INTRODUCTION

INTRODUCTION

Le présent volume et celui qui suivra traitent de la politique extérieure du Canada pendant les 18 derniers mois de la Deuxième Guerre mondiale et les premiers mois de la période de paix. Tout comme pour les trois volumes précédents de cette série, cet ouvrage présente l'évolution d'une question sur une période de deux ans. Le Volume 10 commence avec un chapitre sur la conduite des relations extérieures. Le reste de ce volume est consacré aux politiques liées à la guerre et à ses suites immédiates: règlements de paix, prisonniers de guerre et questions similaires, ainsi que la fourniture de secours aux territoires libérés et occupés. Le Volume 11 portera sur la fondation de l'Organisation des Nations Unies, l'énergie atomique et d'autres aspects de la planification à plus long terme de l'après-guerre, de même que sur les organisations et conférences internationales, le Commonwealth et les relations bilatérales.

S'il fallait choisir une seule expression qui puisse résumer l'état d'esprit qui transparait dans les documents publiés dans le présent ouvrage, ce serait la 'lassitude de la guerre'. Certes, le Canada n'avait pas subi de dégâts physiques pendant la guerre, mais une grande partie de ses troupes avaient séjourné plus longtemps à l'étranger que celles de toute autre nation alliée. Il souhaitait donc rapatrier ses forces dès que possible après la cessation des hostilités. Ce voeu n'était toutefois pas assorti d'un désir de cesser de participer aux affaires internationales car le Canada souhaitait, au même moment, prendre à la formation du monde de l'après-guerre une part qui corresponde à sa contribution à la victoire. L'argument invoqué dans la recherche de ce dernier objectif s'appuyait sur un principe essentiel, celui de la représentation fonctionnelle (Volume 9, p. XII), qui était devenu un des grands axes de la politique extérieure canadienne après la création des organisations de guerre composées par la Grande-Bretagne et les États-Unis au début de 1942.

Le cadre administratif à l'intérieur duquel le Canada poursuivait ses objectifs connus des modifications pendant la période qui fait l'objet du présent volume. Les organigrammes apparaissant au début et à la fin de l'ouvrage illustrent la structure du Siègne avant et après la réorganisation intervenue en 1945. Ce processus fera l'objet d'une description détaillée dans l'histoire administrative du ministère qui est en préparation.<sup>1</sup>

La conduite des relations extérieures a également été affectée par les absences prolongées d'Ottawa du Premier ministre, qui cumulait toujours les fonctions de secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures, ainsi que de hauts fonctionnaires. En effet, l'imminence de la paix facilitait les déplacements à l'étranger et les consultations internationales revêtaient un caractère croissant d'urgence. Du 1<sup>er</sup> au 20 mai 1944, le premier ministre et le sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures assistèrent à Londres à une réunion des

INTRODUCTION

The present volume and the one to follow deal with Canada's external policies in the closing year and one-half of the Second World War and the first months of peace. As in the previous three volumes in this series, themes are examined as they developed over two years. Volume 10 opens with a chapter on the conduct of external relations. The remainder is devoted to policies related to the war and to its immediate aftermath: peace settlements, prisoner-of-war and similar questions, and relief for liberated and occupied territories. Volume 11 will deal with the organization of the United Nations, atomic energy and other aspects of longer-term post-war planning, along with international organizations and conferences, the Commonwealth, and bilateral relations.

If one were to choose a single expression to sum up the mood reflected in the documents published in this volume, it would be 'war weariness'. Although Canada had suffered no physical damage during the war, many of her troops in Europe had been far from home for a longer period than those of any other Allied nation. There therefore was a desire to bring the forces home as quickly as possible, once the fighting ceased. That, however, did not imply a desire to withdraw from involvement in international affairs, for there was at the same time a concern to have a share, commensurate with Canada's contribution to victory, in shaping the post-war world. Essential to the argument in pursuit of the latter objective was the principle of functional representation (Volume 9, p. XIII), which had become a centrepiece of Canadian external policy after the creation of the combined war organizations by Britain and the United States early in 1942.

The administrative framework within which Canada's objectives were pursued was altered during the period covered by this volume. Charts printed as the front and back endpapers illustrate the headquarters structure as it appeared before and after reorganization in 1945. The process will be described in detail in the forthcoming administrative history of the department.<sup>1</sup>

The conduct of external relations was affected as well by the extended absences from Ottawa of the Prime Minister, still also Secretary of State for External Affairs, and senior officials as the approach of peace made foreign travel easier and the need for international consultations became more urgent. From May 1-20, 1944, the Prime Minister and the Under-Secretary were in London for a meeting of Commonwealth prime ministers (May 1-16); during their absence, J. L. Ralston served as acting Prime Minister, L. S. St. Laurent as acting Secretary of State for External Affairs and Hume Wrong as acting Under-Secretary. From April 23 until May 14 and again from June 22-27, 1945, the Prime Minister was in San Francisco for the founding conference of the United Nations (April 25- June 26). On this occasion, J. L. Ilsley was acting Prime Minister and Brooke Claxton acting Secretary of State for premiers ministres du Commonwealth (1-16 mai); en leur absence, J. L. Ralston agit à titre de premier ministre suppléant, L. S. St. Laurent en qualité de secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures et Hume Wrong en qualité de sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant. Du 23 avril au 14 mai et, à nouveau, du 22 au 27 juin 1945, le Premier ministre séjourna à San Francisco à l'occasion de la conférence de fondation des Nations Unies (25 avril-26 juin). À cette occasion, J. L. Ilsley agit à titre de premier ministre suppléant et Brooke Claxton en qualité de secrétaire d'État suppléant aux Affaires extérieures. Plusieurs fonctionnaires du Ministère, y compris le sous-secrétaire d'État et le sous-secrétaire d'État associé, Hume Wrong, restèrent à San Francisco pendant toute la durée de la conférence; John Read demeura à Ottawa en qualité de sous-secrétaire d'État suppléant. Du 7 octobre au 3 novembre 1945, le Premier ministre et le sous-secrétaire séjournèrent à nouveau à l'étranger, cette fois pour rencontrer des ministres et des fonctionnaires en Grande-Bretagne. À Ottawa, Ilsley fit à nouveau office de premier ministre, St. Laurent de secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures et Wrong de sous-secrétaire. La fin de la guerre en Europe facilita également les déplacements des diplomates postés à l'étranger. C'est ainsi que Vincent Massey, haut commissaire en Grande-Bretagne depuis 1935, put prendre des vacances au Canada du 6 août jusqu'à la première semaine de novembre 1945. Pendant son absence, Frederic Hudd agit à titre de haut commissaire suppléant.

Pendant toute la durée des hostilités, le Comité de guerre du Cabinet prit la plupart des grandes décisions de politique extérieure. Il tint sa dernière rencontre le 11 avril 1945. Pendant que le Premier ministre assistait à la Conférence de fondation des Nations Unies à San Francisco, un comité spécial du Cabinet, dont l'existence fut de courte durée, traita des questions relatives à la guerre. Il se réunit à trois reprises (les 19 et 25 avril et le 16 mai 1945). Après la capitulation du Japon, ce fut l'ensemble du Cabinet qui prit des décisions sur les grandes questions relatives aux politiques.<sup>2</sup>

Les plans établis pour la conduite de la guerre (Chapitre II) se fondaient sur l'attente de progrès en trois étapes : l'assaut en Europe continentale et la défaite de l'Allemagne (étape I), suivi de la concentration de la guerre contre le Japon (étape II) et du rétablissement de l'ordre dans les régions dévastées (étape III). Le principal événement auquel les Canadiens ont participé sur le théâtre européen, l'invasion de la Normandie, appartient principalement au domaine de l'histoire militaire, mais l'annonce que cette invasion avait eu lieu fit l'objet de communications diplomatiques parce que le Canada était mécontent des arrangements relatifs à la publicité qui avaient été pris l'année précédente pour la campagne de Sicile (Volume 9, documents 301-315). Après le jour 'J', la lassitude de la guerre caractéristique de cette période devint de plus en plus évidente. Cela tient peut-être à la crise de la conscription de 1944, qui était avant tout une question intérieure et militaire, mais qui est évoquée ici dans un échange de messages entre le Premier ministre, Churchill et (par l'intermédiaire du général Maurice Pope) Roosevelt (documents 330-332 et

External Affairs. Several members of the department, including the Under-Secretary and the Associate Under-Secretary, Hume Wrong, were in San Francisco throughout the conference; John Read remained in Ottawa as acting Under-Secretary. From October 7 to November 3, 1945, the Prime Minister and the Under-Secretary were again out of the country, this time for meetings with ministers and officials in Britain. In Ottawa, Ilsley again acted as Prime Minister, St. Laurent as Secretary of State for External Affairs and Wrong as Under-Secretary. Once the war in Europe was over, travel also was easier for diplomats stationed abroad. Thus Vincent Massey, High Commissioner in Great Britain since 1935, was able to take home leave from August 6 until the first week of November 1945. During his absence, Frederic Hudd was acting High Commissioner.

Throughout the war, most major decisions on external policy were taken in the Cabinet War Committee, which held its last meeting on April 11, 1945. During the Prime Minister's absence at the United Nations conference in San Francisco, matters affecting the war were dealt with by a short-lived special committee of the Cabinet, which met on three occasions (April 19 and 25 and May 16, 1945). After the surrender of Japan, the full Cabinet again became the source of decision on major policy matters.<sup>2</sup>

Plans for the conduct of the war (Chapter II) were based on the expectation of progress through three phases: the assault on the continent of Europe and the defeat of Germany (stage I), followed by concentration on the war against Japan (stage II) and the restoration of order in devastated areas (stage III). The major event in which Canadians participated in the European theatre, the invasion of Normandy, lies mainly in the realm of military history, but the announcement that it had taken place was the subject of diplomatic communication because of Canadian dissatisfaction with the publicity arrangements for the Sicilian campaign the previous year (Volume 9, documents 301-315). After D-Day, the war weariness characteristic of the period was increasingly evident. One reason may have been the conscription crisis of 1944, primarily a domestic and military issue but reflected here in an exchange of messages between the Prime Minister and Churchill and (via General Maurice Pope) Roosevelt (documents 330-332 and 336). As the war in Europe drew to a close, the government was concerned to ensure satisfactory arrangements for the repatriation of the forces, on one occasion threatening to recall Canadian cargo vessels employed by Great Britain if no other transportation could be provided (document 356).

In the circumstances, the government was reluctant to make a major commitment to the war against Japan, and was determined that it be confined to the area of most interest to Canada, the northern Pacific. The discussion of this subject is important, reflecting as it does the government's attitude towards Canada's role as a Pacific nation. The outcome, however, had little impact on

Dans ces circonstances, le gouvernement éprouvait des réticences à prendre de grands engagements pour la guerre contre le Japon, et il tenait à ce que cette guerre soit limitée au secteur qui présentait le plus grand intérêt pour le Canada, le Pacifique-Nord. L'examen de cette question est important, parce qu'elle reflète l'attitude du gouvernement à l'égard du rôle du Canada en qualité de nation du Pacifique. Son aboutissement eut toutefois peu de répercussions sur la guerre, qui prit fin avant que les forces canadiennes puissent y jouer un rôle véritablement significatif.

Un des problèmes les plus pressants qui se présenta à la fin des hostilités consistait à répondre aux besoins des prisonniers de guerre, réfugiés et autres victimes du conflit (Chapitre IV). Avant même la fin de la guerre, le gouvernement canadien, aux prises avec des problèmes de main-d'oeuvre, supportait de plus en plus mal le fardeau de l'hébergement des prisonniers de guerre venus d'Europe, et il accueillit donc avec satisfaction la possibilité de les renvoyer dans leur pays. Le rapatriement des Canadiens capturés à l'étranger était également une question hautement prioritaire. Le gouvernement souhaitait vivement les ramener au pays aussitôt que possible, et il exprima ses grandes inquiétudes lorsqu'il apparut que ces Canadiens étaient sous-représentés dans les premières traversées de l'Atlantique. Les Canadiens naturalisés qui étaient réputés avoir perdu leur nationalité en raison de leur sympathie ouverte pour l'ennemi, toutefois, n'étaient pas les bienvenus, et on fit des efforts pour éviter d'avoir à les prendre en charge.

Il se posa d'autres problèmes difficiles concernant les personnes déplacées par la guerre. L'avenir de la Communauté nippono-canadienne devint une composante importante des relations extérieures à cause de ses répercussions pour le règlement de paix, de ses éventuelles retombées sur les relations avec le Japon, et du besoin de consultations avec les États-Unis. Des préoccupations intérieures au sujet de l'échange de ressortissants entre les alliés occidentaux et l'Union soviétique amenèrent le gouvernement à prendre des renseignements à Washington et à Londres, renseignements qui révélèrent qu'il s'agissait d'une question délicate dans les relations entre les grandes puissances et d'une source éventuelle de difficultés dans le règlement du problème plus général des personnes déplacées. La situation au Canada lui-même militait également en faveur de la discrétion, étant donné que l'opinion dans les communautés concernées était divisée entre partisans et adversaires de l'Union soviétique. Le Canada suivit également une démarche prudente en ce qui concerne l'accueil de réfugiés, parce qu'il n'avait pas encore déterminé la politique qu'il suivrait après la guerre en matière d'immigration.

La fourniture de secours aux pays libérés et aux anciens pays ennemis constituait une dernière tâche à remplir au lendemain immédiat des hostilités (Chapitre V). Dans un premier temps, cette tâche relevait des autorités the war, which ended before Canadian forces could become significantly involved.

One of the most pressing problems at the end of hostilities was to attend to the needs of prisoners of war, refugees and other victims of the conflict (Chapter IV). Even before the war was over, the Canadian government, beset by manpower problems, had become impatient with the burden of accommodating prisoners of war from Europe, and therefore welcomed the opportunity to return them to their homelands. The repatriation of Canadians caught overseas was also a high priority. The government was anxious to bring them home as quickly as possible, and expressed alarm when it appeared that they were inadequately represented in early crossings of the Atlantic. Naturalized Canadians deemed to have lost their citizenship because of overt sympathy with the enemy, however, were not welcome, and efforts were made to avoid assuming responsibility for them.

There were other difficult questions affecting persons displaced by the war. The future of the Japanese-Canadian community became an important component in external relations because of the implications of the peace settlement, the possible effect on relations with Japan, and the need for consultation with the United States. Domestic concern about the exchange of nationals between the Western Allies and the Soviet Union led the government to make inquiries in Washington and London, which revealed that the subject was a delicate one in great-power relations and a possible cause of difficulty in dealing with the general problem of displaced persons. There was reason at home as well for discretion in taking a public position, since opinion in the communities concerned was divided between supporters and opponents of the Soviet Union. The approach to the accommodation of refugees in Canada was also cautious, because policy on post-war immigration was yet to be decided.

A final task in the immediate aftermath of the fighting was the provision of relief supplies to liberated and former enemy countries (Chapter V). Initially, this was the responsibility of the military authorities, with the result that the United States and Great Britain, through their control of the machinery for directing the Allied war effort, were in charge. Although a major source of supplies, Canada was not comfortable with the decision-making process, particularly as it affected the allocation of costs. More satisfactory was the operation of the agency responsible for the post-military phase of relief, the United Nations Relief and Rehabilitation Administration (UNRRA). Canada's contribution was recognized in September 1944 when the Second Session of the Council assembled in Montreal under the chairmanship of L. B. Pearson. At the Third Session of the Council, in London, Canada received acknowledgment of its importance as a supplier country by being named to the Central Committee, fulfilling an ambition that had been formulated when the organization was established in 1943. As a success for the functional principle, that achievement was a major development in one of the principal themes of Canada's wartime foreign policy.

The selection of documents for this volume was based on the guidelines quoted in the Introduction to Volume 7 (pp. ix-xi). As in Volume 9, a dagger militaires et, de ce fait, elle fut prise en charge par les États-Unis et par la Grande-Bretagne, par l'intermédiaire de leur contrôle du mécanisme de direction de l'effort de guerre des alliés. Bien qu'il fût une grande source de fourniture, le Canada n'était pas satisfait du processus de prise de décision, particulièrement en ce qui concerne la répartition des coûts. Le Canada fut davantage satisfait du fonctionnement de l'organisme chargé de la phase de secours de l'après-guerre, l'Administration d'assistance et de réadaptation des Nations Unies (UNRRA). La contribution du Canada fut reconnue en septembre 1944 lorsque le Conseil tint sa deuxième session à Montréal sous la présidence de L. B. Pearson. Lors de la troisième session du Conseil, à Londres, on reconnut l'importance du Canada comme pays fournisseur en le nommant au Comité central, ce qui représentait la réalisation d'un vœu qui avait été formulé lors de l'établissement de l'organisation, en 1943. Ce succès, reconnaissance du principe de la représentation fonctionnelle, a constitué une évolution majeure dans l'un des principaux thèmes de la politique étrangère du Canada pendant la guerre.

La sélection des documents pour ce volume s'est faite d'après les lignes directrices énoncées dans l'introduction au volume 7 (pp. viii-x). Tout comme dans le volume 9, les documents inédits sont marqués d'une croix (†); on trouvera à l'introduction de ce volume une explication des autres dispositifs et principes éditoriaux (pp. XVIII-XX). La publication de tous les documents choisis n'a été assujettie à aucune restriction, mais les noms des personnes ont été retirés des documents 912, 955, 958 et 983, ainsi que de l'annexe au document 985.

On trouvera dans les notes de bas de page des renvois à certaines publications susceptibles d'intéresser les lecteurs de ce volume et certaines autres publications sont énumérées dans l'introduction au volume 9 (p. XVIII, n. 1 et p. XXII). Depuis la publication de ce volume, la série connexe sur Terre-Neuve a été complétée avec la publication de Documents relatifs aux relations entre le Canada et Terre-Neuve (Volume 2: 1940-1949, Confédération), préparé sous la direction de Paul Bridle (Ottawa, ministre des Approvisionnements et Services, 1984). Le volume pertinent de l'histoire officielle de l'Aviation royale du Canada, La création d'une aviation militaire nationale, par W. A. B. Douglas (Toronto, University of Toronto Press), paraîtra sous peu. Parmi les ouvrages récents traitant de cette période, mentionnons The Shaping of Peace: Canada and the Search for World Order 1943-1957, par John W. Holmes (2 tomes, Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1979 et 1982), et Canada and the Age of Conflict: A History of Canadian External Policies (volume 2: 1921-1948, The Mackenzie King Era), par C. P. Stacey (Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1981). Deux biographies récentes présentent également un intérêt particulier: J. L. Granatstein, A Man of Influence: Norman A. Robertson and Canadian Statecraft 1929-1968 (Ottawa, Deneau Publishers, 1981) et Claude Bissell, The Imperial Canadian: Vincent Massey in Office (Toronto, University of Toronto Press, 1986).

No restrictions were placed on the publication of any document selected, but the names of individual persons have been removed from documents 912, 955, 958 and 983, and from the enclosure to document 985.

Some publications of interest to readers of this volume are mentioned in the footnotes and others will be found listed in the Introduction to Volume 9 (p. XIX, n. 1 and p. XXI). Since that volume appeared, the companion series on Newfoundland has been completed with the publication of Documents on relations between Canada and Newfoundland (Volume 2: 1940-1949, Confederation), edited by Paul Bridle (Ottawa, Minister of Supply and Services, 1984). Also now available is the relevant volume of the official history of the Royal Canadian Air Force, The creation of a National Air Force, by W. A. B. Douglas (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1986). Among other recently available works dealing with the period are The Shaping of Peace: Canada and the search for world order 1943-1957, by John W. ## REMERCIEMENTS

Eric Gilmour a, avant son départ à la retraite, assuré la direction de la première sélection de documents pour le présent volume. Il a fourni une précieuse contribution à la préparation de l'ouvrage, tout comme F. J. McEvoy, qui a participé avec M. Gilmour et moi-même au choix et à l'annotation des documents. M. McEvoy est donc celui qui a participé le plus longuement à la mise au point de ce volume et il a assuré, élément des plus précieux, la continuité; il a également préparé la Liste des personnalités, les pages hors-texte et l'index. Je remercie de son intérêt et de son soutien A. F. Hart, qui était directeur de l'ancienne Direction historique pendant qu'était en cours la recherche en vue de la préparation du présent volume. Michel Rossignol a entrepris la préparation technique. Celle-ci a été menée à bien, sous la direction de E. A. Kelly, avec le souci de la perfection qui a caractérisé le travail de M. Rossignol sur un certain nombre d'ouvrages de la série, par Isobel Cameron, Dawn Jones et Margaret Mitchell, qui ont également assuré la correction des épreuves. Il convient de remercier tout particulièrement le Centre de traitement de texte du ministère des Affaires extérieures, où le manuscrit a été produit sous la direction d'Aline Gélineau, et Gail MacDonald, qui a assuré la coordination. Je garde, bien sûr, la seule responsabilité des omissions et erreurs de préparation des documents ainsi que des opinions exprimées dans l'introduction.

Les documents publiés ici proviennent, outre les archives du ministère des Affaires extérieures, de diverses sources, qui sont indiquées dans la liste de provenance des documents. J'ai largement bénéficié de l'aide du personnel des services concernés: Jeannette Fournier et ses collègues de la Direction de la gestion de l'information documentaire du ministère des Affaires extérieures; les Archives nationales du Canada, les Archives de Queen's University, et le bibliothécaire du Massey College, à Toronto, Desmond Neill. Je suis reconnaissant à M. Robertson Davies, professeur émérite au Massey College, de m'avoir autorisé à consulter les documents de Vincent Massey et à publier le document 321.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

The initial selection of documents for this volume was carried out under the supervision of Eric Gilmour before his retirement from the department. His work has been of great value in preparing this volume, as has been that of F. J. McEvoy, who was associated with both Mr. Gilmour and me in the selection and annotation of documents. Mr. McEvoy therefore has the longest involvement with the volume and has provided a most valuable element of continuity; he also prepared the List of Persons, the endpapers and the index. I am grateful for his interest and support to A. F. Hart, who was director of the former Historical Division when the research for this volume was underway. The technical preparation was begun by Michel Rossignol. Under the supervision of E. A. Kelly it was completed, to the high standard set by Mr. Rossignol in a number of volumes in this series, by Isobel Cameron, Dawn Jones and Margaret Mitchell, who also did the proofreading. Special thanks are due to the Department of External Affairs Word Processing Centre, where the manuscript was produced under the direction of Aline Gélinau, and to Gail MacDonald, who coordinated the flow of paper. I of course am alone responsible for omissions and errors in the editing of the documents, and for the opinions expressed in this introduction.

The documents published here are drawn from a variety of sources in addition to the records of the Department of External Affairs. These are shown in the Location of Documents list. I was greatly assisted by staff members of all the repositories involved: Jeannette Fournier and her colleagues in the Records Information Management Division of the Department of External Affairs, the National Archives of Canada, Queen's University Archives, and the librarian of Massey College, Toronto, Desmond Neill. I am grateful to the Master Emeritus of Massey College, Professor Robertson Davies, for permission to consult the Vincent Massey Papers and to publish document 321.

Le Premier ministre au secrétaire privé du Roi
Prime Minister to Private Secretary to the King

TELEGRAM

Ottawa, July 15, 1945

Would you please submit to The King the following communication to His Majesty from myself, Begins:

Sir: I present my humble duty to Your Majesty.

As Your Majesty is aware, the present Governor General of Canada, the Right Honourable the Earl of Athlone assumed office on June the 21st, 1940. Were His Excellency prepared to consider an extension of his term, I would be very pleased to recommend. Lord Athlone has, however, informed me that he does not think he should entertain the idea of having his term extended.

On account of the general elections having been fixed for June the 11th, I felt it my duty to be certain of the return of the present administration to power before making a recommendation to Your Majesty as to Lord Athlone's successor.

As there is now no doubt as to the continuance in office of the present administration, I have the honour to submit for Your Majesty's consideration the names of three gentlemen, each of whom I am sure would prove a worthy successor to Lord Athlone in the position of Governor General of Canada.

The names I have the honour to submit are the following:

1. The Rt. Hon. the Earl of Airlie,<sup>1</sup>
2. Field Marshal Sir Harold Alexander,
3. Mr. G. M. Trevelyan, Master of Trinity College, Cambridge.

I have placed the names in alphabetical order not for the purpose of indicating order of preference but in order that before making a final recommendation to Your Majesty, I might receive from you, should you so desire, any comment or expression of preference, which Your Majesty might wish to make.

I should perhaps mention that at a meeting of the Cabinet yesterday at which the question of a successor to His Excellency was considered, while there was unanimous approval of a submission of all three names, preference, in so far as it was expressed, was for Mr. Trevelyan. As, until today, I have not communicated with any one of the three as to whether or not he would be willing to have his name submitted to Your Majesty, I am unable to say whether Mr. Trevelyan would be prepared to accept the position.

In mentioning the name of Mr. Trevelyan, I should not wish it to be thought that I had any reservation about the entire suitability of Lord Airlie or General Alexander.

I am pleased to inform Your Majesty that Lord Athlone has kindly consented to continue in office for the opening of the first session of the new Parliament which is fixed for August the 23rd, and to continue for such time longer as may permit of his successor arriving in Canada at a time which may prove most convenient to him and to the government.

I have the honour to be, Sir, Your Majesty's faithful subject.

W. L. MACKENZIE KING.

TELEGRAM

IMMEDIATE. The King thanks you for your telegram of July 11th. His Majesty would be ready to approve any of the three gentlemen you mention, though he considers Trevelyan's age is a serious obstacle and that it is most doubtful if he would be prepared to leave Cambridge in his seventieth year.

The King thinks Alexander would be an admirable Governor General in every way, but as a preliminary it is essential to establish whether he could be released from whatever military duties he may be designated for in the future. If you wish, I could ascertain this confidentially.

As regards Airlie, the King considers he also would be highly suitable should Alexander not be available.

I thank you for your telegram of July 13th and should be grateful if you could ascertain, confidentially, whether General [sic] Alexander could be released from whatever military duties he may be designated for in future. Following for the Prime Minister from Massey, Begins: Saw Trevelyan today and conveyed your message in the sense of your two telegrams.† He was most touched by the honour proposed, but he said he must decline not only on the ground of age but because he felt that his experience and interests did not fit him to assume the responsibilities of the office. As conversation progressed it became increasingly clear that his mind was quite made up. He asked me to convey to you his deep appreciation of the proposal, but to say that he definitely felt that he could not allow his name to be considered. Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. I thank you for your telegram of July 17th† advising me that from a military point of view, Alexander would be available. I have since learned from Massey that Trevelyan feels definitely that his name should not be considered for the post.

Since either Sir Harold Alexander or Lord Airlie would be entirely acceptable to the Canadian Government, I should be very glad to receive an indication of any preference His Majesty may have between them so that I can ascertain confidentially whether the one preferred would be ready to accept the appointment before making a formal submission to His Majesty.

Le secrétaire privé du Roi au Premier ministre
Private Secretary to the King to Prime Minister

TELEGRAM London, July 23, 1945

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET AND STRICTLY PERSONAL. July 23rd.

I have laid before The King your telegram of July 21st which His Majesty much appreciates.

1. Airlie is an old personal friend of His Majesty for whom he has a great regard. He has, however, many commitments in Scotland, both public and private, from which he would at present almost certainly find it very difficult to extricate himself.

2. On the other hand, Alexander, whom The King also knows well and much admires, is relatively free. Apart from his genius as a soldier, he has shown himself to be possessed in a high degree of qualities necessary to a good Governor General. He has already won the affection and respect of thousands of Canadians whom he has commanded in the field, and his wife is in every way admirably fitted to be a Governor General's wife.

3. At the moment Alexander is one of the most eminent of the King's subjects, justly famous throughout the world. It would give His Majesty great satisfaction to recognize the magnificent contribution to victory made by Canadians in battle and at home by sending such a man to represent him in Canada.

4. Since, therefore, you have asked The King to indicate his preference, His Majesty has no hesitation in giving it to Alexander.

5. The King would be grateful if, as you suggest, you would ascertain confidentially whether Alexander is ready to accept the appointment.

I would be grateful if you could convey the following confidential message from me to General [sic] Alexander, Begins:

My dear General Alexander,

I should like to submit your name, for His Majesty's approval, as Governor General of Canada. You will not need to be informed of the reasons which cause my colleagues and myself to hope that you will agree to my so doing. Mémorandum du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures au Premier ministre

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs

The announcement of the appointment of the Earl of Athlone as Governor General was made in the following form:

"It is officially announced from Buckingham Palace that the King has been graciously pleased to approve of the appointment of Major General the Earl of Athlone, K.G., as Governor General of the Dominion of Canada."

This text was cabled to you by the King's Private Secretary and approved by you. It was intended to release it simultaneously by the United Kingdom and Canadian Press, but, as you may recall, the United Press beat the gun on the advance story and the news was, in fact, in all the Canadian and English papers shortly before the hour set for the official release.

This time the official announcement, which could be made in Ottawa and released simultaneously in London, might be in the following form:

"The Prime Minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, announced today that His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to approve of the appointment of Field Marshal Sir Harold Alexander, G.C.B., to succeed His Excellency the Earl of Athlone as Governor General of Canada. The new Governor General will arrive in Canada in the spring of 1946. His Excellency the Earl of Athlone will continue as Governor General until shortly before the arrival of Field Marshal Sir Harold Alexander."

The form suggested differs from that used in 1940 in that it would be made by the Prime Minister of Canada instead of "from Buckingham Palace" and would omit the words "Dominion of" before "Canada." In view of the fact that it will be a good many months before the new Governor General can take over his duties, it would appear desirable to include in the official announcement a reference to the fact that Lord Athlone is continuing in office until shortly before the new Governor General's arrival.

Buenos Aires, April 23, 1945

SECRET. 1. Señor Pardo, Acting Minister for Foreign Affairs, called me to the Foreign Office this afternoon to ask me to communicate the Argentine Government's desire to elevate our respective Legations to status of Embassies.

The appointment was announced in Ottawa on July 31 and in London on August 1.

He cited Canadian precedent of Mexico, Peru, Chile and Brazil. An early reply is desired as appointment of new Argentine representative will await agreement regarding status.

2. Señor Pardo repeatedly explained that Argentine Government's present policy is to rotate all present diplomatic heads of Missions, giving them new posts. Doctor Vivot will consequently be transferred shortly. This information, however, is confidential and Doctor Vivot has not yet been notified.

3. Señor Pardo hoped, when agreement referred to in paragraph 1 above is reached, Canadian Government will make an early appointment of Canadian Ambassador here, to round-out diplomatic relations.

4. Interview was extremely friendly towards Canada.

Dear Mr. Read,

I wish to refer to your letter of April 27th,† transmitting copies of telegrams exchanged with our Legation in Argentina regarding the possible elevation of the mission to the status of Embassy, and to Kirkwood's subsequent telegram No. 45 of May 16th,† which was referred to the Delegation in San Francisco.

My view is that we should defer action on the status of the mission to the Argentine until we are in a position to appoint a new representative there. This should be done fairly promptly, but cannot be done until we are in a position to make diplomatic appointments to the European Allied Governments from whom we receive representatives in Ottawa. To appoint an Ambassador to Argentina before we have opened missions in Norway or Czechoslovakia would invite reasonable criticism. In any case, I think it would be wise to allow a certain interval to elapse between the admission of Argentina to the United Nations Conference and the appointment of a Canadian representative at Buenos Aires with ambassadorial rank.

Yours sincerely,

SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for Read from Robertson, Begins: Your telegram D-353 of June 18th.† Prime Minister has approved of Chipman's appointment as Ambassador Argentina. Chipman, who is returning tonight by plane with the Prime Minister, is anxious that no steps should be taken in connection with his nomination until he has had an opportunity to say his farewells to the Chileans, who have been very kind to him. I see no objection to our informing the Argentine Government that we agree in principle to exchange of Embassies and to receive an Ambassador from them. You might let them know that we hope shortly to designate a new representative in Buenos Aires who will be given the rank of Ambassador. In circumstances, I think change of status of Mission should be effective [effected?] with a minimum of fanfare. Ends.

MOST IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Kirkwood from Robertson repeat Chile and to Washington, Begins: The United States Ambassador told me this morning that his Government were afraid that announcement of raising of Canadian mission to status of Embassy might be seized on, (a) by Peron and the Argentine press as an indication that Canada took a more sympathetic view of the policies and behaviour of the Argentine Government than did the United States and (b) by the American Liberal Press, which was becoming increasingly critical of the policy of maintaining normal relations with Argentina. In particular the State Department were disturbed by the Argentine press campaign against the American Ambassador and they hoped the announcement of the appointment of a new Canadian Ambassador would not be used in Argentina to make Mr. Braden's position more difficult.

I told the Ambassador that the appointment of a new head of the Canadian mission in Argentina was an inevitable and more or less routine consequence of admission of Argentina to the United Nations and of the return of the American and United Kingdom Ambassadors to their posts in Buenos Aires. We did not attach political significance to the appointment of a new Ambassador at this time and hoped that nobody else would. At the same time we were just as anxious as the United States could be that Argentina should not make any political capital out of the agreed exchange of Embassies.

During my conversation with the Ambassador I spoke on the telephone with Hickerson, who is temporarily in charge of the Political Division of the State Department and told him that we proposed to handle the press announcement here as a purely routine matter and would endeavour to give the press the proper background at a preliminary press conference.

