed in content and if members have less rights, would have that authority.

Mr. Ouellet: My answer is yes, Mr. Chairman. The mediator-arbitrator will have the right to look at this. This subject in fact was referred to the Courtemanche board. It was the subject of some discussion by the conciliation board. Some comment was made by the three members of that board. Indeed, this question can be dealt with by the mediator-arbitrator with full latitude.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I want to give the minister notice that if that is the case, I intend to move an amendment a little later which will make it very clear that the mediator not have that right. I say this to the minister in all sincerity. The union carried on a long and difficult strike to get that clause. They got it through collective bargaining and a legal strike.

I cannot believe the government would be so insane as to bring in legislation with provisions by which the government appoints an arbitrator and gives him the power to do what the governments wants done unilaterally. Nothing could be more contrary to the most fundamental principles of collective bargaining in good faith. Therefore, I give the minister notice that in a few moments I will move an amendment which will deal with that question.

Mr. Ouellet: If I may be permitted, I would like to move a very minor amendment to clause 6 at the top of page 3. It is an error that arose through talking about employee associations rather than employee organizations.

Mr. Alexander: What line?

Mr. Ouellet: The first line.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I do not want it to get confused. I thought there was an amendment by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond before the committee. Maybe we should deal with that before the one by the minister.

The Chairman: Order, please. On the point raised by the hon. member for Nickel Belt, the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond gave notice to the committee of an amendment but he never formally put the amendment to the committee. In any case, the Chairman has not put the question on his amendment to the committee. If it is the wish of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond, I could at this time put the amendment to the committee so that we could dispose of it in one way or another and then consider the amendment of the minister.

Mr. Hogan: I am sorry for that mistake, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, possibly we could dispose of this very minor technical amendment and then continue with the other one. I move:

That clause 6 of Bill C-8 be amended by striking out line 1 on page 3 in the English version and substituting the following:

"employee organization and the employer"

If hon. members refer to the interpretation section on the first page of the bill, they will see that in the definitions, we talk about "employee organizations". On page 3 we should not be talking about employee associations but employee organizations.

The Chairman: I am ready to accept the suggestion of the minister. I want to make sure I have the consent of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond. I will put the amendment to the committee. Mr. Ouellet moves:

That clause 6 of Bill C-8 be amended by striking out line 1 on page 3 in the English version and substituting the following:

"employee organization and the employer"

Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Mr. Hogan: Mr. Chairman, I move:

That clause 6 of Bill C-8 be amended by deleting lines 40 to 44 on page 2 and lines 1 to 5 on page 3, and by substituting therefor the following words:

"are in dispute between the employee association and the employer"

• (2122)

Mr. Peters: This matter has now been raised for the second time. I believe the minister agrees that certain factors ought to be considered. If that is so, attention ought to be given to this clause. It is the government which will be appointing the members of the Public Service Staff Relations Board, so it is the government which will be negotiating, in effect, if this dispute is to be referred in the end to compulsory arbitration. Most hon. members are familiar with the dispute which took place in 1975 having to do with industrial change; it would be most unfair in my view if all the rewards gained by the workers following that dispute were to be taken away.

A few minutes ago, the hon. member for Vancouver South urged us to get on with this item of business because all we were doing was getting the post office workers back to work. Mr. Chairman, the Post Office has not worked for a long time. It takes seven or eight days to put a letter through the Toronto post office with all the machinery there. I see a number of officials in the gallery. They are on holiday, too, laughing and having a great time. They have been on holiday for five or six years in my opinion. We all know that mail service has deteriorated sharply.

It is reasonable, I think, for the public to know that the settlement we are imposing tonight is costing the workers a great deal. They made their proposal for a year's contract ending on July 1, 1978, and now we are extending it for another year and a half on the basis of the same proposals. It is all very well to say the workers should go back to work. We have to ask ourselves at what price, and if the minister is not willing to offer some of the concessions which are being requested and if we as members of parliament are unable to add to these clauses to allow other matters to be discussed in the interest of the employees, we are being very unfair.

I do not always agree with my hon. friend from Nickel Belt—

An hon. Member: Thank God!

Mr. Peters: Thank God on both sides. But in this instance I think he is right. Our objective should be not only to put people back to work in the post office and try to develop a spirit of harmony there; we must also make an effort to be fair and reasonable. We are not doing this.

No concession whatever is being made to the workers. After all, they have gone through the process of deciding whether they will take the strike route or the route of mediation or arbitration. They have made a legal choice. The union has done all the things it is asked to do and its members are now in a legal position to strike. Yet everything in this legislation is weighted on the other side. We are not taking into account the unfairness of the bargaining position. The minister is in a position, if he wishes, to provide a reasonable settlement as far as the workers are concerned, a contract covering three years. Maybe common sense does not prevail here either. It seems to me there are clauses in this bill which should be amended if it is really our wish to arrive at a settlement which would place the post office in a position to carry on delivering the mail. Let us not make it inevitable that other action should take place in the post office which would be to the detriment of the public.

We could be exceedingly unfair to one side by way of legislation. By legislating high wages, as we have done once or twice in the past, the Post Office might have to double the price of a postage stamp. I remember that we legislated an increase of 30 cents in order to settle a strike on the seaway a number of years ago, and we started the whole inflation mess. If we are going to be unfair, we can expect those who are unfairly treated to react, and that would not be conducive to peace in the postal structure.

In fairness to the people concerned can we not give some consideration to allowing additional items to be added, as recommended in my colleague's motion? If that is not possible, can we not take away something which will be detrimental and costly to the employees of the post office? We are in a position to do that. As legislators we are in a position to be unfair as well, but it seems to me that it would be better for us to err on the side of fairness and justice than to err on the side of satisfying some civil servants who feel that some of the gains made by way of a previous strike should not have been allowed and who are now in a position to arbitrate them away.

Mr. Jones: Mr. Chairman, in all fairness, particularly in view of some of the remarks made by the minister and others in this House previously about the government's intention to introduce legislation to make the post office and its facilities a Crown corporation very shortly, and in order to permit a proper continuity and a proper transitional period for postal services in this country, through the present system and when incorporated as a Crown corporation, I ask the minister why the Canada Labour Code could not be considered to apply to the employees and to the mediation and arbitration process, just for the purposes of this act. Parliament is supreme. Surely we are still supreme, and surely this legislation should be considered transitional legislation for the purposes of continuity in changing the Post Office Department into a Crown agency.

I think there would be legitimate and good reason for doing that and for covering the whole thing in one batch. There should be one dispute, and it should be resolved once and for all. That seems like a fair question to me, and I hope that the minister will answer it positively and in the affirmative.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I see the obvious good intention of the hon. member, and if it was possible to bring everything under this legislation and once and for all to settle the dispute and the difficulties in the post office, I would obviously go along with him. If we could through one piece of legislation settle everything, that would be ideal, but the consequences could be numerous in the sense that we are dealing with a collective agreement which has its origins in 1977. We are almost at the end of 1978, and we expect to create, through legislation in parliament, a Crown corporation with will change the status of those who will be working in that Crown corporation.

However, there is no certainty that either the hon. member or I could give to the public of Canada, to other employees who are employed under the provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and to our colleagues in the House of Commons that this Crown corporation will indeed be created. We are all going in that direction, and that is why I say that in the first collective agreement which will take place after the creation of the Crown corporation some of these items could then be considered. I appreciate the good will of the hon. member for Moncton, who does not want to see some clauses or items which were turned down by the chairman of the public service staff relations board brought in at this time.

I can understand the good will of the hon. member, but I must say that his good will is premature.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia:

That the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again later this day.

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 6(5)(a) I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Goodale):

That the House continue to sit this day until all stages of Bill C-8, to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, have been disposed of.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Do I understand from the motion of the hon. parliamentary secretary that he wishes the House and the committee to proceed to all stages of the bill?

Mr. Pinard: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: At first glance I would have difficulty accepting the motion of the hon. parliamentary secretary. Standing Order 6(5)(a) provides that a motion could be put to permit the House to sit beyond the ordinary hours of daily adjournment for the purpose of considering a special item of business or stages thereof, subject to certain conditions. However, I do not think this Standing Order allows me to accept a motion which goes against Standing Order 72. The House has already agreed, by unanimous consent, to proceed to two stages of Bill C-8 today. Standing Order 72 provides that every bill shall receive three separate readings, on different days, previously to being passed. My interpretation of that is that Standing Order 72 forbids acceptance by the Chair of such a motion.

To my mind, the only way the motion proposed by the hon. parliamentary secretary could be acceptable would be if unanimous consent were given to allow third reading. However, as far as the committee stage is concerned, that is acceptable.

[Mr. Ouellet.]

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, may I draw your attention to Standing Order 75(14) which refers I suppose to the general principle as laid out in Standing Order 72 which stipulates that a bill shall not be read more than once on the same day and provides that when a bill is reported from a committee of the whole as it is now the case a motion can be made that the bill be now read a third time and passed. So that Standing Order 75(14) be logical, Mr. Speaker, it is essential for a bill reported from a committee of the whole, with or without amendment, that we accept that third reading be made the same day. In my opinion, it would be an exception to Standing Order 72.

If you agree with this interpretation which seems to be the proper one to be used on such occasion, the main motion would be receivable. If not, I have no objection to your asking for the unanimous consent of the House so that we could proceed with all the stages of the bill and should anyone dare oppose it, we will know who.

[English]

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not think we need to get into a procedural hassle over all of this. It is perfectly obvious that we in this party are doing our best to make improvements in this bill, but it is not our intention to put any procedural blocks in the way of the House dealing with the bill tonight if it wishes to do so. If the government were to ask for unanimous consent to complete the bill tonight, giving us a chance to move amendments to other clauses in committee of the whole, I believe the government would find that so far as we are concerned there would be that unanimous consent and this procedural battle could end.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, following this wonderful surprise, I think that the problem is solved and that there is unanimous consent to dispose tonight of all stages of the bill.

[English]

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of our party I would like to say that I join in the expression of unanimous consent to all stages of the bill being considered today, as we have agreed earlier in the day.

There is one small item before we move on into the hours beyond ten o'clock, and that is the question of the vote which was scheduled—and which is indeed on the order paper—on the motion moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and seconded by myself with respect to the throne speech debate. There have been some discussions on the matter. We do not want to demand that the vote be taken now because we recognize the necessity of dealing with the post office bill. I hope there will be consent in the House to putting that vote over until just before orders of the day are called tomorrow afternoon so that we could deal with it at that time. Then if there are any further discussions to take place regarding the arrangement of the debate on the Speech from the Throne, we could deal with that at that time.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, in fact I have spoken about this matter to all the House leaders and there seems to be an agreement to postponing the vote until tomorrow afternoon after question period. And unless we are otherwise advised, we will deal with the fifth day of the debate on the Speech from the Throne tomorrow.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Let us dispose of the last matter first. Is there agreement that the vote, which was to be taken tonight, be postponed until tomorrow?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Translation]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the suggestion by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) that the House agrees to sit beyond the regular hours in order to complete all stages in the consideration of Bill C-8?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, you mentioned inadvertently that this was the suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. However the motion stands in my name, and I understand that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is agreeable to it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I did not put a motion to the House, I have merely put a suggestion made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who proposed to proceed by unanimous consent so that the Chair will not to have to make such an important decision tonight.

Having said that, the House must now resume consideration of Bill C-8, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services, in committee of the whole.

[English]

The House resumed consideration in committee of the whole of Bill C-8, an act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services—Mr. Ouellet—Mr. Laniel in the chair.

The Chairman: When the committee rose, clause 6 was under consideration. There was an amendment to that clause. Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Hogan) negatived: Yeas, 11; nays, 73.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I should like to move the following amendment to clause 6:

Postal Services

That clause 6(3) of Bill C-8 be amended by deleting line 26 on page 3 and substituting therefor the following:

"(3) Sections 68, 69, subsections 70(2), 70(3), 71(3) and sec-"

The rest must be read as it now stands in the bill before us.

[English]

The reason for these changes is that when we were drafting the bill—and I hope hon. members will be indulgent—it was prepared in great haste and unfortunately there has been some error in indicating the appropriate clauses. I would like to have them corrected, with the consent of the committee.

● (2152)

Mr. Alexander: I have just a couple of points for clarification, Mr. Chairman. The bill when first drafted had only two subclauses. Now the two subclauses which were originally referred to in the bill are being wiped out and we are introducing four new subclauses. Perhaps the minister will just follow along with me in that regard. We have now added sections 68, 69, subsections 70(2), 70(3) and 71(3). We have now wiped out subsection 71(3) which was originally in the bill.

What I want to know is how to follow this through in terms of looking at the bill as it was originally drafted. I do not think the explanation given was quite sufficient. The minister said he had to prepare the bill in a hurry, and we understand that, but I think the minister should explain to the committee what he is attempting to do and what this clause deals with in the new form. Last but not least, given the fact that the minister has had a considerable time to study this bill, would he now indicate if there are any other errors that have been brought to the minister's attention? I ask this for the edification of the committee because, knowing how this government operates, I am sure there must be one or two other changes. He might as well let us know what other boobs he has made.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the hon. member is saying this in good spirit.

Mr. Alexander: In a facetious way.

Mr. Ouellet: I want to make the thing quite clear. The bill in its first version, which we have before us, refers to sections 70, subsection 71(3), sections 72 and 74. The amendment means we will be including or adding sections 68 and 69. We are retaining section 70, but not all of that section. We are retaining subsection (2), and subsection (3) of section 70. We are not changing subsection 71(3). It remains. We obviously do not change either subsection 70(2) or 70(4). In other words, we are adding only two sections. Those two sections are the ones that allow the parties to be heard, as provided for in section 79 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and allow the factors to be taken into account by the board as covered under section 68 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act. This is intended to make sure we have the proper numbers. I apologize to members of this committee for the error, but I think it is much clearer in this way.

The hon. member indicated that he would like to know if there are other changes to be made at a later date. There is one other minor change to be made. At the top of page 4 he will see a slight difference between the English and French texts where in fact the number "3" has been left out in the French text. The second line of clause 8 on page 4 reads in part "established pursuant to subsection 3(2)". We forgot to include in the French text that figure "3". In the French we talk about "le paragraphe 3". That is the only other change I want to make, and when we come to clause 8 I will ask the committee to entertain that amendment.

[Translation]

The Chairman: Order. On the last point, I doubt that an amendment need be moved. It deals with an editing correction which the Chair can attend to automatically; no amendment is required.

[English]

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, in the last 25 years we have seen a tremendous change in many industries in this country. I would remind the acting minister that in the mid-1960's, and the assistant deputy minister will remember this very well, we had a work stoppage on the CPR because the CPR unilaterally decided to extend the runs of engineers. This led to the appointment of Mr. Justice Freedman who held hearings on the matter and made some important and profound recommendations in respect of technological changes, some of which we have still not accepted.

The minister knows that in the city of Montreal the longshoremen's industry has changed dramatically as a result of the introduction of containerization. This has led to a very sharp decline in the number of longshoremen. The printing industry is also experiencing an industrial revolution because of the use of computers in the place of the old typographical machines.

There is no one change that concerns working people more than technological change. I thought we were dealing here with a bill which would give the mediator-arbitrator the authority to settle many of the questions that have not been agreed to by the post office and postal workers, such as the hourly rate of pay, the number of hours, rest periods and so on. Although I do not like this legislation and said we would vote against it, I was prepared to debate the matter today without a great deal of heat or rhetoric. I was shocked, therefore, to hear the minister indicate a moment ago that the mediator-arbitrator would have the authority to deal with clauses of the present agreement relating to technological change.

I do not want to make a long speech, but we are facing legislation on the first day of a strike. Somehow in 1978 we cannot have a strike in the post office that lasts more than one day. Back in 1975 we had a strike that lasted 43 days, and at that time the minister and the government said they were prepared to let it go on even longer.

One of the most important issues, if not the most important, in that earlier dispute related to the matter of technological change. As a result of that strike the workers obtained the right to negotiate when technological change took place. It may be that this is not working very well as far as the employer is concerned, and I do not think it is working well as far as the employees are concerned. In any event, there is a right of negotiation in respect of technological change.

Now the minister tells us that the mediator-arbitrator will have the right to deal with this because the Public Service Staff Relations Board will have this matter as one that can be negotiated. Let us be realistic. We are passing legislation which gives the government the right to appoint the mediator-arbitrator. That is not a three-man board on which the employees have a representative, as they do on conciliation boards. This is a one-man board with the full power to settle these questions, and that one member is to be appointed by the government. Then another arm of the government, the Treasury Board, together with the Post Office Department, will appear before the arbitrator and argue that the clause in the agreement which was arrived at after a 43-day strike should be eliminated. If that happens, who could blame the workers if they felt that they had been dealt with by a kangaroo court?

If that is what this section provides and if that is the decision which the arbitrator will make, then in January of 1980 we will have another postal strike, and whoever is in parliament at that time will have to deal with it. I would urge the minister to use some common sense. Therefore, I propose an amendment which I think will take care of this difficulty and which is inherent in the legislation as it is written. I move:

That clause 6(1) be amended on page 3 at line 13, by adding immediately after the word "thereof" the following words:

"provided, however, that no arbitral award shall impose terms or conditions of employment which take away rights enjoyed by the employee and employee organization pursuant to any of the provisions of the collective agreement."

I think that it would be an error of tremendous proportion for the government to use this occasion to take away from the worker unilaterally rights they obtained after a long strike at great cost to them and at great cost to the people as a whole and which they obtained through legitimate collective bargaining. It would not only be a disservice to the workers in the post office, but it would inevitably lead to a strike as soon as this legislation is passed.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I shall put the amendment to the committee. Moved by Mr. Orlikow—

[English]

Mr. Ouellet: I have no objection to the committee dealing with this amendment, but I do not see it as a subamendment to the amendment that I proposed previously. Has my previous amendment been agreed to? Was it disposed of or is it still pending before the committee?

The Chairman: Actually it has not been put to the committee.

[Translation]

As the minister will remember, we set it aside pending the formal presentation of the amendment of the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan).

[English]

I think that I will follow the suggestion of the minister and put his amendment in front of the committee to make sure that it is dealt with. It was moved by Mr. Ouellet that clause 6 of Bill C-8 be amended to delete lines 40 to 44 on page 2. Is that the amendment that substitutes the word "organization" for "association"?

Mr. Ouellet: No, Mr. Chairman, this one has been disposed of. It is the other one which says that subclause 6(3) of the bill be amended by striking out line 26.

The Chairman: It has been put to the committee but it has not been adopted. Is the committee ready for the question on that amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

[Translation]

The Chairman: I shall now put to the committee the proposal of the hon. member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow).

[English]

Moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North:

That clause 6(1) be amended on page 3 at line 13, by adding immediately after the word "thereof" the following words:

"provided, however, that no arbitral award shall impose terms or conditions of employment which take away rights enjoyed by the employee and employee organization pursuant to any of the provisions of the collective agreement."

Is the amendment carried?

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, it appears that the minister is not going to respond to what appears to be a very reasonable and logical proposition. The hon. member for Winnipeg North has pointed out that it took a 43-day strike in 1975 to obtain what was then considered to be the solution to the problems between CUPW and post office management. Indeed, the legislation was brought into this House by a former postmaster general, Bryce Mackasey, who may yet go down to his reward as head of this new Crown corporation, which may mean that we will have to live with it again.

What the hon. member's amendment is saying, in effect, is that the employees have won through negotiation and through strike these benefits. For example, there is the definition of technological change. We know that the Post Office management would love to re-examine the whole question of technological change, which in the end would only affect the security of employment of post office workers. Once you affect the security of employment, you attack and destroy the right of the workers to form collectives within the post office. In other words, it is an attack on the union itself.

We cannot have a situation where the mediator-arbitrator may withdraw things won and agreed upon in previous agreements, have him take something out and suggest to the House that that is going to create peace in the post office in the interim period before the Crown corporation comes into effect. Can you imagine the technological change clause being lifted and peace continuing within the post office?

It is important to note the words of one of the conciliation board members, Mr. Irving Gaul, the union nominee on the board. What he had to say in the conciliation report was very timely, and I would like to read it into the record:

Industrial peace is a prerequisite for the successful transition to Crown corporation status but industrial peace cannot be legislated by a parliamentary act. It can be achieved by the resolution of the problems, which can only be accomplished as a result of negotiated solutions.

An hon. Member: Whose friend are you?

Mr. Rodriguez: I see the Conservatives are now awake and are agreeing.

It seems to me that that is the kernel to the problem. If the minister does not accept this amendment proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North, in effect he will not have industrial peace in the transitional period leading up to Crown corporation status. Surely, that has to be paramount in his mind. It would be a hoodwinking of the public if we let them think that what we do here tonight is somehow or other going to move the mail for the next year or two. Indeed, I think that what has been foisted on the taxpayers so far is a travesty.

I saw advertisements in the newspaper showing what the employer offered and what the employee wanted. About $300,000 was spent on a publicity campaign but did it bring peace to the post office? Was that money used to bring industrial peace to the post office? Should we use taxpayers' money to resolve those problems? It may have helped the government or the post office to wage a propaganda war for the public mind, but surely if the taxpayers' money is being spent it ought to be spent on the resolution of the problem and not to win public support for being such a good employer while implying that CUPW is a bunch of unreasonable people who want 30 hours of work for 40 hours' pay.

Surely the solutions do not lie in this open-ended kind of legislation which gives power to the arbitrator to remove things already won.

In the last contract CUPW thought the problem of casuals had been solved, but the post office kept circumventing the clauses in the agreement by not offering work to the full-time employees before hiring casuals. Grievances were built up and the matter was taken to the grievance board. The decision was appealed to the Federal Court by the Post Office but CUPW won on the grounds that the Post Office had breached the agreement. The department has appealed to the Supreme Court with an attached statement to the effect that to go back and correct the injustices where the agreement was breached would cost taxpayers from $2.5 million to $3 million.

We are here tonight in the hope that we can develop some sort of peace in the post office in the period before the establishment of a Crown corporation. If the minister leaves this legislation open-ended and does not accept the amendment of the hon. member for Winnipeg North, that will guarantee industrial unrest in the post office.

We all know that the question of trust is important in collective bargaining. We could never use that word to describe collective bargaining with Treasury Board. In eighteen months CUPW has never sat down with the employer; the Postmaster General has never sat across the table to negotiate problems in the post office. Study after study was kept secret by the department until we blew the cover. These studies showed that management was incompetent. The charges were not made by a partisan politician in this House but in studies paid for by taxpayers.

I should like to relate an instance which occurred in the post office at Prince Rupert. A female employee there wrote to me complaining that the 25 female employees in that post office have only one washroom. She has tried everything to get more washroom facilities; she even wrote to the Postmaster General but did not get a response. I wrote to him myself and he replied by letter to the effect that the matter had been put on the priority list but because of cut-backs the washroom facilities in the Prince Rupert post office cannot be improved. These 25 female employees will have to continue sharing the toilet facilities.

The hon. member for High Park-Humber Valley does not think that is important. Things which affect working conditions are important and this is how grievances build up and an impasse develops between management and employees. I have given the minister enough time to think about the amendment presented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North and I ask him to respond in a positive way.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Amendment (Mr. Orlikow) negatived: Yeas, 7; Nays, 46.

The Chairman: Shall clause 6 as amended carry?

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): Mr. Chairman, clause 6 is the key to the entire piece of legislation in many respects. It seems to me we are not getting many satisfactory replies from the minister or the government. The government has repeatedly said in this House that we are giving to the public service the right to bargain collectively regarding wages, hours and conditions of labour. We all recognize there are situations in which that right has been restricted and even withheld. That is what we are in the process of doing today.

Surely in the haste to withdraw that right in the public interest this House, this committee and the minister have a responsibility to ensure that we take adequate precautions to see that those whose rights are being denied are given some compensation in the form of an assurance that the dispute will be adequately considered and fairly resolved.

I have seen this type of legislation passed a number of times but I have never seen it passed on the first day of a strike, never rushed through as quickly as this. The kernel of the matter is that the government will appoint a mediator-arbitrator who will have the sole power to decide issues respecting wages, hours of work and conditions of employment of the 23,000 postal employees for the next 15 months. The minister has not given us any guarantee that some of the rights they now enjoy will not be taken away.

We attempted to clarify that a few moments ago, but that amendment was smothered by the government and the official opposition. May we have some idea as to the type of person who will be chosen to discharge this very special responsibility? I am not asking for his name, but will he be a judge? That has been the case in the past. Will it be someone within the public service? Can he assure us that the person who is charged with this very heavy responsibility is a person in whom the 23,000 employees and the House can have confidence?

I am sure the minister agrees that the arbitrator's responsibility will be a heavy one. The minister will not be in a position to amend any of the arbitrator's decisions. In fact, none of us will have the power to amend any of his decisions. It is a tremendous responsibility for one man to have in the hollow of his hand, the well-being of those 23,000 employees for the next 15 months. Those employees have put their trust in the House. Can the minister tell us what type of person he will select? What safeguards will the employees have? Are they to be put back to work? We know they will be under the Anti-Inflation Act for the next 15 months. That is something most Canadian employees will not have to face.

Mr. Ouellet: They will be under the provisions of the Anti-Inflation Act only to the end of this year.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I did not see that included in clause 8. If that is the case, I feel somewhat relieved on that point. The workers will operate under conditions laid down by the mediator-arbitrator. We should know from what category that person will be selected before we transfer that heavy and onerous responsibility to him.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, the person who will be appointed will be a very skilled person who has experience in the field of industrial relations. Perhaps he will be a judge.

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I am sure the minister is not prejudiced against judges.

An hon. Member: It sounds like Bryce Mackasey.

Mr. Ouellet: The person will have experience in mediation leading to arbitration.

An hon. Member: It sounds like Bryce Mackasey.

Mr. Ouellet: I should like to assure the House that in the process of mediation and arbitration there is a period of time necessary for the mediator-arbitrator to work toward bringing the parties together and arriving at a collective agreement. I would not like to underestimate that role. Indeed this person is being vested with a double role. He will play the role of mediator; also he has the right to come forward and make recommendations binding upon both parties.

In the past when mediation and arbitration have been used, the persons appointed have been able to make progress with the concerned parties. In fact, they have brought about negotiated collective agreements on almost all outstanding issues. A recent example of that is the grain handlers agreement where very marginal clauses were left for the arbitration process and the rest was successfully mediated by the mediator-arbitrator with the co-operation of all parties. The process of arbitration will be used to its fullest extent by the person appointed.

Referring to the matter raised by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands, earlier today in answer to a question raised by the hon. member for Timiskaming I pointed out that the Anti-Inflation Act would apply only to December 31, 1978; for the remainder of the time, to December 31, 1979, the Act will not apply.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, following what the Acting Minister of Labour has said respecting clause 8, that the Anti-Inflation Act will not apply after December 31, 1978, surely he is aware that there is power in the act to extend its application beyond that date. What assurance can he give the House that that power will not be used?

Mr. Ouellet: Perhaps we can deal with that question when we are considering clause 8.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, I wish to propose the following amendment:

That clause 6(2) of Bill C-8 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after line 25 on page 3, the following new paragraph:

(d) for the purposes of any arbitration referred to in that subsection, the power to render any provisional award.

I propose that amendment because of the reasons given by the minister for the appointment of an arbitrator-mediator to bring peace to this situation. Obviously the qualities of that individual are important. He should be provided with the flexibility to bring in not merely the report after 90 days, but perhaps order an immediate raise taking the government's base, which is approximately 4 per cent. In order to bring peace to the post office, he may wish to have the benefit of the provisional award immediately to solve some of the immediate discontent. If flexibility is lacking with the arbitrator, he will come forward after 90 days with arbitration on the matters not resolved by agreement.

This is the time to provide the arbitrator with some additional flexibility so that if he wishes to resolve some points immediately, without a delay of 90 days, he may. After all, we have had an 18-month hiatus regarding that particular contract, so he may wish to move more quickly to amend the provisions which deal with the PSSRA and related problems. We have had enough discussion on that. I can see neither the government nor the official opposition is going to move on that.

I urge the minister to give some serious consideration to this. Maybe I am misunderstanding the bill. It seems it would be useful if the minister had this flexibility so that the arbitrator could move immediately if he wished on those matters that he wishes to resolve quickly in order to improve perhaps the atmosphere in terms of the ultimate award.

● (2232)

The Chairman: The hon. member just gave notice of an amendment. I may as well put it before the committee. Moved by the hon. member for New Westminster:

That clause 6(2) of Bill C-8 be amended by adding thereto, immediately after line 25 on page 3, the following new paragraph:

"(c) for the purposes of any arbitration referred to in that subsection, the power to render any provisional award."

I am not sure if the numbering is right. It should be "(c)", not "(d)".

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Chairman, on one of the copies it is incorrectly described as "(d)". It should be "(c)". That is the correct subclause.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I have just consulted my colleague the Postmaster General on this amendment. We think it would be fruitful to accept this amendment and have this included in the bill. We have no objection. Indeed, we support the amendment.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, I wish to put a question to the minister. At the moment we are in agreement with the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster and the minister. As I understand it, in terms of retroactivity there are no limitations on the mediator-arbitrator under this legislation in terms of going back retroactively.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I think it would be improper to instruct an arbitrator that he should not review or change any clause in the agreement. However, there is one provision which restricts what he should do. That is clause 8 with regard to the application of the Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines. Apart from that, the mediator-arbitrator could deal with any of the other items already referred to the conciliation board by the PSSRB that are the subject of the agreement.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, may I say on behalf of our party we would be very pleased to receive the suggestion of the hon. member for New Westminster.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Leggatt) agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 7—Report to minister

Mr. Rodriguez: I have an amendment I would like to put forward on this clause. I move:

That clause 7 of Bill C-8 be amended in line 34 on page 3 by adding immediately after the word "appointed" the following words:

"or within such longer period as may be agreed upon by the parties or determined by the Minister of Labour."

In explaining the amendment, as it now stands the mediator-arbitrator shall report to the Minister of Labour not later than 90 days after the date on which he is appointed. Many of these issues are very thorny. The whole question in the technological change clause and the whole definition of technological change may very well require more than 90 days. This would give a little more flexibility in terms of trying to reach a solution to the problem.

I see some nodding, so I will resume my seat.

Mr. Ouellet: I am glad to be in agreement with my colleague from Nickel Belt.

The Chairman: Shall the amendment carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Amendment (Mr. Rodriguez) agreed to.

Clause 7, as amended, agreed to.

On clause 8—Application of Anti-Inflation Act and guidelines

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, during discussion on an earlier clause we discussed extending this clause to December 31, 1979. I gather the minister indicated it would not be applied beyond the end of this year. As it does not say that, possibly the minister could explain how he will manage this so that it will be clear to everyone. On first reading of this bill, that was a major stumbling block to this legislation that came to mind.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I understand there has been some fear on the part of hon. members that the wording in clause 8 is not as clear as it should be. During the supper adjournment, I asked my officials to prepare some appropriate wording in order that it may be crystal clear. If it is the desire of hon. members, I move:

That clause 8 of Bill C-8 be amended by striking out lines 9 and 10 on page 4 thereof and substituting the following therefor:

"employer applicable for that portion of the period specified in section 5 that ends December 31, 1978."

Amendment (Mr. Ouellet) agreed to.

Clause 8, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

On clause 10—Punishment for contravention of PSSRA

● (2242)

Mr. Douglas (Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands): I think the minister ought to give the committee an explanation of the very heavy fines imposed here. These fines range from $100 a day upward, from $300 to an aggregate of $2,500 and from $150 to $10,000. Why are these fines so heavy compared to what is normally the practice? Is it an attempt to intimidate employees? Is this a war of attrition? I can understand that the fines ought to take some cognizance of inflation, something with which the government is all too familiar. But inflation has not been as severe as these fines suggest.

[The Chairman.]

Mr. Ouellet: I would say that the penalties imposed in this clause are of a twentieth century magnitude and probably more in line with our day to day way of life. The fact that this clause is in the bill making penalties heavier is a clear indication that parliament is serious in passing this legislation. These penalties for contravention are a clear indication by parliament of the seriousness with which it regards the situation.

Mr. Forrestall: I share the minister's concern that penalties attached to legislation as serious as this should be brought into line with the twentieth century. Nevertheless it is interesting to note that though the 74 or 75 recommendations made by the joint committee of this chamber and the other House concerning matters related to the public service legislation have been largely ignored, one of them has been singled out and the rest neglected.

The government has approached these recommendations in piecemeal fashion. It would be highly desirable if at some point ministers opposite would bring forward a bill which would reflect the substantial input made by the joint committee by way of recommendations which are presently before parliament. To find one of the recommendations "bootlegged" at the tail of a serious piece of legislation is not wholly acceptable. It is precisely this type of piecemeal application of recommendations in areas of policy suggested in the report which has led to the disquiet we see in the public service today as a result of Bill C-28—selective picking and choosing instead of the total presentation to the House of an updated approach to the whole system of collective bargaining in the public service.

While I am sure my hon. friends would support the extent of the fines, we would remind the minister that it is time we dealt seriously with the process of amending the six or seven acts which are involved in this whole area. Then, perhaps, we could begin to approach the basic questions which have given us trouble with respect to legislation such as this ever since I first took my seat here. I am not criticizing the level of the fines but rather the piecemeal lifting of twentieth century approaches, if I might use the minister's phrase. We ought to have a total package before us.

Mr. Ouellet: I suspect the hon. member was busy this afternoon when I was introducing this bill. I would remind him that in my remarks I did refer to the work of the joint committee and some of the recommendations it made. I mentioned that the government has undertaken to bring forward comprehensive amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act which would include a response to the recommendations of the committee concerning penalties for unlawful activities.

I appreciate that what we are taking tonight is a very sectorial approach to the more general proposition which should be dealt with through comprehensive amendments to the Public Service Staff Relations Act. It is important, though, that the House recognize that the penalties we are suggesting here are precisely those which were recommended by the joint committee inquiring into relations between employers and employees in the public service.

Mr. Forrestall: As long as the minister does not miss the point—that we should not be bootlegging particular recommendations and using them ad hoc.

Mr. Ouellet: I appreciate the point which has been made and I understand the view expressed by the hon. member. I hope we shall be able to deal with this act in the very near future.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the last two members to speak made reference to a report of the special joint committee on the public service. I was the only member of that committee to vote against the report brought down by the committee and one of the reasons I did so was because of these increased penalties the government is proposing.

What bothers me now is that we have before us a special bill introduced for one purpose, to provide for the resumption of postal services. We have interrupted the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne in order to deal with it. We have given unanimous consent to do various things deemed necessary by the House to get the mails moving again. But here, to use the words of the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, we see bootlegged into this bill a change in the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

The clause is offensive on two counts. In the first place, to use an old phrase around here, we are changing the rules in the middle of the game. We are telling postal workers that if they do not obey this law, the penalties are not going to be those which are already in the law, but new penalties that are being passed tonight. The other thing we are doing is passing an amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act itself.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): I suppose the only thing they will have to do is obey the law, Stanley.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I think we should have some respect around here for the laws we make. My hon. friend and the rest of us agreed today to interrupt the normal business of this House and to deal with this special bill, which is here for one purpose only, and that is to get the mails moving again. But here, tucked into this bill, is clause 10 which would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act in respect of a very controversial provision in that act. I admit that I was the only member of the committee who voted against that report. The Liberals and the Conservatives all bought it, but surely it is a controversial provision like others, and I think that the idea of putting this in is completely wrong.

My hon. friend says that the postal employees can avoid these penalties by obeying the law. That is a plausible, understandable statement, but I suggest to him—and he is a lawyer—that what they ought to be required to meet by way of penalties are the penalties that are in the law now, the penalties which were in the law when they went on strike. That was the law yesterday. It will be the law until this law is passed. There are certain penalties, but if this bill is passed by this House tonight, passed by the other place and becomes law in 24 or 48 hours, postal workers will discover that between the time they legally went on strike and the time they are told that they have to go back to work the penalties will have been increased. I think that is completely wrong. I think it is contrary to the whole concept of law, and that in itself makes it wrong.

In addition to that, I say that it is quite offensive to this House and to the whole parliamentary practice to import into a special, emergency piece of legislation a major amendment of general and lasting application to the fundamental laws of this country. The minister has done fairly well in the last hour in terms of accepting some suggestions from this side of the House. I regret that he turned down the most important one, but he has accepted a number of amendments, and I seriously appeal to him to agree to withdrawing clause 10 from this bill.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I think it is important that the bill with which we are now dealing not be frustrated in its application by the enforcement deficiencies of the Public Service Staff Relations Act which were recognized by the joint committee. This House owes it to the public to seize the very first opportunity we have to correct the situation and bring about some of the recommendations which were made by the joint committee on employer-employee relations in the public service.

I appreciate that at the time this question was studied by the joint committee the hon. member voted against this recommendation, but I think there was an overwhelming majority of members on that committee who worked very hard and conscientiously and thought that something ought to be done to make sure that these remedies which we are considering are there to allow for a minimum of disrespect for the law. I think this clause is part and parcel of this bill, and the intention is to get the mails moving again in the near future.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Chairman, I listened with care to the point made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. It seems to me that the point is very crucial. This is not the first time that a person who is not a lawyer has corrected lawyers in this House on a question of justice. Canadians as well as people in other countries learned a long time ago never to confuse legal statements with statements about justice.

Surely the fundamental point which was being made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was that we have a perfect example here of ex post facto law. A group of men and women have exercised their rights under laws which exist in Canada and have embarked on a strike. They are legally involved in this strike, and now if we in this parliament pass this particular provision, we are coming along and saying that in the process we are going to change the punishment if the law is violated. A fundamental concept of justice and law in this land is that you do not do that kind of thing. You do not say to a group of men and women when they embark on a certain course of action: "This is the law as it exists, but we are going to change the law in terms of this provision once you have started to exercise your legal right".

There is no question about the right of parliament in this or any other matter to pass the kind of law which is being advocated by the minister, but it seems to me that those who are concerned about basic principles of justice ought not to be supporting this principle at this time. If the minister wanted to raise the level of punishment for violation of law in this respect or any other, surely the time to do that is before workers involved in a strike have exercised their legal right so to act. I wish the minister would deal with precisely that point in his response. Are we not changing the rules of the game in midstream and, if so, how does he justify that?

I will not elaborate on my second point. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made the point very clearly. We are making a permanent change in legislation here, quite apart from the postal workers, on the whole question—

Mr. Fraser: No, we are not. Read it. It only affects postal workers.

Mr. Broadbent: —of punishment for workers in the public service, and it seems to me that this is not the appropriate time to do that. The time to do that would be when we have proper amendments brought before the House which pertain to existing legal provisions. We should not deal with this matter in the context of a strike which is now in progress.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman, it may have been inadvertent on the part of the Leader of the New Democratic Party when he said, as I think one other hon. member said earlier, that clause 10 would amend the Public Service Staff Relations Act for all other public servants. I certainly do not read it that way. If we read it carefully, I think we will find that it applies only to the particular collective agreement with which this bill deals. I want to ask if the minister would confirm that my impression is the same impression he has. Perhaps he can answer that in a moment.

I want to say something else. The fact is that a number of members of parliament of all parties took a look at the penalty provisions of the Public Service Staff Relations Act, and since several years ago they have been deemed inadequate. There was an almost unanimous decision that they should be changed.

I have listened with sympathy to my hon. friends who have just argued, but there is an obligation on this House to ensure that the law which is passed tonight will be taken seriously. I have to say to the acting minister and to the Postmaster General that our party supports this amendment and that many members of this House have given a great deal of consideration to it in the past.

I do not want the acting minister to think that I allow small errors to go unnoticed, so I say to him that I agree with my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth-Halifax East, that we are bootlegging in one provision and not dealing in a cohesive manner with other provisions. However, as the minister has acknowledged tonight, there seems to be some awareness of that on the government side of the House as well.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the intervention of the hon. member for Vancouver South. He just said what I was going to say as a matter of clarification. This clause refers specifically to whom this act applies, namely those who are touched by this collective agreement.

• (2302)

In order to have more clarification about this clause, one has to go back to the definitions, such as you find in clause 2 where it is quite clear that we are referring to employees, who are defined in the clause, and employees' organizations, which are also defined there. Therefore, no one should think that we are amending section 104 of the Public Service Staff Relations Act to deal with all the other collective agreements which are in existence at present. It is indeed a measure which is restricted at this moment, but it could be dealt with more generally later on when the government will be dealing with something more specific than the amendment to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

Mr. Forrestall: Mr. Chairman, I hate to belabour this point. The point in question is that we are now attempting to govern by intimidation. Nobody questions—at least I do not, nor do I think the leader of the NDP questions for one moment—the wording in the act and its narrow restriction to the matter before us. But I must agree with him, and I think he is right in saying, that you are governing by intimidation.

We have a strike of engineers presently, a legal situation. They will wake up tomorrow morning and take a look at the fines in this legislation. That is intimidation. I do not like it, I reject it, and please do not pass it off simply as being a necesary action so as to enforce the serious decision of this chamber. The law itself must carry its own weight. If, because we have no faith in the leadership of CUPW or of the unions involved to obey the law, we have to impose a fine, then let it stand by itself. Let us not duck the factual situation—

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, tell him to sit down or get out. One of those assholes up there is waving, shouting and making signals.

Mr. Forrestall: Let them do their waving and signalling; it is the Post Office we are talking about. The Post Office has been waving and signalling to Canadians for years. That is what we are doing here tonight.

The point I want to make through you, Mr. Chairman—I think it is fairly serious—is that I have no hesitation whatsoever in passing this, absolutely none. Indeed, I agree with it. What I am saying to you is that tomorrow morning when we wake up, we can impose no lesser penalty for any offence, for any infringement of any act involving parliament, government, and its employees.

Surely we are not talking about the Star Chamber. In this penalty clause we say to every employee of the public service of Canada: This is the precedent. I accepted it, I voted for it, and the minister's colleague sitting immediately behind him will indicate to him exactly where that clause was written, on whose coffee table, after what consultation and with what unions. But let us make no mistake about it, and I am sure the distinguished Leader of the NDP is not under any illusions about it; nor, I am sure, is the Prime Minister of this country.

Mr. Broadbent: Don't be too sure about that.

Mr. Forrestall: The member for Dartmouth-Halifax East is not, and I would remind all hon. members that I do not think there is any mistake about it at all. We are legislating ad hoc. It does not matter what the term is. We are saying very clearly to the public servants of this country, to the people who work for the people of this country, that these are the penalties, and let us be aware of that. We are also implying that there can be no lesser penalties from this point on.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I am puzzled by this clause. I have asked my colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who has been here a long time, whether he remembers a single case in his long experience when parliament passed a law ordering a union, a group of workers, to go back to work and that law was defied by the union. My colleague tells me he does not remember a single such case.

That being the situation, I find it strange that the minister brings in a clause in this bill which is as tough as it is. I think I have a right to say this to the minister: I compare this legislation containing pretty tough penalties for workers who have never defied the law with the way we have treated corporations in this country for 50 years, corporations which have, not once and not twice, but innumerable times, deliberately, and in conspiracy with each other, violated the combines act.

An hon. Member: The sugar companies.

Mr. Orlikow: It was not until this year that the courts directed the companies to pay a fine which meant anything to them. So for 50 years we have allowed the corporations of this country to violate our laws, to steal from the people of Canada, to set prices in ways which were illegal, and we have done virtually nothing about it until this year. Not a single corporation officer has never gone to prison for breaking the law. We have corporations—I am sure the minister knows it—which have broken those laws, not once but twice or three times. But when it comes to groups of workers who, to my knowledge, have never defied a law ordering them back to work, the minister decides in advance that that union may indeed defy the law and therefore imposes penalties which have never been necessary until now. I find that very strange. I also find it very strange that the minister sits in his chair so frequently tonight and does not reply.

Mr. Ouellet: I think I have already explained the reason why this clause is in the bill. To have the hon. member suggest that I sit in my chair and do not answer him and for him to imply that I do not want to answer is incorrect. Indeed, I have made replies on three previous occasions to this question. Obviously every hon. member is entitled to speak on this clause and to bring forward arguments for or against such a clause. But I do not think I ought to reply to every member who presents an argument for or against.

I suspect that members of this committee are by now fully aware of the reasons this clause is included. I know some members are opposed to it and I respect their view. I know, on the other hand, there are a number of members who favour the inclusion of this clause, which increases the penalties for those who will not obey the law. I hope and assume that all members of this committee expect that this law will be obeyed.

Basically I do not agree with the interventions made earlier by the hon. member to the effect that we are intimidating the employees. I do not think this is an intimidation at all, but rather a clause that increases the penalties. These penalties are increased following the considerations of a joint committee of the House of Commons and the Senate, a committee which came forward some time ago with a recommendation to increase the penalties. The penalties will now be increased and we hope this law will be obeyed. If it is not obeyed, the penalties are greater than they were before, and I believe there are arguments for and against doing this. I respect the view expressed by the hon. member, but surely he should not think that every time someone disagrees I should stand up and make another speech.

Mr. Rodriguez: Mr. Chairman, we cannot look at this particular clause regarding punishment for disobedience of the law in isolation. This is another piece of nastiness in this bill which we have to look at in relation to other aspects. This gives one the impression that the government is spoiling for a fight, and that in fact it is another attempt at confrontation politics.

We discovered earlier tonight that a mediator-arbitrator will be appointed. It has also been evident that this person will have a lot of power. We discovered that the minister and the government are not prepared to accept amendments which would in fact state that whatever the workers have achieved in the past will be protected. These things are all now up for grabs. The mediator-arbitrator may very well redefine technological change. The hon. member for Longueuil is shaking his head back and forth like a jack-in-the-box. The minister has already said this is a possibility and that the mediator-arbitrator would have that power. He may very well have the power to change the definition of technological change and the right to negotiate in respect of such change, which was agreed to after a 43-day strike.

We learned earlier his evening that the minister and the government refuse to accept an amendment to the bill which would spell out that the mediator-arbitrator will look at everything in this agreement and not just those matters referred by the Public Service Staff Relations Board to the conciliation board. Here again is another piece of nastiness which leads me to the conclusion that this government is looking for a fight. It seems to me this is one way of instigating disobedience. I have only been here six years but I do not recall public servants defying the law or disobeying parliament. Yet we have this clause thrown into this bill in respect of this group of workers. The government is singling out the members of CUPW to show the Canadian public how tough it is. After one day of strike the government is showing the people of Canada how tough it can be.

Perhaps the government is a day late in its attempt to prevent the by-election fiasco of yesterday. It seems to me this is the wrong way to go about obtaining industrial peace during this period of time before moving to a Crown corporation. This certainly gives the impression to the workers who are to be put back to work they are being put upon by this legislation in that several of those things they won in the past as a result of hard negotiations may be removed.

It seems to me what we are doing here tonight is sowing the seeds of discontent for years to come. It is quite possible this parliament may, if it passes this legislation, sour the possibility of Crown corporation success in the future because trust is not being established. All we are doing is institutionalizing the distrust and anger of the workers in the Post Office.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I disagree with the inclusion of these changes. I do not have the benefit of being a member of the committee, as was the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, so as to know the reasons behind it. I think this will accomplish nothing but aggravation and is not in keeping with the wishes of the minister, or his desires as expressed and demonstrated in the last few weeks in the number of strikes he has been able to conciliate. Therefore, I move:

That all the words in clause 10 after the word "shall" in line 26, page 4, be deleted, and the word "apply" substituted therefor.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Chairman, I must say that I do not agree with this amendment. The hon. member in moving the amendment indicated that he feels clause 10 in this bill, which deals with offences, will aggravate the situation in the post office. I suggest there is nothing more aggravating to the situation than disobedience of a law. The hon. member in moving such an amendment and in opposing the bill takes for granted that the workers will be disobedient. I should like to think that they will not.

I should like to think also that in coming months we will be dealing with important labour relations in the Post Office, specifically with a bill to create a Crown corporation. These penalties are there to make sure that this bill will not be frustrated in its application, and there are proper measures to make sure that it is applicable. Therefore, I cannot agree with this amendment.

The Chairman: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Amendment (Mr. Peters) negatived: Yeas, 6; nays, 62.

The Chairman: I declare the amendment lost. Shall clause 10 carry?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Clause agreed to: Yeas, 62; nays, 6.

The Chairman: Shall clause 11 carry?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Mr. Ouellet moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On division.

Motion agreed to and bill read the third time and passed.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we suspend the sitting until the call of the Chair.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered that the sitting be suspended until the call of the Chair.

At 11.30 p.m. the sitting of the House was suspended during pleasure.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 12:25 a.m.

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council) moved:

That this House do now adjourn.

Motion agreed to and the House adjourned at 12.25 a.m.

LABOUR RELATIONS

INLAND SHIPPING—LABOUR DISPUTE INVOLVING MARINE ENGINEERS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing public necessity, namely, that unless the strike of the 800 maritime engineers and deck officers which has stopped shipping on the Great Lakes is ended without delay, it has been estimated by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool that 150 million bushels of wheat that were to be shipped on the Great Lakes between now and the end of the shipping season will not be shipped, thereby resulting in the catastrophic loss of $400 million to western farmers and a most serious blow to the economy of the western provinces.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Elgin (Mr. Wise):

That as the seriousness of the situation will not brook further delay, the government should forthwith introduce legislation to end this strike.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate, pursuant to Standing Order 43, requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Turned down by Liberal members.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

SALARIES OF ACTORS AND ACTRESSES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity which affects this nation's cultural health and the increasing unemployment among creative artists.

In view of recent reports issued by Statistics Canada that Canada's full-time actors and actresses are paid less than one-half the average industrial wage across Canada, and in light of the failure of the government to act on the recommendations of its own study entitled "Federal Tax Issues of Concern to the Arts Community in Canada", known as the Disney report, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Surrey-White Rock (Mr. Friesen):

That this House refer the Disney report to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts for immediate study, where the Secretary of State, the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration may be called to appear and explain their lack of action in resolving the financial hardship of some of our country's most creative people.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate at this time would require the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF BONUS PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

Given the fact that the bilingualism bonus has always been an incentive for employees who have to work in both official languages either in the public service or in the House of Commons, that abolition of this bonus is unfair to those who invested their time in learning the other language and considering also that Francophones are more penalized by this since they represent the majority of those receiving bonuses, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Rimouski (Mr. Allard):

That the House urge the government to change its decision and to maintain the bilingualism bonus program until 1983 as it was previously set up.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FORESTRY

ASSISTANCE TO PULPWOOD INDUSTRY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 43, involving the welfare of pulpwood producers in some areas of the Atlantic provinces such as New Brunswick and the need for establishing alternate markets abroad. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Egmont (Mr. MacDonald):

That Canada, as a member of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development (OECD) and the International Monetary Fund (IMF), make every effort, on an urgent basis, to facilitate exports of pulpwood from provinces such as New Brunswick where the forest industry is so basic to the economy and offers an opportunity for utilizing surplus labour, as well as helping our balance of trade.

CUSTOMS

CALL FOR DEBATE ON WORK TO RULE PROCEDURE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an important and urgent matter.

As I know from reliable sources that Mirabel airport customs officers work to rule because they are forced to wear a cap and that tourists are welcomed in such a way that, for example, the head of a foreign corporation who had come to Canada to invest $15 million has changed his mind because of the reception he got from customs officers, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Saint-Jean (Mr. Smith):

That the House devote 20 minutes to discuss this urgent matter which seriously harms Canada and Quebec in particular.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the hon. member's motion. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, presentation of such a motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

OLD AGE SECURITY

PENSIONS FOR ELDERLY PERSONS OUT OF LABOUR MARKET—REFERENCE TO PRIME MINISTER'S BIRTHDAY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have delayed seeking the floor under the provisions of Standing Order 43 because I hoped that the Prime Minister might arrive in time and be one who would give support to the motion I should like to offer. I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Nanaimo-Cowichan-The Islands (Mr. Douglas):

That this House calls on the government to introduce legislation to provide for pensions under both the Old Age Security Act and the Canada Pension Plan to be available to all persons between ages 60 and 65 who are out of the labour market, and this House expresses the hope that the Prime Minister will give full support to the introduction of this legislation in view of the fact that today he is 59 and that he could, and probably will, be unemployed before he reaches 60.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT OF BARLEY—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgency. In view of the fact that this is the second successive year that western barley producers have experienced serious problems due to lack of co-operation on the part of the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board and the weatherman, leaving large stocks of barley on farms, and plugged elevators, with piles of grain deteriorating on the ground, creating financial losses through fire-sale prices, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Swift Current-Maple Creek (Mr. Hamilton):

That the minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board take immediate remedial steps to move barley at board prices or, if he is too busy or unwilling to accept his responsibility, to turn it over to somebody who will.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

PROVINCIAL REPRESENTATION ON CRTC—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 in the hope of providing a greater sense of participation in the country. In view of the fact that seven of the ten provinces have no full-time representation on the CRTC, while six of the nine full-time members come from one province, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That the Prime Minister create openings in the CRTC by inviting resignations, especially since he showed such singular success in having one of his candidates in Toronto resign.

FORESTRY

REQUESTED CONTINUATION OF PETAWAWA STATION—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 to ask for unanimous consent of the House to move a motion on a matter of urgency and national interest.

In view of the announced intention of the government to close the Petawawa forestry station as of next March 31, in view of the nationwide importance of this station for forestry research and development in the country, and also in view of the fact that this decision contradicts the decision taken by the Ministry of State for Science and Technology to give national priority to research and development, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Gauthier):

That the House instruct the government to appropriate the funds necessary for the operation of the Petawawa forestry station, in order to ensure the availability of forest resources and permanency in the area of research.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The House has heard the terms of the motion put by the hon. member. Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, this motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FINANCE

REPEAL OF PUBLIC UTILITIES INCOME TAX TRANSFER ACT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Peter C. Bawden (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgency. The government's announced intention to repeal the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act is in direct conflict with the arguments of the former minister of finance that the act would avoid inducing provinces to nationalize their private utility companies.

Since the repeal of the act would result in discriminatory taxation against certain Canadians and inhibit the development by private enterprise of future power sites, as well as alienating tens of thousands of Canadians, particularly western Canadians, on the grounds of unity, energy supply and tax equity, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Towers):

That the government announce its intention to retain the Public Utilities Income Tax Transfer Act and that alternative and less discriminatory means be found to accomplish its announced reduced spending goals.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the presentation of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my question follows the excellent motion presented under Standing Order 43 by the right hon. member for Prince Albert which was rejected by the Minister of Transport and his colleagues on the other side.

In view of the concerns expressed by the Canadian Wheat Board, the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool, the Manitoba Wheat Pool, the United Grain Growers, the Canada Grains Council and Premier, pro tem, Blakeney of Saskatchewan, amongst others, who are expecting immediate action to end the strike that is presently tying up the movement of grain on the Great Lakes, could the minister please advise the House what assurances he is giving these various agencies, particularly the one under his responsibility, that he will be getting the grain moving on the Great Lakes again, immediately?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to note that after the right hon. gentleman had finished putting his motion under Standing Order 43—which as usual was given a negative response—the right hon. gentleman went over and handed the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar the question and told him to ask it.

Mr. Lawrence: What do you expect him to do—mail it?

● (1417)

Mr. Lang: Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I see the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar called in aid the premier of Saskatchewan who has asked me to see that this strike ends, which I found a little funny after he took four months to end a strike in the construction industry in the province of Saskatchewan, under his jurisdiction.

The fact is that at this moment, under the auspices of the Minister of Labour and also because of my strong interest in this matter, the parties are meeting. There is a significant chance of a settlement. I hope that hon. members of this House will agree that if a settlement can be achieved, that is the right result.

In addition, in accordance with exchanges in the House on earlier days, it is very clear that we on this side know the importance of this matter and will act as we have to act. But without any doubt, unless they are suggesting a complete throwing out of the collective bargaining process, the best possible solution is for the meeting of the parties today to produce a satisfactory settlement. That is what I hope will happen.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I advise the minister through you, Mr. Speaker, that when it becomes time for me to decide from whom to take advice, I will take the right hon. member for Prince Albert over him any day of the week.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: In view of the continual vague answers that the minister continues to give in this regard—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I would ask hon. members on the other side to quieten down so that I may ask my question of the minister. The last time we had a strike involving the grain industry, with the grain handlers, we had something like 84 ships in the Vancouver port and 70 shipping days lost before the government took any action. Can the minister tell us whether it will take that long now for the government to take any action with regard to getting the grain moving again? Winter is coming and we need action now.

Mr. Lang: Of course, it will not take a long time. There is a time when we must move, as we demonstrated in the case of the postal strike when it was clear that there was not going to be a settlement. This government took its responsibility and put legislation before this House.

If the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar is going to take his advice from the right hon. member, I can understand that. He is already taking, in support, Premier Blakeney who faced with a strike did not know how to settle it and asks us how to settle it. I ask the hon. member for Saskatoon-Biggar—rhetorically, of course does he suggest that while the parties are meeting we should be here legislating in relation to this matter? Surely his hope and mine should be that there be a reasonable settlement. What the irresponsibility of the opposition allows is to demand action without suggesting any responsible form of solution. That is their pleasure in opposition, and let their pleasure continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: This minister and this government continue to have an eleventh-hour mentality with regard to labour relations in this country. We want to know, very simply, whether it is possible for the minister, who thinks very much like the premier, pro tem, of Saskatchewan with regard to labour relations, to tell us the timetable. What does the government have in mind with regard to this strike? Is legislation going to be presented, or are they going to wait until there is an irreversible trend in shipments on the Great Lakes which will cause serious damage not only to western Canada but across this country with regard to the mining faction, coal deliveries and iron ore? There are a number of areas. What is the minister's timetable?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the timetable is to see the discussions, which are going on, continue. I ask the hon. member whether he woud disagree with that approach, whether he would, while the discussions are going on and while a settlement may be arrived at this very afternoon, move in with what he calls a tenth-hour mentality. It would be a very weak mentality to move in at that stage. Surely we should let the bargaining process solve the problem if it can. If it cannot, obviously we will react to the situation at that moment. However, it would not be helpful to say what the course of action will be. This collective bargaining atmosphere should settle the issue. The parties are meeting at this very moment: the hon. member should take note of that fact.

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I ask the Minister of Transport why he makes the suggestion that our call for action is irresponsible, when the Woods commission over ten years ago advocated a public interest disputes commission to deal with this kind of thing. Who is being irresponsible? They have been in power for ten years, but suggest it is us.

My question is this: during these negotiations, did not either the Department of Transport or the Department of Labour realize there was every potential for a breakdown in these negotiations and a rejection of the conciliation report? Was there no monitoring whatsoever of this situation, bearing in mind that this is an area so vital to our industrial health?

● (1422)

Mr. Lang: The answer to that question is yes, of course there was. For a number of days I have been in constant touch with the parties and with people associated with this problem, keeping myself informed as to where the matter stood. I must say it was a great surprise to me that members of the opposition did not appear to know that this threat was even impending, though it had been building up for three months. We were aware of the situation. It was one of disagreement between employer and employee organizations as to the level at which a settlement should take place. There was a conciliator's report which was not acceptable to the parties as a solution to the dispute.

Members of the opposition, in their irresponsibility, need not say whether they agree or disagree with the conciliator's report or with the position taken by the employers or by the employees. They simply called for action. They do not even suggest what action we should take. Are they saying we should not follow the collective bargaining route?

Mr. Fraser: It may be that the minister has known about this for three months, but this is the first time he has got excited about it. Has the Department of Transport, or any other department in the government, made an assessment of the damage this strike would cause to the economy? Has any department made an assessment of the damage which could be caused in one week or two weeks, bearing in mind that if a settlement is not reached before freeze-up the damage will have been done and nothing can be done to offset it until next spring? If such an assessment has been made, is the government prepared to tell the public what it is?

Mr. Lang: Yes, Mr. Speaker, we carried out an assessment along those lines as we began to learn about the problem. As I have indicated in the House, the damage is very serious. That does not alter the fact that we have here a collective bargaining situation framed in the law which allows the parties to attempt to come to a conclusion, and it would be wrong for us, in advance of finding that the collective bargaining procedure has failed, to interfere with it. At this very moment discussions are going on. As the hon. member has mentioned, I am rarely excited, but I am always an optimist and I am optimistic that we shall see a settlement later this day.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

FORECAST OF GROWTH RATE

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance. The noted and conservative consulting firm of Woods, Gordon and Co., Toronto, released a report yesterday indicating that the Canadian economy is heading into a recession in 1979 and forecasts an unemployment rate of 9.2 per cent, along with an economic growth rate of only 2 per cent or 2.5 per cent.

Can the hon. gentleman tell us whether his department is aware of this report and, in particular, does he agree with the conclusions it reaches, namely, that the cutbacks announced by the government and supported by the official opposition will constitute a major drag on the economy next year and that the private sector is unlikely to fill that important investment gap?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): I do not agree with those predictions, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if, just for once, the Minister of Finance would give us some evidence for the conclusion he has reached, namely, that they are wrong. Since this consulting firm, which is hardly known for its radicalism, has come on top of another economic consulting firm in Ottawa last week which said the cutbacks would lead to a decrease of 100,000 or 96,000 jobs, would the Minister of Finance please tell the House and the people of Canada why he disagrees with this forecasting, which is based on an economic analysis of the consequences of his cutbacks?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, there will be a budget four or five weeks from now and I will discuss all those aspects at that time. I do not agree with the conclusion that the expenditure cuts will create the loss of 100,000 jobs. I say there might be the immediate loss of some jobs, but I think it is important to the Canadian economy to create the proper climate for investment which would create many more jobs, and we believe that jobs should not be created by the public sector but by the private sector.

Mr. Broadbent: I suppose we will have to wait for that budget. I will deal now with another aspect of economic policy in the hope that we can get an answer from the Minister of Finance. Major financial institutions in Canada have announced in recent days an additional half per cent increase in their lending rates and in their prime mortgage rates, which cumulatively means that for this year mortgages have increased by 1.5 per cent, adding $9,000 in mortgage interest payments during the life of a typical $30,000 mortgage for the typical family in Canada.

Given this disastrous economic implication of rising interest rates for the typical home owner in Canada, will the minister take this opportunity to say that he will instruct the financial institutions to rescind this recent increase in mortgage rates?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I do not have such power. Interest rates are set in Canada by the Bank of Canada.

BILINGUALISM

REQUEST FOR RE-ESTABLISHMENT OF BONUS PROGRAM

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the right hon. Prime Minister, I shall put my question to the Minister of Finance. Anyway, I believe he is the one who holds the knife.

The government having announced that it will cancel, without prior consultation with the unions, the bilingualism bonus, as that decision penalizes Francophones more generally because they are concerned in greater numbers, I ask the Minister of Finance whether he has reassessed the situation and intends to introduce a new timetable for the abolition of that famous program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the problem of bilingualism bonuses is the responsibility of my colleague the President of the Treasury Board. I shall advise him of the comments of the hon. member for Roberval.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. member for Roberval wish to put a supplementary?

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): No, Mr. Speaker.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

INCREASED BANK RATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who indicated in response to an earlier question that interest rates are set in Canada by the Bank of Canada. However, hon. members will recall that yesterday, in answer to my question as to whether rising interest rates will mean that mortgage interest rates will go up, the minister stated:

> I would think the market has more or less taken care of that situation . . . there is a lot of money available for mortgages and competition is keeping interest rates as low as possible—

Would the minister tell us what went wrong overnight, because mortgage companies and at least two of our chartered banks have already announced a half point increase in their mortgage lending interest rate starting today?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday and want to confirm today that, in fact, mortgage rates in Canada have not increased as rapidly as the interest rate of the Bank of Canada. That is what I attempted to do by demonstrating there is quite a lot of money available for mortgages, and that the market had reacted in such a way that mortgage rates have not increased as much as the Bank of Canada rate, all things considered.

[English]

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, bearing in mind that construction unemployment is at 17 per cent in the country and that the Woods, Gordon forecast states that housing starts may be as low as 217,000 this year, compared with a projected 245,000, would the minister indicate what he intends to do about the housing situation in Canada, bearing in mind that the cost of a half point increase in mortgage rates will mean that still further thousands of Canadians who might have bought homes will be denied the privilege and, in fact, the right to own their own homes?

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

• (1432)

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, I think I must repeat that the rates of interest for mortgages are set by the market. The market has reacted to the increase in the interest rate in Canada due to the many factors that were explained in the release of the governor of the Bank of Canada last week.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, my question is directed again to the Minister of Finance, who indicated that mortgage rates are set by the market. But the minister has it within his power to resort to various processes by which he can relieve the lot of the home owner who must bear the high mortgage interest rates caused by his government. Would he indicate what type of relief he is at least considering, bearing in mind that he turned down the proposal for the mortgage interest deductibility for home owners and the municipal tax deductibility?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, as I have said many times, we will have a budget four weeks from now. In the meantime, I am very surprised to hear from the mouths of opposition members constant complaints about the deficit of the government, yet they are proposing we spend $5 billion more in this context of lack of revenue. With that type of policy, you would achieve a $17 billion cash requirement, something to which I am not about to subscribe.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

TRADE

TRADE DEFICIT—EFFECT ON EMPLOYMENT

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. As this country achieved a trade deficit of $8.25 billion in the first eight months of this year in fully manufactured products, the ones which produce the jobs, despite the fact that the 85-cent dollar helped exports and slowed down imports, does the government intend to introduce the same kind of trade promotion program which was used by the previous Conservative government to change eight straight years of trade deficit into a trade surplus in the first year, and by so doing start to overcome this gigantic trade deficit in the kind of products that produce jobs?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in thinking back to the time when the former Conservative government, to which the hon. member referred, had total exports of about $10 billion, one-third of which was equal to the deficit in end products, we must realize that we have had a tremendous growth in our trade since those days. Now our total exports amount to $44 billion and a substantially shrinking portion of that is the deficit in end products.

Our export of end products this year will increase by some 13.2 per cent. We are making gigantic strides in the export of end products and, in fact, two-thirds of our total exports are end products and prefabricated goods. So I am confident that this year we will have the largest merchandising trade surplus we have ever had in Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: Is the minister not aware that the sole reason for the merchandise trade surplus is the vast quantities of our primary products which this government allows to be exported to other countries in their raw state, to be processed there into finished products by the workers of those countries instead of by Canadians here in Canada?

I would ask the minister this question: when does the government intend to introduce a policy which would require those who export our primary products in their raw state to process a far greater proportion here in this country and to introduce generous tax incentives—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hees: —to induce the building of factories in which those primary products can be processed to their final state here in Canada, and give Canadians the jobs they deserve?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, at one time one had hope for some of those used, worn-out old horses over there—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: They have crossed the floor.

Mr. Clark: We sent half a horse over to your side.

Mr. Horner: As one who has ridden many horses and raised quite a few of them, I should be able to recognize the used and worn-out ones.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Horner: But, Mr. Speaker, let me bring the former cabinet minister up to date on the current facts in 1978, rather than those of 1961 and 1962. Today, our total exports are comprised of about 10 per cent of our agricultural commodities. About 20 per cent of them are minerals, including oil and gas. That leaves 70 per cent in end products and prefabricated products. That is the breakdown of our total export trade. It is a substantial improvement over the period in which the hon. member loves to live.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Horner: I was glad I could bring him up to date.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I will murder the bum. Step out into the aisle, Jack, and I will show you who is worn out.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

EMPLOYMENT

IMPACT OF CANADA WORKS PROGRAM

Mr. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. A recent government study indicates that the impact of the government's Canada Works program on the total unemployment scene is not very significant. I should like to ask the minister whether, first of all, he is aware of the study by his department and, further, whether he concurs with the findings of the evaluation committee.

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, at a time of high unemployment it is incumbent upon the government, of whatever political stripe, to come up with direct job-creation programs such as Canada Works and Young Canada Works. But not being satisfied with that, it seems to me that it would be appropriate to make more effective use of the funding we used in these temporary make-work programs. So on that basis we established an economic growth component factor so that we can create permanent jobs, and two provinces to date are benefiting from the forestry program in job creation.

We have the emergency response feature which has helped in particular one-industry towns where some people have suddenly found themselves unemployed, and we have been able to put that program in place. We are gradually moving from a temporary job operation to more permanent job creation. So the weaknesses in those temporary programs have been recognized. That is why we are trying to strengthen them with more long-term job creation programs in co-operation with the provinces.

Mr. Epp: In view of that re-evaluation of Canada Works which is taking place, and in view of the fact that the government has spent half a billion dollars from early 1977 on Canada Works projects, I should like to ask the minister whether some of that money in this fiscal year will be redirected to the job creation he has mentioned, namely, long-term jobs in the private sector apart from Canada Works?

Mr. Cullen: We announced, I think early in September, something like 14 or 15 different programs which are in place to help with direct job creation, and we are working in close concert with private enterprise. The funding that we saved from the Canada Works program means, of course, that more money is available to be redirected to areas where I think we could create more permanent jobs which would have a more long-term, positive impact on the employment picture.

