THE SISTERS.

Once upon a time, there was a King and a Queen who had two daughters, the eldest called Melissa the youngest Fennete. One day their god-mother, who was a fairy, called to her two princesses, and addressed them thus:

"My children, for many years I have watched over you with a mother's care. I now feel myself obliged to leave you forever, but ere I go I wish to perform for you one last act of love. Follow me!"

So saying, the fairy turned and set forth towards the rising sun. And the two princesses, wondering at her words, followed her steps, until they arrived at the foot of a mountain, where the fairy paused and bade them look around them. And they obeyed.

Two roads leading right and left branched off from the foot of the mountain. That on the right was narrow, hard, and full of rocks, thorns, and brambles, and the end was lost in a dense cloud, so black, so ominous, that the young princesses drew back in horror. The road to the left was broad, smooth, and pleasant, and strewn with flowers. Roses grew by the wayside—birds sang gaily, keeping time to the dashing music of crystal fountains, that glistened all along the way—Dew, vapory clouds of gold and crimson shrouded its ending from the eyes.

"My children, begin the fairy, those two paths are both open to you. That on the right, though difficult to travel—though the thorns may tear your flesh, yet leads to the Garden of Peace, where ease and sorrow are no more. That on the left, fair as it looks to the eye, leads to the River of Da-knees, where gloom and desolation shall forever dwell. Now make your choice!"

"This for me, then," cried Melissa, turning into the broad path, "so fair a path must end in joy. Come my sister!"

"Nay, my sister, I shall go toward the Garden of Peace. The path may be rough, but I shall reach my goal. Follow me!" And the princess, fixing her eyes on the far off cloud, set out for the Garden of Peace.

A young girl, fair, frail and spiritual, sat reading this tale aloud. Now she had her book down and turning to her companion, a maiden of brilliant beauty, whose crimson cheeks, flashing black eyes, and full red lips, bespoke a passionate, fiery nature, she said:

"Leone! I have been wondering to-day, if you and I had been those princesses, which path would we have chosen?"

"I should have done as Melissa did," replied Leone, tossing back the raven curls from her broad, bold brow; "no narrow, thorny paths for me. I shall ever wander among roses."

"And had it been the River of Da-knees," said the other, half sadly, Leone, "I can see it all—there is a deep moral to this tale. Our path through life must lead either way—which shall we choose? The one will end in the Valley of the Shadow of Death, and the other in Heaven."

"Now, Rose, don't afflict me with a sermon," said Leone, turning impatiently in her chair. "It was a large dim shadowy room in which the sisters sat. Heavy dark curtains draped the lofty windows, and excluded the bright streaks of the winter sun. The rich soft carpet, large, quiet old-fashioned chairs, dim, strange pictures, and very costly hangings, bespoke boundless wealth."

"There was no light in the room, save the red, flickering uncertain glow of the fire, that cast fantastic shadows all around, and vainly strove to penetrate the gloom."

Rose Mortimer sat in her large old chair—her thoughtful grey eyes fixed on the fire. Very sweet and fair she looked, with the wavy golden hair falling from the pale intellectual brow. No one would have called her beautiful; she was too slight, too fragile, too pale for that, and yet there was something far, far higher than mere beauty that shone from her clear eyes. A noble soul, free and untrammelled, without 'one stain of earth' was hers.

Very, very different looked Leone, with her fiery intensity, black eyes flashing, and sparkling like diamonds; her wealth of raven hair falling in heavy masses over her rounded shoulders—her exquisitely voluptuous figure and finely formed head, were the very embodiment of pride and of beauty, yet a beauty of all other kinds.

"To-morrow we must part, sister Leone," said Rose, raising her clear eyes to the bright, dark face beside her; "when in your far distant abode, I can almost fancy I see those two paths before me, and now is the time to choose. In which will you walk when far from home, Leone?"

"How silly you are Rose!" said Leone impatiently. "I have not already told you the path I look as though my path led through thorns? And she glanced proudly at the reflection at the beautiful face mirroring her own face.

"And the end, Leone?"

"Do hasten, Rose. I protest you are the most drowsy creature I ever knew. Why, how late is it!" she added, as the great clock struck 11. "I am going to bed. Good night! And Leone swept from the room with the mien of an empress."

Once, twice, thrice, the clock struck again—yet Rose still sat gazing dreamily into the bright candle. Could she see there two distinct paths through life, both as full of darkness?

Month after month glided by, and the three years allotted Leone to remain at school were past and gone. Rose received her education at home. She was too frail and delicate to be entrusted to strangers, and amid the shadowy charm of the old manor house, and the dim, dark fire, she had reached the age of eighteen.

