MOVEMENTS OF THE COMBINED FLEETS IN THE BLACK SEA.
On the evening of the 25th of April, the several Russian prisoners taken in the merchant vessels captured by the English and French, vessels of war were sent on board the Sardinian brig, and sent to Odessa, from the lifting of which, at daylight on the 26th, both fleets took their departure, to the no small delight of the inhabitants of the town, who could not be brought to give credit for the moderation which under the circumstances of the case has been shown in sparing it as the English and French admirals have done. Next morning a strange steamer was reported, but at a great distance, whereupon the Arctus and Sampson were sent in chase, and though, after a while, the steamer disappeared, still they had the satisfaction of finding that they had come up to the

WHAT SIR CHARLES IS WAITING FOR IN THE BALTIC.
The crisis of the Baltic enterprise seems near at hand. Under date of the 2d of May, we hear of bitter east winds and thick falling snow; of the fleet of Stockholm remaining stationary, with crowds of citizens, to see the fleet; on the 5th, of fog so thick, that the ships could not stir. In Finland, meantime the season is mild, and vegetation is rapidly advancing. The month of May is always the season of suspense at St. Petersburg—the time when it is said the Russian Czar, who shows only by catches, looks out, to go forth, almost before anybody else is stirring, to observe the aspect of his watery realm, and see which way the wind is. The suspense is about the wind; and even now, in this most solemn spring season of all the fifty-seven he has known, the movements of the wind are of more consequence to Nicholas than even those of the allies. A long continuance of strong east winds would do more for him than all the preparations he can make. A rush of west wind would ruin him more speedily and thoroughly than all his united enemies could, without its help. The suspense is about this. The fog is the token that the crisis is at hand. The fog precedes the breaking up of the ice in the Neva; and it will be succeeded by those singular twilight nights, of unequalled beauty, which are the only charm of the desolate region in which St. Petersburg stands. While the fog lasts, the sentinels on the water-towers in the city look out in vain, come towards Ledge, some up the Neva, some towards the sea. They can hear something, but see nothing. So it is with the commandments at Sveaborg and at Cronstadt; and perhaps with our "Champion" walking the deck, and talking to himself. What he is listening for is the arrival of the French squadron, which will enable him to proceed to his work when the fog-curtain rises. What the Russians are listening for is, first, the wind. To some it comes sighing over the gentry plains which stretch to the margin of the gulf, whence they look like a mere drift upon the waters. Over that barren bleak expanse the wind comes sighing through the rushes, with an occasional bark of the wolf, or burst of the din of the waterfowl in the pools which are already melted. The cracks of the ice are naturally most impressive and sound the loudest in the night. The Czar and his sentries are already on the watch; but now the citizens rise, and look out in vain through the fog. Some dress and go to the wharves, though it is much too soon to conjecture how high the water will rise. Next comes the crash of the ice, driven up in heaps in the river, or against the wharves; and then the more anxious sound—the swash of the driven waters. The thing most desired is a moderate east wind; and this is what usually happens. A violent east wind might be the signal for a general retreat, but the fearful thing is a strong west wind, turning back the flood on its way to the Gulf. Then it is less the swash of waters pouring down than the roar of the sea coming up; and what the tide may do, the consequence is that the world saw in 1824. The vessels that were not captured by the meeting of the floods were carried over the wharves, and stranded on the sands which were arable fields the day before. The nine rivers and seven canals on which St. Petersburg is seated all overflowed at once; and the flood covered into the upper chambers of the best houses in the capital. At Cronstadt, a large vessel was drifted into the main street of the town and left there. Every successive year adds to the peril of such a chance; for every year does St. Petersburg settle lower down in the swamp. Slight as the stagnant alluvial matter is, it is not without its disagreeable facts, this very disagreeable fact is well understood. The mallet is heard, driving new piles incessantly—that is a sound that cannot be nullified. The blocks of granite on the quays settle unequally; that is an irregularity which the mallet of the Czar cannot prohibit or punish. The walls of palaces crack, and hovels sink down endway into the bog, and all the world may see them melt down or be shored up. The destruction will be horrible some day; and every inhabitant knows it, and they hope that the mallet may be put to rest. If, as it east wind should carry up—not the sea only, but those who are now riding that sea—what then! This is what the Czar is listening for; for the one other sound—the boom of cannon—which might for once rival in terror the roar of the sea. From Cronstadt, 10 miles off, the pipe of the Admiralty and the glittering cupolas of St. Petersburg may be seen on a clear day. Cronstadt is nearer to St. Petersburg than Gravesend is to London. From St. Petersburg the boom of such cannon as we have sent there may be heard from Cronstadt, if we have the resources of 14 years of naval improvement, he cannot deal with the shallows of Cronstadt.

to oblige her to abandon an English merchant brig which she had just previously captured, and was towing for a Russian port. These prizes were not that moment by the English; and in order that force might not appear too imminent on reaching Sebastopol, for which the fleets were steering—and by way of cutting the anxiety out of his stronghold—the Queen and Marango, ships of the line, received orders to part company from her. On the 25th the sailing of Sebastopol was reached; and on the 26th the sailing of the Tiger and Fury joined, having been back to Odessa for a reconnoitre, and steamed round by the coast of the Crimea, without falling in with a single vessel. At about five p.m. on the 26th, when the fleets were about 35 miles distant from the port of Sebastopol, a steamer was seen, coming from that direction, which left no doubt of her being a Russian. The Tiger was ordered down upon her, when she soon went round, and stood back again to port, into which she got by dusk, the Tiger having chased her nearly within the Indefatigable and Vauban, to guard against her being any decoy or snare, which no doubt was the case, since from the Tiger's deck five steamers were observed to have their steam up, and the four frigates had run up their topsails ready for a start.