Oral Questions

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

OUTFLOW OF INVESTMENT CAPITAL

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I will direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister. In light of the fact that in the first half of this year a total of $910 million in direct investment capital left this country, most of it heading for the United States, and considering that this outflow is greater than in any other half-year on record, and also considering the fact that the outflow is almost twice the amount of six months ago and three times the amount of a year ago, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance, now that he has returned to the House, why we are now getting this unprecedented outflow of capital.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the flow of capital between Canada and the United States has been a phenomenon that has worked both ways for a long time. I am advised that the situation today is basically not worse in relation to the total economy than it was some ten years ago.

Mr. McKenzie: Mr. Speaker, this outflow of capital started three years ago and is increasing right now. What steps will the minister take to restore investor confidence in Canada? As he stated earlier this afternoon, he is depending on the private sector to create jobs. As investor money is leaving the country, jobs are being created in the United States and not in Canada. What will he do to restore investor confidence?

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, in the last little while we have done a lot. We decided to cut the size of the federal government and we have cut spending for next year by $2 billion. In order to maintain confidence in Canada, I think everyone should realize that if we promise to increase the deficit by a further $5 billion, it is not conducive to more confidence. That is why we are showing more restraint and responsibility on this side of the House.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

OLD AGE SECURITY

PENSIONS FOR SURVIVING SPOUSES

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Considering that people aged 60 who receive the spouse's allowance lose it when their spouse dies after having reached the age of 65, thereby becoming dependent on welfare and losing their vested interests, can the minister tell the House whether she intends to set up some mechanism to correct this situation?

[Mr. Cullen.]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, earlier this week we tabled in the House a bill to amend the Old Age Security Act which provides that the recipient who has not yet reached retirement age but who loses his or her spouse will continue to receive the pension for a six-month period in order to allow time to readapt to the new financial condition.

[English]

INDUSTRY

TAKEOVERS OF CANADIAN BUSINESSES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the report of the Foreign Investment Review Agency which I believe was distributed to members of parliament today. The report indicates that in the last year 50 per cent of the takeovers were takeovers of existing Canadian businesses, which is an increase from 38 per cent in the previous year.

Is it the policy of the government to encourage the takeover of Canadian businesses by foreign investment, in view of the change in the statistics which the report discloses?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, that is not the view or the policy of the Canadian government. In FIRA applications, we look for applications which clearly demonstrate significant benefit to Canada, and then we permit them.

As I mentioned in my speech the other day, the enterprise development program assisted something like 256 different businesses by ensuring loans to them within the last year. All but seven of those businesses were solely Canadian owned. More or less, that demonstrates our policy. We want to encourage investment and we want to make certain that the investment is of significant benefit to Canada.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the statistics show that in almost every case approval was granted; the turndowns were almost at a minimum. I think the turndowns numbered 14 in the previous year. The Science Council of Canada recently published a report indicating that one of the major problems in our economy is foreign ownership not being interested in Canadian export and making sure their technology is developed at their head offices and not here in Canada.

In view of the report of the Science Council of Canada calling into question the entire concept of foreign ownership, does the minister intend to make any changes to the Foreign Investment Review Act in this session, in an attempt to accommodate some of the views of the Science Council of Canada, which views have been thoroughly researched, in order to get our economy back on the road and Canadian owned?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, in every Foreign Investment Review Agency application we search for a number of things which will be of significant benefit to Canada. The possible advancement of Canadian ownership of a company is one matter which is taken very, very seriously into consideration. There must be provision made for eventual Canadian management and Canadian ownership. There must be significant improvement in the employment and investment of a given company which is being taken over. There must be a significant amount of new research and development being conducted in Canada. There must be the encouragement of—

Mr. Clark: Think of another one, Jack.

Mr. Horner: That little boy never invested a nickel in any Canadian business, so I would not take advice from him. It must be proven that the takeover is of significant benefit to Canada. In the FIRA applications, approximately one-third of them are American companies taking over existing American companies in Canada.

PUBLIC SERVICE

EFFECTIVENESS OF GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In my view it is a fairly important question in terms of waste and inefficiency. A serious question has arisen as to whom or what agency evaluates the effectiveness of government programs. It is my view and understanding, which I think the minister indicated to me, that the planning branch of Treasury Board is the central body. Given the fact that the government likes to waste money, will the minister clarify this question at this time?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, many evaluations are done jointly by the departments themselves under agreed on but stiff criteria established by Treasury Board. I think the hon. member is referring to possible readjustment of the organization within Treasury Board to reduce our expenditures in that central agency, as well as other departments of the government. Indeed, there will be a consolidation of planning, perhaps under the program branch.

In so far as evaluations are concerned, I see no way of its affecting our ability to conduct them. Indeed, in the Speech from the Throne we announced that they would be made available to parliament from here on.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I have one supplementary question. In light of the fact that the planning branch within the minister's department was the central body, will he advise whether in fact there will be a central body which will evaluate the effectiveness of government programs? Is there such a central body?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, the central body will be the remainder of Treasury Board. An effectiveness performance measurement was initiated as a process by the planning branch, but the actual carrying out of the performance measurements throughout the government, and the actual evaluation of any program, in our view is much better conducted by the department involved under the guidance and direction of the central agency, Treasury Board, many of which functions have been carried out in the past and will be in the future by the program branch.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

FUNDING OF LAND REGISTRATION AND INFORMATION SERVICE

Mr. David MacDonald (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, normally this question would be directed to either the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion or the Prime Minister, but perhaps I can direct it to the Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council as I am sure he is well aware of this situation. It concerns the Land Registration and Information Service which has done some very important work in the maritime provinces in terms of updating land mapping and registration.

Given the government's unilateral decision to suspend support for this program at the halfway point, can the minister indicate what consultation took place with the three provincial governments involved prior to the announcement by the federal government? What amount of millions of dollars of waste will occur as a result of the incompletion of this program, particularly and primarily in the minister's province of Nova Scotia?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of the nature of the consultations which took place, if any, before the announcement by the Government of Canada of its effort to cut costs. Rather than believe, as the hon. member has indicated, that it will lead to waste, it will lead to reduced federal expenditures.

Mr. MacDonald (Egmont): Has the minister consulted with any people in the LRIS branch with a view to the creation of a substantial number of jobs in an export industry providing new expertise in this important area to the United States and countries in Europe?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I missed the first expression used by the hon. member. If he will read the speech I made in his home province the other evening, he will realize that I placed a great deal of emphasis on increasing our expertise in export-oriented industries.

Oral Questions

LOTO CANADA

CONTRACT WITH GENERAL INSTRUMENTS

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Fitness and Amateur Sport. Is one of the conditions for the federal government's withdrawal in lottery gainings of under $10 that the provinces would take over the contract with General Instruments?

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, that was not exactly the agreement: it was that the federal government and the two provincial governments involved would share the resolution of the contract.

● (1452)

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, in the agreement which was reached, has there been any agreement with the provinces that they will pick up that contract, or is it just that the two provinces involved and the federal government might share in the cost for getting out of that contract?

Mrs. Campagnolo: Mr. Speaker, it is a combination of the two elements which the hon. member brings forward. Some of the equipment will be used and some of it will not. Also, the contract itself will be resolved, as I indicated in my first answer.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

MEASURES TO AVOID LABOUR DISPUTES

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Labour, I would like to put a question to the Deputy Prime Minister. I have before me so-called confidential cabinet documents submitted by the former minister of labour outlining a number of potential long-range solutions to the ongoing labour unrest particularly in the central services. It concludes, in short, "it is clear that the system today lacks coherence and has a great potential for conflict," which is an understatement, in any event.

My question is this: in view of the continuing ad hoc actions taken by this government, can the Deputy Prime Minister advise this House whether or not he, the Prime Minister and his cabinet have rejected the proposals outlined in this document, or has the government simply given up in proposing any long-range programs on the labour situation other than turning agencies into Crown corporations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to authenticate the document from which the hon. member has quoted. I would say that this government still believes in the system of free collective bargaining as a foundation and cornerstone for a democratic society. Even though that principle has to be reached, as it was yesterday because of the public interest, I do not believe that the long-term solution is through engrafting upon our system such notions as public interest disputes commissions which seem to offer no additional assurance that collective bargaining would proceed more smoothly.

Mr. Jelinek: Mr. Speaker, nobody is questioning the collective bargaining system. The fact is that there is a definite lack of long-range policies by this government. I would like to ask the Deputy Prime Minister a more specific question, that is, whether the government is considering one of the proposals in this document, that of sector bargaining. In other words, would they eliminate some units within each single sector so that one single sector within the public service would be able to deal with the government simultaneously, thereby eliminating or postponing strikes or walk-outs at least for the duration of that one contract by that one sector? Is the government considering this, and can we have it brought before this House of Commons in the very near future?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member has misunderstood the questions that emanated from his side of the House today, since at a time when collective bargaining was proceeding and when negotiations were in process, action was being called for in the way of legislating a settlement. That is what I regard as a failure to understand the dynamics and, to some extent, the costs of free collective bargaining.

AIR TRANSPORT

LEVEL OF AIRPORT TAX

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport if the government is considering raising the airport tax which is paid by the travelling Canadian from $8 to an unbelievably high $13; if so, could he inform the House when the Ministry of Transport intends to put this raise into effect?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that we are examining the question of increasing the revenue from those who use air services in Canada against the costs of providing that service, as indicated earlier by the President of the Treasury Board. I cannot at this stage say the exact manner in which that will be done but, of course, an announcement on that matter will be made in due course.

INDUSTRY

TAKEOVER OF CANADIAN BUSINESSES

Mr. G. H. Whittaker (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the questions of the hon. member for New Westminster and it is to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce regarding the takeover by foreign companies as adjudicated by FIRA.

In view of the recent adjudication by FIRA on the takeover of the Northwood Mills lumber manufacturing organization owned by Noranda Mines, in British Columbia, by Weyerhaeuser Corporation, a multinational company based in the United States, in view of the fact a consortium of independent lumber manufacturers in British Columbia was able and willing to take over this company, and in view of the very limited response by the government as to why this was given to Weyerhaeuser, I would ask the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, why FIRA adjudicated in favour of this multinational and not in favour of the Canadian independent manufacturers?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon. member's question, let me explain first of all that FIRA is not an auction market. It hears, confidentially, applications from a company to take over another company. We were aware that there were Canadian interests, but they were not the buyers. They did not have the money to buy and they did not have the permission of the British Columbia government to the timber rights. The British Columbia government was in complete favour of the decision made by FIRA and the cabinet. The decision was made based on that particular application because that company agreed to a purchase price in the neighbourhood of $25 million.

Over and above the purchase price, it was then prepared to spend $3 million in R and D in Canada for improving environmental conditions, $2.2 million to enlarge the cutting mills and $14 million to enlarge the pulp mill in Kamloops. So they were prepared to spend $19.2 million in Canada in addition to the purchase price. This was far and above what the Canadian concerns could do, and in complete agreement with the British Columbia government which allots the cutting rights.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, it is my information that the money was there and that the Canadian companies were prepared to do exactly what the multinational corporation was going to do. It was not a question of the British Columbia government allotting forest rights; it was a question of buying forest rights. In view of the knowledge that is there and present on almost every aspect of what the minister has said, I would ask him what real, comprehensive review did his department make of this situation, other than to take some of the presentations made by the multinationals and the big Canadian company to the cabinet?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, on the one hand, the opposition is worried about the investment in Canada and the fact that it is going out of the country and, on the other hand, they want the cabinet to restrict a company like this. In this particular case Weyerhaeuser put in an option to buy Northwood which, if I remember correctly, was good until November 1. We were under the impression that the smaller Canadian companies could not come up with the financing before November 1.

Mr. Whittaker: That is wrong.

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, I hear some experts over there saying that it is wrong. I suppose they are prepared to finance the Canadian company.

An hon. Member: Are you an expert?

Mr. Horner: In any case, FIRA is not an auction market; it operated confidentially. If hon. members opposite would like to make FIRA into an auction market, I would think that the hon. member for Lethbridge, who is not running again for that party and who is a very good auctioneer, could be appointed the auctioneer perhaps; but it is not an auction market.

FORESTRY

REQUESTED CONTINUATION OF PETAWAWA STATION

Mr. Eudore Allard (Rimouski): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State (Environment).

As a result of many representations made by research groups, forest conservation organizations as well as the employees of the Petawawa station, will the government reconsider its decision to close that station on March 31, 1979?

I am asking the same question again, Mr. Speaker. As a result of many representations made by research groups as well as Crown corporations, that is organizations supervising the conservation of forests, as well as the employees of the Petawawa station will the government reconsider its decision to close the station on March 31, 1979?

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BAKER (GRENVILLE-CARLETON)—PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a point of order that arises out of the events of last Monday which caused 15 new members to be elected to this House, and which raises a problem with respect to their rights as members of parliament. Although they have not been sworn in yet, and I gather cannot be sworn in until next week, perhaps Tuesday or Wednesday, they nonetheless represent one million Canadians and they come from all regions of the country. They are, in effect, members of parliament. I do not think that because of timing they ought to be denied the rights of members of parliament. One of those rights is the presentation of motions and bills for consideration by this House. I understand a draw will be made with respect to the position of private members' bills and motions on the order paper tomorrow. If that is the case, and the lines are drawn tomorrow, those 15 members, who represent all the parties in this House, will be outside the pale in that draw.

I wonder if Your Honour would look into this matter to see if an arrangement can be made to ensure that all these new members have the same rights as members who are here today.

I have one suggestion, and there may be others by other members. Perhaps 50 places could be reserved in the draw and these members allowed to compete for those places. I would appreciate it if Your Honour would consider this difficulty which deprives these people of the right to participate fully in the work of this House. I raise it because I know Your Honour's concern about giving members of parliament a chance to express themselves through this part of our Standing Orders.

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I support fully the proposal made by colleague, the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker). In addition to the argument he put forward I think it is worth bearing in mind that those who are coming into the House next week will represent constituents who have not been represented in this House for over a year. There are many causes of local concern which they may want to bring before the House in the form of motions or private members' bills. I think they should be given every opportunity to do so.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in support of this commendable suggestion, I wonder if it could not be agreed that there be a meeting of House leaders to see if we can do something about it.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise on a separate point of order, but if you agree I would let others speak on the point of order that is being dealt with now. Maybe I should say I would be happy to discuss this question, or have my parliamentary secretary discuss it with representatives of the other parties.

I think I should indicate that in view of the fact the throne speech debate is continuing today—as I understand it today is the fifth appointed day—tomorrow I propose to call legislation. I will begin with the bill in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) seeking additional borrowing authority, to be followed by a bill in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) amending the Old Age Security Act.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. On the point of order raised originally by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) on the matter of the draw for private members' bills and private members' notices of motions, this was scheduled to take place at two o'clock tomorrow afternoon. Because we are likely to be on the throne speech we will be sitting at eleven o'clock tomorrow morning. Perhaps consultations could take place and the Chair could be advised by eleven o'clock in the morning, if some arrangement has been made. That would be very helpful. It has now been agreed it is not going to be a day for that—the House leaders could in any case advise the Chair in the morning and we could perhaps even defer the two o'clock draw and make some arrangement which would be satisfactory to House leaders. Perhaps I could be advised in the morning of the result of those deliberations.

PRIVILEGE

MR. BROADBENT—EXPORT STATISTICS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Earlier in the afternoon the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), answering a question from the opposition, conveyed some information which I think is inaccurate and I should like to give him the opportunity either to correct me or correct the impression he left.

In reply to a question he said that, if you look at Canadian exports, the recent figures showed that we were sending out of the country some 10 per cent in agriculture, 20 per cent in oil, gas and minerals, and some 70 per cent in end products and prefabricated goods.

Those figures sounded very strange to me, Mr. Speaker, so I had them checked during the question period. I found from the most recent data, which I have in my hand and which I will provide to the House and the minister because, as I say, I would like him to correct me or to correct what he said that the most recent table for 1977 has, in millions of dollars, a total export figure of $44,565 million in exports. Out of this total there is in the automotive sector $10,168 million, in other manufacturing goods only $4,778 million. If you compare those two combined as a percentage of our total exports it comes out to only about one-third of them, which is the figure which came roughly to my mind of manufactured or end products only making up about one-third of our exports. Beyond that, of course, we had a deficit in manufacturing trade of some $11 billion in manufactured products in 1977.

I should like the minister to take this opportunity to expand on what he included in those earlier figures. Certainly it was my impression and, I think, the impression of most people who follow trade patterns in Canada, that just the opposite situation exists to the impression he wants to leave—that we continue to rely on the export of unfinished goods instead of finished goods.

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I listened very closely to the Leader of the New Democratic Party's (Mr. Broadbent) explanation of what actually happened in our trade. Let me explain clearly what took place. I include automotive parts and automobiles in manufactured, in semi-processed and prefabricated goods. We had a total export trade last year of something better than $44 billion; in agricultural products, we exported something slightly better than $4 billion.

• (1512)

Mr. Broadbent: Yes.

Mr. Woolliams: That does not include wheat.

Mr. Broadbent: Yes, it does.

Mr. Horner: I would like to continue. Concerning minerals, including oil and gas, we exported something better than $8 billion.

Mr. Broadbent: Right.

Mr. Horner: The rest is end products plus prefabricated materials including lumber, aluminium ingots, etc. That is what I said, 10 per cent; 20 per cent; and 70 per cent. I will gladly check those figures with my own files tomorrow, but I am certain I am in the ballpark.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed, from Tuesday, October 17, consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Clark) (p. 27).

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House agreed yesterday to defer the division scheduled for 9.45 p.m. on the fourth day, to this afternoon. Is it the pleasure of the House to proceed with the vote at this time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if it is appropriate to raise a point of order at this time with respect to House business. I will take Your Honour's advice, but there is a matter which came up just before the vote, and I think it is something which ought to be explored here in the House.

Just before the bells began to ring for the vote the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) rose in his place and announced that we would be breaking off the throne speech debate as of tomorrow and that we would be proceeding with government business. It is his right to do that if that is his wish, but I regret to say that is is not in keeping nor in accordance with the undertaking which he gave in the House on October 12 when we discussed the question of House business. We were talking on that day about a possible House leaders' meeting, and I asked whether he was planning a meeting of House leaders to discuss, among other things, the length of the throne speech debate and the order of the business of the House so that the House could, in the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), get down to the business of legislating.

The Deputy Prime Minister said in reply that there would be a House leaders' meeting on the following Wednesday. There has been no such House leaders' meeting.

I raise this matter for two reasons. The Deputy Prime Minister has announced the intention of breaking off the throne speech debate which, as I said, he can do, but we are left in limbo as to the question of whether the throne speech debate is ever to be terminated. I think the House is entitled to some clarification with respect to that because there is an opportunity for the opposition to put another motion.

There is also a question with respect to the address which we are to present to Her Majesty's representative. Aside from the fact that it may well be an affront to the Governor General to leave the matter hanging the way it is, I think it is important that hon. members of this House know what the intentions of the Deputy Prime Minister are. There has been some public discussion outside this House with respect to the length of the throne speech debate, but it was always in terms of urging the government, if it was to abandon the throne speech debate, to abandon it for the purpose of bringing in a budget which would set forward the economic program of the government.

[Mr. Speaker.]

According to the Prime Minister, the reason we are here is to do something to stimulate the economy, and I hardly think that the bill which was announced, a bill to add $17 billion to the deficit of this country, is going to stimulate the economy. I think it is important that there be some understanding. Are we going to deal just with the two bills the Deputy Prime Minister announced? Have we abandoned the throne speech debate altogether?

Mr. Broadbent: I hope so.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): It may well be that that is the appropriate thing to do, but not without consultation.

The third question is whether we have abandoned the consultations among House leaders which have characterized the operation of this House. I regret very much to have to raise this, but I think I must because, if this place is to operate effectively and appropriately, it must operate on consultations, and not on consultations which are promised and never brought about.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I regret to see the hon. member in such a state of excitement. There is no intention to abandon the debate on the address in reply. It can be brought forward later, if that is the wish of the House. I had understood that there was a general desire on the part of all hon. members to proceed with the legislative program which is on the order paper. That is what I propose to do tomorrow by beginning with what I consider to be a very important economic measure. The hon. member may regard it as not important, but that is a question for debate. There will be an important economic measure proposed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien), and it will be followed by amendments to the Old Age Security Act.

There is no intention to abandon the throne speech debate. It can be brought forward, as appropriate, and hon. members will have an opportunity to move amendments if they wish, unless there is a unanimous desire not to proceed. However, I did feel that it was appropriate at this time to interrupt the debate because we have dealt with the amendment moved by the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) and the subamendment moved by the New Democratic Party. The question of confidence has been disposed of so there is no further question about that.

The hon. member referred to the matter of a meeting. I have had numerous meetings over the last several days. There have been informal contacts with members of the opposition parties. We were in consultation yesterday, and while the hon. member feels he really needed a meeting, I do not really think there was much necessity for a meeting to decide to proceed with these important measures.

Mr. Clark: Except that you gave your word, for what that is worth.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order to speak on behalf of my party. I would just like to indicate to the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) that we agree with the decision to proceed with needed, important legislation. If the Deputy Prime Minister is now saying that it is the disposition of the government to abandon the ritualistic throne speech debate, or at least substantially reduce the number of days for it, I think the people of Canada would welcome that as well as an opportunity to deal with legislation put before the House which would come to grips with the real problems which led to such an overwhelming expression of lack of confidence in this government, not simply by votes in this House, but by votes cast by the people of Canada a couple of days ago.

If the government could begin to redress that, it would certainly have our support. Let me just ask in that regard, because these things have to be worked out with the co-operation of all parties, whether the Deputy Prime Minister is saying that not only is it the government's desire to proceed with the bill he has announced for tomorrow but that it is also his understanding that, as far as the government is concerned, we will not return to the throne speech debate? If that is the government's desire, it is ours as well, but I would like to add an important proviso.

The rules provide that if we do not terminate the throne speech debate in a formal way, we cannot set up the committees of the House. That would be a serious setback to hon. members on this side of the House, who want to discuss important matters. If the Deputy Prime Minister wants to proceed now with legislation and to cut off what is largely a formality, the remainder of the throne speech debate, we are in agreement, but we insist that at the same time the government gives notice that it intends to set up the committees, which are very important, and to seek the necessary unanimous agreement of the House.

Mr. Speaker: I am not entirely sure that we are on safe ground on a point of order. We have discussed House business. It is the prerogative, as has been pointed out, of the government, as expressed by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen), to switch off from the throne speech debate at any time, and it is not necessarily an abandonment, as he has said. What he has done and what he has announced today is in perfect order. I cannot find disorder. The subject of whether or not that is a good idea or whether the priority is right really belongs to the field of debate and is not a matter of order, and I think the matter really ought to rest there until we commence the business for tomorrow, at which time it might be the subject of debate. In the meantime, the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) patiently awaits his turn to participate in the matter before the House today.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

The Address—Mr. Crosbie

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, before congratulating the mover and seconder of the address in reply I would just like to refer to a comment made by the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) a few minutes ago when he had the unparallelled audacity to suggest that the question of confidence in this government was disposed of by a vote that we had a few minutes ago. The question of confidence in this government was disposed of on Monday when people right across Canada showed how much confidence they had in the government, and if the Deputy Prime Minister wants to claim that there is confidence in the government, then he should go and advise the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) to go to the people.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: This is a discredited government carrying on in a disgraceful manner after four years of their term have gone, hanging on by their fingernails, hanging on by their toenails, hanging by their handnails because they haven't got the courage to go to the Canadian people because they know what the answer is. The answer is what they got on Monday.

Let me congratulate the mover and seconder, who did an admirable job. The mover is an eloquent lady in particular. Today we had a spectacle that reminded me of Chairman Mao over in China when he said there, a few years ago, "May a hundred flowers grow". We've got 130 flowers that are withering on the other side of the House here today.

The only thing was that the 130 roses were here but the thorn was not here today—where was the Prime Minister? Is the Prime Minister so discouraged that he could not come, even though all these red roses are in the lapels of members in the House to welcome him?

Economics is a dismal science, but that science has become much more dismal in the last three or four years of this government. Is it now so dismal that one does not even like to refer to the economic statistics because the dismalness is so terrible that I do not think the people of Canada can stand much more of it.

Let us just have a quick look at what is the reason for the present economic state of Canada. Why did the Prime Minister rise in this chamber on Monday when asked a question by me about the increase in the interest rates by the central bank to 10.25 per cent, the highest increase since 1935 and the fifth increase in the last seven months, 2 per cent more than the central bank rate in the United States? The Prime Minister was asked how this corresponds with his pledge and bond to introduce a 5 per cent real growth rate in the economy, how does this correspond with the government's pledges to increase economic activity, employment and business investments in Canada. The only defence the Prime Minister has is that he is powerless, that Canada is powerless. We have a government that is powerless today to do anything to help the economic situation in Canada. When the U.S. raises its interest rates by half a percentage point, this government has to respond by bouncing them up by three-quarters of a percentage point when we have already had four increases earlier this year. The government is powerless, and why? It is powerless because of its monumental incompetence in the last four or five years.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: It is a prisoner not of the law but of its total incompetence. Their past mistakes, their total economic bankruptcies, that is what they are prisoners of. Now the Prime Minister of this country, which used to be looked up to as a powerful, confident country, must get up like a beggar in the House and say he can do nothing about the most outrageous increase in interest rates in our history, except perhaps for the great depression in the early 1930s. That is the government that said the question of confidence is disposed of. Like heck it is disposed of. It will only be disposed of when this government is disposed of.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Look at the economic leadership of this government in the person of the lugubrious Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). He used to be full of joy, vim, vitality, and smiles, but today he looks more sour than a prune. Who can have confidence in a minister of finance of this government?

Here is a press clipping of June 23, 1978, from the Ottawa Journal which reads that the Minister of Finance predicts the growth for the year will be 5 per cent—"Tory member calls him Donald Duck." That was me, Mr. Speaker. He is Donald Duck because all he can do is squawk like the well-known Disney character. The minister predicted last June, only four months ago, that our economic growth rate for the year was going to be 5 per cent—that was the minister's prediction. The economists say that at best this year our growth rate will be 3.6 per cent. But the minister predicted 5 per cent. No wonder he is increasingly lugubrious, if that is the right term for the hon. gentleman. I do not know how it translates into French, but he is a lugubrious minister. The sooner he gets out, the less lugubrious the people of Canada will be.

How can you believe a word this minister says? His little shadow over there, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner), was talking about horses today. We are told that this is supposed to be the Chinese year of the horse. We thought there would be an election this year, and we would find out what end of the horse. But we have not, and the election is not coming until next year. We saw what end of this horse this is the year of today when the honourable expert on horses spoke in the question period.

The Minister of Finance predicted what our merchandise surplus was going to be this year. He predicted it was going to be $4 billion. That was on September 28. On September 29 the August trade figures came down to show our balance was only $186 million for August. The minister knew that the day before, but he misled the whole economic and financial community in Canada and in the world. The answer came the next day when he revealed surplus for August, and our dollar fell again to less than 84 cents U.S. As the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) said, the man is a happy-go-lucky minister of finance; he thinks he has another 84 cents to go before we are finished altogether. That was bad enough, Mr. Speaker. A couple of days later the Minister of Finance said that the merchandise trade surplus would be just less than $4 billion, that it was going to be a record because the year before it was $2.9 billion. The record has changed.

What did our wonderful, lugubrious Minister of Finance say on June 1, as reported at page 5947 of Hansard? He said:

> Last year we had a trade surplus of $3 billion and if the present trend goes on the surplus could reach $5 billion this year.

If he were like Pinocchio, his nose would reach right across to here. That is why the odds are so wide, not because of the wordplay but because of the noses of the ministers opposite—they are growing longer every day from the untruths they are telling the Canadian people. That is our Minister of Finance. No wonder there is no confidence.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce says the Canadian dollar should be worth 90 cents, that par is at 90 cents. Thank God he has left this party—it was under par when he was over here and it is over par now. According to the other side, par is at 90 cents. So I suggest we rename our Minister of Finance. Let us call him "Sink" Chrétien because he sank the Canadian dollar. Here I have a heading which reads, "Chrétien remarks Sink the Dollar". So we will rename the Minister of Finance "Sink" Chrétien, and we will name our own finance critic John Stevens. We will then have a more accurate reflection of what is happening in Canada today. Never has a minister of finance succeeded in sinking the Canadian dollar so low. He is what we call in Newfoundland a sunker; he is just below the surface.

The Deputy Prime Minister is not here to listen to me. He might want to correct the Hansard record, correct the silly statement he made a few minutes ago about confidence. He galloped out of the House in a great hurry when he thought somebody would refer to his foolishness.

We had three ministers of finance: we had John Turner—he fled to Toronto. We had the hon. "Thumper" Macdonald—he also fled to Toronto. Toronto is the only place where the public can afford them. When will the present Minister of Finance flee to Toronto? My message to Torontonians is: arise Torontonians, you have nothing to lose but your Trudeauites. They will all go as soon as we have an election. Five went on Monday. We have had Winken, Blinken, and now we have Nod as the Minister of Finance, the three stooges of Canadian finance, the three musketeers, les misérables. We have not forgotten that the man who started it all is now in Toronto—"Blue Eyes". He is going to be black eyes if he comes out of his legal lair, I can assure him of that.

My time is limited—I do not have the time to really let go here.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I will only refer to one forecast because I cannot stand to refer to any more. Woods, Gordon, a well-known Liberal firm, made a forecast and said that next year we will have a decline in housing starts, a decline in auto sales, an unemployment rate of 9.2 per cent, an inflation rate of 8.3 per cent, and a real growth rate of only 2.5 per cent. There is a glowing introduction to the election year by that Liberal firm. At least they speak the truth. There is a forecast from a firm which you could expect to be on the conservative side when estimating what might happen next year. So next year will be worse than the years we have just gone through.

What this country needs and what our economy needs is a complete purge, a complete laxative. They need to be purged of this government, to have a complete cleanout. That is the only way to get our economic system working again because we have no confidence whatsoever in this government. The Minister of Finance is hopeless, hopeless, hopeless. He is the minister of Nod.

What about the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce? He is the next strong man in the government in economic affairs. What is his prediction? Last May 12 he was reported in the Winnipeg Tribune to have stated that "by fall it will be obvious that the economy will pick up a great deal." It is not so obvious to the rest of the people in Canada. We are now in the fall. What did he say on November 9, 1977, in Winnipeg? He said that the fall of the dollar was useful. Well, I suppose he is delighted now that it is down to 84 cents.

● (1602)

Also on November 9, 1977, he stated that we are on the threshold of tremendous growth. That was the prediction of this mighty economic czar who sits in the hallowed halls or the glass halls where once the mighty Howe sat. From Howe to Horner is a purge, all right. He said just last fall that we were on the threshold of tremendous growth. In May he said that it is obvious the economy is picking up a great deal since the fall. On October 5 he stated in Sarnia that the Canadian economy is entering a period of stable growth.

Now, there is something wrong there. It is picking up in one place, it is booming tremendously and on the threshold of tremendous growth, and now it is entering a period of stable growth.

An hon. Member: He is an expert on horses.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes, that is because the minister is an expert on horses. That is where he got the idea that we are into a period of stable growth.

What did he say in the House on Friday, October 13, bad luck day? It was "Bad Day at Black Rock" for the Canadian dollar, interest rates, investments, householders, mortgage holders and borrowers. He said:

—one thing is clear in this debate and will probably run through the entire thirtieth parliament, and that is that we have a healthy economy and a strong, confident private sector in our country.

Honestly, ladies and gentlemen of the House of Commons, can you believe it, that the minister said we have a healthy economy and a strong confident private sector in our country? We hardly have a man in the private sector who has not got his fingernails bitten down to his toenails, he is so confident about what this government has done for him! He admitted, though, on the same page, that while unemployment and inflation are still too high, Canada is working its way through the difficult world economic problems better than most countries. What countries, Mr. Speaker? Zanzibar, Zambia? The Kwacha is still a bit stronger than the Canadian dollar. Nepal? Where are these countries? Malawi, Malagasy? What countries are doing so much better than Canada? Who does he think will swallow this kind of material?

On August 1 the Prime Minister realized something was wrong. He has only been here ten years. It took him ten years to realize that something was wrong. He came back from Morocco. He is better than Bob Hope on "The road to Morocco." He went on television and announced a whole new series of programs which contradicted, violated, and raped all the earlier programs, principles and practices of the government. From restraint to you-know-what, he changed and reversed. His ministers heard about it for the first time on television. That was just as well. They could not have understood, anyway. The commentators said that what the Prime Minister was starting was a political striptease. The Minister of Finance came out, had a press conference, and he stripped. The President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) came out and he stripped. Some other minister came out and he stripped. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce was sent to Japan. We do not know what he did there. Probably he stripped. But anyway, they all came out and stripped, these ministers did. It was a political striptease. When they were finished with their strip, what did the Canadian public see? They saw that underneath the government's clothes there was nothing but falsies. That is why we have had such a result in the by-elections.

We have to look on the bright side of this thing. At least we can joke about the government. But I know it is no joking matter. Before passing on, although time is pressing, I should like to give a considered opinion which I read some time ago. It is by Mr. John Turner. He said that the political interregnum which Canada now faces is deepening, with the resulting increase in economic hazards. If their friends are giving such candid opinions about them, what must their enemies be saying? I declare myself a friend of the government by what I am saying openly here today. One does not have to pay a cent to hear it. He gets it all for free. By the way, it is two years since the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott) and I joined the hallowed ranks in these halls.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: Every time I have spoken here I thought it was the last time. I thought that the big, brave government was going to call the election, and every time was not the last time. Here I am again ready for another eight months of howling and bawling.

Page 9 of the remarks of Mr. Turner reads as follows:

—one cannot rule out a full crisis of confidence in the Canadian dollar.

We certainly cannot. It continues:

Unfortunately, there is also weakness in some key economic ministries of the federal government. In Finance, as already noted, the minister has been seriously hurt.

That is for sure. We see that every day in the lugubrious look on the minister's face. He is badly hurt. On page 10 Mr. Turner is quoted as saying the following:

—Jack Horner is effectively spending 95 per cent of his time away from the job on his re-election problems.

He can spend 100 per cent of his time away and he will not cure that problem. It continues:

This leaves him a totally inadequate amount of time to learn and cope with his job, which is evident from a succession of reports on his performance.

High praise indeed from one of his friends in the Liberal party. I can see that leadership convention now. I wonder who brother Horner will support.

He goes on to say:

Finally, in Energy, Mines and Resources, the minister is generally perceived to lack the confidence of the Prime Minister.

The Prime Minister is an intelligent man. He agrees with all the rest of us. He lacks our confidence. This is the verdict of their friends on their performance. One of their own friends is waiting in Toronto now for the call.

Let me get down to some other problems. There is chaos in this government of policy. I should like to refer to the government of Newfoundland as an example. They talk about restraint. The Deputy Prime Minister and President of the Privy Council this afternoon had the gall to mention restraint. The government announced a few weeks ago that it was going to transfer most of the personnel from the Gander weather office to Halifax. The government was going to cut back on meteorological spending. It does not like forecasts any more, weather forecasts, political forecasts, or any kind of forecasts. It is going to save a few hundred thousand dollars. Now that has been reversed.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson), who is now in Namibia, is an expert on Namibia. A couple of months ago he thought Namibia was an item of babies' clothes. Now he is down in South Africa solving the problems of Namibia. He made an announcement on October 4. I spoke to the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) in the afternoon at five o'clock and he told me that the station was crazy, Gander should be shut, everything should go to Halifax, and that it is all done on computers. On that night at ten o'clock the Secretary of State for External Affairs announced that Newfoundland is all cancelled. That is why the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment has not been around. It is the first time that we scalped one of them. The Secretary of State for External Affairs scalped the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. At ten o'clock he announced that this decision was reversed, even though the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment had told me a few hours earlier that it was still in effect. That is what is called chaos.

[Mr. Crosbie.]

What else happened? I should like to refer to an article entitled "Ultimatum to Trudeau, Hands Off Gander" which appeared in The Daily News on October 4, 1978. In part it reads as follows:

George Baker, MP for Gander-Twillingate, threatened to bolt the Liberal party unless the federal government changed its mind about downgrading the Gander weather office—

That is what it is now, government by bolt. The decision depends on who is going to bolt next. The hon. member for Gander-Twillingate (Mr. Baker) said that he was going to bolt. This government which is so hot now about restraint and twittering about restraint, changed its mind and announced a decision without the concurrence of the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment. The announcement was just made. It was telephoned from Ottawa down to Newfoundland. I will bet any amount that the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment knew nothing about that announcement. This is not government, this is chaos.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has had an application from Newfoundland since March for a synchrolift to be installed in the government-owned dockyard in St. John's. It is paying them some eight million lousy dollars for a synchrolift which will give 200 jobs and put the yard in the position of handling 60 Russian trawlers a year. We have been waiting sinch March. Why? We have been waiting because the Secretary of State for External Affairs was up here skulking around and sabotaging it because there is a shipyard in his own district, and the people in his district mistakenly think that the dry dockyard in St. John's, if it gets this synchrolift, is going to compete with them or do something to harm them. That is not true at all, but they think it is true. The minister skulked around and made an announcement in Newfoundland. I am looking for the clipping.

By the way, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce said in this House, as reported in The Telegram on April 20, that the federal government is going to make substantive expenditures to upgrade our dockyards. That is what he told the House finance committee, that it was now in the midst of negotiations. He said that the decision should be reached in a matter of weeks rather than months. They are cowering in that department, afraid of the Secretary of State for External Affairs because he barked at them. What did he bark? He went down to Newfoundland, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did, and he made a statement down there. What was his statement? Where is that statement? He has made a lot of statements down there. I know I should not have had all these bloody clippings together. What he said, Mr. Speaker, was—I knew that I should not have had all these bloody clippings together. What he said was this; that you are only going to get a synchrolift in the dockyard in St. John's, which we own, to give you 200 jobs and save the 300 there if you are able to prove—yes, here it is.

● (1612)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The city has to prove that the lift will not hurt Marystown. This is the St. John's dockyard in Newfoundland which employs 300 Newfoundlanders and could employ 200 more and it has to prove if it gets a synchrolift that it will not hurt a shipyard in Marystown. What about Halifax? Do we have to prove that we will not hurt Halifax, that we will not hurt Quebec, or that we will not hurt Esquimalt?

There have been seven shipyards across Canada that have received assistance from the government this year, and none of them had to prove that they would not hurt St. John's or Marystown. But this "bully boy" makes the announcement in St. John's on September 13 that we cannot have a synchrolift unless we can prove it will not hurt Marystown in his district. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the minister did not even know about it? I spent two weeks calling the minister. You talk about courtesy; I never even got a call back from him, and I am the critic for industry, trade and commerce and a member of this House. When I was a minister I called back any member who called me, immediately. For two weeks I did not get an answer back from that minister until finally I got a call from his secretary telling me not to worry, that everything was in good hands, everything was under control. I said to one of his executive assistants—he has a plethora of them—"Do you realize that Mr. Jamieson just two weeks ago gave the death knell to this and it is not going to St. John's unless we can prove that it will not hurt Marystown? How can we prove that negative?" He said, "No, he hadn't heard that."

Who is making the policies for this government, Mr. Speaker? This is not a government, it is a collection of "whirlygigs", pushers, and pressure pumpers. And whoever has the biggest pressure pump is apparently running every department. I spoke to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce yesterday and he promised me that everything is in good hands, everything is hunky-dory, and that everything is going to be favourable, that he is going to announce it when he gets to Newfoundland some day. We will give him a great welcome, but I am announcing it now. If we can entice the minister down to Newfoundland, he will announce it, but only if the Secretary of State for External Affairs allows him. He has to get the permission of the Secretary of State for External Affairs who is in Namibia at the moment, the same gentleman who went on a trip last year to the Middle East.

I have a report from the Journal dated November 8, 1977, with the headline, "If Nothing Else We Have King Tut," which says that he visited all the countries of the Middle East. At the conclusion of the trip in Cairo the Minister said:

> There's a flexibility which I perceived here with regard to a formula under which talks may be resolved and a general disposition to look with an open mind on a wide range of issues.

I do not know what he meant, nor does anybody else. He goes on to say that he:

> —arrived in Spain during a four-day holiday weekend and in Greece during an election campaign and a torrential storm in which 25 people died. These tended to distract his hosts.

I hope the results of the minister's trip to South Africa are just as harmless as his trip to the Middle East last fall. I am prepared to fight that gentleman, tooth and nail, until he comes across with my synchrolift.

What has happened in unemployment insurance? A despicable change in the law was announced that is going to crucify the seasonally employed in Newfoundland and the maritime provinces. One of the Liberal backbenchers, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Rompkey) was quoted in the paper as threatening revolt by the Atlantic Liberal backbenchers if these changes that discriminated against the seasonally employed went through. The minister has caved in, and it is a good thing that he did because the revolt is nothing compared with what he would get from this side if he had not made some changes.

That is the government today, Mr. Speaker; they make a decision one day and reverse it the next. That was the Rompkey revolt. We have had the Baker revolt, and the Jamieson revolt. The whole thing is revolting; the government is revolting. It is not a government, it is a revolving, poll-taking machine. The left hand does not know what the left hand is doing. It is dancing in the dark, the old Cole Porter tune which should be the cabinet theme song.

In my last couple of minutes, Mr. Speaker, let me refer quickly to the Newfoundland railway. This is another thing that the Secretary of State for External Affairs talked about in Newfoundland on September 12. He made the announcement. His announcement was that the Government of Canada was not going to accept the recommendation by the royal commission that the Newfoundland railway be phased out, because everyone in Newfoundland, with the exception of our candidate in Humber-St. George's-St. Barbe, had said that the railway should stay. The one man in Newfoundland who said that the railway should go had an unfortunate occurrence in the by-elections.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) did not appear to know that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had already said that the Canadian government would not accept the recommendation. Now they are laying off employees, taking certain trains off the schedule, and laying 20 men off at the end of this month, despite the minister's commitment made in March of 1977 that there would be no lay-offs or changes in service while that royal commission was in effect.

Yesterday the minister in this House gave a weasel-worded answer to my question which completely changed his commitment. It was "baffle-gab" of the worst kind. He said that there could be lay-offs of a seasonal load-related nature throughout the system. I will tell him where the load-related nature of the system is; it is right here at the top. We are sick of these kinds of loads. He is putting this on the backs of the railway workers in Newfoundland. I do not have time to develop the situation further today.

We have a $17 billion borrowing bill coming up tomorrow. We cannot go on with the address in reply because the government want the authority to borrow another $17 billion for their bungling. I am going to debate every cent of those billions, and I hope that nobody tells me that it is an emergency to give this crowd another $17 billion tomorrow. It is not an economic program, is it, Mr. House leader?

I have to shorten this up, Mr. Speaker, because we are allowed only 30 minutes. I am used to 90 as a minimum, which was what we had in the Newfoundland house, or usually it was unlimited. I would like to make an amendment and move that the following be added to the address:

but this House regrets to inform Your Excellency that the policies of your ministers have severely damaged the Canadian economy, and that your ministers have not proposed those measures of taxation relief, including home mortgage interest and property tax deductibility, which would promote economic growth and recovery and ensure a more equitable tax system for all Canadians.

I move this, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), in the full realization, which is self-obvious, that the ministers have severely damaged our economy, that they have not proposed taxation relief, and in the hope that the gentlemen to my left here will come to their senses and help rescue the middle and lower income people of Canada who have a home now or who want to get one, who want to borrow under a mortgage and who want relief from the effects of the stupid actions of this government. These people are being crucified with an 11½ per cent mortgage rate, and when they go to the banks they are going to be stuck with a rate of 11½ or 12 per cent.

We want to rescue these people from the Liberal excesses which have put them in this position. We want to open up home ownership for more people in Canada. This is a program that is going to help sweep this government opposite out of power, because when something was proposed which makes some sense and which the people want, instead of adopting it for the next budget, as they usually do they spoke against it. Even a boa constrictor could not twist itself around enough to include this great proposal in the next Liberal budget. They cannot do that any longer. Even the lugubrious Minister of Finance would not have the gall or the audacity to try to slip around the statements he has made in the past few weeks to bring in a budget that contained this great new principle, which we are going to introduce as soon as we get back from the electorate and the election of 1979.

Is my time up, Mr. Speaker, or do I have another minute or two?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: In moving an amendment, the hon. member is entitled to 40 minutes.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: I must confess, Mr. Speaker, I had not realized that. This is fantastic. It is like an early Christmas. Now, where was I? What joy!

I shall go back to the railway, Mr. Speaker. When the royal commission was set up on March 28, 1977, the Minister of Transport was down in St. John's. He had a press conference aboard a coastguard vessel, and it is lucky for him that it was tied to the wharf so that he did not get seasick. I would like to read some of what the minister said which was quoted in the St. John's Evening Telegram of March 29, 1977. The minister said that that study:

—won't be just another study to lie on the shelf because the province is "at a critical point" for decisions, Transport Minister Otto Lang yesterday maintained. "I consider this one the final one"—

It's the final one for him all right.

—he said following a press conference in St. John's, for "we cannot wait any longer for tough decisions . . . and good decisions for Newfoundland."

That was his statement. He went on in the interview to say that:

—he has asked CN not to proceed with any technological or structural changes during the course of the study that would "disadvantageously affect" employment.

● (1622)

These are pretty peculiar words, but everybody in Newfoundland understood them to mean there would not be any lay-offs as a result while this royal commission was under way. Imagine him saying that in Newfoundland—you would not "disadvantageously affect employment". That might go over in Saskatchewan but we do not think much of it in Newfoundland. He said there would be no lay-offs.

I have another clipping here to show what is going on now. The commission made an interim report last June, which was published by the government somewhere around July 20. I announced it first, by the way. Two days earlier I announced the royal commission's conclusions and came out against them, the first one in that province to come out against the abandonment of our railway. The minister confirmed what I had to say, two days later. He was a bit late in releasing the report.

A heading in a newspaper article of October 14 reads:

Rail Union Plans Strong Protest Against Lay-offs

It says they eliminated two trains in a decision made in Moncton and St. John's and that 20 people would be laid off. That is how much the minister's word is worth.

Yesterday he said in his pallid way that he was going to investigate that. Let me give you the full effect of what he said, now that I have the time, and because it is so shocking in its transparent mendacity that I can hardly contain myself. When I asked him yesterday about these lay-offs this is what he said, as reported in Hansard at page 164:

Mr. Speaker, rather more exactly the instruction was that there would be no lay-offs during the course of the commission except those which were related to changes in the level and flow of business of the ordinary sort because, of course, there are lay-offs of a seasonal and load-related nature throughout the system.

That is pretty clear, Mr. Speaker. He has made it clear that Dr. Bandeen's commission's work will end in January. He continued:

I would be glad to investigate whether a specific lay-off is under the exceptional category which may be permitted or is of such significance that it actually contravenes the understanding.

The minister has not reported to me yet.

I will tell you what will happen to the minister if he comes down there and gives us his "seasonal and load-related nature" of the system. We will take the system and wrap it around his neck and drop him off the dock at Port-aux-Basques. How could the minister say that when he has made a promise to the 3,000 railway workers in Newfoundland that there would be no lay-offs while this royal commission did its work? He is not here now to listen to me, and, it would not do any good if he were. He also said, as I quoted a few minutes ago, that this was going to be the "last commission", "critical point", and mentioned "good tough decisions".

One of the recommendations in the interim report of that commission was that the CN bus system in Newfoundland was beyond contempt. Their finding was that the buses were beyond description and there was poor service. In July of 1976, in the course of federal-provincial relations, the Minister of Transport took the CN bus system that was established in Newfoundland to replace our lost railway passenger service—it was under the Public Utilities Commission of Newfoundland who were regulating it satisfactorily—he took it from them and put it under the Canadian Transport Commission. Since that time they were allowed an 8 per cent fare increase in 1976, and 15 per cent in 1977. CN applied to the CTC. They had a hearing at the beginning of November. The CTC allowed them to put the fare increase they asked for into effect as an interim increase of 15 per cent, and said they would give a final decision later. They gave the final decision in August this summer, eight or nine months later. Imagine a regulatory body doing that. They allowed what was asked for, a 15 per cent increase in the interim, and the interim period was eight months or nine months. Then they brought down the report to confirm the 15 per cent was all right.

The CN has the ball, and what do you think the CN did? Did they think they were lucky to get that in such a slippery manner? The CN came in two weeks later and applied for another 36 per cent increase, to go into effect in November of this fall and in February next.

I wrote the minister on August 3. I wish he would read his mail. I am always getting little notes from some assistant saying the minister is going to respond in due course. He has not responded yet. "Due course" has not arrived. I wrote on August 3 and pointed out that the Sullivan Commission—the minister's commission, had this to say at page 127:

> The CN Roadcruiser service has been operating with old, unsuitable, totally inadquate equipment. The bus is satisfactory for short distance travel, but for long trips is unacceptable as a replacement for the train. From a level of service standpoint, and in light of the concessions made to train travel in other provinces, CN fares are far and above what is reasonable.

That is a devastating indictment of this roadcruiser service. I pointed out to the minister that at page 245 of its report the commission stated that the roadcruiser operation is an equal substitution for the rail passenger service, and that fares must remain at a level lower than similar fares which might be payable for similar distances on a trans-island train service.

The commission report went to say:

> Certainly, no increase in fares must be permitted until substantial improvements are made in the facilities being offered on the corridor at present.

The commission suggested that the federal government give the same subsidy for this service as they give for other passenger service in the other nine provinces of Canada.

The Canadian National, this crown corporation, this creature of the government, after receiving that report and after getting a 15 per cent increase confirmed, and eight year before, came back for 36 per cent.

The Newfoundland government has protested, the people of Newfoundland have protested, I have protested, as has the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), and we cannot get an answer. This government has got to direct the CN—"No increase." Why was the minister saying, when this commission was established, that it would be given every consideration, that decisions had to be made, and then make a report on the CN bus service in Newfoundland crucifying the bus passengers? They want a 36 per cent increase! This minister now has to direct them—"No increase." Never mind the Canadian Transport Commission. We have no regard for the Canadian Transport Commission in Newfoundland. We think it is a hopeless body. It is a tool of the vested interest, a tool of the crown corporation. We have no faith or trust in it. The minister has to reverse this decision and act on the recommendations of that royal commission.

The railway, which has been allowed to run down, is owned by the Government of Canada. It has been given to CN to operate. CN has been losing money on it. CN does not want to put any more of its own revenues or profits from some other part of Canada into the Newfoundland service. We can understand that. The royal commission made a recommendation that it should close. The CN is losing $20 or $30 million a year on this service.

The government has made the decision now to close the Newfoundland railway, and it should not. Why should we be deprived of the rail mode of transportation in Newfoundland? The government has to make up the losses that are properly found each year by the right body, to the CN But the government will not do that. CN is knifing our railway to death. They are determined to kill it within the next 12 months because they will not realize their responsibilities. CN cannot be expected to subsidize the Newfoundland railway from its other railways and other services across Canada. Only government can do that. They have to direct CN. to make an honest effort to operate this railway.

Three thousand people in Newfoundland work for that railway, Mr. Speaker, with all that entails for Newfoundland. Every responsible body, and irresponsible body, has come out to say that it has to continue and we do not want it to stop. It is a mode of transportation and we have to continue that option in Newfoundland. The government is doing nothing, despite telegrams and wires from the Newfoundland government. They have ignored it, Mr. Speaker. They will not meet with the railway unions. The minister will not meet with me.

He will not meet with the Newfoundland government. I do not know who he is meeting with. He has too many portfolios.

Transport would kill any ordinary man or woman, yet that minister is given the wheat board, and justice—everything is sloughed off on him, and he is equally obnoxious in every one of them but particularly so in transportation. He is not a superman; none of us are supermen. I have every sympathy for the huge burden he has in transportation, but I lose my sympathy when we try to deal with him in any human situation at all.

They talk about federal-provincial relations. I am going to give you a story, Mr. Speaker, about the federal-provincial relations and about the problems. I had to laugh when the Prime Minister came on television on August 1. He had the audacity to come on TV and say hello to the Queen and how glad he was that she had arrived in Canada. He was not even there when she arrived in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, to meet her. He was in Morocco concocting his TV address for a couple of days later.

We believe in the British connection in Newfoundland, Mr. Speaker, and in our relationship with the Queen and her continuance as Queen of the Commonwealth and her relationship to us in all of Canada. We agree with Senator Forsey and his criticism of the constitutional proposals, which are now going to be changed—the attempt to change all of that. It is just symbolic anyway—another evidence of our history.

In that connection, Mr. Speaker, the government of Newfoundland wrote—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. This time I have to interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. I hope he will send a copy of his amendment to the Chair.

● (1632)

Hon. Herb Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, when the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) spoke to the country last August he announced the federal government would be giving a new and higher priority to dealing with the country's economic problems. I have been among those calling on the government to establish such a priority in the light of our still too high unemployment and the resulting need for more economic growth in Canada. I have also been calling on the government to take prompt action in developing and implementing programs to deal effectively with these kinds of problems.

I welcome this new and higher priority which is confirmed in the throne speech. The speech also confirms the kinds of programs the government has in mind to carry out this priority. The Speech from the Throne says, as did the Prime Minister earlier, that the government would greatly reduce its expenditures leaving more room to the private sector, and in this way help it to grow and flourish. It says the government will make changes in its programs to help revive the economy through greater private sector activity. The speech also proposes further changes in the unemployment insurance system to remove disincentives to work, as well as the taking of steps to provide more help to senior citizens and other low income Canadians hurt most by continuing inflationary pressures. But in spite of statements we have had from various ministers, I believe there is still a need for more detailed information about the government's proposals so that informed judgments can be made about their real impact on the country.

This throne speech opens a new session of parliament. This means the parliamentary process will be in operation to help get out the necessary information and to enable the merits of the government's proposals implementing its new economic program to be considered in some depth. Also this process will be a vehicle for making changes to those parts of this program which may, in fact, be in conflict with its objectives, or have unintended negative side effects for the country's social or economic fabric.

Canadians are understandably concerned about the levels government expenditures have been reaching because of what this means in terms of such things as the level of taxation, government borrowing, deficits and so on. But if the federal government simply makes cuts in its expenditures and does not balance these cuts with equivalent expenditure in other areas or with equivalent cuts in taxes, or both, the result surely will be to hold back the economy, to restrain its growth, rather than aid in its recovery. This is because the government will be spending less than before, but taking the same amount out of the economy.

One hears many comments to the effect that government spending has been holding back the economy. However, this spending is for goods and services it buys from the private sector. Or it is, to a much greater extent, in the form of transfer payments to individuals who use them as income to buy such goods and services, or also for transfer payments to other levels of government which spend them for these purposes. Therefore a reduction in federal government expenditure by itself is simply a reduction in total demand in the economy. To avoid being a restraint on it, this reduction, in my view, has to be matched with tax cuts, or at least, as an alternative, the money saved from cuts in spending in some areas has to be reallocated in ways that are hopefully more effective in encouraging more sound, private economic activity. It should be noted though that some economists argue that if this is done the effect on the economy would simply be neutral.

So far the government has not announced a re-allocation of expenditure equal to the reductions which have also been announced. And while the Prime Minister said in his speech in August that there would be tax cuts, the government as yet has not announced any program of reductions in personal or corporate taxes to help balance the reductions in government expenditure that have already been put forward.

However, I am pleased that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) now says he intends to present a budget in mid-November. In my view, this budget must be the instrument for putting in place at an early date a balanced program made up of personal tax cuts and economic incentive measures for business where justified and required, as well as government programs for public investment and direct employment to back up these other measures.

The throne speech says a proposal will be placed before the House "to provide for the review by parliament of evaluations by the government of major programs." Something along these lines should be brought forward very early in this new session. Even if one agrees with the need to cut government expenditures, it is possible to have valid concerns about the way these reductions are being carried out, about whether wise choices are being made about the programs to be reduced or eliminated.

We know generally what programs the government intends to eliminate or reduce. However, even here in many cases officials are still unable to provide a full and detailed picture of exactly what is being done. Neither parliament nor the public has been informed of the alternatives the government considered and rejected in place of the cuts it announced, and the exact reasons why these particular cuts were selected.

There is no provision for input from parliament and the public in the expenditure-review process at a point before the government is locked into a particular decision arising from it. Therefore, as a result, it is difficult to bring about changes in such decisions without some form of confrontation between some portions of the community and the government over a particular program expenditure reduction. But even these confrontations take place without having information to start with as to why the government made that decision, and without a meaningful opportunity to present views and alternatives to it.

One approach in dealing with the concern would be to have an appropriate parliamentary committee begin hearings as soon as possible after this throne speech debate is over. They would be on the government expenditure cuts in programs that have been announced, and the committee would hear evidence as to why a particular cut was decided on. Also what the alternatives may be, if any, which would still enable the same over-all expenditure reduction target to be achieved.

Such a committee could examine, for example, whether in fact bureaucratic structures are being maintained while reductions are being made in programs that provide needed information and service to the public. For instance, the Department of the Environment could explain why cutting out regional offices would not be a preferred alternative to eliminating the Petawawa Forest Research Station, the fisheries research laboratories in Nova Scotia, and weather ships off the coast of British Columbia. The committee could examine allegations that the Treasury Board and the Department of Finance are not making any meaningful cuts at all in their own bureaucratic structures. The committee could examine whether it is valid for the Department of Consumer and Corporate Affairs to reduce the number of inspections presently being carried out in the field to ensure that hazardous products and food products of questionable quality are not being offered to Canadian consumers, or whether it is correct for the department to be reducing its direct consumer complaint handling services, all in place of other kinds of cuts.

The government says its intention in changing the unemployment insurance system is to move away from simply providing income payments toward using these funds to ensure that unemployed people get training to provide them with skills they lack to fill available jobs. Therefore the committee could inquire why, if this is the case, the government at the same time apparently has under way a serious reduction in existing funding to provide training allowances to these people.

It would appear that the proposed changes in the unemployment insurance system could mean that as many as several hundred thousand Canadians would not be eligible for payments from it in the way they are at present. If there are not, in fact, jobs available for them which are not now being filled, either because of disincentives to work in the present system or, as may be likely, flaws in its administration, these people will simply be thrown on to municipal and provincial welfare rolls. This will mean that the total public expenditure presently involved will continue but will come, to a much greater extent than before, out of municipal and provincial taxes rather than from federal government funds. This means that in many parts of the country the burden will shift to levels of government with a tax base smaller and less equitable than the one available to the federal government. There will be no saving in terms of total public expenditures. It will simply shift to levels of government less able to assume it. This could be a very serious matter for large areas of the country like the Atlantic provinces.

I am pleased to note the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) has some of these aspects under review because of representations by members of the Liberal caucus from the Atlantic provinces and similar areas.

It would appear, however, that only a relatively limited amount of the money the federal government hopes to save through its proposed changes in the unemployment insurance system has been allocated so far to expanding its employment strategy programs, its programs for job creation, beyond what was intended to be spent by the government before it decided to propose the changes in the unemployment insurance system in question. If more funds are not reallocated, this could have unfortunate consequences for a substantial number of individual Canadians and their families everywhere in Canada, even those in regions like Ontario.

Up to this point I have not seen enough detailed information to confirm to me that there will be the necessary high level of co-ordination in the Department of Employment and Immigration to ensure that for all those who will no longer be eligible for unemployment insurance when the proposed changes go into effect, and who are ready and willing to work, there will be either a job at reasonable wages and working conditions, or skill training to help them qualify for those jobs that are available. Nor does the information I have seen so far confirm there will be the necessary co-ordination and effort in the department to ensure that as a last resort some form of meaningful direct employment under government auspices will be available for all of these people.

Much has been said about how the kinds of steps announced by the Prime Minister and certain of his ministers in recent weeks will help restore "business confidence" and that this is what is required in order to get business to increase its investment to expand its activity in Canada. However, it seems to me that business confidence means confidence that it can and will earn a reasonable profit from its activities. Surely this means having sufficient numbers of people in Canada with the level of income needed to buy goods and services produced by business at prices that will yield these kinds of profits. Businessmen are hardly likely to have the necessary kind of confidence if government policy turns out to reduce rather than to maintain and expand the necessary spending power of individual Canadians and their families. Of course it is also argued that business confidence is being inhibited by excessive government involvement in the market place and in the economy generally.

In considering this issue I think it is necessary to look carefully at all aspects of it and to define what is being talked about and what is meant when one speaks of excessive government involvement in the economy. In my view, and I think there is wide agreement on this, the government should always be striving to be more efficient in all its activities and to lessen dramatically burdens of bureaucracy and red tape. It is certainly my objective to have the government operate generally in a more efficient, effective, and competent manner. It does not follow, however, that any particular activity by government is not important and necessary for the well-being both of business and the consumer simply because a valid argument can be made for improving the way the government administers that activity.

Frankly, I do not think that we would have any kind of enterprise system or market system at all today without much of the government involvement in it that has developed over the past 50 years or so. After all, that market system, wher left entirely to its own devices, brought the stock market crash of 1929 and the deep-seated depression of the 1930s that followed. These, in turn, helped to cause the public at large to demand of governments in North America and the western world the development of present-day programs which stabilize the economy and maintain incomes, and which have helped prevent a recurrence, if not of all economic slumps, at least of much of the misery associated with them 40 years ago.

The unlimited, uncontrolled operation of the market system 50 or more years ago, and the unsafe working conditions that were general in it, as well as the dangerous products freely sold through its operation, helped cause the public to demand that government institute the programs to set basic standards for health and safety that we have today. The public also demanded the creation of programs now providing basic standards of income for our older or less fortunate citizens.

The ability of some unscrupulous operators in the market place to drive out competitors and dominate it through monopoly and combines for their benefit, led the public, including many in business, to urge government to set up ground rules for competition through anti-trust or competition legislation.

As I have said, it is possible for government involvement in the market place to be excessive and heavy-handed and we have to guard against this and work to prevent it. However, at the same time, without forms of government involvement to provide a framework and set basic standards on behalf of the community at large, there would likely be no market system at all, with the opportunities it provides for private initiative in Canada and our western society today. Instead, the bulk of the population seeing only the actual and potential abuses of a market system left entirely to its own devices would long ago have supported one or the other of the forms of totalitarianism of the right or the left we now see in all too many of the other parts of the world.

Of course there is a great deal of ambivalence even on the part of those who profess to be the strongest protagonists of free enterprise on the issue of government involvement in the economy.

No business voice in my own Windsor area objected to the decision of the federal and provincial governments to give a grant of $68 million to Ford Motor Company to get it to locate its new engine plant in that area. This grant came about at the initiative of the federal government which provided the larger part of the funds. When the grant was announced, it was looked on, and correctly in my view, as a form of investment with returns to the public through taxes to all three levels of government, through more than two and a half thousand jobs directly created by the operation of the new plant, and through further spill-over economic activity benefiting all of Canada, returns being many times greater than the total grant over only a few years time.

Also, the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) announced a few weeks ago that a further $300 million had been set aside by the government to support, through grants or loans, further innovative business activity. When he did this, no spokesmen of the business community got up and said, "No, keep the money, we don't want it, this should not be done by the federal government; just decrease government expenditure by this amount." But this $300 million program is a form of federal government involvement in the economy, one which will hopefully turn out to be most worth-while for Canadians generally.

At the same time I hope this program will not turn out to be simply an exercise in providing funds in an ad hoc and reactive manner. Instead, the government should move promptly to put in place an industrial strategy for Canada with this program as one of its key elements. I and others have spoken about the need for such a strategy which would mean a new kind of coherent, intergrated set of federal programs to encourage a stronger and larger industrial sector in Canada, one which is more comptetitive and innovative in meeting the challenges of both domestic and world markets.

The government has had for some weeks the reports of the 24 industry sector task forces set up earlier this year. These can provide useful information and suggestions for components of an industrial strategy. However, each report appears to discuss matters from the special perspective of people from the industry it deals with. It is the responsibility of the government to make decisions as to the best ideas which could be taken from each of these studies and from other work, like that of the Science Council, as well.

● (1652)

It is the responsibility of the government to reach conclusions, to make decisions, as to which industrial sectors in Canada are most likely to be winners in domestic and world markets and therefore deserving of additional if not new kinds of federal government support because of the potential of those sectors, regardless of their regional location or their present health. These are the kinds of decisions by government which are urgently required if we are finally to put in place the integrated industrial strategy necessary, if we are to provide additional jobs and improve standards of living for our growing labour force. Such a strategy is needed to eliminate or, at least, to reverse the trend to deindustrialization, the decrease in industrial activity and the decline in the number of industrial jobs in Canada which are all too frighteningly evident if one looks at statistics showing the relatively low percentage of our exports which are in the form of finished manufactured goods.

I return to the matter of government involvement in the economy. Hon. members may recall that a month or so ago three school buses involved in an accident near Hamilton were found to be in an unsafe condition. It was disclosed that the Ontario provincial government had been allowing the company owning these buses to inspect them itself and to put government safety stickers on them. A high proportion of the entire bus fleet was found not to meet provincial government safety standards. I am sure that even strong proponents of deregulation and of eliminating government involvement in the economy were quite happy, especially if their own children were riding those buses, to see the Ontario government finally tighten up its procedures and increase the number and extent of its own bus safety inspections.

This bus safety incident illustrates the limitations of self-regulation by business in the absence of, at the very least, some form of effective monitoring by government. It could be an invitation to abuse by the unscrupulous. It could allow the creation of pressures, in line with the understandable objective of maximizing profit, which could encourage even the well intentioned to cut corners in ways contrary to the best interests of the public. Thus, in my view, there is a continuing need for forms of regulation by government on behalf of the community at large to ensure that all who come together in the market place will get a fair deal there and circumstances where their health and safety are protected.

I regret, therefore, the absence of any specific mention in the Speech from the Throne of a commitment by the government to attempt, at least, to have implemented in this session the second and final stage of the much needed reform and updating of competition policy. I also regret the absence of any indication in the speech of a similar commitment to implementing borrowers' and depositors' protection legislation. The government itself made a case for these measures very well in its own white paper "Agenda For Co-operation" and I would urge the government to move, for the reasons the government itself has given, to have these measures adopted by parliament in the current session. Their purpose is to set reasonable ground rules for the fair and efficient operation of the market place and not to hamper that kind of operation. These measures are therefore quite consistent with the government's current approach of relying to an increased extent on private sector activity for economic recovery.

I speak today, as always, in a constructive sense as one who wants to see the government operate in such a way that the public will give it majority support in the next general election. If the government demonstrates in the course of the present session that it can deal effectively with matters of real concern and importance to individual Canadians and their families, particularly as consumers, workers, and small business people, I believe it can and will win that majority support when the election comes.

But there is one more thing I want to talk about today. Although the government's new higher priority for dealing with economic issues is welcome, the national unity issue remains important. The issues of the economy and of national unity remain closely intertwined. Without unity we shall not be able to deal with our economic problems and unless we deal effectively with those problems we shall not be able to maintain our unity. This means that constitutional reform continues to require attention. Improving the economy and making decisions on constitutional change are both necessary in order to ensure that the majority of Quebeckers continue to wish to be part of Canada. Both are necessary if we are to respond to views expressed in all regions of Canada that improvements in our present constitutional set-up and in the general format of government operations are needed in order that the framework upon which all activity, whether economic or social in our country is based, may be better and more effective.

This must not mean, however, that Canada would no longer have a strong central government, a national government, able to reflect and respond to the needs of the people as Canadians no matter where they live within our country. The Speech from the Throne says there are to be initiatives "to eliminate duplication between federal and provincial programs." This cannot simply mean the elimination of some federal programs or the handing over to the provinces of activities presently carried out by the federal government. Such an approach might be the most valid one in some cases, but surely not in all—there are likely to be as many cases in which functions now handled by the provinces should be turned over to the federal government, for example, to ensure that business, transacted as it is across provincial boundaries and from one end of the country to another, is not faced with 11 sets of conflicting and overlapping rules; also, to ensure that Canadians as consumers benefit from the same basic rules for their protection in the market place no matter where they live.

Mr. Speaker, if we in the House of Commons work in public life mainly through one or another of our organized political parties it is because we continue to see this as the best way of doing our utmost for the well-being of our country and its people. But, surely, all of us in this House, no matter what our political affiliation, can adopt as our own the words of the Governor General spoken in what is likely to be the last throne speech delivered by him, when he said—and I am sure they reflect his personal sentiment—"We also wish to express our love for Canada."

[Translation]

We wish also to express our love for Canada. A great country is not created without difficulty, but to see it develop and grow stronger despite every obstacle has been for us a source of great joy and pride. Our faith in the future of Canada is stronger than it has ever been.

[English]

I hope it will be noted everywhere in this country that love for Canada as one united country can be expressed equally well in French as in English and by Canadians of every origin.