I have also spoken this morning to the Argentine Minister and asked him to request his Government to avoid any note of emphasis or congratulation in their announcement of the change of status of the missions. Vivot promised to transmit this request at once to his Government adding his own urgent recommendation that it be met. In the circumstances, you should not give any statement to the press commenting on the establishment of the Embassy and should remind the Argentine Government of our earnest hope that they will not exploit the announcement for any political purpose whatsoever.

Ottawa, April 22, 1944

Mr. Dupong, the Prime Minister of Luxemburg called at the Department this morning to say goodbye and to repeat his Government's very warm appreciation of the hospitality the Grand Duchess and her Ministers had received in Canada.

He referred to our earlier conversation about the possibility of our exchanging diplomatic representatives. Under an arrangement of long standing, Luxemburg interests abroad were entrusted to the Netherlands Diplomatic Service, except in a limited number of posts, where there was direct Luxemburg representation. His Government had diplomatic representatives to the United Kingdom, Holland, Belgium, France and in the United States, and they had hoped that we would agree to have the Luxemburg Minister in Washington also accredited in Ottawa, and that our representative to the Allied Governments in London could also be accredited to the Grand Duchy of Luxemburg.

I told him why we had always refused to receive diplomatic representatives who were also accredited to the United States, and that an exception conceded in the special circumstances of Luxemburg's case would undoubtedly be invoked as a precedent by two or three other countries who had proposed similar arrangements. At the present time, our diplomatic arrangements with the Allied Governments in London were on the basis of reciprocity. Each of the Governments to which Dupuy was accredited maintained a diplomatic mission here, and for this reason it would be difficult, just now, to accredit him to the Luxemburg Government.

I told Mr. Dupong that I was sure that after the war an Ambassador to Belgium would be installed in Brussels, and that we would be glad to have him accredited to Luxemburg. It might well be, too, that with the completion of our Diplomatic Corps in Canada by the separate representation here of all the principal countries, there might be fewer difficulties in the way of the smaller countries, with limited diplomatic representation, arranging to have one representative on this continent, who would look after their interests in both Canada and the United States. In any case, we would keep in mind the interest Luxemburg had shown in maintaining the special contacts which the war had given it with Canada and would see whether there was any action we might be able to take in the future which would help to meet their wishes.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Dupuy from Robertson, Begins: Prime Minister has approved your appointment as Chargé d'Affaires of Canadian Embassy to Belgium and desires you to accompany Belgian Government when it returns. Colonel Hébert<sup>4</sup> should accompany you to Brussels, on understanding that if liberation of Holland is quickly effected he may be needed to help open Canadian Legation in The Hague.

Stone has been informed that he will take over from you as Chargé d'Affaires ad interim to Allied Governments remaining in London and accordingly he and Hébert have been asked to cancel their planned visit to Paris and to concert with you necessary arrangements for transfer of your mission to Belgium and for maintenance of our representation to other Allied Governments in London.

I do not think female clerks should accompany your mission in first instance; you may take Park with you if you feel his services will be required in Brussels and should ask C.M.H.Q. to furnish you with a reliable bilingual army clerk for temporary clerical assistance. You might also consult Canada

House about the assignment to the Belgian Mission of a seconded officer for quasi-consular work.

As you can see the good news of liberation is coming in faster than our preparations for it. Despite all difficulties we feel it important that elements of Canadian Mission should accompany each of the Allied Governments in their return to their liberated territories. This will involve a good deal of improvisation and, often, entirely temporary assignments. In present instance Prime Minister thinks it especially appropriate that you should accompany first of the Governments to which you are accredited which will be returning to its homeland. Ends.

After dinner given by me for Dr. Grove last Wednesday, April 12th, Foreign Minister asked me to transmit to you proposal from Chilean Government for raising of respective Missions to Embassies without change of diplomatic personnel. An aide-mémoire,† then suggested, has now been received and states that Chile has especial interest in strengthening links with Canada with which it collaborates in defence, democracy and civilization and concludes that Chile is disposed to elevate to rank of Embassy its Legation in Ottawa and only awaits decision of Canadian Government with respect to its Mission in Santiago in order to settle formalities and date of mutual accord. I understand similar requests will be sent to Chilean Chargé d'Affaires, Ottawa, for transmission to you. I explained to Foreign Minister the necessity of His Majesty's approval before formal action by Canada or any announcement of any arrangements agreed upon. Dear Sir Shuldham [Redfern],

In 1940, and again in 1942, the Cuban Government indicated its desire to establish direct diplomatic relations with Canada. The Canadian Government expressed at that time its regret that circumstances prevented this development. The Prime Minister stated in the House of Commons on July 12th, 1943, that he hoped to be able to announce shortly the agrément for the establishment of a Legation in Cuba.

The Canadian Government now desire to take steps for the establishment of a Canadian Legation in Cuba and for the appointment of Mr. Émile Vaillancourt as Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary for Canada in Cuba.

I am directed by the Prime Minister to ask that His Excellency the Governor General communicate a request to the King for His Majesty's informal approval of this proposal.

The Danish Government is now desirous of establishing a Legation in Canada. Heretofore it has been represented by a Consul-General, whose offices have been in Montreal. There is no present possibility of us exchanging diplomatic missions with Denmark on the basis of straight reciprocity, but we would have no objection to their establishing a mission here and could, if they were agreeable, accredit John Kearney as Minister to Denmark as well as to Norway. Kearney himself would very much welcome such an arrangement, partly because it would give him a locus standi in Copenhagen, where food is abundant, while he carries on his principal duties in Oslo where life for some time to come will be quite hard. In an informal conversation with the Norwegian and Danish Ministers in London, I learned that neither of their Governments would see any objection to our having one man fill the two posts.

If you approve I shall prepare the usual submission to the King, authorizing the reception of a Danish Legation here, and one submitting Kearney's name as Minister to Denmark in addition to his being Minister to Norway.<sup>6</sup>

Vanier has telegraphed from Algiers to say that it is necessary for him to have some sort of a letter to use as his credentials. I attach copies of two telegrams from him dated yesterday.<sup>10</sup> We had not considered it necessary to provide him with such a letter, as we had learned that Mr. Macmillan<sup>11</sup> and Mr. Murphy<sup>12</sup> when they were appointed as representatives to the Committee of National Liberation, had presented no documents of any kind. It now appears that a different procedure has been developed and that a letter from the Head of State or the Foreign Minister is needed. Vanier suggests that without such a letter the President of the Committee may not be prepared to receive him.

I attach, for your consideration, a letter from you to Mr. Massigli, the text of which could be sent to Vanier by telegram. This raises one point of some importance. Both Mr. Wilson (the new United States Representative) and Mr. Duff Cooper (the new United Kingdom Representative) have been given the personal rank of Ambassador. The Representatives of the Soviet and Belgian Governments in Algiers and perhaps some others also have this rank. The British Government has accorded an equal rank to Mr. Vienot, the Representative of the French Committee in London. With some hesitation I have included in the draft letter a statement that Vanier will have the personal rank of Ambassador. Clearly we shall exchange Embassies with France when we enter into relations with a full French Government, and it is not unlikely that Vanier will become Canadian Ambassador to France. It therefore would be reasonable to give him the personal rank of Ambassador now; this would not affect his official title, but might give him some added standing.<sup>13</sup>

Some slight difficulty, however, might result in connection with the status of the French Delegate here. Bonneau, the French Delegate, is certainly too junior in their Service to be given such a high rank. He now receives the diplomatic privileges of a Head of a Mission, and his name appears at the end of our Diplomatic List. I think it unlikely that the French would raise the question of the personal rank of their representative (which would not affect in any way his place in the order of precedence, as he does not represent a government), unless they were to replace Bonneau.<sup>14</sup>

If you prefer, we can leave this phrase out of the letter for Vanier. We should send him instructions very soon so that he can make arrangements for his reception by the President of the Committee.

My dear Mr. Commissioner,

[Washington,] February 3, 1944

PRESENT STATUS OF FRENCH CONSULATES
IN THE UNITED STATES

The question of the French Consulates in the United States was discussed with Mr. James H. Bonbright in charge of the French desk in the Department of State. The negotiations between the Delegation of the French Committee of National Liberation in Washington and the State Department are summarised in the following paragraphs.

On September 1st, 1943, the Delegation of the French Committee in Washington approached the State Department with a request on lines parallel to the one made to the Department of External Affairs by the Delegate of the French Committee in Ottawa.

The end of the message was as follows:

on his return. I trust that our talk may then be of some interest.

First Secretary, Embassy in United States.

On October 1st, 1943, the State Department replied to the effect that the:

“...Government of the United States will be glad to accept the appointment of representatives of the French Committee of National Liberation in the cities named (New York, Chicago, San Francisco, New Orleans, San Juan, Puerto Rico is to be added in the near future) for the purpose of performing such services as may be appropriate under the existing relationship between the United States Government and the French Committee. To this end the Department of State would appreciate being informed of the specific services which the Committee would desire to have its agents perform.

In the present situation, the Committee will readily appreciate the difficulty under existing American law and practice of formally accepting the establishment of regular Consular representatives, but there is every desire on the part of the Department of State to find a practicable means whereby necessary services may be performed.”

In reply to this communication from the State Department, the Delegation of the French Committee in Washington stated that the desires of the French Committee were to have the usual Consular functions performed by their representatives in the cities indicated above. This was conveyed to the State Department in an Aide-Mémoire dated October 11† to which the State Department replied in the following sense:

“Services specified in the Aide-Mémoire of October 11, 1943, from the Delegation of the French Committee of National Liberation are considered to fall within the scope of the services envisaged in the State Department’s memorandum of October 1st and their performance by representatives of the Committee in cities named are consequently approved.

With respect to the designation of the representative agencies to be established, the State Department would prefer there be employed some such designation as ‘Agency of the French Committee of National Liberation’.”

In their Aide-Mémoire of October 11 the Delegation of the French Committee in Washington had pointed out that the United Kingdom authorities had allowed representatives of the French Committee in London to use their former offices and the appellation “Bureaux Consulaires.”

Recently the Delegation of the French Committee in Washington asked whether there would be any objection to their agents in the five cities mentioned to add the payment of pensions to veterans to their consular functions. After some discussion with the interested United States Departments, this was also allowed and I understand that the Treasury will unfreeze the necessary funds. The veterans to whom such payments would be made are presumed to be veterans of the First World War and the lists which the agents of the French Committee will use will be the old ones prepared by the former French Consulates.

My dear Mr. Bonneau,

In reply to your letter of January 18th, No. 154, I am writing to inform you that there would be no objection to the reopening of offices in Canada by the Committee of National Liberation to perform the services which were formerly in this country the responsibility of French Consular officers. In the present situation the Canadian Government would prefer that these offices be called Consular offices, or, in French, Bureaux Consulaires rather than Consulates or Consulates General.

In order that the work of these offices might be facilitated, the Canadian Government is prepared to make available whatever is necessary of the archives of former French Consulates. They can be taken over under arrangements with the Capital Trust Company and subject to return upon request of the Company. It is not expected that it will be necessary to ask for their return but it is necessary to protect the special position of the Canadian Government in this matter. In any city where the office space of the former French Consulates is not now being used for other purposes, the Government would not object to its being taken over by the agents of the Committee.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, May 27, 1944

In conversation with the United States Ambassador this week I mentioned the conditions under which the Canadian Government would be prepared to give favourable consideration to a request from the French National Committee for the use for business purposes of the office premises in the French Legation. He asked me if there would be any objection to his communicating this information to his Government, and I said I could see no possible objection to his doing so.

On Thursday, May 25, Mr. Atherton gave me to understand that his Government feared that if we allowed the Representative of the French Committee to use the Chancery of the Legation, such a step might be given a "symbolic significance" and used by mischief-makers as an indication of shaded difference in the attitude towards the French Committee of the Canadian and American Governments. Mr. Churchill's speech the day previous<sup>22</sup> was evidence that the United Kingdom had accepted the President's thesis of the degree of recognition that should be accorded to the French Committee. The Soviet Union had this week agreed to the Directive which the President proposed to send to General Eisenhower for his guidance in dealing with French civil authorities.<sup>23</sup> In the circumstances action on our part in the sense suggested might be misconstrued as a gesture of greater confidence in the French Committee than our major Allies were as yet prepared to give.

In the light of this conversation I thought there was no point in proceeding with the arrangement, which might be misunderstood by the Americans. It was at the same time so hedged round by restrictive conditions that it was doubtful whether the French could accept it. I therefore asked Commandant Bonneau to come in this morning and explained to him, without revealing that the United States had taken any interest in the matter, that I thought it wiser to leave in abeyance for another month or six weeks the question of his using the Legation Chancery. I cited the recent resolution of the Consultative Assembly in Algiers asking the Committee to assume the style of "Provisional Government"<sup>24</sup> and General de Gaulle's indiscreet speech at Tunis two weeks ago<sup>25</sup> as new factors which made it impossible for us to proceed at present with what was in itself I believed quite a sensible and practical arrangement. He was very reasonable about this. He said his office was very badly cramped in their present quarters, and his efforts to get other accommodation had been unsuccessful. He quite understood our position. He said he had informed Algiers some three weeks ago about the conditions which would govern the use of office premises by his Delegation, and the fact that he had not heard from them might be evidence that they thought the conditions which we had to impose were more restrictive than they could have accepted.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. My telegram No. 255 of August 27th. I learned early this morning that request for air transport for Commissioners was forwarded by A.F.H.Q. to S.H.A.E.F. which replied that this could be made available providing General de Gaulle made specific request that Algiers Commissioners come to France. Of course no difficulty is anticipated on this score. Duff Cooper tells me that Eisenhower is anxious that Commissioners should reach France as soon as possible.

Regarding air transport for Diplomatic Missions, S.H.A.E.F. agreed to provide for advance parties of the United Kingdom, United States, Soviet and Canadian Missions, but not for other Diplomatic Missions until subsequent S.H.A.E.F. authorization granted.

While these arrangements were going forward, Duff Cooper learned from Admiral Miles, Senior Naval Officer here, that French authorities had decided to leave tonight for Cherbourg at six p.m. in Jeanne d'Arc now in port of Algiers. Since Minister for Foreign Affairs had not previously mentioned this alternative, situation became confused. I discussed this new development with Duff Cooper. It was decided that subject to concurrence of French authorities, small advance party consisting of Holman and Reilly for United Kingdom and Rae for this Mission accompany Commissioners and French officials in Jeanne d'Arc.

Later, however, Duff Cooper received a message from Foreign Office suggesting his advance party should proceed to France by air via the United Kingdom. As he has very kindly offered space for a small advance party from this Mission, I propose to send Rae ahead with two other assistants, unless you instruct otherwise. In this way you will have two sources of information.

I have just heard definitely that some French Commissioners will sail tonight, the remainder leaving by air tomorrow. Commissioners are in a state of great agitation which is not surprising as they are worrying about their political status in France as well as their families.

It rather looks as if Duff Cooper and I would leave towards the end of the week.

United States Chargé d'Affaires is in a most difficult position. Although he has asked Washington for instructions over past fortnight, he has received no reply.

Foreign Office asked him to extend accommodation to United States, Soviet and Canadian Missions. United States Chargé d'Affaires without any reply from State Department to repeated enquiries remains here pending instructions. Soviet Mission will make independent arrangements.

I believe it is wise to accept offer to accompany Duff Cooper because now that Commissioners have left Algiers there is no reason to remain on. Besides, if I accompany Duff Cooper now it will mean that later best possible transport facilities will be available for move from the United Kingdom to France. I have therefore accepted Duff Cooper's offer subject to your concurrence. The present plan is for Duff Cooper, Lady Diana, my wife and I to leave next Saturday. Duff Cooper will be accompanied by small secretarial staff. I will not take more than one or two.

Military Attaché will remain behind to take charge of all cars and baggage for which arrangements are being made to go by ship and road, probably from south of France.

As arranged Lamontagne<sup>29</sup> will be last to leave probably in a few weeks time.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Read from Robertson, Begins: We learned last night through the Canadian Press that Hull had announced that the United States was giving the French Committee of National Liberation representative in Washington the use of the French Embassy, with the usual comment that this was not in any sense a step toward "recognition," etc.

In the circumstances, the Prime Minister told the press that "Canada would be glad to make the French Legation in Ottawa available to the French Delegate." He did not make any comment on the effect of this action on the question of recognition.

You will recall that our earlier plan to give Bonneau the use of the Legation premises for business purposes and subject to all sorts of restrictive covenants was put off at the instance of the United States who attached great importance to our acting in step on this question. As far as I have been able to find out, the State Department did not give us any warning that they were abandoning the position which they had asked us to take.

In view of these developments, I do not think we should attach any special conditions to use of the Legation by the French Delegate, and should so inform him. Please explain position to Vanier and to our Embassy in Washington. I shall try to see Atherton this morning if he is still in Quebec. Ends.

3. It has been agreed with the Department of National Defence (Naval Service) that a convenient date for closing the Office would be October 15 next. It is hoped that this will give you sufficient time to clear up any outstanding business and arrange for the return of papers and supplies. Instructions with respect to papers and supplies will be sent you in a subsequent despatch.†

Dear Sir Shuldham [Redfern],

I desire to refer to my letter to you of January 11, 1944,† (our file No. 5858-J-40C) regarding the appointment of General Vanier as Canadian Representative at Algiers with the personal rank of Ambassador and to your reply of January 17, conveying the King's approval thereof.

The Prime Minister announced on October 23 the recognition by Canada of the French administration as the Provisional Government of the French Republic, and the Prime Minister has now approved the appointment of General Vanier as Canadian Ambassador to the Provisional Government of the French Republic.<sup>32</sup>

As the King's approval of General Vanier's appointment as Ambassador has already been signified informally, I assume that it is not necessary to repeat a request for informal approval of General Vanier's appointment as Ambassador to the Provisional Government of the French Republic, and that insofar as Royal approval is concerned we should now forward through the Governor General a formal submission.

I therefore enclose, herewith, a submission† signed by the Prime Minister seeking approval of the proposal to raise the Canadian Legation in France to the rank of Embassy, to appoint General Vanier as Canadian Ambassador, and the issuance to him of a Commission under the Great Seal of Canada and under the signature of the Governor General.

I also enclose, for transmission to London for the King's signature, General Vanier's Letter of Credence.† We are very anxious that this document should be put in General Vanier's hands as soon as possible, and I should therefore be grateful if, when it has been signed by His Majesty, it could be sent by safe hand to the Right Honourable Vincent Massey, High Commissioner for Canada in London. I am sending Mr. Massey a copy of this letter and I am asking him to see that this document is placed in an envelope bearing the arms of the King in respect of Canada and addressed to the President of the Provisional Government of the French Republic. I am also sending Mr. Massey a typewritten copy of the enclosed Letter of Credence for transmission to General Vanier with the original document in order that he may have both documents at the same time, the original to be handed to the President of the Provisional Government of the French Republic and the copy to be handed to the Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Provisional Government of the French Republic.

The King's informal approval of General LaFlèche's appointment as Minister has now been received.

Normally the next step is to ask the Greek Chargé d'Affaires at Ottawa to obtain his Government's agrément to General LaFlèche's appointment as Minister, upon receipt of which an announcement could be made. Later when the Greek Government's informal agreement about embassies is received we can ask the King's approval and announce this further development.

Mr. Robertson telegraphs this morning that the Greek Government have not yet indicated their agreement to the exchange of embassies, and he suggests that General LaFlèche should be informed of the present actual position before the Greek agrément is requested for his immediate appointment as Minister.

Does the Prime Minister wish to communicate this information to General LaFlèche?<sup>34</sup>

San Francisco, June 8, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Following from Robertson, Begins: Your telegram D-290. Aghnidis, the Greek Ambassador to London, came to see me this morning to apologize most profusely for his Government's delay in replying to our proposal that Greece and Canada raise their respective Missions to the rank of Embassy. His Foreign Minister, who is the head of the delegation here, has been pressing his Government at Athens to send a prompt affirmative reply, but has not yet been able to secure their concurrence. Reason given for delay is that Greek Government has, within last few weeks, felt compelled to decline similar proposal to one or two other countries and now felt compromised by this earlier decision, which Ambassador and Foreign Minister insist should not, in any way, affect question of status of Greek and Canadian Missions. They believe question can be straightened out to our satisfaction within next few weeks and ask for a little time.

In the meantime, nomination of General LaFlèche as Minister, with the personal rank of Ambassador is most welcome to Greek Government, who are instructing their Chargé d'Affaires in Ottawa by phone today to advise you accordingly. Announcement of appointment can, therefore, now be made.<sup>35</sup> Ends.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

You will remember that we had some discussion last November arising out of the Prime Minister's statement that the Canadian Government were anxious to appoint a High Commissioner for Canada in India.<sup>36</sup>

The Secretary of State for India has recently consulted the Government of India about the suggestion and, as a result, I have been asked to let you know that the Government of India would welcome the appointment of a High Commissioner for Canada in India on the basis of reciprocity. Should the Canadian authorities decide to proceed with the proposal, the authorities in London and the Government of India would be grateful if they could be informed in advance of any publication.

CONFIDENTIAL

Dear Mr. Robertson,

You may remember that we had some discussion towards the end of 1943 regarding the possibility of the appointment by the Canadian Government of a High Commissioner for Canada in India — see in this connection my letter to you of the 17th April, 1944.

I have now been informed from London that the Government of India are anxious to appoint a High Commissioner to Canada as soon as possible, but before doing so would be glad to learn the intentions of the Canadian Government as to the appointment of a Canadian High Commissioner in India.<sup>38</sup> The Government of India would also like to know whether the Canadian Government would agree to the Government of India sending a High Commissioner to Canada even if, for the moment, no reciprocal appointment could be made for India.<sup>39</sup>

I should be very grateful if you would let me have the views of the Canadian Government on this matter and let me know what reply they would wish to be made to the enquiry from the Government of India.

Following for Wrong from Robertson, Begins: Your telegram No. 2394. I told Secretary of State for India<sup>41</sup> that Government of Canada would be glad to receive an Indian High Commissioner whenever the Indian Government wished to appoint one, but that it might be some little time before we were able to reciprocate by appointing an Indian<sup>42</sup> representative in India. I gather from the conversation, which led nowhere, that the Secretary of State was not familiar with his predecessor's<sup>43</sup> interest in arranging for exchanges of High Commissioners between India and other parts of the Commonwealth.

2. From a subsequent conversation with Sir John Stephenson of the Dominions Office, I gained the impression that the United Kingdom Government did not intend to proceed very rapidly with the proposed appointment of a United Kingdom High Commissioner in Delhi. Ends.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

The new Italian Ambassador to Great Britain called on me a few days ago and in the course of his conversation asked whether I thought Canada would be prepared to permit his Government to re-open the Italian Consulate General in Montreal. Count Carandini seemed to attach less importance to the practical value resulting from the appointment of an Italian Consul-General in Canada than to the moral effect of our willingness to receive him. I told the Ambassador that I would make informal enquiries and in due course would let him know what the view of my Government was and whether they would be likely to give favourable consideration to a formal request.

Yours sincerely,

RESUMPTION OF DIPLOMATIC RELATIONS WITH ITALY

Under the Armistice regime which governs our relations with Italy, a state of war still continues until at least a preliminary peace is signed. The United Kingdom has established direct diplomatic relations with Italy without accrediting the Ambassador formally since such a procedure would involve addressing credentials to the Lieutenant of the Realm "who is still the King's enemy." Sir Noel Charles, therefore, carries the personal rank of Ambassador only. This arrangement took place in October of last year.

G. Ignatieff to G. de T. Glazebrook.

Some days later the United States Government, after consulting with the Governments of the other American Republics, in accordance with the provisions of a resolution adopted at the Rio Conference, 1942,<sup>45</sup> announced that it was resuming diplomatic relations with Italy. Mr. Kirk was accredited formally as United States Ambassador. Although the United Kingdom had requested that the United States should follow procedure similar to that adopted in relation to Sir Noel Charles, the United States decision could not be reconsidered in view of consultations with the other American Republics. There is, therefore, a difference in the formal status of the United States and United Kingdom Ambassadors in Italy. The United States action was followed by the resumption of diplomatic relations by Chile. France is also expected to establish direct diplomatic relations with Italy shortly, as soon as the difficulties regarding Tunis are cleared up. Norway has resumed direct diplomatic relations with the Italian Government. In a Dominions Office telegram, Circular D. 40 of January 9th,† reference was made to the Turkish Ambassador and it was stated that certain representatives of the Latin American States expect to present their credentials shortly.

The position, therefore, appears to be that there is nothing to prevent Canada establishing direct diplomatic relations with Italy, so long as there is no exchange of diplomatic representatives accredited to the Heads of State in the conventional manner.

Ottawa, April 8, 1945

SECRET. Your telegram No. 967 April 5th,† reopening of Italian Consulates General.

We have no objection in principle to the sending to Canada of an Italian representative. The arrangement suggested for South Africa, namely, an Italian agent with the personal rank of Consul General, would seem to be the most satisfactory one. It would provide for any business there may be and be consistent with the attitude taken by the United Kingdom and apparently other Commonwealth Governments.

You may therefore indicate to Count Carandini that a formal request along the above lines would be favourably received.

I note Carandini's inquiry referred to reopening of a consulate general in Montreal. Before the war the Italian Consul General for Canada resided in

Your message WA-581 of January 29th.† Please inform Mexican Ambassador that we will be very glad to submit name of prospective Minister to Canada for the King's agrément as soon as it is received. As you know from the case of the Peruvian nominee, this procedure may take a little time. The Canadian Government is naturally anxious to open Legations in Mexico and Peru as promptly as possible following on the announcement of our agreement to exchange missions with those countries. Nomination of Ministers may, however, take a little longer than we had hoped, since selection of individuals concerned has not yet been finally determined and name when decided here has to be submitted to the King for formal approval. In circumstances simultaneous requests for agréments do not seem feasible. We see no objections to Mexico taking first step in the matter since we have now publicly agreed to exchange of missions.

MINUTE FOR FILE

Following the telephone conversation between Mr. Pearson and Mr. Robertson on Monday, February 28, Mr. McCarthy called on the Mexican Ambassador this morning at 12.30 p.m. to explain to him that Canada had, at the moment, a person of high intellectual attainments and of diplomatic experience, whom we would like to send to Mexico as Ambassador. It was wondered whether Mexico would agree to exchange Ambassadors instead of Ministers, and before taking any action, the Canadian authorities wanted to get the reaction of the Mexican authorities to such a proposal.

The Mexican Ambassador stated that he was delighted to hear this, and that he did not have to refer the matter back to his Government in order to accept the proposal to exchange Ambassadors instead of Ministers. When asked whether Dr. Del Rio, whose name had been put forward as Mexican Minister Designate to Canada, might be the first Mexican Ambassador to Canada, Mr. Najera replied in the affirmative.

This information was telephoned by Mr. McCarthy to Mr. Robertson at 6 p.m. today, and as a result Ottawa is immediately taking up with London the question of opening an Embassy in Mexico instead of a Legation. As soon as this has been cleared, the next step would apparently be to advise officially the Mexican Embassy here that it is now proposed to exchange Ambassadors instead of Ministers, and at the same time, put forward the name of our future Ambassador to Mexico.

I am enclosing copy in translation of a telegram† which the Peruvian Consul-General here has received from his Government, instructing him to take up with us the question of making the missions to be exchanged between Canada and Peru Embassies from the start. I pointed out to him that up to now the only countries with which we had exchanged embassies had been full-fledged members of the United Nations and belligerent allies. Chile was technically in the same position as Peru—had broken off relations with the Axis countries and regarded itself as “associated” with the Allies. I did not think the Government could consider raising its representation in Peru to the status of an embassy without being ready to do the same for Chile. Davila said that he quite appreciated that from our point of view in Ottawa, it did not make much practical difference whether a mission was a legation, embassy or even, as in his own case, a consulate-general. He said he had always found all branches of the Canadian Government anxious to help him and not inclined to stand on points of protocol. He said he had to confess, however, that the position was rather different in his own country, where they still made a good deal of difference between ambassadors and ministers, not only in formal protocol, but in such matters as ease of access to the President or to the

He has asked me to approach my Government as to whether this appointment would meet with their approval.

2. Allen, who is in charge of Polish affairs at the Foreign Office states confidentially and informally that Fiderkiewicz is of the Extreme Left and probably a member of the P.P.R.<sup>51</sup> He is definitely not one of Mikolajczyk's<sup>52</sup> men. As an older man who has travelled a good deal and lived in the United States, he is not too fanatical to deal with. On the other hand, he is not a very impressive personality, and Allen does not think he carries much weight in Warsaw. His appointment in London was simply to carry on for a few weeks until Strasburger could arrive. My impression from my conversations with Allen, whose judgement I respect, is that, although the Poles might have made a better choice in their own interests, it would be difficult for us to refuse to accept their nominee.

SECRET. Following for Wrong from Robertson, Begins: I told Strasburger, the new Polish Ambassador in London, that I thought it would be desirable if they could postpone establishing their new Mission in Ottawa until we were ready to open our Mission in Warsaw, which probably would not be for another three or four months. He said he would inform his Government of this view, adding, however, that he knew they were anxious to open a Mission in Canada as soon as possible. Mr. Fiderkiewicz was waiting hopefully in Cracow for his Agrément and in the meantime the Polish Government were encountering a number of practical difficulties arising from the fact that they had no representative in Canada. To meet these difficulties Strasburger thought his Government might wish to open a Consular Office in Canada straight away, deferring the establishment of a Diplomatic Mission, until we were ready to move. I said I thought this might be a good solution to their immediate problem.

2. Speaking quite privately to Strasburger I said that we had been rather surprised at his Government's nomination of a member of the Communist Party as their first Minister to Canada. There was no question of withholding Agrément on this account. The responsibility in the matter was strictly that of the Polish Government, but having in mind the large number of Poles in Canada, including many of recent and temporary immigration, another nominee might have received a warmer welcome from his own compatriots. Strasburger did not directly deny that Fiderkiewicz was a Communist, but said that all members of the P.P.R., to which party the Minister Designate belonged, were not Communists. Fiderkiewicz was a man of some professional standing and experience and not in any sense an agitator. He thought that if he were appointed Minister to Canada the Canadian Government would not have any occasion to complain about his conduct. Ends.

Ottawa, February 3, 1944

Sir,

1. I have the honour to refer to the position of the Accredited Representative of the Union of South Africa in Ottawa as revealed in the terms of the South African Insurance Act, 1943.

2. In the correspondence which took place with the South African Government during the early part of 1938 concerning Mr. de Waal Meyer's appointment, the South African Government indicated its preference for an exchange of Ministers. As we were not prepared to exchange diplomatic agents between countries of the Commonwealth, the South African Government decided to appoint an "Accredited Representative." Our preference at that time was for the exchange of High Commissioners similar in status to the High Commissioners exchanged with the United Kingdom. In a confidential letter of February 26th, 1938,<sup>53</sup> to Dr. Skelton,<sup>53</sup> Dr. Bodenstein<sup>54</sup> stated that by using the title "Accredited Representative" they did not believe they could properly be considered to have indicated to Canada or to the world at large that they deemed themselves lower in status than the United Kingdom, nor were they aware of any rule laying down that a "High Commissioner" necessarily enjoyed a higher status than an "Accredited Representative."

3. The Canadian Government accepted the proposed title but objected to the South African desire to describe the Representative as being "on the footing of a diplomatic agent." The Government expressed its willingness to recognize the Representative "as having the same status and privileges and immunities as a High Commissioner." When, in 1939, our intention to appoint you as High Commissioner for Canada was expressed, no question was raised by the South African Government concerning the title we proposed to use.

4. Our intention [sic] has been drawn, however, to Section 17 sub-section (1) of the South African Insurance Act, 1943, which provides for the recognition of securities deposited by insurers with the Union's High Commissioner in London or with the Union's High Commissioners in Australia, Canada, or New Zealand, if such should be appointed. In a discussion in the Union House of Assembly on April 9th, 1943, it was made clear by the Minister of Finance

Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

that there was no High Commissioner in Canada, Australia, or New Zealand. When a member proposed an amendment providing for the depositing of securities with an approved person in Canada, Australia, or New Zealand, the Minister of Finance said that he was not prepared to take such a risk. It was indicated that Canadian and Australian insurers could make deposits with the South African High Commissioner in London, but apparently the South African Representative in Canada was not considered to have the proper status to receive deposits.

5. I should be glad if you would discuss this matter with the South African Government, expressing the hope of the Canadian Government that it will be found possible to raise the status of the South African representative in Canada to that of High Commissioner.

6. You might point out that the Canadian Government agreed to have the South African representative styled as Accredited Representative on the understanding that his status would not be lower than that of the High Commissioners and heads of diplomatic missions in Ottawa. We have at all times dealt with Mr. Meyer upon the assumption that he was on the same footing as the other heads of missions here.

7. You might inform the South African Government that the Canadian Government was disturbed by the statements made by the Minister of Finance in the Union Parliament which were cited in paragraph 4 and that, in view of these statements, we find it difficult to understand the position held by the Union Government's representative.