But of late Rose had been studying another lesson, one that brought the rich light to her eloquent face—that kindled a new light in her eyes—that made her heart beat at the sound of a well-known footstep, and thrill at the rich tones of an eloquent voice—a lesson she had learned gazing in the blue eyes of Walter Mortimer.

Mr. Mortimer looked upon the growing attachment of his daughter and the life of the old manor house with a gloomy eye.

"And so you love my sweet Rose?" said

The Mail steamer arrived at Halifax on Monday last, and notwithstanding we have railways and fast steamers it occupies the good old time three or four days for transmission of the Mails to this city, the mail having arrived during last night. Our English Correspondent's letter arrived too late to appear in this impression.

PUBLIC MEETING.
On Tuesday last in accordance with a resolution to the High Sheriff for that purpose, a Public Meeting of the inhabitants of this city was held at the Mechanics Institute. Lord Bray being here on his way to England, he was deemed a fitting opportunity to hear from the lips of his Lordship the purpose of his mission to the Colonies, on the question of connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. His Lordship having received an intimation that the citizens were desirous of hearing from him, kindly condescended to comply with their request. The meeting was large and a national might be expected so conscientious a question, and at the precise hour his Lordship made his appearance. James A. Harding, Esq., High Sheriff being called to the chair briefly stated the purpose of the meeting, which was to hear from his Lordship as to the proposed scheme for connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. His Lordship stated that he had been appointed by the British Government to visit the Colonies, and to report on the question of connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. He stated that he had been appointed by the British Government to visit the Colonies, and to report on the question of connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian.

There but calm, steady resolve. No trace of the emotion which had been his for some time. It was as if he had anticipated. For a while Walter was silent and sad. Now that Rose was lost to him forever, he began to see her true color. Yet the magnetic smile, the brilliant glance of the peerless Lenore, soon made him forget all else. One month after his conversation with Rose, Lenore Montrose became the bride of Walter Montrose.

The wedding was very private, no one being present save the intimate friends of the family—Rose had declined herself to attend, and whatever her feelings might have been, she made no sign, no faltering of the voice, no pallor of cheek or lip betrayed her secret; yet, as she looked at the bride by her sister's side, where once she had hoped to kneel by his, a deadly faintness came over her. It passed in a moment, and with smiling brow and lip she sat down to her seat for the first time as Mrs. Montrose.

Walter and Lenore were to depart immediately for a bridal tour on the Continent. The congratulations were given and received, the good-byes spoken, she had embraced Lenore, met the last look she might ever receive from the blue eyes she loved so well, she saw the carriage drive away on her behalf, she saw the groom step into her room, with a vague sense of utter, after desolation.

RECORDED.
The Office of the Chronicle is removed to the Brick Building corner of Prince Wm. street and Market Square, over Mr. Hutchinson's Store.

The Mail steamer arrived at Halifax on Monday last, and notwithstanding we have railways and fast steamers it occupies the good old time three or four days for transmission of the Mails to this city, the mail having arrived during last night. Our English Correspondent's letter arrived too late to appear in this impression.

PUBLIC MEETING.
On Tuesday last in accordance with a resolution to the High Sheriff for that purpose, a Public Meeting of the inhabitants of this city was held at the Mechanics Institute. Lord Bray being here on his way to England, he was deemed a fitting opportunity to hear from the lips of his Lordship the purpose of his mission to the Colonies, on the question of connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. His Lordship having received an intimation that the citizens were desirous of hearing from him, kindly condescended to comply with their request. The meeting was large and a national might be expected so conscientious a question, and at the precise hour his Lordship made his appearance. James A. Harding, Esq., High Sheriff being called to the chair briefly stated the purpose of the meeting, which was to hear from his Lordship as to the proposed scheme for connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. His Lordship stated that he had been appointed by the British Government to visit the Colonies, and to report on the question of connecting the Lower Provinces by Rail Road with the Canadian. There but calm, steady resolve. No trace of the emotion which had been his for some time. It was as if he had anticipated. For a while Walter was silent and sad. Now that Rose was lost to him forever, he began to see her true color. Yet the magnetic smile, the brilliant glance of the peerless Lenore, soon made him forget all else. One month after his conversation with Rose, Lenore Montrose became the bride of Walter Montrose.

The wedding was very private, no one being present save the intimate friends of the family—Rose had declined herself to attend, and whatever her feelings might have been, she made no sign, no faltering of the voice, no pallor of cheek or lip betrayed her secret; yet, as she looked at the bride by her sister's side, where once she had hoped to kneel by his, a deadly faintness came over her. It passed in a moment, and with smiling brow and lip she sat down to her seat for the first time as Mrs. Montrose.