I began my remarks by talking about the welcome new and higher government priority for dealing with economic concerns. But this is really a reflection of the ultimate priority for all of us which is to preserve Canada and build it better for all its people both now and in the future. This is our challenge. I am confident that we, together with Canadians generally, will respond to it with success. In spite of difficulties which can all too easily be outlined, and recognizing at the same time our past achievements and future potential, I believe that given the basic competence of our people, all Canadians, through individual, government and private sector efforts, working together, will build a country truly reflecting these past achievements and future potential, a greater, more united, more prosperous country for all.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is my duty to inform the House that a communication has been received as follows:

October 18th, 1978

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable W. F. Spence, Puisne Judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to-day, the 18th day of October, at 5.30 p.m., for the purpose of giving Royal Assent to a bill.

I have the honour to be,
Sir,
Your obedient servant,
Esmond Butler

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Crosbie) (p. 233).

Mr. Gus Mitges (Grey-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak today and to add my small contribution to the important debate on the Speech from the Throne. I know that there are several areas in the throne speech about which one could make a responsible comment; however, in the speeches which have already been made in this debate, the unfortunate state of our economy, the high rate of unemployment, rampant inflation, and the constant erosion of our dollar have been tabulated well by other hon. members. For me to dwell further on those matters would only be repetitious, notwithstanding the national importance that these matters have to the people of Canada. This being the case, I would like to deal today with a different aspect contained in the throne speech which has not been dealt with at any length so far in the debate.

Before I do this, it would be remiss of me if I did not mention that we on this side of the House are gratified by the positive results of the by-elections Monday night. I was particularly pleased to see the results in the city of Toronto, which I am sure the Liberal party has always taken for granted because of the large ethnoculture present in that city. Despite all the efforts to woo the ethnocultural vote in many nefarious ways, that segment of the population in Toronto refused to be taken for granted by the Liberal party this time. That segment refused to be taken in by almost empty-handed promises of this government to further the cause of multiculturalism in Canada, which are always highlighted when an election draws near and then quickly forgotten after the election is over.

I do not doubt that the Minister of State (Multiculturalism) (Mr. Cafik) is for the most part sincere whenever he speaks glowingly of multiculturalism across the country. However, I am equally convinced that his representations to his cabinet colleagues fall on deaf ears because he knows, and they know, that as far as this government is concerned multiculturalism means votes at election time, after which it is quickly forgotten.

I can assure this House, as a member of my party responsible for multiculturalism, that our policy reflects the wishes and responses of the many ethnocultural groups which make up more than 35 per cent of our population. The response we have received through feedback from all the ethnocultural groups as to how we can make our policy even better has exceeded all our expectations. It is encouraging to me and to my party that, when we form the government, the good faith which has already been established between our party and our fellow Canadians whose origins are neither English or French will be translated into good multiculturalism policies which will be long-lasting and not fleeting as the policies of the government on multiculturalism have been since the inception of the program by this government some seven years ago.

Sincerity, Mr. Speaker, sincerity in government is hard to forge unless one is a very good actor indeed. This government would not only be an outstanding candidate for a best actor award but would probably win an Academy Award hands down. However, even after Academy Award winners have had their day, they fade away and are soon forgotten. It would be a blessing for our country if this same fate befell this government, and the sooner the better.

In the Speech from the Throne the government spoke of its commitment to a renewal of the Canadian federation through constitutional change. However, the government's constitutional bill has only provoked widespread criticism, particularly with respect to the claim that parliament can unilaterally amend the constitution in areas which the federal government deems to fall within its prerogative. Many of us are convinced that the government cannot and should not take this type of unilateral action, even if it restricts its efforts to reform certain federal institutions.

Back in 1867 the BNA Act was formulated by a consensus among the initial founding provinces. In fact confederation was built on the premise that the nature of the union would not be substantially altered without provincial agreement. This government seems to have forgotten or chooses to ignore the spirit of intergovernmental co-operation which led to the development of this nation.

A reform of the constitution must and should only be carried out with a willingness to reach a suitable compromise among all levels of government. There must be full consultation with the provincial governments, and every effort must be made to reach a consensus on proposed changes before any proposals are translated into legislative initiatives. Any other approach to constitutional reform would serve only to divide this country rather than unite it.

It is not my intention to debate the legality of the government's position on this issue. Such discussions are better left to constitutional experts. Rather, I would like to direct the attention of the House back to the government's emphasis on four basic principles of constitutional renewal. They are the preeminence of citizens and their freedoms, full respect of native rights, full development of Canada's two major linguistic communities, and the enhancement of our mosaic of cultures.

This is not the first time that a throne speech has expressed a concern for the protection of individual freedoms and a commitment to a more equitable and pluralistic society, a concern which has in the past been full of empty promises and, equally, full of empty results.

In 1970 we were asked, and I quote:

> —to share the excitement, to face the challenge, to pursue the distant ideal of a just society.

Further, we were told that:

> The Canada of the seventies must continue to be a land for people; a country in which freedom and individualism are cherished and nurtured; a society in which the government lends its strength to withstand, rather than support, the pressures for conformity.

In 1973 we were informed that:

> The government would continue to encourage through its multicultural policy the development of a society in which individuals and groups could develop and express their own cultural identity.

The Speech from the Throne of just two years ago contained these words:

> Canada is a diverse country. Unity can result only from a recognition of that diversity, and not from any attempt to impose rigid uniformity. In matters of language and culture, it is important to recognize the personality of the various parts of the country without departing from the principles of justice and generosity, which should apply everywhere.

There is no doubt in my mind that the Prime Minister's office can prepare reams of fine prose on almost any subject, but, putting aside the rhetoric, what exactly has been accomplished by this government in the areas of human rights and multiculturalism? In spite of the lip service paid to multiculturalism, Canadian tolerance of other cultures and languages is surprisingly low.

Bilingualism and the 1976 dispute over air traffic control demonstrate the strong English-French rivalry which exists in Canada today, a rivalry which this government has not really tried to defuse. On the contrary, this government has managed—and managed quite well, I might add—to inflame this rivalry to gain its own ends and for its own purpose.

Certainly the treatment of our native people and new immigrant groups illustrates a deep-seated ignorance by this government of the value of different cultural aspirations in this great country of ours.

Negative feelings, particularly against non-Europeans, but also against certain categories of Europeans such as those from eastern and southern Europe, have been an unfortunate part of the history of this country, and show very little sign of abating. The Ontario Human Rights Commission reports that:

> The number of reported incidents of racial violence in public places has increased dramatically.

Additional evidence of prejudice and acts of discrimination of both a violent and subtle kind have been reported in numerous briefs submitted to the Human Rights Commission by ethnic groups. Accounts of assault, abuse and harassment can be read about daily in ethnic papers. In spite of all this evidence, many Canadians continue to cling to the myth that Canada is and always has been a society devoid of prejudice, discrimination and racism.

The priority that I am giving in my address today to racism and discrimination against minority cultural groups should not be misconstrued as showing any lack of concern about other human rights problems. For example, women have been seeking to break the bonds of sexism and to achieve full employment opportunity, equal pay for work of equal value, equal employment benefits and equal insurance, credit and property rights, to mention only a few areas of concern. Similarly, the physically handicapped and the aged seek to have their talents fully used rather than being underemployed and isolated from normal Canadian life.

● (1712)

The present government has accomplished little in these areas, and, what has been done is now being dismantled under the excuse of expenditure restraint. Discrimination against various religious groups and sects is also well documented.

However, the most odious form of discrimination, and that which provides the greatest threat to our national unity, is the discrimination based on race or ethnic origin.

There is something peculiarly Canadian about the way a good deal of discrimination is practised in this country. If one can ascribe characteristics to national groups, one would probably call Canadians a people who do most things quietly and dislike making a fuss. We seem to like our diplomacy quiet; we like our political and economic life comparatively quiet. There is no doubt that we like our discrimination quiet. Consequently, much of it is practised quietly by people who do not consider themselves bigots but who discriminate in order to avoid disturbing what they see as the established social order. Such people are the landlords who, while professing their own freedom from prejudice, refuse to rent to members of visible minorities because presumably, their other tenants would move out. They are the employers who reject minority group job applicants for fear of the negative reaction of other employees; or the businesses which exclude patrons from certain racial groups for fear of a general loss of revenue. Of course these people will seldom admit their motives even to themselves; They would not wish to embarrass those who seek jobs, accommodation or services—so they cloak their discrimination in excuses that the job, or the apartment, is gone.

Individually, we must guard against allowing ourselves to practise subtle forms of discrimination against our fellow Canadians. Collectively, it is imperative that we meet the constant threat of discrimination through vigilant and vigorous human rights promotion. We must ensure the vigorous enforcement of the human rights codes which we now have in every province and at the federal level. It is imperative that we strive for a new constitution which guarantees the fundamental freedoms of speech, press, religion, assembly, and which provides protection for minorities and eliminates once and for all the repugnant and distasteful connotations implied in the words second-class citizen.

The proposal to include in the proposed constitution a Canadian charter of rights and freedoms, is welcome indeed. Such a charter would have great psychological value because it would set up a model for both government and public to aspire to and live up to. Furthermore, a constitutionally entrenched bill of rights would have more weight in the courts than existing human rights legislation in Canada.

[Mr. Mitges.]

However, as great as is the need for the charter of rights and freedoms, we all know that you cannot legislate away prejudices or discrimination. Subtle means of discrimination are constantly being devised. However, in spite of this, there are further initiatives which could be taken to bring about a more tolerant climate in Canada. In this respect, the lofty but empty rhetoric of the government is of little value. What is badly needed is greater interaction among all our citizens. This is the key to a greater understanding and more tolerant attitudes among Canadians. Beginning at an early age, Canadians must be taught to respect and appreciate the cultural and linguistic heritage that has become integral to Canadian social development.

The Canadian Consultative Council on Multiculturalism expresses its disappointment that not only are the ethnocultural contributions being largely ignored, but still prevalent is the idea that the education system can be used to try to submerge ethnic identities. To quote the Consultative Council:

> Ethnic diversity is not just a political ideal; it is an inescapable reality. The Canadian education system must provide a more accurate reflection of this reality, if it is to shape a more responsible citizenry for tomorrow.

The Consultative Council was also very critical of the fact that the government has taken little initiative in promoting language learning other than English and French.

The council has repeatedly stressed the important relationship of language to cultural retention, recommending that the government initiate bilateral discussions with the provinces to find more effective alternatives to the cultural enrichment support program.

This program provides only a minimum of support for voluntary organizations to set up extracurricular language classes. The Consultative Council feels very strongly about the need for more language courses in the public school system. Unfortunately, the government has repeatedly ignored the recommendations of the Consultative Council.

Regardless of the fact that education is a provincial responsibility, the protection of human rights and the development of multiculturalism are the responsibility of all levels of government.

The government can no longer ignore the need for lasting and productive federal-provincial discussions regarding the promotion of these ideals.

There is a need, not only in the schools but in the adult population as well, for greater information about the cultural background of the many ethnocultural groups, to eliminate hostile feelings and to eliminate the beliefs in inaccurate and exaggerated stereotypes. There is no question that the multicultural policy should be broadened to include resocialization programs for adult members of the majority society in order to sensitize them to the cultures and the problems that minority members face in our society. In this respect the CBC can play an important role by providing programming which explores the advantages and problems of a multi-ethnic multi-racial society.

Other government agencies, such as the CRTC, the National Film Board, the Public Archives and the National Library, must also shoulder more responsibility in providing accurate information to the public regarding Canada's cultural heritage.

Further, a multicultural policy must be directed toward improving social contacts between the different cultural groups in Canada, and not toward trying to serve each ethnic cultural group almost totally in isolation from each other.

To this end the government should convene national and regional conferences which involve all segments of Canadian society, not just a selected few.

I am distressed by the rumour that the multilingual biblioservice is going to be cut, not because of budgetary restraints, but out of purely political motives. This mini-library operates out of the National Library and distributes books in many different languages for the use of both new immigrants and for Canadians interested in improving their linguistic skills. If this service is dispensed with, we must seriously question the government's commitment to cultural and linguistic diversity. The government's commitment to diversity has been in question on other occasions as well. I have raised this point before in the House, but I think that it bears repeating.

The summer before last the government failed to take the opportunity to make a positive contribution to changing the attitudes of Canadians toward cultural pluralism. At that time we introduced a motion to amend the Immigration Act so that it could take into consideration the multicultural nature of Canadian society. The motion, however, was defeated by the government members of the House. Considering the stance taken by the government on this issue, how can we expect the general public to be open-minded in their attitudes toward cultural diversity?

There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that from the beginning of confederation cultural and linguistic questions have always been central to Canada's existence as a unified and civilized nation. Further, it is true to say that the cultural freedom we all cherish covers a broad way of life. It includes our art, our history, our languages, our customs, and the way we organize our social and family life. It involves our attitudes toward others whose backgrounds are different from our own. It involves the reaction of others toward the traditions we value. There is no question, if we recognize the legitimate aspirations of others, that we ensure the recognition of our own aspirations.

● (1722)

Multiculturalism was born because of the wish of many Canadians of different backgrounds to express themselves through their own culture. Multiculturalism injects a measure of fairness and equality regarding the cultural development of this country, making it easier to feel and become involved in the national life of our country.

A unique healthy Canadian culture is very, very important to all of us. However, such a culture cannot flourish in a limbo. It must be lived every day by all of us who are proud to call ourselves Canadians.

Finally, I should like to close my remarks by saying: let all of us open our minds to a better understanding of what it really means to be a Canadian. Then, of their own accord, those misunderstandings which tend to separate us will start to crumble, and we will see ourselves and our fellow Canadians as we really are.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, the noble sentiments expressed by the hon. member opposite should be commended to all members of the House. Certainly it is fitting that they should be brought forward in the Speech from the Throne debate. I congratulate the hon. member for York South (Mrs. Appolloni) and the hon. member for Verdun (Mr. Savard), the mover and seconder of the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne.

The Speech from the Throne noted the visit of Her Majesty the Queen to the Edmonton Commonwealth Games, the pleasure which Her Majesty felt, and the surge of national pride which we felt as a result of those very excellent games and the ability of our athletes, coaches, volunteers, officials, and indeed everyone connected with the event. It was a moment of true excellence for Canada. It was an event of which all Canadians can be proud. It is most appropriate that our Head of State, as she is, as her heirs are now and will be under our proposed new constitution, should be there to see the final festival of a decade of development of sport in this country. It was the culmination which sport and recreation in all their diverse elements in this country have striven for during the previous ten years.

Many people say to me, "What is sport?" Often it is very difficult to explain because sport has so many different characters. For some, sport is recreation, an activity which is valued for its own sake alone and one which permits a change of pace from the routine demands of life. For these people, sport really needs no justification whatsoever. It simply is. For some others, sport is a means of maintaining physical well-being or fitness. This approach receives strong support in a society which puts a great deal of emphasis on youthfulness and in more spartan nations which called for a regime of health and strength. For others, sport is an opportunity for status display, for being in fashion, for wearing the latest track suit. For a few, sport is an avenue of social and economic advancement. For a very few indeed, sport becomes the vehicle to enter the elite world of sport celebrities.

There is a sizeable number of organized sports, both amateur and professional, which really are big business. They are linked with the media and advertising. They promote the interests of investors and entrepreneurs. They become profit-making ventures. Big time sport also is a mass spectacle. It includes heroes and villains for millions of young and old. Sport becomes a very dramatic public theatre providing fantasy, identification, and adventure.

I was struck by the hon. member who proceeded me making remarks about this side of the House possibly receiving an academy award for performances which have gone on in this chamber. Undoubtedly his party will receive the television award because of all the changes which have been made for the television audience. I am quite sure viewers have taken note of the fact that they are playing to the television audience and not to the House of Commons. Of course, the traditions are well marked.

Speaking of traditions, for over 200 years Canadians have consciously used sport and physical activity as an avenue through which to improve the quality of lifestyle. As early as the 1700s in this country, people had sticks which they used to push balls around on the ice. No one knew what would happen from that little game back then. That little game became something which, at times, is almost a magnificent problem and a danger to our psyche, at the same time as being a great joy. Also there was another game which became very popular. It was called lacrosse, or la croix. It was heralded across the young and rugged frontiers of Canada as it was beginning to bloom as a nation. It was the manner in which ancient societies of Indian people prepared for war. Sometimes the lacrosse games would continue for six or seven days. Indeed casualties were very, very great. Our reputation as a tough sporting country was launched many generations ago. It was launched before the ancestors of members in this House, with the exception of the hon. member for Kamloops-Cariboo (Mr. Marchand) and the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth), came to this country. During the ensuing years perhaps we lost sight of that reputation. From time to time it might have come down in our estimation, and risen once again. It always came back into focus, as sure as a pendulum swings.

It was during those hurly-burly heydays that our national passion for hockey wove itself into the very fibre of our nation. There are times when I feel that hockey is the other side of our national character. Canadians are usually regarded as good grey, conciliatory, co-operative, and very mild mannered. Indeed that is true. I understood another speaker to state earlier today that we were a very moderate people. Also that is true. How does one explain our unbridled passion for hockey, for the aggressive side of our nature, the other side of our national character? If we could meld the aggressiveness of hockey with all the other good characteristics of our country and apply it to the economy, we would have the strength and ambition to invest in our own country rather than have the Germans, Japanese, Arabs and everyone else investing in Canada. Let us apply our hockey know-how to investments in our country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: I should like to tell hon. members more about hockey, because hockey is too important not to be discussed in the House of Commons. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association was formed in the city of Ottawa in 1912. Today it is still a functioning and viable organization, guiding with authority our domestic hockey programs involving some 550,000 Canadian youngsters.

For many years CAHA was a totally male bastion, as was this chamber. In October 1978, the CAHA decided to sanction females in hockey. Females have been participating in hockey virtually as long as the organization has been in existence, but finally they were given recognition. There are women's hockey teams from one end of the country to the other. Hockey is evolving so much so that there are 13 teams of underwater hockey in the province of British Columbia.

As our domestic programs improved and we conquered all comers in this wonderful game of ours, we began to look toward international competition to satisfy the desire to present and perform hockey to the standards and excitement to which we have become accustomed, because we were very good at the game. However, there was a philosophical difference between the Canadian desire to play hockey and that of most of the rest of the hockey-playing world.

Always we wanted to use our best when we went into competition. The argument which came forward was that other hockey playing nations wanted us to use our amateurs. It was not a reconcilable argument, and Canada withdrew from international hockey in 1969. We are still seeking always best on best, and this has finally been facilitated in some remarkable work by men who represent all facets of Canadian hockey in Canada.

• (1732)

I am happy to be able to say that earlier this year Hockey Canada and the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association entered into an unprecedented agreement which brought, at long last, stability and understanding between the amateurs and professionals. This agreement is a very great step forward, and a tribute to both parties. I congratulate the president of the Canadian Amateur Hockey Association for being so far-seeing as to be able to speak for his people in this way and to sign this document that has literally ended 30 years of disagreement. I also must commend the retiring president of Hockey Canada, Douglas Fisher. I believe that no one has done more for sport in this country than Douglas Fisher, and I believe that bringing forward this agreement through Hockey Canada was the greatest achievement of his contributions to hockey.

This agreement clearly stipulates that Hockey Canada will design the policy governing exchanges dealing with Canada's national teams, be they professional, that is, Canada Cup, and World Championships, Junior—Junior World Championships—or amateur, that is, the Olympic Games. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association, on the other hand, will continue to deal with matters of club exchanges, official development, rule changes, etc. In short, it has finally been agreed to by all parties, and signed by both parties, that the Board of Hockey Canada, of which the CAHA is a member, will be in charge of ensuring that our international hockey objectives be pursued with vigour, planning, and foresight. The over-all, long-range planning for our involvement in international hockey will be handled by the Board of Hockey Canada, and we will present a united Canadian front at the council tables of the International Ice Hockey Federation. The Canadian Amateur Hockey Association president was elected to the council of the IIHF as a result of this accord, and Canada retains its two votes on that body's congress.

The hockey furor of 1969 brought into focus once again the concept that the game is our official national sport. Members of this House, I have to tell you that hockey is not our official national sport. Lacrosse advocates will tell you that it is our official national sport. There is no evidence to suggest that any member of this House has ever brought forth a bill in that regard. I commend those people who are bringing in private members' bills, and certain members on this side of the House have indicated to me that they would like to bring in such a bill. I think that we will leave it up to the sports' community to decide whether it is hockey or lacrosse because, indeed, there is a good case to be made for both parties. Both sports are played by so many people and have a great deal to do with our past and future in sport.

In the early 1960s the federal government lent a much-needed support service to the sport and recreation community in this country. Close contact was maintained with the community and with the provinces. For several years we, the Government of Canada, acted as neutral onlookers, and at times we dispersed a little bit of financial assistance and other resources in response to their direct needs. At times we implemented proposals submitted from outside the government, and then there were instructional and promotional materials which we gradually produced, but seldom did the government actually initiate a program of its own.

A number of significant achievements in this country's centennial year changed this entire situation. In the winter of 1968 this government began the first Canada Games in Quebec city, and this first national, multi-sport event at that time demonstrated that Fitness and Amateur Sport, the directorate as it was then called, had a role to play in Canada, and that it was a significant one. It was the chief catalyst and co-ordinator in the planning and carrying out of the fitness and amateur sport crusade. It was during these very same games that the directorate led a discussion under which was born the concept of an Arctic Winter Games.

There is no doubt that all Canadians, regardless of where they live, have a right to equal access to sport, recreation and fitness outlets. So, if we have the Baffin region Inuit games in Pangnirtung, and if the baseball rules are not quite up to the standards of the game being played in the ball parks of Montreal or Toronto, that is to be expected, but it is still a growing thing. The youngsters of this country, no matter where they live, have an equal right, so we have the Arctic Winter Games and we have the northern games.

At the time in 1967 when we brought in the first Canada Games, they were the only winter games in the entire country. Now there are games in every province and in many regions, both summer and winter. There is great progress in the provinces and regions of this country in these various sports programs.

We also hosted the Pan-American games in 1967, just 13 years after we hosted the British Empire Games in Vancouver. There was then a symposium in Montreal to examine leisure time and the possibilities of its consequences in the future. Recreation was seen as a complex, multi-faceted area whose collective impact deeply affected the character of Canadian society. This was when everybody was saying, "My goodness, what are we going to do when we get to the future because we are going to have so much leisure time we are not going to know what to do with it all?" Everybody was potting flowers, and weeding, and learning how to do various types of sports, and moving at a great rate to prepare for this future when nobody would be busy any more.

This development has moved on, because after 1967 came 1969 and the task force on sport, which was initiated by this government, and which produced a report that reinforced the belief that sport is an important component of Canadian culture. Our athletes are as important as those who are from the art world. And here comes one now, Mr. Speaker.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

[Translation]

A message was delivered by the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable House in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the House went up to the Senate chamber.

• (1742)

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the House that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bill:

Bill C-8, An act to provide for the resumption and continuation of postal services—Chapter 1.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

[English]

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mrs. Ursula Appolloni for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Crosbie) (p. 233).

Hon. Iona Campagnolo (Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport)): Mr. Speaker, I was beginning to talk about the 1969 task force before we moved to the other place. Over 80 per cent of the recommendations in that report have been implemented, and during the period of implementation other studies, reports, and policy statements emerged back in 1970. The then minister of national health and welfare, the hon. member for Hamilton East (Mr. Munro) announced a policy, a first sports policy for Canadians. The paper clearly recognized competitive sport excellence as a consequence of increased participation. We talk quite glibly about the mass participation base and the high performance sports levels. This was the time when we decided that we were going to give some assistance to those people who were seeking the high performance levels, and there were new structures created to tackle specific problems that had been identified.

The National Sports and Recreation Centre was established to house and provide administrative services to many of our national sport governing bodies—54 are resident there out of the 88 recognized sports in Canada—and recreation governing bodies as well. It was the services of this centre which provided them with executive back-up and the means of being able to carry on their executive functions in a businesslike atmosphere. Many people know that various excellent people were elected as volunteers in many of the sport governing bodies. Some had to manage the administration of their sport governing body from their kitchen table or their spare room. Often the president was in one city, the treasurer in another, and the vice president might be in yet another part of Canada. What we have done at the request of sports is to bring further administrative assistance to these sport governing bodies.

Of course other things happened. Hockey Canada was created at that time and "Participaction", which is technically known as Sport Participation Canada, was established to promote the fitness message across Canada. The Coaching Association was created to encourage coaching development through programs and services to coaches at all levels. Coaching certification and apprenticeship programs are recent developments in that area.

Until recently, Canada's performance in international sport could be best described as inconsistent. Our international performance was very much a reflection of what was happening at the national level. Beyond that, one question kept begging to be asked: what opportunities are being provided for young people to participate in this country?

Today, public attitudes to sport and recreation have changed very drastically. Many thousands have participated in national sport championships. In fact some 14,000 have participated in the Canada Games alone, and we expect another 2,400 to join those numbers in Brandon, Manitoba, next year, from February 12 to 24 for the Canada Games.

Then there was the Game Plan Assistance Program. This was for athletes ranked amongst the world's 16 best. Through our grant-in-aid program to student athletes we have been assisting some of the young people at the provincial level to develop their athletic skills. A total of nearly $6.5 million has been awarded to Canadian men and women involved in sport competition to assist them in pursuing their athletic careers.

More than ever Canadians of all ages, Canadians of all backgrounds and both sexes, are participating in this Sport Crusade. In fact, the numbers are quite incredible. From 1972 to 1976, jogging, skiing, and tennis have enjoyed a tremendous growth in participation, ranging from a 148 per cent increase to a 197 per cent increase in these fitness related sports alone.

There was a decade of development for young people. It saw the birth of the fitness awards program. This is a program, one of the very few, we have in the schools of the nation. As hon. members know, the educational system is at the provincial level and there is some difficulty in communicating with the ministers of education of the provinces on national goals and standards in fitness. In Canadian schools there is a great range in levels of fitness and participation in sport. Our fitness awards program has at least brought some awareness to something like 1.8 million young people who have received bronze, silver, and gold crests as a result of their accomplishments in the sport hierarchy within their own peer groups.

Now there is a cross-Canada sport caravan. This is a very interesting demonstration. It has trucks loaded with sport equipment that go into small towns and villages. The demonstrators lay out all the equipment and teach the public how to participate in as many as 40 sports and just about as many fitness related programs. In addition, there is a way in which we can test people for their fitness regardless of age. We can put them through our step test or our fit kit test and show people how to keep fit and keep involved. Because, let us face it, we cannot legislate fitness. We cannot legislate people to be strong and healthy within our society. Yet we know we are spending $8 billion on health care in this nation alone. That could be reduced by as much as 40 per cent if we were to upgrade our own fitness levels, indeed our lifestyle. Alcohol, smoking, nutrition, obesity and fitness, these are the components of a lifestyle that can change that level of the cost of health care.

The cross-Canada sports demonstration program has had as many as two million visitors. This year the Canadian Public Health Association employee fitness project has been carried out in 51 corporations across this nation. This was begun as a make-work project for out of work recreationists, and yet it has turned out to be one of the most exciting projects in which Fitness and Amateur Sport has been involved. We contributed $336,000 to administer the project. Additional funds were brought forward by the Department of Employment and Immigration and the Summer Job Corps added their program to it. The final report of the project is still to come, but we know that some of those recreationists are now permanently employed. Of the group that started 60 per cent are continuing on their own, without any assistance from anyone, to have fitness components in their offices. Because of this they are keeping their workers in better communion with their own bodies.

Federal contributions to sport governing bodies are, of course, fundamental to the program. Every year national associations submit requests for financial assistance, which are then considered from a feasibility and financial standpoint. During the last year contributions to sport and recreation governing bodies have totalled $24.1 million. I would like to emphasize that figure, Mr. Speaker, because that is just about $1 per head per Canadian. That is what we are spending, about $1 per head. One could probably write it at the bottom of each income tax return if we had the time to say this is where this money is going, and I believe it is well spent indeed.

Greater emphasis is now being placed upon accountability, both fiscal and technical. That means two things in sport. Of course, as with any other group which receives funds from the taxpayers, all sport governing bodies must be fiscally responsible, and so they are accountable to the people. But technical acountability is quite another thing, and one which we are now working on in a way that will make it possible to make the dollars that we do have go further.

For example, is it necessary for the rowing club to go to Florida when they might possibly train in Burnaby? Must we have high altitude training in Switzerland, or can it be done in Canada? Is it possible for us to compete? We must compete. But many people say to me, "What are Canadian equestrians doing in Rumania?" I will tell you: that is where the best competition is. As well I am asked, "What are Canadian fencers doing in Poland?" The answer to that question is: that is where they meet their finest competition, because they are the ones they will be meeting when entering competitions. So, when I am asked, "What are Canadian boxers doing in Cuba?" I will tell them, "That is where the competition is."

And sometimes those people come to Canada because Canada is becoming one of the most distinguished host nations for sport in the world. It is also one of the nations that sport countries like to attend. There have been requests for the World Soccer Championship to be held in Canada. There have been requests for more Pan-American Games, more Summer Games and Winter Games, in fact games of all types. This even includes brand new games that are being requested.

As every one knows, there is a four year cycle in sport. It begins with the Olympic Games. The following year is a year off. After that comes the Commonwealth Games, then the Pan-American Games, followed by the Winter Olympics, and back to the Summer Olympics.

The year following the Summer Olympic Games is "the year off". That year is being looked at by many sport organizations who would like to have world championships at that time. There are tens of thousands of volunteers who have assisted in this program being carried out in every part of the country.

Today is a rather special day. We hear from a number of people when our sport heroes are being honoured. Today a coach will receive the Order of Canada. Her name is Ellen Burka, the coach of Toller Cranston, mother of Petra Burka, and coach of Lynn Nightingale. Tonight Mrs. Burka will receive the Order of Canada. I think that is a well deserved recognition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Campagnolo: Canadians are more aware than ever before of the need to take part in regular physical activity. In my opinion that has been shown by the success of Participaction. Participaction receive $500,000 of taxpayers' money every year. They receive $8 million in free time in the journals and in the electronic media of this country to display ads. That is well spent money because the message is going home.

I hope those of you who are a few pounds overweight, as some of us sometimes are, will be ready, because we are going to aim at obesity with Participaction in the next year. So perhaps we will see a change there.

Now for a look at the future of sport. In 1978 we saw the dawning of what will be another significant ten-year period. The transformation is coming in the wind again, and the ten years ahead will be ones of decision-making.

Mr. Prud'homme: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. On behalf of all hon. members in this House I would like to extend to the hon. Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) (Mrs. Campagnolo) our very best wishes on the occasion of her birthday today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It being six o'clock, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 2 p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

IMMIGRATION

DATA BANKS ON IMMIGRANTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent necessity concerning the Department of Employment and Immigration, and particularly the data banks maintained by that department. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Darling):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately confirm to the House that his department maintains over 60 data banks on immigrants and Canadian citizens, and that in particular data bank number 4200 contains information on immigrants and Canadian citizens living in Canada and suspected of being, or associated with terrorists, criminals and other subversive elements and, finally, can the minister confirm that data bank 4200 contains the names of at least 500 residents of Canada trained in guerrilla warfare and terrorists at Finsterwalde, in East Germany, and in Algeria and that it also contains the names of approximately twelve professional assassins or "hit men" resident in Montreal and operating under the direction of a branch of the French intelligence service.

Mr. Speaker: Provision under Standing Order 43 permits the presentation of a motion for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ELECTIONS

BY-ELECTION RESULTS—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House, noting that the Prime Minister blamed the recent defeat of the government of Nova Scotia and the even more recent shellacking of the federal government in the by-elections on a general anti-government feeling, urges him to adjust his blinkers and note, following yesterday's event on the prairies:

(a) that when a government governs well it can expect an almost 10 per cent increase in its popular vote, and

(b) that an amendment should be added to the endangered species act to provide for the designation of the last two provincial Liberal MLAs west of Ontario.

TRADE

CALL FOR TRADE CONFERENCE IN OTTAWA—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise to make a motion, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. As the Canadian Manufacturers' Association has recently stated that if this country can overcome its annual trade deficit of more than $12 billion a year in fully manufactured products, we could make available an additional 800,000 new jobs for Canadians to work at, and as a vital aspect of increasing our exports of these very important products is to make Canadian producers more aware of the opportunities which exist for selling their products in the many export markets which are available to them, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis):

That the government recall our trade commissioners from the principal markets of the world at an early date, for a trade conference to be held in Ottawa, where all Canadian producers who wish to investigate the possibilities of selling their products in specific markets can learn from the trade commissioners who serve those markets what the possibilities are and take advantage of them.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion for debate can be done only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST SAGUENAY RIVER DREDGING CEASE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a motion dealing with a vital question of pressing necessity for the people of the Saguenay area.

Considering that a report published in 1975 by Professor Loring and dealing with a concentration of mercury in the area between the Bay and Jonquière containing from 6 to 12.3 parts per million—a rate of 1 part per million being considered a high rate of pollution; considering that under bacterial action, mercury changes into methyl mercury, a toxic product permanently affecting the human nervous system and causing the unfortunately well-known Minimata sickness; considering that the dredging operations now under way on the Saguenay River could very well increase such bacterial activity, 970,000 cubic yards of sediment being removed, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Beaudoin):

That the House enjoin the Minister of Transport to put a stop to the dredging operations on the Saguenay River as long as a review assessing the ecological impact of that project and suggesting alternate dredging procedures are not put forward by Environment Canada in co-operation with the Department of Environment in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker: Under the provisions of Standing Order 43, such a motion can be presented for debate only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

URBAN AFFAIRS

LEAVE OF ABSENCE OF WM. TERON—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dean Whiteway (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the Ministry of State for Urban Affairs has been without a full-time deputy minister for nearly one half year, despite assurances by the Minister of State for Urban Affairs and the Prime Minister that Mr. Teron was being granted only a four-month leave of absence, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Ottawa-Carleton (Mrs. Pigott):

That the Minister of State for Urban Affairs make a statement on motions today outlining the present status of Mr. William Teron and the conditions under which the extension was granted.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion can be presented for debate at this time only with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

REQUEST FOR IMPLEMENTATION OF DISNEY REPORT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to move a motion under Standing Order 43. In view of the government's general restraint program and cutbacks in funding to the arts, which will result in even more professional actors and artists being unemployed, and in view of the fact that these creative people are not covered by unemployment insurance benefits as are other self-employed people, such as fishermen, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Peters):

That this House instruct the Minister of Employment and Immigration to implement forthwith the recommendations of the Disney report pertaining to unemployment insurance benefits for professionals in the arts.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate can be done, pursuant to Standing Order 43, only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

POST OFFICE

APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR-ARBITRATOR IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Minister of Labour. The minister will know there are continuing serious difficulties in getting postal services restored in the country. He indicated in the House on October 17 that he would be appointing a mediator-arbitrator within hours of passage of the bill, and he would be doing that after consultation.

Can the minister now tell us whether that mediator-arbitrator has been appointed, who it is, and whether consultation has occurred?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Consultations are taking place, Mr. Speaker. The search for a suitable person is actively under consideration. I hope to be in a position to make such an appointment very soon.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, none of us in this House wants to inflame this very difficult situation. However, it is very difficult for us to understand why the minister is encountering such difficulty and why the government is delaying so long in the identification of a mediator-arbitrator.

Can the acting minister give some indication as to when he expects such a person to be in place and, consequently, when he expects serious negotiations to begin?

Mr. Ouellet: If the Leader of the Opposition does not want to inflame the situation, Mr. Speaker, he should take my word that I am actively working to find a suitable person who is ready to accept the job and actively carry out his responsibility in the very near future.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, we will, naturally, want to inquire why the government, which has known about this problem and has, presumably, had legislation prepared for some time, was not acting more quickly even in advance of passage of the bill, considering the possibilities of those people who might be in a position to accept this matter. That is a question we can pursue at another time.

May I now ask the acting minister what action the Government of Canada is taking right now to assist those workers who are members of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers and who want to go back to work but are being harassed or threatened in their attempt to do so? What steps are being taken to ensure that those postal workers who want to go back to work can do so?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, these questions are very much in the mind of the government. We do not need the Leader of the Opposition to remind us of these points. The Postmaster General is taking steps in this direction.

MEASURES TO RECALL STRIKERS

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Perhaps the matter is well accepted by the minister but we in the opposition need answers. What specific measure is the government taking now to ensure that the employees who want to work will be in a position to start working today?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): The Leader of the Opposition should put this question to the employer, namely to the Postmaster General.

[English]

JOB SECURITY OF RETURNING STRIKERS

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I can pose a question to the Postmaster General, who has been keeping a low profile in all these recent events in the Post Office. In view of the large number of postal workers who have indicated their desire to keep the mail moving, can the Postmaster General inform the House and the people of Canada what assurance he has given that their jobs are secure, that they will be free from harassment, and that the government will move immediately to resolve the crisis of its own creation by moving expeditiously to implement the long-term solutions for labour-management relations that have been advocated by the official opposition for many months now?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have been saying for several weeks that the present government would take its responsibilities in case of a crisis, and I think we did so when we passed Bill C-8 with the co-operation of the opposition. We intend to continue to take our responsibilities.

● (1417)

[English]

Some steps have been taken in co-operation with the Minister of Justice, so that all the power of civil laws will be applied to people picketing, to ensure that everything illegal will be prosecuted and that our workers will be free to get into installations and post offices and be free and secure to work.

I should like to add that even though we are taking very definite steps as far as that area is concerned, we do not want to be unduly harsh with our postal workers, though we intend to be firm in our resolve that the law shall be obeyed. Those who feel secure in the thought that they will not be prosecuted are very much mistaken. The leaders must recognize that the full force of the law will be applied.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lamontagne: Above all, those workers who wish to work must be able to do so in the secure knowledge that they will be protected from those who would intimidate them.

Mr. Dinsdale: Mr. Speaker, I have an important question to ask. Can the Postmaster General deny, or confirm, reports that instructions have gone out from management to lock out employees who are anxious to keep the mails moving? Where did these instructions come from? Is the Postmaster General aware of them, and what is he doing about it, because such action would constitute breaking of the law by management itself.

Mr. Lamontagne: I can assure the hon. member that no such order has been given. I ask him to show a great deal of understanding with regard to this matter. We are dealing with a very ticklish situation and we would like the workers to be assured that they can work in the Post Office and do so freely.

STATISTICS CANADA

EFFECT OF FOOD PRICES ON CPI

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It has been announced that Statistics Canada, when providing its annual figures next month for changes in the consumer price index, intends to downplay the role of food prices as an element of that index by some 3.5 per cent.

Since the reason for making the change has to do with patterns of consumption which are now four years old—a smaller percentage of family income was spent upon food four years ago than is the case now—will the minister prevent this change which will have a profoundly misleading impact on the price index, given the fact that food prices have risen by almost 15 per cent so far this year?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this change reflects one of the recommendations which followed the first ministers' conference. The premiers of Ontario and Alberta felt the consumer price index was too heavily weighted as far as food is concerned, having regard to the average Canadian food basket. More Canadians were eating out and for that reason more labour was built into the satisfaction of their food requirements. The two premiers requested this updating of the consumer price index. We found there was considerable agreement with them and we have taken steps to move the index more in line with the food baskets of average householders.

Mr. Broadbent: I did not know the hon. gentleman would be following the advice of Conservative provincial premiers: maybe it has something to do with his own history.

● (1422)

I would like to quote from a secret cabinet document dated June 14 of this year. It is a federal cabinet document, not a provincial cabinet document, in which it is stated:

There is little evidence to suggest that the proportion of income spent on food is continuing to decline and it could even be slightly higher.

That document was prepared after consultation with the minister's seatmate and a number of departments. If that is the case, could the minister tell the House why, when food prices are actually playing a more significant role in terms of family expenditures, the government is going to downplay them as an element of the consumer price index?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, Statistics Canada operates in the best way it knows. We could advise Statistics Canada as to what action it should take. In this case, following the first ministers' conference, we did ask Statistics Canada to take a look at the component parts of the food basket. With regard to the percentage of disposal income Canadians spend on food, that percentage has not gone up noticeably at all. In fact, it is probably the lowest percentage of any of the industrialized countries.

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, the minister is totally ignoring the findings of his own government's interdepartmental assessment of food prices as an element of the consumer price index, which is one of the considerations at which the government itself was looking.

Considering that pension cheques and family allowance cheques are indexed according to changes in the consumer price index, and that lower income people and people on fixed incomes, such as pensioners, spend a much higher percentage of their income on food than others, does the minister not agree that the change the government is now embarking upon will be disadvantageous and unfair to the precise group of Canadians who need assistance most?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's premise is quite wrong. He is referring to an interdepartmental document which was circulated among various departments. It is not a government document. The government did not accept that assertion. It was just one of a number of positions put forward.

[Mr. Horner.]

In view of the hon. member's desire to quote figures, I would like to raise a question of privilege and deal with some figures he suggested were correct yesterday. The hon. member seems to be very anxious to read secret documents, but he will not read the public documents we put out and ask him to read.

I would like to point out to the hon. member and to the House generally that old age pensions will be raised by, I think, $20 per month starting today.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST SAGUENAY RIVER DREDGING CEASE

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The minister is probably aware of the complaints voiced by the people in Saguenay-Lac-Saint-Jean concerning the dredging being done in the Saguenay River and the danger caused by mercury, as was demonstrated by qualified authorities. Can the minister tell the House whether he will consider or order an extensive study on this question, and whether he will immediately take action before going further with this work, so as to preserve the environment in this area?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I acknowledge the representations made by the hon. member and I will seek to give him an answer.

POST OFFICE

PROTECTION OF RETURNING STRIKERS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Justice. The Postmaster General referred to the minister's department as being prepared to take whatever steps are necessary to ensure that a significant number of the members of CUPW who wish to return to work can do so safely and quickly.

Can the minister tell the House, the public and members of CUPW just what those steps are and what assurances the minister can give to those who wish to return to work and to obey the law?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure hon. members that we are examining all the courses of action which are open and the advantages of the various courses of action. We will be taking such steps as make sense in order to assure the best possible results.

• (1427)

Of course, that involves enforcing the law and, above that, I hope that all members would join me in requesting that all citizens in Canada obey the law, since in a democratic state it is well known that it is not through sanctions but through willing obedience that the law is enforced and order is maintained. I think that is extremely important at this time. In that context, I would not elaborate on the specific forms of action which we will take, except to assure hon. members that we are very actively engaged in examining the choices.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, a number of members of the Postal Workers Union, the inside workers, have indicated that they are very anxious to return to work. It is not clear how significant that number is, but there are some. It seems to me that it would be proper to urge upon the minister to say something a little more definite to assure these people that there would not be any intimidation or acts that do not fall within the law which we passed the other night, but other acts against the Criminal Code, and I say that keeping in mind the fact that the vast majority of union members in this country are law-abiding citizens and are prepared to obey the laws of Canada.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I agree with that. Certainly, I would think that in the ordinary course the workers in question, having seen the law passed by parliament, would feel safe and free to return to work. Of course, if there are any suggestions of criminal activity, intimidation or threat, these are matters which will also engage the attention of my colleagues, the provincial attorneys general. In that connection, I hope that any evidence of any such occurrences would be brought to my attention or that of the provincial attorneys general at the earliest possible moment.

ALLEGED LOCK-OUT OF RETURNING STRIKERS

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Postmaster General, who should be aware of the situation in Orangeville, Ontario, where the local members of the Postal Workers Union wrote to a number of offices urging those workers to stay on the job in the national interest, and where the local workers in Orangeville reported for work on Monday and Tuesday and kept the office open, with the result that mail was delivered to some 12,000 homes in the area, only to find on Wednesday that on orders from Ottawa the postal management has decided to lock them out without pay.

I ask the Postmaster General how he can possibly justify this disgraceful betrayal of these dedicated and loyal employees.

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the incident at Orangeville was brought to my attention so that I could look into it. I feel the example of the employees there should have been followed by many other postal workers throughout Canada. The only reason that decision was made was that, because of the strikes at other post offices, no mail was reaching Orangeville, and so they would have been given access to the building but without having any work to do. It was rather difficult for us to do so, under the circumstances; we therefore told them to go back home. It was not a matter of having what is known as a lock-out. We merely told them to return home and that we would call them back as soon as there was work to be done.

[English]

Some hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, in six years I have never seen a more shameful performance by a minister. Does the minister deny it was the postal management at Ottawa with the advisory committee of the Post Office, of which the Postmaster General himself is a member, who decided upon the policy that these employees would be locked out, not only in Orangeville but in other areas where the postal workers had decided to go back to work and to keep the Post Office open, without pay?

Can the minister give an assurance to the House today that these dedicated and patriotic Canadians who work to serve the people in their communities will get full pay for the day they were locked out, and that this disgraceful circumstance will never be repeated in the future?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I can guarantee all those postal employees who want to work in our offices, where there is work to be done, that they will be welcome. We will give them work to do and they will be paid. I do not think a department or any responsible organization can be asked to pay employees when there is no work to do. Still, I feel that as time goes on, as more employees go back to work the more we shall be able to give them work to do.

• (1432)

[English]

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, there was work for these employees to do and the Postmaster General should be aware of that. Never again can the government ask people to sacrifice in the national interest, by returning to work during a strike to provide an essential service, if they find they have been treated so shabbily.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Beatty: Can the Postmaster General give the House firm assurance that the policy of lock-out has stopped as of today and that no postal employees in the country have been locked out by postal management?

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, if the policy of lock-out has been existing, it will be stopped.

Oral Questions

PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General. Six days ago, as reported on page 64 of Hansard, in response to a question by the hon. member for Hamilton West with respect to the need for a parliamentary committee, the Postmaster General said the following:

Mr. Speaker, I do not think I ever said that I wanted a parliamentary inquiry, or that I ever suggested that.

How does the Postmaster General reconcile that statement with his reply to me on March 7, 1978, as reported at page 3518 of Hansard, when I asked for a parliamentary committee at that time and the Postmaster General said that such a committee was not necessary then because they knew the problems, could probably find the answers, and he concluded with the following words:

If not, I will be very happy to agree to that request.

Would the Postmaster General be happy now to agree with that request and appoint a parliamentary committee?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that, as things now stand in the department, there is need for a parliamentary committee. I feel we are fully aware of the problems and that, with the various studies made throughout the years that have been brought to our attention, we can take the required decisions. One very important decision was made by the Prime Minister, the cabinet and the government members, namely to set up a Crown corporation as soon as possible. Then, all hon. members will have the opportunity to express their views before a committee of the House if they so wish.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. Having regard to the expressed optimism of the Minister of Transport yesterday that a settlement of the traffic tie-up on the Great Lakes might be reached, and since it did not occur and presumably discussions and negotiations are ongoing, can he bring the House up to date on the progress of the discussions involving the two interested parties and the representative of the government?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Yes, Mr. Speaker, discussions took place last night. Some proposals were studied by the parties overnight. Discussions resumed this morning and are continuing at the present time.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since the statements of the Minister of Transport expressing optimism are hollow, as is usual with his statements about other matters, how many more days of optimism will we have to go through before service is resumed in a normal fashion, which service is necessary and in the public interest?

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the only report I can make at this time is that discussions are continuing and that mediation is progressing at a good speed. I think it is useful for members of the House to allow the normal process of mediation to run its course, and not to intervene with any suggestions or put undue pressure on this normal process which is now taking place.

INDEXING OF PENSIONS

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. It concerns the ongoing, comprehensive review which the government is carrying out on the retirement income situation of all Canadians and, more specifically, with the forthcoming amendments to the public service pension program with respect to the indexing of pensions, to changes in the cost of living.

In view of the fact that the last twenty-year Canada Savings Bonds paid 9½ per cent, that the central bank rate is now 10¼ per cent, and since the minister told the House in March, 1978, that he would set the indexation rates for the next three years in the month of October, 1978, will he confirm that there is sufficient money in the superannuation funds from interest earnings which will be realized from pensioners' investments in the program to pay full indexation of these pensions?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member for Ottawa-Vanier has indicated, I announced to the House last March that the review of the rate at which the basic public service pension payments could be augmented, or supplemented, would be examined in light of the funds available to the basic pension fund related to the excess or additional interest paid on those funds, that portion owned by the pensioners themselves. That study is under way by the chief actuary now. I expect to have the report very shortly.

I am very hopeful to be in a position to make an announcement in October as to the proposed rates for the next three years. Also, the preparation of legislation for an amendment to that plan is almost finalized. We hope to introduce it in the House soon. I will be more explicit at that time as to the amount and degree of available supplementation. As the hon. member has noted, the bond interest rate will have its effect upon that.

ALLEGED SECRET TRIAL OF CORPORAL RADEY

Mr. Andrew Brewin (Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, my question is addressed to the Solicitor General. According to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation, a secret trial is being conducted by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police in Toronto of one, Colonel Radey, who turned over to the Laycraft commission information indicating that he and others had been bugged by RCMP officers.

Will the minister inquire into the facts of this case and inform the House the basis of the charges against Colonel Radey? Also, will he look into the question of whether he is being denied counsel, and whether the secret hearing and denial of counsel is not, in fact, a breach of individual human rights conferred by the Bill of Rights?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that matter was drawn to my attention immediately prior to my coming into the House. I would be pleased to make inquiries and report on those areas upon which reports can be made.

Mr. Brewin: Mr. Speaker, I am told by one of my colleagues that I referred to the gentleman as Colonel Radey. I meant to say that he was a corporal, not a colonel. I did not intend to promote him so rapidly.

An hon. Member: Perhaps he should be promoted.

Mr. Brewin: Yes, perhaps he should be. My supplementary question is directed to the Solicitor General. It is my understanding that the former solicitor general, the hon. member for Argenteuil-Deux-Montagnes, claimed in an affidavit that the information on this entire matter affected national security. Will the minister look into the involvement of the former solicitor general in this matter and advise whether the claim that it involves national security is false, an abuse of the privileges of the solicitor general and, indeed, a sort of cover-up? Can he inform the House about that matter?

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the alleged affidavit, as I understand the matter from very cursory information, it relates to evidence adduced before the Laycraft commission. As the hon. member recalls, the then solicitor general filed an affidavit at that time as is permitted under the Federal Court Act. Also, as the hon. member knows, there has been a complete report filed by the Laycraft commission. That report is available to the hon. member. If he wishes to have a copy of it, I will make one available to him. The matter has been disposed of in terms of the Laycraft commission itself.

With reference to the corporal, while I do not have the information requested by the hon. member in his initial question, I would point out to him that in the last session of the House we introduced Bill C-50 which dealt with amendments to the Royal Canadian Mounted Police Act as a result of the Marin inquiry dealing with the question of internal discipline affecting the RCMP. It is the full intention of the government to deal with that bill and reintroduce it at an early time.

POST OFFICE

MEASURES TO ASSIST STRIKERS TO RETURN TO WORK

Mr. Heward Grafftey (Brome-Missisquoi): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to direct my question to the Postmaster General.

In answering several questions in the House this afternoon, the minister has given an idea of his intentions. However, I would like to know, Mr. Speaker, what the minister is actually doing, besides making statements and giving words of encouragement, to help the postal employees who want to work get back to their jobs? Besides words of encouragement and statements, what is he actually doing to help those people who want to work get back to work and to settle the situation?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, may I take the opportunity of this question to clarify a reply I gave a few moments ago? I asked the Deputy Postmaster General if there had been lock-outs anywhere in Canada. There have been no lock-outs up to now anywhere in the country, and therefore any employee who comes to work will be received and paid.

To answer the hon. member's question, all our divisions throughout Canada have been instructed to take all the necessary legal steps to inform our employees that they are welcome to come back to work. And following the statements made by the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Labour, we are making the necessary arrangements so that, if need be, civil forces will be used to keep our entrances open. Those who may want to block the way for our employees at postal facilities will be prevented from doing so.

FLOODS

MINISTER'S ANSWER TO QUEBEC REGARDING PROTECTION AGAINST FLOODS

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister of environment.

Last week the minister of natural resources in Quebec informed the press that he had sent a telegram to the minister to make sure that he could go ahead with his flooding protection program. Since he did not receive any answer from the federal minister, would the minister inform his provincial counterpart about the program to which the federal government committed itself last year to protect the Montreal area against floods?

[English]

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, I will have to check my office and see if a reply is ready. I have been in British Columbia on government business for the last four days. Certain cuts have had to be made in the program. I will be happy to get back to the hon. member.

[Translation]

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER WILL HONOUR UNDERTAKING GIVEN TO QUEBEC

Mr. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question.

Is the minister prepared to confirm that he had indeed signed an agreement with the government of the province of Quebec on that matter? If so, would be tell the House tomorrow, at the latest, if he is going to honour his undertaking or if that will pass with the constraints we have already experienced?

[English]

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, we have a flood protection agreement, as well, with the province of Quebec, the province of British Columbia and some other provinces. We did make cuts in that flood protection program both in the province of British Columbia and in the province of Quebec. These were some of the very difficult measures the government had to take. I will be pleased to look into the question that the hon. member refers to about Quebec's representation. I have not yet had a chance to look at that matter in my office.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT OF NO. 3CW

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister in charge of the Wheat Board. In view of the large amounts of No. 3 red wheat in the eastern and northern prairies from last year, and again this year, so that some farmers are delivering grain with their deferred quotas this year, can the minister tell the House and the farmers what the chances are for significant movement of the large volume of this grade in the coming crop year?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that the Canadian Wheat Board, as always, takes note of the type of grain available and does its best to adjust its contracts and selling practices to that grain. In this particular case, some of the large contracts—including that with the Chinese—allow for an option for No. 3CW, and that is fortunate.

The over-all movement of grain will be excellent and I look forward to at least as much being moved as last year. At the present time, we are something like 20 million bushels ahead of last year's movement when, in the end, we almost hit a record. That should be good news to the farmers in general.

Mr. Ritchie: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Are No. 1 and No. 2 grades being given priority over the movement of No. 3, as many farmers suggest, and is this due to the fact that the transportation system just cannot handle the volume available?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, the Wheat Board always gives priority to the grain it needs at a particular time. That depends on the contracts they have with buyers all over the world and the dates on which they want to take delivery of a particular grain. Obviously, the Wheat Board has no alternative but to try to put into position at terminals the grain which will be needed in a given month.

POST OFFICE

ALLEGED LOCK-OUT OF RETURNING STRIKERS

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might put a question supplementary to those already directed to the Postmaster General. It is a two-part question. If he is certain in his own mind that there is no lock-out procedure being followed by his departmental officials in various parts of Canada, can he explain why the doors of the Dartmouth post office were locked this morning, when to my certain knowledge a number of those employees wish to return to work?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I have just checked with my deputy minister. He told me that after having heard the question in the House, he had looked into that matter himself and that there was no lock-out in Canada as far as he knows. If, unfortunately, there was one, this will be straightened out immediately because it was by no means intended. That is all I can say. We will do everything possible to welcome back our employees in the warmest possible way so that they can resume work as soon as possible and maintain the postal services.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

TESTIMONY BEFORE McDONALD COMMISSION

Mr. Bill Jarvis (Perth-Wilmot): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Solicitor General, who on Tuesday, in reply to a question from the hon. member for New Westminster, indicated that documents that he had produced within the meaning of section 41 of the Federal Court Act to the McDonald commission had in fact been produced, in the legal sense, if I understood his response correctly. I want to make sure that I did understand his response.

Is it the minister's position that these documents requested by, and now having been delivered to, the McDonald commission have been produced within the meaning of the Federal Court Act and, therefore, are exempt from any provision of section 41(1) or section 41(2) of the act?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the question that was asked of me by the hon. member for New Westminster was of a more general nature than that. I will have to review specifically what the hon. gentleman advances. It requires a great deal of study and it requires a very strict legal interpretation. I will get back to the hon. member.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, while the Solicitor General is conducting this in-depth study, on this side we wonder why he refuses to give the commitment that the provisions of section 41 will not be implemented against the McDonald commission. Will he determine whether these documents have, in fact, been legally produced and therefore the provisions of that section are completely inapplicable? If so, would he then give the commitment we have been seeking for days and weeks, that he will not invoke the provisions of the act? That becomes academic because the documents, legally, have already been introduced.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I know the hon. gentleman likes to engage in academic debates. I will seek the opinion he wants from the Minister of Justice and make a copy of it available.

GRAIN

MOVEMENT OF NO. 3CW—POSSIBILITY OF PLACING UNDER QUOTA

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, my question arises out of the reply given by the Minister of Transport to the hon. member for Dauphin. All over northern Saskatchewan today farmers find themselves in the position, as a result of the great rainfalls' effect on No. 3, unable to dispose of it except of course on the open market, in which case they lose the 50 cents per bushel.

Is there any possibility of the government facing this situation, to the end so that farmers with No. 3 will get on quota and be assured of at least some return in respect of the crops that they have had?

● (1452)

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the farmers have available to them a cash advance program which is interest-free and which allows them to take a very substantial portion of their final returns, or at least their returns at the elevator, without actually delivering grain and then waiting until quotas open in order to pay back that advance. I would hope that many farmers would rely on this, rather than choosing for other reasons to deliver to the open market when they would prefer to deliver to the Board.

At the same time, of course, the Wheat Board is very conscious of the quantities of No. 3CW grain available now. Obviously, they could not sell 3CW until they saw the harvest situation because farmers do not intend to grow that grade. They have to match their sales after the fact.

As I indicated to the hon. member for Dauphin, because of the quantities available even last year, some substantial sales have been made of 3CW and this should mean quotas will open. I can, however, seek further information from the board on what they may project as to any progress.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that did not answer the question. There was a matter of indebtedness, and I simply asked the question because farmers everywhere are asking for a reply. Is there any probability that number 3CW will go on quota within the next week or two, otherwise they are greatly discouraged in consequence of the fact that they have this wheat on hand. They know, of course, about advances without interest, and the like, but that was not the nature of the question I asked.

I was simply asking for information, not for the purpose of doing anything to place the minister in an invidious position, but simply to be able to let the farmers know whether in the view of the Wheat Board or the government—and that seems sometimes to be an alternative way of expressing the authority over wheat—there is a probability of No. 3CW being given quota position soon?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I think it was fully appropriate for me to draw attention to the cash advance, since the right hon. gentleman suggested that farmers were having to sell their grain at low prices rather than waiting for quotas to sell to the board. Obviously, the cash advance allows them to get the cash, hold their grain and deliver it to the board at a later date. So the very point the right hon. gentleman was making was baseless in view of that.

As to the question of whether an indication can be given to farmers about quotas, I will put that question to the Canadian Wheat Board to see whether they would choose to make a forecast at this point about quotas in the future.

URBAN AFFAIRS

POSSIBILITY OF PROVIDING CHEAPER APARTMENTS—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Mr. Jacques Lavoie (Hochelaga): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs.

Since the government mentions amendments to the National Housing Act in the Speech from the Throne, can the minister tell the House if he plans on introducing special legislation concerning non-profit corporations and housing co-operatives so that they may offer cheaper apartments than they are now doing in my constituency?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Yes, Mr. Speaker, as soon as the bill to amend the National Housing Act is introduced in this House, amendments to the act will be proposed to make it easier to have more low cost public housing in Canada.

FORESTRY—CLOSING OF GOVERNMENT LABORATORIES

Mr. Cyril Symes (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State (Environment). In view of the importance of the forest industry in Canada and the need for research and development to keep Canada ahead in world markets, how does the minister justify the $5 million reduction in expenditure which will result in the closing and privatizing of government laboratories which have been doing vital research that the industry itself has not been doing?

Hon. Len Marchand (Minister of State (Environment)): Mr. Speaker, the Government of Canada still maintains a very good research program for the forest industry. There is an important research laboratory at Sault Ste. Marie. There are important research labs at other centres such as Edmonton, Victoria, Quebec city and in Newfoundland. These have all maintained vital research programs.

The two forest products labs that are being privatized, one in Vancouver and one in Ottawa, have been the subject of discussion for some time. The industry has been asking the Government of Canada for more participation in these labs, and it was with that in mind that the President of the Treasury Board made the recommendation that he did that these two particular labs be privatized.

The total budget for those two labs was $7.3 million. The cut covering both of them was $3.3 million. The federal government still maintains a very large contribution to these labs in the way of $4 million. I want to assure the hon. member that the discussions we have had with industry and the provincial governments have been very fruitful. Industry has given us a positive response so far. I ask the hon. member not to look at this matter negatively, but positively. We believe this participation with industry and with the provincial governments will strengthen those labs.

Mr. Symes: Mr. Speaker, the minister should examine the research figures in Canada. The amount of research done for the forest industry is one of the lowest among the various industries in Canada. Indeed, I do not think the lab at Petawawa falls within his definition of forest products labs.

My supplementary question is this: in view of the fact that Canadian and American studies show that those sectors of the economy which received comparatively higher rates of research have had higher rates of employment and productivity, how can the minister guarantee that the private sector labs will carry out the vital research that needs to be done, when experience has shown that these labs concentrate on design of new products and marketing rather than on the vital long-range planning which we need to help our exports?

Mr. Marchand: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member reads the answer I gave more carefully, he will see that there are two different parts. We will maintain the long-term, vital research that the forest industry depends upon, in the various regional forest research labs that we have. Those were untouched.

As far as Petawawa is concerned, I recently had very good representations from my colleague, the hon. member for Renfrew North-Nipissing East, along with receiving a delegation of mayors and reeves. I am looking at those representations which have been made to me. If there is some way in which we can meet those suggestions, I will be happy to do so.

URBAN AFFAIRS

STUDY OF PUBLIC OPINION

Mrs. Jean E. Pigott (Ottawa-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs. It is prompted in part by a recent CBC radio report which indicated that the federal government has hired the Institute for Behavioural Research at York University, in Toronto, to do an extensive survey of public opinion at a cost of $700,000.

Can the minister inform the House how the collected data and findings will be used, and when will these findings be made public?

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I will inquire into this matter and report to the House.

FISHERIES

RIGHTS OF INDIAN BANDS

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister—don't tell me he has gone again!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): In any event, in his absence I will direct my question to the Prime Minister because this is a matter of serious import within the cabinet. One minister said that another minister had goofed, on Tuesday at page 166. I wonder, in view of the implication of the goof, whether the Prime Minister can tell them—

An hon. Member: Just a regular goof.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): It was the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development who goofed.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): I will explain.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): The problem arose at a result of the failure of the minister to inform another minister about a very serious matter. It concerned an Indian band resolution which gave Indians jurisdiction over fishing on the reserves that would have to be disallowed.

Can the Prime Minister see the long-term implications of this goof, and could explain whether disciplinary action has been taken in the ministry concerned, or against the minister, or by any chance could he explain why these things should occur? Does the disallowance have to be delivered by an order in council, or is it just done by default, by a failure to take some action?

Mr. Hees: Don't goof.

• (1502)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know if the hon. member was here when the Minister of Fisheries answered this question at some length the other day. It seemed quite clear from his answer that there is the fisheries legislation on one hand, and the Indian legislation on the other.

As happens every day in our society, there are conflicting laws that have to be resolved. These conflicts are resolved. They have been resolved by this government. It does not mean that because two laws are in conflict, somebody goofed. Each minister applies the law as he sees it. The importance of government is making sure any conflict is resolved, as it will be and as the Minister of Fisheries said it would.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Mr. Speaker, I was here and I heard one minister say there had been a goof, and the only way the goof could have taken place was because his ministry had not been informed. Is the Prime Minister telling the House and this country that this matter is going to be overridden by statute law, or is it the treaty law which will supervene and take over in this case?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, it is quite clear the hon. member is now asking a legal question. One minister applies the statutes of his department.

An hon. Member: It's a goofy question.

Mr. Trudeau: I agree with the colleague of the hon. member; it is a goofy question.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PRIVILEGE

MR. HORNER—EXPORT STATISTICS

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. After question period yesterday, the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) rose on a question of privilege and suggested to the House I had left an incorrect impression by the use of some figures with regard to manufactured goods and agricultural products that are exported. I then rose and suggested I did not believe I had, but that I would check the facts.

I am pleased to see the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees) and the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby in the chamber because it should be brought to the attention of both members that the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Goyer) is now distributing a document entitled "Canada's Trade Performance 1960-1977". Each member of parliament should have this in his office, either today or very shortly.

On page 20 of the document it can clearly be seen that food, beverages, and tobacco exports accounted for 10.4 per cent of our total exports in 1977. Inedible crude materials, including petroleum and gas, accounted for 20.3 per cent of our total exports. Inedible fabricated materials and finished manufactured goods totalled 69 per cent of our total exports in 1977.

For the information of the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, I will give the figures. Exports in the automotive trade accounted for 23.8 per cent. While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, I wish to say, with regard to finished products, that when the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings was minister of trade and commerce in 1961—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Horner: —finished products amounted to 8.8 per cent of our total trade.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The minister did say yesterday that he would check these figures and bring them to the attention of the House today. The question concerns the one raised yesterday by the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent). I see he is on his feet to complete the matter.

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact the minister has brought out some figures, even if he is quoting from a source not yet available to all members of parliament. I am not concerned about that aspect. In fact I do not want any of the data he is providing.

When I rose yesterday, I did not say the minister had misled the House. I said if I understood what he said that he might have, and I asked him to clarify the situation, which he has done today. I do not want to get into that kind of quibbling game.

The issue that seems to be of real substance, and which was raised in the question period by the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees), really pertains to what we mean by an end product. The minister has removed the problem. I will look with interest at the data in the new book. However, I am absolutely certain at this point that the figures the minister is using to suggest we are now in a position of being a net exporter of manufactured goods or finished products is profoundly misleading. I want to say why, so that the minister can clarify—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am equally certain, with the hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby, that we have met the question of privilege and are entering the area of debate, which can be taken up at some future time. The matter of privilege is clearly closed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the borrowing authority bill now before the House seeks a supplementary borrowing authority of $7 billion for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, and borrowing authority of $10 billion for fiscal 1979-80. This bill also seeks explicit authorization for the government to borrow in foreign currencies as well as Canadian dollars, and amends the Financial Administration Act so as to clarify that use of borrowing authority is calculated on a "net" basis.

As hon. members will recall, the government's cash requirements, exclusive of foreign exchange transactions, amounted to $8.3 billion in fiscal 1977-78, and the current fiscal year's cash requirements, exclusive of foreign exchange requirements, will be in the order of $11.8 billion, as I have said many times in the last few months.

In total, therefore, our domestic cash requirements for fiscal years 1977-78 and 1978-79 will be about $20.1 billion.

In addition to these cash requirements arising out of our domestic operations, the government has, during the last 12 months, arranged foreign borrowings of $750 million U.S. and $1.5 billion Deutschmarks, and has already arranged stand-by lines of credit of $5.5 billion U.S. These financial arrangements have been undertaken in order to add to Canada's international reserves and to provide assurance that the government is in a position to supplement the net inflow of capital into Canada.

As hon. members are aware, the government is now in the process of borrowing a further $750 million through the issuance of bonds on the U.S. market.

Let me now review the borrowing authorities that have been granted from March of 1977 to date, and against which borrowings in this period have been charged.

• (1512)

In March, 1977, borrowing authority of $7 billion was provided to meet anticipated cash requirements for fiscal year 1977-78. A further $9 billion borrowing authority was sought and provided as part of the income tax bill passed in December, 1977. Finally, on March 22, 1978, additional borrowing authority of $5 billion was granted.

This makes a two-year total borrowing authority of $21 billion which is not sufficient to meet the combination of domestic borrowings for the $20.1 billion in cash requirements for the two fiscal years ending next March 31, and our foreign borrowings to date of about $4.5 billion. Nor does it allow a margin to bring our borrowing authority in line with the amounts available under our already negotiated stand-by credit facilities.

As to our domestic debt program to date, during fiscal 1977-78 the Government of Canada raised in the Canadian markets about $3 billion net through the issue of Treasury Bills, about $3.4 billion net through the issue of marketable bonds, and about $1.7 billion net through the issuance of Canada Savings Bonds, for a total of about $8.1 billion.

During the current fiscal year to October 11, 1978, about $1.5 billion net has been raised domestically through the issue of Treasury Bills and $2.9 billion net through the issue of bonds in the Canadian markets.

The bill now before you requests supplementary borrowing authority of $7 billion to cover the balance of the domestic debt program for the current fiscal year, including a new series of Canada Savings Bonds, and as I have said, for the possibility to provide for further requirements in our foreign exchange transactions, including the use of our stand-by lines of credit.

The bill also provides borrowing authority of $10 billion for the new fiscal year beginning next April 1. We have previously indicated that cash requirements excluding foreign exchange transactions, are expected to be $9.7 billion for fiscal 1979-80. The government's cash balances at the beginning of the next fiscal year should be sufficient to allow part of the 1979-80 requirements to be met through a rundown in cash balances. The borrowing authority now being sought will thus provide a margin for contingencies.

Canadian dollars obtained by the government through the sale of foreign exchange reserves may eventually be needed in order to repurchase foreign exchange. For this reason the government intends to raise most of its domestic cash requirements in the Canadian capital markets rather than by running down its cash balances.