8. The implications of the Minister's statement are, all in all, rather puzzling. In recent years, and particularly since the 1926 Imperial Conference and the enactment of the Statute of Westminster, the Canadian Government has always regarded the formal relations between the Canadian Government and the Union Government as being essentially on the same footing as the relations between the Canadian Government and the Government of the United Kingdom, and we had assumed that the Union Government viewed these relations in the same light.

Capetown, April 25, 1944

Reference your despatch No. 14 of February 3rd regarding change of name of Accredited Representative from the Union of South Africa to Canada, no action has been taken yet to change existing situation.

I discussed the matter with the Secretary of State for External Affairs shortly after my arrival and had further conference yesterday with the Acting Secretary who intends to follow the matter up and endeavour to get some action taken before Parliament adjourns, particularly to solve the problem of insurance companies by an amendment of the Insurance Act which would permit deposit of security with the Accredited Representative in Canada.

With reference to the exchange of correspondence with the Union Government in 1938 mentioned in despatch under reference, and the reluctance of Canadian Government at that time to permit the use of the term "Minister," may I suggest that developments have occurred since then and that the matter should now be given further consideration.

The term "High Commissioner" has two meanings, one of which carries with it administrative control and is objectionable on that account in some countries, for example, the High Commissioner from the United Kingdom to the Union of South Africa has a dual position, one of which gives him administrative control over certain Protectorates in South Africa. This causes confusion in this country and misunderstanding. Now that the Canadian Government has raised her Ministers to foreign countries to the rank of Ambassador, may I suggest that the matter might be considered at the Prime Ministers Conference in London, and that appointee from one Dominion to another should be styled Ambassador of the British Commonwealth from Canada to Australia or other Dominions. I think that this designation would be acceptable in all Dominions.

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, June 13, 1944

Dear Charlie [Burchell],

Norman has already written a letter† which in part answers some of the questions you took up in your personal letter to me of May 23rd.† I have nothing to add to what he said on the question of altering the title of the South African Representative here and on the position of de Waal Meyer.

I have never liked the title of High Commissioner myself, but I think it improbable that it will be changed for some time to come. There is certainly no unanimity on the change. Even if we could reach agreement on a suitable alternative title, there are a good many who would oppose any alteration at all.

I should find it difficult to endorse the form of title which you recommend. If we are going to use diplomatic titles at all, I should favour going the whole way and calling our High Commissioners Canadian Ambassadors or Ministers to the countries in which they are serving. There are technical arguments against this since an Ambassador is accredited always by the Head of a State to the Head of a State and not from Government to Government. I have been playing about with the use of some alternative title without such technical meaning, like "Envoy," but I have got nothing in mind that seems worth considering.

Yours sincerely,

PERSONAL AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, November 27, 1944

Dear Charlie [Burchell],

I have received your two personal letters† of October 27th and November 6th concerning the report that Dr. Viljoen may be appointed as South African representative here. He is, of course, a very senior member of the South African Public Service and I think that there are no grounds on which we could base any objection to his selection. The considerations which you advance must be weighed by General Smuts before the appointment is made rather than by us.

I have very recently written to you about your objections to the title of High Commissioner, indicating that nothing can in my view be done to change this title for some little time. Leaving out of account the representatives appointed by some Commonwealth countries in India and the Indian High Commissioners in the Commonwealth and also omitting our own High Commissioner in Newfoundland from the reckoning, there are about twenty High Commissioners now in office in Commonwealth countries and it would be difficult to change the title of one of them without changing the title of them all. One special difficulty which I have not mentioned is that any move in this direction at the present time would open up the question of the position of Ireland within the Commonwealth over an issue of minor importance; this thorny matter must surely be faced on its merits.

You will note that I do not oppose your suggestion on grounds associated with the nature of the crown or other constitutional points. I agree with you that the conception of the place of the crown is flexible enough to permit the adoption of diplomatic titles in place of the title of High Commissioner.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I duly received your letter of November 22nd† in which you suggest that I might talk over informally with General Smuts the possibility of South Africa adopting for their representative in Ottawa the title which they accord to their representative in London.

As your letter was received after we had moved to Cape Town and as General Smuts will not be in Pretoria until some time next week, I felt that I knew him well enough to send him a personal note on the subject, a copy of which is enclosed herewith.

Since writing this note I have learned that it is quite possible, and indeed very probable, that Dr. Viljoen will be given the title of High Commissioner. The fact of his appointment has not been made public, although it is common knowledge on the street that he is to have this position. One of the anti-government papers, Die Vaderland, which was received this morning contained the statement not only that Dr. Viljoen is to be appointed but that he is to be given the title of High Commissioner and not of Accredited Representative. A translation of the article† is enclosed herewith.

Mr. du Plessis<sup>55</sup> arrived in Cape Town this week for the Parliamentary session and I will take the opportunity of discussing the matter informally with him during the next day or two. I find du Plessis very agreeable as, indeed, I do all the officials of the Department of External Affairs and I feel that I can talk very frankly with any of them.

PERSONAL

Cape Town, December 28, 1944

My dear Prime Minister,

You will recall that in a despatch dated the 9th of March, 1944,† my predecessor, Dr. Laureys, in accordance with instructions received from the Prime Minister of Canada,<sup>56</sup> put forward the suggestion that the representative from the Union to Canada should bear the title of High Commissioner which is the title of all representatives from the other Dominions to Canada.

Before I left Canada last March the Prime Minister discussed this matter with me and mentioned his desire of having a uniform title for representatives from one Dominion to another.

By recent mail I received a further letter† from the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and he again mentions the desire in Canada that the successor to Mr. de Waal Meyer should carry the title of High Commissioner from the Union of South Africa to Canada and he suggested that I should discuss the matter informally with you and with the officers of the Department of External Affairs in Pretoria.

It is pointed out that while the matter is not regarded as one of great importance, we now have in Ottawa High Commissioners from the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and Ireland, including a former member of the United Kingdom Cabinet, an Australian general and former Senator, a former member of the New Zealand Cabinet who relinquished his portfolio to come to Canada and one of the very senior and experienced officers of the Irish Department of External Affairs.

It is further mentioned that all these gentlemen would be eligible for appointment to head diplomatic missions in foreign countries, and that from the point of view of the appointing governments their designation of High Commissioners instead of Ambassadors or Ministers had made no difference in their selection.

The representative from South Africa who up to the present time has carried the title of "Accredited Representative" has always been treated at Ottawa as though he bore the title of High Commissioner and is given exactly the same status as the High Commissioners from the other Nations of the British Commonwealth and, indeed, as Ambassadors and Ministers from foreign countries. His title, however, always requires explanation and more, perhaps, for the sake of uniformity than for any other reason, the Canadian Government would prefer that the representative of the Union should carry the same designation as that used by other Commonwealth Nations. This arrangement, if agreed to by you, will not prejudice any later general agreement to alter the title of High Commissioner if this is subsequently desired by the Union Government or by Canada or any other Dominion.

Yours faithfully,

Dear Norman [Robertson],

In my letter of January 5, 1945, I sent you a copy of a letter which I had sent to General Smuts regarding changing the designation of the representative of the Union in Canada.

I now enclose a copy of a letter received from Mr. Forsyth in reply, and I think you can count with certainty on the new appointee being given the title of High Commissioner.

I am bound to say that the letters received from you and Mr. Wrong have convinced me that the present time is not opportune for making any change in the title of High Commissioners. I am glad to note, however, that you agree with me that the Dominion has now reached the stage of self-government that there are no technical difficulties in changing the title if, as, and when the time is opportune. It is certainly a most unfortunate title to give to a representative from one Dominion to another in view of the aroma which surrounds this title in respect of representatives from the United Kingdom to colonies, protectorates and mandated territories.

It would be appreciated if you could inform the Spanish Government of Mr. Glass' appointment as Trade Commissioner in Spain. It is possible that Mr. Glass, who is at present in England, may travel via Spain to reach Lisbon, in which case he might request that the usual Customs and Immigration courtesies be extended to him.

London, July 19, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to my telegram No. 2024 of 19th July† in which I informed you that the Swiss Federal Council desire to establish a Legation at Ottawa, and hope that the Canadian Government will appoint a Minister in Berne. Herewith is enclosed a copy of a letter dated 19th June from the Swiss Minister in London to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom on this subject. The delay in transmitting this communication to us was due to an oversight in the Foreign Office, for which the Dominions Office have expressed their regrets. In the meantime, I believe that the Swiss Minister has been enquiring as to whether a reply had been received from the Canadian Government.

I have etc.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you under the instructions of my Government that the Swiss Federal Council, desiring to strengthen the traditional relations between Switzerland and the Dominion of Canada, have decided to establish a legation at Ottawa.

The Federal Council hope likewise that the Government of the Dominion of Canada, on their part, may consider the possibility of appointing a Minister to Switzerland with residence in Berne.

If the decision of the Swiss Federal Council meets with the consent of the Government of Canada, the Federal Council would be happy to appoint at an early date an Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary in Ottawa.

I am instructed to ask your kind assistance in view of informing accordingly His Majesty's Government in the Dominion of Canada.

*Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

I am attaching copy of a letter of July 19th from our High Commissioner in London, transmitting copy of a letter dated a month earlier from the Swiss Minister in London to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom.

The Government of Switzerland wishes to establish a Legation in Ottawa, and would be glad if the Canadian Government would appoint a Minister to Berne. If the proposal to establish a diplomatic mission in Canada is acceptable to the Canadian Government, the Government of Switzerland would ask for agrément for Dr. Victor Nef, formerly Consul General in New York, as their first Minister to Canada.

You will recall that some three years ago we proposed an exchange of diplomatic representatives with Switzerland, but the Swiss, who were resisting pressure from the Germans to have them receive Ministers from Slovakia and Croatia and other puppet Nazi states, tried to strengthen their position by laying down the principle that they would not enter into new diplomatic relations with any country for the duration of the war in Europe. For this reason they felt unable to receive a Canadian diplomatic mission in 1942.

Switzerland is now anxious to develop direct diplomatic relations with those countries of the United Nations in which it did not have diplomatic missions before the war. It has already recognized the new Provisional Government of Poland and it is desirous of exchanging missions with Canada, Australia, New Zealand and South Africa.

I am inclined to reply to the Swiss note to the effect that Canada would welcome the establishment of a Swiss Legation in Ottawa and be agreeable to the appointment of Dr. Nef as Minister. At the same time, we should point out that the establishment of a Canadian mission in Switzerland may have to be deferred for some little time. Certainly we would have to complete our arrangements for representation in Allied countries which have maintained missions in Ottawa during the war before we could proceed with the establishment of an office in Berne.<sup>59</sup>

Your telegram No. 2554† and earlier messages regarding exchange of diplomatic missions with Switzerland. Please convey to Swiss Minister our real regret for the very long delay in replying to his enquiry and inform him that the Canadian Government would welcome the establishment of a Swiss Legation in Canada. The King's informal approval of Dr. Nef's appointment as Swiss Minister is being sought and may be expected shortly.

In advising the Swiss Minister to this effect, you should explain that the establishment of a Canadian mission in Switzerland may have to be deferred for some little time. It is felt that we would have to proceed further with arrangements for representation in Allied countries which maintained missions in Ottawa during the war before proceeding with the establishment of an office in Berne.

London, October 5, 1945

Following is repetition of telegram No. 1520 of 3rd October from Berne to Foreign Office. Message begins: Please pass following to Canada House from Rive, Begins: For Secretary of State for External Affairs and N. A. Robertson.

I saw Stucki<sup>60</sup> this morning and cannot exaggerate his concern over the delay in exchange of Ministers. They are most anxious to have Nef at Ottawa at the earliest possible moment, both "for national reasons" and because the movement of their officers to posts where they are urgently needed has to await Nef's departure from New York. It is too late now for them to free the post of Consul General at New York by any different assignment for Nef.

Stucki is equally anxious to see Canada represented at Berne. I explained that shortage of personnel made our position difficult. He said that he understood, but would I enquire whether, "as a favour" to the Swiss and as evidence of cordial relations, the Canadian Government would make gesture accrediting General Vanier as Minister to Switzerland until a successor could be found. He said that he knew General Vanier personally and that the General's qualities were known to many of the Swiss. (Query. Group omitted)<sup>61</sup> would be well received in Switzerland. He said that the suggestion was his own and not from his Government, but he knew it would be acceptable. He hoped that Nef could go to Ottawa and a step be made publicly towards Canadian representation at Berne without further delay. He was very keen on early publicity about Canadian and Swiss relations. I promised to report the conversation at once to Ottawa. With regard to Nef, I said I was not directly concerned, but that I understood from the officers responsible that the Swiss would very shortly receive agrément. Ends. Message ends.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I should like to refer to our telegram No. 2919 of 8th October, and previous correspondence concerning the appointment of a Swiss Minister in Ottawa. You may wish to have a little more information on the negotiations, in view of the fact that they seem to have led to a maximum of misunderstanding on the part of the Swiss. The Swiss authorities apparently attach a good deal of importance to this exchange of missions, and are not a little impatient.

The proposal for an exchange of missions was first made by the Swiss Minister in London in a letter dated 19th June to Mr. Churchill.<sup>62</sup> It was unfortunately held up in the Foreign Office and reached us only in a letter from the Dominions Office dated 19th July.† The Foreign Office were apologetic about the delay, both to us and to the Swiss. As instructed by External Affairs in your telegram No. 2075 of the 8th September, we accepted the responsibility for the subsequent delay in reply, and expressed our regret to the Swiss. Throughout the summer the Swiss kept expressing their anxiety and impatience by constant telephone calls to the Foreign Office which were relayed to the Dominions Office and thence to Canada House. Eventually this channel of communication was cut down to direct communication between Lord Reay of the Foreign Office and myself.

The final confusion, and possibly the most serious, seems to have arisen over the question of formal and informal agréments. We informed the Foreign Office on the 16th September of the King's informal approval of the appointment, and the Foreign Office informed the Swiss Legation on the 18th September. It was our natural expectation that the next move would come from the Swiss. We were therefore very much surprised to receive Mr. Rive's telegram from Berne, of 3rd October.<sup>63</sup> As we suspected that the Swiss authorities would raise the subject with Mr. Rive we had explained to him the situation, as it existed at that time, before his departure for Switzerland. This evidence of complete misunderstanding made it seem desirable to get into direct communication with the Swiss themselves. I talked on several occasions, therefore, to M. Escher, the Counsellor of the Swiss Legation in London, who, as a good republican, seemed to become increasingly confused over the question of agréments. Some of the misunderstanding, I suspect, has been initiated by Lord Reay, whose explanations to M. Escher had not always been

the same as ours. Acting on Mr. Robertson's advice I explained to the Swiss that the formal agrément of the King was something which they need not wait for. Lord Reay, however, suspected us of lèse majesté, and queered the works. For this reason the Swiss have not yet responded to our suggestion, following your telegram No. 2340 of 6th October, concerning a concerted announcement. Instead, they have sat waiting for the formal agrément and continued to press the Foreign Office. We have now learned informally from the Palace that the formal agrément has been signed by the King and this information has been passed on informally to the Swiss.

Although we have made every effort to explain the situation carefully to M. Escher and to make it clear to him that although we freely accepted responsibility for the delay from 19th July to 19th September, subsequent misunderstandings were not of our creation. However, if one might judge from Mr. Rive's telegram, the Swiss may feel somewhat aggrieved. They are undoubtedly disappointed that Canada will not establish a Mission in Berne for reasons of prestige among other things. The proposals which they made through Mr. Rive are under consideration by Mr. Robertson, who will no doubt communicate his decision to you. In my informal discussions on this subject with the Foreign Office I have pointed out the nature of our previous obligations to Allied countries such as Norway and Czechoslovakia, as well as to a neutral country like Sweden which has had a Minister in Ottawa for several years.

I have entered into this somewhat detailed explanation in the expectation that you may wish to have this account for reference if it is necessary to clear away any clouds which hover over the Swiss Legation at Ottawa when it is established.

Yours sincerely,

J. W. HOLMES

I enclose a copy of a press statement† which we are giving out concerning the establishment of a Swiss Legation in Ottawa. In this statement we say nothing about reciprocal action on our part. When the Swiss put forward their proposal, they said that they had decided to establish a Legation in Ottawa, if we would agree, and they hoped that we would consider appointing a Minister in Berne. In answering, we said that the opening of a Canadian Legation in Switzerland might have to be deferred for some time, since we would have to proceed further with arrangements for representation in Allied countries which had established missions in Ottawa during the war, before proceeding with the establishment of an office in Berne.

I think it best not to include an explanation of this sort in a statement to the press, but if questions are asked there is no reason why they should not be answered on these lines.

The Swiss have also suggested, informally, that we might, as an interim measure, accredit Vanier in Berne as well as in Paris. I rather think the Prime Minister, who was informed of this in London early this month, will be reluctant to agree, as we have been resisting efforts of various countries to accredit their representatives in Washington to Ottawa as well, and it would be rather inconsistent for us to adopt a similar course ourselves with respect to two capitals as far apart as Paris and Berne.

The honour which falls on you today is one in which the whole of Canada will wish to share. It is a crowning touch upon the strong ties of friendship and understanding which Canada has so long enjoyed with the United States. It is a mark of the emergence of Canada as a world power of major rank. Today's ceremony will also, as I hope, build a firmer basis of understanding and cooperation upon which the efforts of both our countries may be directed ever more vigorously until the war has been won, and with increasing usefulness in the days of peace.

I wish you would say to the President how pleased I am that Canada's first Embassy should be established in the country of our good neighbour, and that this event in the history of the relations of our two countries should have its association with his tenure of office as President of the United States and my own tenure of office as Prime Minister of Canada; also its association with one who is so intimate and old a mutual friend as yourself. Mr. Ambassador, I am happy indeed to welcome you, an old friend, as Canada's first Ambassador to the United States and to receive from your hands the letter† by which His Majesty the King has accredited you in this new capacity.

On this significant occasion, as you have made clear, we may rejoice in the broad scope and effectiveness of our collaboration in war. In Italy as in the Aleutians, in the skies of Europe as, later, in the skies of Asia, and on all the oceans our comradeship in arms will have forged enduring bonds in the struggle against mutual enemies both east and west.

Through long years Canada and the United States, each confident of the good will of the other, have worked out their problems as neighbors, faithful always to the principle that the best solution of each problem is the solution which is to the mutual advantage of both. The solid achievements of the past are the best possible earnest of even greater achievements in future.

I assure you, Mr. Ambassador, that you may count on the continued support and friendship of the authorities of this Government who hope, as I do, that your several years as Minister here will be succeeded by many equally successful years as Ambassador. Ends.

Washington, March 7, 1944

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I have been meaning to write you for some time about a gathering of all the British Consuls in the U.S.A. which was held in Washington a few weeks ago. It was a sort of refresher course and pep talk combined. They do it every year. This time, Sir Gerald Campbell and Stephen Holmes asked me if I would quite informally talk to them on Canada and things Canadian. This seemed to be a reasonable thing to do, as so much of the work of so many of them is for Canada. They also wanted to know about Canada and the Commonwealth, Dominion status, etc. It was almost pathetic, and not a little humiliating to me as a Canadian, to have them ask me questions—many of them very elementary questions—about my own country so that they would be in a position to deal with enquiries about Canada which they received. Some of the border Consuls stated that more than 75% of their work deals with Canadian affairs. Some of these men—and they seemed to me to be very good men—who are representing us in this way have never been inside Canada and naturally know very little about it. I am surprised that Vaillancourt in his letter to Brooke Claxton,† a copy of which you sent me, did not refer to what I think is one of the worst examples of our reluctance to accept the full responsibilities of the status about which we boast, namely, our continued use of British Consuls in places where so much of the work done is Canadian.

When I asked the Consuls how they would feel if Canadian consular offices were opened in their territories, they were unanimous in their approval. This approval may have been inspired in part by the fact that such appointments would relieve them of much of their present work, but I think they had other and better reasons for it. One or two said that it would be a striking example of the real meaning of the Commonwealth if British and Canadian Consuls could function quite separately in United States cities. As an indication, however, that at least one of the Consuls missed the point in my suggestion, I am enclosing a copy of a letter from C. H. Cane, British Consul General in Detroit,† and a copy of my reply.† Cane seemed to be a very good sort of person; very willing and obliging, and quite proud of the fact that he was, as he put it, more of a Canadian Consul than a British Consul in his city. He obviously, however, missed the point about the significance of separate Canadian Consuls, and I am afraid might be inclined to consider such Consuls as more or less assistants to their British colleagues.<sup>65</sup> That feeling, I think, was not widespread and could easily be corrected even where it existed. In any event, one cannot be too sensitive about this point of view when it is expressed by a person whom we at present allow to act for Canada in a city a few hundred yards away from our own country. As long as they are permitted so to act, I thought that we should at least keep them informed about things Canadian and possibly let them see a little of our own country's war effort. To further that purpose, I wrote Dunton<sup>66</sup> on February 18th, and sent a copy of my letter† to you. I have not yet had any reply from him. We might discuss some informational aspects of this matter touched on in my letter to Dunton—at the next meeting of the W.I.B.

Yours sincerely,

Dear Mike [Pearson],

I have been expecting to hear from you on the subject of the meeting of British Consuls in Washington about which you wrote on March 7. Hugh Scully sent me a letter† on his return to New York after the meeting and also emphasized the unsatisfactory situation which prevails through our throwing such a burden of Canadian consular work onto the shoulders of British officials.

Our record is not one of which we can be particularly proud and the sooner we start to rectify it the better. There is under way in the department a thorough examination of the whole question of Canadian consular representation in the United States which will conclude with specific recommendations. When these are in we will go into the question in what I hope will be a practical and positive fashion.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

On April 3rd Mr. Macdonnell wrote to me† on your behalf suggesting that I might send you a statement about the duties of a Canadian Consular Service in the United States in peacetime other than those purely consular duties which are now carried out on Canada's behalf by United Kingdom officers.

I enclose three copies of a memorandum of May 24th on this subject.

Since I assume that a Canadian consular service will be absorbing the present Trade Commissioners' Offices in the United States, it will be useful to get from the Department of Trade and Commerce the instructions which they have in the past sent to their Trade Commissioners in this country. These instructions would give us leads on the kind of work our consuls would be doing.

We are hoping to receive soon from the British Embassy the estimate requested by Mr. Macdonnell of the amount of time which the United Kingdom consulates in the United States spend on Canadian business and what the general nature of this business is.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum by First Secretary, Embassy in United States<sup>67</sup>

[Washington,] May 24, 1944

WORK OF A CANADIAN CONSULAR SERVICE IN THE UNITED STATES IN PEACETIME IN ADDITION TO THE PURELY CONSULAR DUTIES NOW CARRIED OUT ON CANADA'S BEHALF BY UNITED KINGDOM OFFICERS

1. Commercial

After the war the main job of the Canadian consular service in the United States will be to protect and promote Canadian economic interests in the United States. There would seem to be no need to set forth the nature of this work in detail since the relevant United States foreign service regulations (Chapter XIV) would be applicable to the work of a Canadian consular service in the United States. Useful suggestions can also be found in Chapter XVII of the British general instructions to His Majesty's Consular Officers.

The commercial responsibilities of a consular office are discharged in two ways: by sending reports to Ottawa, and by giving direct assistance to Canadian citizens and business organizations in connection with the conduct of their trade with the United States.

The reports to Ottawa should include reports on:

- (a) The potentialities of the consular district as a market for Canadian products or as a competitor of Canadian products in international trade.
- (b) Concrete trade opportunities.
- (c) The general standing and distributing capacity of United States firms.
- (d) Tariffs, customs regulations, patents, regulations respecting commercial travellers.

The direct assistance to Canadian citizens and business organizations should include:

- (a) Replies to specific trade enquiries.
- (b) Assistance in their dealings with United States citizens.
- (c) Assistance in the settlement of trade disputes and the collection of debts.
- (d) Certification of invoices, execution of notarial documents, the taking of depositions, etc.

A Canadian consular office should also supply United States merchants with information on Canadian products, and should facilitate and report on visits which these merchants propose to make to Canada.

In cities where there is a considerable volume of Canadian business, and a substantial Canadian business community, a consular office should encourage and facilitate the establishment and successful functioning of a Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

In these, and in other ways, a Canadian consular office should guard against the infringement of the rights of Canadian citizens in matters relating to commerce and navigation which are based on custom, international law or treaty; should observe, report on and, whenever possible, remove discriminations against Canadian agricultural, commercial and industrial interests in the United States, and should in general protect the national commercial reputation of Canada.

In some countries after the war, e.g. the smaller Latin American states whose economies are complementary to Canada's, it may be found desirable for the Canadian consular service to facilitate the export trade of that country to Canada. The United States commercial service in Canada is, however, large and efficient and it would not appear necessary or desirable that the Canadian consular service attempt to duplicate its work. Moreover, Canada may after the war be short of United States dollars, and be anxious therefore to find alternative sources of supply outside the United States for goods which Canada needs to import.

2. Public relations.

The most important public relations work which a Canadian consular service in the United States can do will be done as a by-product of routine consular duties. Consular officers in the course of their duties meet a larger number of representative private American citizens than do diplomatic officers in Washington. They meet many of them when they need assistance in surmounting some obstacle to the free movement of goods and peoples across the border and at such times courtesy, intelligence and efficiency are most appreciated. It is possible to hide a misfit in the Department at Ottawa, or even in a large diplomatic mission. It is much more difficult to hide him in a consulate.

The other two main branches of the public relations work of a consular service will be to answer inquiries about Canada from newspapermen and lecturers, and to give public speeches. If a consular officer is to do this work as it should be done he ought to have a wide and intimate direct knowledge of Canada (both the English-speaking and French-speaking parts), a liking for newspapermen and ability in public-speaking.

3. The local Canadian community.

In 1940 there were about a million persons in the United States who had been born in Canada. At that time about half had become naturalized United States citizens. Since then the proportion of United States citizens among the Canadian community in the United States has increased, probably very considerably. These former Canadians are often the strongest supporters of Canada in the United States. They have become United States citizens either because of economic pressure arising out of discriminations against the employment of aliens, or because of the very proper feeling that a person who intends to live permanently in the United States ought to accept all the responsibilities and privileges of citizenship. They have not however, except in a very few cases, any desire to cut themselves off from Canada. A Canadian consular officer in the United States should help the members of the Canadian community, both citizens and non-citizens, to maintain a healthy interest and pride in the country from which they came. He will find that he is doing this by his general public relations work. He will also find it useful to keep in touch with the local Canadian organizations and help them to keep their activities on sound lines. He should not, of course, discourage Canadians from becoming naturalized. Nor should he encourage the Canadian-born to become a separate community—not that there would be much chance of his succeeding in doing this.

4. Visiting Canadians.

Visiting Canadians will provide the consular service with a considerable amount of routine consular work—problems connected with crossing the border, identification and other documents, troubles with police and other local authorities, etc. They will also properly expect other assistance from a consular service. Businessmen will want to be put in touch with businessmen; newspapermen will want to be helped to get interviews; public men will expect to be looked after and assisted in meeting prominent United States citizens. The danger to avoid is that consulates do "Cooks" or "American Express" work. A Canadian Consul-General should not be a "chief Canadian greeter."

5. Tourist traffic.

A consular service should promote the Canadian tourist industry, not only because of its material advantages to Canada, but also because an American who has spent a pleasant holiday in Canada is likely to have a friendly feeling about Canada and a better understanding of Canada.

6. Trends in United States opinion.

Since it is a truism that Washington is not a mirror of the mind of the American people, and since it is desirable that the Canadian government should be kept informed of significant changes in American opinion, the consular service should send reports from time to time to the Canadian Embassy in Washington on trends of opinion. Consular officers will require a considerable amount of guidance in the preparation of these reports. Clearly, to be useful, they should not be merely analyses of newspaper editorials, but penetrating studies of opinion. Their value will depend on their brevity, and on the width of the range of acquaintances of the consular officer and the depth of his knowledge of the United States.

7. Visits of Canadian warships.

If the consulate is situated at a sea port the consul will, of course, call on any Canadian warships that are in the harbour. He will advise the Captain where to purchase stores or supplies, and will assist him in providing entertainment for the officers and crew. He will report to the appropriate Service Attaché in Washington, or to the Embassy, any Service personnel who gets into trouble, and will, if necessary, advance money to destitute Service personnel. He will also assist in the apprehension of deserters from the Royal Canadian Navy.

8. The consulates as "Canadian centres."

Each Canadian consulate should become in course of time a "Canadian centre." It should have an adequate reception room with a few well-chosen current Canadian books and periodicals in both English and French, and some Canadian pictures. It should have in a separate room—perhaps opening off the reception room—a Canadian library of five hundred to a thousand of the best books by Canadians or about Canada. This library should be kept constantly up-to-date. The books by Canadians should be, of course, both fiction and non-fiction, and the books about Canada should include all the standard series such as the Canadian-American relations series, the Frontiers of Settlement series, and a complete set of publications of the Canadian Institute of International Affairs. There should also be a complete set of all current government publications and of the more important recent government publications such as, for example, the Rowell-Sirois report and Hansard since about 1930. The library should be open to the public as a reference library. The consulate should be furnished entirely with Canadian-made goods where they are available both manufactured goods and handicrafts.

*Minister, Embassy in United States, to Under-Secretary of State

Washington, June 7, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have now had a chance to study the reports of the British consular service in the United States on the amount of the Canadian work which they do. These reports† were sent to you under cover of my letter of May 31.†

2. What surprises me is the relatively small proportion of their work which the consuls state is Canadian. This does not accord with the impression which many of them gave last February at the meeting here of all the British consuls in the U.S.A. Some of the border consuls then stated that more than 75% of their work dealt with Canadian affairs.

3. One possible explanation of this apparent discrepancy—as well as of peculiar differences in the estimates made by various consuls—is that it is not always clear whether a consul is talking about the Canadian proportion of all his work, or the Canadian proportion of his routine consular work. (The Kansas City consulate was one of the few offices which reported clearly on this point. It said “not more than twenty percent of our time is occupied by consular routine and twenty percent of the consular routine concerns Canadian nationals.”)

4. During the past four years the “information” work of the British consular service has increased greatly, the normal commercial work has virtually disappeared, and other normal consular work has shrunk. The result has been that the Canadian proportion of the total work of the consular service has gone down.

5. The point made by the Boston consul general is important. He said in his letter that

“however much work we might find we were doing on Canadian account, if there were a Canadian consul here he would certainly find much more work coming his way than ever gets to us since it is not generally realised that we handle Canadian affairs in this district.”

It is probably true that the more knowledge an American has of Canada's national status the less likely he is to go to a British consulate for information about Canada.

6. Just because the reports from the consular offices are not strictly comparable it is difficult to deduce much from them on where Canadian consulates should be established. I should think, however, that, on the basis of these reports and of other criteria, it is clear that Canadian consular offices should be established in at least Boston, Detroit, Chicago and Los Angeles. There also seems to be an argument for small offices in Miami, St. Paul-Minneapolis, and possibly San Francisco and Cleveland or Buffalo. The reports from Seattle, Denver and New Orleans have not come in yet, but my guess is that we should have a consulate in Seattle and that we might, for "cultural" and domestic political reasons, eventually have one in New Orleans. This would mean that we would have offices in the following cities where the British now have consulates-general—Los Angeles, Chicago, New Orleans, Boston, Detroit, San Francisco and New York. (The other cities where they have consulates general are Kansas City, Philadelphia and Houston).

7. This would cover the states which, according to the census of 1940, have 20,000 or more persons of Canadian birth.

Los Angeles .....	California (96,000)
Boston .....	Maine (61,000)
Boston .....	Massachusetts (224,000)
Boston .....	New Hampshire (42,000)
Boston .....	Rhode Island (31,000)
Boston .....	Vermont (20,000)
Chicago .....	Illinois (33,000)
Detroit .....	Michigan (158,000)
Minneapolis .....	Minnesota (22,000)
New York .....	New York (124,000)
New York .....	Connecticut (31,000)
Seattle .....	Washington (42,000)

8. Mr. Fisher, the consul general in San Francisco, came in to see us the day before yesterday. He will be calling on the department in a few days. He feels we should have some representation on the west coast immediately, mainly because the people there do not, according to him, have any idea about the magnitude of the Canadian war effort. As our participation in the Pacific war increases, and with that the danger that Americans, particularly those on the west coast, may think we are not carrying our full share of the burden, the argument for immediate Canadian representation on the west coast becomes stronger.

9. In your studies of the establishment of a Canadian consular service in the United States you have, no doubt, considered the possibility of appointing honorary consuls or honorary vice-consuls in cities where the volume of work would not be great enough to justify the appointment of a full-time officer. Mr. Fisher says that the United Kingdom has decided that the fee-paying system for honorary consular officers is unsatisfactory and that the British are now giving honorary consular officers an annual or quarterly grant in lieu of fees.

10. In conclusion, I can only repeat what has been said before—that representation of Canadian interests in the U.S.A. by non-Canadian Consuls is anomalous and misleading. We can hardly expect our neighbour to understand fully our independent position within the British Commonwealth of Nations when a British Consul, appointed by the United Kingdom government, looks after the affairs of a country which begins a few hundred yards from his office and has thousands of its nationals in the city where he is stationed.

Yours sincerely,

L. B. PEARSON

2. I think that this memorandum with any changes which you may wish to make might be sent to Trade and Commerce. After they have had a chance to think it over we could have an interdepartmental meeting.<sup>69</sup>

3. You will see that the memorandum suggests the feasibility of setting up six consular offices in 1945 and 1946. To prevent indefinite postponement I wonder whether we could not aim at a timetable which would call for interdepartmental consideration by September at the latest and the reaching of decisions by December, 1944.