I would like now to turn to the section of the bill amending the Financial Administration Act. In the act as it now exists there is some uncertainty concerning the amount to be charged against the statutory borrowing authority in any period. This arises particularly in connection with short-term borrowings under the revolving stand-by lines of credit negotiated with Canadian chartered banks and international banks. When a borrowing is first made under a revolving stand-by credit pursuant to section 37 of the FAA, it is clearly a charge against the borrowing authority. At maturity date the borrower may wish to extend the borrowing for a further period immediately. Pursuant to section 38, this would not be a charge against the borrowing authority, because the borrowing is made to repay a maturing issue. Should the option be exercised after a delay, however, because of the manner in which section 38 is worded it may constitute a further charge against the borrowing authority.

This result would clearly restrict the full use and flexibility of the revolving stand-by lines of credit. The proposed amendment to the Financial Administration Act would clarify that it is only the net increase in outstanding debt from the date of the borrowing authority to the date of calculation of use of this authority that would be charged.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the bill we are introducing in the House today aims at clarifying certain situations concerning financial administration and at increasing for the final months of fiscal year 1978-79 the borrowing authority of the government on financial markets, as well as at obtaining for fiscal year 1979-80, the authority to borrow up to $10 billion for government operations.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to move second reading of this bill. I want it to be referred as soon as possible to the committee, where myself and officials from my department will be able to provide hon. members with all the details they may require on this bill. During the past, such bills were generally introduced at the same time as the supplementary estimates. We are now introducing a bill directly in the House, which greatly simplifies the work of opposition members. Very often in the past, these authorizations were given on the same day as the supplementary estimates were passed, and very often—and rightly so in my opinion—hon. members complained that they did not have enough time to analyse these proposals. I therefore wanted to proceed immediately to the consideration of this important bill so as to obtain the required authority as soon as possible, and also to give hon. members the opportunity during consideration of this bill in committee to ask the questions which may concern them.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The hon. member for Edmonton West on a question of privilege.

[English]

Mr. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, would it be possible to get a copy of the statement which the minister has just put on the record?

Mr. Chrétien: I have only one copy here. I could have it copied right away rather than send it—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Chrétien: Well, between the people and members of parliament I will give it to the people. I will have other copies later on.

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, the bill which is before us, though small in size, is of tremendous importance to the nation and to the people of Canada.

Mr. Peters: You are right. It is a disaster.

Mr. Stevens: What the minister has expressed in a ten minute speech is his wish for parliament to give him authorization to borrow a further $17 billion in the name of the people of Canada. To put things into perspective, what the minister has asked is that we agree, by passing these few simple clauses, to give him, along with his colleagues, authority to borrow an amount which is greater than the entire national debt at the conclusion of the second world war. We are asked in this one bill to grant the minister authority to borrow funds greater than the entire nation borrowed in its fight for survival against Hitler and the hordes against which we were engaged in conflict in that horrible war.

Again, to put the matter into perspective, how many of us realize that when the "emperor" first took control and became Prime Minister of Canada in 1967 the total unmatured debt amounted to $19,900 million? At that time the debt carried an average interest rate of 4.71 per cent. When the "emperor" first took power, this nation had less than $20 billion in total debt, which was costing us an average of 4.71 per cent interest. If this authority is now granted and if this government goes ahead with the borrowings, which presumably it intends to go ahead with, we will find that the total debt in Canada will jump from the $20 billion to which I referred to $74 billion. Not only will that be the total debt, and the impact on future Canadians is obvious, but the interest rate will also rise from the 4.71 per cent to which I referred to an average of approximately 8 per cent.

What I am leading up to is that this House must come to grips with the economic blackhole which liberalism has sunk us into in the last 15 years. This government casually sought and obtained authority to borrow $7 billion in March of 1977. In December of 1977 this minister sought and obtained authority to borrow an additional $9 billion. In March of 1978 he sought and obtained authority to borrow another $5 billion. He added it up for us today. He said the total came to $21 billion. That is one figure he has right. Let us add the $17 billion he is requesting today, and we find that since March of 1977 this government has sought authority to borrow $38 billion. One thing which I think is perhaps often overlooked, or perhaps misunderstood, is that the authority which has been requested is additional authority. As the minister has made clear on previous occasions, any outstanding bonds can be re-financed, so what we are being asked to approve today is additional authority for $17 billion. On the minister's own admission, since March of 1977 the government has already received authority to borrow $21 billion.

Once again the minister has said that this bill should be expedited and passed quickly. This should arouse our interest. Why is it so important to interrupt the throne speech debate in order to put before this House a measure which is not an economic measure or a budgetary measure but which is a request that we quickly approve borrowing authority amounting to a further $17 billion? The reason I ask this is that I think this question of urgency shows the ad hoc nature of the dealings this government is engaged in, month in and month out.

I know that the minister is conveniently forgetful, but he did refer to authority which was obtained in 1977 and 1978, and it is interesting to go back through Hansard to see exactly what he said at that time as to what would be the effect of those borrowings and why they were needed.

The borrowing requested by the minister on November 7, 1977, is described by him at page 646 of Hansard for that date. The minister said that the government was rapidly running out of borrowing authority and that the government needed money for various reasons. He went on to say that it was vital to avoid any unnecessary delay in proceeding with the bill at that time. He said that, to a considerable extent, the economy depended on business confidence and that the measure then before us was extremely important in order to secure that confidence. At that time the government was seeking authority to borrow about $9 billion.

After describing that bill the minister went on to say that the increase in borrowing authority sought at that time was to cover estimated financial requirements into the next fiscal year, and to provide a substantial margin for contingencies. We granted that authority on the understanding that it was not only enough to cover that fiscal year but that it would contribute a substantial amount for the next fiscal year.

That brings me to March 16, 1978. At page 3859 of Hansard for that date we find the debate on the new request for authority to borrow $5 billion. The minister had this to say:

> The authority in this bill to borrow a further $5 billion, together with the unused portion of the $16 billion authority granted in March and December of 1977, should provide the government with sufficient borrowing powers to meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-79, and provide a margin as usual for contingencies.

Surely the House must ask this minister what went wrong? Why were we told in March that if we granted borrowing authority for $5 billion that that could be sufficient for the current fiscal year, when we now find that a further $7 billion is being requested? Think of the magnitude of what this minister has done. He told us in March that in the current year he needed a further $5 billion, and now we find that he needs an additional $7 billion. In view of what I have said, asking us to give speedy passage to this bill is absolutely irresponsible and an affront to this House.

Let me clarify one thing. Certainly most of us—I know I am one—cannot comprehend billions of dollars, but let us not allow that to distract us from the hard truth of what this government is doing.

This government has allowed its spending to get so out of control in relation to its revenue that we now have an ever-mounting deficit on the budgetary account which, in turn, has to be financed in one way or another. That is the simple truth. We are being asked to authorize borrowing of $7 billion for this current year and another $10 billion for the next one, and we are not being given the slightest indication as to what the picture will be in fiscal 1980. That is something we should not tolerate.

Where are the facts and figures? Why does the minister need this blanket borrowing authority of $10 billion for fiscal 1980, which is the period from April 1 of next year to March 31, 1980? The minister slipped into a press conference here in Ottawa, misled the press and tried to mislead the Canadian public by boldly saying that the government cut back its fiscal 1980 spending to $52.6 billion, that our cash needs are $9.7 billion and that "Isn't that great?" Hon. members will note that the minister did not reveal his revenue estimates for fiscal 1980. He did not make it clear to the press or to the Canadian public that, according to his own internal figures, revenue will be less than $40 billion, resulting in a shortfall, by the government's own figures, of $13.3 billion in fiscal 1980.

Mr. Chrétien: False.

Mr. Stevens: The minister says "false". Let him do two things. Later in the debate let him put his revenue and expenditure estimates with respect to 1980 on the record. The minister says what I say is false, but an official in his own department released those figures. Let the minister argue with his own official. Perhaps he does not understand what his officials are trying to tell him.

Mr. Lumley: Who was the official?

Mr. Chrétien: What is the name?

Mr. Paproski: Ed Lumley.

Mr. Stevens: Ed is as good as any.

● (1532)

What I have indicated is that we are now, thanks to 15 years of misrule by the Liberals, in a position where 75 cents of every $1 that they are spending on the current account is having to be financed in one way or another. That is what is happening; let us not kid ourselves. The money they are asking us to allow them to borrow is not going into, say, building an Alaskan pipeline, is not going into helping to solve the grain transportation problems in the Canadian west, and is not going to help the fishermen on our east or west coasts. It is literally covering the expenditures of last year's or this year's consumption. That is where they need the money. It is money that is gone.

Let us take a look at what we are being asked to finance by this government. In this regard I guess we were inadvertently helped by the government because on October 10, in its anxiety to clear many of the questions that had been on the order paper for some time, it answered some of them, and I invite hon. members to go through some of the answers because they will find some revealing statistics on how the government has been spending our money and why it is now asking us to allow it to borrow more money.

Here is the type of thing we will be financing if we approve this bill. In the 1978 fiscal year the total telegram bill incurred by the Ottawa government was $5 million. Where did they send their telegrams to? What is involved in that $5 million bill they ran up? Here is another really funny one, Mr. Speaker. In spite of the fact that we have a Post Office which is running a deficit to the tune of $700 million, guess where they spent $8 million? They spent $8 million on courier service that year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: No confidence in the Post Office.

Mr. Stevens: They spent $8 million on courier service on the excuse, which they gave when they were questioned, that they had to use that service because, to use their words, the Post Office does not provide similar day or overnight service.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: Let me put this into perspective. I indicated that they spent $5 million on telegrams and $8 million on courier service, which makes $13 million, which presumably could have been used on the Post Office to some extent.

What they are really doing now is saying, "We do not have any money in the till to pay that $13 million, so would you let us put it out in the form of a debt?" However, the minister does not say—and here is the crux—when the debt will be repaid, and judging from their past record, if they find it hard to balance a budget, guess how hard this "emperor" and this crowd would find it to have a budgetary surplus! So, if there is no budgetary surplus, the debt we are being asked to approve will obviously have to be incurred for an indefinite period. Let me put it into perspective: the type of money that the government has been spending, or wasting in many cases, will now be financed.

The Canada Savings Bonds issue is now at over 9 per cent annually. Do you know that at a 9 per cent interest the cost of what we are now approving will double every eight years? That is the cumulative effect. At 9 per cent interest, within eight years you will have to repay twice the original amount. Let us not lose sight of that. The $13 billion shortfall, which the minister will have to reveal sooner or later, between his expenditures and his revenue sources in the coming year, will result in 25 cents on every $1 they are spending having to be financed some place.

Basically what the government is doing is to consume and spend today, and expecting future generations of Canadians to live with that debt. Every eight years the entire amount will have to be repaid in interest alone.

Let me give you some other examples of the amounts the government has been spending and is now asking us to authorize it to borrow to keep the till filled. In the 1978 fiscal year the government had vacant buildings, many of them right in this area, which cost $1.5 million in rent. We are now being asked to approve a $7 billion borrowing which will cover that $1.5 million in rent for vacant accommodation.

There are other such expenditures. For example, the government has spent on briefcases alone—and boy, some of their offices must be lined with briefcases—some $70,000 in one year.

An hon. Member: That is for their bagmen.

Mr. Stevens: Let us keep our eyes on the ball. It is great for the minister to stand up for ten minutes and say, "I am out of money, please get on with it and give me authority to borrow $7 billion, no questions asked." I think it behooves every member of the House to dig in and say, "First, before you ask us to okay your borrowings, tell us where you spent all that money." For example, not only did they have all those briefcases—

Mr. Chrétien: You have approved the spending.

Mr. Stevens: The minister says we have approved the spending. You see, there he goes; he is forgetful again. On March 16, when we approved the last $5 billion in borrowing authority, the minister—I will remind him of that—said that that would meet all cash requirements for the fiscal year 1978-1979.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Stevens: That is what we approved on March 16. Now we are being asked to approve for the same year another $7 billion. I ask the minister to get his facts a little straighter.

I am just giving a small tip of the iceberg regarding where the government has been spending money in Canada. As you know, the government has some very friendly advertising agencies on which it depends a lot. I do not want to draw any particular inference from this, but I find it very interesting that one advertising agency alone, on behalf of the Anti-Inflation Board, was paid $445,000 to tell us what inflation is all about. There is no mystery about where inflation comes from—we are dealing with it right here. It will come out of Bill C-7.

Inflation, basically, is the result of the government running too big a deficit, which in turn means it has to borrow funds, which in turn means the Bank of Canada has to borrow some of those funds, which increases the monetary system in the country and gives us the inflation. So how wonderfully odd it is that the government has spent $445,000 on McClaren Advertising which is telling us what causes inflation, without, presumably, realizing that that $445,000 will increase the government's deficit, which means it will have to borrow more money, which in turn creates more inflation in this country.

It is not only people like McClaren who have contributed to our problem. We have all heard of Goldfarb. Apparently Goldfarb did some very useful work for this government. That company told the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) that the water is hot and he should not try an election or he will get clobbered. I wish Mr. Goldfarb had taken a trip to the far south or gone some place else, because the greatest thing that could have occurred, both economically and politically in this country, had Mr. Goldfarb not so instructed the Prime Minister, would have been for the Prime Minister to have tested the water some time this month or next month.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: I think it is interesting to take a look at where the money we are now being asked to authorize was spent. Goldfarb picked up $100,000 of it—that was his fee for one assignment alone.

As I come to the Parliament Buildings every day, month in and month out, I watch the construction of the steps going down to the Bytown Museum. Even to my untrained eyes it looked like a pretty expensive job, but I must admit that when I asked what those steps cost—and there are about 40 of them—I was flabbergasted to find they cost $410,000—just steps to go down to the Bytown Museum a few months of every year.

● (1542)

There are various examples of what the government has been up to, Mr. Speaker. How many of us recall the $200,000 which was spent on a study to determine how long people spent in public washrooms? Let us not lose sight of that. Because the government is now faced with a deficit, that $200,000 must be financed at 9 per cent, and every eight years that $200,000 doubles. The silly little study will cost the Canadian public $400,000 in eight years, and $800,000 in 16 years. As a result of that study, we have knowledge as to the amount of time used by males and females in public washrooms. As far as males are concerned, it was an average of 41 seconds, and as far as females are concerned, 75 seconds. This is the fiddling around that the government has been engaged in while the nation faces one of the most serious economic crises faced by any nation in the industrial world.

Not only must the minister explain more fully why this borrowing is needed, but he should deal with some other interesting questions. One such question relates to borrowing in foreign lands. There should be no doubt that clause 4 of the bill has a very good purpose. The money lords of Wall Street told this little minister that they wanted the authority of the Parliament of Canada behind the borrowing, that they do not trust him. They want parliament to confirm that the authorization to borrow $7 billion, and eventually $10 billion, is in fact backed by the Parliament of Canada, not just by a government which will hold office for a few further months.

The minister chose not to explain why the bill included an authority to borrow $10 billion in fiscal 1980. We know nothing about fiscal 1980. The House has been furnished with no figures. We do not know what the expenditure and revenue forecasts are, or what the budgetary deficit will be for that year. Why should we be asked to hand him blindly an authority to borrow $10 billion during that year? What is the rush? We know the government is planning an election. Perhaps it would be embarrassing in April or May of next year to request that $10 billion authority. If that is the only reason, I wish the government would admit it. It is not good enough simply to ask us to okay blindly a $10 billion authority without giving the usual, expected budgetary figures before any fiscal moves are made by parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: We must put into perspective how well or how poorly the country is doing. I could quote from many economists and analysts, but I should like to refer to the relevant quarterly report by Wood Gundy, the largest investment dealers in Canada. In September, 1978, that firm had the following to say about our economy:

> Despite an official commitment by Prime Minister Trudeau to a 5 per cent real growth rate, our August Forecast looks to no more than a 3.3 per cent increase in real GNP this year, with the rate falling further to only 2.2 per cent in 1979. Some improvement is likely in 1980, largely as a result of a pickup in capital spending, . . . We therefore expect unemployment to worsen over the next two years, averaging 8.7 per cent in 1978 and 9.1 per cent in 1979 before moderating to 8.9 per cent in 1980.

We are being asked to give a borrowing authority for 1980, yet a reputable investment house told us that our economy will be so sluggish that there will be 9 per cent unemployment for the entire three years—1978, 1979 and 1980. We have ended up with huge deficits, huge debts and the highest unemployment since depression years. That is the culmination of this black hole of Liberalism. That is how far the government has pulled the nation down in the 15 years of its rule.

It is important to analyse what this vicious inflationary spiral looks like. We find that the federal government incurs deficits which must be financed by selling securities. The government has found that it can no longer sell sufficient securities in the Canadian domestic market, because obviously interest rates are driven up the more that is done. Thus the government resorts to selling securities to foreigners in foreign currencies. There are only three other countries in the world which resort to such financing to cover consumption deficits in their home economies. Those three countries are Zaire, Panama and Spain. That is the level to which our economy has been dragged by the government extending our borrowing into foreign jurisdictions.

This is a serious matter, because when a debt in foreign currency is incurred, one must speculate as to how much that debt will be currencywise when it is time for repayment. For example, the German loan which was incurred in May of this year provided a little less than $800 billion Canadian. It would cost an additional $130 million Canadian to repay that loan today. The government undertook to repay that amount of interest when it borrowed the $800 million Canadian. The more we borrow in foreign currency, the more the risk will be extended.

The minister should have come into the House requesting a $17 billion borrowing authority to put capital investments into place. What would $17 billion do? I understand that it would build 150,000 homes in Canada. Perhaps it would build two Alaska pipelines.

Now that the government basically has drained the domestic market, it is resorting to borrowing foreign funds to cover consumption deficits in the country. Deficits are being incurred which result in financing by selling securities. Then the Bank of Canada is forced to buy many of the securities to stabilize the market and to ensure a success as far as government issues are concerned. In so doing, the Bank of Canada pumps reserves into the banking system, which leads to a multiplied level of money and credit in the system. Excessive credit expansion then leads to a long trend in declining liquidity among our banks and corporations, which raises the level of risk which, together with the continuing rise in loan demand, raises the level of interest rates through the economy.

That is the cycle they are putting us through, Mr. Speaker. In our late stage of liquidity deterioration, companies have become less able to withstand business downturns; they are less resilient on the recovery. This is demonstrated by our increasing level of bankruptcies, especially among small businesses. According to Dun and Bradstreet, in the first six months of this year bankruptcies were up 40 per cent over last year. Bankruptcies in Canada have jumped to the point that today, rather than having one bankruptcy in Canada for every ten in the United States, the ratio one would normally expect, we have seven bankruptcies in Canada for every ten in the United States.

The problem caused by the federal government's massive federal funding is also reflected in our mortgage field. This week we have seen interest rates on mortgages go still higher. We are also faced with a rising foreclosure rate in home mortgages. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, for example, paid out insurance claims on 1,051 residential units to the end of August this year, against 405 for the whole of last year.

I would suggest that fiscal discipline has clearly broken down at both the cabinet and administrative levels of government. This is partly a problem of philosophies that must be changed, and it is partly a problem of structure which must also be altered. A general election will presumably rectify the problem of philosophy, but even here one important barrier to any solution is the lack of understanding by many voters of the true origins of inflation to Canada. And not only inflation, but all the other problems associated with that phenomenon.

Not only has the government misled the Canadian public concerning the causes of our inflation—high unemployment, lack of real growth, and current account deficits—but this misrepresentation has been pounded home by the New Democratic Party who have deliberately told the Canadian public that we need more of what has already made the nation so sick.

If there were a better public understanding that it is the national cumulative deficit, the public debt, which becomes our public debt, that has caused inflation, people would not be picketing supermarkets, but would be picketing the Parliament Buildings. They would not complain to their members of parliament about taxes, they would complain about the Bank of Canada building that has been a-building for five years at a cost of $53 million. They would be complaining about the mammoth spending programs launched by this government.

There is something we must not lose sight of, Mr. Speaker. Year after year we subsidize the CBC. It has cost the nation over $3 billion in total. To the degree that the government has to finance those subsidies, it is now putting us on the treadmill of not only having to pay for the initial subsidy but to pay 9 per cent interest per year. That is what it has led us into, Mr. Speaker.

We must bear in mind that higher taxes and inflation are only the symptoms; spending is the problem with this government. In the short term the government must go on a diet to avoid a severe coronary later on. In the long term, structural and philosophical changes are required.

In the United States the Legislative Reorganization Act of 1970 makes it necessary for the administrative branch in that government to price out the cost for new legislation for five years into the future. We need that approach here, not only for new legislation but for old.

In the past 15 years all governments in Canada have increased their share of the GNP by over one-third. Let me repeat that, Mr. Speaker. In the past 15 years all governments in Canada have increased their share of the GNP by over one third. No other industrialized nation has had that type of escalation in governments' take. One half of this spending is at the federal level. In terms of actual levels of spending, the federal government's expenditures will amount to $52.6 billion in 1980, compared to $6.4 billion in 1960, an eightfold increase in 20 years.

In a recent special study by the C. D. Howe Institute, H. V. Kroeker summarizes his suggested improvements which I think we should consider. He said:

Ultimate control of, and accountability for, the expenditures of government must be exercised by the legislature. The Canadian House of Commons is hampered, however, in effectively carrying out this role because it has not adapted quickly enough to the demands placed on modern government. To enhance and reinforce parliament's role requires a number of improvements which parallel those proposed for the internal expenditure process of the federal government. These improvements include—

He then itemizes a list of things he would like to see improved. One is a general assessment of past and future trends of government expenditures covering a span of ten years, five years into the past and five years into the future. He would also like to see the preparation of the economic basis on which future projections have been made, such as the expected rates of growth in the gross national product, rates of unemployment, inflation, wage increases and so on. He would like to see the preparation of comprehensive government overviews of programs, along with an indication of how these relate to government policy and other programs. He would like to see the introduction of the right of parliamentary committees to investigate, at their initiative, matters that fall under their mandate, and to call public servants as witnesses on technical matters or in relation to the implementation and funding of programs. He would like to see the creation of a parliamentary committee on economic and expenditure policy to review longer term projections and trends, and finally, he would like to see the introduction of the accounting-officer concept as part of the mandate of the public accounts committee. I think these things, or perhaps modifications of them, are badly needed.

This is getting out of hand. It is not a matter of trivial deficits any longer; it is a matter of the government literally being able to finance out of current revenue only 75 cents of every dollar it is spending. Yet I do not see the slightest indication by this government, and certainly not by the minister, of an attempt to facilitate the types of review I have summarized and which, presumably, have been endorsed by the C. D. Howe Institute.

In his contribution to the throne speech debate the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said that we ranked sixth or seventh behind various other countries. Presumably that was an attempt to contradict what we in this party have often said, that we have dropped from second to seventh in the world, but I think he had in mind that first, second and third were Kuwait and countries like that. Just the odd time the Prime Minister is of help. In his speech he listed the six countries that are actually ahead of us. If we take the Prime Minister's six, plus the six we were referring to—West Germany, Belgium, the United States, Norway—we would find that we are thirteenth. Something must have got through to the Prime Minister. In fact Canada has dropped to thirteenth, if you include the countries he named, compared to second—

Mr. Martin: Specify your six.

Mr. Stevens: If you want, I will be glad to—Switzerland, Sweden, United States, Denmark, West Germany and Belgium. I know the parliamentary secretary is greatly pleased with his new appointment, Mr. Speaker. I wish him well in it, but I suggest that if he needs any more information he should go to the Prime Minister for it. He knows the names of the other six countries which are also ahead of us.

This is what we are faced with in this bill, Mr. Speaker. We are faced with the fact that the government only last spring told us they needed $5 billion more borrowing authority to get them out of this year. Now in October they find they need another $7 billion, and they want specific authority to borrow part of that $7 billion in a foreign currency. They have even gone further and said, "For good measure, throw in another $10 billion for fiscal 1980; we will probably need that too."

Obviously, the situation is out of control. I believe that we must, in order to put it into perspective, vote against what the government is asking us to approve. Before I sit down I intend to move a motion. My motion will be that we not now read this bill but that it be considered objectionable in principle for the mere fact that the government is requesting us to grant an authority for massive borrowing in a future fiscal year and yet we have no proper budgetary presentation to allow us to judge whether that authority should be granted or not. But, Mr. Speaker, in truth we need some figures. We need information. Why did this borrowing authority request come before the budget? Surely the proper sequence would have been to bring in the budget, let us see whatever figures the minister is willing to put before us, and let us then come to our own conclusion whether a borrowing authority of $17 billion is warranted.

We know the reason for the urgency. They are in trouble. They are in trouble in New York because they have to satisfy some legal firms in New York that they have the authority to borrow the money they would like to borrow now. That is why they want to put this bill through. Surely they owe it to us to give us a lot more detail. They owe it to us to show us, for example, what the future trends are in Canada, assuming that they allow this 9 per cent increase per year to follow up to, say, 1984, and revenues to continue to grow. If those figures are projected, it will be found they are very startling. One will find that the budgetary deficit, rather than contracting, is going to get bigger year by year. In short, if the government can only be as restrained as they indicated in their press conference, and if revenues are maintained at the level that they have been in recent years, the deficit in 1984 will be considerably bigger than it is today, and today it is totally unacceptable.

Put it again into perspective. This government have the audacity to hint or to say that they are being restrained, and yet they admit that the deficit is somewhere around the $10 billion level. That deficit in relation to our federal government spending is triple the deficit that the United States government is living with now. It is triple in relation to our spending compared to the American deficit in relation to their spending. The Americans are worried. But I do not sense that this government are worried about anything other than getting re-elected. That is all they are concerned about. Whether the country is economically in good shape or bad shape becomes secondary to them in their anxiety to try to win favour once again with the Canadian electorate.

In closing, perhaps Thomas Jefferson, many years ago, put this type of situation squarely. He said:

> I place economy among the first and most important virtues, and public debt as the greatest of dangers . . . we must make our choice between economy and liberty, or profusion and servitude. If we can prevent the government from wasting the labors of the people under the pretense of caring for them, they will be happy.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stevens: Having said that, I would like to move the Amendment to which I earlier referred. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

> That all of the words after "That" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:
>
> "this House holds the opinion that the granting of an authority for massive borrowing in a future fiscal year, in advance of any budget presentation for that year, is objectionable in principle and this House therefore declines to give second reading to Bill C-7."

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): With the permission of the House I will reserve judgment as to the acceptability of this amendment and render judgment at a later date.

Mr. Max Saltsman (Waterloo-Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the idea of borrowing $17 billion must really do something to the imagination of the people who contemplate it. If we have to borrow that kind of money, something is seriously wrong in this society.

One has to look at the need to borrow the money. There is no question that, faced with the kind of slackness in the economy that we have, a deficit under the present circumstances is probably unavoidable, and that the alternative to not having a deficit and having a balanced budget—and I am not sure that my friends to the right are suggesting that we have a balanced budget—would be to make the unemployment rate of the thirties look like a picnic.

As a matter of public policy the borrowing has to be carried out. But it is sad to think that this is the only way it can be done.

While I was listening to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) use the figures from Woods, Gordon, an interesting thought occurred to me. The thought did not occur to me when my own leader was using those figures the other day.

Mr. Stevens: I am using Wood Gundy figures. The hon. member for Oshawa-Whitby (Mr. Broadbent) was using Woods, Gordon.

Mr. Saltsman: Thank you. It is the same thing for Wood Gundy because Woods, Gordon is somewhat tainted with Liberal tendencies; Wood Gundy is not. Therefore, it makes it more useful to talk about Wood Gundy.

I presume Wood Gundy have been reading the polls, like everyone else, and I presume that they are making the assumption that perhaps the Liberals will not be in office in 1980 and that the Conservatives will be in office then. Yet despite that kind of possibility, Wood Gundy is saying that "we are still following the same disastrous course that we are on at present." With that in mind, I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe has one or two conclusions to reach. First, his party is not going to form the government in 1980, and Wood Gundy is making these predictions based on the Liberals remaining there and continuing their policies. Second, they are going to form the government, and it isn't going to make a damn bit of difference if they do or not, because the predictions are not going to be changed. That is really the point I want to make.

When one looks at $17 billion one has to ask and tell oneself that this is a serious problem. When you deal with the magnitude of that problem, what sort of suggestions are made as to the cause of it? We hear about a misspending of $5 million on telegrams, $17 million on courier services, and $400,000 to an advertising agency. Even when you add up all these little figures, you do not come anywhere close to $17 billion.

Even assuming there is some waste and mismanagement, as there tends to be in all large organizations, the way to correct it is not simply by being more efficient in government. As desirable as that may be, it is not going to knock out the $17 billion loan requirement.

When we talk about the economy it reminds me of a skit that sometimes appears over television. I think "The Honeymooners" used to use it. Someone walks in and goes over to the stove. When he turns it on, instead of getting a flame, he gets a shot of water in the face. When he rushes into the bathroom and flushes the toilet he gets the triumphant march from "Aida" bursting forth in the living room. Something is not working. The whole economy is mixed up. The blue plumbers are sent for. They come with their wrenches and tinker with it. The whole system breaks down, and there is water all over the place. That is like the shape of our economy. It just is not working. Something is dramatically wrong with our economy and it will not be corrected by looking at an advertising or telegraph expenditure, or something similar.

The importance for parliament in trying to deal with this subject is to look at some of the underlying causes and some of the choices that face us with regard to what we can do with the economy. We have the blue choice, the one put forward by my friends on my right, that the only thing wrong is with the present government and the fact that government expenditures are out of control.

We also have a pink choice, the choice of the New Democratic Party, as to what can be done. We feel that the problem is not in government expenditures. The problem is essentially that the market system in this society has broken down. It will not be corrected by the government getting out of and not managing the economy. That would only make it worse.

We have reached the point in the development of our society where we need more government management, rather than less. To the extent that the private sector has failed, and it has failed, the public sector has to take up the slack.

In that regard I must ask my friend from York-Simcoe if he really meant what he said when he stated that if the government were borrowing $17 billion for housing, it would be a different matter. I presume he is saying he would support a $17 billion public expenditure on the part of the government. If it is for current needs, he will not support it; but if it is for investment, he will. I am not sure he meant that and, therefore, I do not know why he introduced it.

Let us look at some of the problems and how this government and, to a very large extent, my friends on the right would handle it. At the moment we have a need to bolster the Canadian dollar. There are a number of ways in which that can be done. The government has chosen to increase rates for the fifth time.

What is the consequence of increasing interest rates in order to keep money in Canada? They have come to the conclusion that much of the devaluation of the Canadian dollar is because of the outflow of capital and the importance of inflowing capital. Raising interest rates has not worked in the past and it will not work now. However, the government is going to do that in order to stop some of the outflow. The consequence will be to slow down the whole economy. Raising interest rates will slow down the housing industry, investment, and all those other things about which they are concerned. The justification will probably be they had no choice, there was nothing else for them to do.

But there is a choice in these matters. It is not an easy choice or a perfect choice. However, it is preferable to raising interest rates. I refer to imposing exchange controls. I think the problem is that there is too much money in this country for gainful investment. The government have been too generous to people with high incomes, to people in businesses, particularly in the large business sector, and they have more money than they know what to do with. It is leaving the country for that reason. It must be stopped. There is a responsibility on those who make their money in this country to have some response to national needs.

The figures that we have bear out where the problem is. I agree the trade deficit is important and that it has something to do with it. However, what is more important is the fact that so much money is leaving the country in large amounts. Small amounts, such as those for people going on holidays or buying a home in Florida, are not the real cause of the problem. Rather, it is that there are large sums of money leaving the country in an attempt to find more gainful interest rates somewhere else.

If we look at the section of the quarterly estimates, the Canadian balance of equal payments, page 56, under the heading of "Interest and Dividends", we can make a comparison. In 1969 we had a deficit on that account of $915 million. In 1977 the deficit was $3,480 million, almost four times as much in eight years, leaving this country.

When I discussed this matter with the people at Statistics Canada in order to try to get an accurate picture they said they could not give an accurate picture because the statistics were not good enough. They had to lump it under various headings, and they were not sure how much was private money and how much was business money.

They have an item called "Net Errors and Omissions", a very exact thing. Under that heading is shown a deficit of $219 million in 1969, whereas, in 1977 the outflow was $2,746 million, an incredible increase.

If you look at the offsetting amount of capital coming into Canada you find that, while it has increased, and I do not want to put the figures now, it has not increased at nearly the same rate as the outflow of money from this country.

Money does not flow out of the country just because there is no confidence. Anyone who does not have confidence in this country has to be out of his mind! I cannot think of any country in the world that has a more brilliant future than Canada. Any investor who does not see that does not deserve to be called an investor.

You cannot say this money is leaving Canada because there is no confidence in this country. It is leaving for other reasons. I suggest it is leaving because of public mismanagement. There is so much money around that it is just trying to find a place to light down. It moves back and forth on a quarter per cent rise in the interest rate.

The liquidity in large corporations is so great that some of these corporations make more money by placing their money for interest than they do on their own operations. A lot of this has arisen because of the very generous capital allowances we have allowed to large corporations. It has increased the liquidity and enabled them to do this kind of thing.

This is the kind of thing we have to examine. Therefore, you impose exchange controls. The minute you say that, however, someone says, "That means that if I want to go on a holiday I cannot do it without going to a bank or agency." But you do not have to do it that way and in most countries where there are exchange controls it is not done that way.

You can impose these controls on any sum of money over $50,000 in order to ensure the large sums of money—those that are affecting these figures—are taken into account. It will be much more desirable to try to deal with the dollar problem in this way than to keep raising interest rates in a losing battle of one-upmanship with the United States. This is a battle we cannot win. Why is it not done? It is not done because the government does not want to manage the economy.

● (1622)

It is not easy to impose exchange controls. It means a government has to accept responsibility, and the present administration does not want to accept that kind of responsibility and it is this reluctance to do so that is at the heart of our economic problems.

The government has been cutting taxes over the years. One of the reasons we have borrowed to this extent is because the government has cut taxes, but they have cut them for the wrong people! The cuts have stimulated saving by those at the higher income levels. Taxes were cut for the more fortunate to such an extent that the people concerned could not spend all their money. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) himself said we were saving ourselves into a depression.

The New Democratic Party has said that cutting taxes might be necessary in the short term but, if taxes were to be cut, they should be cut for those at the lowest income levels so as to help those with consumption needs. In that way we derive a double benefit. Surplus funds are not created and the extra purchasing power stimulates the economy, putting people back to work. Revenue from taxes is greater, and the deficit is reduced at the same time. This is not only a more decent way to do things, it is a more efficient way. Why is it not being done? Because it means you have to make a decision in favour of the poor rather than the rich and at the moment there seems to be a blue tide running—the people who "have it made" are insisting on retaining their position, a position endorsed by the government.

It is not only tax benefits that are greater at higher income levels. The trend to more favoured treatment extends to such things as registered retirement savings plans and various other premiums. The Minister of Finance has, on occasion, pointed out that it is not just the rich who benefit from these programs. He tells us that some people from the middle income levels also benefit. But the benefits to the rich are disproportionate to the small amounts received by those at the lower end of the scale as a result of which the system works to increase savings at a time when we really need an increase in consumption.

The only solution proposed by hon. members to my right is that we should cut the public sector. Mr. Speaker, cutting the public sector simply exacerbates the problem. We are all familiar with examples of too much fat in the public sector, and to the extent that this is identifiable it should be cut out. But that is not the mood of those who sit on the government benches. Their idea of cutting the public sector is not to trim the fat but to make cuts across the board on principle, and this principle might be described, more or less in these words: we are going to get out of the economy, we are going to show the people we do not want to be in the economy, we are going to leave room for the private sector.

The other day my leader asked the Minister of Finance whether it was true that a recent study showed that the cuts made by the government would result in close to 100,000 being unemployed. The minister had to do some mental gyrations before answering that question. He attempted to demonstrate that by making 100,000 people unemployed in the public sector he would create jobs in the private sector. Yet the hon. gentleman has himself expressed disappointment with the performance of the private sector in this regard. Every time cuts were made on the assumption that the private sector would take up the slack, it did not happen. Unfortunately, the private sector increases the problem instead of diminishing it.

How could anyone in his right mind conclude that just because the government stops employing people the private sector would suddenly develop confidence and hire them? Business does not expand its operations in proportion to the number of employees the government has dismissed. The only reason business expands is because there is a market for what it is trying to sell, or the services it is providing. The actions of the government in this area are of no consequence to a businessman beyond becoming the subject, possibly, of conversation at the golf club.

We have much more compelling difficulties to face. It seems to me we are living in one kind of society, a society we think we understand, while moving rapidly into another kind of society, one we do not understand and one for which the government is not prepared. The government is attempting to manage by crisis, by election dates, and the official opposition is not being of much help in that regard though one would not expect them to be. The reason we find ourselves in this great economic difficulty is our reluctance to face the fact that the world is changing before our eyes and that the solutions we were once able to apply are no longer as useful as they were.

It seems to me that when we debate as parliamentarians we should try to understand the changes which are taking place and to listen to arguments in favour of one course of action as against other courses of action, arguments, if you like, of a philosophic nature; I recognize that philosophy is regarded as somehow unparliamentary, but I feel, nevertheless, that parliament should be a forum for philosophy. A great many things are changed in our society.

My hon. friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), reviewed what has happened in our society, when he spoke last week. He spoke of the changes that have taken place, many of them because of the presence of a social democratic party in Canada. There can be no comparison between the society into which he was born—and into which I was born for that matter— and the society we see today. For want of a better term, we call it the "welfare state". Nobody is going to dismantle the welfare state because, whatever faults it may possess, we are not willing to go back to the kind of jungle which existed before, in all its insensitivity. In our desire to be a more humane civilization we have removed many of the pressures which pushed civilization in a certain direction. We have removed combative presssures; pressures of poverty and pressures of illness and desperation.

• (1632)

This is not a desperate society. It is not the world of Adam Smith, if there ever was such a world. It is not a world of small shopkeepers competing against each other. We have a different society. Because it has been gradual and because we have fought every step of the way in order to attain this society, we have not stopped to analyse and ask what the implications are for the future, now that we have this kind of society. Ours is not the only welfare state. I do not think there is a country in the western world, including the United States, which does not devote much of its resources to the field of medicine, education or pensions, all of which are associated with welfare states.

Another thing that is happening is that growth in the western world is slowing down. That is not so just in Canada, but in the whole western world. Those of us who have been travelling to Japan, Germany, France, Britain, or even Sweden, will note that the preoccupation of those countries is the same as the preoccupation here: what happened to growth? What we tend to forget is that we have come through a period of the most rapid growth in human history. The last 30 or 40 years have been a period of incredible growth. This is not usual for the world. The world did not grow at that rate before, but because we have been living in this period we think it is going to go on forever. But suppose it is not going to go on forever, and suppose we simply have to adjust to making a decent society which is not constantly being prodded and pushed into consumption? I think that is in fact what is happening.

If we look around at people today, we find that they have changed a great deal. Their attitudes toward clothing, cars, and security have changed. Out of the old society a new one is emerging. The great difficulty is that, whatever we say about the old society, it is both true and false. Whatever we say about the new society is both true and false. But a government which continues to ignore the fact that it has a double problem, how to manage the existing society, and how to make the transition to the other one, is doomed to failure.

I will give some examples of failure. The government cuts taxes. I say the cuts are being made in the wrong places. Perhaps that is part of the failure, but it is a general failure in a relatively affluent society and in a welfare state. The Keynesian idea is that if we cut taxes we stimulate demand enormously, but instead, when we turn on the stove, we get a shot of water in the face, and the government stands there wondering what happened. Governments think they are doing the right thing but then wonder what happened.

Mr. Chrétien: We cut sales taxes.

Mr. Saltsman: Cutting sales taxes is somewhat more efficient, but that too poses a problem. Besides, that cut is going to be rescinded.

Mr. Blackburn: It already has been.

Mr. Saltsman: The government still has not shown that it understands the problems sufficiently to forget about tax cuts and to initiate other things such as grants, payments, increased old age pensions, increased family allowances, or earlier retirements, as ways to stimulate the economy.

Increases in public expenditures are positive and direct, and the outcome can be predicted. We are now entering a slow growth period. I do not want to go into all the reasons we are in a slow growth period, but I think we will have to face the fact that we will not continue to grow at the same pace as we have. To some extent we should not deplore that. We grew too fast for too long, and very often we grew at the expense of humanity and the environment, and people no longer want to do that. We are becoming a more stable society, and we have to make the necessary adjustments.

There is far less demand today for traditional goods and far more demand for services. This is becoming quite obvious, and it has an effect. Much of the inflation we experience in our society is a direct consequence of the switch from the production of goods. Productivity figures are totally misleading because they do not take this factor into account. When we switch from the production of goods to the consumption of services, we have what amounts to a productivity drop, because in providing services we cannot use labour-saving devices and inventions to the same extent as we can in the production of goods. Therefore we have what looks like a productivity drop.

As people in the goods sector increase their incomes, usually in line with productivity increases, which cannot be matched by the service sector, and the service sector wants to catch up—it is about 60 per cent of our economy now—that catch-up is inflationary. That may be fair and just, but it is inflationary. A permanent inflation is built into a society which is in the process of this kind of transition. We hear very little about the consequences of that and of what needs to be done.

I am proud that my colleagues have had an important role to play in the redistribution policies of the last 30 years. Looking back now, redistribution in those years was relatively painless because people's incomes were growing very rapidly, and the gross national product was increasing enormously. This enabled our society to improve the situation of virtually everyone, not on a relative basis, but on an absolute basis. In addition, those who had some of their money taken away did not find it too painful because they were still improving their situations, and therefore we were able to effect redistribution domestically as well as internationally. But, what happens when the gross national product does not rise at the same rate? We get a right-wing conservative reaction because, in order to redistribute, something must be taken away from somebody, and people do not like that.

The money cannot come out of the surplus any more. There really must be a redistribution of existing resources. Some people must be told that they cannot become as rich as they did before, because some of the wealth has to be set aside for those who are not as well off. Then we go through this painful experience of moving to the right because people start to feel the effects of redistribution.

I think that there are now two moves taking place. We all know that there is a move to the right. Those of us who are in politics experience that, but I think the results in Saskatchewan, and the election of an NDP federal member of parliament in Newfoundland, indicate that there is also a willingness on the part of the public to look at more progressive ideas, if they are articulated. We are hoping to have the kind of debate in which there is no room in the middle, where the Liberals find themselves. They are right in the middle, trying to be all things to all people, and I do not think that is possible any more. We must take a stance on these changes which are taking place in our society, and decide which way we want to go. Should we stand in the way of these changes, or move with them and make the transition to a different kind of society?

We can call this society anything we want. We can call it the conserver society, as some people have, the post-industrial society or, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did, the new society. One of the few times the Prime Minister has been right in the last four years was in a speech he made a couple of years ago when he said that our society is changing. The idea of a Liberal Prime Minister finding that he is on the right side of history is enough to shock him back to reality and to go back to where he was before. The Prime Minister could not take it for very long, but our world is in fact changing. A new world is coming, and it will be a reasonably good world, as long as we adjust to it.

The reason the government seems so helpless in the face of what is happening is that it is not taking the dramatic changes into account as we become a new society. The government is still trying to deal entirely with the society which is dying away.

What is clear when we talk about this new society—it is easy to talk about a new society—is that more and more people who are looking at it are saying that the market system is breaking down. It should be obvious that we are not talking, as I said earlier, about Adam Smith's small shopkeepers; we are talking about large scale multinational corporations that can set their own prices and that, in fact, are sometimes bigger than governments and act as if they were governments. We are talking about large combinations of workers, not workers acting in isolation, workers protected by trade unions whose decisions affect hundreds of thousands of people, not just one man, two men or half a dozen men and women. This is a different kind of world.

We are talking about the welfare state where people no longer want to live by the law of an economic jungle. It operates at both levels; domestically and internationally. To some extent the only market that is left is the international market, and again some interesting things are happening there. What is happening is that, as the result of the spread of technology around the world, we are competing with everyone and nobody has a comparative advantage any more except in a very few things. We are competing internationally.

What is happening when we compete internationally? The very people who talk about competition in the domestic society are saying, "Protect us internationally. We do not want to compete with Taiwan, with Korea or with Singapore. We do not want to be thrown to the winds of international competition." The fact is that most of us are not and will not be.

A new kind of co-operative arrangement has to develop. In some ways a reverse colonialism is taking place. For centuries the west derived a net benefit from trade with the third world, with underdeveloped countries. We grew richer at the expense of the underdeveloped countries. Now the shoe is on the other foot. There is a real transfer of income from the western world to the third world. This is very obvious when you come to the oil producing countries; it is less obvious when you look at other countries. While this transfer of income does not show up as a per capita increase in wealth among the populations of those countries because their birth rate is so phenomenal, there is a real transfer of wealth from the west, and it is no longer in jute bags. Because of the multinationals and because of the foreign aid we have provided, we have given technology to many countries in the world.

We do not have much in the way of comparative advantage any more, nor does any other country have it. The Swedes and the Americans complain about it. It has to be faced that not only must we reorganize our internal economies to take into account the changes that are taking place, but we also have to do it internationally, otherwise there will be serious conflicts in that area as well.

What is the answer? No one is certain what the answer is beyond knowing that what they are doing now is not worth a darn, and what is being proposed by my friends on the right is no help either. For all practical purposes it does not represent any real kind of change. It seems to me that the problem is the same as it has always been, except that it is more acute, more urgent, more compelling, and we have to seek redistribution at two levels. Not just redistribution at the level of income. Certainly that will help, it is necessary, and it should be done. Now we are faced with the problem of redistribution of jobs as well. In his book entitled "Social Limits to Growth", Fred Hirsh talks about positional goods.

There are hundreds of thousands of bright young people coming out of university for whom there are no jobs. You can tell them to go pick apples or go pick tobacco—maybe there are jobs in those areas. But is this why we sent them to school? Is this why we told them to get an education? How can we ask people to do that? We can ask them to do it for a short period of time—and certainly it does not do anyone harm to do any kind of work because all work is worth-while—but the frustration of that kind of situation is becoming very obvious.

I think that much of the problem we have in the Post Office today arises from the fact that many of the people who work in the Post Office came out of school with a good education. They are not people who came out with just grade two or grade three—these people are well educated. Now they are being asked to do hum-drum jobs, they are being asked not to share in decision-making. I think it is that level of personal frustration, that struggle for an assertion of the dignity to which they think they are entitled, that is creating problems in the Post Office and, I think, in many other occupations as well. That is very important.

There will have to be a sharing of power. A rise in the number of neighbourhood groups, of citizens' participation, is an indication of the fact that people want to share. They feel they need to have more than just goods alone. They need to have access to good positions, to stature, to where the power is. For instance, look at an MP's job. It is not a bad job in many ways, but it is not the greatest job in terms of how hard we have to work for the money we make in comparison with other jobs. Presumably if we did as my friend, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, would have us do, that is, reduce our salaries below what they are now—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear!

Mr. Saltsman: —I am sure he would work for half of that—and I think all the rest of us would do the same thing—there would still be no shortage of candidates because, when all is said and done, we might not be as important as some of us think we are, but we are not unimportant either, and the kind of work we are called upon to do is very special. It is the kind of work that I certainly am very proud and happy to do. There are many people in this country who would be willing to do it. These are called positional goods.

I do not think there is a man or woman in this chamber today who could not make more money outside this chamber. So why do they do it? They do it because there is something more in life than just money. They do it because they feel that they are useful to society, that they make a contribution, and that they are where some of the power is, though again we might not have as much power as we think.

What this leads to is not that the government should get out of the economy, and not that they should say, "We will turn it back to the private sector", because this cannot be done. I saw my friend, Lubor Zink, earlier today in the corridor. He would say, "I told you so; you cannot have a little bit of socialism. There is no such thing as a little bit of socialism". I think he is right; we cannot go on the way we have. We need a managed economy, and we need the government in the economy rather than out.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[Translation]

SUBJECT MATTER OF QUESTIONS TO BE DEBATED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Perhaps it would be appropriate at this time to inform hon. members of the proceedings on the adjournment motion tonight. So it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 40, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith)—Transport—Grain shipments through Churchill, Man.; the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon)—Air transport—Hiring of consultants outside Canada—Possibility of charges being laid; the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez)—Fisheries—Proposed transfer of weather forecasting services.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): It is customary for the House at 5 p.m. to proceed to private members' business. However, in view of the point of order raised yesterday by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker), the House leaders have agreed that the balloting for private members' business will take place one week from tomorrow, on Friday, October 27, 1978, at 9.30 a.m. As no private members' business is listed on today's order paper, the House will continue with government orders.

Mr. Pinard: Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I ask for a special order of the House suspending the proceedings on private members' business until Monday, October 30, 1978.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions respecting that, and we agree.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the request is in line with the agreement already reached.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier (Roberval): We agree, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Is it agreed and so ordered?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

FINANCIAL ADMINISTRATION ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE ADDITIONAL BORROWING AUTHORITY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to take a few minutes of this House to give my opinion on Bill C-7 introduced this morning, which did not give us much time to consider it in detail. We did not take much time to consider it because it is not long. When the news was announced yesterday I thought that it was a borrowing of $7 billion. But I realize from reading the bill that borrowing authority is requested for $17 billion and when 1979 will be over the government will have borrowed a total of $28 billion, and that will increase greatly the debt of the country. Mr. Speaker, we have already made several borrowings to bolster the dollar, that famous floating dollar which has been diving like a submarine. The latest borrowings are for $750 million.

I am talking about the bond issue worth $750 million to bolster the dollar, and more recently, about another loan of $1.14 billion for the same purpose, which means that if we add up all the loans issued to prop up the dollar, we reach a total of $4.5 billion. Mr. Speaker, I find these loans enormous. Even then, our dollar has not been saved. If only the dollar had been bolstered and had regained its normal value, but this is not happening.

Mr. Speaker, this is another proof of the falseness of our debt system. For 15 years, we have been coming to this House and telling the government that it is time to get out of this system of running up debts continuously. After all, what are we now doing? We have to borrow to pay off old debts. We simply put the account in another name. The only difference will be that the interest charges will increase. Instead of paying 7 per cent or 7.5 per cent as before, we will pay 10 per cent, 10.5 per cent or 15 per cent and even more. This little game has been going on since the beginnings of Canada, to such a point that we are now saying that a debt is an asset. For my part, Mr. Speaker, I have never believed that getting into debt was becoming the owner of anything. I consider that I own something when I no longer owe anything on it and when it is no longer mortgaged.

Canada is now mortgaged for over $67 billion, and if we add the $28 billion to that, we will have reached $95 billion at the end of 1979. That is a mortgage. No one should say that we own Canada. We do not. We are living with a great many debts which we cannot repay because we will have to borrow each year if not each month to pay the interests one the old debts. We no longer have enough even to pay off the interests. We must borrow to do so. Where will all this lead us, Mr. Speaker? I suggest that it will simply lead to a crash such as occurred in the thirties, which was caused by the fact that the government had completely lost control over the Canadian money supply. I say that is what we are heading for today. The Bank of Canada controls absolutely nothing. It seems to control the amount of debts, but with all the changes made in the Bank of Canada, even though it has raised the bank rate to 10¼ per cent on the reserves, that does not bother the chartered banks one bit because when they run out of money, they could not care less; they do not need the Bank of Canada: they go to the client, because today the client who borrows can create the bank reserves.

That is what is happening today. Let no one say that the Bank of Canada is going to control the chartered banks by imposing 10¼ per cent on illegal reserves, when they fall below the allowed amount. In any event, the 10¼ per cent applies only for three days because we know full well that after three days, the chartered banks go to their clients to borrow the $500 the latter will deposit in their savings account and on which the banks will pay 9 per cent interest.

It does not take long to build up reserves. That is how it works, Mr. Speaker, and today we try to cope with our debt. The issue should be studied in depth because there is an inconsistency in Canada. Our country is the largest borrower in the world and one of the most industrialized countries having the largest debt per capita. See if you can understand that! We have the largest debt per capita. To my mind it is because the government does not take its responsibility which is to control credit in Canada. This is the reason of the problem.

As I said earlier, we are on the path of another crisis like in the thirties. Let us remember what happened in the thirties. The government had lost all control over the issue of credit and money and at that time every chartered bank was allowed to print its own money, provided it kept gold in its vaults. Eager to make profits like others, they did not care whether or not they had gold in their vaults; even if they had no gold left they printed money, they issued credit and they granted loans. When they realized there was nothing left, they kept on lending anyway. Then, there was the crash of the thirties and who saved the situation?

Mackenzie King saved the situation by creating the Bank of Canada in 1935. In the Bank of Canada Act, it was prescribed that henceforth no chartered bank would be allowed to print money. That goes for legal currency, but our monetary system is divided into two parts: a legal currency which we call our dollar and monetary credit. But the legal currency represents only 8 per cent and the monetary credit 92 per cent of the money supply.

Mackenzie King did the right thing when he put the issue of monetary credit and legal currency under the control of the Bank of Canada. Only the Bank of Canada—and it is still the same today and it has stabilized the monetary system at that time—issues the currency, the paper money and the coinage, and if the chartered banks need some, they must buy it from them. The Bank of Canada is the sole authority and has complete control over all this. So much for the 8 per cent of the paper currency. However, he had forgotten a small detail. It may have been intentional, but he had forgotten a detail.

If he had done the same thing in the same legislation for the monetary credit, if he had instructed the Bank of Canada to control monetary credit as closely, the new credit for the new production that has to be minted by the bank each year, if the same act had been applied to monetary credit, we would not be in trouble as we are today. Indeed not, and I think several members will agree with me. It is realized today that if we are in debt up to the eyes, it is because the Bank of Canada has never controlled monetary credit, has never minted the yearly production. Never! It has left it to the chartered banks. The chartered banks are the ones that mint the production.

Let us suppose that last year we had $75 billion in gross national product and $40 billion in national revenue. This amounts to $35 billion in new products which must be minted. This is what is called minting new credit. If the Bank of Canada had any authority on that just as on legal currency, the Bank of Canada alone would issue that credit. No chartered bank would have the right to create a single dollar. The Bank of Canada would create these new credits to the benefit of the country and individual Canadian citizens and not the chartered banks to their own profit. This is what we of the Social Credit party advocate.

It is legalized theft by the chartered banks. This is why there is still misery today. So long as the government does not regain authority over monetary credit, new credits, we will be faced with this difficulty because as soon as we produce something, as soon as we declare a net production we borrow its value the day after. We have to borrow to put it on the market. How ridiculous! Goods are worth the cost of production plus 10 per cent because chartered banks do not lend without interest. This is where the evil lies because our debt which adds up to $67 billion represents only the interest on a capital which we should not have borrowed because it belonged to us in the first place. This is why we have been saying for so long that we must absolutely bring about a separation between these two things, that the public sector must be financed by public capital, by the Bank of Canada, and that the private sector must be financed by the private capital.

[Mr. Gauthier (Roberval).]

The fact is that the public sector these days is financed by private capital. The public sector must necessarily pay the interest charges. There is a total change of economy. Within a single economy we do not have the right to charge interest because this would unleash a galloping inflation, but between two different economies one can charge interest and that is why the chartered banks charge interest to the federal government. They charge interest on something which belonged to the federal government and which the federal government should have injected in the financial circuit. There lies the secret. It is not as complicated as it may seem. There are some people for whom money represents a mystery. They make a mystery out of it but it is not so at all. I think that as long as we fail to get back to reasonable ways of doing things we will encounter problems in bolstering the dollar. It just will be impossible to do it.

It will be still more difficult to pay our national debt because we should keep in mind that we have both a public and a private debt. Our federal debt amounts to $67 billion; we should add to that the $28 billion I already mentioned if we want to go as for as the end of 1979, which will amount to $95 billion at the end of 1979. There are also provincial debts which amount to $16.825 billion, consumer credit which represents $25 billion, corporation credit which totals $31 billion and mortgages which stand at $13 billion, which adds up to a total national debt of $152.825 billion.

Those figures do not include the debt of all Canadian municipalities. The federal deficit alone increases at the rate of $13,700 per minute—I shall come to that later—$222,000 per hour, $20 million per day. Right now the average debt per capita in Canada, including people from all categories, children, and senior citizens, amounts to $6,900. You should add to this the interests on the $28 billion, and the debt is going to go up from $6,800 to close to $7,500 per capita, and $27,600 per family.

Interests we have to pay on the Canadian debt amount to $6.5 billion a year, on provincial debts $1,228,225,000, on consumer credit $2.5 billion, on finance company loans to corporations $3.1 billion, on mortgages $1.5 billion. In the end, total interests are in the order of $14,628,225,000. This means Canadians will be paying $1,693,000 a minute on the total debt, or $40,633,944 a day. In 1978 the interests on the total debt will be $665 per capita, and with the $28 billion they will be $1,000 per capita. I said earlier we were the most heavily taxed and most interest burdened nation in the world, well the figure is $2,660 per household.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to read more of that, but I will now turn to the deficit. I simply wanted to give an idea of how far this country is now into debt. We are wrestling with deficits and that fight is not over yet because as long as we do not get out of that "gimmick" there is no hope. We do not control our credit, we control nothing here. Our lives are controlled by financial circles and chartered banks. I blame nobody. Whoever the minister may be, whether he is a Conservative or a Liberal, he will be doing the same thing under that "gimmick". They can do no better. The "gimmick" has to be changed. Today we are wrestling with large deficits, including the balance of payments deficit. Where do those balance of payments deficits come from? In the first place there is the merchandise trade. We export too much raw materials and not enough finished products. When I think we have to import food products, we produce some 40 per cent of our food. Imagine, in a country like Canada, 40 per cent only. When it comes to furniture and other products, it is even worse. All we export abroad is raw materials—our iron, our aluminum, our steel, all this goes abroad then comes back as finished products.

As long as governments do not care for and do not invest in secondary and tertiary industries, as long as they are content with encouraging primary industry, we will have that kind of balance of payments deficits. When it comes to encouraging small businesses, the government may suggest they must have the will to invest. My suggestion is we must give them a break so they can invest.

Here is another contradiction. Canada is practically the country with the highest savings; why then do Canadians who could venture in industry, keep their savings? Because they are afraid. They are afraid of the government. They are afraid of the tax system because if they invest today in industry thereby risking certain amounts of money already invested in fairly safe enterprises to prevent tax people from "swallowing" them up, in two or three years the taxman will eat up their capital. So they prefer to sit on it rather than break their necks.

They will not invest as long as the government does not give premiums to the industry and protect primary and secondary industries. It can very well give subsidies for two and three years and it is done. Small subsidies are paid to encourage them, to save face but after three years, taxes are levied. Tax deductions are granted for a couple years, then three years later . . . Some of my friends followed the suggestion of the government and launched some projects but in the fourth year they were ruined by taxation. The government had taken back its subsidy and at the end of five years, they were bankrupt. Is that to encourage industry? No, Mr. Speaker. Some favours are bestowed on powerful industrialists and on multionationals. The fact is not always disclosed. It is concealed. Take for example the $40 million paid to the Ford Company. I say that those $40 million would have been more effective in our areas to develop secondary and service industries I can assure you. That is the worker's tax that went there, to a multibillionaire multinational company while they urge our small investors to invest their money and build industries which they will destroy in three or four years. Meanwhile, the government is going to protect the multinationals because they are the ones which put it in power and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the government will have to change its attitude towards industry.

They give incentives to encourage small businesses but for one year or two only, which is not enough. They offer them money to pay for two or three years, interests on the money they are going to borrow. Let us be serious! To encourage industry means to support and assist it, as long as it is not profitable. Municipal and other levels of government, as well as big business are allowed to go tax-free for up to 20 years. Why not do the same for small businesses because, next to the farming industry, they are the ones who create steady employment for our workers. I think that point deserves some consideration. From then on, we could have finished products and exportable goods. And what about the milk industry? Even they, do not receive any help. I know some cheese producers who are forced to reduce their export orders by 50 per cent because they cannot obtain the milk they need to to meet the demand. What a joke! Milk producers who exceed their quota are fined.

I have seen some milk producers pay a $2,000 fine in a month because they had gone beyond their quota, yet there is a cheese producer desperate for milk which he cannot get and because of that his contracts are cancelled. This is what is called encouraging exportation. No wonder our balance of payment is showing a deficit. During this time, we import foreign cheese. Our milk goes down the drain and we cannot produce cheese. We see such utterly disgusting and revolting things in Canada that I wonder why the government does not react, why it does not take action to put an end to it. And now they come crying to the House, saying: "There is a deficit in our balance of payment". But they are not doing anything to boost exports in order to balance our payments.

I was referring earlier to individuals who would have risk capital to invest. It will be noted that in the province of Quebec—I have not been in other provinces—large investments—investments dealers surely know that—are safe. Municipal and school board debentures are safe investments. But people will not risk money in business or industrial ventures because they know their investments would not be guaranteed. Those are not safe investments. They witness so many bankruptcies, I do not blame them and I tell them: You are right!

Let us wait until such time as we have sensible laws that can protect us, because I took a chance myself and lost money on some industries, but never again. Yet I was confident. But income tax has ruined industry. I suppose that all other private investors are like that. They go for what is safe. Anyone who owns a business, who runs it day by day and who is careful will wait for the tax inspectors and watch them so that they will not steal too much from him. Some people think that tax inspectors will only try to catch cheats in business or industry.

I can tell you that I personally won a battle against such inspectors, because I was not the one who cheated, they were. And they thought they would get me. That is what prompts people to say: Well, sometimes you win, sometimes you lose. It will always be like that as long as people have such a mentality, as long as they are not honest enough to recognize the efforts made by some for society and their fellow citizens, in order to create employment. Some civil servants think that they are paid to collect taxes.

When after five years of easy-going management someone comes to a small businessman for a check and he must show the receipts for a five-year period. Imagine! That is the end and the only solution left to him is to shut down his shop and clear out his stock. This is what happens.

Mr. Speaker, once again we do not ask ourselves why private investment is lagging in Canada. As far as interests are concerned, that is another problem. We are told that the Bank of Canada and the other banks increase interest rates to avoid a flight of capital out of the country. Imagine! But they do not realize that by trying to do so they paralyse the whole market.

Money is too expensive, industries cannot operate any more, neither can businesses; they paralyse everything by trying to prevent capital from flying out of the country. I think it would be much better, as I said earlier, to throw the dice, to prevent that flight of capital, to help protect the capital invested in Canada, and so investors will not think about investing elsewhere. Let us not be afraid. They invest abroad, because they are afraid to see the government take what they have left. That is why they take their money out of the country. When the government passes legislation to protect that capital, I think we shall begin to reduce our deficits.

Once again, I should like to invite the government to separate both sectors, namely the public and the private sectors, and to have the public sector financed by public capital, by national revenue and the private sector financed by private capital.

Today I can understand why the Prime Minister (Mr Trudeau) says that there are only two ways of financing a country, taxes and income taxes. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker! I was so surprised to hear that, it floored me. Only two ways, yet we know that Canada is a producing country, but what happens to its products? I think we should start using production like a father does with his household, and if at year end there is not enough, then you resort to taxes, if there is a deficit, but before that you have to use the product that you have.

And what is that product? Well, it is the revenue generated by each year's new production that the government, through the Bank of Canada, must transform into money, and give to the people. Really! If the country has produced 45 billion, well you have to start using that before taxing everyone for 45 billion. That is where I understand the Prime Minister's statement. He does not give a hoot about revenue. He ignores it, that belongs to the chartered banks. We are going to have to claim our goods and tell the Bank of Canada: Now, that new production, you are going to create it, then deposit it, and register it in the books of the Bank of Canada. What is it going to be used for? For Canadian expenditures. The federal government, instead of borrowing as it does, is going to have $45 billion on hand, and if the provinces need it, they are also part of the national economy and they are going to borrow there. If they need $50 million, they will get it interest free, of course. This is an economic principle whereby if you use money within the same economy you do not even have the right to charge interest because that is going to create galloping inflation. But why are governments borrowing today? Because they have given up the goods of the people, and then they are force to borrow them and put them on the market. That is all. It is clear.

Well, listen to what an economist has to say:

> Another economist looked into that problem of government financing and came to the conclusion that Social Crediters discovered long ago, namely financing public capital with new interest free credit.

Interest free, of course. Take a father within his household economy. When he goes and gets $200 from his bank account, does he think about paying interest into his own account? No, it is within the same economy. He would be making a mistake if he paid interest to himself. For a country, it is the same thing; the economy is much larger, that is all. It is the same thing. If the money is there at the Bank of Canada, it belongs to the country, the nation. The government has no business paying interest to itself if it is required for the nation. But they should be the ones and the only ones to have the right to create money, not chartered banks. All chartered banks today think they have the right to monetize the production of the people of Canada by multiplying their assets by 16; they take over the production of the people of Canada for personal purposes—chartered banks are private industries. I do not blame them for that.

When we can make people understand that that system must be corrected, chartered banks will become like caisses populaires. Caisses Populaires are doing very well, as well as chartered banks, but what is straining chartered banks today is that they have to create so much because they have to finance the public sector. But should the public sector ever manage to finance itself through the Bank of Canada, chartered banks will have only the private sector left, and that will be enough.

Everything will work out and the Canadian people will be able to benefit from the credit of their country. This is not the case now as only banks and trusts benefit from Canadian revenue. About ten big companies benefit from the national credit and everyone else is taxed. When the worker produces for a value of $1,000, for instance, he is taxed for $1,000. This has been said by an economist. This theory is explained in a volume entitled "The Challenge of Abundance", by Mr. Robert Thoebald, which can be found in the Library of Parliament. This is what Mr. Thoebald says in this regard:

A government may use three methods to obtain the funds required to meet its commitments. First of all, it can tax——and this government knows what it means to tax, like all its predecessors.

First of all, it can tax the citizens and the institutions to gain control over their money. Second, it can borrow the money from the people and the institutions and pay interest on the sums borrowed. Third, it can simply create the money and use the funds generated to make its purchases.

This is what I was saying earlier, and it is very simple. You simply have to follow up on Mackenzie King, who ordered that in future all legal tender would be controlled exclusively by the Bank of Canada, and add that the same would apply to monetary credit. That is all you would have to do to set the whole thing straight. Chartered banks would remain and have the same function; they would remain commercial banks, but Canada would be in a much better situation and Canadians would stop having the product of their work stolen each year, and I say "stolen" because I believe that this is a national theft that benefits chartered banks. As long as this is not done, Mr. Speaker, we will continue to complain about deficits and borrow to pay off the interests, and ten years from now, we will not even be able to borrow to pay off these interests.

[English]

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, in joining this debate on the motion put forth by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) for the additional borrowing authority the government is seeking I should like first to make reference to some of the points made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the financial critic for the official opposition and presumably the senior financial spokesman for the Conservative party. Some of the points he made were a little surprising to me bearing in mind the importance of the position the hon. member for York-Simcoe occupies. The nation is looking at the official opposition rather carefully this week. Hon. members on that side of the House are gleeful as a result of some developments of a very temporary nature a few days ago; people are looking more closely at their senior spokesman and I think the hon. member for York-Simcoe stands out as their spokesman on matters related to finance.

The hon. member knows very well that the additional authority sought through this bill is not intended to cover additional spending by the government. In fact, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) have repeated over and over again since the declaration of last August, it is the intention of the government to reduce substantially expenditures over the years ahead. The hon. member knows this. He knows authority is being obtained now to cover the government's needs not only for the balance of the present fiscal year but for the next fiscal year so as to avoid our having to come back to parliament time and time again for the necessary legislation if we are to meet the expenditures which he himself, along with other members of the finance committee, examined in detail when the estimates were before the committee last spring and supported there. If expenditures are made, they have to be paid for. That is the purpose of this authority. It is of a routine nature. It is the kind of thing which must be brought before parliament from time to time to make sure that sufficient funds are on hand to meet commitments.

The hon. member referred to briefcases and to washrooms, presumably in the course of what he considered to be mature and deliberate comments. He gave us some figures which are of small significance in relation to total government expenditures. I am not sure why he mentioned briefcases; they are used, I suppose, by a large number of the 300,000 civil servants engaged in government and agency work. But the hon. member did not refer to the full four billion or five billion which he and his leader have recommended should be spent and added to the country's deficit in the course of the recent election campaign. Add up all the goodies the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark), supported by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and others across the way, indicated they would hand out if they formed the government of this country and one would be coming forward with a bill seeking authority to borrow not the amount mentioned in this measure but $4 billion or $5 billion more.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Martin: I perused some of the literature put out by the party opposite, full of doom and gloom and references to the terrible situation we are in, but I do not recall the cost of those promises being shown as an addition to the deficit which we all agree is already too high and must be reduced. The attitude was: If you buy these goodies there is a price tag but we will tell you what it is later on. We believe the people should be told about the price tab now and I assure you, Mr. Speaker, we shall make a point of doing so.