CONSULAR SERVICES IN THE UNITED STATES

The opening of additional Canadian consular offices in the United States has been under consideration in the department for a number of years. It is generally agreed that additional consular representation is desirable but the shortage of trained personnel has so far prevented any action being taken. Yet Canada's relations with the United States are of such importance that all possible steps should be taken to improve them. Our dependence on the United Kingdom to represent Canada throughout the United States (except in Washington and New York) can only contribute to a misunderstanding by the United States public of Canada's position and policies.

There is no indication in the files that such a meeting took place.

2. By delaying the setting up of our own consular offices we continue to throw an unjustifiable burden on the United Kingdom consular service, we leave our representation in the hands of officers who, with the best will in the world, are inevitably handicapped by lack of knowledge of Canada and we encourage the growth in the United States of false ideas as to what Canada is and what she stands for. The status of Canada as a nation has increased materially during the war which makes our dependence on the United Kingdom consular service even more difficult to explain in the United States. It is therefore submitted that plans be prepared and the necessary authorization obtained to increase our consular representation in the United States at the earliest practicable date.

3. The functions required of a Canadian consular officer can be divided into four main headings:

- (a) The performance of a wide variety of consular duties.
- (b) Trade promotion.
- (c) General enquiries.
- (d) Public relations.

The first three functions will obviously influence the fourth, for they involve meeting a large number of private citizens in need of assistance, advice or information. The efficient and sympathetic handling of these day to day problems will do much to foster good relations and to make Canada known in the community. In addition our consular officers will be expected to be ready to help the press and to do a lot of public speaking as well as to have a wide acquaintance among representative citizens. It is therefore essential that the officers selected should have the qualifications necessary for effective public relations work, and this should be borne in mind in considering the recommendations put forward in the remainder of this memorandum. This is particularly true of the head of each office who will be required to undertake a great deal of representation work.

4. Reports have been received from all United Kingdom consular offices in the United States showing the extent to which they are called on to deal with Canadian affairs. A study of these reports shows that the most urgent demand is for five offices located at Boston, Detroit, Chicago, Seattle and either San Francisco or Los Angeles. (Since there is already a Trade Commissioner's office in Los Angeles, it is assumed for the purposes of this paper that Los Angeles is preferable to San Francisco). Then the Canadian Consul-General in New York recommends that one of the first offices to be opened be at Buffalo. The reports also show that serious consideration could be given to Philadelphia, Cleveland, Minneapolis or St. Paul, and Miami. An office in New Orleans might be desirable from the point of view of relations with a section of the United States where the French tradition is still strong. However, the personnel situation is such that it would be wise to concentrate attention at present on the six most important localities.

5. One point to determine is the rank of consular offices. There is much to be said for the argument that in each locality the Canadian office should have at least equal rank with the United Kingdom office unless special reasons exist for a greater degree of United Kingdom representation, as might happen in some seaports. The United Kingdom have consulates general at Boston, Chicago and Los Angeles and consulates at Buffalo, Detroit and Seattle. Buffalo, Detroit and Seattle would be among the most important Canadian offices by virtue of the numerous links which extend across the border and might well qualify for consulates general. There is therefore a case for proposing consulates general for all six localities.

6. On the other hand it may be that a less ambitious beginning would be preferable and that only consulates should be established. In the course of time and after the acquisition of some experience it would be possible to raise a consulate to a consulate general while it would be a matter of serious difficulty to lower a consulate general to a consulate.

7. Obviously there can be a number of compromises between the six consulates general suggested in paragraph five and the six consulates suggested in paragraph six.

8. It has been accepted that where the work of a consular office is predominantly commercial, the senior officer should be selected from the Commercial Intelligence Service with a Consul or Vice-Consul from External Affairs, whereas the reverse would apply if commercial problems were of secondary interest. Decisions would have to be reached in each case as to whether the work of a given office would be primarily political or commercial, and the head of the office selected accordingly.

9. There is attached a long and very useful letter† from the Canadian Consul General in New York in which he submits opinions based on fourteen months' experience in his post. The main points could be summarized as follows:

(1) New York is unique as a consular post and special problems are encountered there because it is such a commercial, financial and cultural centre.

(2) Routine consular work has been heavy—heavier than anticipated—and this can be expected in the six cities mentioned above which present the most pressing problems. A vice-consul and a stenographer would be needed to handle this work in each office.

(3) In border cities so long as the war lasts the time of one man might be needed to look after work relating to the Armed Services.

(4) Work relating to Canadian merchant seamen is dealt with by the United Kingdom consular service. If this policy continues to be followed only occasional cases will require assistance from any Canadian consular office.

(5) The head of each office should be free of routine duties and should be prepared to devote a large amount of his time to representational work.

(6) General enquiries can be expected to take up a great deal of time. The announcement of the opening of a Canadian consular office will create a considerable volume of work of this type which in the past has not reached the United Kingdom offices.

(7) Trade promotion in the sense of influencing individual orders for Canadian products is not of great importance and can be left to a junior man.

There should be in New York a senior trade representative of high rank to act as a general representative rather than having to do with individual transactions.

(8) Each consular office should be under the direction of a single officer whose combined staff, whether from External Affairs or the Commercial Intelligence Service, would hold rank as consuls or vice-consuls.

(9) In seaports shipping problems could be handled by a consul along with other duties.

10. To provide a basis for considering personnel requirements it may be worth while estimating what our needs would be. A liberal estimate for six consulates general would be six consuls general, six consuls and six to nine vice-consuls. This would give each office one consul general, one consul and one or two vice-consuls. A rather conservative estimate for six consulates would be six consuls and six vice-consuls.

11. According to an estimate made in the Department there should be available from External Affairs personnel suitable officers for appointment in the consular service as follows:

Year	Consul General	Consul	Vice-Consul
1944	none	none	none
1945	1	1	4
1946	1	1	4

If it is decided that all of these could be made available for duty in the United States it should be possible to open two offices in each of the years 1945 and 1946 provided we did not contemplate a consulate general in every case. If Trade and Commerce could make as many officers available the six proposed offices could all be staffed by 1946.

The closing of the British Vice-Consulate at Portland, Maine, is causing a good deal of inconvenience to Canadian shipping interests, who use that port not only as a supplementary railway terminal but as the port of unloading for petroleum, which is then moved by pipe line to Montreal.

I do not feel we can press the United Kingdom to maintain an office there primarily to serve Canadian interests. At the same time, I should be reluctant to recommend the establishment of a Canadian Vice-Consulate there when there are a good many places in the United States for which there is a greater need for general Canadian representation than in Portland, Maine.

As a temporary measure we have sent one of our junior officers in the Legal Division down to Portland to look over the situation with a representative of the Department of Transport, and to report whether arrangements could be made to designate an honorary consul there who could perform the necessary functions for Canadian shipping interests on a fee basis.

My dear Norman [Robertson],

I am writing a personal note with reference to your EX-4149+ and 4165+ of December 6 and 7 concerning the appointment of J. D. Foote as temporary Vice-Consul at Portland, Maine.

I can't refrain from registering my disappointment that our consular service in the United States is being extended in this way and for the reason that a British Vice-Consulate is being closed. Solvitur ambulando has its merits, but surely should not be the basis for the development of a Canadian Consular Service. Isn't there something absurd about Canadian consular representation in Portland, and no such representation in places like Detroit, Buffalo, Chicago, or Los Angeles. I feel very strongly that our consular service in this country must be set up according to a carefully worked out plan and that we are only on the road to trouble and confusion if we try to do it in any other way.

You may recall that some time ago, I told you that Sir Gerald Campbell had informed me that they were about to close the Portland Vice-Consulate and that he suggested the possibility of keeping it open as a Canadian Vice-Consulate. This would probably not have been a very sensible idea but it would have been possible, I assume, to have made a contribution to the expenses of the British office for Canadian work. This might have made unnecessary the closing of that office and if so, have avoided the makeshift arrangement which is now proposed.

I have today formally requested provisional recognition for Foote as Canadian Vice-Consul in Portland, and I am notifying the British Embassy that we are taking this step.

Yours sincerely,

MIKE [PEARSON]

DESPATCH

Portland, December 20, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL. SECRET.

Sir,

I have the honor to report the following information concerning the proposed establishment of a Canadian Vice-Consulate in Portland, Maine.

Captain Kerr of the Department of Transport and myself arrived in Portland after gaining considerable information through the kindness of Mr. Scully, Canadian Consulate General of New York, the British Consulate General of the same city, and the British Consulate General of Boston, concerning consular work as regards shipping matters. We were fortunate to obtain the office formerly used by the British Vice-Consulate here, whose lease does not expire until the end of this year. There were also a few odd pieces of furniture which they kindly loaned to us. The furniture consisted of one desk, two chairs, and a typewriter.

Mr. Prickett, former British Pro-Consul, has been kind enough to give us his services for the next few days, and his knowledge of the local shipping problems is invaluable to us. Captain Kerr and myself have made the rounds of the various shipping agencies and from information obtained from them and the British Consulates in New York and Boston, I desire to present the following.

During the years of 1944 and 1945, the bulk of the shipping which came into this port was of Canadian registry. This was due chiefly to the pipeline which was constructed during the war between this port and Montreal. The tankers carrying the fuel from South America are owned by the Imperial Oil Company, the Shell Oil, and the Park Steamship Company.

The United Kingdom decided at the beginning of the war to establish a British Vice-Consulate in Portland. Many ships were being built in the Portland shipyards for Britain, and they deemed it necessary to have a local representative so that he might handle the various problems dealing with registry and the manning of these ships. Now that this problem has ceased, and because of the very reduced number of ships of United Kingdom registry now stopping at this port, they decided to close the Vice-Consulate here.

I am attaching several prepared tables† which will readily give you the various information concerning the number of ships of both Canadian and United Kingdom registry using this port during the years of the war. You will notice that at the present time there are approximately thirty of our vessels to every one of the United Kingdom ships now stopping here.

When it became known that the United Kingdom government contemplated the closing of the Vice-Consulate, the Department of External Affairs was approached by the Department of Transport suggesting that the Canadian government might see fit to establish a Canadian Vice-Consulate or Consular agent in Portland to handle Canadian shipping matters.

The various shipping companies pressed the Department of Transport for a Canadian representative in Portland. Their request was not entirely unjustified because of the number of Canadian ships using the port and from information I have received, vessels of Canadian registry have caused considerable trouble and worry to the local authorities because of the more than large number of disturbances caused by Canadian merchant seamen. The British Vice-Consulate handled our problem very ably and without complaint, but it now appears that since the opportunity has presented itself for them to be released from this chore, they are more than favorable to discontinue the Vice-Consulate here and place this Canadian problem in our hands.

I beg to submit my observations on the establishing of a Canadian Vice-Consulate in Portland, Maine.

There appears to be a definite need for a Canadian representative in this port to handle the shipping problems which will arise. The question which now presents itself is whether this representation should be made by a career officer or whether the Canadian government feels that they might appoint some reputable citizen of Portland who could represent Canadian interests, to be an Honorary Consul or Consular Agent. It might be felt that this latter appointment would be sufficient to cover the Canadian shipping needs here.

It may be felt that the present amount of work and the business which is contemplated in the future does not warrant the expense of renting an office, hiring a staff, and the many other expenses which arise with the running of an office. From my attached table marked "D" you will note that the consular fees collected do not cover the expenses incurred.

Still, if the Canadian government feels that to establish an office here, as more or less a training ground for Canadian consular officers in shipping, Portland without doubt is an excellent location for such an experiment, due to the nearness of the British Consulate General in Boston and the Department of Transport in Ottawa. Assistance might readily be obtained by the Vice-Consul for the many peculiar problems which will arise.

If the policy I have outlined is to be followed, it would be very desirable for the Vice-Consul to have an assistant to do the "donkey work" which is attached to this office. The keeping of accounts alone will take up much time. If an assistant is employed to care for these matters, it will give the Vice-Consul the opportunity to appraise the situation carefully, study the Canadian Shipping Act as against the Merchant Shipping Act and make recommendations whereby forms, instructions and other material might be brought in line with Canadian shipping problems. There appears to be very much work to be done in this line.

From information which I have obtained, it does not appear that Portland Harbor will continue having much traffic. Business will continue during the winter months because of the freeze-up of the St. Lawrence, but, because of the railroad rates and the higher loading charges at this port—$6 per thousand bushels of grain loaded, as against $1.75 for one thousand at Montreal—it is unlikely that exporters and shipping companies will continue using the harbour facilities here. I have heard that the Furness, Withy Company Ltd. were thinking of closing their shipping agency here, but now, since there will be some exporting of cattle and horses to France, they expect to keep their office open for at least another year.

If the Canadian government desires to appoint a Consular Agent or an Honorary Consul, it might be noted that a certain Mr. Leslie Harrison, agent for Furness, Withy & Company has made application to Mr. Sullivan, the British Consul General in Boston for the position of British Vice-Consul. Mr. Harrison is a very well-known and respected citizen in this community. He was born in England and served with Canadian forces in World War I. He received his education at Kings College, Dalhousie University, Halifax, and was graduated in engineering. He has lived in Halifax many years besides representing his shipping company in the Argentine. He and his wife are among the leaders of the Canadian community in this city. He has a large staff and with the decrease in his own business, this extra work should be handled without difficulty.

Another person whom the Canadian Government might consider for this office is Mr. H. Abrahamson, agent for the Portland Tourist Company. Mr. Prickett has told me that he is a very conscientious person who greatly assisted the British Consulate. Mr. Abrahamson was born in New Brunswick and his assistant, Mr. Eward, is also Canadian born.

The lease on the office here expires at the end of the year and if we are to retain these premises it will be necessary that I contact the agents soon. This office is very well situated, being quite near the water front, and although it is by no means pretentious, it is quite adequate. There are two large and two small rooms, a built-in counter and two wall safes which are very desirable for an office of this type. The rent is very low, being $30 a month, and the lights amount to little more than $2 a month. It will be necessary to purchase a fair amount of office fixtures.

I would be very grateful if you could advise me as to what course you desire me to follow.

DESPATCH 1523

Ottawa, September 13, 1945

IMPORTANT

Sir,

Following the surrender of Germany and the closing of the Swiss Legation in Berlin, we assumed that the Swiss had ceased to represent Canadian interests in Germany.

A few weeks ago, we noticed that we were still getting communications from the British Minister in Berne which indicated that some Swiss agency was still operating in Germany in relation to Canadian interests. We asked the British Minister in Berne for an explanation, and he has now replied to us as follows:

I may say for your information that, although we realize that this action of the Swiss Government is intended for our benefit, the result of it may be to give assistance to persons who deserve no assistance from us. All the genuine Canadians whom we knew about are out of Germany and, therefore, the persons who are still receiving help from the Swiss must be German-born naturalized persons whom, as you know, we regard as being generally unentitled to assistance.

I should be grateful if you would informally consult the Foreign Office regarding this activity of the Swiss Government and send us any comments the Foreign Office may wish to make.

Enclosed for information is a copy of a telegram we are sending to the British Minister in Berne.†

London, September 22, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 1523 of September 13th concerning the continued protection of Canadian nationals in Germany by the Swiss. I have discussed this matter with the German Section of the Consular Department, Foreign Office.

You will understand from our several reports that there is, as yet, no real effective consular activity on the part of the United Kingdom authorities within Germany and Austria. I may have more to tell you of the situation, however, when Captain Hoogendyk,<sup>70</sup> now visiting Germany, returns. The only recent change here is that Mr. A. H. King has joined Mr. Fulham at Lubbecke. He will have jurisdiction throughout the whole of Germany. Fulham will continue to assist him in the British zone. A consul has now been appointed to Frankfurt for the American zone; this is Mr. Abington Goodden. These are both career consuls of experience. Mr. Bell, as you know, is at Strasbourg, with authority to the French zone.

This sounds like fairly complete coverage except in the Russian zone, but these officials have no status, no clerks, no transportation and almost no means of communicating. Mr. Williams is still in Austria but the Consular Department report he is not often heard from. I have a suspicion that the Foreign Office representatives in Germany do a better job for us, considering comparative numbers involved, than they do for the Foreign Office. This is presumably because of our superior preparatory paper work.

Under these circumstances the Foreign Office, far from discouraging the Swiss from continuing the handing out of relief funds, have welcomed this practice as the only practicable means of distributing relief funds. The Consular Department report, however, that they have very little information as to what the Swiss are actually doing. The Consular Department do not send them new business; they simply receive what the Swiss send. Berne has been asked for a report, but the Consular Department feel that the Swiss in Berne do not themselves know much what their folk are doing. I gather that the Swiss Consul at Hamburg keeps pretty busy in British interests, while the one at Frankfurt, being a German or half German, was regarded as persona non grata by the Americans and has pretty much shut up shop. It is to be presumed that the Russians do not give the Swiss much liberty of action, but the Foreign Office cannot seem to get information, even about the Swiss there.

Seconded to High Commission in Great Britain to assist with problems concerning prisoners of war and internees.

The Consular Department saw no objection to the telegram† attached to your despatch, and asked for a copy of it. I shall send them the whole despatch and would like to know from you whether the telegram has actually been sent.<sup>71</sup>

The Consular Department believe the Swiss Consul renews British passports which have recently expired but they doubt whether the Swiss revive Swiss passports which have been long extinct.

I have etc.

Sir,

I have the honour to inform you that a report has been received from London to the effect that the Swiss Legation have notified the United Kingdom Government that they cannot continue to represent German interests in the United Kingdom and throughout the Commonwealth and territories of the British Empire.

I should be grateful if you would let me know if this is in accord with information which you have received and if we can expect to receive from you a similar notification. Montreal, May 22, 1945

Sir,

With further reference to your note of May 17th, I have the honour to acquaint you with the following communication received from the Division of Foreign Interests in Berne.

The aforesaid Division have indeed directed the Swiss Legation in London to notify the United Kingdom Government—also for consideration of the Dominions' governments—that having ceased to recognize the government of the Reich, Switzerland is consequently no longer in a position to represent the German interests in the British Empire; she regards herself as being released from all related duties and obligations, as well as free from any ensuing responsibilities as from the date of the notification. The Swiss Government assume, however, that the safeguarding of extraterritorial real estates and of German archives will be continued as hitherto, until the relevant properties are duly transferred to the party concerned.

I venture to add that the notification just mentioned above was made in London on Tuesday, May 15th.

I am most desirous of taking this opportunity to express how much the writer and associated consuls did appreciate the unflinching good will and the utmost courtesy shown to them by all Canadian authorities or officials and, in particular, by your Special Division. This attitude is unanimously acknowledged to have been of undeniable assistance and inspiration to the representatives of the Protecting Power during their five-year activity connected with German interests.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch No. 3/16-a M. of May 22nd informing me that the Government of Switzerland, having ceased to recognize the Government of the Reich, is no longer in a position to represent German interests in Canada and has relinquished all responsibility for their protection, except as concerns the safeguarding of extraterritorial real estates and of German archives. It is noted that the cessation of representation of German interests in Canada is regarded as having taken place on the date on which notification was made in London to the United Kingdom Government and for consideration of the Dominions Governments, which was May 15, 1945.

The other interested Departments of the Canadian Government are being informed of this action by your Government. May I assume that you will inform the spokesmen of internment camps in Canada where German prisoners of war or German civilians are detained that you are no longer authorized to protect their interests or to receive communications from them.

In conclusion I should like to return the compliment to the Canadian authorities and officials contained in the last paragraph of your despatch. Without exception the officers of this Department who have had occasion to deal with you and your colleagues in matters affecting the protection of German interests in this country, have much appreciated the frank and open way in which it has been possible to discuss, on the basis of mutual understanding, all questions which have arisen in this field. The readiness which you and your colleagues have shown to take pains to appreciate the point of view of the Canadian authorities while at the same time presenting the other side, has enabled speedy and mutually satisfactory settlement of any questions which might easily have made difficulty. Please accept for yourself and for the other members of your Consulate General my sincere thanks.

Ottawa, July 13, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to refer again to your despatch No. 3/16-a M dated May 22nd in which you informed me that the Government of Switzerland had relinquished the protection of German interests in Canada, and to my reply No. 458 of May 24th.

The Canadian authorities have given thought to the position which arises in relation to German civilian internees and prisoners of war in Canada as a result of the fact that there is no longer a German Government.

It is the intention of the Canadian authorities that the treatment of prisoners of war and internees should not depart from the spirit of the Geneva Convention despite German capitulation. There is implicit in the Convention the presumption that prisoners of war will always have a Protecting Power to whom they can submit complaints and enquiries. It is also the desire of the Canadian authorities that there should be a clear record that there has been no misuse of arbitrary power by them in their dealings with German prisoners of war and civilians.

The Canadian authorities would, therefore, welcome an arrangement whereby an officer of your Consulate General, who has been engaged in work on behalf of German prisoners of war and internees in Canada, might be enabled to carry on these activities under some other auspices.

Should your Government be prepared to agree to this proposal, it is thought that it might be appropriate for the officer undertaking this responsibility to be attached to the International Committee of the Red Cross in Canada with the status of Associate Delegate. This is, of course, a secondary question for consideration by your Government and the International Committee of the Red Cross.

Such an officer would be permitted to correspond with German nationals in custody in Canada, to visit prisoner of war and internee camps, and in general to perform the functions in respect of prisoners of war and internees which have been performed by the Protecting Power. These arrangements are suggested only as a temporary measure during a necessary transitional period.

I should count it a favour if you would give consideration to this proposal. If you agree, I should be glad to know the earliest date on which the services of your officer could be made available for the duties described.

I am telegraphing the substance of this despatch to the British Minister at Berne for communication to the Swiss Government and am asking him to tell them that a similar communication has been made to you as Consul General.

Ad No. 477

Montreal, August 7, 1945

Sir,

I have the honour to advert to your despatch of July 13th, in which you inform me that the Canadian authorities would welcome an arrangement whereby an officer of this Consulate General, who had been heretofore engaged in work on behalf of German POWs and internees in Canada, might be enabled to carry on these activities under the auspices of the International Committee of the Red Cross during the transition period opened by the cessation of the Swiss protection.

I forthwith brought your proposal to the cognizance of the Swiss Government while recommending that favourable consideration be given to it and suggesting that Mr. Somm be made available for the aforesaid duties with the status of Associate Delegate of the International Committee of the Red Cross.

As a result of this consultation, I have been informed that the Federal Political Department had already sent its answer to the British Minister at Berne. The Political Department pointed out that the Swiss authorities would raise no objection against releasing Mr. Somm from his present assignment with this Consulate General and his transfer to the Delegation of the International Red Cross Committee.

Mr. Somm, on his part, is prepared to carry on his activities under the aforesaid conditions and for a limited time. He will be available to Mr. Maag within some days and at least as soon as the relevant arrangement between the Canadian Government and the Delegate of the International Committee of the Red Cross has been completed.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your note no. 3/16-a M. of May 22nd and to the question of the German Government property and archives which are in your custody or control.

In view of the fact that the Swiss Government has ceased to protect German Government interests in Canada, and the fact that there is no longer a German Government, the Canadian Government has decided to take over the custody and control of German Government property and archives. The Canadian Government has designated The Custodian, Department of the Secretary of State of Canada, Ottawa, as the official to assume this custody and control.

Preparatory to your turning over to the Custodian the property and archives, I would suggest that you send direct to the Custodian a complete inventory of the property involved, with all relevant information as to the present situs of the property. It would also be helpful if you would give the Custodian full information regarding arrangements which you may have made with storage companies for the storage of some of the property.

RE: PROTECTION OF JAPANESE INTERESTS IN JAPANESE GOVERNMENT ASSETS AND ARCHIVES

This subject was discussed today by the Under-Secretary, Mr. Read and Mr. Rive. It was decided to find out immediately what has happened in the United States and United Kingdom as a result of the Japanese surrender.

The tentative views of this Department are that the Swiss should not take over the functions of Protecting Power even if they still wish to do so, and that Japanese Government property and archives should be taken over by the Canadian Government in a trustee capacity (using the Custodian as agent of the Canadian Government for the purpose).

No conclusion was reached as to the action which the Canadian Government would take if the question of handing over Japanese archives to the United States or United Kingdom Governments should be raised.

IMMEDIATE. Your EX-3072 of August 24,† protection of Japanese interests in the United States by the Swiss.

1. The Swiss took over protection of Japanese interests in the United States in the latter part of July and still have in their custody Japanese Government property and archives, with the exception set out below.

2. Japanese interests in Hawaii are under the Protection of Sweden.

3. It is understood by the State Department that the Swiss will remain in charge of Japanese interests for an indefinite period and that, should any change be made it will be on instructions from Tokyo by the Emperor as directed by the Supreme Allied Commander. In short, the instructions will be part of the overall treatment of Japan, as opposed to a separate arrangement between the United States and the Swiss Government.

4. The status of the archives is that the Swiss are holding them as trustee pending further instructions and at the moment they are not available for inspection by any of the United Nations, including the United States.

5. State Department would appreciate information as to Canadian policy in respect to any Japanese property or documents in Canada.

RE: PROTECTION OF JAPANESE INTERESTS IN CANADA

When this was discussed with the Under-Secretary on August 22nd, the tentative view was that the Swiss should not take over the functions of Protecting Power even if they still wish to do so, and that Japanese Government property and archives should be taken over by the Canadian Government in a trustee capacity (using the Custodian as agent of the Canadian Government for the purpose). However, the first step was to find out exactly what is happening in the United States and United Kingdom.

We now have reports from Washington and London, and I think they alter the picture considerably.

I now feel that there is no reason why we should object to the Swiss actually taking over protection of Japanese interests in Canada if the Swiss still wish to do so. If the Swiss do take over protection of Japanese interests, it will of course be open to any of the three governments directly involved to alter the situation and to terminate the protection at some future date.<sup>73</sup>

SECRET. His Majesty's United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, reports that United States Government have sent instructions to General MacArthur for transmission to Japanese Government regarding treatment of Japanese diplomatic and Consular archives and property, both in countries at war with Japan and neutral countries. Following is summary of instructions, Begins:

(a) In neutral countries, Japanese Government should be required to order Japanese Missions to turn over all diplomatic and Consular archives and property to representatives of United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China. Protection of Japanese nationals may be entrusted to Sweden and Switzerland, since these countries are acting as Protecting Powers for Japan elsewhere.

(b) In States which have been at war with Japan, other than those specified in sub-paragraph (c) below, arrangements are to be made for immediate transfer of physical custody of all Japanese diplomatic and Consular property and archives from Protecting Powers to representatives of United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China. Protecting Powers would, however, continue to exercise routine functions of protection of Japanese nationals.

(c) In British Commonwealth countries other than Eire, in United States, China, U.S.S.R., France and [The] Netherlands, arrangements are to be made for custody of diplomatic and Consular property and archives to be transferred from Protecting Powers to Governments of respective countries. Representatives of United States, United Kingdom, U.S.S.R. and China to have access to archives. Ends.

2. We are instructing His Majesty's representatives in countries referred to in (b) above to associate themselves with their United States colleagues in request for handing over of Japanese official property and archives to joint custody of representatives of the four Powers named. His Majesty's United Kingdom Ambassador, Washington, has, however, been instructed to make clear to United States Government that, in event of objection being raised by respective territorial Governments, we do not consider that such diplomatic and Consular archives, as may still be available, would justify any action designed to put pressure on country concerned.

3. We have not yet heard that General MacArthur has as yet taken any action on instructions contained in paragraph 1 above, nor that Japanese Government have issued necessary instructions to their representatives in neutral countries or have made necessary arrangements with Protecting Powers concerned.

RE: JAPANESE ARCHIVES AND GOVERNMENT PROPERTY IN CANADA

I have read Dominions Office telegram D.1972 of October 22nd regarding the instructions which the United States Government has sent to General MacArthur for transmission to the Japanese Government.

Pursuant to these instructions, we may expect that the Japanese Government will ask the Swiss Government to hand over to the Canadian Government all Japanese diplomatic and consular archives and property in Canada. These archives and property were recently handed over to the Swiss Consul General by the Spanish Consul General.

We may expect that the Japanese Government will also ask the Swiss Government to tell us that representatives of the United States, the United Kingdom, the U.S.S.R. and China should be given access to the archives.

Although no definite action is required by the Canadian Government until we are approached by the Swiss Consul General, I think that it would be desirable to consider in advance what our attitude will be.

Regardless of what we may think of the instructions which have been sent to General MacArthur, I see no reason for us to refuse to accept the archives and property if the Swiss Consul General is instructed to hand them over to us.

The question of whether we should then allow the four Powers to have access to the archives is a separate one. As we will be requested by the Japanese Government to grant such access, we will be justified in international law if we do give such access. It seems to me that, if we refuse to follow such a request from the Japanese Government, we will be getting into a quite needless dispute with the United States Government.

It seems clear from the Dominions Office telegram that the Japanese Government will be permitted to continue to have protecting powers for purposes other than the care of diplomatic and consular archives and property.<sup>75</sup>

The United States Ambassador raised with me today a matter affecting the projected transfer to us of the records of the Japanese Legation and Consulates in Canada. He said that he understood that we would shortly be approached by the Swiss Government (in consequence of the directive recently issued to the Japanese Government by the Supreme Allied Commander) with the request that we take over from them the custody of these archives. Mr. Atherton went on to say that he had been asked to let us know that his Government would appreciate it very much if we would be prepared to make available to them any information of interest to the United States Government which might be disclosed as a result of our examination of the archives. There apparently were indications that espionage activities extending into the United States may have been conducted through Japanese representatives in Canada.

I told Mr. Atherton that I was quite sure that there would be no difficulty over our passing on information of this nature to his Government. I was, however, rather bothered about the actual task of examining the archives when they come into our custody. This would be an extensive job, in all probability, which would require the services of a number of persons thoroughly familiar with the Japanese language. I asked him if he had any information as to how they would propose to go about this job in the United States. He said that he had not, but would be glad to make enquiries.

I do not know whether any consideration has been given in the Department to this aspect of the transfer of archives of enemy states. If not, we should probably think it over without delay and see what recommendation we can make.

Sir,

At the request of the Federal Political Department, I have the honour to bring the following communication to your cognizance.

Upon instruction of its Government, the Legation of Japan in Berne invited the Swiss Government to order that the Japanese archives and property held in conformity with the protection agreement be handed over to the respective governments of the British Commonwealth of Nations. This handing-over of archives and property would not prejudice, however, the protection extended to Japanese nationals as already assumed by Swiss representatives in British countries.

I am directed, therefore, to seek your concurrence in this intended transfer and at the same time to ascertain what is your decision in regard to the date and to the procedure appropriate for the matter.

Dear Mr. King,

You may recall that in December I wrote you<sup>76</sup> from Edmonton expressing the hope that you might be able to give early approval to the report of the officials of External Affairs and of Trade and Commerce, who, as a joint Committee, had submitted their recommendations regarding the manner in which the work of the Foreign Services of the two Departments could best be co-ordinated in future.<sup>77</sup>

At that time I mentioned that I was well satisfied with the recommendations made by the Committee and that I was rather anxious that the co-ordination plan be put into effect as soon as possible.

In bringing the matter up again, I do so mainly because I know that there is active concern on the part of many businessmen of the best standing who have spoken to me about the necessity for having plans made now, or in the very near future, for the re-establishment of the Trade Commissioner Service abroad on an adequate scale. As a matter of fact, I have these plans for the reorganization of the Commercial Intelligence Service, including the Trade Commissioners, well in hand, but I have not felt that I could take businessmen into my confidence on what is being done, as fully as I should like to do, until I know whether you are in agreement with the proposals recommended by the Committee.

CONFIDENTIAL

Dear Mr. MacKinnon,

I have your letter of January 21st regarding the plans for closer cooperation between the foreign services of the Departments of Trade and Commerce and External Affairs, which have been prepared by a Joint Committee of officers of the two Departments. In the present circumstances, I am inclined to agree with the scheme submitted by the Joint Committee, which goes about as far as we can hope or expect to go in the next two or three years. When its recommendations are fully implemented, the position can be reviewed again to see whether a closer pattern of cooperation is needed. In the meantime, suggestions for establishing a single basis for recruiting through the Civil Service Commission, for facilitating interchange of personnel between the two Services and for closer coordination of administrative practices and procedures will each represent a substantial improvement over the present position. I am, therefore, instructing the officers of the Department of External Affairs to see that they do their part in making the proposed joint arrangements work smoothly and efficiently.

I do not think that the importance of these administrative changes which our Departments are putting into force should be overemphasized, or that the scheme of cooperation we are trying should be regarded as a definitive answer to the question as to how the representation of general Canadian interests abroad can best be associated with the special service devoted to the promotion of our export trade. The United Kingdom and the United States, after a good deal of experience and experimentation, have each come to the conclusion that a consolidated foreign service is needed, and it may be, therefore, that we shall have to sooner or later re-examine our arrangements in this field.

Yours sincerely,

Moscow, February 25, 1944

Following for Robertson from Wilgress, Begins:

1. Have received your letter of November 18th† and confidential report of Committee on relations between External Affairs and Trade and Commerce and am giving you my comments herewith.<sup>78</sup>

2. Committee have made a very good and sincere attempt to work out satisfactory compromise between conflicting views but I do not consider their proposals to be workable. As long as there is separate Trade Commissioner service little advantage is to be gained through interchangeability of officers and common recruiting. This would be apt to work to disadvantage of Trade and Commerce because External Affairs would be willing only to take best men, leaving average or below average to former. Experience in recruiting has shown that usually about one-third of each lot are outstanding, one-third average and the remainder below average. Under common recruiting all outstanding men would be likely to go to External Affairs.

3. Trade and Commerce have developed satisfactory method of recruiting for their particular purposes. In large measure this is due to reliance placed on judgement and expediency of present machine of Civil Service Commission. This method might be upset under proposed plan of common recruiting.

4. Experience in interchangeability of officers based on war conditions is apt to be misleading. In peace time Trade officers at London, Pretoria and St. John's would have been too busy to have permitted arrangements similar to those worked out in wartime.

5. Interchangeability of officers would lead to divided loyalties, and as opportunities for advancement in External Affairs are likely to be greater officers would tend to concentrate on work for that Department to the prejudice of trade work.

6. Canadian system of Government makes divided responsibility difficult and impracticable. Minister of Trade and Commerce has to answer to Parliament for Trade Commissioner service and he can only do this if he has full control over recruiting and disposition of officers.

7. Principal justification for amalgamation of the two services would be need for Canada to have far-flung Consular service. Experience of other countries has demonstrated that serious conflicts arise from maintenance of two services. This is due to the fact that most work of Consular officers is concerned with trade. It is only a wartime accident that the two Consulates first established by Canada were more political than trade. Experience in New York has shown impossibility of divided control. When Consulate-General was established there, Trade Commissioner should have been transferred to some other post.

8. Historically Canada developed most efficient Trade Commissioner service on account of being important trading nation without Consuls of her own. In this service we have nucleus of first-rate Consular service which it would be foolish to attempt to duplicate by difficult task of building up alternative service with men lacking experience in work abroad. However, until it is decided that Canada has need for far-flung Consular service, it is better to leave Trade Commissioner service entirely responsible to Minister of Trade and Commerce and not to attempt interchangeability of officers and common recruiting.

I wish to thank you for your letter of March 1,† your file No. 2446-A-40, summarizing the views which, in a personal message to you, Mr. Wilgress has expressed with respect to the recommendations made in the confidential report of the Committee on Relations between External Affairs and Trade and Commerce.

It is quite evident that Mr. Wilgress has given the contents of this report a good deal of very careful thought, but I believe that, in accord with the suggestion made in the final paragraph of your letter, Mr. Wilgress would probably have been quite ready to modify some of his views if he had had the opportunity of participating in the Committee's discussions. Personally, I regret very much that these discussions could not have been brought to a head a year or two earlier, when we would have had the full advantage of Mr. Wilgress' presence and active interest in the matter.

However, having regard to what I think is a generally-conceded urgent need to work out something in the way of a concerted modus operandi, I am satisfied that we are taking a trial course which cannot fail to be beneficial in one way or another; and, given the kind of cooperation which I think both Departments are fully prepared to bring to our mutual problems, I am confident that the results will be of real and substantial advantage to both Departments—and by that I mean to the scope and the standard of their public service.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the subject of the relations of officers of this Department with those of the Department of Trade and Commerce at posts abroad. There has been established in Ottawa an interdepartmental committee for the study of these relations and, at a meeting held on May 11, the question of further collaboration in the preparation of general despatches and like matters was examined and recommendations were adopted. These were concerned with the problem which arises when officers of the Department of Trade and Commerce and officers of this Department are serving in the same place. In some instances, they may be under the same roof and, in other cases, they may be in separate buildings. The principles involved will also be of interest to offices abroad which are not directly concerned.

2. It is considered that it is desirable to establish procedures whereby the officers of the Commercial Intelligence Service will be kept informed of and consulted with regard to general despatches which are sent out or received by our High Commissioners' offices, Embassies, and Legations.

3. For this purpose, it would be helpful if our offices abroad would make arrangements, in the case of missions which are in the same place as Trade Commissioners' offices, for inter-office reference of despatches of general interest. It could be worked out in much the same way as references between divisions in the Department at Ottawa. It would be unnecessary, in most cases, to make additional copies of the documents as they could be examined between disposition and filing without giving rise to any administrative difficulties. The Department of Trade and Commerce will be giving similar instructions to its officers abroad and it is expected that members of the Commercial Intelligence Service will refer despatches of general interest to the head of the diplomatic mission and, in the appropriate cases, furnish copies of reports.

4. It would also be convenient to include a note in the final paragraph of despatches of the fact of reference to the Commercial Counsellor, Commercial Secretary or Trade Commissioner, in the same way as in the case of reference to heads of neighbouring Canadian missions.

5. The Committee also thought that it might be desirable to encourage consultation between members of the Services in the preparation of despatches of general political and economic interest. The actual fields of interest of members of the Commercial Intelligence Service and of the External Affairs

Similar despatches were sent to all missions abroad.

Service blend into one another and their experience in the countries in which they are serving extends beyond their immediate centres of interest. It is thought, therefore, that consultation would be helpful to members of both Services. It is not possible to set down any rules or regulations designed to bring about consultation but if it is encouraged by the heads of missions, it will undoubtedly improve general political and economic reporting and broaden the experience of the personnel concerned.

6. I should be grateful if you would let me have any comments or suggestions which you may wish to make with regard to this aspect of collaboration between the Services abroad.

DESPATCH A.497

London, August 11, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your circular despatch No. 814 of the 29th June<sup>80</sup> regarding the relations of the officers of the offices of the Commercial Intelligence Service with High Commissioners' Offices, Embassies and Legations.

2. The admirable suggestions set forth in your despatch are already operative here and I am glad to be able to say that in the case of this Office, the closest co-operation exists. The Office of the Trade Commissioners is kept fully informed and is consulted with regard to despatches sent out or received, touching matters of mutual concern, and in the majority of cases communications regarding commercial matters are drafted in that office. I therefore deem it appropriate to say that all relations between the officers of the Department of External Affairs and the Department of Trade and Commerce here are a happy example of the extent to which the maximum collaboration may be achieved.

Ottawa, June 23, 1944

With your approval, I should like to authorize our High Commissioners in Commonwealth countries to issue Canadian passports under the same conditions as our Embassies and Legations in foreign countries are now issuing them.<sup>81</sup> At the present time, Canadians in the United Kingdom, when their passports expire, have to secure United Kingdom passports, and people from the United Kingdom, if their passports expire while they are in Canada, have to get new Canadian passports from our Office here. Our officers abroad have reported a good deal of misunderstanding and some resentment of this situation. It has been mainly on the part of Canadians, stationed overseas, who wished to maintain their connection with Canada, which is evidenced by the possession of a Canadian passport. Authorizing the High Commissioners' offices to issue passports would be an optional and additional facility which would not modify the present position in any fundamental respect. The United Kingdom Passport Office would still renew or replace Canadian passports on application, and our Passport Office in Ottawa would continue to perform the same services for residents of other parts of the British Empire who happened to be in Canada.

In a number of respects our passport system is anomalous and needs overhauling. For instance, our passports are issued in the name of the Governor General, while British passports are issued in the name of the Foreign Secretary. I think it would be more appropriate if our passports were issued in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but this is a change which could easily wait until the change over at the time of the appointment of a new Governor General.<sup>82</sup>

More important is the question of the description of the holder of a Canadian passport. Currently he is simply described as a British subject, and there is nothing on the face of the passport, nor in the fact that it is in the holder's possession to prove that he is more closely connected with Canada than with any other part of the Commonwealth and that his diplomatic protection abroad is in any special sense the responsibility of the Canadian Government. This question of description is, of course, part of the much bigger question of the status of Canadian nationals or citizens. We have been waiting for years<sup>83</sup> for State and Immigration to take the initiative in framing a satisfactory and coherent definition of Canadian citizenship. I think we will have to take the responsibility for moving in this matter<sup>84</sup> because we are confronted, in a practical way in the ordinary work of our Department, with many real difficulties arising out of the contradictions and anomalies between the Immigration Act, the Naturalization Act and the Canadian Nationals Act. These difficulties relate to the issuing of passports, the diplomatic protection of Canadians abroad, and the arrangements for their repatriation from foreign countries. I hope we can get the interested Departments together in recommending a draft Bill, which might be ready for consideration next year.<sup>85</sup>

Ottawa, October 12, 1944

Sir,

With reference to Mr. Hudd's letter of April 11, 1944,† and previous correspondence† concerning the provision of passport facilities for Canadians resident in the United Kingdom and other parts of the Commonwealth, I have the honour to inform you that your Office, together with the Offices of all Canadian High Commissioners abroad, has now been authorized to issue and renew passports and to engage in passport activities on the same basis as other Canadian Missions abroad, namely in accordance with the Passport and Visa Regulations, dated Ottawa, June 1st, 1943,† copy of which was forwarded to you under covering despatch No. 578 of June 17, 1943.†

We are informing the British High Commissioner here of this long overdue development (you might do likewise with the British authorities), at the same time stating that we do not expect Earncliffe to engage in passport activities at least for the present and that the Passport Office here will continue as

With regard to exempting from the normal passport requirements the wives of Canadian soldiers proceeding to Canada under the Free Passage Scheme, it might be as well in these cases to furnish them with the new "Canadian Travel Certificates" in lieu of passports, if the proposed plan mentioned in the above referred to letter from Mr. Hudd has been in operation.

Ottawa, September 24, 1945

Some months ago when you authorized our High Commissioners in other Commonwealth countries to issue and renew Canadian passports, you agreed that it would be more appropriate to have Canadian passports issued in the name of the Secretary of State for External Affairs rather than in that of the Governor General, but felt, in view of the fact that the present Governor

General's term was approaching its close, that the matter might be taken up shortly before the new Governor General arrived.<sup>86</sup>

The practice in the various nations of the Commonwealth is as follows:

United Kingdom

Passports are issued by the Foreign Office and read "We, Robert Anthony Eden, a Member of His Majesty's Most Honourable Privy Council, a Member of Parliament, etc., etc., His Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, request and require, etc."

Australia

Passports are issued by the Department of the Interior at Canberra and by the Collector of Customs in each of the State capitals and read "I, the Governor General of the Commonwealth of Australia, etc., etc."

South Africa

Passports are issued by the Department of the Interior and are worded "His Excellency the Governor General, etc., etc., requests, etc..." and are signed by the Minister of the Interior.

Ireland

The issuing authority is External Affairs and the inscription is "We, Minister for External Affairs for Ireland, request, etc., etc.", and is printed in three languages Gaelic, English and French.

In Canada the inscription used at the present time is as follows:

"We, Alexander, Earl of Athlone, Knight of the Most Noble Order of the Garter, etc., Governor-General and Commander-in-Chief of Canada, Request, in the name of His Britannic Majesty, all those, etc..."

On this question the late Dr. Skelton<sup>87</sup> had the following observation to make to the Canadian Legation in Paris on October 29th, 1928:

"My own opinion is that it would be more consistent to have the passport issued by the Secretary of State for External Affairs in the name of the King, but that on personal grounds it would be preferable to postpone any such change until the end of the term of the present Governor General."

Appended is a suggested form of inscription to be brought in to use at the end of the present term of office of the Governor General. As it takes a couple of months to prepare new passports, I would suggest that you mention the

London, March 20, 1944

MOST SECRET. We have recently had under review application of principle of unconditional surrender to the minor Axis European States in the light of the new situation created by Soviet action in case of Finland. Soviet terms for Finland (my telegram of 21st February, Circular D. 257)<sup>1</sup> did not include unconditional surrender. They explicitly provided for "negotiations" on certain specified subjects and Soviet Government announced, in a broadcast on 29th February, that rumours appearing in foreign press that unconditional surrender had been demanded were without foundation.

2. We regard the term "unconditional surrender" as meaning that an enemy State offering to surrender is barred from attaching any conditions to its offer and that it must accept without discussion our requirements whether all presented at once or by stages.

3. While it may be desirable to continue to apply this interpretation of unconditional surrender to Germany and Japan, we feel that in the case of the minor European Axis States better results might be achieved by dropping it either tacitly or openly. Our desire is to get them out of the war as soon as possible, and we may wish to give them some assurance that their desertion of Germany, and any material contribution they may make to hastening latter's defeat, will earn them some reward. We also wish to be able to discuss with them such questions as military collaboration, future frontier claims, or the possibility of our giving them assistance against the Germans. All this is ruled out if unconditional surrender is literally interpreted.

4. Principle of unconditional surrender was laid down at Casablanca Conference and confirmed at Moscow Conference in preamble of Declaration on General Security<sup>2</sup> where it was applied specifically to all Axis Powers with which United Kingdom, United States and Soviet Governments are respectively at war. Any change in the application of this principle must, therefore, be discussed with United States and Soviet Governments.

5. His Majesty's Ambassadors for United Kingdom at Washington and Moscow have, therefore, been instructed to approach United States and Soviet Governments respectively and to propose that, for purposes of both propaganda and peace feelers, all three Governments should be freed from the Moscow decision as far as the minor European States are concerned, and that in future they should, so far as these States are concerned, be at liberty to decide in consultation according to circumstances whether or not to insist on unconditional surrender.

Washington, May 4, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

On April 22 you wrote to me† concerning the reply of the United States government to the United Kingdom suggestion that the principle of unconditional surrender should be dropped in the case of the minor Axis states.

Mr. Reid brought this question up when he was talking this afternoon to Mr. Riddleberger, the chief of the Division of Central European Affairs in the State Department.

Mr. Riddleberger said that he had some time ago sent a memorandum to the White House supporting the proposal that unconditional surrender be no longer demanded from the satellites, but that he had had his ears pinned back. When the Soviet Union informed the State Department that they also favoured the proposal, he again took the matter up with the White House and succeeded in getting agreement on the compromise formula of which you were informed in the Dominions Office Circular D.591 of April 19. He interpreted the formula in the same terms as you, namely, that the United States does not favour a public announcement that the minor enemies may not be required to surrender unconditionally, but that they are prepared to consent to conditional surrender in certain cases if this is proposed by either the United Kingdom or the Soviet governments.

He indicated that the President was much attached to the term "unconditional surrender," and that it was therefore necessary to avoid what he called a "public recantation" of the doctrine.

Mr. Reid thought it wise to inform him of the attitude of the Canadian government on this question as expressed to the United Kingdom government.

Yours sincerely,

MOST SECRET. My telegram Circular D.888 of November 1st, 1943,† administration of liberated France.

French Committee addressed notes to United States and United Kingdom Governments on January 6th pressing for negotiation of an agreement and pointing out that if agreement were not reached before military operations were undertaken in France, United States and United Kingdom authorities would be obliged either to negotiate on the spot with Vichy authorities or to establish a regime of direct administration. United States Government replied to French Committee on January 18th that all questions concerning future military operations in France were under active study by appropriate authorities of United States Government who would inform Committee as soon as arrangements had been made for dealing with situation. Reply continued that there was no reason whatever for supposing that United States Government contemplated treating with Vichy authorities. United States Government had no intention of having any dealings or relations with Vichy regime except for purpose of abolishing it and had no intention of dealing with any individual in France known to have wilfully collaborated with the enemy.

MOST SECRET. My immediately preceding telegram. United States draft Declaration on administration of liberated France, Begins: The Governments of the United States of America, the United Kingdom and the Soviet Union, in pursuit of their paramount aim, the defeat of Germany, are determined to bring about earliest possible liberation of France from her oppressors, and create conditions in which a democratically constituted French Government may be re-established. The ultimate aim of the three Governments is the free choice by the French people of the Government under which they will live.

2. In conducting military operations in France, and so long as military necessity requires, it is manifest that the Supreme Allied Commander must have supreme authority in order that the prosecution of the war against Germany may be pursued relentlessly with full cooperation of the French people. It is the intention of the Allies that civil administration shall, insofar as possible, be left to the French citizens.

3. The three Governments are confident that at the proper time all French patriots will rise to the aid of the Allies in ejecting the Nazi oppressors from their land. The Allies and the Supreme Commander will have no dealings or relations with the Vichy regime except for the purpose of abolishing it. No person will be retained or employed in any office by the Allied military authorities who has wilfully collaborated with the enemy or has acted in a manner inimical to the cause of the United Nations.

4. The restoration of civil administration in France will be left to the French people in conformity to their traditional love of liberty and independence.

5. It is the hope of the Allies that the French people, having as their primary objective the freeing of France from Nazi domination, will subordinate political activity to necessity for unity in ejecting and destroying the enemy.

6. With these objects in mind, the Allies will count upon the assistance of all Frenchmen in the maintenance of public order and conditions which will permit the restoration of the Government by the consent of the people. Ends.

Dominions Office Circular telegrams D.138 and 139 of January 28th relate to a disturbing proposal from Washington for the issue of a formal declaration on the liberation of France by the United States, the United Kingdom and the U.S.S.R. In view of the character of the proposed declaration, I think some observations from the Canadian Government will be required.

The French Committee has for some time been trying to negotiate an agreement with the Allied authorities covering the question of the administration of liberated France. On January 6th they sent formal notes to the United Kingdom and United States Governments in which they said, perhaps tactlessly, that if such an agreement were not made the Allied military authorities would either have to deal with the Vichy administration or govern France themselves. There is a good deal of truth in this but the reference to Vichy was probably a diplomatic error and it has already drawn a sharp reply from Washington.

The United States Government has now given the United Kingdom and Soviet Governments a draft statement with the suggestion that it should be issued by the three Governments when the Supreme Allied Commander has completed his plans for civil administration in the invasion period. Mr. Eden did not commit his Government on the question, and has suggested that the text of any such statement might be discussed with the French Committee before it is issued.

The draft appears to be open to objection on a number of counts. It seems likely not only to defeat its own purposes in large measure but to antagonize the French Committee and to be resented by other United Nations including our own. One would gather from it that only the United Kingdom, the United States and the Soviet Union are really concerned over the liberation of France and that they in their wisdom intend in due course to create a democratic French Government. There is in it no reference whatever to the French Committee, which we have all recognized in degree as the trustee of French interests abroad, or to the forces of resistance within France, which have now become pretty thoroughly integrated with the Committee in Algiers. There is, it is true, an assertion that civil administration shall be left to French citizens as far as possible and an appeal to Frenchmen to "subordinate political activity to the necessity for unity in ejecting and destroying the enemy"—as though Frenchmen felt less keenly than Americans about the need of liberating France.

If this statement were to be issued as it now stands, it is perhaps just as well that there has been no suggestion for Canadian participation. If, however, as is more probable it is to be redrafted and turned into a declaration of policy calculated to command the confidence of the French people and consonant with what we all have said about our hopes for the future of France, then I think we should object to the assumption that only the three largest powers among the United States [Nations?] are concerned with the future of France or have any share in the liberation of French territory. We have a dual interest in the nature and effect of the declaration itself and in the position of Canada in a matter of as great a concern to us as the restoration of democratic government in France.

Perhaps the most effective method of dealing with it would be for you to send for Mr. Atherton and express your grave concern over this proposal. He should know the importance Canada must attach to the maintenance of really friendly and understanding relations between France and the rest of us, and should understand our misgivings about a declaration of policy regarding France, which mutatis mutandis might have been made of Ethiopia.

With regard to the substance of the declaration, I think it certain that the French Committee will have a large share in the civil administration of France behind the invading armies. The attitude of the Americans on the spot (including General Eisenhower and Mr. Murphy) towards the Committee and even towards General de Gaulle has become much more favourable. They recognize that de Gaulle is the most important political figure on the French scene and must play a big part during the actual period of liberation. Their fears of an attempt at personal dictatorship seem to have greatly diminished. If France is to become again a democracy as soon as possible it can only do so through the efforts of the French Committee and the resistance movement. We have received from our most secret sources a good deal of information about the discussions which have been going on in Washington between representatives of the French Committee and the U.S. authorities. These leave a strong impression that the French have in recent months acted with great restraint and have behaved throughout as trustees for the interests of France without seeking to press points of special concern to the Committee itself.

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: My WA-1432 of March 9th†—occupation of French territory.

The British Embassy has given Reid a copy of the cable they are to-day sending to London transmitting the text of a letter from the President to the Secretary of War. The State Department does not know we have a copy and the condition on which we were given it by the British Embassy is that we do not let the United States know that we received it from them. It is assumed that the United Kingdom will consider it to be a draft and that they will suggest not only verbal changes but also that it not be sent to the Supreme Allied Commander in the name of the President of the United States. It is not known whether the United Kingdom will be prepared to suggest substantive changes or a reference to the European Advisory Commission.

The document reads as follows, Begins:

Dear Mr. Secretary,

After much thought, and many revisions, and with the approval of yourself and the Secretary of State, I request that the following order be sent to General Eisenhower. I think it covers the practical objective of giving the final command in the forthcoming occupation to General Eisenhower and, at the same time, leaving him free to consult any and all French organizations as circumstances may be determined by him.

General Eisenhower:

This memorandum is directed to you as Supreme Allied Commander in the event of the occupation of French territory:

I. The three paramount aims which are to be the landmarks of your policy are the following:

A. The prompt and complete defeat of Germany.

B. The earliest possible liberation of France from her oppressors.

C. The fostering of democratic methods and conditions under which a French Government may ultimately be established according to the free choice of the French people as [to] the Government under which they wish to live.

II. The following powers and instructions are given you for your guidance in the achievement of the foregoing aims:

1. The Supreme Allied Commander will have supreme authority in order that the war against Germany may be prosecuted relentlessly with the full cooperation of the French people. As such Allied Commander you will have the ultimate determination as to where, when and how the civil administration in France shall be exercised by French citizens, remembering always that the military situation must govern.

2. When and where you determine that there shall be set up a civil administration in any part of France, so far as possible there shall not be retained or employed in any office any person who has wilfully collaborated with the enemy or who has acted in any manner inimical to the cause of the United States.

3. In order to secure the setting up of any such civilian administration locally in any part of France, you may consult with the French Committee of National Liberation and may authorize them in your discretion to select and install the personnel necessary for such administration. You are, however, not limited to dealing exclusively with said Committee for such purpose in case at any time in your best judgment you determine that some other course or conferee is preferable.

4. Nothing that you do under the powers conferred in the preceding paragraph 3 in connection with the French Committee of National Liberation or with any other group or organization shall constitute a recognition of said Committee or group as the Government of France even on a provisional basis.

5. In making your decision as to entering into such relations with the French Committee of National Liberation or other Committees or persons for that purpose, you should as far as possible obtain from it the following restrictions upon its purposes:

A. It has no intention of exercising indefinitely in France any powers of Government, provisional or otherwise, except to assist in the establishment by the democratic methods above mentioned a Government of France according to the free choice of the French people, and that when such Government is established it will turn over thereto all such powers as it may have.

B. It favors the reestablishment of all the historic French liberties and the destruction of any arbitrary regime or rule of personal Government.

C. It will take no action designed to entrench itself or any particular political group in power pending the selection of a constitutional Government by the free choice of the French people.

6. In any area of liberated France, whether or not there has been set up local control of civil affairs as aforesaid, you will retain the right at any time to make such changes in whole or in part which in your discretion may seem necessary.

(a) For the effective prosecution of the war against Germany;

(b) For the maintenance of law and order; and

(c) For the maintenance of civil liberties.

7. As Supreme Commander you will seek such uniformity in the administration of civil affairs as seems advisable, issue policy directives applicable to British, French, and American Commands, and review all plans.

8. You may at your discretion incorporate in your civil affairs Section members of the French Military Mission and other French officials.

9. You will have no talks or relations with the Vichy regime except for the purpose of terminating its administration in toto.

10. Instructions on economic, fiscal, and relief matters will be furnished you later by the Prime Minister, by the President, or by the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

MOST SECRET.

The following general comments may be made in regard to the President's proposed directive to General Eisenhower:

1. This statement is substantially the same as previous draft declarations prepared in Washington, and show no change or development whatever in United States policy. This policy, as indicated in the current and previous declarations, seems to be,

(a) to deny to the F.C.N.L. any form of recognition as an authority competent to administer Metropolitan France.

(b) to deny to the F.C.N.L. any assurance that it will be permitted even to set foot in Metropolitan France.

(c) to live in the hope that some authority will emerge in France as an alternative to the F.C.N.L.

The references (in paragraph 3 of the proposed directive) to the F.C.N.L. do not really alter this policy.

2. The proposed directive overlooks the Combined Civil Affairs Committee and the Combined Chiefs of Staff, and issues instructions to General Eisenhower, in regard to British and French as well as American forces, directly from the United States War Office.

3. The European Advisory Commission, in which the Russians apparently expect to be informed on this subject, is also ignored. There seems to be no provision by which the Russians could have any part in the course of action which General Eisenhower is instructed to carry out, or any contact with the civil authorities he establishes.

4. If General Eisenhower wishes to grant full authority in civil administration to the F.C.N.L. and to place the Committee in a position where it will become the effective provisional government of France, he might be able to do so within the terms of this directive. The various restrictive clauses would, however, make it necessary for him to bring this about by the most devious and left-handed methods.

5. No provision is made in this document for the restoration of normal civil government in France. Several references are made to the objective of re-establishing a democratic government freely chosen by the French people, but the only specific instructions on the point inform General Eisenhower that he shall not regard any civilian group with which he deals as such a government, nor shall he allow it to take steps by which it might become one (paragraph 4, 5C). Furthermore, any powers which he confers are temporary only, and may be withdrawn by him at any time. The re-establishment of democratic government in France, as far as this directive is concerned, is to take place by methods which are not indicated under auspices which are not named. It might reasonably be inferred from the document that General Eisenhower himself is to conduct the first general elections in France.

6. Clause 5c, which requires the civil authorities recognized by General Eisenhower to take no action designed to entrench themselves in power is open to much possible misunderstanding and misinterpretation. Any good and constructive action on the part of a governing body is likely to have the effect of entrenching it in power.

7. It is presumably left entirely to General Eisenhower to identify members of the "Vichy regime" with whom he is to have no relations.

The course of action outlined in the President's proposed directive is clearly contrary to the general lines of French policy which have been developed in this country. There is also a direct contradiction between the United States statement, and our own and the United Kingdom commitment to give effect as far as possible to the desire of the French Committee of National Liberation to be recognized as the body qualified to ensure the administration and defence of all French interests and to consult the Committee on practical measures to be adopted.

It is, however, difficult to see how the Canadian Government could intervene in the present exchange of views, since we have not been informed officially of what is taking place. One possible action would be to take advantage of our presumed ignorance, and to approach the United States and United Kingdom governments with proposals for fuller recognition of the F.C.N.L. in view of the good record of the Committee and the coming invasion. If there is any disposition in London to resist President Roosevelt on this question, such an action might give the United Kingdom authorities a new base from which to operate. It is not likely we could do any harm, and we might conceivably alter the present tendency of United States policy.

I have read Mr. Riddell's memorandum on the President's proposed directive to General Eisenhower. I am in entire agreement with his argument but would suggest a slight modification in his proposals under paragraph 7. We have not been consulted on this directive and have made no commitment. On the other hand, Allied policy towards France is of major importance to us from three points of view—(1) the employment of Canadian forces justifies our interest in a satisfactory political background for the invasion; (2) Canadian opinion has a particular interest in French affairs; (3) we cannot escape from post-war affairs in Europe and in those affairs the position of France is of the first importance.

From every point of view, therefore, it seems that the Canadian Government is required to formulate its own policy towards France, and I suggest that the only possible policy is one of recognition of the French Committee as a provisional Government. In my opinion if that recognition is not accorded the French people will not give to the Allied armies the assistance which they would otherwise do. Furthermore, the President's directive would appear to leave to a Military Commander large but vague powers which have nothing to do with military operations. It surely is of urgent importance that the recovery of France should be as rapid as possible and if the United States policy is to be followed I can see nothing but political confusion within France and bitterness toward the Allied countries.

Could we not then inform London and perhaps Washington that we are proposing at an early date to recognise the F.C.N.L. which there is every reason to believe has the confidence of the Consultative Assembly and the Resistance Groups? The Committee's plans for the setting up of a permanent Government of France appear to be satisfactory though somewhat complicated. In expressing these views there will be no need to make any reference to the policy of either the United Kingdom or the United States about which we officially know nothing. I believe that a firm statement of this type if made at a very early date might have a considerable influence on the United Kingdom and United States Governments. Even if it did not, it is in my opinion the proper policy for Canada and I can see no reason why we should not have our own policy in this matter.

I recently sent you a copy of Washington message WA-1706 of March 18th which contained the text of a directive prepared by the President for the guidance of General Eisenhower on the administration of French territory following its reconquest from the Germans. This document contains the seeds of future trouble, in which we cannot fail to be involved in some measure. I think, therefore, that we cannot let it pass without comment. The text which I sent to you was secured sub rosa from the British Embassy, but since then it has been communicated to the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington by the United Kingdom Staff Mission, and to the High Commissioner in London by the Dominions Office. The Canadian authorities are, therefore, officially in possession of it.

The central difficulty in advancing our views is that the directive has been prepared by President Roosevelt personally in consultation with Admiral Leahy. It is a revision of a draft worked out in the Combined Civil Affairs Committee, which is dependent on the Combined Chiefs of Staff. If its terms become known to the French authorities in Algiers, it is almost certain to provoke an explosion. There has been leakage to the press in Washington, and responsibility for the aloofness towards the French committee shown in the directive has been ascribed to Mr. Roosevelt.

If you agree with the views set forth in the following paragraphs of this note, I think the best course would be for you to have a general discussion of the situation with Malcolm MacDonald, asking him to find out what attitude they are adopting in London and whether they agree with our own apprehensions.

The military prospects are that France will be freed from German control by an Allied army consisting mainly of American, British and Canadian troops. There will be some small contingents from other countries; at most, only one French Division will participate in the main attack from the United Kingdom. There will be a period of indeterminate length in which some, or even all, of France will be under a military Government deriving its authority from General Eisenhower as Supreme Allied Commander. During this period the orderly and progressive transfer of civil administration to a French civil authority or authorities must take place.

The President's directive would lay down the procedure to be followed by the Allied Forces in the establishment of civil administration in any part of France. It provides little, however, in the way of positive guidance beyond a statement of aims, and it purposely puts the French Committee of National Liberation very much in the background. It does this in such a way as to leave quite obscure the methods whereby a French government can be established according to the free choice of the French people, although this is defined as one of the three "paramount aims" of the policy to be pursued.

General Eisenhower, it is true, is authorized to consult with the French Committee and to permit them to select and install civilian administrative personnel. It is spelled out, however, that he is not limited to dealing exclusively with the Committee (which is reasonable), and that nothing that he may do will constitute the recognition of the Committee as a provisional Government. He is also required to obtain as far as possible from the Committee a series of restrictions (specified in paragraph 5 of the directive), all of which have already been publicly proclaimed at the time the Committee was formed as being among its basic purposes.

Meanwhile in Algiers the Committee is developing plans in concert with the consultative Assembly for establishing in a thoroughly democratic way a republican government in liberated France. The Committee and Assembly are already integrated with the resistance movements inside France, which must provide the assistance on which the success of the Allied attack will in part depend. The wholehearted co-operation of the Committee and the resistance movements is needed to reduce the time and cut the cost of the invasion. There is no alternative authority in France except the Vichy regime, which is explicitly ruled out. General Eisenhower will have to rely on the Committee and the resistance movements, but under this directive he can only do so left-handedly.

We know that Eisenhower himself, the American representatives in Algiers, and also the State Department, have come round to the view that the Committee, whether they like it or not, is the only French authority which can assume responsibility for civil administration, and that it alone can arrange for the difficult transition to a new constitutional regime. We know, also, that this view is held in the United Kingdom. We know that the President has developed a strong animus not only against de Gaulle personally but even against France. He has, for instance, for some time been making suggestions that parts of the French Colonial Empire should be transferred to other control, with particular reference to Indo China and the French South Sea Islands.

If the directive becomes Allied policy, there is danger that when a free French Government does emerge it will be hostile not only to the United States but also to the British Commonwealth, including ourselves. The long-term implications of what is done during the period of liberation are of the first importance. On this may depend the prospect of there emerging a strong and stable France, and indeed a stable European settlement.

The directive, furthermore, is objectionable from another point of view. It has been issued from the White House with instructions to the Secretary of War to transmit it as an order to General Eisenhower. It has not been concurred in by the British Government, nor has it been considered by the European Advisory Commission which is directly charged with responsibility in matters of this sort. Even if it were to be regarded as a purely military matter, it should not go from the President to the Supreme Allied Commander, but should reach him as an order from the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

Both the United Kingdom and ourselves have adopted a policy contrary to the terms of the directive in the notes of last August defining our relationship to the Committee. Both the United Kingdom and Canada undertook to give effect as far as possible to the Committee's desire to become the body qualified to ensure the administration and defence of all French interests, "while reserving the right to consider in consultation with the Committee the practical application of this principle in particular cases as they arise."<sup>4</sup> We can, therefore, hardly agree to the imposition by the United States of a policy of vital importance to the Committee on which it has not been consulted.

I feel, therefore, that we must at least make it clear that this policy is not our policy. We know that the President's judgement does not carry the endorsement of informed opinion, both military and civil, in Washington and in London. If we explore the situation first with London through Mr. MacDonald, we may encourage the United Kingdom Government to urge reconsideration on the most important points. We may also find it desirable to raise the question directly with Washington, where we have a right to be heard on a matter deeply affecting the future of France.