The official critic for the Conservative party indicated we were fiddling around in foreign markets borrowing money and gave the impression that this was a very strange thing to do; I think he said only two countries had made such loans before. The point he did not bring out was that the Deutschmark loan this government made was taken out at a rate of 5 per cent. He did not mention that for the obvious reason that it was a darned good deal; it is not in the interests of members of that party to indicate to the public that anything done by this government is in the interests of the Canadian people. That loan was a good deal.

An hon. Member: A good deal of money.

Mr. Martin: The hon. member also gave the impression that all the money that was being borrowed was being frittered away on day to day expenditures, that the government was borrowing these great amounts of money just to pay salaries and current expenses. He made no reference to the fact that part of the government expenditures in this two-year period is being devoted to a number of major capital projects which will bring long-term benefits. Large amounts of money are being invested in tar sands development. Money is being invested through CMHC in houses for senior citizens, co-operative housing and other types of housing projects involving direct financing.

Nor did he mention many other areas where capital expenditures rather than current spending is involved, among them, transfers to the provinces involving capital programs such as the building of hospitals and other facilities under shared costs arrangements with the federal government.

It is obvious we have been obliged to use some long-term funds to deal with the U.S. exchange problem, again, as the Minister of Finance has said so often, to ensure an orderly market. The hon. member made a great point of emphasizing that we were applying now for money for the next fiscal year. Mr. Speaker, the bill is presented in this form so that no more parliamentary time will be taken up than is necessary and we can get on with more positive things which need to be done. The funds will not be used until actually needed, but the authority will be there.

I would like to refer again to the comments of the hon. member for York-Simcoe who ridiculed the fact that the Prime Minister objected to comments made by the Leader of the Opposition when, in his lead speech in the throne speech debate, the Leader of the Opposition said that Canada had dropped to seventh place among the world's richest nations. The Prime Minister asked him to specify which countries were involved, but no specifics were given. The Prime Minister referred to some small countries which indeed might be ahead in terms of the riches that they have enjoyed in recent years.

When the hon. member for York-Simcoe went into that subject this afternoon, I called across the floor from where I was sitting and asked him to specify the countries he was talking about, if we are in seventh place. He did so, and I will repeat them because I want to discuss those countries and our position among them. The hon. member mentioned West Germany, Belgium, Norway, Sweden, the U.S.A., Denmark and Switzerland. He said that Canada fell behind all those countries, again conveying the notion to the public at large that Canada is in a much worse position than any of those seven countries and that we have fallen behind them.

Let us look at some of the factors involved with which I assume it would be deemed fair to deal in considering where we stand as far as economic progress in concerned. Let us talk about job-creation. I may be repeating some of the information already put on the record by the Prime Minister, but it must be done because the average Canadian is not getting this information through the media or from members of the opposition, whose plan has been for a year or more, and certainly will be for the next six months, to put before people the ideas that they are in a doom and gloom position. They will not mention any positive facts. It will be up to us to put this information forward over and over again.

Let us talk about job creation, which is a very important matter in any country which considers itself to be doing reasonably well. From 1973 to 1977 Canada outpaced the U.S.A. and the OECD nations. We were three percentage points ahead of the United States and eight percentage points ahead of the OECD countries.

One of the countries referred to by the financial critic of the official opposition—I am not picking these countries out, he picked them out and I am merely making a comparison—was West Germany. From 1974 to 1977 job creation in West Germany went down 4.1 per cent. In the same period job creation in Switzerland went down 10 per cent. Those are two of the countries the hon. member for York-Simcoe indicated were ahead of Canada in terms of over-all economic progress.

There were 10,635,000 job holders in Canada as of the end of September, 375,000 more than in August of last year. On a seasonally adjusted basis some 279,000 new jobs were created in Canada in the first eight months of 1978. From 1950 to 1976 the labour force here grew at an annual rate of 2.7 per cent. Hon. members opposite laugh. They should be hiding their heads in shame because they are not telling people about these figures. The U.S. rate was less than half our 2.7 per cent rate; it was 1.3 per cent. Hon. members opposite do not like to hear this because it goes against what they are trying to shove down the throats of Canadians.

Mr. McKenzie: You couldn't sell that in Scarborough.

Mr. Martin: Let me turn for a moment to food prices.

Mr. McKenzie: Tell us about the vote in Scarborough.

Mr. Martin: I will tell the hon. member about the vote in Scarborough after the general election.

Mr. Ellis: No, you won't.

Mr. Martin: In a comparison of least costly food Canada stands in second place and, for the edification of the hon. member for York-Simcoe, not seventh. West Germany is in ninth place, Belgium in seventh place, Sweden in tenth place, the U.S.A. in fourth place and Denmark in eleventh place. The general statements made by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and originally by the Leader of the Opposition in this context have to be considered irresponsible because they simply do not coincide with the facts I am putting on the record now.

Canada stands in second place in connection with the cost of living. West Germany is in tenth place.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What do you mean, second place?

Mr. Martin: In terms of lowest increases in the cost of living that is where we stand in relation to this group of 15 industrialized countries. We stand in second place. The hon. member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro) shakes his head, but that is because he has not been told about this. He is going by what the official critic of his party has told him. He has been given incorrect information. He should tell the peole back in Victoria that he is getting incorrect information. West Germany is in tenth place, Belgium is in thirteenth place and Norway is in fifteenth place. All these countries are supposedly doing better than Canada, according to the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Sweden is in eleventh place, Denmark is in ninth place and Switzerland is in twelfth place.

I hesitate to go into any more of these statistics, but I think it is important that we do because hon. members opposite are doing so. They named the countries. They now want me to go back to what I was talking about earlier because they do not like what they are hearing.

Mr. McKenzie: What about Scarborough?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. The hon. parliamentary secretary has the floor. Hon. members will have their turns later on.

Mr. Martin: In the difficult years from 1974 to 1977 where did Canada stand with regard to trade balances? Canada stood in fourth place. We hear much about trade balance problems. Yes, we have some, but we were in fourth place. Belgium was in thirteenth place, Norway was in fifteenth place, Sweden was in seventh place, Denmark was in fourteenth place and Switzerland was in tenth place. I wish the hon. member for York-Simcoe was here to hear this because he has given completely wrong information to people who may read his speech, have watched or listened to it or whatever.

Unfortunately, I do not have a great deal of confidence that the media will broadcast this positive information.

Mr. Ellis: What you are saying is that they will not read your speech.

Mr. Martin: I agree, and that is because my speech is not bad news, it is good news. We are going to make it a point to make sure that the Canadian people get some of the good news.

During the difficult years between 1974 and 1977 Canada was in second place with regard to housing starts, not eighth or ninth.

Mr. McKenzie: Seventy-two thousand unsold homes?

Mr. Martin: I am not talking about sales, I am talking about construction. The hon. member should listen to the information; only then will he be able to digest it properly. Sweden was in twelfth place, and the U.S.A. was in fourth place.

Let us deal with the rate of growth of real domestic product. Again I deal with the difficult years, 1974 to 1977 when all countries were having problems, and again I deal with the countries on the list used by the hon. member for York-Simcoe. Canada stood in second place, Switzerland in fifteenth place, Denmark in eleventh place and the U.S.A. in eighth place.

I do not think there is any point in carrying on with these detailed statistics. The point has been made by the Leader of the Official Opposition and the hon. member for York-Simcoe. They have called on the Canadian public, through important speeches at the beginning of this session, to support their preconceived notion of doom and gloom. That, they figure, is what will win them an election: talk gloom and doom, and, my gosh, people will say: "If it is really that bad, maybe we should look at those guys a little more carefully". It is just as important for the people in Scarborough as elsewhere to hear some of the real facts.

● (1752)

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Martin: I think that in our parliamentary system it is just as important for the Leader of the Opposition and his senior financial critic, for that team, to be responsible when they are putting forth economic statistics and economic facts or analyses before the Canadian public as it is for the government to do so, because the parliamentary system operates on the assumption that both sides of the House will be responsible for what attitudes they take and what things they do. We for our part are being responsible. We have shown our responsibility particularly in relation to the recent cuts announced in government expenditures in our effort to reduce the over-all deficit. Members of the official opposition are starting off this new session with speeches by the Leader of the Opposition and the financial critic of their party in which they have re-emphasized to the public—which, in their mind, is the only way they can get support—that Canada is in bad shape. "Talk your country down, fellows, and we can win an election." That is their whole concept and that is what they will try to run into as many Canadian heads as they can in the next six months. But, Mr. Speaker, they will not get away with that.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Before giving the floor to the honourable member for Dauphin (Mr. Ritchie) I should like to make a brief reference to the action by the Chair earlier in the day in respect of the amendment put forward by the honourable member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). The Chair reserved the decision on that amendment at that time and simply set it aside. There was no argument raised at that time and the Chair indicated it would be held aside. No point of order had been raised on the matter and the Chair was not advised of any procedural argument that was to be raised.

However, I think it is the duty of the Chair, particularly on second reading amendments, to be on the alert and to advise the House if, in the opinion of the Chair, there is any serious procedural difficulty. Therefore, we examined the contents of the amendment as well as some precedents, notably one from 1970 concerning a ruling of my distinguished predecessor in respect of an amendment put forward at that time by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert) on a grain bill. I must confess to some misgivings about the entire practice of reasoned amendments at second reading.

I have looked at the British practice, as I think most hon. members have, and found it to be much more generous than ours. In the British practice it is quite acceptable to attach to a second reading vote a motion which is by way of an amendment to the second reading motion, which seems to be nothing more than an expression of the reason for voting against the motion. We have taken a much tighter line in Canadian practice but, to my regret, not strong enough, because I still think that frequently in our past practice we have permitted this very kind of declaration. Certainly on the occasion of the 1970 precedent which I examined this afternoon we permitted a statement which was really a declaration that the bill somehow offended or was repugnant in principle to members of the House and to some residents of Canada and that the House declined to give second reading to the bill.

If it was permissible at that time in our practice to do that, certainly it must be permissible to do what the hon. member for York-Simcoe has done in this amendment because he introduces at least a new principle which is contrary to that of the bill, that is, the principle of granting borrowing power for future years on the basis of which he says the House declines to give second reading at this time.

I still think that at some time we should select one of these practices, and I am sure that at some time in the future a good example will be chosen and a point of order will be raised which will compel me or a future Speaker to examine all of these so-called reasoned amendments at second reading and find out which ones really are expanded negatives and which ones in fact introduce a statement of a principle declaratory of some principle contrary to the principle of a bill, or whatever the appropriate language is.

In any case, having briefly examined the precedent on this particular occasion, I looked at the amendment that was put forward and I found I really could not single this one out in the light of other precedents. Perhaps the argument will have to come at some future time. Therefore, on the face of it and in the light of the 1970 precedent of Mr. Lamoureux to which I have referred, it seems clear to me that this amendment is in order and should stand on procedural ground.

Mr. Chrétien: Mr. Speaker, we have not studied this amendment. You have just invited the House to raise a question of order on that type of amendment at second reading. I suppose that the Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) might want to put forward some argument on this point. I do not know whether you could accept an argument at this point, but we were taken by surprise. You said, sir, that you would look at the amendment without hearing any argument from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of Privy Council. Perhaps we could reserve our stand, as you have invited us to put forward some objections to a future bill. Perhaps we could reserve the decision, look at the amendment and then make a decision on reasoned amendments right away.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary was in the House during the speech of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens). In the middle of his speech, the hon. member for York-Simcoe made reference to the amendment he intended to move. Then he proceeded with his speech, at the end of which he moved the amendment. That is what happended a little while ago in this House.

[Mr. Speaker.]

Your Honour made reference to argument. There was an opportunity here to advance argument by the government but, for whatever reason—whether they did not really know or they did not realize what was happening, I do not know—they did not make an argument with respect to the matter. Then you dealt with the matter and gave a careful judgment based on the 1970 precedent—which I was going to argue in any event if that should have proven necessary—and you made a ruling which I think quite appropriate, and I say that with respect. Therefore, I think the matter must stand.

Mr. Speaker: I just want to reiterate, as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has just stated, that on this particular motion no point of order was raised. That does not in any way preclude a similar point of order being raised at some time in the future. My own disposition, as I have just said, is very critical of these kinds of motions at second reading stage. However, I did reserve my decision because, without a point of order having been raised by anyone in the House, the situation in the House this afternoon required the Chair to take the initiative, and it has to be a clear case, not one on which there is any doubt at all, that the initiative of the Chair is required. In this case I was in doubt, and on checking precedents I found I would be bound by the 1970 precedent.

It may be that the next time an amendment at second reading is raised, the government will want to take the opportunity—if it is declaratory of some principle of this sort—to raise it at that time, and then I would be pleased to hear full argument on both sides and to go into an exhaustive review of the precedents. It may also be that in respect of these amendments, if we wish our practice to depart substantially from the British practice, we might have to make a decision of that sort in our procedure committee. In any case my hands are tied with respect to this amendment and my decision is made.

Mr. Chrétien: I ask for an explanation, Mr. Speaker. I think that the point made by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) was that when the Chair received the motion, right away the Chair reserved its decision. I have the impression that perhaps you realized there was a problem with this one, but you took the initiative, sir, and that is why we did not raise a point of order. This is not a very important motion and obviously it will be defeated. We can always come back to the same point, but because the Chair has taken the initiative, we did not want to intervene. That was the point I wanted to make.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. The question is on the amendment.

It being after six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock.

At 6.04 p.m. the House took recess.

● (2000)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Gordon Ritchie (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, before I commence the main part of my speech tonight I should like to mention a few things. I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) as he presented a significant point of view. I suggest his point of view is debatable on philosophical grounds; he suggested more government intervention. Perhaps he does not realize the underground economy is already in place. At the present time much is being written about that in the United States, where it is estimated that something like 10 per cent to 15 per cent of the GNP belongs to the underground economy which does not surface in the tax system because of people working part time as well as drawing unemployment benefits. Their employers allow this because they can be paid less. This should be taken into account when we talk about more government intervention.

Agriculture always has been the Achilles heel of the Soviet Union and its economy. Under Mr. Khrushchev a peasant was allowed an acre of land to grow his own produce for the purpose of sale. It was reduced to a half an acre of land because it was felt that having an acre of land was against the philosophy of the Soviets. Eventually it was found that the workers of half-acre parcels quit producing, and Mr. Brezhnev has been given credit for changing the half acre allotment to an acre once again. It is estimated that an acre is roughly 44 times as productive as state farms. More government intervention brings with it a whole train of intervention which we do not always think about.

During a recent airplane trip, I had occasion to speak with a missionary who had lived in South America for 25 years. He had interesting veiwpoints about inflation. I asked him how ordinary people lived in high inflation countries. He said that naturally they did not have very much money, and that they spent it each week to buy food and to pay for shelter. Thus, inflation did not affect them in a sense.

Then we must consider the wealthy, which make up a small proportion who protect themselves by the purchase of gold through the establishment of estates, and so on. I asked how the average individua! could protect himself against the ravages of inflation. What he told me was very interesting. He suggested that they might buy a bicycle because not only could they use it but its value would increase as inflation increased.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge also referred to multinational corporations. There is substantial evidence that the influence brought to bear by these corporations around the world is decreasing. Third world countries are establishing their own multinational corporations and companies but the climate for these corporations is not as good as it has been. I think these multinationals have had their day and their influence is less of a factor at the present time.

Let me say a word about savings, which are necessarily tied in with these borrowings. It is interesting to note that the present older generation is now saving money. An individual who works in the income tax field told me that he prepares the income tax returns for some 30 people, and he suggests that nearly all of them are saving money, though few of them have assets other than a house and an old age pension. These are thrifty and frugal people. The people who are aware of what is happening to the economy are likely to save as apparently those people have been able to do.

Furthermore, what is happening as a result of more and more intervention in the lives of individuals by governments of the day? Nearly every merchant, baker and butcher say that the consumer affairs people give them a bad time. One individual wondered whether it was worth operating his own business in view of the fact that many civil servants were making twice as much as he was able to make. Many of these people in small businesses are leaving business and joining the civil service because they are much better off. We have reached the stage in this sort of Ralph Nader society where everyone who makes a mousetrap or performs a service is of lesser importance, and certainly worse off financially, than those who police the making of the product or the provision of the service. The suggestion is that everyone who makes a mousetrap or performs a service is somehow ripping off the public. Those are a few of the thoughts I wanted to put on the record for the benefit of the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge.

Let me now turn to Bill C-7 which is, in effect, a $7 billion supplementary borrowing authority for the remainder of the current fiscal year, and authority for borrowing $10 billion for the year 1980. Imagine borrowing money for 1980 with more than a few months still remaining in this year. Since the beginning of the fiscal year 1978 the government has sought borrowing authority to a total of $38 billion. It has sought this authority in four different bills. First there was Bill C-45 for $7 billion, then there was Bill C-11 for $9 billion, followed by Bill C-31 for $5 billion, and now Bill C-7 for $17 billion.

At March 31, 1977, the unmatured debt of the Canadian government totalled $42.5 billion. If all the borrowing authority was used, by 1980 the unmatured debt would exceed $80 billion, some 100 per cent above the 1977 level. In fact, in three years we will have doubled the debt.

If we are to go by the past experience of this government it will likely seek further borrowing authority for 1980 even though the department might like to do so without coming for that authority to parliament. The request in Bill C-7 for $7 billion in borrowing authority represents the third time the borrowing ceiling has been raised for the present fiscal year. How can the experts in the minister's department be so wrong as to be required to come to the House of Commons three times to increase the borrowing ceiling?

The minister requested the $9 billion increase in Bill C-11 with the claim that it would cover the remaining cash requirements for 1978 and the cash requirements well into the new fiscal year. In March of this year the minister came back with Bill C-31 saying the new ceiling would provide the government with sufficient borrowing power to meet all the cash requirements for the 1978-79 fiscal year. Now he wants another $7 billion to cover foreign borrowing, the Canada Savings Bonds issue and other contingencies.

Let me turn now to the foreign exchange problem. It is obvious we are in a bad way in this regard. It is now realized that had there been no foreign exchange borrowing by the government our foreign exchange reserves would have been at zero. We are rapidly becoming as badly off as the British. Soon we will be joining those nations which lop all the zeroes off their currency. It seems the minister has to go to the New York market for a $750 million bond issue. I understand this issue commenced this morning. This bond issue is the third federal foreign currency bond issue this year. In April there was a $750 million issue in the United States. In May there was a German Deutschmark issue equivalent to $706 million in United States currency. In a seven-month period the Government of Canada will have issued $2.2 billion in foreign currency bonds.

Interest must be paid on these bond issues or borrowings just as it has to be paid on a line of credit with U.S. banks. All of this adds to the deficit of Canada's balance of payments. This is obviously going to mean some $200 million extra in interest payments. These additional interest payments are required at the very time when there is a deficit in the interest and dividends account, and it is growing by leaps and bounds. I am reminded of the fact that some years ago a New York banker suggested to Canadians that when they borrow they should at least be friendly with their bankers. I think the reason the minister is here tonight is to obtain the agreement of parliament in respect of these borrowings.

In the first half of this year the deficit on interest dividend payments was $1.7 billion, up 17 per cent from a comparable period in 1977, and 80 per cent greater than the deficit in the first half of 1976. Just this year alone the interest on the federal issue will raise the interest and dividend deficit by a full 5 per cent.

One could ask why the minister needs $10 billion in borrowing authority for 1980, particularly when we are a long way, in a parliamentary sense, from the end of March. Perhaps the minister feels like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) when he complained about the breakfast served at the world hunger seminar, that this is "just the same old buns", as the minister said. He said, "I thought it was going to be like the MP's breakfast in Ottawa; we get in the cafeteria there and you get to pick out your scrambled eggs or whatever you want". The minister told a Washington audience how wealthy Canadians are despite the doom and gloom about the economy. He said, "I walk up the driveways and I see two cars in the garage, ranch-type houses, so much money in the credit union, just back from a trip to Europe or some other place". If we are so wealthy why do we have to go down to Washington every three months to borrow money?

[Mr. Ritchie.]

Obviously inflation is a monetary phenomenon. There can be no inflation in a bartering economy, when in fact goods and services bear a relationship to the money supply and the costs increase proportionately. There is no doubt that deficit financing is contributing to the inflationary process that has been taking place.

What has the situation been in respect of financing requirements in the last decade? From 1966 to 1968 we experienced deficit financing to the extent of $2,578 million. In 1972-74 we required $3,271 million, and in 1975-76 we required $14,334 million. Now we have this enormous rise in deficits in the last two years. In fact, it is estimated that the deficit for 1977-78 will be increased by some $10 billion. If one can believe the statistics that are available it will be consideraby more—perhaps as high as $16 billion. The estimate for 1978 to 1979, on the best authority I have, is that it will be somewhere between $11 billion and $12 billion. The government has had a very bad habit of budgeting for a deficit considerably smaller than it ends up with. In the 1972-74 period over $2 billion of the $3 billion was amortized or monetized by the Bank of Canada, or 66 per cent of the requirements in that period. Obviously those were the days of minority government, one of the factors that set off the inflationary cycle.

There has recently been a steady progression required by the Bank of Canada as a percentage of net financing required. What stands out clearly—and this is a crucial point—is the inability or the unwillingness shown by the Government of Canada in obtaining non-inflationary financing—that is, sales to the non-banking general public—and its increasing reliance on the printing presses.

If credit demands rise faster than money supply, the competition for funds causes interest rates to rise, thus rationing out the weakest borrowers, that is, those unwilling or unable to pay the higher cost of funds. We see it happening already as the Bank of Canada raises the rate. If, however, at this stage the central bank prefers to keep interest rates from rising too quickly, either because it fears derailing the ongoing expansion or because, in its wisdom, it feels that interest rates are high enough, then it is forced to monetize the increasing credit demands.

This is exactly what happened in that ill-fated period of 1972-74 when the treasury and/or the central bank feared bidding up funds too aggressively, so as to place the entire government loan with the investing public, with the result that the Bank of Canada was forced to take up as much as 66 per cent of the government's net financing requirements. The enormous appetite of the public sector acts as a drag to the economy by crowding out the private sector; caught in this dilemma, the Bank of Canada comes to the rescue and purchases or monetizes government debt.

In the subsequent 1975-77 period, as the Canadian economy moved into a severe growth recession and private sector credit demands abated, the government was able to place an increasing proportion of financing requirement directly with the private saver. In those years it was a lot less. The 1975-77 period only required a total financing of some $7 billion. We are faced in two years with an enormous deficit of $20 billion which is projected for this year and next.

We have long been used, Mr. Speaker, to a foreign exchange deficit. So long as the Canadian dollar remains stable, it can be handled easily enough, particularly when foreigners have confidence in our economy and the stability of our political situation. But this has been clouded by the province of Quebec and the possibilities of serious disruption of our ability to pay our debts.

What are people who know saying about our Canada Savings Bonds? People are looking at them closely and they are described by many as a "con game". At the end of the year there will be on a $1,000 bond $85, $90 or $95 interest more or less. But in buying power this represents less money than the buyer had at the start. Furthermore, the $85 interest will be taxed at his marginal rate of income tax. In effect, a loss is guaranteed on these bonds. There is not the slightest chance of making a profit as long as inflation continues.

We distinctly hear asked the question: How low can the dollar go? It is said we are being locked into a collapsing currency. Our deficit financing has grown until there is obviously no bottom to the Canadian dollar. The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) says that a depressed dollar is good for exports. But it is also inflationary because everything coming into this country from the United States is going to cost 15 per cent more than it did a year ago. We have depreciated in the past year some 30 per cent more or less against the Japanese yen, yet the price of a bushel of buckwheat for the western farmer, a product destined for Japan, is the same price this year as last—$4.75 a bushel. I will not use the metric system in describing the price in tonnes—a system bitterly resented by the western farmers.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) has consistently overstated the growth rate. It has always been, he states, 5 per cent or 5.5 per cent, but it has not measured up to this during his time in that portfolio. Other people whose opinions and judgments are valued and considered have always been much less optimistic than the Minister of Finance.

Why does the minister want this borrowing authority at this moment, particularly for 1980? Does he expect a sudden run on the dollar? Perhaps he is concerned about the three-year old dividend controls which expired last week. No one knows what the impact of unmatured dividend flows will be on the shaky Canadian dollar which is now trading at a 45-year low against the U.S. dollar. This outflow, even if it is minimal, will not help our dollar. Some would suggest this outflow could be as high as $1 billion over a short period or up to $2 billion over a longer period. All in all, the situation for the Canadian economy is very clouded. The minister could well enlighten us a great deal more as to why he wants these enormous borrowings; indeed, we need an explanation.

I will close with these remarks, Mr. Speaker, but I look forward with interest to finding out from the minister why he needs to have the ceiling raised so far ahead. Is it because an election must come within a year? Is it that he does not want to be embarrassed at election time by a run on the Canadian dollar?

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, once again we have a government bill to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79. It seems that all we do here is discuss bills to provide for more borrowing. If we are not borrowing more money it seems we are spending more money or printing more money, which is a clear indication that the government does not know what it is doing and does not know the first thing about running this country.

This all started ten years ago when the rules of this House were changed to reduce the number of votes. There is no proper examination of the departmental estimates by parliament; there is no control over government spending. This has been pointed out year after year by the Auditor General. Even he cannot find out where the money is going.

Having listened to the comments from the government benches today I suggest that hon. members opposite should read the Auditor General's reports to find out what is going on in the country. The government would have us believe that everything is beautiful, our accounts are in good order and there is no need to appoint a Comptroller General at an initial cost of $6 million per year. The government seems to be proud of borrowing money all the time, but that is nothing to brag about. A government or a business cannot be run by borrowing money all the time. It is a clear indication that the government does not know what it is doing.

I should like to put on the record some remarks attributed to the Comptroller General in an article in the Winnipeg Free Press on September 29, 1978, datelined Edmonton:

> The federal government's system of financial planning and control is unsuitable for the current period of economic restraint, the Comptroller General of Canada said Thursday.
> Harry Rogers said in a speech to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants that the system evolved in a period of rapid expansion of government activities.
> "Without changes in these financial and manpower planning and control systems, the government will be severely limited in its ability to implement changes in its priorities."

It is odd that tonight the parliamentary secretary, who is supposed to be an accountant, did not comment on the matters raised by the Comptroller General. He informed us that this borrowing has something to do with reducing spending in the years ahead. The government has been in office for the last 15 years and it appears now that they are getting on to this so-called restraint and reduction of spending because of the latest opinion polls. It is not in them to have a really proper accounting system, to reduce spending or to see that our tax dollars are spent properly.

● (2032)

We are also informed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) and his Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Martin) that this bill is a routine matter. He stated that we voted for this amount to be passed. The parliamentary secretary's comments that we voted for this will have to be investigated in some detail tomorrow, Mr. Speaker. When I was at home in my riding during the recess, I was learning about more borrowing by reading the newspaper. I was not called back here to vote for any of this borrowing. So we were completely misled tonight by the parliamentary secretary. I will have his comments researched in more detail tomorrow.

Just in passing, there was another comment made about the great progress in housing and it was said that housing starts are up again. There are 72,000 new homes in this country today that remain empty. That is a dismal record for a country like Canada. People simply cannot afford to get into these homes. We recommended a mortgage deductibility plan that has been in effect in the United States for 40 years. It has been very successful. It has been in effect in Great Britain for many years and it has been very successful there. We want to implement a plan like this in Canada to help people buy homes. In return all we receive is criticism from the Minister of Finance, the Prime Minister and all the rest of them. All they have is a lot of negative criticism to offer.

I was also interested in the comments expressed by the financial critic of the New Democratic Party tonight. He criticized our party's financial critic. He listed a lot of small items that could be curtailed. However, there is no NDP member in the House tonight to listen to my comments. That is typical.

The comments of the New Democratic Party's financial critic seem to be right in step with this government. He said, "If the government spends more, the private sector will also spend more". That is a great theory. I have some evidence that will shatter that comment.

We had a change of government in Manitoba a year ago and I will give some statistics to show what is happening there. Expenditures are being curtailed. Not only that, the government is bringing in proper management and eliminating waste. Construction has experienced the greatest gain in Manitoba this year in the commercial sector. It is up a whopping 3,542 per cent from a mere $1 million worth last year when we had an NDP socialist government in Manitoba. We are up $38.4 million in 1978 so far.

After a loss of 6,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector under the NDP government, an increase in excess of 8,000 jobs in the past year has been evidenced. Expenditures are being curtailed. The private sector has faith in responsible government and as a result they are spending more. That is the evidence. In Manitoba building permits are up 69 per cent over 1977, when there was a New Democratic Party government in power which had all spending out of control. By having a responsible government eliminating waste and mismanagement, the private sector has expressed its faith in that government, and they will now invest in that province. That discounts the argument of the critic of the NDP.

Another example of what is happening in Manitoba by bringing in proper management and eliminating waste concerns the St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg. This hospital has been able to reduce its operating expenditures for this year by $3,700,000. This has been accomplished as a result of the president of the hospital working with the staff to set up a program of eliminating wasteful things and bringing in more efficient management. This hospital is still maintaining proper quality patient care. The quality of care for the patients is not being reduced. This is one hospital, one institution. The New Democratic Party critic said that we are talking about peanuts, small amounts. However, this is a $3,700,000 saving at one hospital. Mr. Quaglia, the president of the hospital, has listed in a document how they accomplished it. It shows that it can be done. I would like to see all of the policies and programs that were adopted at this particular hospital adopted in all of the government departments in Ottawa. We are talking about reducing taxes by $2 billion. We could probably reduce them by $10 billion if we implemented a program such as the one in existence at the St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg.

The parliamentary secretary accused Conservative candidates in the by-elections of using false and misleading information and said that all our statistical information is wrong. I challenge that statement, Mr. Speaker. I commented on this last Monday night. Canada's Prime Minister used a lot of selective statistical information in his speech on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. This was picked up by the news media and the Prime Minister has been challenged.

I have not heard the Liberal party challenging the statements made by Mr. Don McGillivray of Southam News. One of the things he had to say is as follows:

> Most of Trudeau's statistics used 1970 as the "base year" or starting point. He was elaborately casual about it, saying that any other year would do as well. But when one looks at the resulting members, it is clear that 1970 was well chosen. It is an example of "the before-and-after trick" described in Darrell Huff's 1954 classic, "How to Lie with Statistics".

One can be sure that the Liberal party would dig up a document like that to help them along. Mr. McGillivray goes on to say:

> If you compare your income this year with the one when you were out of a job and living on unemployment insurance, you have made fantastic gains. But if you compare it with the year you won the lottery, you have slipped badly.
> Nineteen seventy happened to be a recession year in Canada. It was the lowest point for housing starts, for example, in the past 10 years. Only 191,000 units were started.
> So when Trudeau claims a 25 per cent gain in housing starts he is measuring against a bad year. If you move the base year to 1971 when 233,000 houses were started, the gain shrinks to 5 per cent.

The Prime Minister should be completely and totally responsible and should not be using a bunch of tricky statistics.

This example of how this government operates is a clear indication that you cannot really trust them. This is why everybody is so suspicious. Look at the things which they allow to go on and how they allow taxpayers' money to be squandered. I have one other example to give. The New Democratic Party probably will not like this because it concerns $200,000 of the taxpayers' money. I have an article entitled "Why do the Gals Take so Long", and it reads:

The mandarins in Ottawa decided that an urgent question of great public concern, "how long do people spend in public washrooms", had to be settled. To that end they allotted in the neighbourhood of $200,000 to have this nagging question answered.

You will be heartened to know the results. By depositing themselves in the washrooms of Ottawa's National Arts Centre during intermission, recording arrival rates, duration and frequency of toilet traffic, researchers flushed out the fact that a man spends an average of 41 seconds at a urinal, while a woman spends 75 seconds using the cubicle.

● (2042)

There is a classic example. I guess I should not have raised that becaue it involves only $200,000 of the taxpayers' money and I realize it is not a large amount.

One also questions the credibility of the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). His word does not mean anything. On Wednesday, August 13, 1969, the Prime Minister, at a major press conference over national television, talked to the Canadian people about inflation and the country's financial future. He said this:

We would be on the way to financial disaster if nothing were done to bring spending under control. To spend vast sums on welfare, education, and other progams while allowing inflation to continue would merely place hundreds of thousands of Canadians on a treadmill they could not escape.

I never read more meaningless words in my life. He never meant one word of it. The Prime Minister also committed his government to a substantial cut in the federal public service. What has happened since August 13, 1969? Government spending has increased by over $34 billion, some 230 per cent. We now hear the parliamentary secretary trying to brush all this under the rug.

Here is something else that is driving Canadian taxpayers and the official opposition up the wall in connection with these phony programs. Although we are not opposed to sound foreign aid programs which will help our trade picture, some of them are very questionable. I quote from an excellent editorial in the Toronto Sun of October 8:

Our federal government has got to be crazy. Out of its maple syrup mind. Either that or criminally negligent. Or, horrors, both!

Here the damned country is falling apart, we're in the pits economically, and Trudeau's pledge a couple of months back (at the Bonn economic summit) of a 5 per cent growth rate has crumbled. Now Canada will be lucky if it hits 3 per cent growth.

Two years ago our dollar was worth nearly 5 per cent more than the American. Today it is worth 20 per cent less. And still fading. This year the feds have borrowed some $5 billion in futile, desperate attempts to shore up the slipping dollar. It is said to cost Canada $85,000 a day merely to keep a line of credit open. That's $85,000 a day with no tangible returns!

It sounds incredible, but it may not be beyond Trudeau's talents to bankrupt Canada.

And now the crazy part: In the midst of this chaos Canada has just borrowed $1.2 billion in order to lend it to Algeria! Unbelievable. Borrowing and paying interest in order to lend to Algeria! See what we mean when we suggest the government is nuts? Or wicked . . .

Watinell is the magic hold Algeria holds over the Trudeau government anyway? One of the world's more repressive regimes, it aids and protects terrorists, it actively tries to subvert neighbouring countries it doesn't like, it tramps on its own citizens, and it is nurtured with Soviet weaponry. But it speaks French . . . And Canada borrows to lend it dough—probably forgiveable loans (the feds won't tell), which cost us 10 per cent . . . Yet we pay some 10 per cent interest.

It likely costs Canada $300,000 a day in interest to loan Algeria money to buy from Canada, which will be a phony boost to our export statistics. This is called "creative accounting" and any private firm which tried it would be bankrupt or its executives jailed.

I wonder if the parliamentary secretary, who is an accountant, tells this to the firms he represents. I certainly would not want my tax form filled out by his accounting firm. The article continues:

Algeria is one of the biggest recipients of Canadian aid anyway. Now this $1.2 billion bonanza. And Algeria isn't even an ally. It is a "socialist" military dictatorship which shoots, hangs, assassinates or imprisons political opponents. It has 80 per cent illiteracy and no civil liberties. Why is Canada aiding such a regime at the expense of Canadians?

It constitutes a moral and financial outrage and those responsible should be horsewhipped. Or worse . . .

That was a classic example. The government suggests that we rubber-stamp all of these bills with billions here, borrow more there and all the rest. Many government members are critical of this side of the House and our successful candidates in the by-election. It is negative criticism which is not warranted. Well, we have a lot of company on our side.

As I mentioned last Monday night, more and more responsible people are studying and analysing how this government has mismanaged our affairs over the years. This is being documented in books such as the one I have here. This is not a series of general statements and opinions; these books contain statistical information.

The book I have here is entitled "The Canadian Economy, Its Problems and Its Potential", published under the auspices of Burns Fry Limited. The author is G. Leigh Skene. I wish to highlight a few of the points it makes:

It is now clear that the explosion in government spending during the past decade has left us with intolerable unemployment, intolerable inflation, and an intolerable burden of taxation. What makes our plight even more serious is that traditional government remedies, over the short term at least, can only exacerbate our problems. More and bigger government deficits—the common political response—would only act to unduly increase the money supply. That in turn would raise unit labour costs as well as other prices. The result then would be an increased volume of imports. Increasing the gap between imports and exports means the export of jobs—

They are being exported on a daily basis. Some figures indicate that up to $18 million a day is leaving, most of it going to the United States, because there is no faith in this government or this country.

And that means lower federal revenues, higher government spending, and more massive deficits.

It goes on to ask:

Do Government Deficits Cause Inflation?

There has been an ongoing controversy in Canada as to whether government deficits cause inflation.

They certainly do. There are a number of chapters on this. There is a chart which shows what is going on in this country. In their wrap-up, they refer to the role of the electorate in avoiding the crisis. I quote:

Perhaps most important of all, none of the reforms detailed in this chapter can come about without an electorate which chooses opportunity over handouts. As long as the voter chooses the candidate who promises more giveaways rather than the one who offers realistic solutions to our problems, there will be no lasting prosperity.

I can say without boasting that I have never stood on a platform and said: If you vote for me I will give you something for nothing. This nonsense was started by the Prime Minister in 1972 and a former minister of finance, John Turner, while parading around this country.

Can you imagine the Prime Minister trying to bribe the taxpayers with their own money, saying if you vote for me, there will be lots of goodies. We had an example of that in Winnipeg. He was going to give us a hangar. Now we have a $15 million hangar but they do not know what to do with it. Well, bribery did not work there. The parliamentary secretary is saying that we promised goodies. We did not do any such thing. I again quote:

What is lacking is will and determination. No society every received more than it earned, and this one will not be any exception to the rule. If expectations are high the level of effort must be high to achieve these expectations. If the level of effort is low, then the achievement level will be also. A continuation of the current levels of effort will bring about a very low achievement level.

In this document are a number of excellent recommendations. I will only refer to two. I quote:

Reduce the annual rate of increase in federal spending to 2 per cent to 4 per cent per annum.

Eliminate the federal budget deficit in a four to five year controlled program.

● (2052)

Of course, this is what we have been calling for for many years. We presented a motion on February 2 of this year calling for the strengthening of the committee system. We wanted the government to bring in sunset laws and, through the committee system, to examine every government department to find out exactly what they are doing and implement a program along the lines of that followed in Manitoba. But the New Democratic Party and the Liberal party are not interested at all in curtailing spending or conducting a proper examination of what is going on. The criticism we received was extraordinary.

We talked about a review of the tax system on May 23 of this year. There have been complaints from all over the country about our tax structure and we wanted to set down the proper committees to review that structure and attempt to improve our economic situation by encouraging investors to stay in Canada. Again we encountered blazing criticism from the New Democratic Party and from the Liberals. Now they come here again and say they are going to curtail spending. Those are meaningless words. They are not fooling me for one second.

Some excellent work has been done in the Senate. I should like to refer to a study which was completed earlier this year. It is called "Canada-United States Relations" and I am quoting from volume two which deals with Canada's trading relations with the United States. This is a document compiled by the Senate standing committee on foreign affairs; it should be required reading for all members of parliament and espacially for those who sit on the government benches.

I should like to refer to a few of the areas covered in this study. One of them is headed "Deterioration in the Travel Account". We know that this year there is likely to be a $2 billion tourism deficit. We hear from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) that he is holding great meetings, that he is going to cure all our tourism problems and that everyone will be coming to Canada. Those are more meaningless words.

I should like to give hon. members an example of how these matters are really handled. This is what happened in Manitoba during the summer. Northwest Air Lines, which flies from Chicago and Minneapolis to Winnipeg, was in a four-month strike. This meant that 14,000 fewer passengers were carried to northern Manitoba by Transair. A great number of Americans come up each year to fish and hunt in Manitoba but 14,000 fewer came this year; we have these statistics from Transair which picks them up in Winnipeg and takes them to the north.

While the strike was on we asked Air Canada to put on a regular flight to help us with this problem. But the corporation would do nothing about it. I telephoned the President of Air Canada and I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). Air Canada has the right to fly from Winnipeg to Minneapolis and Chicago. They have had that right for almost a year but will not exercise that franchise. Nor will they give it to anyone else. This is a government airline, Mr. Speaker. Why did they not step in to help us or at least hand the franchise over to Transair so that they could have gone down to Chicago and Minneapolis and brought these 14,000 wealthy Americans up to spend money in northern Manitoba? I would venture to say that 14,000 fewer wealthy Americans getting up to northern Canada this summer cost us untold millions, because they are big spenders. That is an example of the way in which the government and its agencies are helping out with our tourism problem. There is a chapter in this study dealing with the basic cause of this tourism deficit. It goes into great detail.

One of the highlights of the document is the suggestion that Canada is no longer an attractive country in which to invest money because of the fact that the Saskatchewan government nationalized the potash industry in Saskatchewan a number of years ago. The Senate report states:

The nationalization by the Saskatchewan government of the potash industry produced a strong negative reaction from the United States. The United States is heavily dependent upon Saskatchewan as a source for potash; almost 70 per cent of its potash needs came from Canada in 1974.

That was the start of it, Mr. Speaker. A combination of this action by the NDP government in Saskatchewan and the policies of the Liberal government here has given rise to fears among investors that Canada was no longer an attractive country in which to invest.

The Senate committee also dealt with the subject of resource taxation. A number of witnesses were called and they made some extremely interesting comments. The committee set forth its views as follows:

A major problem for the Canadian resource industries and particularly the mining industry in recent years relates to the jurisdictional disputes between the federal and provincial government over the right to tax. The mining industry tax incentives structure was substantially altered in 1971 by changes in federal tax policy which removed some of the advantages which the industry had traditionally enjoyed. The impact of this change was compounded by steps taken within a couple of years by the provinces to tax away the profit generated in the prosperous 1973-74 period which, it is now apparent, was due to cyclical factors.

We are all aware of the potential of the mining industry in Canada. We want to do everything we possibly can to encourage it. Unfortunately, the federal government and some of the provincial governments have treated this industry very badly. The result has been extremely costly for Canada. Further in this document we read:

Mr. Alfred Powis, President of Noranda, termed as "devastating" the over-all impact of the federal government's 1971 tax reform coupled with the punitive taxes and royalties of the provinces which the federal government disallowed as expenses. In terms of competitive position, he said, Canadian taxes were more than double those in parts of the United States.

These are some of the things we wanted to discuss in committee so that we could solve these problems and get Canada going. But no co-operation was forthcoming from the NDP or from the government. The company prepared for the committee, as evidence of this, tables of comparable mining operations in B.C., Ontario and in Nevada. I am happy to say that the government of Manitoba has removed some of these restrictive taxes on mining operations in northern Manitoba so we shall certainly see an improvement in Manitoba. But Manitoba cannot cure all of Canada's economic ills on its own.

The Senate also heard a tax expert, a gentleman by the name of Mr. R. D. Brown. According to the Senate study—

—Mr. Brown considered the Canadian tax structure as inefficient. After the detailed comparative study of the tax systems in Canada, United States and northern Europe for one industry, he concluded that the Canadian system imposed more burdens on its industry than the tax systems of other countries. As to its effect on competitiveness, Mr. Brown said: "Our tax system does not help and indeed hinders the aggregate level of productivity in Canada and tends to make our products have a more difficult time in world markets".

What are we doing about these things? Absolutely nothing. All we are doing is talking about a bill to enable the government to borrow more money. Isn't that a great solution to all our problems? You borrow more money, print more money, spend more money. I should have brought along some of the speeches made in days gone by by the hon. member for Crowfoot, because they would have made an excellent contribution to this debate. I looked up some of his old speeches on the devalued dollar. Some of his comments are worth repeating.

Yesterday I asked the Minister of Finance a question about the amount of investment money currently leaving the country. The volume of investment money leaving the country has now reached record proportions. I asked what steps would be taken to encourage investors to stay in Canada. In reply we were given the typical, gobbledygook answer that the minister is reducing taxes by $2 billion. He is not even making an effort to meet with these people to find out why they will not invest in Canada. He is taking a totally negative approach.

● (2102)

We have also heard detailed speeches about the socialist policies we have in this country today. This is a comment made by Mr. Rowland Frazee, President of the Royal Bank of Canada, as reported in the Free Press:

Foreign investors are not investing in Canada because they hold a dated perception that Canada is left-leaning and unreliable, says Rowland C. Frazee, President of the Royal Bank of Canada.

Frazee said it would probably take another year for outside investors to realize Canada has now implemented orthodox economic policies in a bid to shore up the dollar and hold down inflation.

Mr. Frazee feels that everything will be straightened out in another year, but we will have to wait to see about that.

With regard to the public debt which the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary secretary made light of, I would like to give a few statistics. The wild spending habits of the government have resulted in steadily mounting deficits. When the government borrows money to pay for the deficits, the public debt increases. Gross public debt has doubled since the Prime Minister took office, rising from $32.9 billion in 1968 to $67.1 billion in 1977.

I understand that the latest figures show that it is heading toward $90 billion or $98 billion. It took the present Prime Minister and this government only ten years to double the public debt. Before the Prime Minister and this government came to office it took 23 years to double the public debt. This government has increased the public debt at a rate faster than any government in Canada's peacetime history. Gross public debt increased by $7.3 billion in 1977. That increase is greater than the total public debt of 1942.

I am sure Canadian taxpayers would be interested to know that interest payments on this debt have skyrocketed. In 1968 the federal government spent $1.3 billion to pay for accumulated debts. In the coming financial year $6.5 billion will be spent, five times the amount of 1968. Federal debt costs were $62 for every Canadian in 1968. Now they are $278, four and one-half times greater. When does the end come? Every time we have another of these bills before us we hear a series of excuses that everything is in order and going great. The deeper the government gets into debt, the greater it says things are. What a philosophy!

When the federal government issues bonds, bills and securities to pay for its deficits, they are bought by either private citizens and corporations or by the Bank of Canada. Sales to the private sector place a burden on capital markets by increasing the demand for funds. Federal borrowing requirements of the current size, $8.8 billion, makes it harder for the productive sectors of our economy to borrow funds to finance job-creating investment projects. Sales to the Bank of Canada are paid for by the bank by printing money. In effect, the government owes money to itself, so hon. members can see the ridiculous situation we are in. Too much money in the economic system means inflation. I could go on and on with statistics, but I do not think I have to say any more to get the message across.

There is much comment across Canada today placing the blame on one man. The Prime Minister of Canada must bear a large share of the responsibility because he has handed everyone in his cabinet a blank cheque. Cabinet ministers can do anything they want. They can fly around in JetStars and take all their friends to Grey Cup games. As soon as the Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sports) (Mrs. Campagnolo) became a cabinet minister, she took a JetStar across the Atlantic Ocean and flew around Europe at a cost to taxpayers of about $350,000. She certainly has all the necessary qualifications to be in this Liberal cabinet, and she demonstrated that in short order.

However, we cannot place all the blame on one man. All cabinet ministers are guilty, and even backbenchers who defend this government's record are guilty. They have been leaving one by one. Some have been speaking up while others have just gone off to Bay Street to make a bundle practising law. Mr. Charles Lynch of Southam News summed it up very well as follows:

When we talk about the government being tired and listless, we are talking about the unfaithful departed, like John Turner—

I will get to him in just a minute.

—and Donald Macdonald and Ron Basford, and a host of ministers who have remained on board without pulling their weight—Allan MacEachen, Don Jamieson, Otto Lang, Alastair Gillespie and the faceless ones like Hugh Faulkner, Judd Buchanan, Bud Cullen, John Roberts and Tony Abbott.

That is a great piece of theory about this cabinet, and it is right on.

It is a measure of the government's bankruptcy that Trudeau must now contemplate strengthening his cabinet for the long winter's run to the polls, and he has no place to turn for strength. There is manifestly better cabinet material on the Tory benches than on the Grit side.

It is certain that we have no shortage of talent on this side.

A column by Dennis Braithwaite appeared this week in the Toronto Star in which it is stated:

Since my political predictions are running well ahead of the regular pundits (they are saying today what I said on Aug. 8, that Trudeau's had it), I must press on with further enlightening analyses.

Many Liberals are saying that Mr. Turner must return. Mr. Turner is just as guilty as all of them. I would like to point out that under Mr. John Turner as minister of finance federal government spending increased by 99 per cent in his short term. To put it another way, it took us 105 years to reach a federal spending level of $17.4 billion. John Turner doubled that figure in 44 months, taking the level of government spending in his brief term—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I must interrupt the hon. member because his time has expired. Unless he gets the unanimous consent of the House—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to allow the hon. member more time?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. S. Victor Railton (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I do not know which section of the Globe and Mail some of my hon. colleagues opposite read. I do not know whether they read the first section, which is purely political, or the business section.

Mr. Friesen: The obituaries.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. Railton: They may have been reading obituaries, but some of them are imaginary. They get up with their books and read many things which all of us have read and discarded. I do not really think they have been reading the second section of the Globe and Mail or any other business journals because they show that in the last year momentum has slowly been building toward an economic upturn.

• (2112)

This upturn has been engineered by the present government. The Progressive Conservatives are fighting hard to get in on the good times round the corner which have been prepared by us Liberals.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: I am quite serious when I say that. There is nothing like listening to the people in your own constituency to find out what is going on. I do not listen to members on the opposite side too often because they are ghost writers really. They have somebody telling them what to say, and then they get up and say it. Actually, I have spent the summer going around my constituency of Welland and I have found that there have never been such good times in Canada, despite the doom and gloom in the media and in the accusations coming from the opposition.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) had a few interesting observations to make. I thought he made the most thoughtful speech today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: But nothing constructive is coming from the other side. I thought that the financial critic on the other side showed everything except a knowledge of finance. All he did was to deliver a diatribe of accusations. He referred to all sorts of things that had no substance to back up his statements.

Let me get back to speaking about my own riding, which I respect and for which I have a great affection. I have done a lot of work there, and I think they appreciate it. I have visited several manufacturing firms in my riding. We have been told that manufacturing is down to 80 per cent of its capacity. That is completely untrue; they are at full capacity, most of them running two, sometimes three shifts.

We have heard talk that the government is not sufficiently subsidizing research and development. My God, what do they want? Do they want us to supply everything? Business in Canada is just waking up to the knowledge that they have to put some effort into it too. We have been pampering them. Research and development in most Canadian firms is increasing, partly because the firms are starting to realize that they must supply 1 per cent to 3 per cent of total sales in order to become competitive. This entails some hard times for two or three years, but they are facing up to the challenge.

I have found also that exports from my riding, although they are sometimes only 10 per cent, in many cases are in the range of 70 per cent of industrial manufacturing. Millions of dollars from these firms are going into expansion. The money is going into building and machinery. They have more faith in Canada than the other side of the House. I cannot understand the prophets over there talking about Canada going to the devil when our Canadian manufacturers are saying that things have been definitely on the upswing for the last six or 12 months and are getting better all the time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Railton: What is more, they have competitive ability. Our firms are selling products in the United States which they could not begin to sell two or three years ago. Why is it? Is it because of this weak, sick, Canadian dollar? Ha, just think of that! What is the matter with you men over there? Do you not realize that this is what is giving us much of our competitive edge and this is what the manufacturers want? Just because people cannot go on trips to Europe or to the United States and buy everything cheaply over there like they can at home—most of it is not important to their standard of living or way of life—do you think that people do not realize that Canadian prosperity hinges on our exports?

Now that the Canadian dollar is down, our companies will continue to be prosperous. What is more, those firms tell me they do not want to see the dollar get any closer than 10 cents or 12 cents to the U.S. dollar. I wish I had not bought American currency a couple of days ago. A lot of ridiculous nonsense has been said about the dollar. It is about time we realized the exchange rate is in our favour and that we are benefiting from it. Let us hope it does not go up closer to the American dollar than 90 cents.

When I think of the different companies in my riding I am reminded of the textile industries which have had so much trouble because of the third world, and we have to expect it. Yet Canada with her negotiations in GATT has done a great deal for these textile industries. Mr. Fyfe through my efforts was able to meet with the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) last spring. I think now that they feel they can make things go, it is possible they will get about 50 per cent or 60 per cent of the domestic market in Canada, which is what they must have if they are to survive. Also, there is John Deere in the Welland area. It is a U.S. firm, but it is unique in the fact that it makes millions of dollars worth of sales every year. There is no other company that does exactly that type of manufacturing in the U.S., so they can compete and export to the United States. In fact, they have sent 70 per cent of their manufactured goods to the United States, which will certainly improve our export trade balance. Every year they spend 3 per cent on research and development. They are really a great asset to Canada. In the next year or two that company will spend between $5 million and $15 million on expansion.

Another company is Union Carbide which is going to spend $5 million to $20 million next year on expansion. It exports 5 per cent to 6 per cent of its products, although it covers the Canadian market to a large degree.

Then we have Stelco, which was a big company before the pipeline business started. They built a nine-acre plant two years ago in readiness for the pipeline, but they have not got it going yet. However, not to worry; Stelco is doing all right even selling material in the U.S., Mexico and other places. Their competitive ability is excellent. So let hon. members not talk to me about a country which is going down the drain. Stelco is ready to put out a mile of pipe a day when they get the orders.

Then we have Atlas Steel, one of the great steel companies in Welland. They wrote me a letter the other day thanking the government for all it had tried to do in the GATT negotiations and in the anti-dumping tribunals. That company feels it has been fairly treated, even though it did not get all it wanted. At least Atlas indicated that it hoped we would continue to make sure dumping did not occur. I know the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce is doing his best to prevent it.

We have received a lot of criticism from the other side concerning the takeover of Canadian companies by American companies. I should like to refer to the Mansfield-Denman Company in Welland which was dying by inches because its parent company in the United States did not have enough capital to enlarge, refurbish its machinery and modernize. That was the case until the Foreign Investment Review Agency took on the problem and recognized that the applicant, General Tire, had the ability and financial capacity to enlarge that plant's output for export in Welland, as well as its tire plant in Barrie, Ontario. The Welland plant exports a great deal. In fact, it manufactures canister components for gas masks for the Canadian, American and German defence forces. That firm is prospering.

The Hayes-Dana Company is situated in an area of Ontario which is shared by the hon. member for St. Catharines (Mr. Parent), the hon. member for Niagara Falls (Mr. Young), the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Andres) and myself. Until recently that firm employed 800 people; now it has increased its staff by another 800 people. Basically it is situated in the St. Catharines area, and Welland is the bedroom component of that industry. As well it has increased its staff by a few hundred in the new plant in Barrie.

Can one say that I have told a sad story about Canadian industry? There are small firms in Welland, many forge plants which supply the bigger plants. Recently I received a telephone call from the manager of General Forge. His firm has been successful in getting capital in order to enlarge by $2 million to build some additional plant and refurbish the existing plant because it is exporting a great deal now.

It is time for optimism in the House. I spoke tonight because I have heard so much pessimism and ridiculous accusations against the government. One would think the country is going down the drain. Canada has never had it so good. Sometimes I require loans just like everyone else, so I have had occasion to speak with bankers. It provides me with an opportunity to hear their ideas. All the bankers have told me, as well as merchants on the street, that things have never been so good.

Perhaps there is a lot of talk about unemployment, but at least we look after our unemployed. There is no other country in the world which has been as good to its unemployed as Canada. Just because a few loose hitches are being tightened here and there, there is no reason to cry. The majority of unemployed Canadians are able to go to stores, fill their baskets, and look after the nutrition of their families just as well as anyone who is somewhat luckier and has a job. This is due to the government's good vision, commonsense, foresight and the fulfilling of its responsibilities.

This morning I had occasion to speak to someone over coffee who told me the story about that big development in St. John's, Newfoundland. Newfoundland has been known for its high unemployment, as much as 30 per cent in some places. Perhaps the people of that province do not have good times similar to the residents of the booming provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia, but the people of Newfoundland are not complaining very much. Recently a $700,000 food market was opened. That business is booming in an area where perhaps 20 per cent are unemployed. People are buying a great deal of food and are quite happy. In fact, the man in charge of the project said that he went to St. John's because he could make more money there than anywhere else because of lower costs. Also he said that there is a scarcity of money, even though some of the people are unemployed, because they are being paid by the government. There would be something to criticize the government about if it did not have a generous unemployment insurance program. The government should not be criticized for spending $4 billion on the unemployed. It should be criticized if the unemployed are not being looked after.

Many speakers today referred to provincial opinions. Just as the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) said in his speech last Thursday, who stands up for Canada? Not very many people stand up for Canada now, just the Liberal government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Railton: One should not kid oneself. The opposition has worked hard to divide the government and make it fall for the apparent good of the provinces and the local parochial people.

An hon. Member: Where is your violin?

Mr. Railton: That sounds good, but the Liberal government stands up for the country. If local parochialism becomes too strong, who will suffer? Of course nobody but Canada will suffer. There will be no chance for a strong central government. One must not think the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) will provide us with a strong central government. That is quite impossible, based on what I have seen in the last year. I want to see a fair show for the government. I rose to defend the government by indicating that I do not believe a word the opposition has said.

In conclusion, I should like to point out that the government has done more for Canada in the last ten years than any other government could have done. In the next two or three years there will be more jobs in Canada than people to fill them.

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who preceded me referred to opposition parties spelling doom and gloom, and to the result of their talking about the devalued dollar and the fall of the government. I should like to refer to a few comments made by a former minister of finance, the Hon. Mitchell Sharp, back in May of 1962. He said that the Canadian dollar, once the strongest currency in the world, was in danger of becoming known as the Diefendollar in which, like the Diefenbaker government, there was less and less public confidence. He said that when the government lost control of the exchange, was forced to abandon its policies and devalue the currency, the country would be in serious peril. The dollar was at 92.5 cents at that time. What would it be like now that the dollar is worth 82.5 cents? Also he indicated that it was one thing to reduce the value of the Canadian dollar deliberately in order to assist our trading position, but it was quite another thing when the Canadian dollar is forced down because the world has lost confidence in our economy and financial policies.

Bill C-7 was given first reading in the House approximately two days ago. It seeks a $7 billion supplementary borrowing authority for the rest of the current fiscal year, and a further $10 billion borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1980. I could not even consider giving my consent to the borrowing of some $17 billion until I know just how the money is to be spent.

For quite some time now I have wanted to express some of my concerns and feelings about why this government is in the position that it now has to borrow more money and become involved in a hodgepodge of cutbacks. The major economic statement we heard from the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) on August 1 really boils down to what I can only call a hodgepodge of cutbacks involving some $2 billion in spending and the elimination of 5,000 jobs in the public sector. It also involves the freezing of new public service hirings.

This government's attempt at restraint is certainly welcome. However, this announcement, impromptu as it was, resulted in ministers of the Crown scurrying back to Ottawa to determine just where the cuts should be made. This is no surprise to me in view of the mismanagement we have seen in respect of government spending over the past ten years. I am not surprised that there have to be cutbacks because this government's spending has been out of control, particularly for the last five years.

Let me devote my remarks to one area of the Churchill constituency which I am proud to represent. If the Liberals are really serious about restraint, why does the government not sell the empty government houses in Churchill, Manitoba, or at least make every effort to prevent a further white elephant such as the Otineka Mall and Churchill complex? I will deal specifically with this as I get further into my remarks.

What happened in the town of Churchill on the Hudson Bay coast in Manitoba is a prime example of what this government has been doing. For over three centuries Churchill has been a base for explorers, scientists and travellers. It is also one of the main grain handling ports in Canada. In the last century this community has become the subject of government whim.

Let me go back to 1969 when an agreement was reached between the NDP government of Manitoba and the federal Liberal government of Canada to embark on a 13-point plan for the redevelopment of the townsite of Churchill. At that time there were some 4,000 people living in the community of Churchill. I have never been able to pin down who the architect of this redevelopment plan was. I have tried unsuccessfully by inquiring of the Department of Public Works and of various other offices.

At the time government officials felt that a viable tax base existed in Churchill to support an estimated $32 million redevelopment plan. From 1969 to 1976 the redevelopment plan was carried out. Just two years ago a multimillion dollar recreational complex was opened in Churchill. The complex cost $13 million, $8 million of which was put up by the federal government and $5 million by the NDP government of Manitoba. It was based on a population of 4,000 at that time. Someone in government did not realize that the population of Churchill in 1976 had decreased to some 1,700 or 1,800.

Under the roof of this huge, monstrous complex there exists a paramedical and dental care facility, an arena, a gymnasium, a four-sheet curling rink with artificial ice, bowling alleys, a swimming pool, theatres, a skating rink with artificial ice, and, lo and behold, in the rotunda of this complex in the frozen tundra of Churchill we have $100,000 worth of tropical plants, along with benches and all the facilities of a park. You can walk around inside this area. As I say, at the time of completion we had exactly 1,700 people living in the community.

In addition to these facilities this huge complex housed a high school designed to facilitate the education of 300 students. In 1977 there were 100 students attending that high school, at a cost of $180,000 per year. That is what it cost to educate those 100 students. Today there are 55 high school students attending school in that complex, and it still costs something in the neighbourhood of $150,000 or $160,000 to educate those students. This complex is like an albatross or a yoke around the necks of the people who live in the Churchill community.

The population in Churchill today is 1,400. That is an example of how this federal government has done its planning, how it squanders the taxpayers' money. The government pays no attention whatever to what is going on in northern Manitoba. This is only one example of how this government squanders the taxpayers' money, in this case to the extent of $8 million in federal funds. The people of Churchill would have been happy with a $1 million building designed in such a way that it could be utilized by the local population. Today you could fire a cannon in that place and never hit anyone. This complex is so huge it costs $1,200,000 a year just to maintain it and there are only 1,400 in the community.

When the complex was started, or shortly thereafter, this government began to reduce the armed services in Churchill. Churchill was a winter training area. Then the government pulled the National Research Council out of Churchill and moved it to Gimli, Manitoba. I asked why and was told that it was too costly to continue operations in Churchill. This was after they commenced building this $13 million recreation complex. The government has now said to the people that this complex is its gift to the people of Churchill: "There it is, now you look after it".

In addition to pulling out the armed services and the National Research Council, the government pulled the CBC employees out of the community. This amounted to a loss of 16 jobs in that community. I could never figure out why the CBC needed 16 people to run a radio station in Churchill where there was a population of 1,400 people, but I suppose that is a pretty good ratio in order to give good radio programming. This has left the community with a recreation complex it cannot afford. The new Conservative government of Manitoba has given a grant to continue maintaining the complex for at least this year. I do not know what will happen after this year. I have in front of me a newspaper clipping with a heading "A Dream Dies at Churchill, Can't Explain Where People Went, say Planners of Facelift". The article reads in part:

● (2142)

"You can go up to the centre and fire a cannon and you wouldn't hit anybody," laments Jack O'Connor, vice president of the local chamber of commerce.

The desolate Hudson Bay outpost is stirring with a California-style tax revolt. In order to maintain the centre, local taxes have gone up 24 per cent in the last year.

Later, the article goes on:

Troubleshooters in the federal-provincial relations section of the Privy Council office in Ottawa have been asked to find a solution—and the solution could mean an infusion of more tax money.

The government came up with a proposal to put money in there but they have not bothered with it since. The cost of this redevelopment of Churchill has skyrocketed. It was estimated at $32 million but cost closer to $50 million.

There was also redevelopment of housing in Churchill. The federal government owns 80 per cent of these homes and it rebuilt them. I do not know where the government finds the architects for this work when it is required in remote areas of Manitoba and the Northwest Territories. They must be good Liberal supporters. The buildings are so overdesigned that it takes three or four times longer than usual to construct them.

I have the example of someone, a painter, who went to Churchill to do some contract work in one of the 20-unit apartment buildings. His experience shows that money is of no concern to the government. Indeed, if the government had any commonsense at all the $2 billion restraint program might not have been necessary. Government waste alone could probably account for $2 billion without the other cutbacks and lay-offs of public servants. This painter who went to Churchill on a contract says that a simple two-day job lasted six days because the paint was either the wrong kind, the wrong colour or was not even available. Much of it had to be mixed in order to match the architect's specifications. Colours selected were difficult to apply—yellow numbers on dark orange doors required four coats to cover instead of two if dark numbers on a light background had been chosen. Twelve stripes on one wall required twelve different colours and consequently 12 quarts of paint, yet only half a quart was used in total.

There were architects' specification sheets, a fully detailed print, in scale, for every two apartment doors, indicating the actual number and its location on the door with angles and measurements in fractions of an inch—a total of 12 sheets. These are architects' blueprints of 3½ feet by 3½ feet. This is what I call government waste.

This particular apartment has 20 suites and has taken almost three years to build. Initially the cost was estimated at $250,000 and ended at perhaps $750,000. This was a government cost-sharing project with the government of Manitoba and there was no concern about controlling the expenditures. Contractors and architects were allowed to spend money like water because it was taxpayers' money.

Although almost ready for occupancy, the doors were binding because the building had already moved; the roof was leaking; exterior paint was peeling because primer had not been used properly; walls were painted after carpet was installed leaving marks on the carpet and some walls were painted seven times because painting quality was rejected.

Other apartments and houses had similar problems. Cedar siding was imported thousands of miles and the protective coating that was applied was simply eaten away by the salt water air. Why not use local rocks or stones instead that would stand up against salt water air instead of shipping in cedar siding?

The government's move to restraint will mean nothing until their actual plans are monitored. If they are unable to do so themselves then it is time they considered the value of local input. While the government mouths restraint, as many as 40 government housing units stand empty in Churchill. There is a waiting list for rental accommodation there from residents who do not have proper accommodation.

I want to explain about this government housing, Mr. Speaker. I have in front of me a file entitled "Pool Housing". I know the hon. member for the Northwest Territories (Mr. Firth) has encountered exactly the same situation in his area. A 1956 Treasury Board Order No. 1301 specifies that "local hires"—meaning someone hired from the community—are not entitled to government housing. A resident of Churchill could not live in a government house if he was hired locally. If the Department of Public Works, the National Research Council or the Department of Tranport went to any other community in the country, they could hire someone there, take them to Churchill and supply them with government housing if it was available.

This redevelopment program which cost $50 million must have supplied 80 to 90 units in Churchill. When I asked what those units were for, the answer I got from Treasury Board was that the Department of Transport pays for a certain number of units on an annual basis, so does the CBC, the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, the National Research Council and three or four other departments. Ironically, even though the accommodation was being paid for, no one was living in it.

When I started inquiring into this in 1976, I got nowhere. I was told that all units were full. I contacted the CBC, DOT and NRC, and they claimed to be using these facilities. People in Churchill have told me, however, that 40 or 50 of these units are empty all the time. Taxpayers pay to heat these units and to maintain them—all for nothing. They are empty. There is not a soul living in them, yet there are people living in Churchill without a roof over their head.

Now, lo and behold, after many letters to the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras), we were successful in having local hires in Churchill get government housing. That means if someone can qualify for a job in Churchill they can now qualify for government housing. This is ironic, Mr. Speaker, because since 1956 a local hire could not get a government house. This success was accomplished only by a lot of hard work, because the first letter I received from the Treasury Board said: "Here are the regulations, we must abide by them. We cannot make any changes because this is all set out by the President of the Treasury Board." My last letter was written in August. The letter I received in reply from the President of the Treasury Board says that: "The timing of your letter is most opportune. As an officer of the Treasury Board Secretariat I am presently reviewing the continuous issue of local hires. I have requested that your further concerns that federally-owned apartments are standing vacant in Churchill while public servants in the community face a general accommodation shortage be incorporated in that study."

He goes on to say that there is a study under way and local hires will have accommodation, and they are going to sell the houses they do not need now. These houses have been surplus for the last five years. No one has lived in them. But now, all of a sudden they will be sold. I tell hon. members it is evident there is an election just around the corner because some of the letters that members write to the President of the Treasury Board are now being answered. I thought I should touch briefly on the housing situation in Churchill.

As I have said before, here is a community with the best grain handling facilities in Canada which are being underutilized because this government, with their cat and mouse games, will not increase shipping through Churchill. The Hall commission report says the port of Churchill can handle 55 million bushels of grain with little or no extra expense. This government is still pussyfooting around. It is not even bothering to put that amount of grain through Churchill.

The cat and mouse game that they have been playing with Churchill leads me into my next remarks. After the Hall commission report was released, our flying minister—"Twin-Otto Lang" I call him—has to commission a report from Bryden Development Consultants Western Limited of Winnipeg. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, who Bryden is? He used to work for the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang). I believe he was a secretary or something for the minister.

An hon. Member: A bag man.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Yes, a bag man. So another report is commissioned for Churchill because the minister did not believe the Hall report, or did not want to believe it. The Saskatoon Star Phoenix reported on March 11, 1978, that the federal grains group was aware of the firm's view that the development of the Hudson Bay port was uneconomical when it commissioned the study. The study referred to is the Bryden report. They just spelled gloom and doom for Churchill. Talk about the Conservatives spelling gloom and doom! Mr. Speaker, I think I am a very positive person, but it is impossible trying to be positive with a government that is so inept. I have to be a little bit negative. They will not be around here in another seven months or so, but we do not need to dwell on that.

The Hall commission report dealt with the shipment of some 55 million bushels of grain through the port, as I mentioned before. The port of Churchill this year was strikebound for 13 days. This meant that ships that were originally destined for Churchill were diverted to Montreal, to Halifax, and some to Thunder Bay. It meant that some 7 million to 9 million bushels of grain which was supposed to be shipped out of Churchill took the route through Thunder Bay. What has this done to the port of Churchill? It has placed the port of Churchill in a cash loss position. That port must have shipment of at least 25 million bushels of grain per annum in order to break even. This year only 23 million bushels have gone through that port.