The realistic attitude to adopt is, I think, to maintain Eisenhower's ultimate authority and responsibility intact during the period of active operations, but to recognize in advance (and preferably at once) that as military control is relaxed, the French Committee is responsible for establishing civilian administration, and for arranging elections and taking the other steps essential to the convocation of a representative constituent assembly. In Italy, civil authority has been already transferred, in certain areas, to the Badoglio Government. We shall presumably transfer civil authority to the Belgian, Dutch and other Allied European Governments on the liberation of their territory. The French Committee is now strong enough and stable enough to be treated on the same basis.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

We have secured from Mr. Michael Wright of the British Embassy and from General Pope some additional information on the subject of the draft directive on the civil administration of France. My conversation with Wright took place yesterday morning, and Pope's information was secured on Monday, the 27th, from General Macready.<sup>5</sup> Neither the British Embassy nor the British Joint Staff have received any comment from London on the directive. Wright describes its reception in London as a "stunned silence". The directive has been submitted by the U.S. Secretary of War to the Combined Civil Affairs Committee for approval, but the United Kingdom members are not in a position to discuss it without instructions from London.

2. Wright says that the British Embassy's feeling is that it would be virtually hopeless to put a new draft before the President, that Mr. McCloy, Mr. Dunn and others in the State Department feel that they have done all they possibly can to move the President and that there is no use in their going back to him again. One of them said he would probably be dismissed if he did. General Marshall is all in favour of recognizing the French Committee as the sole agency for the civil administration of liberated France but says, not unnaturally, that he has so many other matters of more direct concern to him to deal with, that he cannot give time to this particular problem. What he has done is to give Mr. McCloy his blessing to go as far as he can. Mr. Hull is in general inclined to support Mr. McCloy, but is not prepared to push the President.

3. General Macready was somewhat more hopeful, though he may, of course, have been in an unduly optimistic mood on Monday. He believes there is definite reason to hope that the President might be induced by Mr. Churchill to agree to an amendment of the directive under which General Eisenhower would be instructed to deal with the French Committee and such other persons or bodies in France as might subsequently be made known to him by the United Kingdom and United States Governments. This would put the responsibility where it belongs. General Macready thinks that the only way to shift the President would be a personal communication from Mr. Churchill.

4. The Embassy, on the assumption that no substantive change is possible, are inclined to believe that the most practicable plan would be for them to be instructed to discuss the question with Monnet of the French Committee, putting before him not the text of the directive, but the principles contained in it, and suggesting that the French Committee immediately appoint a Military Mission to General Eisenhower's staff to work out the details of the collaboration between the French Committee and General Eisenhower. The Embassy is firmly of the opinion that General Eisenhower can be entirely depended on to treat the French Committee as the sole agency for the civil administration of liberated France.

5. General Pope is strongly of the opinion, and I am inclined to agree with him, that it would be unwise for us to let the United States know that we have received a copy of the directive from the British Joint Staff Mission. There would be danger that this might result in closing up this source of information. Should the Canadian Government, therefore, decide to make any statement to the United States Government on the directive, this statement could be based either on published accounts of the contents of the directive or on the copy given to Canada House by the Dominions Office.

6. I enclose a copy of the secret letter† of March 24th from Brigadier Redman of the British Joint Staff Mission to General Pope, enclosing a copy of the directive.

Yours sincerely,

ESCOTT REID

SECRET. Norman Robertson and Hume Wrong have spoken to me, on the instructions of Mr. Mackenzie King, about the directive prepared by President Roosevelt for the guidance of General Eisenhower on administration of French territory following its reconquest from Germans. There is a strong feeling here that document contains seeds of future trouble in which Canada cannot fail to be involved in some measure. First text which they received of document came sub rosa from British Embassy in Washington. Since then however it has been communicated to Canadian Joint Staff in Washington by United Kingdom Staff Mission, and to High Commissioner in London by the Dominions Office. Canadian authorities are therefore officially in possession of it. They are considering whether it may be desirable for them to raise question directly with Washington. But they are anxious in the first place to consult the United Kingdom authorities and to find out what attitude they propose to adopt towards the document and whether they agree with Canadian apprehensions. Robertson and Wrong gave me a copy of a note prepared for the Prime Minister, which he had approved as a basis for their discussion with me. My immediately following telegram contains this statement. I should be grateful for your comments on this for transmission to the Canadian Government.

Ottawa, April 6, 1944

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following is statement of Canadian attitude referred to in my immediately preceding telegram.

The military prospects are that France will be freed from German control by an Allied army consisting mainly of American, British and Canadian troops. There will be some small contingents from other countries; at most, only one French Division will participate in the main attack from the United Kingdom. There will be a period of indeterminate length in which some, or even all, of France will be under a military Government deriving its authority from General Eisenhower as Supreme Allied Commander. During this period the orderly and progressive transfer of civil administration to a French civil authority or authorities must take place.

The President's directive would lay down the procedure to be followed by the Allied Forces in the establishment of civil administration in any part of France. It provides little, however, in the way of positive guidance beyond a statement of aims, and it purposely puts the French Committee of National Liberation very much in the background. It does this in such a way as to leave quite obscure the methods whereby a French government can be established according to the free choice of the French people, although this is defined as one of the three "paramount aims" of the policy to be pursued.

General Eisenhower, it is true, is authorized to consult with the French Committee and to permit them to select and install civilian administrative personnel. It is spelled out, however, that he is not limited to dealing exclusively with the Committee (which is reasonable) and that nothing that he may do will constitute the recognition of the Committee as a provisional Government. He is also required to obtain as far as possible from the Committee a series of restrictions (specified in paragraph 5 of the directive) all of which have already been publicly proclaimed at the time the Committee was formed as being among its basic purposes.

There is left in a vacuum the methods whereby a representative French Government is to be established. The Committee is to be regarded as exercising authority in France only to the degree directly authorized by the Supreme Allied Commander, and the directive repeats and underlines that such authority must be terminated in some undefined manner by the selection of a new Government through the free choice of the French people. It would almost seem to follow from the terms of the directive that French elections ought to be held under Allied Military auspices.

Meanwhile in Algiers the Committee is developing plans in concert with the Consultative Assembly for establishing in a democratic way a republican government in liberated France. The Committee and Assembly are already integrated with the resistance movements inside France, which must provide the assistance on which the success of the Allied attack will in part depend. The wholehearted cooperation of the Committee and of the resistance movements is needed to reduce the time and cut the cost of the invasion. There is no alternative authority in France except the Vichy regime, which is explicitly ruled out. General Eisenhower will have to rely on the Committee and the resistance movement, but under this directive he can only do so left-handedly.

We know that Eisenhower himself, the American representative in Algiers, and also the State Department, have come round to the view that the Committee, whether they like it or not, is the only French authority which can assume responsibility for civil administration, and that it alone can arrange for the difficult transition to a new constitutional regime. We fear that the President may have developed an animus not only against de Gaulle personally but even against France. He has, for instance, for some time been making suggestions that parts of the French Colonial Empire should be transferred to other control, with particular reference to Indo China and the French South Sea Islands.

If the directive becomes Allied policy, there is danger that when a free French Government does emerge the directive may cause that Government to be less friendly not only towards the United States but also towards the British Commonwealth, including ourselves. The long-term implications of what is done during the period of liberation are of the first importance. On this may depend the prospect of there emerging a strong and stable France, and indeed a stable European settlement.

Both the United Kingdom and ourselves have adopted a policy contrary to the terms of the directive in the notes of last August defining our relationship to the Committee. Both the United Kingdom and Canada undertook to give effect as far as possible to the Committee's desire to become the body qualified to ensure the administration and defence of all French interests, "while reserving the right to consider in consultation with the Committee the practical application of this principle in particular cases as they arise." We can therefore hardly agree to the imposition by the United States of a policy of vital importance to the Committee on which it has not been consulted.

The realistic attitude to adopt is to maintain Eisenhower's ultimate authority and responsibility intact during the period of active operations, but to recognize in advance (and preferably at once) that as military control is relaxed, the French Committee is responsible for establishing civilian administration and for arranging elections and taking the other steps essential to the convocation of a representative constituent assembly. In Italy, civil authority has been already transferred, in certain areas, to the Badoglio Government. We shall presumably transfer civil authority to the Belgian, Dutch and other Allied European Governments on the liberation of their territory. The French Committee is now strong enough and stable enough to be treated on the same basis.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have had a reply from London to the two telegrams about France, the drafts of which you returned to me with your letter of April 6th.

The telegram asks me to thank you for letting the United Kingdom have the statement of the Canadian views about the President's draft directive. Your views are in fact very much in accord with those held in London. Since the President's directive was prepared two things have happened. Mr. Hull made his broadcast of the 9th<sup>6</sup> and Mr. Law<sup>7</sup> stated in the House of Commons that the United Kingdom was very generally in agreement with this.<sup>8</sup>

The present position is that it is still being considered in London whether to press the President to revise his draft directive to bring it into line with Mr. Hull's speech. But it has not yet been decided whether or not to do this.

As far as the United Kingdom authorities are concerned, there would be no objection to Mr. Mackenzie King putting his views to the President through the Canadian Ambassador in Washington. Alternatively, he may prefer to wait

I mentioned to you on the telephone today the action taken by the French Committee in suddenly changing its name to the Provisional Government of the French Republic. This was done in the evening of May 16th, following the passage of a resolution proposing this change in the Consultative Assembly the previous evening.

It is possible<sup>12</sup> that someone will raise this question in the House tomorrow. If so, and if you are asked about the position of the Canadian Government, I should be inclined to answer that the Canadian Representative in Algiers has reported the action taken towards the alteration in the title of the French Committee of National Liberation to the Provisional Government of the French Republic. No request has been received, as yet, from the French Committee for the recognition of the new title and, therefore, the occasion has not yet arisen for any decision by the Canadian Government.

As I mentioned to you on the telephone, I have asked the Canadian Embassy in Washington and Canada House in London to discuss the position informally with the United States and United Kingdom authorities. I am nervous lest there should be a rather violent reaction in the White House, especially since the Committee, on May 15th, informed the Consultative Assembly that they proposed to denounce, at once, the agreements between Admiral Darlan and General Clark, on which are based the present relations between the Allied authorities and the French authorities in North Africa.<sup>13</sup>

My own feeling is that, while I sympathize with the objective of the Committee, I am doubtful about the wisdom of their tactics. I told Bonneau, in conversation a couple of days ago, that it looked as though the Committee would secure in fact, without any difficulty, the position which they had been working for, providing they were really cooperative and did not constantly try to force the pace on questions of form.

SECRET. You will have noted in press that, on May 15th, Consultative Assembly in Algiers adopted a resolution moved by a Delegate of Metropolitan Resistance that the French Committee should henceforth be known as the Provisional Government of the French Republic. The resolution was adopted unanimously and President Gouin of the Assembly proceeded to introduce General de Gaulle as President of the Provisional Government.

2. This resolution had no legal effect, since a decree of the French Committee was necessary to sanction it. The Canadian Representative in Algiers reported on May 16th that Committee's approval was likely to be forthcoming. We have been informed, however, by Dominions Office that Mr. Diethelm, Commissioner for War, assured Mr. Duff-Cooper<sup>14</sup> that the resolution was a spontaneous gesture of goodwill towards the Committee, that de Gaulle had not been consulted, that the Committee would take no action, and that everything would continue unchanged.

3. General Vanier has now reported that late on May 16th Committee unanimously adopted the Assembly's proposal, and that an ordinance would be promulgated to this effect which would not modify the provisions of the ordinance of April 21st on the organization of public power in France after liberation.<sup>15</sup> General Vanier has asked for our views. We are telling him to take no action which would imply recognition of the Committee as the Provisional Government of France until he has received instructions.

4. Presumably, after promulgation of the new ordinance the Committee will seek recognition of its new title from Governments of United Nations. Please discuss the position informally with the Department of State and maintain contact on it with United Kingdom Embassy, which may of course already have raised the matter with the Department of State.

RELATIONS WITH FRENCH NATIONAL COMMITTEE

I spent an hour this morning with Mr. Michael Wright at the British Embassy. He showed me a large number of recent memoranda and telegrams. In addition to these telegrams he had a fairly large number of telegrams exchanged recently between the Prime Minister and the President. These had been repeated to Lord Halifax in his capacity as a member of the War Cabinet. He was worried about showing me these without authority, since any information which I got from him could come only from that source.<sup>16</sup> I therefore did not press him to let me see them.

Mr. Wright is extremely concerned about the present situation. In his opinion we are drifting into a very dangerous position and it is urgent that action be taken immediately to remedy it. There were two groups of problems; the first relating to the general question of the civil administration in liberated France, the second to the question of supplies for liberated France. The one was being discussed between General Eisenhower and General Koenig<sup>17</sup> in London, the other was being discussed in Washington. Conversations in Washington on supplies were growing worse lately, though the conversations in London appeared to be going better.

Mr. Wright had seen Mr. Robertson's memorandum for the Prime Minister of March 28th and had been much impressed by it. He had noted the suggestion in the second to last paragraph that Canada might find it desirable to raise the question directly with Washington, where we have a right to be heard on a matter deeply affecting the future of France. He said that he himself would welcome our taking the matter up with the United States government. He felt it would do no harm (provided it was clear that we were acting on our own), and might do some good.

The deadlock could be broken only by new instructions from the President, who was acting contrary to the advice given him by his military and civilian advisors such as General McCloy and Mr. Dunn.

So far as the Koenig-Eisenhower discussions in London are concerned, Mr. Wright said that General Koenig appears to have been given restricted permission to communicate in cypher with Algiers. It was not possible for me to get confirmation of the recent newspaper stories that General de Gaulle has been invited to London; indeed I understand that up to the present he has not been invited.

Five main questions are outstanding:

1. Civil affairs question. The directive has not yet been sent. Some time ago the United Kingdom suggested that the phrase in the draft directive "you may consult with the French Committee" should be changed to "you shall consult with the French Committee", but the President turned this down. Mr. Winant a few days ago urged Lord Halifax that the United Kingdom should accept the draft directive, contending that once General Eisenhower had something in writing the situation would work out alright. Mr. Wright recognizes that General Eisenhower's position would be easier if he were to receive the directive even in its present form, but he could not see any other substantial advantages in the proposal. He said that when the United Kingdom government found the President immovable they had decided to make a declaration on their own account, and this declaration was made by Mr. Eden in the House of Commons on May 2 when he said that the United Kingdom government would deal in liberated France only with the French Committee of National Liberation.

2. Supplies. The French Committee was unwilling to put surplus supplies from Africa into the general pot unless they could be given some indication of what supplies the United States and the United Kingdom hoped to provide for liberated France. The President refuses to authorize the giving of any such indication to the French Committee.

Commander of French Forces of the Interior.

3. Plan A.<sup>18</sup> Plan A contains an estimate of what supplies the supreme Allied commander thinks could be got into France in the event of a quick collapse of Germany following the invasion and before the Germans could cause widespread destruction in any part of Europe, after allowing for the amount of shipping and port facilities required for the invasion forces. The United States War Department had passed Plan A to Mr. Monnet privately, but it has not been communicated officially to the French Committee and the War Department cannot discuss the matter officially until authorized. Subsequent to decision on the directive on the civil affairs question, unofficial discussions have taken place but these have been abortive since the War Department have not felt free to make modifications in the Plan A figures. The French in Washington on their part say that they cannot make really effective plans for supplies for the post-military period in France until they know what the Anglo-American command are aiming to provide during the military period. Since it will probably prove possible to move much less than under Plan A, at least for the first time or three months, General Eisenhower was asked by the C.C.A.C. on May 18 what, in the light of his operational requirements, he thinks he can provide for the French. It is, in the opinion of Mr. Marris of the British Embassy, essential that discussions take place immediately between General Eisenhower's staff and the French military representatives in London on how the French Committee will organize the movement of supplies at the ports and from the ports into the normal channels of communication<sup>19</sup> in France.

4. Supply of currency and notes. The French in Washington say that the plans which have been contemplated are being upset by the insistence of the United States on introducing a large number of notes for the use of the United States troops, since the U.S. proposals to do this have not been thought out or properly correlated with other plans which have been made. Sir Ronald Campbell had discussions on May 12 on the rate of exchange of the franc with Mr. Monnet and Mr. Mendès-France.<sup>20</sup> They explained that the rate of 200 francs to the £ was provisional in their intention. A final and permanent rate could only be fixed later when conditions were known, and it would have to be fixed within the framework of an international monetary agreement. It was essential that such an agreement be reached at the earliest possible date after the liberation of France in order that the people of France would believe in the rate which had been established. In the opinion of the French this question was urgent. (The insistence of the French on the urgency of this question arises not only out of the substance of the question itself, but also out of the desire of France to participate with the three great powers in discussions on the monetary question.) One other aspect of the financial question which had been left hanging in the air is the financing by France of supplies in the military period. No official discussions appear to have been held in London with the French Committee on this subject.

5. Economic administration of liberated France. Mr. Tixier<sup>21</sup> has said that the Algiers Committee is unwilling to take any part in the economic administration of France unless they are the sole agency for the administration of liberated France. The problems are going to be so difficult that they cannot accept responsibility if there are to be competing economic administrations.

In the light of the present situation Mr. Wright thought it unlikely that the French Committee would initiate discussions with the United Nations on the recognition of them as the provisional government of France. He thought, however, that the United States and the United Kingdom might perhaps be forced into taking action for fear that the Soviet Union would recognize the French Committee.

I asked Mr. Wright if he felt that all the possible arguments and considerations had been brought to the attention of the President. I instanced especially the very able summary of the issues involved which had recently been made by Mr. Harold MacMillan. I also referred to the arguments in Mr. Robertson's memorandum. Mr. Wright said that he felt sure that all these arguments had been put as strongly as possible to the President, but without effect. He had not even indicated what methods he had in mind whereby a French government could be established according to the free choice of the French people, nor had he shown any comprehension of the dangers and difficulties of putting General Eisenhower in a position where he had to decide between competing French claimants for the administration of a town in France.

SECRET. 1. My despatch No. 1283 of May 22nd concerning relations with the French National Committee. Reid has given me the following report of the talk he had this afternoon with Culbertson and Bonbright of the Western European Division in the State Department:

(1) They think it is probable, but not certain, that the Committee will promulgate an ordinance changing its name to the Provisional Government of the French Republic. Even if the ordinance is promulgated they think it most unlikely that the Committee will request recognition of its title from the Governments of the United Nations since they would be assured of a rebuff from the United States. In their opinion the main purpose of a change in name is an effort to strengthen the Committee's position in metropolitan France. In response to a question from me, they said that they did not rule out the possibility that the U.S.S.R. would recognize the Committee as the Provisional Government.

(2) They were not particularly concerned over the failure up to the present to make precise arrangements on supply questions and financial and monetary questions which would arise during and after the liberation of France, since they felt that these problems would be satisfactorily solved when the event occurred.

(3) They put forward the usual explanation of the United States Government's position. During the period of active military operations in any area of France it would be possible to find out to whom the local civil administration should be turned over. It may be that in most areas it should be turned over to the French Committee; in other areas some other group might emerge. If there should emerge groups in France which have public support and which are not prepared to accept the French Committee with its present membership, it is to be assumed that the Committee would make changes in its personnel which would result in these groups adhering to it. Thus, before provisional elections took place the Committee would have become the sole agency for the administration of liberated France. The alternative possibility which they still insist is conceivable, though not probable, is that liberated France will demonstrate a general revulsion against the French Committee. In that event we (presumably the United States and the United Kingdom) will have to face this new situation.

2. There are a few typographical errors in the memorandum of May 22nd enclosed with my despatch under reference which you might correct. The second half of the last sentence of the first paragraph should read "Since the information which I got from them could come only from that source." The word "communications" in the last line of numbered paragraph 3 should be "distribution."

Vanier reported on May 17th that the French Committee had decided to give legal effect to the resolution adopted on May 15th by the Consultative Assembly in Algiers changing the Committee's name to "Provisional Government of the French Republic." There had been an earlier report forwarded by the Dominions Office that Diethelm, the Commissioner of War, had assured Duff Cooper that no such action was likely. You will have seen a later telegram from Vanier, dated the 22nd May†, giving the result of a discussion which he had on the subject with Massigli. It seems probable that there will be at least some little delay before the Committee publishes an ordinance changing its name.

On receipt of Vanier's report of May 17th Wrong asked both the Embassy in Washington and Canada House to make informal enquiries. I enclose a copy of a message from Washington (WA-3172 of May 23rd) giving a report of a discussion at the State Department. Bonneau mentioned the change in title to Wrong the other day and Wrong told him that he thought that the Committee would be very ill-advised to request recognition as a Provisional Government at the present time except in the unlikely event that they could feel reasonably certain that recognition would be accorded by the United States.

I shall send you later a copy of the memorandum referred to in this Washington message which contains an interesting report of a lengthy discussion on the United States attitude towards the French Committee between Escott Reid and Mr. Michael Wright of the British Embassy. This is now being copied.

Commandant Bonneau left with me this afternoon a copy of the decree of June 2nd of the French Committee of National Liberation,† designating the Committee as the Provisional Government of the French Republic.

Bonneau had been instructed to explain that this change of official style would not, in any way, affect the organization or functions of the French administration in North Africa, nor would it modify previously agreed plans for the restoration of democratic government in France after its liberation.

The Committee has approved this decree, following the unanimous adoption by the Consultative Assembly, on May 15th, of a resolution requesting it to do so, which had been introduced by M. Gazier, the principal Representative in the Consultative Assembly of the National Council of French Resistance.

I told Mr. Bonneau that I did not think this action of the Committee could, of itself, modify the arrangements under which the Canadian and other Governments had recognized the French Committee in August last. Our representative in Algiers would have to continue with the style of Canadian Representative to the French Committee of National Liberation, and we would, presumably, continue to address Bonneau as the Delegate of the Committee.<sup>22</sup>

TOP SECRET. General de Gaulle received me today cheerfully and in good form. He is hopeful that agreement will be reached soon with the United Kingdom regarding administration in France. He said Eden optimistic also about agreement later with United States, but de Gaulle does not share his optimism. He is happy about the present de facto situation in Normandy which, except for currency, could not be better.

Regional Commissioner appointed by Committee is carrying out his duties in friendly cooperation with the Allied Command. No attempt was made by authorities in the United Kingdom to prevent Commissioner going to France. Montgomery expressed satisfaction at his presence.

On disembarking in France Canadians were first troops General met. His reception at Bayeux and Issigny convinced him that he and the Committee have the support of the French nation. As soon as reasonably large area is liberated I believe he will appoint in France a Resident Member of the Government. The Committee itself will be transferred to France as soon as such course is justified by the extent of territory recovered.

Questioned about his trip to Washington he said no decision had yet been taken. He appeared to be adverse to going unless he had some sort of assurance that an attempt, at least, would be made by the United States authorities to come to an understanding. But he did not rule out a visit on previous assurances. I took it upon myself to express opinion that he would be well advised to go to Washington with or without assurances, that his going would be a proof of goodwill and would appeal to American public opinion and press, some sections of which were already favourable to him. Once there, President might find it difficult to limit scope of the visit to exchange of courtesies only. On the other hand, if he did not act so people would say he was difficult and his abstention might be misinterpreted.

I will send by next air bag full report of conversation.†

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Your telegram No. 167 of June 21st. I was very glad to learn that de Gaulle's own estimate of the results of his visit to England tends to confirm the more hopeful view which Eden formed after his last talk with the General.

As we see it, the basic difficulties in the French position can only be satisfactorily settled with the concurrence and cooperation of the President and Churchill who, in this matter, are more likely to move on their own initiative than in response to public and diplomatic pressures. Having in mind the immediate and long range importance of the issues involved and of the sensitiveness of the personal relationships which may affect their outcome, we must be careful during these next weeks to forego action or advice which might possibly prejudice a favourable turn of events.

For these reasons I did not think it advisable to take up your suggestion that General de Gaulle should at once be invited to visit Canada. A prompt and cordial invitation to General de Gaulle to visit Canada could only have been contrasted with the guarded and contingent invitation he had received to visit the United States and would have been construed in the United States and abroad as further evidence of the isolated and unsupported character of the United States attitude toward the French Committee. I think there are some indications that the American attitude toward France is developing favourably. I do not think this development can be quickened by an accumulation of external pressures on the President. In fact, such pressures may have an exactly opposite effect. I feel it would be unwise for us to seek in any way to influence de Gaulle in deciding whether to visit the United States. That should be regarded as a matter pertaining exclusively to him and to the President.

If an appropriate occasion arises for a renewed expression of the interest and importance which Canada has always attached to close and cordial relations between France and her Allies, I cherish the hope that such an expression of our interest and concern will be the more effective because we have kept our counsel and refrained from public judgment on the differences that have divided two of our best friends.

Apparently, it is now settled that he is to go. He plans to leave on Monday or Tuesday, and be back in Algiers for the celebration of the 14th of July. He has said to Vanier and to Duff-Cooper that he is most anxious to pay a short visit to Canada during his journey, and enquires whether the 10th or 11th of July would be suitable. In the circumstances, I think we have to invite him to come to Canada. I attach a draft telegram to Vanier for your approval.

SECRET. Following from the Prime Minister for your Prime Minister, Begins: General de Gaulle's visit to Canada, though brief, was I think altogether successful. He received a cordial welcome on all his public appearances in Ottawa, Québec and Montreal, and his statements to the press and over the radio were friendly and probably helpful.

I had several conversations with him during his day in Ottawa. He was, I think, pleased with the results of his Washington discussions and hopeful that they had prepared the way for reaching definite agreements on the various questions outstanding between the French and United States authorities. He had not himself attempted to negotiate agreements. He described his conversations with the President as very interesting and very cordial.

de Gaulle made little of the question of recognition of the French Committee as the Provisional Government of France, following the line that he took with you in London and with the President in Washington. Our acceptance of the Committee's new title might nevertheless have a helpful psychological effect. Unless there are other considerations not wholly apparent, the question would now seem to be no more than that of the name by which we call the French authority. Their retention of the qualifying adjective "Provisional" should give all the safeguards we need or are likely to get; and the Allies, including the United States, are in fact treating the Committee as a provisional government. Furthermore, we are unlikely to be able to continue to call the French authority by a name which it has formally abolished until free elections can be held in France and a new government is installed through the democratic process. Ends.

Algiers, July 18, 1944

Sir,

1. General de Gaulle received me this morning and kept me some forty minutes. He said he wished to speak to me about his trip to the United States and Canada. He was most enthusiastic about the warm welcome given to him by the Prime Minister, the Governor General, the Princess Alice, members of the Government, and the people generally. He told me about the various functions organized in his honour. The ceremony on Parliament Hill impressed him very particularly.

2. The General gave me the following account of some of the views he expressed to our Prime Minister. He informed the Prime Minister that it would not be possible for France to accept any settlement in Europe which might be concluded by Great Powers without French concurrence. Not one of the other Great Powers took the same peculiar interest in Europe that France did. France's voice would have to be heard also in the settlement of international, as distinct from European, questions of major importance. He did not favour the suggestion put forward by some that Great Powers alone should attempt to establish and maintain peace and generally to control world affairs. All nations large or small (and most nations were small), should have a voice in the post-war organization of peace. This did not preclude the Great Powers from conserving a preponderating influence. In matters however in which smaller nations had a special major interest, these nations should have a voice in the discussion and settlement on a completely equal footing with the Great Powers. He gave as example, a most interesting one to us, the drawing up of an international agreement on airways and navigation. He assumed that Canada would not accept or tolerate any decision taken in this field unless her status of complete equality with the Great Powers were acknowledged.

3. In reply to an inquiry from the Prime Minister relating to the recognition of the French Committee he had replied that the question of recognition now was not of much importance. It would perhaps have interested them earlier on but now what really mattered was an understanding on the de facto situation in French liberated territory where the administration was already being carried on by the Committee's representatives.

4. General de Gaulle then spoke about his trip to Washington where the President had received him in a most friendly manner. He had three conversations, each of about an hour, with Mr. Roosevelt in addition to a long talk at luncheon. The President had been most cordial. The General had informed him before his arrival in Washington that he was not coming to present any request but simply for a friendly exchange of views as the President had expressed a wish for this.

5. The President and he had covered a wide range of subjects but there was no disposition on either part to do more than touch lightly [lightly?] on any of them. The question of the Committee's recognition was not discussed in a way which could account for the statement of the President at a subsequent press conference. The General of course was delighted with Mr. Roosevelt's declaration of recognition: he believed that it was in the interest of the United States administration as well as that of the Committee that such a declaration should be made because negotiations were actually taking place in Washington on the basis of the tentative Anglo-French agreements which were almost concluded. It was reasonable and helpful therefore that the Committee's de facto position should be recognized.

6. Negotiations were proceeding in Washington at the Hoppenot<sup>24</sup> level. M. Alphand<sup>25</sup> had been left there to help M. Hoppenot. He was sanguine that an agreement would be reached before long. He told me with an amused smile that Mr. Roosevelt in the course of conversation had said suddenly "I don't know much about this currency question, why shouldn't you issue the money?" and the whole thorny problem was solved!

7. The President seemed concerned when discussing the Committee's administration in France with ensuring that the Commander-in-Chief had the last word in territory where military operations were still in progress. The General believed this concern was due to a misunderstanding and that there was no real difference of opinion. He accepted General Eisenhower, the C-in-

Delegate in United States of French Committee of National Liberation.

Director of Economic Affairs.

C, as the highest authority but not by virtue of his position as C-in-C of the American or of the British or of the Anglo-American Forces but in his capacity as C-in-C of all the Allied Forces and as such, General Eisenhower derived his authority, in respect of France, from (to quote General de Gaulle), the "Provisional Government of the French Republic". The French Government under the Constitution was empowered to declare a state of siege in any part of France and, following such declaration, to transfer to the military authority control of such area. In the proposals made last September the French Committee had suggested this solution. Thus the C-in-C would be invested by the French "Provisional Government" with this special state-of-siege authority. The General foresaw no difficulty in the settlement of the question.

8. He said that Mr. Roosevelt's spontaneous recognition of the Committee had piqued the United Kingdom Government. Mr. Duff Cooper yesterday had expressed his disappointment to him that the impression might be given that the United States had taken the first step in this direction when as a matter of fact the United Kingdom for some time past had been favourable to recognition and had been endeavouring to bring round Mr. Roosevelt. The General added that things might have been different however if Mr. Churchill's reception of him just before the landing in France had been more friendly. He contrasted the warm personal welcome of Mr. Roosevelt with the "déplorable" (this is the French word he used) treatment of him by Mr. Churchill. He was obviously hurt also by the fact that Mr. Churchill had gone to France, with General Smuts, before him and without informing him. He had seen Mr. Churchill on one occasion only, at luncheon on the day of his arrival. General Smuts was present. (This is something the General cannot forget.) Mr. Churchill and he had indulged in a few friendly bouts at luncheon but there had been no serious dissension. Later in the afternoon however when General Eisenhower produced his speech on what General de Gaulle called "AMGOT" and when he (General de Gaulle) declared that he could not agree to be presented to the French people by General Eisenhower, could not accept the currency arrangements and, in the circumstances, would not permit French officials to cooperate with "AMGOT", Mr. Churchill became very angry. He did not see the Prime Minister after this, but at 3 o'clock the following morning Mr. Churchill summoned M. Viénot and, for something over an hour, upbraided him in a disgraceful fashion. Before leaving England, General de Gaulle wrote what he considered quite a friendly letter to Mr. Churchill. He received a reply which, in the interest of Mr. Churchill, had better not be published.

9. The General deplored Mr. Churchill's present foreign policy vis-à-vis the French, particularly in Syria and the Lebanon where he appeared to be taking advantage of French weakness in an attempt to get rid of French influence. At the 14th of July celebration at Beirut, neither General Spears nor any other British officer had appeared. This he thought was inexcusable. He added "Are we allies or not?" He showed some fire when on this subject.

10. I have seldom seen General de Gaulle more relaxed or serene. It was obvious that he was very pleased indeed with the welcome which was given to him both in the United States and in Canada. He realizes to the full the importance of President Roosevelt's recognition of the French Committee for purposes of administration in liberated French territory. Intuitive as he is he must feel that his trip was a great personal triumph.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from Prime Minister for Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram No. 108 of July 27th.

There has clearly been a misunderstanding of the intention and purpose of my message. I did not intend to suggest that we in Canada were contemplating independent acceptance of the title of Provisional Government.

The word "our" in the last paragraph of my telegram No. 120 was not used in any exclusive sense as referring to possible action alone by Canada but rather was intended to express a view which might be shared by Canada and the United Kingdom, and in the new circumstances be welcome to the United States.

The last paragraph of my telegram No. 120 summed up my impression of the general situation reached following de Gaulle's visits to London, Washington and Ottawa. It was intended to express a feeling that the question of the title by which the French Authority was called seemed to have lost its practical importance. I certainly had no intention of pressing the President to go further than he has now gone and wholly agree with you that we should all continue to keep in step. I have never entertained any other thought. I regret there has been any misunderstanding. Ends.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I was very glad indeed to receive your letter of the 25th July† to which was attached a copy of your letter of the 25th July addressed to the High Commissioner for Canada, London.†

It is a source of great satisfaction to read that our Prime Minister has suggested to Mr. Churchill that our acceptance of the French Committee's new title "Provisional Government of the French Republic" might have a helpful psychological effect. Of course it would. It is also obvious that we cannot go on calling the Provisional Government of the French Republic a "Committee" when, as will happen very soon the "Committee" will be administering and governing the whole of France.

General de Gaulle is no longer interested in our recognition of his Committee or Provisional Government because what is more important to him is the fact that the French people have given their recognition. As a matter of fact there is no Government among the exiled Governments which is nearer the people of its country than the French Committee.

I do hope it may be possible, whether Mr. Churchill accepts the suggestion or not, for Canada to recognize the French Committee as the Provisional Government of the French Republic which in fact it is. Frankly I cannot see what possible ill effect it can have on our relations with the United States and the United Kingdom. Of one thing I am certain, the people of the United States and the United Kingdom will approve our action as reasonable and fair even if their Governments are annoyed by our independence of spirit and action.

Yours sincerely,

Dear General Vanier,

With reference to your letter of August 8th, I think that I should let you know that the Government has every intention of keeping in step with the United Kingdom and United States with respect to the recognition of the French Committee as a Provisional Government. The Prime Minister's message to Mr. Churchill, to which you refer, was never intended to be regarded as an indication that we would take separate action on this matter and there have been later exchanges of telegrams between the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill in which Mr. King has reaffirmed his intention on this point.

The magnificent march of events in France within the last few days ought to speed matters up. Once the Committee is installed in Paris with authority over all or nearly all of metropolitan France, the difficulties in the way of an agreement to call it a government and not a committee on the part of all the Allies ought quickly to disappear.

Yours sincerely,

Following for External No. 34 of September 10th. When I called on Massigli he asked me whether the Canadian Government intended to recognise the Provisional Government or whether present position was to continue. He added that if Government delayed their recognition it would hardly be courteous, after all the present Provisional Government and its head had been acclaimed and accepted by the French people. I replied that I would pass on to the Department his enquiry and view. I would be grateful if you would let me know as soon as possible what reply I am to return to the new Minister for Foreign Affairs. I feel it my duty to reiterate my recommendation made some time ago that the Provisional Government under General de Gaulle be recognized at once.

I questioned Massigli about Communist movement. He said that orders to rise and fight which were given to the people of Paris on August 19th by representative of the Provisional Government were meant to forestall insurrection which it was feared would be attempted by Communists. The people of Paris were ripe then for an uprising and (query group omitted) followed the lead of the Communists. He does not foresee any Communist danger now. The people are interested in getting back (query group omitted, query to) work and a normal existence and not in extreme political doctrines. Ends. Vanier.

From the attached intercepts† we learn that the French Delegates in Washington, Moscow and London formally requested the admission of France to the European Advisory Commission, probably on September 18th or 19th. The first telegram is fragmentary but it obviously is a part of a text of identic notes to be presented in the three capitals. The second is a suggestion of Hoppenot's that the French press and American correspondents should be inspired in Paris to raise the issue.

I am surprised that we have not heard of this démarche from London and am rather concerned that it may get connected up with the recognition of the Provisional Government in some way which will leave us out in the cold. Do you think that the time has come when we should send to our Missions in Washington and London an instruction to approach the State Department and the Dominions Office? Such an instruction might be to speak along the following lines in Washington preferably to Stettinius and in London to Cranborne.

"The Canadian Government was recently placed in an embarrassing position by the announcement in both London and Washington that the French Embassies in those cities had been returned to the French representatives. Some months ago the Canadian Government had intended to make available for the use of the French Delegate the Chancery of the French Legation in Ottawa. A rumour to this effect reached the press and resulted in an approach to the Department of External Affairs by the United States Ambassador urgently requesting on instructions from the State Department that such action should not be taken by the Canadian Government as it would be embarrassing to the United States. The United States Ambassador said that before the United States Government took any action of this kind, the Canadian Government would be consulted in advance. As a result of this approach the handing over of the French Chancery to the French Delegate was delayed. When the Canadian Government learnt from press despatches that it had been announced in Washington that the French Embassy had been handed over to the French Delegate it was placed in the embarrassing position of tardily pursuing a similar course which had lost value as a gesture of friendly cooperation.<sup>26</sup>

“The Canadian Government has been approached by the French authorities in Paris on the question of the immediate recognition of the Provisional Government in France. It is assumed that similar approaches have been made to other Governments. The Canadian Government also understands that the French are pressing for membership in the European Advisory Commission. The Canadian Government has felt for some time that recognition of the Provisional Government sooner or later was inevitable and that the sooner this recognition was accorded the more beneficial would be its effects. The Canadian Government certainly does not wish to be left in the position of extending recognition only after public announcement has been made that recognition has been accorded by the United States and United Kingdom Governments and wishes, therefore, to remind these Governments of their undertaking to keep the Canadian Government fully informed of any steps in this connection which they contemplate taking.”

There is some interesting matter in Mr. Churchill's speech of September 28th<sup>27</sup> concerning the recognition of the French Provisional Government. He repeated eloquently his familiar thesis that France must become once more strong, independent and friendly. He argued that French representatives should be included in all discussions affecting the settlement with Germany. He referred to the broadening of the basis of de Gaulle's Government and went on to say that “it would now seem possible” to transform the Consultative Assembly into an elected body to which the de Gaulle Government would be responsible. Such a development “would render possible the recognition of the

He concluded his reference to France by saying that these matters were under discussion with the French and other Allied Governments and that he was "hopeful that in the near future a happy settlement will be reached to the satisfaction of all concerned."

Mindful of what happened when the French Embassies in Washington and in London were handed over to the French Delegates without prior notification to us, I am concerned lest we might be similarly confronted with recognition of the Provisional Government as result of an agreement reached directly between Roosevelt and Churchill. This would put us in a very difficult position and I attach hereto a draft telegram from you to Mr. Churchill†, referring to his speech and our interest in being fully associated with any decision of the recognition of the Provisional Government.

French authorities have been co-operating well with Allied Supreme Command and General Eisenhower is prepared to agree to a request from the French administration for declaration of a large part of France as an "interior zone" (in accordance with Civil Affairs Agreement)<sup>29</sup> in which responsibility for civil administration would become entirely a matter for French authorities. (See my telegram Circular D. 1544 of October 16th.†)

4. Internal position of French administration also appears to us to be satisfactory. There is no doubt that the administration has the support of the majority of the French people. For their part the French administration are doing their best to restore democratic basis of French political life. The enlargement of Consultative Assembly is making good progress.

5. We consider that recognition of the French administration as a Provisional Government might be accorded either when the greater part of France is formally declared to be an "interior zone" or alternatively when reformed Assembly has met and has given the administration a vote of confidence. On the whole the first occasion which is likely to be earlier would seem to be preferable.

6. Above considerations have been put to President Roosevelt whose concurrence has been invited. Pending his reply we shall of course take no step.

7. We are also informing the Soviet Government.

8. In anticipation of this event we are engaged in the preparation of a communication to be addressed by Mr. Duff Cooper to the French Minister for Foreign Affairs on behalf of His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom, text of which will be communicated to you as soon as it is ready. Before sending final instructions to Mr. Duff Cooper, we intend to show our draft to the State Department for their consideration. Ends.

RECOGNITION OF FRENCH PROVISIONAL GOVERNMENT

1. THE PRIME MINISTER reported that it was altogether probable that the U.K. and U.S. governments would, in the immediate future, accord recognition to the French administration as the Provisional Government of France.

It was proposed that Canada take simultaneous action in the same sense. To this end, a draft communication had been prepared, in somewhat different terms to that which the U.K. government would send, extending Canadian recognition and indicating the desire to accredit Major General Vanier as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Canada to the Provisional Government of France.

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted with approval the Prime Minister's report and, after discussion, agreed that action be taken to accord Canadian recognition along the lines of the draft communication submitted.

MOST IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. We assume that you have received while in London or by repetition from Canada House messages concerning prospective recognition of the Provisional Government on occasion of transfer to French control of the interior zone which has been agreed between Supreme Allied Commander and French authorities. You should concert with Mr. Duff Cooper and Mr. Caffrey<sup>31</sup> your action in notifying the French administration and should present to French Minister of Foreign Affairs a communication, text of which is given in my immediately following telegram. We are telegraphing this text to United Kingdom Government. There remains some possibility of modification in consequence of discussions now proceeding between United Kingdom and United States Governments. Failing further instructions, however, you should present this note at same time as United Kingdom and United States notes.

The Government of Canada has heard with gratification of the agreement reached between the Supreme Allied Commander and the French authorities for the transfer to the French administration of full responsibility for the government of the larger part of France, including Paris.

The Government of Canada is happy to take advantage of this occasion to extend recognition to the French administration as the Provisional Government of France. As an immediate step towards placing the relationship between Canada and France on a more regular footing, the Government of Canada desires to accredit its Representative in Paris as Ambassador Extraordinary and Plenipotentiary of Canada to the Provisional Government of France, and would be glad to learn whether Major General Vanier is acceptable to the Provisional Government in that capacity.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. The Minister for Foreign Affairs asked me to call yesterday afternoon, at the same time handed me a reply to our unified recognition of the Provisional Government of France. As our notes, as well as the Provisional Government's reply, have been published by French authorities, I am sending the text of the reply en clair in my immediately following telegram. The Minister informed me, confidentially and privately, that General de Gaulle had expressed surprise and concern as to the wording of one part of our note, as well as that of the United States. The wording to which the General took exception was "the transfer to the French administration of full responsibility for the Government of the larger part of France, including Paris." His contention is that from the very moment of its arrival in Metropolitan France the Provisional Government exercised full sovereignty over liberated territory and that there could be no question in the meantime of the responsibility for Government. This is the idea which the Minister for Foreign Affairs brings out in the paragraph of his letter which begins "The Provisional Government which from the very moment of its arrival on Metropolitan territory of, etc." The Minister for Foreign Affairs said that with some difficulty he had persuaded the General to renounce any veiled allusion to the (word omitted) paragraph.

The United Kingdom note, which was more acceptable, did not speak of the transfer of responsibility for the Government but of a transfer of a forward zone to an interior zone. The Soviet note referred simply to the setting up of an interior zone, including Paris, but made no mention of a transfer.

Dear General Vanier,

We were surprised to learn from your telegram No. 387, of October 26, that General de Gaulle had expressed concern over the wording of part of our note concerning the recognition of the Provisional Government, and that the language used in the note from the United Kingdom Government was considered more acceptable. We received from London, on October 20, their draft communication with a suggestion that we should approach the French in similar terms. The following paragraph contains the passage in question from the United Kingdom draft of October 20:

“The Supreme Allied Commander has announced that he has reached agreement with competent French authorities regarding transfer of larger part of France, including Paris, from a forward to an interior zone, as defined in memorandum No. 1 of Civil Affairs Agreement of August 25th last. The means that the conduct of the administration of the area of France in question, and responsibility therefore, is now entirely a matter for central French authority which thus effectively exercises all the powers of Government in that area.”

We considered that this constituted an unsuitable wording for us to employ and that it was also somewhat grudging in tone, and when we despatched our instructions to you we used the substance of the British draft but changed it both so as to conform to our position and so as to sound somewhat more cordial. We communicated our instructions to you in advance both to the Foreign Office and the State Department and we did not receive any comment in reply. We also did not receive the text prepared in the State Department, and we assumed that the British note went forward in its original form.

Unless they changed the wording of their note I fail to see how it could be regarded as more acceptable than our own. We have not received the text of it or of the United States note as they were presented on October 23.

I do not enter into the substance of General de Gaulle's complaint which frankly strikes me as far fetched. We certainly never intended to suggest that the Supreme Allied Commander exercised any sovereignty in France, but it was a fact that he did exercise in parts at least, of the liberated territory, a temporary responsibility for administration.

This is only for your information. It is not desired that you should pursue the matter any further with the French authorities.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Reference your telegram D-385.† Prime Minister would be grateful if you could transmit the following top secret and personal message from him to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom, Begins:

1. Our Ambassador to China has been informed by Chinese source that the Soviet Government, through its Embassy in Chungking, has communicated to the Chinese Government certain conditions to be accepted prior to Soviet entry into the Pacific war. It is reported that Soviet terms assume that Mongolia is already separated from China, and include among their desiderata:

- (a) Kuriles,
- (b) South Sakhalin,
- (c) Chinese eastern railway including line to Dairen,
- (d) Port Arthur and Dairen.

Conditions regarding points (c) and (d) to be negotiated. The Ambassador reports that foregoing information was given him in the hope that it might reach London. I am puzzled at the channel chosen by the Chinese for this communication intended for your information. I know, however, that General Odlum has quite close contact with the Generalissimo. Odlum says that information reported in his telegrams was known only to five persons in Chungking.

2. I gave Halifax, this afternoon, copies of the messages from our Embassy in Chungking summarised in the first paragraph of this message, and it is on his advice that I am sending this report direct to you for what it may be worth.

3. Odlum said that his Chinese source made the comment that Britain might now, with advantage to all Allied Powers, pass from a negative to a positive attitude in the Pacific. The Chinese recognized that this was an American theatre for war operations but thought that in the diplomatic field there were no similar restrictions. The Chinese in the past had been quick to note any omission of reference to the Chinese war effort in your speeches and would welcome renewed evidence of United Kingdom interest.

4. In view of some earlier indications of Chinese nervousness about possible consequences of Soviet participation in Pacific war, I have some hesitation about transmitting the report contained in this message, but assume you will relate it to information you are receiving from other sources. Ends.

Ottawa, February 13, 1944

Dear General Stuart,

In the midst of all your activities and the extra thought and supervision called for by the major changes being made, I hesitate to divert your attention even for a moment, but there are reasons and good ones I think why I should like to ask you to be particularly careful regarding our relations constitutionally with the United Kingdom, and particularly as they affect the Army.

The Air Force are just now engaged in some straight from the shoulder discussions regarding Canadian control<sup>35</sup>, and I think it will emerge that there will be a marked improvement Canadian-wise in that respect. Endeavour is going to be made to establish a situation that the R.C.A.F. will have something more definite to say as to the employment of Canadians, so as to make sure that there can be no possibility of R.C.A.F. being detailed for more than their share of operational sorties, and that Canadian rules about commissioning, etc. are to prevail.

The Army position has been that we put our troops "in combination" with others, and the rule set out in the Visiting Forces Act about the Senior Officer taking command applies. Canada's ultimate rights and responsibilities are exercised however by (a) withdrawing from combination, or (b) direct reference by the Commander of the Canadian Forces to the Government in respect of any operation of which he does not approve. These are cumbersome procedures and are embarrassing to exercise, but they of course are incidents to Canada's autonomous status and her control over her own troops.

I and others have been thinking that it would be a very much better working arrangement if there could be established a procedure whereby Canada would be "in on" the planning at a high level. Then our Commander would know well ahead what is in mind as to the tactical disposition of our troops and would be prepared to be in a position to offer his opinion early and not be faced with a completed plan to which he had not been a party, and with the heavy responsibility of having to question, or in the ultimate analysis reject, that plan so far as it affects Canada. This would involve, (a) irritation and misunderstanding, (b) complete revamping of plans, or (c) the withdrawal of Canada's participation at a time, so late as perhaps to prejudice and possibly endanger the whole operation.

It may be said that the Canadian component is only a small part of the Force, or that if that right were granted to Canada other Dominions would claim the same right, but on the first point the Canadian component is just as important to Canada as the United States component is to the United States, and the latter are "in on" the plans from the very beginning, and Canada constitutionally is just as sovereign in respect to her own forces as is the United States. On the second point, as a matter of fact there are no other Dominions interested and that situation therefore does not arise.

You will understand that I am not talking about strategic direction of the war. I am talking about the tactical dispositions to carry out that strategy.

I know that McNaughton had Turner<sup>36</sup> at COSSAC,<sup>37</sup> but I cannot believe that he did anything more than simply carry back to McNaughton what was going on and I question whether his position there was regarded as one of right. It would rather seem to me he was simply being granted the courtesy of liaison.

I know that the Government feels strongly about this, and I think with you there it can be put on a sound and workable basis.

I know that General Montgomery in Italy gave special consideration to New Zealand. He treated General Freyberg<sup>38</sup> as a Corps Commander and Freyberg had direct access to Montgomery and didn't have to go through the Corps, even though Freyberg had what was in effect only a large division, not a corps.

I mention this to indicate that when the question is raised in the proper way, those in authority are ready to accede to produce a working arrangement.

The other point, and it has to do with the same thing, is the matter of appointments. I liked your para. 1 of your G.S.399.<sup>39</sup> It was not Montgomery's recommendation, or Dempsey's<sup>40</sup> recommendation. It was your recommendation, and the fact that it was in accordance with the views of Montgomery and Dempsey simply indicated that these appointments would be well received by those with whom we are working.

I think it is highly proper that you should and that we should consult Montgomery and Dempsey and Brooke, and the rest who have official positions in the Force in which our Army is to work, but in the last analysis the recommendation and the decision is a Canadian one, based on all the information we can get from those who are qualified to speak. I know that this is your view, but I underline it, as it supports I think the desirability of ensuring that autonomy farther by any connection with plans.

The criticism here will be that the Canadian Army reduced in England by the sending of the Corps to Italy, there will be less likelihood of our being able to maintain our position, or to put it the other way, more likelihood of our Allies, unconsciously perhaps, assuming that they have more control over, and more to say about, the Canadian component in the cross-Channel Force. We want to make it clear that our position in that respect has not changed in any way.

This is a matter for Massey as well as for you, but I am writing you because I have an opportunity to send it off tomorrow, so that you will be guided by it and do what is possible on the Service level to see that the arrangements carry out the principle.

1. In reply to your two letters of the 13th Feb[ruary]<sup>41</sup> delivered to me today by Lett.<sup>42</sup>

...

4. Thank you for your second letter on the constitutional issue. Frankly I do not believe it is an issue in the case of the Army. Both the War Office and Montgomery have told me specifically that they fully recognize the special position of the Canadians. I am confident that we are amply covered by the accepted right to withdraw from combination and the accepted right of appeal. In Crerar and Simonds we shall have two very strong characters and two field commanders in whose judgement I have the greatest confidence. Neither will commit their command to an operation unless the plan has a reasonable prospect of success with the resources available. In conversation with Simonds recently, he told me that he had objected strenuously to the original plan for the crossing of the straits of Messina. The plan was changed to accord with his proposals. The real solution to this problem is to get the right commanders. I consider that we now have them.

5. Re para[graph] five of your longer letter. There are two aspects of planning involved. The first concerns planning in the field after an operation has been launched. I think I have covered this in para[graph] four above. We must rely upon our own commanders. (Part Three follows.)

Commander, Fourth Infantry Brigade.

This message in three parts. Herewith Part Three and last part.

I cannot see any possibility of initiating in the field any such procedure as you suggest without the most unfortunate consequences. It would be a retrograde step just at the time when U.S. and British formations are operating under one another's commanders without any strings attached.

It would imply a lack of confidence which would be an unreality as far as the Canadian Army is concerned. The Army here has complete confidence in Montgomery's ability to plan and conduct a campaign successfully. Moreover, Montgomery will not play unless all his commanders have complete confidence in him. He would look upon the proposal you suggest as being expressive of a lack of confidence in himself. The result would be that either Montgomery or the Canadians would have to leave 21 Army Group. Surely the raising of an alleged constitutional issue which in reality is not an issue at all as far as the Army is concerned is not worth such a price. The second aspect concerns the initial stage of planning before the operation is launched. There is a great deal more time for planning in the initial stage and consequently there is ample opportunity to discuss the general and detailed plan on high level. The objections to your proposal also apply in similar degree to this stage of planning. In any case the general plan we are interested in has now been made and there will be no more such plans for some months to come, not in fact until Germany has been beaten.

I can assure you that I shall keep a very careful watch on constitutional relationship with the U.K. in so far as the Army is concerned. I do suggest however at a time such as the present when everybody in the British Army over here are putting everything they have got into preparations for the vital assault on the continent that we abstain from raising the constitutional issue in army relationships until there is cause to do so.

I maintain that such cause does not exist at the moment so far as the Army is concerned.

Ottawa, February 21, 1944

MOST IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. Officer only. For Stuart from Ralston. Your G.S. 518.

1. Thanks for your very full comments.

2. It would help greatly if we could know just what access we have and what consultation there is with us and what means are taken to keep us informed regarding tactical plans particularly in what you refer to as the second aspect which concerns the initial stage of planning before the operation is launched.

3. It was this to which I referred in my G.S. 69 and to which I noted your general reply in G.S. 410. In that cable, you mention that planning on high level would not begin for another six weeks. I assume this means tactical planning and my query is how far we will be in on that.

4. I note from your G.S. 518 that there is quote ample opportunity to discuss the general and detailed plan on a high level unquote. I would have thought that this opportunity was the consultation which I was reaching for in my letter of February thirteenth but you evidently think that it does not go as far as my proposal. What is the difference? Is it that the opportunity is not available as of right but rather by courtesy or are there other differences between what you indicate and what I suggested.

5. Like you, I am looking forward to the time when the Army Commander and Chief of Staff will be submitting to the Canadian Government reports regarding the feasibility of the operation proposed similar to McNaughton's report on Sicily.† It would be useful if we could know to what extent the Army Commander or the Chief of Staff has had an opportunity to consider and comment on the tactical plans which Canadians are expected to carry out before they are finalized so as to influence the tactical dispositions and the support and supply arrangements insofar as they affect Canadian participation and ensure reasonable prospects of success.

6. I am sure that I am the last one to raise an abstract question. The reason for it is the necessity for being in a position to assure Canadian homes that Canadian Staff and Commanders are assured of timely opportunity to get all the information they need so as to be in a position to exercise their judgment for the benefit of the Canadian troops for whom they are responsible to Canada.

7. You will find similar question discussed in extracts from memo by Crerar dated July 4, 1942† as appear in Stacey's report on JUBILEE Part I.<sup>43</sup>

8. Regarding the first aspect mentioned in your G.S. 518, namely planning in the field after the operation has been launched, I can quite see that the opportunity for consultation and discussion of the plans with those who are formulating them will on account of time and space be more limited, but the principle would be the same.

9. Regarding both the first and second aspects, I agree thoroughly that we have to and do rely on our commanders and on their judgment and efficiency. My query is what is the extent of the opportunity which these commanders have to get information and to bring that judgment and efficiency to bear on plans for the employment of the Canadian Army and on the execution of these plans.

MOST SECRET AND IMPORTANT. Ralston from Stuart. No circulation. Officer only. Your G.S. 2442.

1. I think perhaps we are finding it a bit difficult to understand one another because of our different conception of how planning is actually carried out. In respect to OVERLORD, the key or basic Army plan is prepared by Montgomery in close association with his opposite numbers in Air Force and Navy. Eisenhower coordinates the three service plans and approves them. They are finally approved by Combined Chiefs of Staff. Montgomery then sees his army commanders and indicates to each the task of 21 Army Group as a whole and the task of each Army. He indicates the formations and units and administrative establishments allotted to 21 Army Group and to each Army and the general support each will receive from the other two services. Each Army Commander then begins his own planning in conjunction with the commanders of the Air Force and Navy who are going to work with and support him during the operation. As a result of this tactical and administrative planning, each Army Commander makes a plan that in his opinion will work and will assure a successful accomplishment of the task assigned to his Army. In the process, the Army Commander and his planners on their respective levels will have constant contact with the Commander and staff of 21 Army Group. These contacts will result in many changes of major and minor degree which become apparent as detailed planning progresses. The Army Commander will be anxious to get his Corps and Division planners to work, therefore he will first complete his own outline or key plan and have it approved by 21 Army Group. Completion of this plan will enable him to outline tasks to Corps Commanders and so get all planners working as early as possible. I outline this procedure to you to show that planning on Army level presents both time and opportunity for careful study and for the request of such additional facilities or resources as in the opinion of the Army Commander are required for the successful accomplishment of his assigned task.

2. In the case of a field operation as opposed to an amphibious operation the procedure is similar but the time element differs. In the field, the operations are less complicated and therefore less time is required. You can be assured however with Montgomery in command, there will always be ample time for planning and adequate preparation. He fights his battles to win and he knows that he cannot win unless his battles are carefully planned and prepared down to the last detail.

3. Your paragraph two. I am in the picture in regard to 21 Army Group key plan as are my two principal staff officers at Army. A degree of administrative operational planning is now proceeding. Tactical operational planning cannot begin in the case of Canadian Army because no role allotted to it until plans of other Armies are complete. This will still give us ample time to complete all necessary planning. The situation we find ourselves in is such that tactical planning for the operation will be done by the man who will be in command of the operation namely Crerar. This I consider to be of paramount importance. What I have said above and in paragraph one answers your paragraph two.

4. Your paragraph three. I meant that Canadian Army planning would not begin for another six weeks. My paragraph one answers this question.

5. Your paragraph four. I think my paragraph one explains. My interpretation of your proposal was that you sought Canadian representation in the formulation of the original 21 Army Group plan. This we simply cannot expect either as a right or by courtesy. We have every right to expect however that we can have the plan altered as it affects Canadian Army if our detailed Army planning indicates sound reasons why it should be changed.

6. Your paragraph five. I think my paragraph one explains. The Canadian Army has been given a task and 21 Army Group will allot to it such additional formations, units and establishments as in their view after a general rather than a detailed examination will be required to achieve success. The purpose of our own Army planning is to provide the detailed examination and to recommend such changes as appear necessary resulting from this detailed examination. I can assure you that in due course the Army Commander will transmit his views to the Canadian Government as to the feasibility or otherwise of the part to be played by Canadian troops in the forthcoming operation.

7. Your paragraph six. You need have no worries regarding the point raised in this paragraph in respect to the forthcoming operation. I also refer you to my paragraph two.

8. Your paragraph eight. I agree and also refer you to my paragraph two.

9. Your paragraph nine. I think I have already answered this.

Ottawa, March 1, 1944

1. In view of the early approach of major operations in which the Canadian Army will take part, you may wish to consider with the Defence Ministers and with War Committee some aspects of the association of the Canadian armed forces with those of our Allies, which are not as clear-cut or well defined as they might be. I think something could be done to clarify the formal character of the relationship of the Canadian armed forces to our Allies, without limiting or impairing the effectiveness of our military contribution to the winning of the war.

2. There are two distinct, though related, aspects of this relationship which might be looked at separately. One is the problem of command. The fact that the Canadian Army is one of a number of armies making up a United Kingdom Army Group under the command of a General designated by the United Kingdom Government gives the United Kingdom High Command a special and legitimate interest in the fitness of the Canadian Army Commander. It was clearly necessary for the Minister to consult the General, who had been in command of the United Kingdom Army Group of which the Canadian Army formed part, as well as the Chief of the Imperial General Staff about the effectiveness of the Commander of the Canadian Army and about the suitability of possible successors. It is difficult, however, to define the scope of such consultations or to determine how decisions should be arrived at when there is difference of opinion between the competent United Kingdom authorities and the Minister's own military advisers. It might happen that the Commander of the Canadian Army had the full confidence of the Canadian Government, while he did not have the similar confidence of the military authorities with whom he would be associated in operations. Such a situation could probably only be settled by inter-governmental consultation and not within the framework of a military relationship in which the Commander of the Canadian Army was technically subordinate to the Commander of the United Kingdom Army Group and to the Chief of the Imperial General Staff. The position disclosed by General McNaughton's retirement was simpler because the Minister's Canadian advisers and the United Kingdom authorities whom he consulted were of one mind on the question. The necessary action was taken by the Canadian authorities on their own responsibility, but it originated in views expressed by the United Kingdom military authorities, and may leave the impression in some minds that the selection of the Commander of the Canadian Army is subject to the approval or veto of the United Kingdom War Office.

3. The contrast between the steps leading up to General McNaughton's retirement and those that led to the appointment of General Montgomery is instructive. In the first case, there was the fullest and most receptive consultation of competent United Kingdom opinion by the responsible Canadian authorities. In the second case, which involved the choice of the Commander of the group of armies of which the Canadian Army is to form part, there was, so far as I know, no consultation of the Canadian Government to ascertain whether or not the proposed Commander would be acceptable to it. When it came to choosing the Supreme Allied Commander for the Northwest European theatre and the officers under him who were to direct the land, air and naval operations in which the Canadian forces were to participate, it does not appear to have occurred to Churchill or Roosevelt that this country might have expected to be consulted about the constitution of the command under which its troops were to serve. In fact, as far as our records show, Canada was not only not consulted in any way about the selection and organization of the Invasion Command, but has not yet been officially advised, apart from press announcements, of the appointments of the officers under whom our troops will operate. If my memory is correct, the designation of the Supreme Allied Command in the Southwest Pacific was formally agreed between the Governments of the United States, Australia and New Zealand, and the forces of the latter countries were placed under General MacArthur's command by a formal directive of their Governments.

4. What we must try to find is some formula of consultation in respect of command and the planning of operations which takes into account the dual character and role of the Canadian Army, i.e., its position for operational purposes as one of the constituent parts of a United Kingdom Army Group and the fact that it is at the same time the Canadian Army and not, for all purposes, identical and interchangeable with other British Armies with which it may be put into combination. It is true that in putting the Canadian Army into combination with the United Kingdom forces the Canadian Government reserves the right to withdraw it from combination. This right, however important in the last analysis, is a very difficult and dangerous power to use to control the working relationship of the Canadian Army with the other armies by whose side it must fight. The ultimate sanction of "withdrawal" seems to the layman to be a very rigid and legalistic instrument of control which does not take into account the political factors which must affect this relationship. Instead of relying, for the final protection of Canadian interests, on the right of withdrawal, which is something like the right to make a separate peace, it might be better to establish definite areas within which decisions should be taken in consultation between the United Kingdom and Canadian authorities, just as there are wide and well defined areas in the larger conduct of the war in which decisions can only be taken after consultation between the United Kingdom and United States military authorities.

5. One of these areas might include the selection of senior commanding officers, i.e., our obligation to consult the United Kingdom military authorities before making changes in the higher command of the Canadian Army could be matched by a similar obligation on their part to consult us about the nomination of commanders under whose direction the Canadian Army would serve. To the extent that Canadian forces were serving under orders of United States Commanders the same considerations would argue mutatis mutandis, for a similar measure of consultation with the United States military authorities.

6. Underlying these questions is, of course, the old question of the relationship of Canada to the supreme direction of the war. You have frequently, in public and private, recognized the special role which Churchill and Roosevelt must fill. I do not think there is any disposition in any quarter to question the position they have taken in the supreme direction of the western war. The Combined organizations which they have created for the conduct of the war are, in essence, an emanation of their joint, personal direction of the war. We have, however, found it necessary and desirable to define the relationship of Canada to these Combined agencies operating in the economic field, e.g., the Combined Food Board, the Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Production and Resources Board. We have never, however, worked out any formal relationship to the Combined organization on the strategic side. We tackled one phase of this problem, that relating to the composition and powers of the Combined Munitions Assignment Board, some eighteen months ago, and came within range of reaching what might have been a satisfactory relationship to it. Differences of views between our own Ministers prevented this relationship from ever being formalized. We have, however, a certain contact with the Combined Chiefs of Staff Committee in Washington through the presence there of our Joint Staff Mission, which may be regarded as "accredited", in a more or less diplomatic sense, to the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

7. To straighten out this situation you might consider formally delegating to the Combined Chiefs of Staff those duties and powers in respect of Canadian forces which they have, in fact, been exercising without ever having received any formal assignment of these duties and powers from the Government of Canada. Such a delegation would, I think, regularize and strengthen the position of our Joint Staff Mission in Washington and prepare the way for the establishment of a similar Joint Staff Mission in the United Kingdom which might be "accredited" to the Combined Allied Command, of which General Eisenhower is head. In this way, it might be possible to work out a feasible method of associating Canada with the planning and direction of operations in the success of which this country is vitally concerned and in which Canadian armed forces will play a not inconsiderable part. Use of a Joint Staff Mission for purposes of top level liaison would avoid some of the practical difficulties referred to above in speaking of the anomalous position of the Canadian Army and make unnecessary the sort of irregular personal liaison between the Commander of the Canadian Army and Cossac, which General McNaughton attempted to establish. The fact that the three former Chiefs of Staff of the Canadian Services are now in the United Kingdom, gives us an opportunity of setting up a strong Joint Staff Mission, dissociated from the operational control of the Canadian formations fighting in combination with United Kingdom forces, and at the same time capable of ensuring suitable Canadian association at a high level with the strategic conduct of the invasion operations.

FORMAL RELATIONSHIP OF CANADIAN FORCES TO FORCES
OF OTHER UNITED NATIONS; COMMAND; PLANNING

15. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the opinion that the formal relationship of Canadian forces overseas to those of other United Nations should be reviewed at this time with particular reference to impending large scale operations in which the Canadians would participate in large numbers. In this connection, the Minister of National Defence had shown him messages recently exchanged with the acting General Officer Commanding in Chief, First Canadian Army, with respect to Canadian participation in the preparation of strategic and tactical planning.

Two principal questions were involved: that of consultation and concurrence in the appointment of the high command, and that of Canadian participation in the preparation of plans.