We understand the government is in a bind and because of that they do not have the grain moving in Canada. I do not know if they will ever get it moving, but they have scheduled the m.v. Arctic, which is a Canadian class II ice-breaker, to go to Churchill on November 15 to pick up a cargo of grain, and for that I compliment the government. This is the latest date that any ship has gone into Churchill because the season there closes on October 23. Incidentally the river at Churchill is now frozen and full of slob ice at this particular time.

However, in view of the fact that the lakehead is now affected by a strike, resulting in no grain movement through there, I asked the government if it would consider directing the Wheat Board, if it wants to have grain moving, to have at least four or five other ships go in with the m.v. Arctic to Churchill and move out another 4 million or 5 million bushels of grain. As well I requested that at least 4 million bushels of grain which has already been sold for next year's shipments be stored. It could be stored at Churchill. The port of Churchill has the most ideal storage conditions anywhere in Canada. It is like a permanent deep freeze in the wintertime. Humidity is not a problem.

May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

TRANSPORT—GRAIN SHIPMENTS THROUGH CHURCHILL, MANITOBA

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, under Standing Order 43 and also during question period a few days ago I raised the problem of the chaotic state of Canada's grain transport system, which has caused a backlog of 4 million metric tons of grain worth $450 million still to be shipped if Canada is to meet its 1978 commitments.

• (2202)

Prairie grain elevators are close to overflowing. Their grain stocks are up 35 per cent from a year ago. At the same time, grain stocks at the major export terminals are down 33 per cent from last year. The problem is not that farmers have suddenly dumped their grain at the country elevator in the last few weeks as deliveries to primary elevators are also lagging behind 1977 figures. The tie-up is in rail movement of grain to export positions.

The government spent $800,000 in upgrading the port of Churchill this past summer. Rail trackage has increased and the Herchmer subdivision siding is now in service providing a passing track and lessening turnaround time for the grain cars. Moreover, Churchill has storage capacity for 4 million bushels of grain and the natural advantages of constant freezing temperatures and low humidity. Regardless of these advantages and improvements, the federal government refuses to increase grain shipments through Churchill and fully utilize the Manitoba port.

A wildcat strike by CNR yardmen and brakemen at Thunder Bay blocked grain traffic to the terminals in late September. Now, a strike by licensed seamen on the Great Lakes has left ships harboured and loaded grain cars idle. Shipowners are saying it will be too costly to reactivate ships with less than eight weeks left in the shipping season.

The government has a commitment to their overseas markets that it is failing to meet. In view of the natural advantages of the port of Churchill and the present situation in Thunder Bay, will the government redirect grain cars now standing idle at Thunder Bay to Churchill? Ships could be diverted from the St. Lawrence Seaway to follow the new Canadian icebreaker m.v. Arctic. During the 13-day strike by grainhandlers at the port of Churchill this past summer, ships were diverted to the eastern seaports. Why will the government not follow the same policy now in order to put that port on a cash saving basis?

The Hudson Bay port is down 7 million to 9 million bushels in grain shipments this year over last year and is in a cash-loss position. Does the minister responsible for the Wheat Board not have the foresight and initiative to move the loaded grain cars now filling the rail yard at Thunder Bay? Why not utilize the 4 million bushel storage facilities at Churchill? The Wheat Board has confirmed grain shipments through the port for next year and could store grain here ready for shipment in the spring. This would remove the port from a cash-loss position and ensure its continued operation. This is very important because, if it is in a cash-loss position, the loss must be borne by the federal government. Therefore, why not ship more grain through this port and put it in a cash saving position?

The government gives with one hand and takes with the other. After upgrading facilities, and now, assigning the m.v. Arctic to chart Hudson Bay waters as late as November 15, which will be an historic voyage, in an effort to extend the season, the government refuses to increase our throughput or use existing storage facilities.

The Hall Commission on grain handling and transportation recommended development of the port of Churchill and an increase in grain shipments to 55 million bushels. Not satisfied with the report's conclusions, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) commissioned a second study, the Bryden report, which views further development as uneconomical.

This government jumps from one side of the fence to the other, never landing long enough on one side to leave even the faintest of footprints. When will the present Liberal government take a stand and commit itself to the development of this western port? There are only a few months left.

[Translation]

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we are happy to see that the hon. member realizes the efforts the government has made to allow the port of Churchill to reach full development. I would like to point out that for 1978 alone we spent more than $5,575,000 on equipment for that port.

The Canadian Wheat Board also showed its willingness to use the port of Churchill as much as possible. Record volumes of grain were moved through that part in recent years and it is conceivable that a new record would have been set this year had it not been for last summer's unfortunate strike.

The government is pleased with the efforts that have been made to make better use of that port but we would not want, and we would think it would be inappropriate, to interfere in the operation of the Canadian Wheat Board by giving it, for example, instruction on its storage policy. Its job is to analyze the market and direct grains so as to maximize producers' profits. It does so by considering all relevant factors, including the availability of land and water means of transport at any given time. It is empowered to do so, and we do not think we should be taking its place in this area. The board is quite aware of the advantages of using the port of Churchill. We have full confidence in its judgment as far as making maximum use of that port. The fact is that the board stored 3.8 million bushels of grain in that port last winter.

[Mr. Smith (Churchill).]

If that is to its advantage the board may decide again to store grain there next winter. On the other hand, it may decide on a better use to be made of the railway rolling stock and direct the grain toward other ports where ships are also available. It is up to it to decide, and I repeat that it would be inappropriate to interfere in its affairs. Indeed, the hon. member would be the first one to complain if the minister were to give instructions to the board on a daily basis. I believe for that matter that western producers have faith in the board's judgment and they would prefer not to have us interfere in its every day business.

AIR TRANSPORT—HIRING OF CONSULTANTS OUTSIDE CANADA—POSSIBILITY OF CHARGES BEING LAID

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I rise tonight to follow up a question I asked in the House on October 16. I put my first question to the Minister of Justice (Mr. Lang) and then addressed the supplementary to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Danson). The subject was moneys which has been paid by Boeing to consultants in Canada as part of a practice commonly known as fraud or graft.

I considered the answers given to me to be unsatisfactory. The Minister of National Defence said a year and a half ago that if there was any evidence of impropriety he would cause an investigation to be launched. My supplementary question was as follows:

Certainly there is evidence of impropriety at the present time, which impropriety has been known for over two months since the Boeing revelations. What have the results of the investigation been? Who is in charge of it?

The minister replied:

At the time the issue was looked into and we could not find any evidence, record or indication of any impropriety involving Canadians or from Boeing itself.

I do not know where the minister has been spending his time if he sees no evidence of impropriety. The Citizen in August carried this headline: "Boeing pay-off scheme cites Canadian sales". Southam News Services said: "Canadian jet sales part of dual contract pay-offs". Further headlines said: "Boeing files on consultants"; "Selling aircraft under the table". The Vancouver Sun has the same story. There is the comment in the Victoria Daily Colonist, "Who got what from Boeing?"

Then the other day, following my question in the House the Canadian Press reported:

Defence Minister Danson says the government has uncovered no evidence of wrongdoing by Canadians in Boeing aircraft sales.

The reference was not just to the department. It was to the Canadian government generally.

I should like to quote from the original source of these revelations, form 8K which was filed in response to the civil injunction against Boeing by the securities and exchange commission in the United States. When this injunction came before the court, Boeing and the securities and exchange commission made a deal that Boeing would report on the events leading up to the injunction. This report was duly filed with the SEC on July 28. I should like to read parts of it to show what kind of injunction it is and what we may expect has happened in Canada:

The Securities and Exchange Commission filed a complaint against the company today alleging inadequate disclosure in proxy materials and reports filed by the company with the SEC—

The board of directors has determined that it would be in the best interests of the company—

That is Boeing.

—and its stockholders to avoid the expense and disruption of company business that would be involved in protracted litigation by settling rather than contesting the allegations. The company has accordingly consented without admitting or denying the allegations of the complaint to the entry of a Final Judgment and Order of Permanent Injunction simultaneously with the filing of the complaint—

● (2212)

In connection with this settlement, the company undertook to provide in this report the information contained herein—

One of the main parts of it says the following:

For a number of years in certain foreign countries, the company has retained consultants to assist it in selling its products and to assist its customers in arranging financing for the purchase of products manufactured by the company . . . In some instances, where consultant fees were set as a percentage of the sales price and the dollar volume of sales made was substantial, the fees paid were substantial—

As a part of the settlement, the SEC has required the company to describe herein the following transactions.

It then describes in detail some rather unsavoury transactions with Middle East countries, and page 11 of the report says:

The company executed two consulting agreements in connection with aircraft sales in a number of countries including Argentina, Canada, Greece, India, the Sudan, and Venezuela. In some cases the two agreements were with the same consultant; in other cases the agreements were with individuals or companies believed to have some business relationship. In all cases the two agreements were executed at the request of the consultants.

There was one legal, above-the-board agreement, and one under the table.

In one instance the company had a commission agreement in effect with a corporate sales representative for several years. The company was orally advised that the airline would purchase the company's aircraft but that the company should not have a commission sales representative.

It then goes on to explain how they swore to the company that they had no sales representative and then paid him anyway. It goes on and on like that.

In another instance the company had a commission agreement with and paid a commission to an individual consultant and another individual who was engaged by and assisted the consultant. Neither individual was an employee of either the foreign airline or its government. The company was requested by the government to certify that no commissions had been paid or would be paid to any persons involved in the purchase or financing of the aircraft and the company provided a letter to that effect to the government.

Hon. members may recall that a similar letter was received from Lockheed concerning the LRPA, and one wonders if the results were the same as in this example.

I would like to ask how it could be that the Minister of National Defence has seen no evidence of impropriety. India, which is one of the five countries listed, has found evidence of impropriety, and legal action has been taken against local Boeing agents. Despite the fact that Boeing has been allowed by the SEC to keep the names of its agents and their airline and government contracts secret, the United States department of justice is co-operating with foreign governments in tracing the flow of Boeing money.

The Indian government has stated that its investigation of the Indian airlines' 737 order has been based on information provided by the U.S. department of justice. Implicated in the investigations are the Pillman Aircraft Company and three members of the Maneckji family, prominent under Mrs. Ghandi's administration. If India can get that information from the U.S. department of justice, why can Canada not get it? After all, our country signed an individual agreement with the United States which the then minister of justice swore in this House was to enable us to track down culprits in this very case. It applied only to the Boeing case. I and the people of Canada want to know why the Canadian government is dragging its feet on this and what the cover-up is all about. If India can get those names, why can Canada not get them?

Mr. Claude-André Lachance (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has used the word "cover-up". That seems to be a word hon. members opposite like to use, but I will try to give the facts in this matter and perhaps the hon. member will be satisfied with the answer.

[Translation]

As you probably know, Mr. Speaker, it is not unusual for companies to use agents to promote their interests. This is a common business practice and there is nothing basically wrong about it. On the other hand, it is not basically illegal for such an agent, even if he is a Canadian as in the present case, to receive his commission or his fees outside Canada, for instance in a foreign bank account, to the extent that this agent does not do so in an attempt to evade taxes, and of course, in this case, it is the Department of Revenue which would be responsible for protecting the interests of Canada or for ensuring that the fees received by this agent are not used illegally, especially by diverting the money received from the seller to an agent of the purchaser.

Following the allegations reported in March 1977 by several Canadian media, the Canadian government examined this whole matter very thoroughly. On March 15, 1977, as the hon. member said earlier, the attorneys general of Canada and the United Stated reached an agreement to allow Canadian and American police forces to co-operate closely in an examination of this matter and in making a detailed investigation to check whether there had been illegal use of the sums in question and whether there had really been illegal payments. Following this agreement, the Royal Canadian Mounted Police carried out a thorough investigation to determine whether one or more Boeing agents had used the sums received by this company for prohibited purposes. I may say to hon. members that the RCMP carried out this investigation most conscientiously and that it seems to be just about ready to report its conclusions.

I must point out to the hon. member that it would be preferable to wait for the investigation to be completed and for the results to be referred to the Attorney General of Canada so that he can determine whether or not these funds have been used illegally and exonerate the people involved if there is no appearance of illegality, or, of course, if there are indications of illegal use, lay charges against those who have committee irregular actions. I therefore suggest to the hon. member that if he can be patient, he will soon be satisfied one way or another.

FISHERIES—PROPOSED TRANSFER OF WEATHER FORECASTING SERVICES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, last Thursday I put the following question to the environment minister.

In light of the recent announcement by the Department of the Environment that there will be a cut in weather forecasting services in Newfoundland and Labrador, a decision which will seriously endanger the lives and safety of thousands of fishermen who operate off the Newfoundland coast, and in view of the minister's announcement that weather forecasting services in Newfoundland and Labrador will be transferred to Halifax, can the minister assure this House unequivocally that the weather forecasting services will not be transferred to Halifax, and can he further assure the House that there will be no cut in weather forecasting services off the Newfoundland coast?

Since the minister was not in the House, I did not receive an answer. I think that certain actions by the Department of the Environment need to be explained to the people of Newfoundland, and indeed to all the people living in Atlantic Canada. These actions include the reduction of weather forecasting from four times a day to twice a day.

The minister may not realize it, but there are 20,000 licensed fishermen in Newfoundland whose safety and livelihood depend on the accuracy and frequency of marine weather forecasts. Furthermore, search and rescue services for Newfoundland and Labrador based at Gander have publicly admitted their service would be hampered by the change. This, of course, also jeopardizes the safety of fishermen and others who ply those seas. The minister should rescind these cutbacks immediately.

Second, the Department of the Environment has announced a cutback in the ice reconnaissance program to the tune of $1.8 million. Again, surely you must recognize the importance and necessity of ice movement information for fishing and shipping in the early spring. This downgrading of the service can only be detrimental to the safety of all those who sail the seas off the Newfoundland coast. There is no alternative for the ministry but to withdraw these cutback announcements.

Also, the officials of the department announced the shifting of weather forecasting services from Gander to Halifax. It is a callous and ill-advised decision as it will disrupt lives and impair the safety of those who depend on frequent and accurate weather forecasts. Moreover, there is ample evidence that these moves will not result in the kinds of savings which our bureaucrats envisage. I call on the minister now to withdraw that decision.

[Mr. Lachance.]

Another cutback which although not directly connected to the Department of the Environment has serious implications for Environment Canada is the laying off of all employees at the Bonavista Ministry of Transport communications office. Approximately six Department of Transport employees with 25½ years of service received their lay-off notices last week, which notices are to be effective on February 24, 1979. These men supplied hourly weather reporting services on a 24-hour basis, seven days a week. The information was supplied to the Gander weather office for the compiling of marine weather forecasts.

● (2222)

It is true that they are declared redundant because computers can do their jobs as defined by the Department of Transport. But one must remember they provide direct contact with weather forecasters on an hourly basis. Also one must remember that the unemployment rate in that province is the highest of any part of the country. The Department of Transport indicated that it was a problem for the Department of Fisheries and the Environment, and that their jobs with the Department of Transport are finished. It is the minister's responsibility to ensure that this very valuable weather information is not lost to those who depend on knowing these conditions for their safety and livelihood.

Also I should like to refer to the fact that a weather office in Corner Brook was promised approximately one and a half years ago. Can the minister inform the House as to the status of that project? Also the environment centre which is presently under construction in St. John's was cut by $2.2 million. I hope the minister can tell us whether the project is still on schedule, and if it is, when it is to be completed.

I understand from the rumour mill and hearsay that on the evening of October 11, which was the eve of the by-election in Newfoundland, the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Jamieson) made an announcement in that province indicating that all of these decisions had been rescinded. He indicated that the weather reporting would continue and that the office would not be moved from Gander to Halifax. Perhaps that decision may have been tinged by the fact that the by-election in that province was approximately five days away. At the present time the people most concerned with these problems have not received any official word from the Department of Fisheries and the Environment. The Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) should rise and tell us of the decision. He does not seem to know what is going on in his department.

As the Secretary of State for External Affairs was making his announcement in Newfoundland, the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment was travelling around western Canada in an attempt to keep Liberal Saskatchewan on the map. It is his responsibility to let us know what is the disposition of these particular matters.

Mr. Jack Pearsall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to see the hon. member for Nickel Belt (Mr. Rodriguez) here this evening. I waited last Thursday night until 10.30 p.m., but he failed to show. I did not know whether he intended to raise his question tonight. However, he made a number of statements, and I should like to point out that his conclusions concerning statements made by people other than the Minister of Fisheries and the Environment (Mr. LeBlanc) do not pertain to this issue.

Although the Department of Fisheries and the Environment is faced with major and serious budget reductions, the minister would like to assure the House, in order to maintain the highest possible level of weather services for Newfoundland and Labrador, that he has decided weather forecasting services will not be transferred to Halifax but will continue to be provided, as in the past, from the Gander weather office. Despite what the hon. member said, the minister has instructed the atmospheric environment service to ensure that the quality of weather services in Newfoundland and Labrador is maintained at current levels. Specifically he directed that there be no cutback in the number of daily weather forecasts for the province and adjacent waters.

The hon. member should give proper notice to the minister on the other matters which he raised. I am sure the minister would be prepared to answer them.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. A motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tommorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.27 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

THE MONARCHY

ALLEGED LACK OF SUPPORT BY GOVERNMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Hon. George Hees (Prince Edward-Hastings): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to move a motion of urgent and pressing necessity. As the overwhelming majority of Canadians strongly support the present role of the monarchy in this country, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Victoria-Haliburton (Mr. Scott):

That the government cease its present efforts to downgrade the role of the monarchy in Canada and, instead, give strong support to the Queen and the royal family as they carry out their duties with such dignity and effectiveness.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion would require unanimous consent. I have some concern about whether an urgent and pressing necessity was explained by the mover in a particular way. However, when in doubt in circumstances of this sort, since a motion could only be presented with the unanimous consent of the House, I generally resolve the matter by putting the question, where any doubt rests in my mind.

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I think this is an appropriate occasion to express my resentment at the fact that there is included—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am not able to hear the point being made by the President of Privy Council (Mr. MacEachen).

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I put the problem before Your Honour that there is contained within the motion put forward by the hon. member a series of false statements. When false allegations are made, when is it possible for us to answer them under this procedure?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Such an arrogant breach of the rules!

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. We have not used the time at this hour of the day to enter into discussion on the principles surrounding the use of this particular rule. However, as I indicated at the outset, the Standing Order says that a matter of urgent and pressing necessity explained by the mover forms a part of the application.

In this case, as in other cases, it may be that there are borderline matters involved in which the mover is simply expressing an opinion, and the matter is perhaps one of criticism and of policy without necessarily having any pressing or urgent nature to it. The Chair has generally resolved that question in favour of the person applying to the House for unanimous consent, because the simple expedient is to deny consent.

This always places the Chair in a difficult position. While I do not think that the few minutes at the start of the day gives us an opportunity to discuss it, I certainly would welcome at some time, perhaps by way of a point of order on any particular application, a full discussion on what principles should govern the Chair in the acceptance of the presentation of these motions.

I do not think we can do it at this time, but possibly by way of this one, if the President of the Privy Council wishes to take this example to serve notice that later this day, or at a time set by the Chair, there should be a discussion of Standing Order 43, I would be glad to do it in that way.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, this has been a troublesome point for some time, and I welcome your suggestion: it is one that I would want to press, that we set aside, at an early date, an opportunity to debate fully the use of Standing Order 43 to ensure that if false allegations are made, or if debating points are made in the motion, there will be an opportunity—under the fairness of debate that is supposed to be established in parliament—for those on this side of the House to have an adequate opportunity to reply. I would like to debate that point of order next week, whenever Your Honour would like to raise the point.

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I take it my friend has not forgotten that he is the government House leader and can call the matter at any time he likes. In fact, he could have done it long before now, without rising on a fallacious point of order at the outset in order to put a point of view across and thereby disturb the order of business of this House.

• (1112)

Standing Order 43 is there for a purpose and it should be used by hon. members for a purpose. I do not wish to see the diminishing rights of private members further diminished because the hon. gentleman finds it uncomfortable to hear the truth.

Mr. MacEachen: I rise on a question of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. In accordance with the practice we have followed since we altered our procedures to take motions under Standing Order 43 prior to the question period, it is usual to await the conclusion of the question period before dealing with points of order and questions of privilege. However, I do feel this Standing Order ought to be discussed in some way.

The matter has been raised today, and further exchanges at this time would obviously give rise to other matters which would be argued. I should like to have the subject left in my hands. I will take the earliest opportunity which meets the need of the House leaders and, in particular, of the two combatants this morning, to give hon. members the fullest opportunity to amplify their feelings on this rule and the exchange which has taken place.

May I take it that this application is by way of a point of order which will be deferred for discussion until a more convenient time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE

SUGGESTED APPEARANCE BEFORE COMMITTEE OF PRESIDENT OF ST. BONIFACE HOSPITAL, MAN.—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provision of Standing Order 43, to present a motion of urgent and pressing necessity.

In light of the federal government's supposed commitment to reduce government spending, and owing to the extraordinarily effective response by Mr. L. Quaglia, president of St. Boniface General Hospital in Winnipeg, to Premier Lyon's call to eliminate waste and mismanagement in all government departments and institutions, a response which resulted in an estimated $3,700,000 savings on operating expenses at St. Boniface hospital, without lay-offs, and maintaining the high level of patient care for which St. Boniface hospital is world-renowned, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Epp):

That Mr. Quaglia be invited to appear before the public accounts committee of the House of Commons to outline his program of employee involvement in the cost reduction of $3,700,000 and with a view to applying his plan to all federal government operations.

Mr. Speaker: Presentation of such a motion can only be done by unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

[Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton).]

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

ACTION TO BE TAKEN AGAINST ILLEGAL STRIKERS

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. The minister stated yesterday he would not elaborate as to specific courses of action he might take in connection with the illegal activities of a minority of workers in the postal services. However, Canadians are wondering for how long we can allow a double standard to continue with regard to a majority of law-abiding labour and a minority of law-defying labour.

Could the minister advise the House, if not specifically, what the government intends to do, bearing in mind the legislation passed earlier this week, the present status of the Public Service Staff Relations Act and the provisions of the Criminal Code, under the options available to it by way of injunctions, dismissal or other form of recourse? Surely the public is entitled to know that.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): The hon. member has mentioned the options that are available. It might be noted that even in a case like this in regard to which parliament passed a law very recently, it is still necessary to gather the facts and move with care when proceeding against individuals. It is our intention to do that, to ensure that the law is respected.

• (1117)

I said the other day, and I say again, that respect for the law comes best through ordinary compliance with the law by Canadian citizens, and I make a plea again to the individuals involved and their friends that that point be noted and be made time and time again. In the current circumstances we are proceeding, and the first action to be taken is proceeding by way of seeking injunctions. That material is being prepared, and that may be in court this afternoon in certain localities.

APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR-ARBITRATOR IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his remarks. I would like to put a supplementary question to the Postmaster General.

In the legislation which was passed earlier this week there was provision for the appointment of a mediator-arbitrator. In answers given yesterday, it was not clear whether the government had the agreement of any person to take the job or whether the government had had any opportunity to discuss the appointment of the person to be named with the appropriate people. Has anybody accepted the job? Has anybody indicated that he will take it and, if there is more than one, are any of these people acceptable to the parties who have to enter into the arbitration?

My third question is very specific: is the government in such a position that it just cannot put together any kind of mediation-arbitration as was contemplated in the act which was passed only a few days ago?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Labour is now actively engaged in trying to find a mediator who will be acceptable to the government and all the parties involved so that the job can be done as soon as possible. I think we can expect the Minister of Labour to make this appointment very shortly.

[English]

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Speaker, I can understand how my question might have evoked a general answer if there was not any specific answer; but has anyone said to the government, "Yes, I will take on the job," or is the minister still looking?

That is a simple question, but it certainly is important because on Monday night we were assured: the Acting Minister of Labour said to me, in answer to a question, that we could be assured he would make that appointment within hours. If no one will even accept the job, the minister will have a difficult time making the appointment. It is time we found out what the situation is.

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I can only say that the Minister of Labour is very actively looking for this person.

[English]

Listen. Don't get excited.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lamontagne: I think in a situation like this hon. members should keep their calm. The Acting Minister of Labour is working very actively at the moment to make the most judicious choice of a good arbitrator-mediator, and I am confident that he will find one within hours or within days.

Mr. Hees: You could have added, weeks or months.

SUGGESTED MEETING WITH CUPW TO STOP ILLEGAL PICKETING

Hon. W. G. Dinsdale (Brandon-Souris): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Postmaster General and I trust that he will show some real concern in this matter.

In view of the fact that illegal picketing is still taking place in some major postal plants across the country, has the hon. gentleman assumed his responsibilities and met with officers of the Canadian Union of Postal Workers who are recommending this illegal action, thereby preventing return to work of a large number of postal workers who want to obey the legislation to provide for the continuation of postal service which was passed by parliament last Tuesday, and could he inform the House whether he has taken other specific action to end this continuing harassment of postal workers who want to work?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the Minister of Justice defined very well the steps he intends to take with regard to legal procedures. I must say, and repeat, that all our postal buildings are open. Security measures have been taken to accept and welcome the employees who want to work. I want to reiterate what I said yesterday, that is that if they come to work at any post office in Canada, they will be paid. Mr. Speaker, I should also like to add that we have received innumerable telephone calls, telegrams and messages from the Canadian people, and that we are acutely aware of the situation. But, in view of the difficult circumstances we are going through at the present time, it is most important not to take steps that could be unfair towards the majority of Canadian postal workers. I believe it is generally known that extremists in the postal services are in a minority. Hasty measures should not be taken that might create more injustice than would help the situation. I must say that we are very much concerned about the situation, and that we are now making very special efforts to try and convince the employees who want to work for the postal services to go back to work and respect the law.

● (1122)

[English]

Mr. Dinsdale: With reference to hasty action, I am sure the Postmaster General is aware that on May 18, 1977, the official opposition moved lack of confidence in this government because of our increasing concern about the drift toward the situation which can only result in final confrontation and complete breakdown of the postal service. That was in 1977, and it was on that occasion that CUPW requested that a royal commission be established.

In view of the fact that the postmasters general—there have been two since that time—have taken no action to deal with the crisis that we pinpointed in precise detail in 1977, will he now reread that debate and start implementing the recommendations which were made which will begin to establish confidence and trust in labour-management relations in the Post Office?

[Translation]

Mr. Lamontagne: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will have the opportunity, during the committee sittings and when the bill for the establishment of a Crown company is introduced, to intervene as often as he wishes on that matter. I should also like to tell him that I shall be tabling, in a few minutes, the annual report of the Post Office Department for 1977; he can then see that, despite what he has just said, there has been progress in that department.

RESOURCES

RIGHT OF PROVINCES TO COLLECT INDIRECT TAXES IN RESOURCE AREAS

Mr. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa-Whitby): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister: it arises out of the very important decision that was reached by the Supreme Court of Canada in the Cigol case. As the Prime Minister will know, the decision reached by the Supreme Court declared ultra vires the law passed by the government of Saskatchewan which it thought was very clearly within its jurisdictional authority.

While considering that constitutional control of resources, the right to have effective management over resources, means something to the provinces—in this respect I am thinking specifically of forests, mines and minerals—would the Prime Minister agree that the law should make it perfectly clear that provincial governments have the right to levy indirect taxes in these fields?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, let me remind the leader of the NDP that as far back as 1969 we had proposed constitutional changes which would permit provinces to levy indirect taxes. The only proviso was that that did not affect interprovincial or international trade. It is obvious that only the federal government can have jurisdiction to regulate international trade—if Canada is, indeed, to be a country—and no province should be able to use the tax method to prevent free trade across Canada. These are the two provisos that we put then, and we still stand by them.

The Supreme Court made a very simple judgment: it is that the province indeed was trying to use powers it did not have in order to regulate international trade. We think the Supreme Court made a decision which stands on its own merit, and I am somewhat surprised that the leader of the NDP is trying now, across the House by way of a question, to suggest that Canada should not continue to exercise the power to regulate the common market within Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: The Prime Minister knows very well that at least on this matter I and my party are in basic agreement with him: the federal authority must remain very strong indeed to ensure that there is an equitable distribution of the benefits of the wealth, for example, that occur throughout this country. The federal government has the right to levy its own indirect taxes on resources.

• (1127)

In his letter to the Prime Minister dated October 10, 1978, Premier Blakeney requested that the provinces be given at least the same right exclusively in the field of resources, and I have named the three areas of resources. That was accepted unanimously by the ten provinces in 1976; also, I thought it was accepted by the federal government. If the Prime Minister is in agreement with that, will he follow it up at the upcoming first ministers' conference and accept the suggestion of making an amendment to the Constitution of Canada to remove all uncertainty in this area?

[Mr. Lamontagne.]

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party said that he supported my view in so far as it permitted the redistribution of wealth across Canada. That is not the case I am making. Of course we must have that power. We have it now, and we exercise it.

I am making another case, that no province should be able to use its jurisdiction to prevent the free flow of goods across provincial borders. That is why, in the area of indirect taxation which can be used for this purpose, we stand by the position we have always taken and we think the position of the court is correct.

In 1976, Premier Blakeney reached some position on resources. We will debate that at the end of the month. We hope some accommodation is possible. We want provinces to be able to exercise fully their jurisdiction over resources, but when there is a conflicting interest with the importance of maintaining within Canada the free flow of goods, whether they be resources, manufactured products or anything else, then we think the federal government should remain supreme—and that is the position we will take.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Broadbent: Mr. Speaker, it is very important for members on this side of the House, and the people of Canada, to receive as clearly as possible the position of the Prime Minister on this. Whether indirect taxes are levied by the government of Saskatchewan, the government of Alberta or the government of Ontario, and if that should constitute an increase in the price of the product paid by another province, would it be defined by the Prime Minister of Canada as a hindrance to free trade throughout the country and, therefore, the province which levies such a tax ought not to have the right to do so? If that is his position, certainly it is not the position of the New Democratic Party of Canada.

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is asking if this is the definition of the Prime Minister. I understand this is the line which Premier Blakeney used during his election campaign in an attempt to indicate that the federal government, somehow and in some way, was trying to take the resources away from Saskatchewan and that they needed Premier Blakeney to protect the province. I am pointing out that it is not the Prime Minister taking that position; it is the Supreme Court of Canada stating what the law is.

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: It was the Supreme Court of Canada stating what the law is. I have indicated that we are flexible in our approach to changing the law. I have indicated what the parameters are, that we will consider permitting the provinces to exercise jurisdiction in indirect taxation; once again, provided it does not interfere with the free flow of goods from province to province.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES—GOVERNMENT ACTION IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Transport: it concerns the continued disruption of shipping on the Great Lakes.

Now that negotiations between the striking engineers and the Lake Carriers' Association have broken off, can the minister tell us what action the government is taking or is contemplating to bring the parties back to the negotiating table?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, of course I was glad to hear the news yesterday that one of the two unions involved in the dispute, and the employers, with the help of the mediation of the Department of Labour, had reached an agreement. That dispute is settled as a result of the successful collective bargaining process and the efforts of the Department of Labour.

● (1132)

With relation to the contract with the engineers, negotiations and mediations broke off yesterday but the parties have now agreed to meet again and there will be further meetings, again with the help of the Minister of Labour.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, since it has been indicated by the president of the Lake Carriers' Association, Mr. Norman Hall, that if the strike is not resolved by the weekend about 2,000 crew members and seafarers will be laid off, with the effect of further entrenching a prolonged disruption of services, will the Minister of Transport indicate what action the government is prepared to take to ensure that the whole system is not shut down prematurely; that is, shut down until the spring, as a result of which we would lose the benefit of the next month and a half of shipping season, which is crucial considering the impact to the Canadian economy, an impact that would be irreparable?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, in view of the ongoing mediation and negotiations, I think it would be wrong to talk in terms of the hypothetical and what we would do if this did not succeed. Let us hope that, as with three other contracts in this area in respect of which negotiation has succeeded, they will succeed in this one remaining area during the course of the weekend.

While I have not heard from lake shippers directly or indirectly about the matter, I would, indeed, think they might reconsider their notice of intention to lay off, in view of the one settlement which has occurred and the possibility of operating some ships, and in view also of mediation and the hope for success during the course of the next day or two.

EARLY ACTION TO SETTLE DISPUTE

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, it is our understanding that the lake carriers have not heard any word, as of just a few minutes ago, about any kind of resumption of talks, so the whole question is still very much up in the air. The impact, as the minister should know, would be extremely serious for parts of the country, especially western Canada and any area that is affected by the iron ore shutdown.

If we are still in this position on Monday, will the government be ready at that time to take some concrete action? Once again, I hate to say this but the only recourse at the present time seems to be legislation. Is the government prepared to move in that direction in the first part of the week in order to settle this very serious matter?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, that, obviously, is a repetition, in different words, of the earlier question. I indicated why it was not wise to speculate on the hypothetical failure of these discussions and, instead, that we should emphasize reasonableness on the part of the parties.

As far as the meeting is concerned, I only learned about 55 minutes ago that there were now grounds for the resumption of mediation and discussions and I would think by this time, if they had not heard an hour ago, they will have had that communication on the subject.

Mr. Murta: Mr. Speaker, if the strike should last without any action being taken by the government, the part of this country that will be most seriously affected by a slowdown, certainly in grain movement, is Manitoba because all the grain out of that province goes to Thunder Bay.

Does the government have any contingency plan to go to an alternative system of moving grain to Vancouver or some other area of the country, if that should happen? The economy of Manitoba will be very seriously affected if we keep fudging on this issue and if it keeps dragging on well into next week.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, fortunately, some 20 per cent of lake shipping has been continuing even throughout this strike. In addition, the ocean-going vessels which can go to Thunder Bay and collect grain were also still moving. Needless to say, in view of the circumstances of this week of immobility of certain parts of shipping, the Wheat Board and others have been looking at all the alternatives in order to again take advantage of wherever there is space and wherever there is movement. This will include absolute maximization of the use of Vancouver and Prince Rupert on the west coast.

If that can be done, it will take some of the pressure of moving Saskatchewan grain away from the movement of Manitoba grain, allowing Manitoba grain to move more freely to Thunder Bay. We are looking at all possible formulas, including the use of unit trains directly to the east, in order to catch up anything that may have been lost through the last few days.

Oral Questions

POST OFFICE

STEPS TO STOP ILLEGAL STRIKE AND PICKETING

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice: it is supplementary to questions asked by the hon. member for Vancouver South.

It seems to me there is a little foot-dragging here. The minister indicated that he wants to get the facts. The facts are that we have an illegal strike and illegal picketing. It seems to me that the minister has admitted there are three options: an injunction, criminal proceedings, and dismissal.

I want to know what makes the minister think an injunction is going to work, when in fact we know there is a small group that is defying the law at this particular time. Why does the minister opt for an injunction at this time? What are the reasons for moving for an injunction at this urgent moment, rather than spelling out why he has not sought proceedings under the Criminal Code, or dismissal? I think he must explain that.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that all the options were being examined and there are different timeframes for each of them. Hon. members may think that a law, having been passed, it can be enforced against individuals automatically. That is not the case. The Attorney General labours under the difficulty that he still must respect the civil liberties of people and still must respect due process. It is a difficulty I labour under very gladly, I may say, because I do not believe that generalizations can lead to criminality or conviction. That simply does not work in our country, either. When I talk about the respect for the law that I want these individuals to observe, I think it is partly because we carefully observe these traditions, that the law does, indeed, deserve that respect.

I should make it clear that the injunctions referred to and which we will be seeking will be directly related to the picketing activity which, of course, is an obstacle to the resumption of work by those who do, indeed, want to go back to work. That is a first step and one which we hope we can take as quickly as possible. I cannot comment on that further, again because of traditions about what one should say in respect of what will be going before the courts.

As far as other matters are concerned, the facts in relation to individuals and in relation to the law are being obtained and further action will be taken. I do not say that in any sense of trying to hold out a threat, because I fall back again on my original statement, that willingness to obey the law and the recognition of that principle is of most fundamental importance.

Mr. Alexander: Mr. Speaker, I would have more faith in the minister's answer if he had taken the opportunity to give me and the people of Canada some indication as to what he was referring to in terms of timeframes.

[Mr. Lang.]

INSTITUTION OF PUBLIC INTEREST DISPUTES COMMISSION

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Let me address this question to the Postmaster General, since he seems to be in a box at this particular time. Members of this party have indicated over and over again that the solution placed before the people of Canada for peaceful labour-management relations lies in the public interest disputes commission. Under questioning in the House, the minister has indicated more than once that he was not considering this. Yet at the same time, in the other place I understand that the Acting Minister of Labour has indicated that the public interest disputes commission is under active consideration.

Will the minister stand and tell the people what is going on? Is he considering the public interest disputes commission as an answer, or is he not? The minister has left the people of this country with the impression that he has discarded that idea.

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can give an answer to that elaborate question. Everything we have done in an attempt to obtain a settlement of this postal dispute is well known.

I can state again that we are wide open to renewed discussions. Clause 5 of Bill C-8 provides the union with an opportunity to come back to us, and with common agreement we can talk again about our differences. If the union wants to come back, we are wide open for discussions and we will discuss these differences at any time they want.

• (1142)

Mr. Alexander: Why do you evade my question, sir? I am talking about the public interest disputes commission.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES—LENGTHENING OF SEAWAY SEASON

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): My question, Mr. Speaker, is to the Minister of Transport. Given the nature of the strike on the Great Lakes—which I believe must be concluded in the next few days—which, incidentally, highlights the vital role of the port of Thunder Bay in the Canadian economy, given the backlog of grain in the west, and given the fact that studies have been going on this summer with the idea of increasing the number of months the Seaway is in operation, does the department have any plans at this stage to lengthen the time the Seaway will be open this year, so that some of this backlog can be moved, assuming that the strike will be concluded within the next few days?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, without any doubt the Seaway and Thunder Bay are extremely important aspects of our transportation system in Canada. That is why a short time ago we indicated that a consultant analysis had been started in relation to the lengthening of the Seaway season.

The Seaway, under current circumstances, is likely to be approaching its full capacity in a fairly short period of time—a very short period of years. Clearly, anything which can be done to lengthen that season and allow the port of Thunder Bay and vessels on the lakes to operate for a longer period of time would have great benefit for Canada, and it is being pursued with that in mind.

USE OF CHURCHILL IN MOVEMENT OF GRAIN

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, my question is supplementary to the questions of the hon. member for Lisgar: it is to the Minister of Transport. When the minister said that alternate routes for shipping grain out of Canada for export would be looked at, he failed to mention the port of Churchill.

I would like to ask the minister if he would give consideration to my suggestion, that when the m.v. Arctic comes into Churchill on November 15, because it is a class II icebreaker it be accompanied by four or five other ships, thus bringing the shipping of grain out of Churchill up to the anticipated 30 million bushels?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I did not mention the port of Churchill for the very good reason that for the last four or five years we have been maximizing, absolutely, to the highest extent possible, the volume of grain moving through Churchill. Therefore, we can add nothing more to it under current circumstances.

The problem with shipping into Churchill late in the season may have just been emphasized, and that is the difficulty with ice which the m.v. Arctic has just run into. In view of that difficulty, I am not at all sure at this point in time if it will be able to make the trip which originally had been planned. I do say, however, that the fact this ice-strengthened vessel ran into difficulty is some indication in logic to the hon. member as to why other vessels may not want to try the trip at that time of year. The solution to Churchill's problem may lie more in lengthening the season by avoiding certain ice problems in the harbour, but they are not simple problems to overcome.

Mr. Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, I think the solution to the problems in Churchill would be the changing of this government. The minister said that the port of Churchill was being utilized to its full capacity. I believe he has read the Bryden report and not the Hall commission report which says that 55 million bushels could be shipped through this port.

In light of that, will the minister now take it upon himself to ask the Wheat Board, if they cannot ship another 4 million or 5 million bushels out of Churchill, if in fact they will store the cargo which has been sold for shipment out of Churchill, next year in Churchill, thus easing the pressure on storage facilities on the prairies?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, if the existing situation allows railway cars to be available, the Wheat Board may well find it possible to move grain into storage in Churchill earlier than they had anticipated. That does depend, however, on whether cars can be freed from the other movements of grain.

As far as the question of expanding the port of Churchill to handle 55 million bushels is concerned, the Hall commission report recommended the construction of a very expensive terminal inland in order to accomplish that. I have to say that, looking at this from the point of view of total economic benefits, it is still true that the placing of that terminal at Prince Rupert where it could be used 12 months of the year, or at Thunder Bay where it could be used nine or ten months, simply gets a lot more grain through for the dollars available.

I hope the hon. member will appreciate that, even as a westerner who has long and strongly worked for the port of Churchill and its development, I too have to take into account the use of those dollars and the fact that if you can get two or three times the grain through for the same expenditure, then it would be something in the way of a waste to not do it in that fashion.

PSSRA PUNITIVE PROVISIONS RESPECTING ILLEGAL STRIKES

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Justice in his capacity as Attorney General. In the Senate, on October 18, 1978, with respect to the postal matters, Senator van Roggen wanted to know whether or not there was sufficient provision in the Public Service Staff Relations Act to enable the Minister of Labour to terminate the employment of those who disobey the law, as opposed to only fining them. The unequivocal answer by the Minister of Labour was that there was power in the Public Service Staff Relations Act. There have been press reports which say that a search of that act has indicated that the power does not rest there.

With respect to the remedies which are available to the Government of Canada, and in view of that uncertainty, can the Attorney General assure the House that the government has the capacity to dismiss for failure to obey the law, if that should be a remedy that the government would consider? I ask, not in his capacity as Minister of Justice but as Attorney General, will the hon. minister advise the House as to the capacity of the government to utilize that one option that the minister, in his capacity as Minister of Justice, indicated that the government was considering? Do they have that power?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, without having the Public Service Staff Relations Act in front of me, I can say to the hon. member that there are, obviously, within it various powers to dismiss and some of those powers apply in circumstances such as those to which he refers.

It is true, however, that certain of those powers are subject to the usual protections in that act in terms of appeals and other procedures. I will not go further than that. Yes, the power is there. There are also procedures which are designed to safeguard individual employees, of course. These are all matters to be carefully considered.

INDUSTRY

JAPANESE INVESTMENT IN WEST COAST SHIPPING—EFFECT ON FISHERIES

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It concerns the very substantial investment by Japanese interests in the west coast shipping industry and the potential that this will have an adverse effect in terms of employment, pricing and processing of fish.

My question is: what steps has the minister taken to see that Canadian capital is available for west coast fishing interests, rather than Japanese capital of foreign capital, so that we can be assured that we are moving in the direction of Canadian ownership in terms of our west coast fisheries, rather than in the direction we are now, which is toward a foreign-dominated west coast fishery?

Hon. Jack H. Horner (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, with regard to Canadian ownership of the west coast fishing industry, any new venture by Japanese capital, or any other capital, into starting a new business in British Columbia, naturally would have to go through FIRA. Any takeover would have to go through FIRA. With regard to funds available from the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, it might be of interest to know that the Federal Business Development Bank last year loaned approximately $479 million and one-quarter of that money went to British Columbia.

In my own department, the enterprise development program was recently approved by Treasury Board to insure up to $1 billion in loans. I have said many times in this House that last year we helped 256 companies and that all but 7 of those companies were Canadian-owned. So we have money available and are prepared to assist any industry that can bring forward a bona fide case and show that it is particularly interested in developing the fishing industry, or any other industry.

Mr. Leggatt: Mr. Speaker, the minister fails to tell us how much of that money went into the fishing industry. I can tell him that it was miniscule. Under the foreign investment review mechanism, only takeovers are reviewed. What is happening is that we have Japanese interests that are putting up loan capital rather that equity capital, and are therefore getting in under the review mechanism. This means that when you have tied contracts in terms of products, where you have a foreign company that is able to tie up your products because of a loan rather than a purchase, that is not reviewable.

My question is: will the minister now consider changing the provisions of the Foreign Investment Review Act so that these kinds of product agreements which are coming in through the back door—through loan, rather than equity—will be reviewable?

Mr. Horner: Mr. Speaker, we are prepared to look at all possible suggestions to facilitate Canadian business; but the hon. member is quite wrong when he suggests that only takeovers are reviewed by the Foreign Investment Review Agency. New businesses are also under review by the Foreign Investment Review Agency.

● (1152)

With regard to the Federal Business Development Bank, as I said, one quarter of the money loaned last year was loaned in British Columbia, and one-quarter loaned last year was in manufacturing. I will have to see how much went into the fishing industry. But the initiative must rest with the private sector; they must come to the bank and ask for a loan.

An hon. Member: They are on strike.

Mr. Horner: I do not know how many companies representing the fishing industry came to the bank and asked for loans.

CRIMINAL CODE

AMENDMENT TO CONTROL FIREARMS

Mr. Ross Milne (Peel-Dufferin-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Following the tragic shooting incidents, one in a Brampton high school and later another in Ottawa, I am sure all members were alarmed to learn that there was a similar incident in Winnipeg.

Could the Solicitor General give the House every assurance that the remaining provisions of the bill which was passed last session, including the firearms acquisition certificates requirements, will be proclaimed on January 1, 1979, as proposed?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, that is fully the intention of the government. I understand the hon. gentleman's concern in this matter. As the hon. member knows, most of the remaining provisions have been implemented. The firearms acquisition certificate provision is the only section which has yet to be implemented. It is our intention, in view of the offences that the hon. member has described and the dangers that are ongoing, to proceed with final implementation of that section on January 1. We shall also be proceeding with the aspect of the amnesty recall program during the month of November. Further publicity will be advanced in that area.

While I am on my feet, I would indicate that I am very pleased with the amount of public support the program has received: it is well deserved support.

BANKRUPTCIES

REPORTED INCREASE IN CANADA

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my question in the absence of the Minister of Finance, and now I see the Minister of State (Small Business) is also absent, will be addressed to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister familiar with the Dun and Bradstreet revelation that while bankruptcies in Canada had a ratio to American bankruptcies of one in ten in 1970, they are now up to a ratio of seven in Canada for every ten in the United States?

If the Prime Minister is aware of this, has he done any review to find out why there is this sad increase in bankruptcies in Canada, bearing in mind they left defaulted liabilities of $2 billion in the last two years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no, I was not aware of what the hon. gentleman calls a revelation. I will read it and see if I have an explanation for it.

THE MINISTRY

INQUIRY AS TO CABINET SHUFFLE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the right hon. Prime Minister. I would like to know if he intends to proceed with a cabinet shuffle and, if so, when.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The opposition leader's question astounds me, Mr. Speaker. I would think that he has enough to worry about shuffling his own members on the other side of the House.

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I think that even if the Canadian people are anxious to elect a Progressive Conservative government, it is now urgent to have a cabinet which is able to face the present challenge. I am therefore asking the Prime Minister again if he intends to shuffle his cabinet and to appoint a new Minister of Finance. And if so, when?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, according to the Leader of the Opposition, a cabinet shuffle would allow us to meet the present challenge in Canada. I am aware of that, Mr. Speaker, but I believe that the present cabinet also allows us to do just that.

PUBLIC SERVICE

INSTITUTION OF PUBLIC INTEREST DISPUTES COMMISSION

Mr. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister: it is supplementary to the question posed to the Postmaster General by the hon. member for Hamilton West.

Was the Acting Minister of Labour reflecting government policy in the other place on October 18, 1978, when he said:

> I can assure the honourable senator that the recommendations of the Woods commission are under active consideration.

The principal recommendation of the Woods commission was the setting up of an industrial, or essential or public interest disputes commission. In light of the very dangerous confrontation that is taking place in this country today between a segment of organized labour and this parliament, can the Prime Minister tell this House if it is the government's intention to bring in, forthwith, legislation implementing the principal recommendations of the Woods commission, which the government has had now for ten years?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of Labour may have revived within his department interest in some aspects of the Woods report which, as the hon. member says, goes back ten years. I have not been informed of such a revival.

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. I will put it to him in the form of a direct question. Is it the intention of the government to establish in this country an industrial, or essential or public interest disputes commission which would resolve the kind of dangerous confrontation that is now taking place in this country with respect to collective agreements or collective bargaining between government services that are obviously essential?

Mr. Trudeau: The short answer is no, Mr. Speaker. But I think I should be allowed to reassure the hon. member that the degree of confrontation which he suggests is not such so as to exhibit the alarmist tone that he is using.

The hon. member knows that 85 per cent of labour matters are under the jurisdiction of the provinces.

An hon. Member: Ninety-five.

Mr. Trudeau: I have improved statistics from the New Democratic Party; I am told it is 95 per cent. I think, as usual, this statistic is off the top of the hon. member's head. At any rate, it is quite obvious that the danger of confrontation that the hon. member is talking about is, if it exists, mainly in the provincial area.

The second point is that in the past two years the Canadian strike record has improved immeasurably. The third point is that even when the Canadian strike record was very high, it took into account things which are not comparable with the figures of other nations because it took into account the very large sector of the public service which is found in schools and hospitals. This accounts for the very large strike record in the public sector.

All these facts are meant to reassure the hon. member that there are obviously some confrontation situations, like the present one in the Post Office, but we are not as despairing as the hon. member about the future management-labour relations in Canada.

REQUEST FOR CONTINUATION OF ESQUIMALT AND NANAIMO RAIL PASSENGER SERVICE

Mr. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, for which I have given him notice. The Esquimalt and Nanaimo railroad passenger service is slated for discontinuance on December 13 of this year.

Is the minister aware that passenger-loading on the E and N quadrupled this summer and fall? Can he now assure Vancouver Islanders that this popular, and now profitable, rail service will continue beyond December 13?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member that I am aware of the very remarkable increase in the number of people using the service. I presume that will also be taken into account in the various steps which have to be taken with regard to the future of the rail service. There are a number of complex legal and procedural questions involved. I note the hope and optimism of the hon. member.

IMPLEMENTATION OF URBAN TRANSPORTATION ASSISTANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Howard Johnston (Okanagan-Kootenay): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister inform the House whether the master agreement under the urban transportation assistance program has been signed with the province of British Columbia? Can he provide any assurance that construction of the very necessary overpass at Invermere, B.C., will proceed without further delay?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, while we have been able to sign master agreements with many of the provinces, we have not yet reached that stage with the province of British Columbia.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The government House leader was not in the House yesterday and therefore I did not ask the usual question regarding business of the House. He is here now. May I ask him the usual Thursday question, on Friday, with respect to the proposals of the government for business before this House?

[Mr. Trudeau.]

• (1202)

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is aware that we are presently dealing with the borrowing authority bill in the name of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). We propose to continue that bill today and, if it is not completed today as I would hope, deal with it again on Monday. We will continue with it until we can see some prospect of completing it. Following that I would like to deal, as I indicated earlier, with the act to amend the Old Age Security Act.

There is standing in notice the bill in the name of the Minister of Finance which will be given first reading today that I would like to call, and the amendment to the Health Resources Fund Act that I would also like to call at an early date.

I would appreciate some comment from hon. members opposite as to when we might give second reading to the very important bill dealing with conflict of interest with respect to members of the House of Commons and the Senate.

With regard to the resumption of debate on the address, it is my intention to call that debate a week from Monday. In the meantime, we are having discussions as to how we might terminate that debate. I do not believe I should state the terms of the discussion. That can be done later.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I would be quite prepared to speak to the hon. gentleman with regard to the conflict of interest bill. I take it he was asking for discussion on the matter. That is certainly agreeable.

I wonder if the minister would be interested in following the normal practice of having suggested allotted days for the period between now and the Christmas adjournment. I think there are five of them. If so, we could discuss the appropriate schedule.

Possibly while on his feet he could advise when he anticipates the notice with regard to establishing the Crown corporation relating to the Post Office. I understand this is actively under consideration by the cabinet. Can he indicate approximately when we might see that bill, since it is an important piece of legislation in light of what is going on in the country today?

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I would be quite receptive to receiving a proposed list of allotted days that we could use as a basis for future planning. I had hoped it would have been possible to have given notice of the bill on the Crown corpor-tion relating to the Post Office today. However, because of a number of points that have to be further considered, it is not likely that I can give the notice earlier than this time next week. I feel that is a good target.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we welcome the statement of the House leader on what the business will be for the next few days. I note that he did leave open two questions. First, may I say we would be happy to discuss with him the possibility of getting the conflict of interest bill into committee an early date.

The other comment I would make is that I thought we had reached agreement about completing the debate on the address in reply. At any rate, we are prepared to have it called again on Monday, October 30. We are also prepared for that to be the final day.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I know that it is no secret, at least among House leaders, of the generosity shown to the government House leader with regard to the throne speech debate. It is a matter that he appreciates very much. If my friend is offering one day, that is quite agreeable with me, and has been quite agreeable for some time. I am delighted to see him in the position now where he can make the same offer. If later today the appropriate House order could be put down, we would be very pleased to consider it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, that is not quite a representation of what happened. I thought we had agreed at the meeting of House leaders this morning. I am confirming that. We are prepared, all of us, to conclude the address debate in one more day.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready to so order?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if you order it, it is also agreed that the vote be taken at 9.45 p.m.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Speaker, I confirm that this agreement was reached. I did not disclose the terms of the agreement because I did not recall that I sought authority from my colleagues to announce the agreement. However, I am delighted that it has been done on my behalf. I hope this seeming spirit of generosity will continue. May I add that it is understood the two days that are taken away from this debate are not to be added to the allotted days, otherwise it would be counterproductive.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, we should make it quite clear. The government has a problem with regard to its legislative program. There is not much in it with regard to incentives to the community. However, we have agreed, as he has suggested. Also in a spirit of generosity we have agreed to put back the private members' matters. Therefore the government in effect has the equivalent of another parliamentary day, or perhaps a bit more, for government business.

It has never been our tradition to hold up the business of this House of Commons but only to discuss those matters which are important. We think this is a point of view and position that are important for us to take in this. It is in that spirit we made the agreement we have discussed.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. I am beginning to get the impression we are having more difficulty agreeing with each other than when we disagree. Does the House wish at this time to proceed to order that there be one remaining day for the debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne, that it shall be Monday, October 30, and that the vote thereon shall be taken at 9.45 p.m.?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: It is so ordered.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. STEVENS—REMARKS MADE BY PARLIAMENTARY SECRETARY IN DEBATE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It arises from remarks made in this House yesterday by the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin). The parliamentary secretary, unintentionally I assume, misled the House when he said, referring to myself:

> The hon. member knows this. He knows authority is being obtained now to cover the government's needs not only for the balance of the present fiscal year but for the next fiscal year so as to avoid our having to come back to parliament time and time again for the necessary legislation if we are to meet the expenditures which he himself, along with other members of the finance committee, examined in detail when the estimates were before the committee last spring and supported there.

My point of order is twofold. First, the current year's estimates as they were before our committee, and indeed in this House, were opposed on many points and, to the limit of our procedural ability, we tried to have certain of these estimates defeated.

My main point of order is that for the parliamentary secretary to suggest that expenditures for the next fiscal year, fiscal 1980, have already been approved, is totally erroneous. We have not seen the figures. We have seen no estimates. Indeed, we have seen no indication, even in the form of a budget, as to what the government plans for 1980 as far as expenditures are concerned.

Mr. Speaker: I am not so sure that that point might not have been a better contribution to the debate than it was to the order of the House. In any case, it is now finalized.

INCOME TAX ACT

AMENDMENT TO PROVIDE FOR CHILD TAX CREDIT

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (for the Minister of Finance) moved the introduction of Bill C-10, to amend the Income Tax Act to provide for a child tax credit and to amend the Family Allowances Act, 1973.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. BEATTY—QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

Mr. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Grey-Dufferin-Waterloo): Perhaps I missed it, but did Your Honour call questions on the order paper?

Mr. Speaker: If the hon. member would refer to the last occasion on which that question was raised, a few days ago, he will find it has not been the practice to call questions on the order paper until after the debate on the address has been concluded. However, in view of the rearrangement of our business perhaps I can forewarn the House that beginning on Monday of next week, I shall call questions on the order paper.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Thursday, October 19, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Stevens) (p. 271).

Mr. Cecil Smith (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, toward the end of my remarks last night I was talking about the town of Churchill and the recreational complex which was built there by the government at a cost of some $13 million, and the fact that there are only 1,400 people left in this community which is saddled with keeping this huge complex in operation.

For some time I have been trying to establish what could be done with this white elephant, as it must be called at this time. I have heard some rumblings, some rumours, that a university of the north might be in the offing—I understand the government is in something of a dilemma with regard to this complex. I suggest that consideration be given to setting up a university of the north in Churchill for postgraduate work in engineering, scientific research, and so on. Those studying there could concentrate on the potential of the north, not only in Manitoba but in Canada generally.

At present most of our northern research is carried out in places far removed from the north and it is about time that the government, having created this monster, seriously considered establishing a new university in the north for postgraduate work. Churchill is well known for its involvement in scientific work of various kinds and this huge complex could become the hub of such a university as I am proposing.

At the beginning of my speech I mentioned Otineka and Le Pas and the billion dollar loan to Panama. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that north of the 53rd parallel in Manitoba, Liberal words about restraint have an odd ring to them. In 1970 the Le Pas Indian band, a group of approximately 1,200 Cree-speaking people, made a proposal for a small shopping complex to be built on their reserve. What they had in mind was a complex covering some 25,000 square feet. The proposal was accepted by the federal government through the minister of Indian affairs at that time, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). What did the people of Le Pas end up with? It is hard to believe. The Indians wanted a little store. Ottawa built them a mall. Once approval had been given by the minister, work went ahead and, by the time the mall was completed, it covered 190,000 square feet. The estimated cost was in the neighbourhood of $4 million, and the final cost was $8.4 million. I attempted several times in committee to ascertain the reasons for this huge cost overrun. Invariably I was told that it was due to government overbilling.

I will tell you what happened, Mr. Speaker. The Indians have been placed in a most difficult position because once the mall had been built the government turned it over to the band organization; Harry Wilson, the chairman of the Otineka corporation, is finding it almost impossible to make it a paying proposition, although he is working very hard, for the simple reason that this 190,000 square feet mall is still not filled though the complex was officially opened two years ago. As a result the government has felt obliged to write off $4.2 million of the guaranteed loan it gave in connection with this mall.

The Indian people have been put in the position of trying to bail the government out of a situation it manufactured for itself by allowing spending to get completely out of control. It is the taxpayers of Canada who are being called upon to pay the $4.2 million the government wrote off some two months ago, and if things continue as they are now in that shopping mall, the government will be spending still more of the taxpayers' dollars to write off the entire debt. I would like to develop this theme further but I am sure it is not new to hon. members. It is just another example of the bumbling mismanagement and overspending that have gone on under this government. These things happen because the government decides to take matters out of the hands of the communities concerned. Costly gifts are made, and then they walk away from them, declining responsibility for upkeep and maintenance once the initial construction has been completed.

What does the bill before us ask parliament to do? The government is seeking authority to borrow another $17 billion, and I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that I shall want some answers from the minister before I agree to it. For example, is $1 billion of that $17 billion going to the Republic of Panama for the development of a copper mine there as the EDC is planning right now? The EDC was, of course, somewhat embarrassed when General Torrijos announced in a speech in Panama that Canada has agreed to guarantee a $1 billion loan to that country to help develop the Cerro Colorado mine. EDC denied this, however, stating that negotiations for the loan were still at an early stage.

• (1222)

On October 16 I learned that this loan had still not been guaranteed and that the final negotiations had not been completed. However, it is the intention of the government to go ahead, and the EDC says it is a very good project in which to get involved. But how do I explain to the miner at the Hudson Bay Mining and Smelting Company at Flin Flon, which mines copper and zinc, that we have a government which is taking tax dollars and sending them to the Republic of Panama to develop a copper mine there? The miner at Flin Flon is wondering if he will be laid off next week because the Canadian copper industry has gone to rock bottom. How do I explain that? There is no way.

What the government should be doing with this $1 billion it is considering lending to the Republic of Panama is putting it into the Canadian mining industry, so that instead of shipping raw materials to other parts of the world and buying back manufactured goods, that $1 billion should go into the Canadian mining industry so it can process raw materials here and provide much needed jobs.

Hon. members opposite can smile, and the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Cullen) can say that the Churchill constituency receives a bigger grant under the Canada Works Program than any other constituency, but that does not satisfy me, because that constituency has the highest rate of unemployment. Churchill is entitled to a bigger grant if money is going to be handed out in that fashion. We need long-term jobs, but lending $1 billion to the Republic of Panama to develop another copper mine will certainly not provide jobs in Canada. That money should be used to develop processing right here in Canada.

The chamber of commerce of Leaf Rapids, Manitoba, has sent a petition to the government. The chamber of commerce of Thompson, Manitoba, sent a petition to the government telling it to get off this foolishness. Instead of financing a copper mine in the Republic of Panama, why not put some money into the sagging mining industry right here in Canada? The government is asking for authority to borrow another $17 billion, but I certainly will not vote for this bill unless we know where this money is going to be spent.

I am dealing only with the Churchill constituency. Will some of this money be spent on another white elephant complex in Churchill? Will it be spent to built another huge shopping mall like the one which has become an empty barn in northern Manitoba? Will it be used to send another $1 billion to the Republic of Panama?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. I regret to inform the hon. member that his allotted time has expired. He may continue with unanimous consent. Does the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith) have unanimous consent to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Paul E. McRae (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to participate in this debate and to make a few points which I think are rather essential when we are talking about the national debt and its relative size in terms of the gross national product.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) made an interesting speech in the House yesterday dealing with some new economics and dealing with what he termed a new society. I have talked about this three or four times in this House, and I will say it again and again—there were very important lessons to learn from the hon. member's speech, and I have some other thoughts along the same line, that is, that there is no question that in the world today a whole range of industrial nations are undergoing some very serious economic problems.

Japan has a surplus of trade, and therefore a yen which is very high. Japan is finding it more and more difficult to compete with dollars like ours. West Germany and Switzerland, which have relatively low inflation rates, still have some very serious long-term problems. The IMF and the Big Seven talk in terms of 5 per cent as being like zero in relation to inflation. It is not like it used to be when 2 per cent was considered normal. We now have to deal with figures like that.

Unemployment is a problem throughout the world; much more so in Canada than in most other countries, but it is certainly a problem throughout the world. There are many social problems which are being faced by all countries.

The hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge said that ours is a new society. I prefer the term "new economics". There is a totally new notion called scarcity, and we find this in the major area of energy. This has some very major ramifications for the world's governments. The net outflow of about $50 billion a year to the Arab countries from the United States is one of those ramifications, and it has militated considerably against the economy of the United States and the American dollar. Because of our reliance in terms of trade upon the United States, there are ramifications for our economy as well.

We are told that we must expect to spend about $180 billion over the next 15 or 20 years on energy projects. That amount far exceeds the rate at which we are spending today. That rate more than doubles the number of capital dollars going into energy projects in relation to the total number of capital dollars available.

Another factor which seems to be little known to hon. members opposite is that the techniques which have served us well in the past, Keynesian fiscal and monetary techniques, are no longer working the way they did, and for two reasons. One is the nature and size of the problem. It is interesting to hear members of the Conservative party talking about $2 billion in tax relief as the kind of stimulus which will really move things. This is what the Tories plan to do if they happen to be fortunate enough, from their point of view, or unfortunate enough, from the point of view of the country, to be in power.

They talk about a $2 billion tax cut changing things. That is the same figure we used to hear in the early sixties. We were told that such a move would change the economy around and move things along. In those days we were talking about a gross national product of $40 billion to $50 billion. Today we are talking about a gross national product of $220 billion. We were talking about a stimulus of 4 per cent or 5 per cent at that time, and now we are talking about a stimulus of .75 per cent to 1 per cent, and saying that that will move the economy. I want to talk about that later, but at this point I am saying that the magnitude of the problems make it almost impossible for this to happen.

Present techniques also tend to be counter-productive. That is the thing which worries most economists. This was mentioned by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge. He said that if there were tax cuts to stimulate growth in the economy, we could expect that money to go into savings. Back in the early sixties about 2 per cent or 2.3 per cent of the gross national product went into savings. Today the figure is about 10 per cent, a growth factor of about 4. This goes into savings and therefore does not get into the stream as purchasing power. Some goes in terms of purchasing luxury goods, which often means that money flows out of the country through foreign purchases. People do take trips south and so forth, and while that is desirable from an individual point of view, it is not the kind of thing which stimulates the Canadian economy.

I am using this to illustrate the point that these techniques do not work the way they used to work, and some of them are counterproductive. For instance, there is a good case to be made that if you do in fact increase the deficit by a tax cut, the increased deficit will have an effect on inflation. Increased inflationary costs will mean that our goods cost more and more on the world market, and very often that might mean that we produce less and there are fewer jobs. It used to be that if you had a little inflation, you would have few unemployed. There is a case to be made today for actually increasing unemployment by increasing inflation.

So, putting these factors together, I think we are going into a new economic world, and some of the things we are saying in the House do not work any more. I think that was the case that the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge made, and that is the case that many of us on both sides of the House have been making. We have to look at new ways of handling our economic problems.

When we come to Canada more specifically, we have one or two unique problems which separate our efforts from the efforts of other countries to solve their economic problems. The most compelling single factor that makes us very different from any of the other OECD countries is the high rate of unemployment and, more basically, the very large growth in our labour force.

I have used these figures before, but I will use them again because I think we must keep saying this. I have a chart in front of me from Statistics Canada which was produced in spring. If one takes the year 1965 as the base year, using the figure 100, one finds that for every 100 persons in the labour force in West Germany in 1965 there is now something in the order of 96 or 97 people, an actual decline of people in the labour force; for every 100 people in the labour force in Italy in 1965, there is still 100; for every 100 in the United Kingdom, there is about 104 now; Sweden has about 112; France, 110; Japan, about 114. All of these are major countries with which we can compare ourselves.

Let us not compare ourselves with Mauritius or some such country with which it is not possible to compare economies. Let us compare our economy with those of the Big Seven and the major European countries, the economies of which are similar to ours. Taking them as a kind of average, you find that most of those countries have had either no growth in their labour force or a growth of perhaps less than 10 people per 100 over the period from 1965 to the end of 1977.

There are three countries that stand out beyond these figures. One of them is the United States, which has 28 more people per 100 in the labour force than they had in 1965, and one is Australia, which has 30 more people per 100 in the labour force than they had in 1965. This is quite different from the first group. But there is one country that stands out in a way that no other does, and that is Canada. We had 46 more people per 100 in the labour force at the end of last year than we did in 1965, way above anyone else. Even with an 8.5 per cent or 9 per cent, or even a 10 per cent unemployment rate in this country—and there is always a debate about this rate—we would not have a really serious problem in this country, having done the things we have done to create jobs, if we had at this stage the same growth in the labour force that exists in the United States. That is the fundamental difference between Canada and the other countries to which I referred. The growth in our labour force has been unbelievable.

This is what concerns me in the House. I hear people saying, "Throw another $2 billion into the hopper, and we will solve the problem". The NDP member would up the ante to about $4 billion. This is an horrendous problem. We have 46 more people in the labour force per 100 than there were 12 years ago.

Why am I talking about this when we are talking about our national debt and the money we need to cover it? I am talking about it specifically because this growth in the labour force has been the single factor that has created the problems which have brought us this debt. We have a massive $4.5 billion to $5 billion going out in UIC payments each year. This is entirely related to the growth in the labour force. I haven't the figures at hand at this point, but several billion dollars have gone out to DREE, in transfer payments to provinces, to Canada Works, and so on. All this is entirely related to the growth in the labour force.

I do not think I am exaggerating one iota when I say—it is probably absolutely true—that if our labour force growth was like the growth in the U.S. labour force, we would be incurring virtually no debt today simply because we would not have to spend that money. I would say we could wipe out $10 billion to $12 billion of government expenditures if we had the same situation that exists in the United States, given what we have done in the past. I think there is much nonsense being said in the House and in the press that totally ignores that fact.

If you pick up the Globe and Mail or any other newspaper, you often find on the first page some statement about the economy which is totally isolated from the context, like the statement I heard this morning on the CBC credited to the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens) that our national debt has increased four or five times over the last 15 or 20 years and that his is a very bad situation. This is the kind of thing the public keeps hearing.

If you turn to the financial page of the Globe and Mail, of the Financial Post, or of most of the larger newspapers, you will find a slightly different story. They will not be saying that the growth in our debt has increased four or five times. They will say, yes, it is four or five times larger, but also the GNP has grown four or five times. Actually, we have somewhat less debt as related to the GNP today than we had 15 years ago. This is what one finds in the financial pages of the papers and this is what economists tell me; this is what I find when I read various economic journals. But when I read the front pages of our daily newspapers, all I see are these alarming, disturbing figures. Now we have reached the point where the press, the opposition, and the government have to talk about real figures. They have to talk about the real growth in the labour force and the effect of that real growth on our economy.

So I am saying—and I have been saying it all along but I hope that perhaps I am saying it better now because it takes some time to understand this—along with the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge—and I do not agree with all his solutions—that we have a new economics now, a new set of problems which will not be solved by the simplistic, Keynesian techniques that were used in the past. They were great in the 1960s; they do not obtain today.

Now I should like to spend a couple of minutes talking about some of my concerns in terms of the things the opposition members have been saying in what I think are their honest efforts—in no way am I imputing to someone dishonesty in this business—to find solutions to our economic problems. It is not dishonesty. It is that people have not come to grips with the fact that there is an essential qualitative change in the world's economies. Canadians are affected by that as much as anyone else. This essential qualitative change is what we should study. I am not talking about dishonesty, misleading information, or anything of that nature. I am talking about government leaders throughout the world not understanding the phenomena referred to by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge, myself, and others.

I should like to refer to one of the recent statements of the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) regarding mortgage and municipal taxation deductions from income tax. It is not a bad idea. It appeals to a lot of people, even though this type of program contains some grave inequities which must be dealt with. Certainly the government has looked very, very carefully at the same type of program. We see some of the desirability in it. There is no question a lot of middle class people are caught in a bind. This particular suggestion by the opposition makes some sense, so it should not be rejected out of hand. But we should look at it, taking into account the new economics.

I rose today in order to look at these suggestions and so-called techniques, taking into account the world in which we are living. There could not be a worse time to advance a mortgage and taxation refund program. The deficit for this fiscal year is $11 billion or $12 billion, and the opposition comes forth with an idea which would increase the deficit to $14 billion or $15 billion. There has been some mention of figures, but the best figures of many economists indicate an amount of close to $4 billion shared by provincial, federal, and municipal governments.

In view of the inflationary situation, an increased deficit is not acceptable at this particular point. The suggestion of the opposition is a good and valid one, if it is applied to Keynesian economics and the pre-1975 period. The point is that $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion is put into the housing sector in the hope of stimulating it and creating jobs. There are a lot of economists in the world who do not believe that $2 billion or $3 billion will result in any material change in the growth of this country. Therefore government revenues will not be increased one iota because of this increased demand. That is why I feel such a proposition is very bad at this particular time. I do not believe it will increase jobs or have any effect on the job market. It will not have the expected effects on revenue. Therefore, it can be only inflationary and further increase the deficit.

The opposition party has claimed for a long time that government spending must be reduced. There are problems with deficits, but government revenues cannot be cut back. An interesting chart was put out by the President of the Treasury Board (Mr. Andras) which showed revenues and expenditures, side by side, for the last ten years. The lines continued along parallel, and crossed at points which indicated small deficits or surpluses. Suddenly in 1974-75 the expenditure line continued to rise but the revenue line almost flattened. It is not a slow turn; it is an abrupt one. What happened in that period? The then minister of finance, in a minority government, on the suggestion of a push by the Tory party leader, at one particular point decided to index exemptions. Everything else was indexed, so we indexed exemptions, and the curve went off. The revenue line flattened right out.

One cannot have it both ways. Government deficits cannot be reduced by the reduction of expenditures, if at the same time revenues fall because of decreasing taxes. It will not work, it cannot be done this way. At the present time we are facing a very serious deficit problem. It is inflationary, has a bad effect on the dollar and so on. It is a major problem.

My main criticism of the mortgage and tax deduction notion is that a stimulus of $2 billion, $3 billion or $4 billion in our new economics will not have the same effect as it did in the era of Keynesian economics. It will not have the expected effect. We are talking about a stimulus of perhaps 1½ per cent to 2 per cent of the gross national product in total. We are not talking about the effect of a $3 billion or $4 billion stimulus on a $45 billion GNP. We are talking about the effect of an approximate $2 billion stimulus on a $220 billion GNP. It is a very, very small factor, a little over 1 per cent.

The opposition indicated that the mortgage and municipal tax deduction scheme is popular in the United States. Perhaps that is so. One of the very important effects of such a deduction on the United States federal state and municipal taxation system is that more and more taxes are levied on property owners. For example, the average home owner in California is paying in the order of $5,000, $6,000, or $7,000 a year for municipal taxes. If a similar type of situation is placed before our average home owners, one must remember that there is a different kind of problem to face. In the United States this led directly to proposition 13. That was the result of this type of scheme. Property owners are encouraged to keep their homes highly mortgaged, not to pay off existing mortgages, but to remortgage because of these deductions. This is the type of thing which occurred.

The structure of this country supports property owners and property taxes. For example, in my area taxpayers pay approximately $800 or $1,000 a year, as opposed to the $5,000 or $6,000 in California. Of course that $800 or $1,000 is not the total amount of money spent by the municipality. Close to 50 per cent of the money for education in that municipality comes from the provinces. In turn, a lot of that money is transferred from the federal government to the provinces. In a sense we have already a built-in exemption within the federal income tax which is transferred to the provinces for welfare, education, and various purposes not specified. Then it is transferred to the municipalities. This is not the case to any great extent in the United States.

One has to understand these factors, and when you start playing around with the taxation system, making major changes out of the blue a few weeks before a by-election, and when you talk about that kind of change, then you are talking about changing the whole structure we have built up in Canada. I do not say the structure should remain forever written in stone. The point of the matter is that changing the tax structure is an intricate thing and you do not just pick one little thing out of the hat and say we will do that. We all know that when we take this one small step we are obviously creating all kinds of inequities in terms of those people who now fully own their homes and in terms of those people who rent, and so on. We have to look after those people, and then we start to change the whole tax system.

I do not want to spend much more time on this, but I have dealt with it at some length because in the new economics, and the new kind of thinking that must obtain, there is no room in the future for these kinds of half-baked schemes, of picking something out of the hat, dropping it in and saying we will solve all our problems in this way. In no way do I impute any motive. Rather, I am saying this is the result of not understanding the situation. When a political party picks up something like this and says, "This is how we are going to run the next government," then I do not think that party really has an understanding of what is happening and should not have the right to govern, or that it will really be able to govern under the circumstances.

I really decry partisanship in respect of this kind of thing. When we start looking at the kind of world we are moving toward, the kind of world about which the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge talked, the kind of thing about which I have spoken many times, and about which the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has spoken, we must do some new economic thinking about changes that will fit into this new structure. It may well be that a government will be formed by members on the other side at some time in the future. I would ask them, before moving into this kind of thing, to think about the kind of world we are living in, and to avoid coming up with schemes that are good but irrelevant to the times.

Let us talk about a new kind of economics in terms of changes that have occurred and the new approach that must be taken by all nations, Canada included. Let us talk about the fact that we have a massive and unique problem which no other country faces, but which creates all kinds of tensions in this country. I refer to the growth in the labour force. Let us talk about the real terms of this problem rather than giving these $2 billion answers to everything.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I listened with intense interest to the speech of the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McRae). He said during his remarks that the amount of unemployment in Canada has risen because of the degree to which jobs have increased.

Mr. McRae: No, I said the labour force.

Mr. Diefenbaker: When he was speaking I decided I would find out what previous ministers of finance had said in this connection. In 1969 the then minister of finance said that we really mean business, and the business was the degree of unemployment that had to be met. Then in February, 1973, the Hon. John Turner, who today represents hope eternal and survival for the Liberal party, said that the purpose of his budget was first and foremost to reduce unemployment. That was clear and definite. Then in the 1974 budget we find it stated that one thing that must be done is to restrain all government spending. Then within the last year on January 20, and I am sorry the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is not here today—he is a very busy man and I am not critical of the fact that he is not here—the minister said that he expected by the year end inflation would be down to 6 per cent. The hon. member for Fort William should certainly whisper a few of these ideas into the impenetrable depths of the cabinet mind today in this country.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: I was very much impressed by the speech of the hon. member for Churchill (Mr. Smith). He is an hon. member who is clear and definitive in the views he expresses. When it comes to Churchill, I have a particular interest in the area. My great grandparents spent part of the winter of 1812-13 in that area before they were driven out to York Factory, the Selkirk settlement of the day. They were driven out because they shot or killed too many partridges. They had their guns taken away—this was before gun legislation—and were driven out into the night.

The amendment moved by Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition is that we are of the opinion that the granting of this authority for massive borrowing in advance of any budget presentation is objectionable in principle. It has been proven today that what is stated therein is in accordance with the fact. The proof is in the degree of unemployment and the massive deficits, amounting to $13,000 million to $15,000 million, which exist in Canada.

On August 1 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came back from his Moroccan trip and made a speech, about which the cabinet knew nothing. His ministers had to listen to that speech on television to find out what he was going to do.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Turner): Order, please. It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock p.m. this day.

At one o'clock the House took recess.

● (1402)

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, at the time of the adjournment I was referring to certain quotations concerning inflation. I will refer to one or two others that I have. The Minister of Finance on January 20, 1977, said, "We expected by the year end that inflation will be down to 6 per cent." In 1978 the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) predicted that as a result of the controls that had been brought in he felt sure that inflation would be brought to 4 per cent. Another quotation from the Prime Minister on May 27, 1974, at Etobicoke, Ontario, says, "We are confident that we have a grip on the problem and will wrestle inflation to the ground." That has been quoted before, but apparently inflation wrestled him to the ground. A little later on in that same speech he is quoted as saying, "We are going to bring inflation under control, I pledge you that."

Those quotations are simply part and parcel of a trend through the years in which the Prime Minister has endeavoured to fool the people of Canada into believing that inflation could be controlled. I say this to you: I was prime minister for just less than six years, and the rate of inflation at its highest was 1.2 per cent, the lowest all over the world. We brought in the control of the valuation of money, and we fixed the dollar at 92.5 cents. In consequence this brought to Canada the greatest expansion of trade in its history up to that date.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: At that time the front bench Liberal party cried, oh, the lachrymose perversions they put on, "the most terrible thing" but they kept that control at 92.5 for seven years. This is indicative of the degree to which they endeavoured to deceive and succeeded, and at the same time carried on a policy which they had ridiculed.

I am not going to say any more about inflation because there are some other matters that I want to deal with specifically, except to say that with the rate of inflation at what it is today, the Prime Minister is looking around for a plan to conceal to what extent it has actually risen. He set up this board called CSIP, the study of inflation and productivity. They are going to change the manner of computation, for they say that too much importance is placed on certain things, food and the like. In the first issue of their magazine "The Monitor" they proposed this measure as a better, short run measure of inflationary prices and the success of government policy. This is an old trick. It is deception personified, because there is every indication that inflation will increase, but in order to pretend that it has not, a new system is set up, this CSIP system.

I said to myself, "In short, what do you think should be done?" It has taken me several hours to get this reply from the Bank of Canada, and instead of reading those massive figures, may I be permitted to place on Hansard the letter from the deputy chief of banking, delivered to me only a few moments ago, setting out in full the general monetary situation since 1968, during the period of the Prime Minister's administration. If I might have that permission?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will not go into the document, except to say that it shows that in this nation today, and in particular three years ago, and two years ago, there is and has been uncontrolled expansion of credit far beyond the requirements of our country. Over and over again this has been referred to, but without success.

I went into the bank the other day. I very seldom do this, so it was probably the first time in ten years. I wanted to find out what the monetary situation was, and I asked them to give me $10 in one dollar bills. I did not go into devaluation at all. What I received was then perfectly new printing press dollars. That is what we have in this nation today to a degree never before equalled; whenever they want any money, the printing press turns it out. There is one thing I might add that is of interest in that connection, and that is that in that department, as I am informed, they have four incinerators to burn used dollars, or dirty dollars that no longer should be passed in circulation.

Why does this government not do something to control the expansion of money? It is because it is easier to permit the expansion than it would be to act with courage and with determination. That is the suggestion I want to make today; that something along this line must be done. It will be hard to do it because people may resent it, but it is necessary. When you view the record of the Trudeau administration, it is one of spendthrift spending beyond anything before known in history, a $13 billion deficit this year. It will probably go up in the next year, while they are pretending that they believe in restraint.

In what way has the Prime Minister practised restraint? In that connection I point this out; that it costs $3 million to run his office today, whereas during my period of administration it cost $50,000 a year, and $75,000 during the administration of Mr. Pearson. During my period of administration we took over Harrington Lake, my late wife and I. The building was to be torn down, but we took it. The expenditures thereon totalled $50. Last year, as I understand it, the expenditure by this government in order to make it appropriate, fit for a sultan or a czar, amounted to approximately $85,000. I would like to ask the Prime Minister about that if he was here, but he never turns up when I am around.

● (1412)

We had to supply our own cars, Mr. Pearson and I. I think we got an allowance of $2,000 a year approximately. Nothing of that today. The Prime Minister has two $75,000 cars. They are bombproof.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Not bugproof.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: In addition to that—a swimming pool at 24 Sussex Drive which cost $200,000. It was given by well-meaning Canadian citizens—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —who desired to remain incognito. I do not know why, making a contribution like that which you can deduct from income tax. Why? Who were these people? We asked. Information was not given to us; it was refused; hidden, the way so much of the information that parliament is entitled to today is being hidden I suppose with the vast expenditures that are taking place. They talk about restraint. We have expenditures amounting this year to $2 billion or $3 billion additional, and yet the cornerstone of democracy in this country and in all democracies is the municipality.

Last spring the Minister of Finance told regional municipal government officials they could expect more grants in lieu of taxes this year. Now that plan has been scuttled. What does it mean? The total shortfall in this country today, that is, over what taxes should be on government properties and what is actually advanced, is $62 million a year, of which $33 million is in Ottawa. I do not know how they carry on, the city of Ottawa among other cities. It was said the government would expand that. It has now been turned down.

I live in Rockcliffe and the taxes today are at a point beyond which taxation can never possibly be successful. I suggest the first thing that should be done in order to help out the municipalities, and the taxpayers in the municipalities, is for that promise that the Minister of Finance made last spring to be carried out. Unless it is, municipalities will find themselves in bankruptcy.

Now then, where are we going? I am glad the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) is here because he has an answer to all of the questions. I have never seen him as affable as he was yesterday in all of the years that he has been here. He was the epitome of all the warm-hearted consideration of parliament that he so seldom evinces.

What are we going to get? I thought this House was called together for the purpose of providing opportunities for economic change and improvement in this country. Where is there anything of what the government has in mind today to cover inflation and unemployment? The hon. member for Fort William said,—I do not know whether the minister listened to him when he said it—"You know, we have the largest unemployment in Canada in all of the world. What is to be done?" Nothing. We are to have old age security—that is fine—and family allowances. It will not take long for one of those bills to pass. Then there is the health resources bill. Will the health resources bill help the economic condition of Canada today? Regarding conflict of interest legislation, I think the only interest the government has is in endeavouring to pretend that it is going to do something and then not do it. Because, after all, the Minister of Finance endeavoured to help municipalities out last year only to find his plan was turned down.

What are they going to do? They say, "Oh; wait, wait." That is the answer we got the other day, the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) and others, in connection with the strike on the Great Lakes.

Yesterday the Minister of Justice—he just beamed. "Oh" he said, "I won't deal with that because already negotiations are going on." It shocked his fine sensibility to think that anyone should say in advance what would be done unless a settlement came. Did he give that advice to the Prime Minister when he said to the posties, "If you go out, we will use the limit of the law"? Since when did that magnificent spirit of diffidence to face facts become the monopoly of this government?

I mention that, Mr. Speaker, because we had an event in Saskatchewan two days ago. I do not like to bring up horrible scenes of the kind. I do not know how the Minister of Justice was able to smile yesterday because the city of Saskatoon, I think they elected one Conservative and about six NDPs, and all the constituency represented by the minister pretty well turned NDP. But look, he smiles!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: The result placed Saskatchewan in the position where the Liberal party started with eleven members. "We were eleven and now we are none." Regina's six or seven seats went NDP, except for one.

The Minister of Justice looks as if he is going to ask a question. I am always ready for a question from intelligent wonders.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you know why it happened? Do you know why the Liberal party is as extinct as it is in Manitoba and in Alberta, and also approaching extinction in British Columbia? It is because of this government. No other reason.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Diefenbaker: James Fenimore Cooper wrote the "The Last of the Mohicans". Somebody will write today "The Last of the Liberals on the Prairies". And I warned the minister, and said with the deepest appreciation for everything he does and does not do—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —he will be back in university—

An hon. Member: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: —as soon as the election takes place.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: You say I overstate it. I always believe in quoting good authorities. Yesterday Senator Herb Sparrow—I think he was appointed by the Trudeau government—

Mr. Lang: No.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He wasn't. Oh, I got an answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He is pre-Trudeau.

Mr. Lang: That is right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He made a statement. I do not know whether the minister has had it but I think it ought to go on the record so that it will be clear. Senator Herb Sparrow said:

Prime Minister Trudeau should resign . . . Sparrow said in an interview he blames the policies of Trudeau and federal transport minister Otto Lang—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

An hon. Member: Shame!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Such bedfellows!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: He said the federal policies that are ruining this country are unemployment—is there anything in this plan the government placed before the country today, that we are going to do in the next two weeks, to halt the declining value of the Canadian dollar and irresponsible spending?

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

● (1422)

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Sparrow has worshipped at the feet of liberalism all his life. He has been in the Senate for ten years. That is what he said. I want to bring this to the attention of the minister, interested as he is in his own future. He then said:

This record will destroy the Liberals, said Sparrow who was president of the Saskatchewan Liberal party from 1964-68 and who has managed federal party efforts in Saskatchewan during at least one election.

I give the minister the opportunity of saying that Mr. Sparrow does not mean an end for the Liberal party, but that is the view today all over Canada.

Passing on from there for a moment, they say they are keeping expenditures down. All I ask is a record of the expenditures in the office of the Prime Minister, in his official home and country place in the ten years since he has been Prime Minister. They would be most revealing. I think of that fabulous expenditure at Mirabel. Mirabel cost $1½ billion.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I gather that the $1½ billion figure the right hon. gentleman is using has as its source the Toronto Sun.

Mr. Diefenbaker: No, I am using fact.

Mr. Lang: That is certainly the worst of all sources. It is a matter on record in this House, in answer to a question some time ago, that the cost at that time was $325 million, including the purchase of land and total new construction. I say that because I know the right hon. gentleman would like to dissociate himself from those who suggest that this spending, which they cite as $1½ billion, is biased toward one part of the country or another.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A little guilty conscience brought him up because, after all, in the province of Saskatchewan, occupying a very high position—

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, my point of order is what I take to be the imputation of motives when the right hon. gentleman refers to a guilty conscience. Let me just say this. I thought he would like to look at the facts, instead of a distortion of the facts with which I know he is much more comfortable.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He at least ascribes a conscience to me. I cannot do the same for him because he spent $750,000 for himself and his family to travel all over Canada and elsewhere on government planes. He spent $8,000 of the taxpayers' money to attend the Grey Cup game in Calgary.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege, a very serious one indeed.

Mr. Diefenbaker: This one is serious, is it? The last two were not.

Mr. Lang: The right hon. member says that perhaps the last two interventions were not serious. In one sense, they were not. Very often in this House error goes uncorrected. I thought it was important for me to correct the Mirabel figure. On my question of privilege—

Mr. Diefenbaker: The rules do not permit this kind of thing to take place, even by a person filling three portfolios but doing nothing.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The minister has a question of privilege. I would like to hear him.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I believe it is a very serious question of privilege. While ordinarily I can sit and receive all kinds of remarks and innuendo, I know that very often there is the danger the suggestion will be made that because I sat and said nothing I accepted what was said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am coming, in my question of privilege, to the reference by the right hon. member to an expenditure of $750,000 in connection with the use of aircraft. That figure, of course, is one which I supplied, although let it be known, if honesty—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang) may raise this question of privilege at a later date. Right now it is mostly a point of debate, one that is argumentative. He is arguing a point previously made by the right hon. member.

Mr. Lang: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Order!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. The right hon. member for Prince Albert.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): The Minister of Transport on a question of privilege.

Mr. Lang: I am now calling it a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I would like to return to the question of privilege. I do not think Your Honour has given me a chance to state my question of privilege. It is not a matter of debate because I sat here and heard direct imputation against me by the right hon. gentleman. I must, as a matter of my right in this House, come to this question of privilege.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On the same point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I have recognized the Minister of Transport on a question of privilege. If he will get to his question of privilege, I will listen to it.

Mr. Lang: My question of privilege is this—

Mr. Diefenbaker: It was a point of order a minute ago.

Mr. Lang: The suggestion by the right hon. member regarding the use of aircraft by myself and my family is an insinuation.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is the truth.

Mr. Lang: It is an allegation unbecoming of him and completely false in light of the fact that my very extensive use of aircraft is designed to allow me to carry out my duties.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lang: The right hon. member and his colleagues said he made an insinuation. He did have innuendo at the very least. I say to the right hon. member, do an honourable thing about it in terms of what he is alleging. If he is alleging wrongdoing in me, I say to the right hon. member that I have spent hundreds and hundreds of hours flying between different parts of this country as part of my duty to listen and talk to people. It is on government business I did that.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I listened carefully to what the Minister of Transport has said. The point he seeks to introduce is argumentative. I would ask that whoever addresses the House today should speak to the amendment presently before us.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The hon. gentleman says what he has done. He has referred to the Sun as if it were something very wrong that appeared there. In a recent issue it stated:

> Otto was completely unrepentent about his misuse of the taxpayers' planes. But what was the cheapest trick of all was the fact he made the poor Scottish nanny—whom he had been paying the princely sum of $50 a week to look after his seven children—pay half of the $279 ticket she needed to get back to Britain.

Mr. Lang: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. It is very difficult to keep order in the House when hon. members do not confine their remarks to the bill. I now have to recognize the Minister of Transport on a point of order.

Mr. Lang: More specifically, on a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker. The right hon. member might have checked those allegations in the Sun with me, because they happen to be false as well. The allegations in the Sun make me look bad by requiring a person working for me to pay her own fare home. The fact is we paid it, even though it was her legal obligation to do so. That too is false, and I would ask the right hon. member not to associate himself with those remarks in the Sun. That column happens to have nine specific errors in it.

● (1432)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I am sure all hon. members are interested in the discussion which is now going on, but I believe we should confine our remarks to the amendment.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is only because I have so high a regard for the hon. gentleman that I speak with such restraint. But I want to say this to him with regard to the problem which now faces this country, the strike on the Great Lakes. Yesterday he smiled benignly and said we should not be discussing that matter because at that very moment the parties were considering whether the strike should be continued and the outlook appeared very hopeful. He added that any discussion of the matter in the House might be unhelpful. He also said he realized the loss being suffered by Canada in consequence of the strike and told us that the Lake Carriers Association and the engineers union were getting together. I now ask him why it is, in so serious a situation, that instead of holding that meeting today or tomorrow or Sunday morning, it has been postponed until Sunday afternoon? Again it is a case of playing with this country, fooling the people, pretending to take action, while at the same time refusing to act. Why is not something done?

In connection with the postal strike, let me say I do not support anyone who breaks the law. But why was it that the Prime Minister warned that if the postal employees struck, the full force of the law would be used against them and that there would be a parliamentary declaration? Why was this strike declared a national emergency within 24 hours, while the last one was allowed to go on for seven weeks? It was simply because of a desire on the part of the government to pretend it was going to act and to act firmly because of the impending date of an election.

I could go on indefinitely to cite examples of waste and extravagance unparalleled in the history of our country. Since the hon. gentleman is rising on points of order, I should like him to answer the following question. More than $125 million was spent on the sale of nuclear reactors. Some $20 million in fees was paid to mysterious agents. Who were these agents? Why was $20 million of taxpayers money handed out to them? The government has refused to give an answer. Who are these agents? We endeavour to get the facts but they are concealed from parliament because the government declines to answer. Consider its duplicity in pretending allegiance to the Crown while at the same time denying the Queen all her powers. It is no wonder the people have lost faith in this government to an extent not seen in many, many years, and all I would suggest is this: the earlier an election comes, the earlier there will be a possibility of salvation for Canada.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Stuart Leggatt (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I listened with great interest to some of the remarks made concerning this legislation. It seems to me that those who argue that the reason we are borrowing an additional $7 billion is because of waste in government spending, simply do not know what they are talking about and haven't examined any of the fiscal accounts of the Government of Canada.

There is no question the government is in a bind, there is no question that it does not have much choice but to borrow $7 billion, but to say at one side of one's mouth that you can't borrow the $7 billion, and out of the other side, "We are going to allow mortgage deductibility in respect of home ownership and further reduce revenues to the treasury by a major amount", makes no sense whatsoever. There has to be some kind of balance when we consider this question of government waste and government spending.

We have had the experience of the forces of Proposition 13 from California coming into British Columbia and selling the idea that, with a referendum, a simple proposition can be put that says you can cut 20 per cent or 30 per cent of your budget, and still run an efficient and good government. That is a siren song being played in the west and it will probably be played throughout the country. It is the most dangerous kind of proposition I have seen since I became serious about politics.

Just note what has happened. In the city of Berkley, for example, they have shut down their libraries, and they do not have recreational programs.

There is no doubt that we can be more efficient in government. There is no doubt that we can cut a great deal of the fat out of government, but examine the accounts; if you want to start saving money, consider first where you are spending it. The biggest part of the government accounts has to do with health and welfare, child and family allowances, and old age pensions. Yet there is no political party in this House with the courage to get up and say: let us really save money, let us cut $10 from the old age pension. This party would certainly never propose such a thing.

The idea is getting about that somehow or other government spending is bad and private spending is good, that if you build another hamburger stand on the block, that is a wise investment, but if you build a library for your community you are wasting money. That is Milton Friedmanism taken to its logical conclusion. That is the kind of philosophy that is being espoused throughout this country, and it is time the people of Canada took a serious look at the impact of that kind of philosophy in terms of the civilization we have been able to achieve in Canada, one which implies a reasonable balance between public and private spending.

My party will, I suspect, vote against this bill because we believe that it is wrong to continue forever with deficit financing. In this particular year we can see a need for additional borrowing, but somewhere along the line we will have to remind ourselves again about what Lord Keynes had to say about budgeting. He still believed that in the long run you had to pay the price. I must say that as a democratic socialist I have just as much objection to deficit budgeting as any right wing Tory. I say to my friends on my left in the Social Credit party that one part of their philosophy that I have always been able to understand—perhaps the only one—is the virtue of balanced budgeting and the virtue of not having a continuing deficit in the accounts.

We cannot continue to put ourselves in the hands of foreign investors and foreign moneylenders, and as long as we continue to run these kinds of deficits, our capacity for social progress and for flexibility goes down the tubes.

The reality here is that when we have a $11 billion, $12 billion or $13 billion deficit, we can talk all we want about the changes we want to effect in society, but our hands are tied. The hands of this government are tied. If the people of Canada decide to have a Conservative government, the hands of that government will be tied. The hands of a New Democratic Party government would also be tied, because with that kind of deficit there is no room to manoeuvre. There is very little room in which to manoeuvre. Therefore, surely it is in the interests of everyone in this country that we examine the idea of cyclical budgeting rather than having constant deficit financing of $11 billion to $15 billion a year.

The last government in British Columbia, the government of the provincial New Democratic Party, was defeated to a large extent because one of its ministers went $100 million over in his budget. He miscalculated the extent to which a new pharmacare program, which the New Democratic Party had introduced, was needed, and he was $100 million out.

People screamed "fiscal irresponsibility". They said, "You socialists can't run a peanut stand", but they elected a good number of government members in the next federal election when the country was running an $11 billion deficit. The government buried $100 million in the ground at Pickering. No one will ever see that money again. The government squandered millions of dollars on the Mirabel airport.

It becomes a question of trying to understand the difference between a million and a billion. Many people do not quite understand the difference in the amounts, but we cannot continue to operate government irrationally, and we cannot continue to provide the services the public demands. It is not just this party which demands additions to welfare, additions to pensions, and further government interference in the area of welfare. That has generally been popular and will continue to be popular. However, with this kind of deficit financing, the hands of any government will be tied when it tries to improve that particular feature.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

One of the reasons for this bill is the fact that we are now wasting as much as $1 million a day abroad to buttress the value of the Canadian dollar. I have seen figures ranging from $750,000 to $1 million a day. Surely that is the most monumental waste of all. People can talk all they like about civil servants who have not been earning their salaries, allegedly, etc., but that $1 million a day is a phenomenal waste.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Horner) tells us that our trade picture is improving and that in fact we in this country are getting out from under, but the reality is that we are continuing to go in the wrong direction. It is not the trade picture which is causing the Canadian dollar to fall and fall. In 1977 we had a surplus on the merchandise trade account of something close to $3 billion, but when we look at our service transactions and examine what we have paid in travel, interest, dividends, freight, shipping and other areas, the key figure lies in what we are paying out to those who have lent money to Canada both privately and publicly. That figure is just about $3.5 billion a year, and it is a drain on the resources of this country.

The trend I have seen in this House is that foreign ownership is no longer an issue and that we are so desperate for capital that we do not need to review foreign investment seriously. We have the Foreign Investment Review Agency, and we have a minister who really is acting like a fox among the chickens.

There is no question that our free trader Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce has no real interest in controlling foreign investment or directing it only to those areas which are in desperate need. A classic example in my own province is what happened in the fishing industry.

As a result of negotiations at the Law of the Sea Conference—and I might say that the Canadian delegation played a vital and constructive role in them—we have expanded our sea boundaries out to 200 miles. The result, however, is that Japan is the big loser. The Japanese desperately need fishing markets where they can get fish to continue to supply the massive Japanese fish market. Therefore they have placed capital on the market in that industry which is more advantageous to us than capital we can get anywhere else. They have said that they want a piece of our fishing action so that they can be guaranteed access to that resource. I have every sympathy for Japan in doing that, but I have no sympathy for a government which does not understand what Japan is trying to accomplish. This means that jobs are going to Japan. It means that we do not process our fish here, and it also means that the price of that product can be artificially depressed where purchase agreements are tied to loans to the Canadian fishing industry.

Because of a lack of imagination on the part of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce we are allowing foreign capital to come into our fishing industry without restriction or review. As a matter of fact, it is not reviewable because it is loan capital. It is not take-over capital, and it is not establishing new industry. We do not have legislation to control it. A government with imagination would not allow this to happen but, rather than taking the draconian move of saying we will not allow capital—and clearly the fishing industry needs capital—we should be saying that we will offer Canadian capital at better rates than the Japanese are offering it.

We should go to that market and say that if it needs capital it must get Canadian capital and that it will get Canadian capital at better than competitive rates. That is only one example of what could be done if we had a government with an industrial strategy. This government has none. It continues to operate on a day to day basis, and it looks like that day to day operation will be coming to an end in the near future. That might not be a bad thing.

It might be a good thing to have a change of government, whether it be a change to a Conservative government or to a New Democratic Party government. I think a change may be necessary to get the spirit of this country going again, because there has been an atmosphere of tiredness for a long time in terms of the way our affairs have been conducted.

We talk a lot about economic conditions in Canada. We hear much rhetoric in this place and in politics generally to the effect that everything which happens in the country is the direct result of whatever government may happen to be in power. While the New Democratic Party was in office in British Columbia between 1974 and 1975 there was a total of 100 bankruptcies. The following year there was a total of 197. In the following year there was a change of government. The new government said that the New Democratic Party had been scaring foreign capital away, that it was far too tough on the business community and that it was in fact antagonistic to the business community. In the first year of office of the new government the number of bankruptcies rose to 421, and in 1977-78 the number rose to 674. In the first five months of this year there were 281 bankruptcies.

I am not saying that that is the fault of the provincial government nor the fault of the federal government, and I am not saying that there were no bankruptcies or very few in British Columbia when there was a socialist government, or because there was a socialist government. These things occur from time to time in the cyclical economy we have, and people who are engaged in the field of politics have great difficulty restraining their rhetoric. Blame is always cast as if all the evils of the world sit right at the government's door, and it is said that the new Jerusalem will come when we change governments. That is not going to happen. We are faced with certain realities, and no matter which government we have, that government will have to embrace the concept that in the world of the future there will be less to distribute.

Now, I happen to think that the NDP, or democratic socialism, is the best vehicle to have as a government when a crisis exists and when one has to consider the possibility of future scarcity in the world, it is only the NDP, with its principle of equality in sharing, which can hold the political fabric together. Because in the long run, over the years, we have developed a welfare state in Canada, and we have always congratulated ourselves around the world that somehow we are very fine people because we have been redistributing wealth and we have been creating old age pensions, unemployment insurance, and the various other social programs. The reality is that the people of Canada have given nothing to those particular projects, nor have the governments.

What has happened is that our economy has expanded and we have taken the additional wealth we have created and redistributed a little bit of it. But no one else has said, "I am taking less". People out there have said, "We want more, more and more". All I am saying, Mr. Speaker, is that the day will come when we will not be able to do that any more, when someone will have to make a sacrifice, when the spirit that was abroad in this country in the second world war will have to come back, and when we will be willing to give and to sacrifice.

The reality is that in the last ten years the poor section of the population has retained approximately the same percentage of the GNP, about 4 per cent, and the rich, the top 10 per cent, have retained something in the order of 20 per cent of the wealth. There has been no redistribution of wealth, and we have created our social programs out of the expansion of the pie. The proposition is that, if that pie stops expanding, we will have serious trouble in this country because someone will have to give up something, and that has not been the case up to now. There has been enough to distribute and, I suggest, only the philosophy of democratic socialism can contemplate that particular crisis which we might have in the future.

Now, what is the immediate solution to the question of the dollar? The idea that we should continue to allow the natural flow of capital to take place between Canada and the rest of the world is a disastrous mistake in terms of the dollar. Unless the government has the courage to impose some kind of exchange controls, problems that we have seen in such places as Sudbury, problems that we have seen where it is far more advantageous to invest in the resource sector of the third world, will continue to exist. We cannot allow the drain of Canadian capital to continue.

I am not suggesting that exchange controls need to be applied on small amounts of money leaving this country, but let us take a figure in the area of, say, $75,000. You might then say that the Parliament of Canada believes that you should keep your money in Canada, that Canada is still a capital shy country but it is particularly capital shy in terms of Canadian capital. If we do not impose some exchange controls, the dollar will continue to be soft at 84 cents or 85 cents—it could even go lower.

I do not suspect that this particular bill will do much for the Canadian dollar. I suppose that the people who look at money in the city of New York are looking at this piece of legislation to borrow another $7 billion abroad wondering what will happen to the Canadian dollar after it is passed. Exchange controls are the immediate answer to two major problems: the first is the softness in the Canadian dollar; and the second, and perhaps the most important one, is that the multinationals which have come to Canada, which have reaped the benefits of our resources, which have made some contribution to this society, but which have developed their capital on the ingenuity, education and work of Canadians and then decided to take that capital abroad, are not good corporate citizens.

What we do with bad citizens is to pass laws to place some kind of control on them, and until we take courage in our hands and impose exchange controls on the capital flows of multinational corporations, Sudbury will just be the beginning of a massive problem all across our resource sector. As a matter of fact I do not think that companies like Cominco and some of our pulp and paper giants would be unsympathetic to a temporary exchange control once the total problem was explained to them, and once they understood the difficult situation in which this country has now been placed as a result of the movement of the capital that has accumulated in this country.

There is too often a simplicity in the debate in this place. All too often unnecessary cheap shots and slanging matches between members of parliament take place here, and I want to tell you that the public does not appreciate that at all. I think they are tired of the stupidity of debate in this place, they are tired of personalities jumping up and throwing jibes at each other. I do not think that kind of conduct enhances this place or enhances the reputation of politics or politicians. It is time we in the House ended the personality conflicts and got down to talking about issues, instead of, "What did you do at some time in the past", etc., etc.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Leggatt: When I speak to members of the public I find, I must say, a feeling that we have lowered the level of rhetoric in debates to nonsense, and they recognize nonsense. The average voter out there knows games when he sees them being played. Let us get back to talking about issues; let us not talk about personalities. Thank you, Mr. Speaker, that is all I have to say.

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I had not really intended at this time to rise again in this debate, but I believe we are now debating the amendment rather than the main motion.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order. As I recollect the order of speakers, the last time the matter was before the House the amendment was put by the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), and it was following the putting of the amendment by the hon. member for York-Simcoe that the hon. member for Scarborough West (Mr. Martin) spoke. The question is now on the amendment, and I do not think he has the right to speak now, although when the amendment is disposed of he may speak on the main motion, of course.

Mr. McIsaac: Mr. Speaker, on the same point of order, may I say that the opposition House leader surely realizes that the amendment was being considered by the Chair at the time and was not formally put until later on in the evening. Surely that is a fact.

[Mr. Leggatt.]

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to speak on the point raised by the government whip. I hope that the decision of the Chair will be that it is not only when Mr. Speaker gave his ruling that the debate started on the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe. The debate was started at the time when the amendment was put. I think that would be the normal way in which one would deal with the matter. Anything else would be a travesty of the rules of the House of Commons. The rules are quite clear that a member can speak only once in each stage of the debate, and the stage of debate at the moment is consideration of the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, the principles outlined by the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) are excellent. This is very easy since he quotes from the standing orders, but his interpretation is wrong.

Yesterday evening at six o'clock, the Speaker of the House called the motion for the first time and the hon. member who had the floor spoke before six o'clock and talked about the main motion at the second reading stage. Therefore, the time between the moment when you reserved your decision concerning the amendment moved by the hon. member for York-Simcoe and the moment when you gave your ruling did not constitute a debate on the amendment as such, but rather on the main motion. It is only at six o'clock yesterday evening that the Speaker of the House put the motion in front of the House. In view of the circumstances, it is therefore obvious that the amendment could not be debated before the motion was put to the House, which was done only at six o'clock yesterday evening, and the hon. member did not speak before that time. I therefore submit that he is quite entitled to speak at this time, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): I have no precedent to guide me in this particular instance. I read the amendment when it was moved and I asked whether I might take it under consideration and rule on it later on. It is very difficult to determine whether the hon. member was speaking about the amendment or the bill. I therefore ask all hon. members for their guidance on this point. If there is unanimous consent to allow the hon. member to speak on the amendment and to consider that when he spoke previously, it was only about the bill, this would be acceptable, but I could not recognize the hon. member at this time without consulting further the precedents that may exist if there were not unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

[English]

Hon. Marcel Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, this question is very simple in that it is a determination of an amendment put by an hon. member. The Chair seeks the indulgence of the House on the question of a decision. In fact, hon. members of the House could insist upon Mr. Speaker rendering his decision at that time, as well as giving his reasons for that decision. It is in the spirit of accommodation that the Chair is provided with an opportunity to put together a reasoned judgment, because some amendments present difficulty.

For the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) and others to argue that the division of speakers shall start from the time Mr. Speaker renders his judgment is quite wrong. In the past I have put amendments or raised points of order in debate where Mr. Speaker has taken two or three days to render his decision because the matters were rather difficult. It was readily understood that there was no prejudice, and that, whatever the decision may be, it is dated back to the point at which the amendment or the point of order was put forward.

As the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) said, to do otherwise would be a most invidious position in which to put the Chair, because one could quite unfairly accuse the Chair of guiding the nature of the debate by merely withholding judgment on a point of order or an amendment. That is not acceptable. Because of the experience I have had in the Chair and otherwise, it is clear in my mind that the amendment dates from the point it is put forward by the proposer and the seconder, and not from the date of the judgment given by the Chair on a complex question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in the points raised by the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Lambert), particularly in his noting that when there is a difficult question which needs to be decided, argued about and considered at length, then usually the House makes a sensible arrangement and continues debate. That could apply in this case because there is an interesting point involved here which perhaps was not argued before. It may deserve further argument, and therefore, it might make sense on the one hand to let the hon. parliamentary secretary speak, knowing that would be his second time on the motion and amendment.

When a decision is reserved on an amendment and speaking continues, clearly one of the possible results is that the amendment may be ruled out of order at the conclusion of Mr. Speaker's deliberation. Then it is difficult to say that the member was speaking on the amendment. Obviously the government would put up speakers dealing with the main motion in this case and not with the amendment, if there is a possibility that the amendment will be ruled out of order. In that event, the words and comments become completely meaningless in the context of the real debate.

I recognize that I am arguing a question which perhaps Mr. Speaker wants to reserve upon in terms of a formal decision. I know that the Chair said the same spirit of co-operation which allows for debate to continue, while that issue is being decided in regard to motions, can lead the House to resolve the matter amicably this afternoon without prejudging the question whether the House might hear this afternoon from the parliamentary secretary.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Ethier): Order, please. I recall what happened. After I read the amendment of the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), I said that I would reserve judgment. Also I recall recognizing the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman) on the bill. Therefore, I recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Martin) at this time.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Alan Martin (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to a take a great deal of the time of the House in speaking on the amendment. Yesterday when I had an opportunity to speak on the main motion, I put before the House certain statistics which I felt were important in that they indicated how well Canada and Canadians were doing vis-à-vis a number of other countries. I did not select the countries with which to make the comparison. I used the same countries which were referred to by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. Clark) in his initial speech commencing debate on the Address in Reply to the Speech from the Throne. Yesterday the hon. member for York-Simcoe (Mr. Stevens), the financial critic for the opposition, identified the countries as being West Germany, the United States, Denmark, Sweden, Switzerland, and one or two other places and then I referred to the point originally raised by the hon. Leader of the Opposition, which was reiterated yesterday by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, that Canada was in seventh place in relation to these countries. They both indicated that Canadians were sitting on a tier which was seven points down in relation to some other western industrialized countries.

I raised the point yesterday that that was completely incorrect. I referred to statistics of four and five years ago, statistics regarding increases in food prices, employment records, creation of new jobs, housing starts and a number of other areas. Also I pointed out that Canada was in second place in most of these cases, and that some of the countries mentioned by the hon. member for York-Simcoe as being in a far better position than Canada were in fact as low down as fourteenth, fifteenth, or in a number of cases, eighth, ninth or tenth place as compared to this country. I made that point yesterday and I might come back to a few more of these statistics this afternoon.

I should like at this time to come back to a quote that was said to come from the hon. member for York-Simcoe, the financial critic for the opposition, on a commentary on the radio this morning, in which the inference was left, with me at least as an early morning listener of early news broadcast, I think it was at seven o'clock, that Canadians were building for themselves debt upon debt which they are going to have a great deal of trouble paying back. I think that was the context of his remarks; at least, that was the inference I gained from the point made by the newscaster.

I believe the hon. member was comparing our situation with that of the United States. That is probably a reasonable comparison in view of the fact that we do compare so much of what we do in this country with what is done in the United States. The U.S. is our best customer and is where 70 per cent of our exports go and, contrary to what former President Nixon thought, we all know Canada is in turn its best customer. I think he thought at one time that Japan was, but that impression was soon corrected. We are, indeed, each other's best customer, so I think a reasonable comparison would be the long-term debt outstanding of the two countries.

The comparison I want to make is in terms of the borrowings outstanding by the two countries; that is, by the central governments in Washington and Ottawa. This is again in relation to gross national product. In other words, these are percentages of gross national product. I will go first to the period from 1960 to 1969 in order that we get a little bit of the history of a period during which, at least for a few years, this country was governed by that party on the other side of the House one of the few periods in this century when they have had the opportunity of being the government.

The figure for the United States during that period is 39.2 per cent. That is the percentage of the U.S. gross national product, for a given year, that is represented by their total outstanding debt. That figure has come down over the years in the United States, from 1960 to 1969 to the year 1977. The United States has improved the situation to the point that this figure now stands at only 29.9 per cent of the gross national product, represented by total outstanding debt. That is the long-term debt owed by the central government, and indirectly owed by every resident of the U.S.A. Those are the American figures.

The Canadian figures are amazingly close for the period 1960 to 1969, in fact varying by one-tenth of 1 per cent. In that period the central government debt in Canada, which is the federal government debt, was 39.3 per cent of our gross national product, as against the United States figure of 39.2 per cent. As I say, with one-tenth of 1 per cent variation, basically the two are identical.

We move to 1977. I mentioned earlier that the United States seemed to have improved its situation in that the total long-term debt outstanding decreased as a percentage of gross national product. I think the variation in the United States was some 12 percentage points. The same thing happened in Canada. This is not going to be happy news for members of the opposition, because again it is a little bit of good financial news. Happy news for members of the opposition is that kind of news the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker), a former prime minister, quoted from the Toronto Sun, making some imputation regarding certain legitimate costs incurred by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Lang), and making other imputations about a particular airport costing five times what the Minister of Transport indicated were the actual costs. These are good figures and that is why we do not hear very much about them, unfortunately.

The figure has come down from 39.3 per cent for the period 1960-69 to 27.4 per cent for 1977. I mentioned earlier that the United States had brought its figure down to 29.9 per cent, whereas ours is 27.4 per cent. That is a considerably better performance than occurred in the United States.

In other words, 27.4 per cent of our gross national product today is the figure that is represented by our total central government outstanding debt. In comparison, the U.S. figure is 29.9 per cent. In other words, Canadians do not owe as much as Americans in terms of our total outstanding central government debt in relation to gross national product, which is the product of all our goods and services produced in any one year.

This is a far cry from the hon. member's insinuation. Indeed, it is more than an insinuation; it is in fact a direct comment broadcast on our national news service to all Canadians as they got up for breakfast this morning, and emanated from the speech made by the financial critic and senior financial spokesman of the opposition party in this House yesterday, in probably his first major speech this session on a financial bill. I am sure we will be hearing from that hon. member and perhaps other financial experts who may be on the scene on the other side at different times during this year. I would only ask them, if they do expect to go to the Canadian people when we have a general election—and I assume they will be out there plodding the streets—to campaign in an honest and straightforward way by giving the people the facts of the situation, rather than trying to play a sort of shell game, showing people statistics that simply do not bear up under close examination. I indicated yesterday that in my view, at the next general election, perhaps within the next six months, the Canadian public simply will not buy that kind of attitude from a party that has held itself out as a legitimate alternative to the government now in power.

An hon. Member: Check the polls.

Mr. Martin: These statements will be much more closely examined, and I am sure over the course of the winter and the spring the polls will reflect this view. The people will be looking more closely at statements made by senior spokesmen for the Conservative opposition on financial matters. I hope members on this side of the House and all Canadians will examine these figures carefully rather than accept them at first hand as being factual.

An hon. Member: They sure as blazes will look at yours.

Mr. Martin: That is fair enough. The hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Ellis) says they are not going to accept our figures. Perhaps not, but the sources of our figures are very clear and are supportable. It seems to me that Canadians should look at all facts and figures put before them. I hope they will and that they will ask questions. I hope when proposals are being made, such as those propounded by the official opposition during the recent by-election campaign, the public will ask questions and get more concrete answers than those given by the Leader of the Opposition the other week on television. I hope that, indeed, there will be some clarification of those answers which will indicate clearly to the people that when a very large tax deduction is put forward as a major incentive to persuade people to support a party, that hand-out is going to cost the government a lot of money.

I hope these clarifications will be similar to these put forward by the provincial treasurer of the Conservative party of Ontario. Every time you reduce the tax revenue coming into Ottawa you do indeed reduce substantially payments transferred to the provinces. The provincial treasurer in Ontario was sensible enough to realize this point and made a very quick rebuttal when the Leader of the Opposition first announced his particular policy.

• (1522)

Mr. Stevens: What did he say?

Mr. Beatty: Did he say whether he supported the policy or not?

Mr. Martin: The other point I would like to make during my second intervention in this debate, since we have an amendment put forward by the hon. member for York-Simcoe, is in regard to the reference made earlier by the right hon. member for Prince Albert who indicated that perhaps our banking policies, our government policies and general fiscal policies were resulting in the printing of far too many dollars at a rather outrageous rate.

Our government recently floated a major U.S. bond issue in the amount of $750 million, one of the larger issues of all time and which has had absolutely no problem finding its way into the market. This is always a good indicator of how strong the economy really is; it is usually easier to borrow money if you are in sound and stable shape financially.

Mr. Stevens: And pay a high interest rate.

Mr. Martin: Indeed, this particular issue has run into no problem at all. The prospectus that went with this issue contains a rather significant comment which was made by the syndicate that was responsible for selling the issue. I assume that it was inserted in there because it is factual and also because they felt that it would be a plus to show prospective investors who would be buying pieces of the bond issue. It refers to the fact that in recent years Canadian monetary policy has primarily been directed toward achieving a gradual and continuing decline in the trend rate of growth of the money supply, defined as the public holdings of currency and the chartered bank's demand deposits, otherwise known as the Ml figure, a definition which includes only forms of money used as a means of payment. The aim was mentioned in this same extract, which was to guide monetary expansion along the path conducive to the gradual return of the Canadian economy to satisfactory levels of activity without inflation.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, no member of this House can tolerate this type of misrepresentation. The hon. parliamentary secretary knows perfectly well that the prospectus he is referring to is the government's prospectus, not the syndicate's prospectus. It is the government's representation to those who would be buying the issue as to what is the state of affairs in Canada. I think the parliamentary secretary ought to clarify that.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. There are remarks that the hon. member should make by participating in the debate afterwards.

Mr. Stevens: I cannot participate.

Mr. Blais: Sure you can.

Mr. Martin: I had assumed that they were comments that were put together, presumably, to aid prospective buyers to understand something about the issue and the organization from which they will be buying the bonds. I assume that it was put in because it is positive news and it is factual. The point I am trying to make is that it seems to go a long way from arguments advanced by the right hon. gentleman from Prince Albert, that, indeed Canadians appear to be running along some reckless road where new money was constantly being printed, a kind of insinuation which I think, in fairness to the hon. member for York-Simcoe, is dropped into various media channels where it might do some good by the official finance critic for the opposition and his colleagues. So, I think that the point is well made.

I really do not want to take up any more time of the House at this time.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Martin: However, it is important for members on this side continually to do their utmost to bring before the Canadian public, wherever justified and supported by facts, objections to the kind of insinuations and loose comments that are self-serving for members of the opposition and, indeed, make news because they help feed the kind of headlines that sell papers. All this information is thrown into a big hopper and comes out the other end to the ordinary Canadian who is led to believe that things are not right on the government side and he should perhaps try the fellows on the other side, the same point I made yesterday.

I would only hope that as we move closer toward the period of a general election and the time when the mettle of members on both sides of the House will be more properly tested, which was not the case in the 15 by-elections, last Monday when people knew full well that the winners would have no chance of affecting the over-all direction of the country. I do hope members of the opposition will do their utmost to be responsible as they present points of view and facts that they may put before the voting public, so that the public may make a fair assessment of the situation and not be misguided by the presentation of inaccurate figures and loose comments.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Filibuster, filibuster.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): It seems to me, listening to the jeers coming from the other side of the House, that hon. members opposite are very unhappy when facts are being put on the record. We, of course, are expected to sit here and listen to the diatribe which they hurl across the floor.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, just before the member on the other side launches into a speech that will stop the vote on our amendment this afternoon, may I raise a point of order? It is with regard to your colleague in the chair and the ruling that he made. I would like to reserve, if at all possible, the opportunity at some time—and I will speak to the Chair, my colleagues and other House leaders with respect to the appropriate time—to discuss the question of the appropriateness of a ruling such as the one that was made, so that we may settle once and for all what the appropriate language is for the official record of the House of Commons, as well as other questions which allowed the member who has just taken his seat to repeat a speech he made yesterday for the purpose of stringing out this debate, rather than coming to the point and having a vote on the amendment to the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I find the intervention of my colleague very strange. We do not have the right to appeal a decision of the Speaker. The decision is very clear, very simple. We know that an hon. member may not speak twice to a question, under Standing Order 37(1). Now, the Speaker put the motion for amendment only at six o'clock last night, after which the hon. member spoke.

The matter was settled. The ruling was given and the comments of the hon. member cast doubts on the wise and learned ruling given by the hon. member who preceded you in the chair, Mr. Speaker.

Under the circumstances, I deplore the fact that an attempt is being made to discredit a decision of the Chair, decision that was very soundly based as far as facts and our standing orders are concerned.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I do not wish to get involved in a decision that has already been taken by the Chair. The hon. member gave me the impression that he wanted to raise a general question, and it is his privilege to do that. I am not prepared to pass judgment on a decision that I think should not be questioned, but if there is a general matter as to the proceedings of the House, he can do that at any time, either when Mr. Speaker is in the chair, myself or somebody else. I am sure it has no reflection at all on the previous decision, and surely it did not prevent the hon. parliamentary secretary from addressing the House.

• (1532)

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, the crybabies on the other side seem to want to have a field day with the ruling made by the Chair. They do not seem to want to give to members on this side the right to speak in debate. I find that somewhat difficult to accept from those who are constantly holding themselves up to be the defenders of the rights of parliament. It is an absolute sham.

An hon. Member: Shame.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): In introducing Bill C-7 the minister set forth very clearly the purposes of the bill. From listening to the debate one would think there was something insidious about this bill. In fact there is not. It is a very routine bill. It is the type of bill put before the House of Commons quite frequently which quite often passes without a great deal of difficulty or long debate.

At this particular time the official opposition sees some advantage in making a political football out of this bill. We have listened to all kinds of red herrings in this debate. No one in this House can do that more capably than the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker). In listening to him today he took us all the way from the time of his great-grandparents to the present. He brought in the old red herring which the Tories are using more and more nowadays and which some of their candidates used in the by-elections. As well, some Tory premiers and Tory hopefuls are using this same red herring in provincial elections. It is the so-called issued of the removal of the powers from the Queen. If they do not know it, that is an absolute fabrication and they should stop using it because it is damaging not only to the Queen but to the country.

It has been clearly stated in the government bill introduced for the purposes of discussion and creating interest in the issue of constitutional reform that the government does not intend now, did not intend in the past nor does intend in the future, to remove or lessen the powers of the Queen.

Ever since 1215 the power of the British monarchy has steadily and progressively diminished, until today we have a parliamentary democracy in which there is very little power given to the monarchy. However, there are some potent prerogatives which our present Queen is free to exercise and which have not been removed or diminished by this government, nor will they be. As a result I find it offensive that the official opposition tries to mislead the public by bringing in that kind of argument in discussing bills which are totally unrelated to the situation. I am not trying to claim that the government should not be subject to criticism from the opposition; obviously that is the role of the opposition. But it would be refreshing if at least once in a while there was some constructive criticism coming from the other side, particularly the official opposition.

On the other hand, I must compliment the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt). The speech he made this afternoon was constructive. It was not designed to destroy but to criticize in a constructive way. I say that whether or not members agree with what the hon. member said, but his remarks were made in a positive manner.

I am also concerned with the charges and counter-charges made in this House and the effect they will have on our nation in the days and years ahead. We are living in a time when there are those who doubt very seriously the future of our country as a unified nation consisting of two founding races and many other ethnic groups. I wonder what purpose is being served in continually trying to downgrade our country by saying that everything is bad. If one listens to the official opposition everything is worse than it has ever been, and that it is worse in Canada than it is in almost any other country. Everything is put in the negative superlative in order to try to score some political points. In my opinion that will not serve the interests of our nation.

We have heard a lot of figures which have been bandied about across the floor in the last few days on the relative standing of Canada vis-à-vis other nations of the world. Peculiar uses have been made of these figures in trying to show that Canada is just on the verge of bankruptcy. As well these figures have been used to try to show that the citizens of Canada are suffering irreparable economic harm, and that that economic harm is increasing day by day. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that that is not true.

I ask the opposition, how many of them would prefer to live in one of the countries that they are holding up as examples to us? How many of them would prefer to live in one of those countries rather than in Canada? How many of them would prefer to buy their groceries in West Germany rather than in Canada? How many of them would prefer to buy their petroleum in Great Britain rather than in Canada? How many of them would prefer to buy their clothing in any of the countries making up the European Common Market? In other words, how many of them would like to take the income of people in any of the other industrialized nations of the world and have to support themselves in those nations? How many of them would honestly say they would prefer that and that they would be better off than they are living in Canada? I do not hear any answers.

The bill before the House requests authority to borrow. As I said, it is not an unusual bill. It specifically requests authority to borrow $7 billion for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1979, and borrowing authority to a total of $10 billion for the fiscal year 1979-1980. That, of course, does not mean all of that money will necessarily be borrowed, but it means the authority has been given by parliament to the government to borrow those sums if it becomes necessary.

We have already been told that the cash requirements for 1977-1978 were $8.3 billion and the cash requirements for 1978-79 will be $11.8 billion. That is a total of $20.1 billion for two years plus U.S. exchange loans of $750 million and other borrowings of 1.5 million Deutschmarks. It is conceivable that other lines of credit will have to be arranged or other borrowings made in order to ensure that the position of the Canadian dollar vis-à-vis the U.S. dollar is one which is in the best interest of Canada and her trading partners.

This is not an unusual bill. I am therefore surprised that the opposition is trying to make a political football of it. I simply want to put on record today my view that, despite the political atmosphere in the country at the moment, it behooves us all to speak with care and attention when dealing with the economy of our nation. I do not think it serves the purpose of our government, the opposition nor our nation to continue to try and score political points at the expense of our nation's economy.

[Translation]

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, first of all I welcome this opportunity to address the House because it is not often I can speak on the economy, although I am neatly interested in such matters because they have a fundamental bearing on our country's existence. I was given responsibilities in other areas although I feel those are of primary importance and I give them much of my time. Because of my departmental responsibilities, I also have an opportunity to take part in discussions dealing with economic matters. This no doubt is the reason for my being accused of showing a constant smile, because I have the opportunity to discuss these matters with our highly competent people managing the Canadian economy and as far as I am concerned things look very encouraging. It has just been suggested that in the international context Canada is comparing very advantageously with all our competitors. Of course we would like, as members of government, to emphasize that this country's outstanding economic performance is due to the government's genius only and exclusively. For my part I would not go that far because I have no reluctance in recognizing that of all countries Canada is no doubt the most privileged and the most fortunate.

I had an opportunity during the by-elections we have just gone through to travel across the country. In addition, as former postmaster general and now minister responsible for penitentiaries, the institutions for which I have been and I am now responsible are dispersed throughout the country so that I have the pleasure of travelling throughout the land and this gives me a chance to review the economy and all factors which favour Canadians. I enjoy this very much because we politicians, both in the opposition and on the government side, can witness our advantages throughout the country. In the Vancouver area—and I see now one of Vancouver's famous members of parliament—

An hon. Member: They are all famous.

Mr. Blais: —of course, they are all famous—as well as in the York-Simcoe constituency, in the Toronto area, in my own northern Ontario area, it is becoming evident that economically Canada is faring very well. I would not wish to be too parochial but I had an opportunity two weeks ago to be in my own area, the constituency of Nipissing, in North Bay where I had the privilege of signing a federal-provincial agreement——with the Ontario representative, the minister of northern affairs, Mr. Léo Bernier. I felt a great deal of pleasure in signing that agreement. It was a joint federal-provincial contribution of more than $10 million under the regional development program. It was an infrastructure grant which had a great deal of significance for my area, and my area is typical of the rest of Canada.

[English]

In effect, it was a recognition of the economic growth experienced in my area of Nipissing and an investment of faith in the future of that part of the country. It was a justified investment because, in my view, Canada has a great future.

That infrastructure grant was made to develop new industrial land. The industrial land previously made available had been completely used up. As a result of a high demand for industrial development, we needed additional land. I felt there was a signal to be transmitted there. It was an excellent one.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, it may have slipped the minister's mind, but we are dealing with an amendment to Bill C-7. I wonder if he might do his best to stay on the subject so that we can proceed as quickly as possible. He may have thought we were on the throne speech debate, but if he checks with his House leader he will find that is not the case.

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. I am delighted to see the hon. member for Grenville-Carleton (Mr. Baker) at last considering that relevance has anything to do with debate in this House. It has not been his practice in his own speeches or those he has seen members of his party give.

Earlier in the debate the right hon. member for Prince-Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) was rather embarrassed when speaking about the Post Office situation and the Great Lakes strike. He, as an aside, practically laughed about the matter, saying he could of course connect it with the amendment before the House. If we are moving toward a reinstitution of the idea of relevance in this House, members of this government will welcome it very much, provided the standard is observed by the opposition.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I can only ask hon. members to stay on the subject matter. I cannot answer as to what has been said or will be said tomorrow. I can only say that I am in the chair right now. I hope hon. members do not think that one sin can be an excuse for another sin, and that the minister and others who speak in this debate will speak to the subject matter.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I listened to the minister most closely. As a minister of the Crown, and bearing in mind the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) is not with us this afternoon, I believe hon. members would appreciate it if he would tell us exactly why the government needs the $7 billion it is taking for in borrowing authority this year and another $10 billion next year. I would be most interested in hearing this minister of the Crown explain why the government needs this authority.

• (1552)

Mr. Blais: It will be my pleasure. I was trying to find an article in the Globe and Mail; I am sure one of my hon. friends will find it for me while I continue to enlighten hon. members. Contrary to what has just been said, articles which have recently been published do recognize the immense future which is before Canada both in trade and in other areas.

As for the hon. member's direct question, I ask him to wait until we get into committee when he can put it to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien). I know he has had a great deal of practice because I have often sat here and heard him in committee of the whole asking the same question ad nauseam, and I would not deprive him of the pleasure of doing so again.

Speaking of the golden future of northern Ontario, may I say I had the occasion recently to visit the northern region of my province, in particular the town of Timmins. I dally there from time to time and take a great deal of pleasure in visiting. In Timmins there is a great deal of activity by Texas Gulf, a company which is one of the concerns of the Canada Development Corporation. Among the most welcome initiatives shown by this government was the creation of a corporation which seeks to concentrate capital within Canada for the benefit of the nation. This is something we tend to forget amid the doom and gloom and naysaying that we hear from members of the opposition. I was interested to see the development of a massive copper refining industry in Timmins. I cannot but wonder at the wisdom of the policies followed by this government in the past in encouraging the development of what we in Canada find to be most advantageous, especially where our mineral resources are concerned.

The hon. gentleman spoke of the borrowing of funds. There is no doubt that in any economic activity the act of borrowing is inevitable. I have yet to see an individual or a corporation engaged in a business of any size in circumstances where a strong line of credit is not maintained with an appropriate financial institution.

I had occasion also to visit the county of Lotbinière.

[Translation]

This riding, Mr. Speaker, is steeped in tradition and is still represented by the Social Credit party—which deserves our congratulations—it is a riding where we can see the changes now occurring in Canada as a result of government initiatives.

In fact, I had the opportunity to talk with businessmen in that community who made investments in the post-war period to modernize our manufacturing industry. Hon. members will recall indeed that textiles and furniture were the basic industries in this area, and it has been recognized that employment in recent years has declined in textiles as well as in footwear and furniture industries. In fact, what happens is that those companies are experiencing lower employment potential as a result of international competition, but Canadians, with the help of the federal government and the minister concerned, have nevertheless been able to undertake industrial initiatives and are also able to compensate for the employment loss experienced recently in those areas.

As you know, when we mention the furniture industry, we must recognize that it takes wood to make furniture. Since the supply of hardwood is not inexhaustible it disappeared in the Victoriaville area so that now we have to import it. As a result, those people are already using iron and other materials to increase industrial activity and job creation. It is extremely encouraging, particularly if you consider that those initiatives are undertaken by Canadians who are not afraid to take some risks to develop the economy of our country. And this situation does not prevail only in that area, Mr. Speaker, but in all parts of the country. And when you go to Alberta, which is, everybody is ready to admit it, the richest province in Canada—

[English]

The impetus which has been given to development in that region results in large measure from the creative juxtaposition of federal and provincial powers. Soon after I came to this House I had the good fortune to be involved in the energy field with a minister who perhaps marked the area of national resources to a greater extent than any minister in the fifty years prior to his assuming office. His policies are presently being put into effect by my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie). We often neglect, as men leave public office, to offer them the recognition which is their due.

I recall debates on the subject of oil in this House when members of the opposition were advocating the wholesale transfer of this resource to American consumers. Those were days when, even in face of evidence that there was likely to be a shortage of hydrocarbons in the near future, members of the opposition were advocating an increase in the export of our non-renewable resources.

An hon. Member: That was Joe Green.

Mr. Blais: It was that kind of shortsighted policy that the government resisted.

An hon. Member: What does all of this have to do with borrowing?

Mr. Blais: It has to do with borrowing because it affects the economic status of this country. What I am saying is that the stability we have known here, notwithstanding detrimental conditions generally, is the result of wise and farseeing policies dictated by the government. Take the investment of $300 million by the Canadian people in the tar sands development at a time when there was resistance on the other side of the House to that investment. While the legislation establishing Petro-Can was before the House, members of the opposition in their shortsightedness and narrowmindedness resisted the setting up of that corporation.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, we have a story to tell the electorate about the official opposition. The Canadian people are no longer ready to listen to diatribes—

Some hon. Members: Oh!

Mr. Blais: —or pejorative readings of all possible indicators. I have been reading the press and I have not been very pleased at some of the interpretations placed on economic matters and other subjects that are close to my heart. But when I looked at the Toronto Star of October 18, at page B-12, I saw there an article by a writer named Jack McArthur who has given a fair shake in terms of telling what the truth is. I hope hon. members present will give me the opportunity to read this. Under the heading "Big differences" Jack McArthur says this:

● (1602)

How much chance is there that Canada can perform differently—and better—than the U.S.? Well, there have been big differences during the 70s.

For example, Canada grew more than twice as rapidly in 1971 and considerably more in '73. It added to its production at rates varying from 1.3 per cent to 3.6 in the years 1970, '74 and '75 while American output was dropping by from 0.3 per cent to 1.4 per cent annually. The Americans outgained us considerably only in 1977.

That's history. But there are differences today in the two economies. Canada's energy development boom is comparatively louder. Its capital spending already seems to be picking up.

Those quotations come under the general heading "Canada may once again outrun the U.S.".

I did not say that, Mr. Speaker. This man is not a member of my party. Members of the opposition attempt to paint people who are positively inclined toward our country as being part of the Liberal party line. They think that to be positive about this country is to be guilty of some partisan prejudice. What utter rubbish and impossible nonsense!

I see the report on the first page of the Globe and Mail business section this week that a group of Canadian businessmen went to China to initiate and develop potential markets within a country which possesses one quarter of the world's population. That is not by accident. It is because this government has recognized the need for investing in the export market. It has created instruments in order to do that. It has created the Export Development Corporation. I remember well that in the last session members of the opposition kept negatively harping at and attacking the government for seeking to increase the ceiling of loans by the EDC. They filibustered that bill ad nauseam. They did not even want to recognize that without that bill Canada could not survive as a trading nation because we were competing with people who were extremely competitive.

Mr. Dick: Now you want to borrow $17 billion.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton (Mr. Dick) is only about 40 miles away from his home; he might make it in time for dinner if he left just about now.

Mr. Baldwin: He will miss it if he stays here.

Mr. Blais: The hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Baldwin) says the hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton has other plans for his dinner. I am sure that if he does he will stay away from the hon. member for Peace River. The blue jacket of the hon. member for Peace River is very becoming, and I would not want to see it spotted.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Stop filibustering the bill.

An hon. Member: You haven't talked about it yet.

Mr. Blais: I am selling the positive record of this government. I am not filibustering the bill; I am participating in the debate in order to point out to hon. members opposite, who are anchored to their chairs—and I am pleased to have an audience—the truth, in both official languages.

[Translation]

What happens, Mr. Speaker, in cases such as what was reported this week is that action is being taken to sell our products to distant countries. In order to do that we must have the necessary funds to encourage companies which may be new in Canada and not in a position to take the risk. Of course it means that the Canadian government must offer guarantees and insurance so that these companies can recognize that when they do sell abroad they will be paid, independently of the buyer's ability to honour his obligations. But to offer these guarantees we must borrow, because this money will not come before the sales are completed, the products reach destination and the money returns to the country. It is recognized, in the international sector, that we Canadians must help and finance those firms abroad.

[English]

There was another story in the Globe and Mail on Wednesday which spoke about the sale of two Candu reactors. Undoubtedly there will be some government financing to allow the export of these reactors because it is recognized that the money necessary will not be generated until such time as the goods are in place after export to Rumania. Notwithstanding the fact that we have the best technology in the world in terms of nuclear generation, I remember quite well the opposition's naysaying and dooming and glooming in that context as well, never recognizing the excellence of Canadian technology.

The principles advocated by the official opposition find something sinister about having a Crown corporation such as AECL in Canada. AECL is developing new technology. The official opposition tries to make us believe that the private sector could have developed the Candu technology which is now one of the prime international technologies and which will be providing us with immense foreign exchange.

When we look at the philosophy of the official opposition, we wonder how far it can go. Hon. members opposite try to maintain with some modicum of consistency that a Crown corporation or something which is tainted by the government can really not function properly. That was their attitude in dealing with Petro-Canada. When we were dealing with a bill to set up Petro-Canada, there was filibustering the likes of which we have never seen. Hon. members opposite tried to prevent the creation of Petro-Canada because they could not imagine that a corporation like Petro-Canada could do anything positive for Canada. Quite the contrary, we have seen that that is not the case because there is a recognition, even by the most conservative in the small "c" sense, or small "r" reactionary sense, that Crown corporations are an essential ingredient of Canada's make-up. There is a recognition as well that Petro-Canada is doing much in the development of Canadian energy resources.

There were questions raised regarding the financing and the capital structure of Petro-Canada, because there has to be a great deal of investment in energy resources if we are going to ensure supplies for a long period of time. In order to finance that kind of investment we have to borrow, which is perhaps one of the reasons why on a regular basis we present borrowing bills to this House. In case hon. members opposite get sensitive about what Petro-Canada has to do with this borrowing bill, I simply point out that in order to invest moneys we have to borrow from time to time so that we can secure a return on our investment at some future time.

There is no question but that Petro-Canada is our window into the petro-chemical industry. The United States is the only major oil producer in the world which does not have a national petroleum corporation. Mexico has one, Indonesia has one, Nigeria has one, the OPEC countries have one and Venezuela has one. There is a recognition that what is contained under the ground in Saskatchewan really belongs to the people. It does not belong to the fellow who is lucky enough to find it. He should, of course, get a fair return, there is no question about that; but the wealth that is under the ground should belong to the people collectively.

In fact, we were in a very difficult situation at the time Petro-Canada was formed because there was a danger that the multinational corporations, in the interest of satisfying their own shareholders, would make decisions which would be detremental to the national interest and, having made those decisions, would have sufficient capital to give effect to them, thus taking away the birthright that is owing to Canadians. I objected to that very strenuously, of course, and, notwithstanding the opposition's filibuster and their negative attitude, we passed the Petro-Canada legislation, and we are very pleased to have passed it.

The reason I refer to this subject at this stage is to indicate that, with the export of the Candu reactor and our policy with regard to that, with Petro-Canada, with investment in the tar sands, we owe a great deal to the former minister of energy, mines and resources, Mr. Macdonald, who is now back in the private sector. I simply want to draw to the attention of hon. members on the other side that those were sound policies that even they, having rejected them at first, are now recognizing as being wise.

I do not have that much more to say, and I am sure hon. members opposite will be pleased to see me sit down soon, but some allegations have been made relating to the borrowings in which we have engaged in terms of foreign reserves—

Mr. Baldwin: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I was most dreadfully sorry to hear the minister indicate he will sit down shortly. We have heard a masterful demonstration of how to filibuster your own legislation, during which the minister has taken us over the newspapers, which I know he is watching very carefully for criticism of the royal commission. He has touched very briefly on the bill once or twice to show he has a vague knowledge of what the debate should be about. I am sure all hon. members are prepared to allow him an additional 20 minutes if he would like to continue.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, I have not departed for one minute from economic considerations. I am sure that every point I raised was connected with the question of government borrowings and the fact that, in order for the government to function properly, it has to invest funds in the economy. I indicated the wisdom of our past decisions, although opposition members have tried to embarrass me through technical means; but, as you well know, Mr. Speaker, I do not embarrass easily. I remember last session rising to speak on points such as the one which the hon. member for Peace River has raised and being told, as you will undoubtedly tell him, Mr. Speaker, that it is customary in the House, in order not to restrict free speech, to permit a relatively wide range of discussion, in particular on financial matters.

I wish to indicate that some question was raised at one time when I was not here as to the cost of borrowing the amounts which the Minister of Finance has seen fit to borrow in order to permit stabilization in the trading of the Canadian dollar. I think there was a question on the recent $750 million borrowing. I am advised—and this is for the enlightenment of the House—that indeed no cost is involved because, as you may understand, Mr. Speaker, you borrow on the international market not in order to spend, when you are dealing with currency exchanges, but so as to put in order the trading of your own currency. The amount, once it is borrowed, is not left in the bank but is reinvested in the country. In fact, it is now securing an interest on the return which will surpass the costs of the borrowing. So indeed those amounts are being borrowed in order to permit Canada to deal more easily with its own currency at no cost to the public purse.

An hon. Member: It only costs the taxpayer, that is all.

Mr. Blais: There is a gentleman over there who is speaking from his behind—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Order!

Mr. Blais: In any event, Mr. Speaker, those are all the remarks I have to make. I want to conclude by again commending the hon. member for New Westminster on his remarks. He really touched on a very pertinent question, namely, the fact that in the House there must be an ongoing exchange of information among all parties, and when information is advanced, although we can never guarantee the accuracy of everything we advance, there is a responsibility to be accurate, especially when we are dealing, not with whether tomorrow taxi fares will go up in the Gaspé, but with questions that are of national import and that are seen and interpreted on a regular basis by the press and by the electronic media which transmit everything that happens in the House directly to the livingrooms of the nation. There is a responsibility to cite accurate figures and to make responsible points in their context, and so I fully support what the hon. member for New Westminster advanced.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker—

An hon. Member: You are filibustering your own bill.

Mr. Lang: —we have before us a bill to extend the power of the government to borrow and an amendment from the financial critic of the official opposition to strike out that increase in authority on the rather treacherous grounds that he does not yet have sufficient information about the need for this authority.

It might be difficult for people in the country to understand the nature of this debate. It is not a debate about a specific borrowing taking place. It is not a debate about the ability of the government to borrow money as required in a practical and economic sense. It is a debate about the actual authority and the limit on it which is maintained over the years in order that a parliamentary procedure may take place before additional authority is given. Obviously the authority required for a government in any circumstances is enough to deal with the issues it faces in borrowing and also enough to provide for contingencies so that it may be in a position to take reasonable steps to deal with financial emergencies and foreign exchange activities which might arise. It is, therefore, the amount of authority required to meet governing problems.

What is extraordinary here is that presumably the official opposition, in putting forward their amendment, would vote to curtail this authority of the government, although they themselves know that such authority is required in today's circumstances. It is required in part to deal with budget deficits and in part to deal with matters in the world of exchange where both the U.S. and the Canadian dollar are seriously under attack. I say the Canadian and U.S. dollar because, of course, many people believe that the Canadian dollar is affected by what happens to the U.S. dollar, regardless of what we might do inside our country. This bill could have supplied the specific total amount now for this year to deal with contingencies a year and a half or so ahead. Instead it does it in two stages so as to specify that, in the current fiscal year, no more than $7 billion of that authority will be sought to be used, and therefore it is not requested.

● (1622)

The further amount to deal with contingencies into the future, of course, is a sensible and necessary precaution. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Chrétien) indicated that it is a matter of contingency, largely because of his view of cash balances. The point is that the exact question of government action regarding spending under a budget will come before the House in another form. From time to time in the future, as in the past, the House will have an opportunity to debate specific issues as to how the government is spending, what kind of taxation it is imposing, and what kind of deficits result from that.

The extraordinary thing is that the official opposition criticized the bill, and indeed by its amendment presumed to vote against it. In anything they have said, surely their position has been that the deficits should be higher rather than lower today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lang: This afternoon we heard an excellent speech by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt), a member of the New Democratic Party. I regret to hear that he is not planning to seek re-election. His speech was excellent in almost every regard, but I have to reserve my position on his comment that he was not sure if his party would vote against the authority being sought in the bill because of the extent of the borrowing request for next year. He said that on the ground that sooner or later there should be some balanced budgets. I agree with him on that, but surely he would agree that the "sooner or later" will not happen next year in this country. Given all we can project regarding present economic conditions, the situation next year certainly will require a significant deficit again.

For several years now the government has been engaged in a cost cutting exercise, an exercise of retraint in its spending, in limiting growth in the public service, and in cutting back the number of man-years employed. It is not a new venture on our part. When we engaged in it, we knew as we began that it was not an easy exercise. It was an exercise of finding out in various parts of big government operation where things can be done more efficiently, more effectively, and then examine them again as to their efficiency and effectiveness.

It is an ongoing job which in one sense should always continue. In the last three years we have undertaken it with zeal. That is why our situation is so different from that which faced the right hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he was prime minister. He entered the debate today, perhaps stung by the memory of the fact that once before in the country when the dollar was falling he was prime minister and found it impossible to escape the blame and criticism for the economic conditions which brought that about.

The difference is that in the late 1950s and early 1960s, the government of the day was in circumstances where the hon. member for New Westminster, had he been in the House then, would have called for economic responsibility and a sign of a government in control of a situation. Instead he would have found the Diefenbaker government spending irresponsibly and exercising no restraint whatever. In those days when the dollar suffered because of lack of confidence in the economy as a result of government action, naturally blame was attached immediately to the government of the day.

It should be noted to some extent the government will fall heir to the spirit of criticism which existed in those days. However, the situation is very signficantly different. Even with the restraint we have been exercising for three years in regard to government spending, and the responsibility we have been showing, time after time the opposition thought we were in a pre-election period and expected us to go to the limit in terms of spending and minimizing taxation. Instead, we produced three budgets which were criticized by the official opposition for not having enough spending and too much taxing. The official opposition, budget after budget, has asserted that our deficits should be larger than they have been. That is a sign of the responsibility of the government.

Our dollar is under attack, as is the American dollar, in a world where certain things fundamentally have changed, oil prices being one of them. Canada has its own special factors which cause a problem for the dollar. In terms of investor confidence, as misplaced as it may be to argue that a separatist government has created threat to the country and its unity, that is without a doubt one factor. It is not a factor investors should take into account, but it is one which is often subtle when looked at by would-be investors, and leads to judgments as to where investments should take place. It is apparent a good amount of Canadian money is going abroad to be invested, rather than simply a lack of foreign money coming here. That is where it becomes important to re-emphasize at every turn the reasons why Canada and Canadians ought to have absolute, firm confidence in the future of the country and its economic development.

Of course, the opposition must, as part of its natural objectives create as much doom and gloom about the future as possible. As a government, we must challenge that and emphasize why Canadians should have confidence in their future and in the actions of the government in relation to the constitution, language, and questions which otherwise might feed separatism.

The government has been successful to such a degree that that threat should not be considered real or realistic in the minds of investors, subject to the continuation of the type of leadership displayed by the government. The fact of the matter is that the Canadian economy is buoyant and strong. More jobs are being created in Canada each year than in any other area of the world, relative to the nature of the economy and the size of the country. Year after year we have seen jobs created in numbers which outpace the proportionate increase in population. If in a 12-month period the number of new jobs is 375,000 higher, it is well out of proportion to the increase in population during that period. If in a ten-year period the increase in jobs is two million, when a population increase of three million has occurred, then clearly more Canadians in proportion to the population are working at paying jobs and more Canadians are supporting the economy with these jobs than ever before.

We should not let ourselves be misled by the existence at the same time of even a larger number of people seeking work. As a government we are not misled. We know the economy is strong, but we are not misled by the fact that additional efforts must be put to the task of assuring that work is found for those who want it. Even though we expressed satisfaction with the increase in the number of jobs, we are not satisfied about the amount of unemployment and the challenge for additional jobs. We continue to turn our attention to that in economic measures, job-creation measures, industrial incentives measures, and throughout our government of this country.

● (1632)

Behind the unemployment figures we realize, if the official opposition does not, there is a chronic situation, as well as the current one of a lot of people wanting jobs. The chronic problem is that of a very large number of people seeking jobs without jobs to be found for them in the eastern part of the country, from Montreal to the east, throughout a good part of Quebec and the whole of the Atlantic region.

It is for that reason that this government has made effort after effort to try to strengthen and expand the efforts of the Department of Regional Economic Expansion, and has tailored its unemployment programs, its employment-creating programs and its Canada Works program toward assisting the eastern region of the country. I hope hon. members opposite support that effort to help these areas of the country where the problem is chronic.

Instead of supporting it, however, may I remind you again, Mr. Speaker, that hon. members in the Conservative party far too often attack these programs by relating them to assistance for Quebec in that very insidious way they have of ignoring the fact that, because the problem is even more serious in the Atlantic region, even more attention by us has been placed upon the Atlantic region in job-creation and regional development. That we will continue to do and we will continue to look for solutions. We do not say we have found all the answers. We believe, however, that we are facing up to the problem and recognizing it for what it is.

The economy of this country has faced for some years the challenge of inflation, and indeed, if there is one thing more than any other which can be identified as putting pressure on the Canadian dollar and forcing it down, it is inflation in this country, fired by demands for wages and other forms of return which are out of line with what can be expected, given the need to share some of the productivity gains, and given the cost to the world of rapid increases in energy prices. Whether it is foreign oil or increased prices for oil which give great returns to Alberta and Saskatchewan, for which I am naturally grateful as a prairie boy, the fact of the matter is that those returns have to be obtained from all Canadians.

Those who ignored the fact that this was a cost we all had to share and tried, through increases in returns, in wages, profits or salaries, to obtain full recompense for productivity increases and cost of living increases, are the people who tried to move the load of inflation and energy price increases to those who are not protected and cannot protect themselves.

This government, remaining true to its Liberal principles, took steps in these difficult economic times where inflation was a challenge to make sure that those who suffer most from these forms of attack by inflation were helped. That is why we have announced new funds for those who have families and are in a low income position, and it is why we have announced a $20 increase in the guaranteed income supplement for those who are retired and depend upon the old age pension and the income supplement for their livelihood. These are Liberal principles applied at a time when our own policy has been for three years one of stern spending restraint, and at a time when we are facing a budget deficit which we believe is as much as it reasonably ought to be in the economic circumstances of the day.

This is a time when we are facing the need to find those funds and have put into place further spending cuts and the removal of programs, many of which we believe are good in themselves but which simply have to be put in a lower priority category compared to helping the family on low income and the elderly who depend upon the OAS and GIS for their sole support. This also meant we had to cut some programs in order to find funds for the industrial incentive programs we have already put forward and will be putting forward in the House.

We have not decided to go to a larger deficit for these matters because of our challenge in respect of inflation, a challenge we continue to face and are going to have to face by encouraging all Canadians to examine the question of restraint in their own demands upon the economy. Yet we are faced with an opposition which says we should spend more, tax less and have a larger deficit, but should not have the authority to borrow the funds which we would obviously require if the deficit were larger.

That is an irresponsibility from an opposition whose members think they can get away with it because the issue is complex and the people may not understand. I think gradually and over time people have a very shrewd way of judging these irresponsible approaches to economic management, and I think they will so judge the official opposition as well.

The last factor I should like to refer to in this approach by the official opposition is its recent proposal for mortgage deductions from income, which every commentator has seen as being a forgiveness of tax to the rich much more than to the poor. It excludes whole classes of people, including particularly the elderly who own homes free of mortgage. This is a program which will mean a loss of $1.6 billion in revenue for the treasury. It will cost even more when the program works its way through and people take on mortgages to get the benefit of the proposal, as we have seen happen in the United States. The opposition puts this proposal forward without saying what it will do to replace that loss of $1.6 billion in revenue, or what it will do about the further taxation it will have to impose to balance the budget or to hold the deficit in line with current thinking. That is again an irresponsibility which we will, over the coming months, have to point out clearly to the people of Canada.

Even more than that, I think our real challenge as a government and as a people is not only to continue to grapple with the problem of inflation which is fired by excessive demand, as well as grapple with the problem of chronic unemployment in areas like Quebec and Atlantic Canada, but also to inspire once again confidence among Canadians in the fact that our economy is, indeed, very strong; that in every sector, except those we have had to help because they could not help themselves, real incomes are better than they were before. This is measured in terms of disposable income and savings, and measured in terms which are very visible at airports and railway stations and by those who organize charters abroad. All of this shows that we Canadians are clearly better off than ever before.

The one thing that is lacking is clear confidence in our future. There is no reality in fact for that lack of confidence, and we recognize the challenge to restore it. Because if one thing more than another is needed in addition to restraint on a government that has committed itself, it is restraint on demand for higher wages, salaries and profits. We must find ways of getting Canadians to accept this fact in the absence of a wage and price control program.

One additional thing needed is for Canadians to readdress themselves to the fact that this country is strong and vibrant, that they have been the recipients over time of Liberal policies and programs of many kinds to assist those who are in need and inspire economic growth, without attempting to override the private investment sector in so doing. People in Canada must, as I say, recognize that this country is strong and vibrant and that they should have faith in it. This will restore the flow of investment into this country and will be an important ingredient in dealing with the problems this country faces.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, would the minister accept a question before he sits down?

Mr. Lang: Yes, I would.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the tributes which have been paid this afternoon—and well deserved they have been—to the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Leggatt) for the excellent speech he made. Would the minister also not agree that a very constructive speech was made yesterday by the hon. member for Waterloo-Cambridge (Mr. Saltsman); and would he also not agree that all members of his cabinet ought to read the speech made the other day by the hon. member for Windsor West (Mr. Gray)?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to hear those two suggestions and to understand that there were three great speeches made in the House rather than just the one made today. It is very good news, indeed, and I will personally see whether I can find the other two and read them.

Hon. Martin O'Connell (Scarborough East): Mr. Speaker, it is not an enviable position to be speaking now, since there have by general agreement in the House been so many excellent speeches preceding me that it may be difficult to match their eloquence and substance. I do want to say that I have appreciated very much the speeches and remarks made in the House this afternoon, principally by speakers on this side, because they have been very clarifying and instructive.

An hon. Member: Stonewall.

Mr. O'Connell: I trust that the hon. member believes when he makes a speech he too intends it to be clarifying and instructive as well.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Order. Now, don't get carried away.

Mr. O'Connell: It is essential that the people of Canada understand the government's reasons for asking for this borrowing authority. It is not the borrowing itself that is important but the right for the rest of this fiscal year and throughout the next to borrow sums of money that may be required.

There are a couple of essential points that I would like to add to the understanding we have gained this afternoon. The first one is that this borrowing authority does not represent additional spending by the government in the rest of this fiscal year or the next. It would be a false impression to think that this borrowing was for something new, something not already divulged in the government's program.

The government over the past two years has made it very clear that its firm intention and its practice is to reduce government spending, and it is on course in that respect, not least of all in the announcement on August 1. The total requirements of this government are well known, and they do include a significant deficit this year and next year. There are reasons for those deficits. This borrowing authority is to provide a legal foundation for those deficits, and there are economic and fiscal reasons for doing so. We need to have the legal framework in which to do the borrowing to support those deficits.

A second reason for the borrowing is to bring the authority into line with the stand-by credit already negotiated.

A third reason for the borrowing authority, one that will be of interest to Canadians, is to protect the government's current cash reserves in Canadian dollars for the purchase of American dollars when our dollar rises again.

Why would this lead one to borrow? It is because we have acquired Canadian dollars in the process of the falling dollar as it sought the lower levels. Those dollars will be required again to purchase U.S. dollars as our dollar rises. If those dollars were spent in current operations or in investment in Canada's future, as in Central Mortgage and Housing mortgages or in Petro-Canada development in energy and so forth, we would subsequently have to borrow Canadian dollars to purchase U.S. dollars to replenish the reserves. Reserves go out and come back. Canadian dollars are purchased as they fall in value. American dollars are purchased as our dollar rises. Therefore, we want to save Canadian dollars for that return upward. Those are some of the reasons which make it prudent for the government at this time to seek from parliament the authority to borrow.

Is the Canadian debt of such unusual size that it would cause concern in the country? We do have Canadian government debt and it has risen substantially, like most things. Our incomes have risen, as has the value of Canada's production and our entire economy.

The most sensible way of responding to the question whether our debt is now really very high, and would these additions make it unusually high, is to make some comparisons.

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): You cannot sneeze at $17 billion.

Mr. Stevens: You have tripled the debt in five years.

Mr. O'Connell: Naturally, members of the opposition are going to say yes. I have a table which is an international comparison on public debt as reflected in the debt of central governments such as Great Britain, the United States, Germany, Canada, etc. As the hon. parliamentary secretary to the minister said in his excellent speech this afternoon—and I found it an instructive point—we should compare our Canadian government debt with the American government debt, take a look at what has been the trend to see whether we have diverged, whether we are out of line, or whether we think that their debt is excessively high.

The period for the 1960s shows that the Canadian government debt and the U.S. debt reflected the same percentage of their economic production in any one year. For example, about 39 per cent of our annual production would have paid off the debt in that one year, which means we had that kind of relationship to our total economy. It may be that the debt has doubled or tripled in certain periods, depending on the period you want to take, but the economy has doubled and tripled along with the debt.

It is only reasonable to ask, is the weight of the debt today heavier in the economy than it was back in the sixties? The answer is no; Canada's public debt as reflected by the Government of Canada's direct debt is a lesser burden on the Canadian economy in 1977, according to the last figures we have, by roughly 10 percentage points. That is 25 per cent less. I do not have the actual figures worked out, but it could be said that it would take a little over a quarter of our production to pay the total debt off.

● (1652)

Where do we stand with respect to the United States? In 1977 the United States had a central government debt representing 30 per cent of its gross national product for that year, and I have rounded that figure; the actual figure was 29.9 per cent. The Canadian government's debt was less than the American in relation to its own economy. The figure for Canada was 27.4 per cent. Not only have we stayed generally in line with what is going on in the United States, but we have done a little better.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. O'Connell: Why have we done a little better? It is not only that we have struggled to invest in the Canadian economy with government borrowing and investments, but that the Canadian economy has outperformed the American economy over those periods of years so that the debt we have is a lesser proportion of the total economy than it is in the American case.

I will not trouble the House at this late time in the afternoon with more statistics that would reflect the faster growth of the Canadian economy over the American economy, because those points were made today and yesterday quite clearly. I want to stress that one of the sources of growth in both economies, and indeed in all economies, is borrowings. Borrowing when seen from another direction is an investment in the future. Borrowing is not made for frivolous reasons. Money is borrowed to invest in a country's social structure and in its economic structure. Investments are made in education. Investments are made in things like Petro-Canada in order to discover new energy resources, particularly in the frontier regions where the cost of exploration and production will be very high.

We are investing in the rehabilitation of grain gathering railway lines in western Canada. That takes in a large sum of money. Borrowings support such investments. Borrowings such as those we are seeking authority for today help to rehabilitate western Canada's grain lines. That is one reason why the economy of Canada is outperforming other economies. We are making investments in restructuring so that revenues will come back later and less subsidies will be required.

Borrowings also go to rehabilitate the fishing harbours in Atlantic Canada. Why do I mention that? If we have the new 200-mile fishing zone off our shores on both coasts, we will have to provide bigger harbours for bigger boats that go out to catch the fish. We will have to invest in shipbuilding and we will have to provide better breakwaters than the old ones used for smaller boats. It is foolishness not to borrow to invest in that sort of future and have the borrowing paid off as taxes bring back funds to repay that debt.

I could go on and on. Such bodies as the Export Development Corporation, the CNR and Air Canada will be asked to borrow on their own, but we have been providing them with hundreds of millions of dollars. Is it fair to say to the taxpayers today: "You pay money in taxes and we will give it to the Export Development Corporation to lend to another country, so that the other country will buy our manufactured goods, our technology and our ability to build an airport for them and engage our engineers and so forth"? No, it is not fair to ask taxpayers, today to pay those taxes, because the returns come in over 20 years, 15 years, ten years. It is money borrowed.

The authority we are now seeking from this parliament is the authority to continue to invest in an improved economy for the sake of those taxpayers ten years, 15 years and 20 years down the line. There is no question in my mind that we not only must continue that process—and these borrowings are for the rest of this year and all of next year—but that we will continue to get returns for it.

I would like to point out one other aspect of why borrowing authority is being sought. I refer to the rather unique spreading out of our revenues as a government and our expenditures as a government. Is anyone in the House going to object to the indexation of family allowance or unemployment insurance or senior citizen's pensions? That change was undertaken I believe in 1973, when the oil crisis sent inflation reverberations all over the world. We had to face those circumstances, and we said we would protect such people against inflation. While our expenditures would rise with whatever the inflation rate was, we said we would protect taxpayers by indexing their tax exemptions. So that as we take in fewer taxes—

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Dick: Mr. Speaker, would the hon. member permit a question? That suggestion, rather than being from the Liberal government, came in a speech made by the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Stanfield) in Truro. The Liberal government for one whole year before that turned down all those indexation ideas until they almost got defeated in the—

Miss Bégin: Make up your mind.

Mr. O'Connell: Mr. Speaker, it is virtually impossible for any party in Canada to claim the original patent rights, as it were, to any particular program.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. O'Connell: Program suggestions come up on this side of the House and on that side as well. But it is this government which protected those people and it will continue to protect those people. I would be surprised if the hon. member and his party would not support this borrowing authority in order to continue that kind of support.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, this House stands adjourned until Monday at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 5 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES—REQUEST FOR LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prince Albert): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of deeply urgent and pressing necessity, namely, the continuance of the strike which has stopped much, if not all, shipping on the Great Lakes for wheat and other products and is costing an estimated $10 million a day.

The situation is worsening day by day as the shipping season approaches its end, and promises to be a body-blow of disaster for western farmers who are shocked by the failure of parliament to bring in legislation to end the strike, a measure overdue since its inception.

I would, therefore, move, seconded by the hon. member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski), that such measure should be introduced at once.

Mr. Speaker: Such a motion, under Standing Order 43, can be introduced only with unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BUS SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of the fact that in July of 1976 the government arbitrarily removed the CN bus service in Newfoundland from the jurisdiction of the Newfoundland Public Utilities Commission and placed it under the Canadian Transport Commission, with the result that the CTC, completely captive to the CN and the Minister of Transport, permitted a fare increase of 15 per cent immediately, with a further 15 per cent in the summer of 1977, and in view of the fact that the Sullivan commission of inquiry has found the CN roadcruiser service to be operating with old, unsuitable, totally inadequate equipment at fares far above what is reasonable, and recommends that fares remain at a lower level, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Edmonton Centre (Mr. Paproski):

That the government direct CN to withdraw immediately its application for further increases totalling an average of 36 per cent to go into effect on November 1 and February 1, 1979, that the CN be reprimanded for unmitigated audacity and audacious effrontery, and that the government direct CN to accept the recommendations of the Sullivan commission for improvement in the bus services and for lower fares than would be payable for travelling similar distances on a trans-island train service, and that the government return regulatory control of the CN bus service in Newfoundland to the board of commissioners of the public utilities of Newfoundland.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to the introduction of such a motion?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

FUNDING OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity arising out of the government's decision to chop $116 million from the home insulation program over the next two years.

In view of the fact that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Gillespie) has described this program, CHIP, as the key item in the government's energy conservation program, in view of the fact that the minister also stated that the program, if fully implemented, would save this country upwards of 50 million barrels of oil, and bearing in mind that energy conservation is no less important now than it was a year ago when the home insulation program was introduced, I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Hogan):

That the Minister of Energy be directed to restore the $116 million dropped from the CHIP budget and that, further, the government actively promote this program so that it will effectively fulfil the country's conservation objectives.

Mr. Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for the introduction of such a motion?

REQUEST MERCHANT MARINE BE ESTABLISHED TO REDUCE UNEMPLOYMENT—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 43, I ask for the unanimous consent of the House to present a motion on an urgent and important matter.

Considering that it would be in the best interest of our country to have a genuine merchant marine and since our commitments toward NATO impose upon us the obligation to have an adequate fleet of ships, that our dockyards operate below capacity and that a large number of workers in these dockyards are unemployed, I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Caouette):

That the House order that a special committee made up of representatives of the various parties in parliament be set up to consider carefully this serious naval deficiency so that the government could order the building of merchant ships and others which would likely give work to our workers on the dockyards and which would allow our dockyards to maintain a permanent state of competitiveness.

Mr. Speaker: Order. The House has heard the motion of the hon. member. Pursuant to Standing Order 43, this motion requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

FINANCE

TRANSFER PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Hal Herbert (Vaudreuil): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under Standing Order 43, on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity: urgent because of the serious consequences if action is not immediate; pressing because a budget is to be introduced next month and it is important that opportunity be provided for an early debate so that party positions may be clearly established.

I ask leave to move, seconded by the hon. member for Montreal-Bourassa (Mr. Trudel):

● (1412)

That the government introduce immediately the measures necessary to eliminate the present $11.8 billion deficit and provide a reasonable surplus for use in important areas of federal responsibility, and that the government accomplish this task by recognizing the full provincial jurisdictional responsibility in areas such as medical, hospital, health care and welfare programs and social services as well as in certain educational and cultural fields, and by discontinuing forthwith the huge transfer payments to the provinces in these areas of provincial responsibility, transfer payments which are greater than the federal deficit and which provide billions of dollars of financing for the separatist—

Mr. Speaker: Order, please. Surely the hon. member is using the Standing Order in the same way as the case last week with the hon. member for Prince Edward-Hastings (Mr. Hees). There is some question as to whether the hon. member's motion is a general statement or a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. I would prefer to leave it until we have argued the point of order raised on the last occasion.

POST OFFICE

CONGRATULATION TO CUPW MEMBERS CROSSING ILLEGAL PICKET LINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a matter of national importance and urgency, under Standing Order 43, to deal with further examples of Post Office lock-outs.

Contrary to the orders of the Postmaster General (Mr. Lamontagne) last week, Mr. Jack Lindsay, the postmaster in my home town of Oakville, confirmed that he was forced to lock out postal workers, without pay, last Tuesday on orders from national Post Office headquarters. Despite this lock-out, all local postal employees returned to work on Wednesday as soon as back-to-work legislation came into effect.

I therefore move, seconded by the hon. member for Northumberland-Durham (Mr. Lawrence):

That this House compliments the CUPW members in Oakville and elsewhere who are crossing illegal picket lines in order to adhere to the law of the land, and instructs the Postmaster General to compensate accordingly those Post Office employees who were locked out by the government without pay last week.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

REMOVAL OF ILLEGAL PICKET LINES—MOTION UNDER S.O. 43

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, to seek the unanimous consent of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity.

In view of the enlightened position taken by one of the country's largest police departments which was enunciated by Police Chief Harold Adamson, of Toronto, to the effect that attempting to remove the pickets at post offices in Toronto would result in a serious breach of the peace, and that Police Chief Harold Adamson has shown considerably more insight into industrial relations in the Post Office than has this government, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie (Mr. Symes):

That this House calls on the government to demonstrate the same responsibility shown by the metro Toronto police department in dealing with this dispute.

Mr. Speaker: The presentation of such a motion for debate requires unanimous consent. Is there unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Some hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

POST OFFICE

APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR—ARBITRATOR IN LABOUR DISPUTE

Mr. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Acting Minister of Labour.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I cannot quite understand the shouting across the floor of the House. Perhaps it is a natural inclination to disorderliness.

My question to the Acting Minister of Labour is the same question I put to him four days ago. I understand that he might now have an answer. Can the Acting Minister of Labour tell the House of Commons whether he has named a mediator-arbitrator in the postal dispute, who that person is, whether there has been consultation with CUPW, and whether CUPW is prepared to work with that arbitrator?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to report to the House that I have appointed Mr. Lucien Tremblay, former chief justice of the court of appeal of Quebec, as mediator-arbitrator pursuant to Bill C-8.

In response to the question put by the Leader of the Opposition, the consultation process took place during the weekend. Not only was there consultation, but a last-ditch effort was also made to try to bring the two parties together and to convey the message to the union leaders that they ought to respect the law of the land, that no one should disobey the law of the land, and that they ought to encourage their membership to go back to work.

In a spirit of co-operation, the government was ready to start constructive negotiations immediately during the weekend. Unfortunately, these efforts were not successful and I indicated this morning, in meeting the union leaders, that I had no choice but to appoint immediately a mediator-arbitrator pursuant to Bill C-8.

● (1417)

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, I can certainly express the pleasure on this side of the House that the Acting Minister of Labour, who promised a week ago that he would name an arbitrator-mediator within hours, has now—some six days later—been able to make that appointment.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Clark: I would like the Acting Minister of Labour to either confirm or set the record straight on a news report by the Canadian Press this morning, quoting the minister as saying:

There can be no negotiations until the union obeys the back-to-work order passed last week by parliament.

That statement, if it is correct, would appear to conflict quite directly with section 6(1)(a) of Bill C-8 passed by this parliament, which instructed the mediator to proceed forthwith with his negotiations.

Can the Acting Minister of Labour tell the House of Commons whether it is the position of the government that the members of CUPW must obey the law before the mediator begins his work?

Mr. Ouellet: If the Leader of the Opposition would look at the law, he would realize that under the law the mediator-arbitrator has a role to play. The law does not specify that he has to start immediately, but to start at a time which in his judgment is appropriate for him to do active and useful work.

I think the Leader of the Opposition is trying to play it on both sides of the fence. I suppose it is easy for the Leader of the Opposition to do this: it is easy to criticize. But basically what he should remember is that he would have been the first to complain to me if we had rushed into appointing someone without allowing time for some consultations and a genuine effort to pass the message across to the union leader that the union should respect the law and should sit down and work constructively with the government team, under the assistance of the mediator-arbitrator.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Mr. Speaker, this matter has been going on for far too long already, partly because of this government's failure to act quickly on its responsibilities. Let me refer the minister, who presumably had something to do with the language of the law, to the precise language of the law passed by this House. With reference to the mediator-arbitrator, it says:

—who shall

(a) forthwith—

That means immediately

—endeavour to mediate all matters—

I ask the Acting Minister of Labour a simple question: has he instructed his mediator-arbitrator, as is indicated by the Canadian Press report this morning, that no mediation is to continue—in other words, that he is not to begin forthwith, but that mediation is to proceed only if members of CUPW have first agreed to obey the law?

Mr. Ouellet: I think those are two separate issues. I do not think the Leader of the Opposition has to give readings of the bill to the appointed mediator-arbitrator. That person is a very well known and respected former judge who obviously knows the law very well, and it will be as easy for him to interpret the law as it is for the Leader of the Opposition.

Secondly the question of whether or not the work of this mediator-arbitrator should start before or after the unions go back to work and respect the law is another question. I think the Minister of Justice will take steps in order to ensure that the law is respected.

Some hon. Members: When?

Mr. Ouellet: He will not act beyond what are his responsibilities. He has a task to do, and I believe that he will immediately take steps to do his job in a way which in his judgment is the best way to do it.

Mr. Clark: The instruction of the law is very clear. The instruction of the law to the mediator is to begin immediately. My question is whether the Acting Minister of Labour has given contrary instructions.

Has the minister told the mediator that he should not begin his work until members of CUPW obey the law? In other words, has a delay been suggested to the mediator by the Acting Minister of Labour, a delay until the law is obeyed; because that is the clear import of the story, which the minister has not yet denied? I gave him the opportunity to set the record straight, to clear the import of the story by Canadian Press that the minister has suggested that the law passed by parliament, as it relates to the immediacy with which the mediator takes up his responsibilities, will not come into play until CUPW members have themselves obeyed the laws of the land. What instruction has been given to the mediator?

● (1422)

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I can state quite categorically that I have not said such a thing to the mediator-arbitrator.

GOVERNMENT ACTION AGAINST ILLEGAL STRIKERS

Mr. Walter Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. At 12.01 a.m. last Thursday legislation was passed and proclaimed respecting the restoration of service within the Post Office. As of today, we do not have full and normal service within the Post Office. On Friday I asked the minister a question respecting the remedy of dismissal and he indicated to me in his answer that that remedy was subject to a great deal of difficulty as to its application by the government.

It is important for the House and Canadians to understand just what remedies are available: we should know what remedies are available to the government, in view of the open defiance by CUPW of the law of the land. Is the minister prepared to make a statement on motions later today in order to indicate to the House and the country the view of the government as to what its remedies are in this situation? Regarding the obeying of the law, this situation seems to be reaching an impasse.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I do not think it is necessary for the Minister of Justice, or indeed anyone else, to make legal statements in the House as to what rights are and what the law is, in an elaborate way. Certainly, from time to time announcements may be made and decisions may be taken about such things as dismissals, but those are not under the authority of the Minister of Justice; rather, they are under the authority of the appropriate department, department head and minister.

As far as the current postal situation is concerned, clearly there are a number of remedies available. No doubt the public is interested in them. They include injunctions, and we are seeking those. We obtained some this morning in various locations. Also, there are various procedures by way of prosecution which are available to us. I think there is easy misunderstanding in the public mind that these prosecutions may follow very readily, simply because everyone in the public knows that these offences are being committed. That is an easy conclusion. But for the purposes of law enforcement, an attorney general must take care to ensure that the facts and evidence to ground a prosecution before the courts, and not in the media, are available.

That is what we are in the process of doing. I think it is important to say that that evidence, simply because we are in a strike and postal services are halted, should not be obtained in any careless or hasty way. In these cases, ordinarily we study the situation thoroughly in order to safeguard the liberty of the subject. This evidence is being obtained, the charges will be laid based on that evidence and those charges will be pursued to a conclusion before and under the law, regardless of the outcome or stage of a particular dispute. It is a matter of an offence against the law of Canada. Those who have offended will be charged on the basis of adequate evidence, and those charges will be completed.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Baker (Grenville-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, it is because of the importance of the public knowing what the position is that I invited the minister to make a statement on motions.

There is another problem relating to the law and its enforcement respecting those within CUPW who want to obey the law and go back to work. Aside from the injunction proceedings about which the minister must have some reservations, can he indicate to the House what steps he and the government are prepared to take to ensure that the people within CUPW who want to go back, do their job and obey the law passed by parliament last week will have the opportunity to do so?

● (1427)

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, we have been, as has the Post Office, urging the return of these various employees to work, assuring them of every possible protection in the exercise of what is now their legal duty. That is the position we have been taking and will continue to take.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

REASON FOR REDUCED BUDGET OF DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In the recently announced cutbacks by the federal government, the average cutback for most departments was around 4 per cent but the cutback in the Department of Agriculture was about 8 per cent.

I would ask the minister why he took such a heavy meat axe to the Department of Agriculture, because many valuable programs such as the Farm Credit Corporation program are helping farmers but they will now be severely hampered by this severe cutback.

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, if you segregated the reduction in the capital advance to the Farm Credit Corporation, the percentage reduction to which the hon. member refers would be considerably reduced. The reduction in the advance from the consolidated revenue fund to that Crown corporation does not necessarily mean any diminution in the efforts of that corporation on behalf of farmers: there are other methods that can be followed.

In so far as the selection of programs is concerned, Mr. Speaker, this was not an across-the-board percentage reduction by any department, and the average the hon. member mentioned is simply that, a statistical average. The choice of reductions was based on an assessment of programs starting with those that were considered to lack some degree of acceptable efficiency, and moving to those that might have been quite efficiently run, but where the priorities of objectives were lower than we now thought necessary in terms of over-all reduction in respect of reordering the funds freed up. That was the general process by which these were decided. The Department of Agriculture I think fared just as well or just as badly as any other in that sense.

Mr. Nystrom: Regardless of how it is put, Mr. Speaker, the department is still cut back by 8 per cent. I have here in my hands a cabinet document dated June 29 and signed by a senior official in the Treasury Board. It indicates that the Treasury Board had recommended or authorized that the Department of Agriculture, namely, the minister, should discuss with the provinces two new agricultural programs, and the document went on to state:

> No additional funds or man-years be committed by the federal government for the above mentioned programs until Agriculture Canada completes... its analysis evaluation of existing federal government programs currently estimated to be $1 billion per annum, and reports to cabinet as directed—

It then gives the file number of a cabinet document. I would ask the President of the Treasury Board whether this total evaluation of federal Department of Agriculture programs referred to in this cabinet document is now completed and, if so, what are the results; if it has not been completed, what is the nature of the evaluation and are provincial governments being consulted?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I have not had access to the evaluation. I do not think from my current knowledge that it is yet completed. Probably I will not have the full details until later this year.

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, the cabinet documents refer to two programs that the Minister of Agriculture should be discussing with the provinces, namely, the new technology development fund and a family farm improvement program. We have consulted this morning with some of the provincial governments and they know very little about these two programs. Can the minister explain to the House what these programs entail? Is the Minister of Agriculture now pursuing these programs, or is he stopped dead in his tracks because of the re-evaluation? Is that re-evaluation also going to affect other existing federal programs such as the ones I have already mentioned, or others about which the farmers are concerned?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, I think that question could be best answered in detail by the Minister of Agriculture, and I will certainly draw his attention to its existence in Hansard.

INDUSTRY

REQUESTED REDUCTION IN TEXTILE IMPORTS TO PROTECT CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, I shall direct my question to his parliamentary secretary.

As the department will soon have to review the quotas for textile imports for the year 1979, could the parliamentary secretary tell the House whether they intend to reduce considerably those quotas in order to protect more our Canadian textile industries on local and national markets?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, in fact the general quotas will be replaced starting from January 1 by bilateral agreements signed with the seven countries which are the main exporters of clothing to Canada. The level of imports from those countries for 1979 will be approximately the same as in 1975.

Oral Questions

PROPOSED MANUFACTURERS' PERMITS RESPECTING INCOME TAX

Mr. C. A. Gauthier (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I thank the parliamentary secretary for his statement. Still, with a view to encouraging the manufacturers even more, have the officials of the government read, or could they read, the statement of the manufacturers who want to obtain, among other things, consolidated tax forms in order to stimulate new manufacturing undertakings and create more jobs in that sector?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the government has indeed read the study prepared by the clothing and textiles sector. The study was one of 23 that were tabled in July last. This morning, a subcommittee known as the second level committee, tabled its final report with the government; yes, the government will take into consideration the recommendations of both the textiles and clothing industry and the other industrial sectors in Canada.

REQUESTED REDUCTION IN TEXTILE IMPORTS TO PROTECT CANADIAN INDUSTRY

Mr. Adrien Lambert (Bellechasse): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce.

Has the Textile and Clothing Board recently made a report and, if so, does it recommend that imports be reduced not only for textiles but also in the clothing sectors in order to protect our clothing plants in Canada?

Mr. Bernard Loiselle (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, naturally, the Textile and Clothing Board meet the government regularly. The board would like us to reduce the clothing imports in Canada and I believe the government, through the Deputy Prime Minister, and on the occasion of the GATT negotiations, has indicated its firm intention of protecting that industrial sector which is of prime importance to Canada and particularly Quebec.

TRANSPORT

MOVEMENT OF GRAIN ON GREAT LAKES—INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION TO END STRIKE

Mr. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Labour. Given the fact that the expressed hope and optimism of the Minister of Transport for an early settlement of the Great Lakes labour dispute did not materialize over the weekend—the strike is now in its second week—and since it has been made clear by the Lake Carriers Association that unless a settlement is reached today, lay-offs will commence immediately, which will further contribute to the prospect of a premature shutdown of the total system, could the minister tell the House whether legislation will be introduced immediately if the talks break off without success today?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, if we had followed the view of the opposition, legislation would have been introduced last week which would have deprived the deck officers' union and management of arriving at a settlement. Indeed, the negotiations that were carried out, allowed for a collective agreement for three years to be reached and signed by both parties.

It is true that discussions with the marine engineers are taking place at the present time. I asked for an update on the negotiations before coming to the House at two o'clock. The report I received was that the parties were still actively negotiating. I think it would be grossly improper for parliament to legislate a settlement while the parties are still negotiating.

Mr. Mazankowski: Mr. Speaker, my question directed to the minister was in the event that talks did break down. We on this side of the House are finding it very difficult to rationalize the government's position with respect to the handling of this dispute vis-à-vis the postal dispute. There seems to be a double standard. Perhaps the minister would undertake to tell the House how much longer this country can afford the kind of economic disruption that is currently taking place, before the government proposes any concrete, positive action.

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the government, through the Department of Labour, is hoping for and assisting in the settlement of this matter. The hon. member ought to keep in mind that the due process of collective bargaining through negotiation should be carried out to the fullest extent before adopting the extreme recourse of legislating against the union. The hon. member should not draw a parallel with what was done in the case of the postal workers. In that case, after negotiations—

Mr. Mazankowski: Even before they went to strike.

Mr. Ouellet: —it became clear that there was no possibility of a negotiated settlement, and it was only after that that the government was asked to intervene.

With relation to this dispute, I appreciate—and members of this House should realize this—that the government is monitoring the situation very carefully. We are as deeply concerned as anybody else about the shutdown of shipping operations on the Great Lakes. I would like to remind the hon. member that, indeed, in the past there have been stoppages of activities on the Great Lakes due to strikes, and I would like him to review what happened in those circumstances while the Conservative party was in power.

Mr. Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. Ouellet: The strikes carried on for many days.

PROPOSED STRIKE BY NORDAIR PILOTS—STATE OF NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Acting Minister of Labour. It has to do with the proposed strike by the Nordair pilots which may come as early as tomorrow morning.

Would the minister bring the House of Commons on what has transpired to this point and, specifically, how close are the pilots and the company to a settlement so that, hopefully, this further disruption may be averted before tomorrow?

Hon. André Ouellet (Acting Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, we have asked officials of the Department of Labour to look into this dispute and try to find a way of avoiding the disruption of service. The Department of Labour is giving assistance in relation to that conflict and we hope there will be no stoppage of activities.

PROPOSED STRIKE BY NORDAIR PILOTS—CONTINGENCY PLANS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Minister of Transport. In the unfortunate event there is a strike at Nordair, has the Department of Transport given any consideration to placing additional flights, either by Air Canada or another third-level air carrier, to fill the void that will certainly be created, especially in areas such as the eastern Arctic and northern parts of Quebec which will be without air service of any kind in terms of bringing in supplies and other products?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I think it would be premature to comment on the situation, except to indicate that in circumstances like this the practice of the Canadian Transport Commission, among others, is to attempt to facilitate substitute arrangements.

PUBLIC SERVICE

REQUEST LAY-OFFS BE REDUCED IN NATIONAL CAPITAL REGION

Mr. Gaston Isabelle (Hull): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In view of the announced budgetary cutbacks which will indirectly result in a reduction in the number of man-years in the public service, especially in the national capital area, does the minister intend to take what I would call drastic action so that the departments adhere religiously to the spirit of his October 12, 1978, statement, as well as to the statement made by the chairman of the Public Service Commission in this regard, in order to minimize the number of lay-offs among the civil servants of the national capital region?

[English]

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the work force reduction policy to which I have made some public reference does provide for reassignment of surplus employees to other jobs for which they are fitted and which become vacant. Relocation and retraining will be provided where this will assist in making people competent for the particular jobs. Reassignment will be based upon preference for those who are competent to fill the vacant positions. The Public Service Commission has established the reassignment program, a new clearance system which will give preference to government employees whose jobs have become redundant, and will help in every way to relocate them.

The work force reduction program is based on the 1969 policy but it has been adjusted in consultation among the national joint council and the heads of the bargaining agents. Full details will be made public in the very near future. One or two items still have to be decided upon.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ANTICIPATED LEVEL OF GOVERNMENT'S CASH DEFICIT FOR 1980

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Finance, I think my question should properly be put to the President of the Treasury Board, who on September 8 joined the Minister of Finance at a press conference, at which time it was indicated that 1980 expenditures would be $52.6 billion and that the government's anticipated cash deficit would be $9.7 billion.

Would the President of the Treasury Board indicate to us the revenue figures used to come up with a cash deficit of $9.7 billion? How much does the government anticipate its revenue to be for fiscal 1980?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the over-all receipts of the Government of Canada is a matter of simple deduction based on those two figures, so the hon. member can make any forecast as easily as I can. The Minister of Finance has indicated, however, that the detailed breakdown of revenue and other receipts will be presented to the House in a budget some time in mid-November.

REFERENCE OF BILL C-7 TO COMMITTEE

Mr. Sinclair Stevens (York-Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact there is some uncertainty about the shortfall in fiscal year 1980 between the government's revenue figures, which are well short of their expenditures figure of $52.6 billion, would the Prime Minister at least consider speaking to the House leader with a view to having Bill C-7 referred to a committee of the whole House, so that the membership of the House can deal with the bill, get the facts on the table and, above all, let the people of Canada see through television exactly what is the position of the Minister of Finance?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has a very able House leader who, through the so-called usual channels, meets with the House leader on the government side. I am sure that if the hon. member has representations to make to his House leader, he could bring them up at the weekly caucus, if he ever goes.

POST OFFICE

LOCKING-OUT OF EMPLOYEES AT OAKVILLE, ONT.

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Postmaster General: it is further to my motion, which I noticed the Postmaster General turned down.

I should like to ask him on whose orders postal workers were locked out, without pay, in Oakville and elsewhere, and what steps is he taking to compensate the people affected?

[Translation]

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I inquired concerning the Oakville case, and if orders were given not to pay employees who came to work, that will be immediately rectified. The government's general policy since Bill C-8 was made law is that all postal workers or letter carriers who report to our facilities are to be received, given work and paid.

[English]

LAYING OF CHARGES AGAINST ILLEGAL STRIKERS

Mr. Otto Jelinek (High Park-Humber Valley): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Justice.

In view of the fact that there are a number of rank and file members of CUPW who would like to return to work and obey the law because Canadians are getting sick and tired of this postal strike which has been going against the law for nearly a week, when are the minister and the government going to stop pussy-footing around on this issue and lay the obvious charges, particularly against the union leadership, and bring postal service back by perhaps decertifying the union and replacing those unwilling to work with the many unemployed?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am fairly well satisfied that the attitude demonstrated by the hon. member would not be helpful in settling the dispute. In fact, in addition to developing material in order to lay charges, to which I referred earlier, we are proceeding to attempt to obtain injunctions in a variety of places. The immediate objective is to end the picketing so that it is easier and, indeed, possible for those who wish to return to work to do so.

CONSULTATION WITH ATTORNEY GENERAL OF ONTARIO

Mr. Jim Fleming (York West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Justice, in this area of questioning, whether he has any comment to make or if he has reacted by contacting the Attorney General of Ontario or the chairman of the metro police commission, on media reports which seemingly indicate that the chief of police of metropolitan Toronto is not prepared to have his staff act against illegal CUPW picket-line activity.

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the report of the comment by the chief of police of Toronto was in connection with the situation as it exists in advance of an injunction being obtained. Police forces, of course, attempt to exercise their responsibilities and to carry out their duties, recognizing that at any given moment in time there may be a series of priorities with which they have to work.

I believe that, in fact, the comments of the chief of police are more in aid of obtaining an injunction and the subsequent enforcement of that injunction than they are pointed in any other direction.

ENERGY

FUTURE OF HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. It has been announced that $116 million will be chopped from the budget of the Canadian Home Insulation Program over the next two years.

When this program was unveiled, the minister described the Canadian Home Insulation Program as the "key item" in a campaign to reduce the average rate of growth of energy use in Canada to zero per cent, per person, by 1985. With the cutback of funds to this program, I would like to ask the minister if he has abandoned that objective and decided to write off CHIP as a failure.

Hon. Alastair Gillespie (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Not at all, Mr. Speaker: the program is going forward. Some 50,000 householders across the country have benefited from the program. We would expect some hundreds of thousands to benefit from it in the next year and the year following.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, it is rather interesting that the minister says the program is going ahead even though they are cutting back $116 million.

URBAN AFFAIRS

ALLEGED FAILURE OF DEPARTMENT TO PROMOTE HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of State for Urban Affairs, who is responsible for the administration of the Canadian Home Insulation Program through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

In view of the fact that the Canadian Home Insulation Program has been taken advantage of by only 50,000 of the 1.2 million single-unit dwellings eligible for the grant, I would like to ask the minister why his department has failed so miserably to promote the very worth-while aims and objectives of this program.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of State for Urban Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the department has failed. It would be more accurate to say that the public did not respond to this program as quickly as we would have liked. But is does not prevent the Canadian government from putting subventions at the disposal of those who wish to insulate their homes. We believe in the utility of this program. We will continue to promote it in order to encourage the Canadian public to take advantage of it and by doing so, we hope not only that energy conservation will be greater in Canada, but also that home owners insulating their homes will get some advantage out of it as they will save money on their heating bills.

GRAIN

REASON FOR LEASING ELEVATOR AT PRESCOTT, ONT.

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport and concerns a matter that is very important in my part of the country, namely, the plan announced last week by the National Harbours Board to call tenders for the leasing of the government-owned, large grain elevator establishment at Prescott, Ontario, to be run by private enterprise.

Could the minister tell the House the reasons for the government taking this step, when in actual fact the establishment is making money for the government? Also, is he prepared to guarantee that job security will be written into any lease entered into by the government for the 30 full-time and 40 part-time public service employees engaged at this establishment?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that the hon. member does not understand why at certain times a facility can be handled by the private sector rather than by the government. We think that can often be done to advantage, and this particular case seems to be such a situation.

Of course, we will be looking at proposals or bids with many interests in mind, including those of the employees, and we will attempt to assure that employment is offered as far as possible. We will also look at bids from the point of view of the Foreign Investment Review Agency's principles in order to ensure the best result for Canada in the way the operation of these facilities continues.

Mr. Cossitt: Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. I am surprised that the minister would want to dispose of a public enterprise that is making money for the government.

May I ask the minister this supplementary question? Can he explain why the National Harbours Board refused completely to give any information on the matter of job security last week to the Public Service Alliance of Canada?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I was not aware of the request or the refusal. I will look into that matter.

INDUSTRY

TAKEOVER OF CANADIAN BUSINESSES

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister filling in for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce who is away for a 95 per cent segment of his assignment.

Last week, in an answer to a question by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary, he indicated that FIRA approved the Weyerhaeuser purchase of Northwood mills under some very specific considerations.

● (1452)

Is one of those considerations the fact that lumber retailers in the lower mainland of British Columbia must go to the United States in order to make their purchases respecting Canadian lumber sales within Canada? Also, what implications will this have on the market?

Hon. A. C. Abbott (Minister of State (Small Business)): Mr. Speaker, I will report this allegation to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I could not give an answer right now.

Mr. Friesen: It is not only an allegation; it is the only number in the phone book. I would also like to ask the minister whether he has considered the unenviable position of the small, independent mills which will be cut off from their market for chips and, therefore, could be driven out of business because of this unfortunate sale.

Mr. Abbott: Again, Mr. Speaker, I cannot comment on the details. When the minister returns, I know he will deal with it in detail.

Oral Questions

FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCES

AGENDA FOR FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Miss Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister: it concerns the conference of first ministers which is slated to take place beginning next week.

I wish to ask the Prime Minister whether the agenda for that conference has been finalized, and whether it will be made public beforehand so that Canadians will know what matters will be discussed at this very important conference.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Yes, Mr. Speaker, the agenda has been formalized. I remember a series of exchanges between the premiers and myself in which we agreed on an agenda. I will see if there is any reason why that agenda could not be tabled. Surely, we would be anxious to do so. I will find out, I believe before tomorrow, if there is any objection on the part of any premiers. I would think not.

Miss MacDonald: Can the Prime Minister inform the House whether the agenda will include a discussion of the terms of reference to the Supreme Court of certain constitutional amendments which were announced some weeks ago by the Minister of Justice?

Mr. Trudeau: Mr. Speaker, I am not clear on the nature of the subject. I do not have any memory of the statement of the Minister of Justice to which the hon. lady refers.

PUBLIC SERVICE

STUDY OF OVERCLASSIFICATION OF EMPLOYEES

Mr. Lincoln M. Alexander (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the President of the Treasury Board dealing with overclassification in the public service. I need not remind the minister that, as a result of the ineptness and mismanagement of this government, the people of Canada have been faced with millions of dollars in waste.

Prior to the summer break, the minister indicated he would have a full study made outside of the national capital region. My question is very short, Mr. Speaker.

An hon. Member: Well, ask it.

Mr. Alexander: Watch your language, Mr. Minister. The Acting Minister of Labour is using profanity. Just watch your language.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Alexander: I don't understand, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would put his question.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Mr. Abbott.]

Mr. Alexander: I would like to know whether the study the minister said would be undertaken has been completed. If so, has he anything to report in terms of what action he is going to take in order to rectify this very serious matter?

Hon. Robert K. Andras (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the classification audit in the national capital area and in the non-capital area is, I understand, complete or very close to completion. I have not had an opportunity to study it in detail. Until I have had that chance, I cannot comment further.

Mr. Alexander: Given the fact this government is so interested in freedom of information, will the minister make this study public, so that we will know what the problems are and how we can attack them, or are we to be faced with the usual cover-up for which this government is so famous?

Mr. Andras: Mr. Speaker, we will give the information to the hon. member as we do in 95 per cent of these kinds of cases.

* * *

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

CHANGES TO PROGRAM—EFFECT ON PROVINCES

Mr. John Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. When the minister announced the recent changes in the Unemployment Insurance Act, he suggested there would be a minimal effect on the provinces. Someone said the effect would be $50 million across the country, a figure which is disputed by the provincial governments, who feel it will be more like $100 million to $200 million.

Will the minister assure the House that he will table the method by which he calculated this $50 million overrun on the social welfare programs of this country?

Hon. Bud Cullen (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, because of the concern expressed by my provincial colleagues, I met with them and we set up an impact committee to look into this measure. That meeting was held on October 19. Four of the provinces indicated they cannot dispute the figures submitted by us.

The information that was tabled before the ministers and their officials will be made available either at the committee stage or at second reading of the bill. Although some people are not prepared to accept the $50 million figure, they do not have a model whereby it can be contradicted. We must remember that the Canada Assistance Plan makes provision for us to pick up 50 per cent of that cost. Therefore, it is closer to $25 million than $50 million.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

BUS SERVICE IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Transport. As the minister should know, the CN bus service—the only trans-island bus service in Newfoundland—has applied to the CTC for a rate increase of 38 per cent, 20 per cent on November 1 and 18 per cent next February 1, after receiving increases of 23 per cent over the past two years. The CTC has stated that under the law it must give the increase on an interim basis to CN on November 1, despite the fact there will have been no hearing to that point.

Will the minister direct CN to withdraw these outrageous increases which they are looking for, in view of the government's battle against inflation and all the other economic policies we have heard described in the last few weeks?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, we have been looking closely at the rate structure of buses in the CN service in Newfoundland, particularly with regard to seeing whether the rates at any given point in time seemed to be moving ahead of those in other parts of Canada, especially in the Atlantic area. This had not previously been the case; the rates in Newfoundland had been in line with or lower than other Atlantic rates. That does not end our concern, however. Following the Sullivan commission interim report, we have been discussing the question of the possible transfer of the bus system from CN to VIA. Those discussions are going forward very well.

Mr. Crosbie: The Sullivan commission, which the minister appointed, stated that CN fares are far and above what are reasonable. It recommended lower fares, fares that would be comparable to a trans-island railway passenger fare because this system replaced the railway passenger system. Is the minister going to act on those recommendations? I ask this in view of the fact that CN was stated to have unsuitable, inadequate equipment, and the fares were described by that independent commission as being far too high.

Is the minister going to act? VIA Rail will still have to impose fares. Will the minister now act on this fare question, in accordance with the royal commission?

Mr. Lang: Mr. Speaker, I have indicated my concern that the fares not be too high and outlined the comparisons of them in Newfoundland with bus fares in other regions, such as the rest of the Atlantic provinces. Bus fares are very often slightly lower than comparable rail fares for similar distances. Therefore, that comparison may be even more favourable than the one the hon. member suggests.

Recent developments have seen the acquisition of three new buses, and discussions in conjunction with VIA's takeover of the service will involve the acquiring of new equipment so that better service can be provided to the people of Newfoundland.

PROPOSED STRIKE BY NORDAIR PILOTS—AIR CANADA CONTROL OF NORDAIR

Mr. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport: it is supplementary to that asked by my colleague from Lisgar.

One of the considerations in the new negotiations between the employees of Nordair and the company relates to the acquisition by Air Canada. As there is some apprehension in terms of labour relations on this issue, has the government reconsidered its position with regard to Air Canada acquiring control of Nordair, or does it continue to hold the position that Air Canada should pursue that application?

Hon. Otto E. Lang (Minister of Transport and Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member misstates the current situation. An appeal is before the governor in council on the very question of whether the Canadian Transport Commission's decision in approving the acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada should go ahead. I should emphasize that even that decision very clearly stated that the Nordair's operations should remain separate and distinct from those of Air Canada. I thought that would be somewhat applicable to the parties in this labour dispute.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: I want to ask the minister a straightforward question. Is the government's position that it will support the appeal with regard to the acquisition of Nordair by Air Canada, or will they take a contrary position and reject that appeal, which would then prevent Air Canada acquiring control of Nordair?

● (1502)

Mr. Lang: The hon. member is asking what decision we have reached. We have not announced a decision because we have not yet taken a decision. We have given careful consideration to all the issues involved, to the arguments advanced before the CTC and to the conclusion which was reached. As soon as a decision is made by the government as to whether or not the takeover should be confirmed, that decision will be announced.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRIESEN—BROADCASTING OF CBC LICENCE RENEWAL APPLICATION PROCEEDINGS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Some days ago, at the earliest opportunity, I gave you notice of my wish to raise a question which I felt I should bring before the House as it seemed to me to touch upon parliamentary privilege. The incident involves the behaviour of the CBC in relation to a member of parliament, namely, myself. The CBC is a Crown corporation responsible to parliament. Crown corporations enjoy a wide measure of independence and freedom from government control, which is quite proper. This means, however, that they must be accountable to parliament for their actions. Without parliamentary control and supervision their autonomy would be virtually total, and since they exist to serve the public interest, and incur vast public expenditures in the process, control by parliament, as I think all hon. members would agree, is absolutely vital.

On October 7 I appeared before the CRTC hearings to make an intervention relative to the CBC licence renewal application. CBC provided direct feed of these hearings to all cable systems across Canada via satellite.

I provided an advance copy of my remarks to the CBC president and vice president. When my turn came on the agenda, I was announced by Mr. Camu to be the next intervener. At that point the television screens in the West immediately went black with instantaneous supply of recorded music for the ten minute duration of my presentation. I have checked and there were no technical problems with the cable systems or telephone companies. I was told that the problem was at the source, namely, the CBC. In addition to this, if technology had been a problem the CBC has not seen fit to send me an explanation.

This is a very brief account of the incident which forms the subject of my complaint. I submit that the evidence of members of parliament at these hearings has a significance which is of some importance. It is certainly no less important than that of other witnesses, and may even have a special importance in view of parliament's unique responsibilities in overseeing the activities of the CBC. I believe I was the victim of a serious affront on the part of the CBC in my capacity as a member of parliament. I believe that the CRTC was similarly affronted, as in blacking out my evidence the CBC was impairing the coverage of the CRTC's hearings. I have written to the CRTC notifying them of this misadventure.

I do not know whether I have chosen the appropriate method of bringing this matter before the attention of the House, but I felt it was my duty to do so and I knew of no other way. In conclusion, I would request that if this matter is not considered to be a fitting one to refer to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections, it be referred instead to the Standing Committee on Broadcasting, Films and Assistance to the Arts. I feel strongly that I should be given the opportunity to submit this matter to the judgment of my fellow-members and that the CBC should be called upon to offer an explanation.

Mr. Speaker: In the course of his remarks the hon. member did make reference to the relationship between the CBC, as a Crown corporation, and parliament. The role of the corporation is, as we know, a special one. Nevertheless, I would hope that in these circumstances the Secretary of State (Mr. Roberts), who reports to parliament for the CBC, would wish to look into the allegations made by the hon. member and report back to the House, at which time the House can address itself to the question of whether a question of privilege can properly be founded. Until that time, pending an intervention by the Secretary of State, I will certainly preserve the right of the hon. member to proceed with his question of privilege.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Yvon Pinard (Parliamentary Secretary to President of Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

[English]

Mr. Tom Cossitt (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I rise with regard to question No. 3 on the order paper because it has been on successive order papers for two years and four months. It was put down on May 25, 1976, and it still stands.

When I raised a point of order a few days ago with regard to several other unanswered questions, the reply from the parliamentary secretary was to the effect that a lot of these questions call for a great deal of research. That was one of his excuses for the failure to answer them. I submit that very little research is needed in order to answer this question—that it could be answered in about an hour if somebody wanted to take the trouble. It asks simply this: how many ministers of the Crown have been accepting a $2,000 car allowance year, and how many have not; how many have returned the $2,000 car allowance year, and how many have not; how many have returned the $2,000 because they are not using it—they are being driven around in chauffeur-driven limousines supplied by the government? For example, is the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), with his chauffeur-driven battleship, accepting this $2,000 on the side?

Does it really take two years and four months to find out how many of these gentlemen, who are so busy they have now left the chamber, are accepting $2,000 they do not really need because they do not use their personal cars? I fail to understand why it should take so long to answer such a simple question. When the parliamentary secretary rises to reply I hope he will not confuse the issue by giving us various percentages, as he usually does, saying the government has answered 70 per cent or 80 per cent or 90 per cent of the questions, and so on. Will he simply tell us why it has taken two years and four months to inform the House which of these ministers are taking money from the public trough?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, there is no doubt that in the mind of the hon. member that question can be of great public concern in Canada. Nevertheless it does not belong to me to decide whether his question is relevant or not.

I will merely point out to the hon. member that last year we began answering questions on the order paper the tenth day after the Speech from the Throne. Today is eighth day and the hon. member says that he has been waiting for two years. I do not think that a few days or months more will overly tax his patience.

Anyhow, Mr. Speaker, his question required research in some forty agencies or departments. We are therefore making thorough inquiries to provide thorough and accurate answers as we usually do.

And as he pointed out very aptly, last year we answered almost 90 per cent of the questions, including 90 per cent of those which came from the hon. member himself. He realizes, therefore, that he has been well taken care of by this parliament and I can assure him that we will continue to do so.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: Order. Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1978-79-80

MEASURE TO GRANT SUPPLEMENTARY BORROWING POWER

The House resumed, from Friday, October 20, consideration of the motion of Mr. Chrétien that Bill C-7, to provide supplementary borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1978-79, to provide borrowing authority for the fiscal year 1979-80 and to amend the Financial Administration Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs, and the amendment thereto (Mr. Stevens) (p. 271).

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: The question is upon the amendment. All those in favour of the amendment will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the amendment (Mr. Stevens) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I therefore declare the amendment lost.

Amendment (Mr. Stevens) negatived.

Mr. Speaker: The question then is upon the main motion.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, this is the first opportunity I have had to rise in this House since returning on October 10 to start this new session, and it is my first opportunity to make the observation that this is a government in chaos. It is a government that has lost control of its mandate to run the country.

We were told that it was important to bring the House back to face serious economic problems and economic legislation and the government's program for turning around the economy of the country. There is not a single economic bill on the order paper, however, nor is there any of the promised legislation for action that the government said was awaiting the recall of the House. There is not any of the promised legislation and action that the government said it was awaiting the recall of the House in order to deal with, put it in place, and get the economy rolling again. There are no economic bills. There are no references to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs of such things as the commodity tax or Bank Act, items which were not completed in the last session of this parliament and given as examples by this government of vital pieces of legislation which needed to be handled by this House.

● (1612)

We have been promised a budget for the latter part of November. However, before that budget this government has the colossal gall to bring in this bill asking for authority to borrow $17 billion. That is an incredible sum, totally incomprehensible.

We are not told what the money is required for, what government expenditures are going to be next year, what anticipated revenues will be next year, what the rates will be, and whether there will be increases or decreases in the taxes. We are told nothing.

This country, through this House, is given absolutely no information about the government's plans for next year, yet we are asked to give the government authority to plunge this country further into debt to the tune of $17 billion. Can you imagine an individual or corporation going to a bank and saying, "I would like to borrow some money. I would like a line of credit for a few tens or hundreds of thousands." The bank is likely to ask for what purpose. "Well, I can't tell you." The bank would ask how you are going to repay the loan. You would say, "I can't tell you for sure." When asked how are you going to spend the money you would reply, "I can't tell you that, but I ask you to give me this loan now because I need it, but I can't tell you for what." You would be thrown out on your ear. You would not get one red cent from that banker.

[Mr. Speaker.]

That is the situation here. This government is coming to this House and asking for authority to borrow $17 billion. We are asked to trust it in terms of why it is needed.

We have a trustee position with regard to the taxpayers of this country. We have been elected by our constituents to represent their interests. When the government asks that a debt be incurred on their behalf, we have a responsibility to ask for what purpose, and to deny that authority until such time as we have been told why. Anyone who does not live up to that responsibility is failing the taxpayers within his constituency.

We are told that this is an emergency and the government needs the borrowing authority now. Some emergency! Last Friday we were quite ready to vote on the amendment. Apparently the government was not. We had to endure the spectacle of the Solicitor General (Mr. Blais) proving to this House and the country that he knows as much about economics as he does about law. He rambled on in such a manner, using up the allotted time so there would not be a vote on that day. That is an example of a government in a hurry to get things done and move on with the nation's business—the Solicitor General standing up in the House to kill time, trying to make it sound as though he knows something about economics.

We would be failing in our responsibility to pass this legislation without questioning. This is an incomprehensible sum, $17 billion. In order to get it down to something we can understand, I will refer to income tax statistics. There are approximately nine million taxpayer in this country. On a per capita basis, that represents $2,000 for each taxpayer. That is not per individual but per taxpayer in this country. In 1976, the last year for which figures are available, the total income tax collected from these nearly nine million taxpayers was only $13,808 million. We are being asked to authorize borrowing in excess of the total income tax collected in the last year for which data are available.

If anyone managed their business, home or private life in that manner, they would be bankrupt. That is precisely what this government is doing, bankrupting us. This is precisely what the world economic community is telling us in driving our dollar down to 84 cents. They are saying precisely the same thing to this government that a banker would say to you, or I if we walked in and said, "We want more money; don't ask us why; don't ask us how we are going to repay it; we don't know but we will figure it out, trust us."