With regard to command, it would be recalled that Australia and New Zealand had been consulted and had actually participated in the designation of General MacArthur as Supreme Allied Commander in the Southwest Pacific. Their forces had been placed under General MacArthur's command by formal directives of the two governments. On the other hand, the Canadian government had not even been informed officially of the appointment of the Allied Commanders in European theatres, although substantial Canadian forces were serving under them. This situation should be rectified by some formal action on the part of the Canadian government.

As to the planning of operations in which Canadian forces were to be engaged, it was not clear to what extent Canadian Commanders participated or had the opportunity of adequate consultation. In Britain, the Canadian Army, for operational purposes, formed part of a U.K. Army Group; at the same time it was not in the same position as other British Armies. The Canadian Government retained the right of withdrawal from the "combination", but this was a right which could only be exercised in extreme circumstances for the protection of Canadian interests. Would it not be possible to make some formal provision for regular consultation with Canadian military authorities in relation to strategic planning wherever substantial Canadian forces were to be employed?

In order to meet these important needs and to provide for improved and continuous consultation between Canadian military authorities and the United Nations High Command, advantage might be taken of the presence in the United Kingdom of the three former Chiefs of Staff, who might be constituted a Canadian Joint Staff similar in function to the Canadian Joint Staff, Washington.

16. THE SECRETARY pointed out that this same problem had been before the War Committee almost a year ago. At the meeting of March 23rd, 1943, consideration had been given to a recommendation of General McNaughton that he be authorized to explore the establishment of a more formal link with the U.K. Chiefs of Staff in order that, as Commander of the Canadian Army, he could be assured of knowing, in advance, of plans under consideration affecting Canadian forces.

At that time, the Minister of National Defence, in agreeing with the Army Commander, had expressed the opinion that the Canadian Command should also have the right of initiating proposals with the U.K. Chiefs of Staff, and that the Canadian government should not confine their function to the mere receipt and approval of reports affecting the Canadian Army.

The War Committee had then agreed that General McNaughton should proceed in the manner recommended, and the principles and procedure to govern in connection with plans for the employment of the Canadian Army had been approved. However, no report had been received from General McNaughton as to the implementing of the decision which had been taken.

17. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR observed that, in European operations, the R.C.A.F. were under the strategic direction and tactical command of the R.A.F. There existed a limited practice of consultation with the Canadian government with regard to the movement of R.C.A.F. squadrons to theatres outside of the United Kingdom.

The problems raised by the Prime Minister were particularly important in relation to Canadian participation in the war against Japan. In this connection, the Air Officer Commanding, R.C.A.F. Overseas, had received an enquiry from the U.K. Air Ministry as to the number of squadrons to be provided by Canada.

The suggestion to establish a Canadian Joint Staff in London, who could be consulted on such matters and advise the government, was worthy of exploration.

18. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES agreed that the machinery for consultation with the High Command upon plans affecting Canadian forces should be improved. This was important in planning the parts to be played by the three Services, in future operations.

19. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE observed that the right of the government to appoint the commander of the Canadian Army was clearly established;<sup>44</sup> furthermore, the government had been fully consulted and had

The following note was in the original:

In this connection, the Minister stated that, as it appeared that the First Canadian Army might contain British formations, he considered it desirable to avoid any implication that the appointment of the commanding officer could be made otherwise than by the Canadian government; in view of the British component, it seemed to him only proper, however, that the appointment should be made after consultation with the United Kingdom. Accordingly, he had suggested the insertion of a clause, in correspondence with the War Office, to the effect that the Commander of the First Canadian Army should be appointed by the Canadian government, after consultation with the U.K. government.

agreed as to the employment of the First Canadian Army in the 21st British Army Group.

With regard to Canadian participation in planning, General Stuart had reported as follows: the original plan for the employment of the Army Group was formulated by the Group Commander, General Montgomery, co-ordinated with plans for the employment of the Air Force and the Navy by the Allied Commander in Chief, and finally approved by the Combined Chiefs of Staff. Canadian Army authorities could not expect to participate in the formulation of these plans, either by right or by courtesy. Once the general scheme had been approved, however, plans for carrying out the specific role of the Canadian Army would be worked out by the Canadian Army Commander and his Staff, who would consult with the Group Commander and who could expect to have the plan altered as it affected the Canadian Army, if they adduced sound reasons for so doing.

(Telegram No. G.S.-588, Minister of National Defence from G.O.C. in Chief, First Canadian Army, Feb. 24, 1944).

20. MR. RALSTON pointed out that the position of Canadian overseas forces rested ultimately upon the Canadian Commander's established right of direct appeal to the Canadian government as to the employment of Canadian forces, and the right of the government to withdraw Canadian forces from operations.

21. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary, in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff, examine the questions raised by the Prime Minister regarding the relationship of Canadian forces to those of other United Nations and prepare a report and recommendation for consideration, for the establishment of improved machinery for consultation and participation in matters of command and planning, where Canadian forces are employed.

FORMAL RELATIONSHIP OF CANADIAN FORCES TO THOSE OF OTHER UNITED NATIONS; COMMAND; PLANNING

10. The Secretary, referring to the discussion at the meeting of March 1st, submitted a draft message prepared by the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and himself, in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff, and proposed for simultaneous despatch to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States.

The draft message was to the following effect:

It was the understanding of the Canadian government that, in setting up the Allied Supreme Commands, Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt had been acting on behalf of those United Nations whose forces were involved. The Canadian government felt that, so far as Canadian forces were affected, formal approval should now be transmitted for the establishment of the Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force and the corresponding headquarters in the Mediterranean. Accordingly, it was requested that the Commanders-in-Chief be informed that authority over Canadian forces under their command derived from the government of Canada.

The Canadian government also felt that it should be made clear that General Wilson and General Eisenhower were the Commanders-in-Chief of the participating forces of the United Nations. This would increase their effectiveness to a substantial degree.

It was desirable that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Canadian government be fully informed in respect of arrangements involving participation of substantial Canadian forces. Accordingly, the government had in mind the establishment of a Joint Staff Mission in London, to act as an appropriate channel of communication between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands in Britain and in the Mediterranean.

It was also desirable to arrange for the employment, to an increasing degree, of trained and experienced Canadian officers in the combined organizations.

11. MR. HEENEY also submitted an additional message for despatch to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. This draft had also been prepared by Mr. Robertson and himself, in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff.

The second message was to the following effect:

Arrangements between the governments of Canada and the United Kingdom regarding command had been based upon the assumption that the armed forces of the two countries would work together in major military formations and that Canadian forces would normally be operating in combination under U.K. commanders.

The special position of U.K. forces in Canada in relation to Canadian forces had been protected by special arrangements worked out by the Canadian government. No similar arrangements existed in the United Kingdom whereby the special position of the Canadian forces could be taken into account, apart from the power to withdraw from combination and the right of Canadian military commanders of direct reference to the Canadian government. These, however, were not powers to be exercised lightly.

Accordingly, it was desired that the Canadian Staff Mission to be established in Britain should form a link between Canadian authorities and the U.K. Chiefs of Staff so as to ensure the receiving, in advance, of information as to plans involving the use of Canadian forces.

(Draft additional message to U.K. Prime Minister, March 8, 1944).†

12. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after considerable discussion and revision of the draft messages submitted, agreed:

(a) that the draft message to the U.K. Prime Minister and the President of the United States be approved as revised, for simultaneous despatch, and that the members designate of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission be informed by their respective Ministers of the action taken;

(b) that the question of providing Canadian staff personnel to Supreme Allied Commands (referred to in paragraph 6 of the above draft message) be taken up independently at a later date; and

(c) that the draft additional message to the U.K. Prime Minister be approved for despatch as revised.

REPORT OF MEETING HELD ON WEDNESDAY, MARCH 8TH, FOR PRELIMINARY DISCUSSION ON FORMAL RELATIONSHIP OF CANADIAN FORCES TO THOSE OF OTHER UNITED NATIONS; COMMAND; PLANNING

1. There were present:

Mr. N. A. Robertson (Chairman)—Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
Mr. A. D. P. Heeny—Secretary, Cabinet War Committee
Mr. H. H. Wrong—Assistant Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
Air Marshall Leckie—Chief of the Air Staff
Rear Admiral Jones—Chief of the Naval Staff
Major-General Murchie—Vice-Chief of the General Staff
Lieut.-Colonel E. W. T. Gill (Secretary)—Secretary, Chiefs of Staff Committee

2. Mr. Heeny read extracts from the minutes of the Cabinet War Committee meeting in which the concern of that Committee was expressed on the following matters,

(a) Canada had not been consulted with respect to the High Command in Operational Theatres where Canadian Forces were employed.

(b) No channel at present existed through which the Canadian Government could be fully informed with regard to planning and arrangements which involve the participation of substantial Canadian Forces.

3. Mr. Heeny stated that the purpose of the meeting was to examine the proposals contained in two draft messages† which had been prepared on instructions of Cabinet War Committee to record the views of the Canadian Government with respect to the above situation.

4. The first of these messages, intended for dispatch to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and the President of the United States, approved on behalf of the Canadian Government, the appointment of the present Commanders-in-Chief and suggested the establishment of a Joint Staff

Mission in London to act as the appropriate channel of communication between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands which have been set up in England and the Mediterranean area. It also proposed the employment of Canadian Staff Officers on the Combined Staffs.

5. The second message, which was supplementary to the above, was intended for dispatch to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom and this dealt with those aspects of the problem which concern only United Kingdom and Canada. This message proposed that the Joint Staff Mission should act as a link between Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the British Chiefs of Staff and receive, in advance, information on plans involving the use of substantial Canadian forces.

6. Mr. Robertson stated that it was recognized these proposals were being put forward at a late hour but that it was hoped that they would bring results in connection with the planning for the occupation of Europe and the war against Japan. It was stated further that it was not the intention that they would in any way affect the existing arrangements with respect to Canadian Forces being employed in combination with British Forces under the Visiting Forces Act.

7. Discussion took place on the implications of the proposals and the Chiefs of Staff raised certain questions on the practicability of the plans. The major points were,

(a) Our right to ask British Chiefs of Staff to disclose plans in advance unless there were advantages in [not?] so doing.

(b) Whether or not better results might be achieved through seeking Canadian representation on the Combined Chiefs of Staff, Washington.

(c) The working from a practical standpoint of the proposed Joint Staff Mission, London.

(d) The wisdom of proposing the employment of Canadian Officers on the Combined Staffs.

8. Following discussion, the messages were examined in detail and certain changes agreed upon prior to their submission for Cabinet War Committee approval.

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for your Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: The Canadian Government has noted the arrangements which have been made by you and President Roosevelt for the establishment in the United Kingdom of a Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force, in order to exercise command over the forces organized for the liberation of the allied countries in Europe and the assault upon Germany. In this matter it is our understanding that you have been acting on behalf of the United Nations whose forces will be taking part in these operations which involve the Armed Forces of Canada as well as of the other countries concerned.

2. The conduct of operations in Western Europe and in the Mediterranean has been given unified strategic direction, by the President and yourself. Now that further substantial Canadian forces overseas are likely soon to be involved in active operations against the enemy it seems to us necessary to place on record in a formal way, the authority which must emanate from the Canadian Government respecting the participation on a large scale of Canadian Armed Forces under the Supreme Allied Commanders in the various theatres. I should be grateful, therefore, if the Commanders in Chief could be informed that they may be regarded as deriving authority, in so far as Canadian Forces (Navy, Army and Air) under their command are concerned, from the Government of Canada.

3. The establishment of the Supreme Allied Commands brings out the need for closer relationship between the Canadian staffs and the commands as set up. The Government of Canada has in mind the establishment of a Joint Staff Mission in London, which will act as the appropriate channel of communication between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands which have been set up in England and in the Mediterranean. It is contemplated that the Mission will consist of a senior officer from each of the three Services. It is clearly desirable that the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Canadian Government should be fully informed with regard to arrangements which involve participation of substantial Canadian Forces. I should be grateful, therefore, if appropriate directions could be issued in order that the necessary relationship may be established with the Canadian Mission.

4. The Canadian Government is of the opinion that it would be desirable that appropriate announcements should be made so as to make it clear that General Wilson and General Eisenhower are the Commanders-in-Chief of the participating forces of the United Nations. We believe that wherever these forces may strike, their effectiveness will be increased to a substantial degree if the command is supported by the authority of the countries to be liberated, whether they be Norway, Holland, France, or Belgium, or countries in the Mediterranean area.

5. I am sending an identical message to President Roosevelt.† Ends.

IMPORTANT. MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for your Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: In my communication with regard to the relationship between Canada and the Allied Supreme Command, which

I have sent to you and to the President of the United States of America, I have dealt with those aspects of the problem which are common to the United Kingdom and to the United States of America.

2. There is, however, one part of the question which concerns more particularly the Governments of the United Kingdom and of Canada.

3. You are familiar with the arrangements between the Canadian Government and the Government of the United Kingdom relating to the question of command. We have based our arrangements throughout the war, both in the United Kingdom and in Canada, upon the assumption that it was desirable to place the forces in combination with one another and to have the armed forces of the two countries work together in major military formations.

4. In accordance with these arrangements, Canadian armed forces in the coming operations will normally be operating in combination with larger United Kingdom formations. The relationship arising out of serving together and in combination under the Visiting Forces Acts is one which (with the exceptions mentioned in paragraph 6) places the forces in much the same position as if the combined force had been raised and organized by the one country.

5. You are, of course, familiar with the arrangements under the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan whereby the special position of United Kingdom forces in Canada in relation to Canadian forces has been protected. Under these arrangements, which have worked out so satisfactorily over the past four years, the United Kingdom Government and in fact the Governments of Australia and New Zealand participate substantially in the planning and organization of the combined forces.

6. In the United Kingdom there are no arrangements of a similar character whereby the special position of the Canadian forces can be taken into account. There is, of course, the right of direct reference by the Canadian commander to his own Government and the power to withdraw from combination (but I am sure that you would expect that that power would not lightly be exercised).

7. I think, therefore, that it is essential that we should constitute the Canadian Staff Mission in the United Kingdom as a link between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff in London, in the same way as we are proposing to set it up as a link between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Headquarters Allied Expeditionary Force. In this manner our Canadian Staff Mission would have access to the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff and would be assured of receiving, in advance, information on proposals and plans involving the use of Canadian forces, not only in current European and Mediterranean operations, but also in such matters as the post-war occupation of the Continent and the war against Japan. TELEGRAM 769

MOST SECRET AND PERSONAL. Robertson and Heeny have shown me copies of the Canadian telegrams Nos. 34 and 35 of today's date containing messages from Prime Minister to Prime Minister with amongst other things, proposal to set up a Canadian Staff Mission in the U.K.

2. I understand that this Mission would consist of Lieutenant-General Stewart, Air Marshal Breadner and Vice-Admiral Nelles, all of whom have of course been the Chiefs of their respective service staffs in Ottawa.

3. Robertson and Heeny were anxious to assure me, on behalf of the Canadian Government, that this proposal is made in the most helpful spirit. The Government here realise that the existence of such a Mission could add to the complications which already face the Supreme Allied Commands and our U.K. Chiefs of Staff Committee in London. They are anxious that it should not do this, and believe that the excellent personal relations which the three officers mentioned above have established with the authorities in London will avoid any such result. The three officers will of course wish to be truly cooperative and to cause no difficulties.

4. The Canadian Government feel that the move is necessary primarily for the following reason. There would be criticism in Parliament and elsewhere here if the Canadian Government appeared to have abdicated all responsibility for the fortunes of the Canadian soldiers, sailors and airmen who are to take part in impending military operations. Moreover, if the Canadian forces were to be employed in a manner which seemed wrong to any important section of opinion here, the blame would be thrown on U.K. and other authorities, if the Canadian Government had not even any theoretical responsibility. The proposal of the Canadian Staff Mission now made provides that the Canadian Government will share responsibility for whatever may happen to Canadian armed forces. They are prepared to shoulder that responsibility, and feel that it will be helpful to U.K. authorities and others if they do so.

In fact, the numbers were 34 and 35. See the two preceding documents.

5. Canadian Government see other advantages in the proposal, but its main purpose is that stated above.

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. For immediate action. Following for Robertson from Pearson, Begins: The following message has just been received from the White House, Begins:

My dear Ambassador, upon receipt of your communication dated March 13, 1944,† and transmitting a letter from the Prime Minister of Canada in regard to the command of Canadian troops with the Allied Forces overseas,<sup>46</sup> I referred the questions therein contained to the Joint Chiefs of Staff.

The Joint Chiefs of Staff this date have given me the following report with which I am in agreement:

We have examined the message addressed to you on March 10, 1944, by the Canadian Prime Minister, in which he informed you of his Government's consideration of the establishment of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London. In the same message he proposed that appropriate formal announcements be made to clarify the command authority exercised by Generals Eisenhower and Wilson over the participating forces of the United Nations.

Although the establishment of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London is a question for decision by the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada, military implications involved make it necessary that, should such a Mission be established, the appropriate channel of communications between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands must be through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not directly through the Mission, to the Supreme Commands, as proposed by the Canadian Prime Minister.

See Document 233.

We feel that there is no need from the military standpoint, to make any announcement clarifying command authority since the chain of military command is well established. There is no objection, however, to such an announcement if other than military considerations warrant it. An announcement should make clear that the Supreme Commanders derive their authority from the Governments concerned through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not directly from the Governments, as suggested in the letter from the Canadian Prime Minister. We recommend that if any announcement is made, it be general in scope and cover all participating nations. Signed Franklin D. Roosevelt. Ends.

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins:

Many thanks for your telegrams Nos. 34 and 35 of the 10th March. I have now examined these with the Chiefs of Staff and I have seen a copy of the reply which President Roosevelt has sent you. We welcome the proposal for the establishment of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London to act as a link with the British Chiefs of Staff and with the Supreme Allied Commanders. Our Chiefs of Staff will work out detailed arrangements for the necessary liaison between themselves and the Canadian Joint Staff Mission as soon as we hear that it has been appointed. President Roosevelt has explained that the appropriate channels of communications between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands must be through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not directly through your Joint Staff Mission. You will, I think, understand that it is essential not to disturb the well-established chain of command whereby the Supreme Commanders receive their instructions on all subjects from the Combined Chiefs of Staff. There will, of course, be no objection to your Joint Staff Mission having contact on day-to-day liaison matters with the Supreme Commands but all matters of high policy can only be dealt with through the Combined Chiefs of Staff. In your telegram No. 34 you expressed the opinion that it would be desirable that appropriate announcements should be made to make clear that General Wilson and General Eisenhower are Commanders-in-Chief of the participating forces of the United Nations. I agree with President Roosevelt that on military grounds there is no call for such an announcement. I am inclined to doubt its desirability on other grounds. The Supreme Command in the Mediterranean has been in existence for 18 months and has been directing the forces of many nations which have been placed at its disposal under arrangements satisfactory to all. Any general announcement at the present time might give rise to misunderstandings and cause difficulties with the many participants in the European campaigns. I suggest therefore that if you desire to announce the authority of General Eisenhower over the Canadian Forces under his command that you should do so on behalf of the Canadian Government alone rather than that we should seek to get agreement from all concerned for a general announcement. Ends.

RELATIONSHIP OF CANADIAN FORCES TO SUPREME ALLIED COMMAND; CANADIAN JOINT STAFF, LONDON

11. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of April 12th,† read a telegram from the U.K. Prime Minister.

Mr. Churchill welcomed the proposal to establish a Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London. He pointed out that while matters of high policy could only be dealt with through the Combined Chiefs of Staff, a Canadian Mission could have direct contact with the Supreme Commands on day-to-day liaison matters. He questioned the desirability of a general announcement to clarify the relationship of the Commanders-in-Chief to the forces of United Nations serving under them, and suggested that if it were desired that any announcement be made it should be on behalf of the Canadian government alone.

(Telegram No. 51, Dominions Office to External Affairs, April 18, 1944).

12. MR. HEENEY pointed out that Mr. Churchill's communication differed from the reply received from President Roosevelt in two respects. The President had stated that the only channel of communication with the Supreme Commands must be through the Combined Chiefs of Staff. He had also suggested that any statement regarding the authority of the Commanders-in-Chief should be general in scope and cover all participating nations.

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the communication received from Mr. Churchill and approved constitution forthwith of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London, to consist of Vice-Admiral Nelles, Air Marshal Breadner and Lieut-Gen. Stuart; precise definition of the functions of the Mission and their relationship to the Supreme Command and to the U.K. Chiefs of Staff to be the subject of further consideration along with the nature of the replies to be sent to Mr. Churchill and the President.

27. THE SECRETARY referred to discussion at the meeting of April 19th and submitted a draft message to the U.K. Prime Minister, copies of which had previously been circulated to the Ministers of National Defence and the Chiefs of Staff.

It was suggested that if it were decided to reply to Mr. Churchill along the lines indicated in the draft, it should be communicated to Mr. Churchill by the Prime Minister in London.<sup>47</sup> A similar message would then be sent to President Roosevelt. Subsequently, draft instructions to the Mission could be prepared for submission to the War Committee.

The draft submitted proposed abandonment of the proposal to make any announcement as to the relationship of the Supreme Commanders to the forces of Canada and other United Nations. It contained a formal recognition of the fact that General Eisenhower and General Wilson exercised Command over Canadian forces in their respective areas. It went on to describe the position of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London.

28. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE questioned the wording of paragraph 4, expressing the opinion that particular reference should be made therein to the right of the Canadian Commander to withdrawal from combination and the right of direct reference to the Canadian government, unless these rights were provided for specifically in the Visiting Forces Acts.

His principal concern in this matter was to see to it that Canadian Commanders were in a position to be informed of plans involving Canadian participation in sufficient time to enable them to exercise these fundamental rights without prejudicing the success of operations.

29. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that a communication in the general sense of the draft submitted be communicated to the Prime Minister for transmission to Mr. Churchill, the draft to be revised,

Ottawa, May 5, 1944

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. Following for Prime Minister from Heeney and Wrong. Reference our immediately preceding telegram,† following is text of draft message to Mr. Churchill, Begins:

1. My colleagues of the War Committee of the Cabinet have given further consideration to the questions raised in my telegram to you, No. 34 of March 10th, in the light of the reply contained in your telegram No. 51 of April 18th, and the message on the same subject received from President Roosevelt.<sup>48</sup>

2. In the circumstances, we have come to the conclusion that no public announcement should be made at this time to the effect that General Wilson and General Eisenhower exercise command over the Canadian Armed Forces within their respective areas. For the same reasons we are not inclined to press our proposal that any announcement should be made that they exercise command on behalf of all participating United Nations. At some later stage we may wish to revive one or other of these proposals.

3. Nevertheless, as indicated in paragraph 3 of my telegram No. 34 of March 10th, we think it desirable that the Allied Commanders in Chief in Western Europe and the Mediterranean should be formally notified that they exercise command over the Canadian Armed Forces in these theatres with the full authority of the Canadian government. I am informing President Roosevelt to like effect.

4. This expression on our part with regard to command must, of course, be subject to the provisions of the Visiting Forces Acts which govern in detail the relationship between the Forces of our two countries.

5. My colleagues and I have been glad to note that you welcome the establishment in London of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission to act as a link with the British Chiefs of Staff and with the Supreme Allied Commanders.

6. We have already taken steps to establish the Mission in the United Kingdom and it has been agreed that, at the outset, it will consist of Vice-

Admiral Percy Nelles, Head of the Canadian Naval Mission and Senior Canadian Flag Officer Overseas, Air Marshal L. S. Breadner, Air Officer Commanding-in-Chief, R.C.A.F. Overseas, and Lieutenant-General Kenneth Stuart, Chief of Staff, Canadian Military Headquarters, London.

7. We have noted that President Roosevelt regards it as necessary that the appropriate channel of communications between the Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands must be through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not directly through the Canadian Mission to the Supreme Commands. We also note that, while you agree that it is essential not to disturb the well established chain of command whereby the Supreme Commanders receive their instructions from the Combined Chiefs of Staff, you see no objection to our Joint Staff Mission having contact on day to day liaison matters with the Supreme Commands, matters of high policy being dealt with through the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

8. While we have no desire to upset the existing arrangements, you are doubtless aware that the relationship of the Canadian government and Armed Forces to the Combined Chiefs of Staff has never been defined with any degree of precision and indeed the Canadian Government has never been requested to recognize the Combined Chiefs of Staff as the source of authority of the Supreme Allied Commanders.

9. Nevertheless, we trust that the establishment of the Mission will result in effective collaboration in all matters affecting the dispositions and use of Canadian Forces. In this belief we have gone forward with the establishment of the Mission.

10. It is assumed that matters of high policy will continue to be dealt with between governments through whatever channels are most appropriate to the questions in hand, while our Staff Missions in London and Washington will provide ready and constant means of consultation and communication on military matters.

1. At this week's meeting, the War Committee considered the form of communication appropriate to be sent to Mr. Churchill in reply to his telegram to you No. 51 of April 18th, on the questions of the relationship of Canadian forces to the Supreme Allied Commands and the establishment in London of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission.

2. The War Committee instructed us to revise the draft in consultation with the Chiefs of Staff and our immediately following telegram contains the text as so revised.

3. It was understood that, if you approved a message along the lines of the revised draft, it might be communicated at once to Mr. Churchill in a letter over your signature. If this were done, it was intended that a similar communication with appropriate changes should be prepared for you to despatch to President Roosevelt. Following this, it is proposed to prepare instructions for the London Mission.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL

London, May 10, 1944

Dear Norman [Robertson],

I have read the draft cable<sup>50</sup> you gave me and I have the following comments. I thought at first that para 7 was in conflict with Crerar's views, with which I agree, as expressed to us recently at Army Headquarters. In re-reading this paragraph I find that my first impression was wrong. This paragraph is really nothing more than a paraphrase of the substance of certain paragraphs in the cables from Roosevelt and Churchill to our P.M.

2. I would like to confirm what I said in your room at the hotel. I suggest that no further wires be sent until the contemplated operation on the continent has been launched. Our insistence in following up this matter at this time would not be fully understood and our views would not get the sympathetic consideration they deserve. There is no reason, however, why we should not go ahead with all preparations and actually set up our Canadian Joint Staff Mission here.

3. As I told you, I am not too happy about the second task of the Joint Staff Mission. I refer to its contact with the Supreme Allied Commanders. We can fulfil a really useful function in our relations with the British Chiefs of Staff. On the other hand I am afraid that our relations with the Supreme Commanders will not be productive of any great results. In the case of the Army, as you know from our conversation with Crerar, I am placed in a rather difficult position in respect to my conversations with the Supreme Commanders. I will have to be very careful not to get on to Harry's "pitch." I do not think it is possible to keep off entirely but I shall of course, keep him in the picture in respect to any conversations I may have.

4. In view of Mr. Roosevelt's cable<sup>51</sup> it is for consideration whether the second function of the Joint Staff Mission in London, namely contact with the Supreme Commanders, might not be eliminated. What is really required is contact on the policy and strategy side with the British Chiefs of Staff in London and with the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington. The Joint Staff Mission in London has been made responsible for the former. Why could not our Joint Staff Mission in Washington look after the latter more specifically than it does at present.

5. Paras 2 and 3 of the draft, when read in conjunction with Mr. Roosevelt's cable, bring another interesting point to light. Are we right in implying that the two Supreme Commanders derive their right to command Canadian troops from the Canadian Government? The U.S. imply that the Supreme Comdrs derive that right from the Combined Chiefs of Staff and that this body derive the right from the Canadian Government. Is there not something to be said in support of this view? If so should not para 3 of draft be amended accordingly?

6. I would be interested in seeing proposed draft in reply to Roosevelt's cable.

Your sincerely,

K. STUART
Lieutenant-General

We have noted that the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff regard it as necessary that the appropriate channel of communications between Canadian Chiefs of Staff and the Supreme Commands must be through the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not directly through the Canadian Mission to the Supreme Commands. We have no desire to disturb, in any way, the established chain of command whereby the Supreme Commanders receive their instructions from the Combined Chiefs of Staff. At the same time there can, we believe, be no objection to the Canadian Mission having regular contact on liaison matters with the Supreme Commands, so long as matters of high policy are dealt with through our contacts with the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington. I may say that our view, in this respect, is shared by the United Kingdom government.

6. We note that your Joint Chiefs of Staff regard the Supreme Commanders as deriving their authority from the "governments concerned" through the Combined Chiefs of Staff, and not directly from the governments.

I feel bound to point out that, while we have recognized that the higher direction of the war should be exercised by the Combined Chiefs of Staff, under Mr. Churchill and yourself, the relationship of the Canadian government and armed forces, to the Combined Chiefs of Staff, has never been defined with any degree of precision. Nor, specifically, has the Canadian government ever been requested to recognize the Combined Chiefs of Staff as the source of authority of the Supreme Allied Commanders.

In drawing attention to this state of affairs, which is somewhat unsatisfactory from the Canadian point of view, I need hardly say that we have no desire to upset existing arrangements, particularly at this critical time.

“I have noted your memorandum of 16 June<sup>53</sup> relative to the relationship of the Canadian forces to the Supreme Allied Commanders and the establishment in London of a Canadian Joint Staff Mission.

I am in full agreement with you and your colleagues in thinking it desirable that the Allied Commanders in Chief in Western Europe should be formally notified that they exercise command over the Canadian Armed Forces in those theatres with the full authority of the Canadian Government, and I shall so inform the United States Chiefs of Staff.

I appreciate the statement that you and your colleagues have no desire to disturb, in any way, the established chain of command whereby the Supreme Commanders receive their instructions from the Combined Chiefs of Staff.”

Dear Mr. Wrong,

You will remember writing to me on October 2nd last enclosing with your letter draft instructions to the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London. These have not, I think, yet been confirmed by the Cabinet War Committee.

I think that so far as my own relationship to the Joint Staff Mission is concerned, I should make my position perfectly clear lest it should be thought that I have up to the present been associated with the work of that body. As you know, it was contemplated in paragraph 7 of the Draft Instructions to the Mission that its members should act in an advisory capacity to me, and that they should inform me of "the main developments which come to their attention." In practice, however, I have received no communication from the Joint Staff Mission since it was set up, with the exception of two or three routine documents of a quite unimportant character which have been transmitted on the secretarial level. Nor have I ever met with the members of the Joint Staff Mission as a body. I am, of course, in continual contact with them as individuals, but not in connection with their work as members of the Joint Staff Mission. I do not write this in any spirit of complaint, but simply to put the facts on record in case it may be thought in Ottawa that I am being advised or consulted through this channel regarding questions which come within the purview of the Joint Staff Mission.

Perhaps I may add very confidentially that I am less concerned at this omission than I otherwise might be because I have the strong impression that the Joint Staff Mission functions only at very rare intervals, and it has hardly yet developed the corporate character which would spring from day-to-day deliberations.

When definitive terms of reference for the Joint Staff Mission have been approved, and if it fulfils the functions originally envisaged, I should like to put forward some suggestions to ensure full and satisfactory liaison with this Office. Meanwhile I have written thus frankly about the present situation for the confidential information of yourself and Mr. Robertson and Mr. Heeney, as I am anxious that there should be no misunderstanding.

Dear Mr. Massey,

Mr. Wrong has suggested that I reply direct to your letter to him of December 15th, concerning the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London. I have, however, delayed writing you until the matter of the Mission's instructions had again come before the Cabinet War Committee for consideration.

You will remember that the draft instructions,† sent you with Mr. Wrong's letter of October 2nd,† had been approved subject to the concurrence of the then Minister of National Defence<sup>54</sup> who, at that time, was in Europe. Subsequent events rendered it impossible to have proper consideration given to the views of the Army for some time, and it is only within the last fortnight or so that General McNaughton has had an opportunity of putting forward his views on the subject.

Proposals by the Minister for amendment of the first draft have now been considered by the Chiefs of Staff and were submitted to and approved by the Cabinet War Committee at a meeting held on January 8th. I am sending you, separately, today, a copy of the instructions as approved.† These incorporate General McNaughton's amendments.

You will observe that the amendments have to do with preservation of the normal Army channel for executive instructions and limitation of the function of the Mission in relation to the Supreme Commanders to "liaison" and the obtaining of information where Canadian interests are involved.

You will notice that the approved instructions retain the paragraph to which you have drawn attention in your letter, namely, that directing the Mission's members to act in an advisory capacity to you and to inform you of "the main developments which come to their attention." This paragraph has been lifted from the terms of instructions of the Joint Staff, Washington. It was inserted in that case in the expectation that it would assist in bringing about that close relationship between the Mission and the Embassy which appeared to us to be in every way desirable. With the same object it has been inserted in the London instructions and I trust that efforts will now be made to associate the Mission more closely with Canada House.

I confess that I was not altogether surprised that up to the time of your writing on December 15th you had had no important contacts with the Mission, nor indeed with your confidential observation that as yet the Mission had developed little in the way of corporate character. An attempt has been made in the instructions to outline the joint functions which it is thought the Mission may usefully perform. It has occurred to me, personally, that it might prove useful if the High Commissioner were to meet with the Mission regularly, perhaps weekly, not necessarily with any fixed agenda, which no doubt would be difficult if not impossible at first, but rather for the exchange of information of mutual interest. It has also occurred to me that regular contact at the secretarial level between Canada House and the Mission might prove helpful from both points of view.

In any event, I would be grateful for any suggestions which you might care to make along this line, or any other proposals in relation to which we might give some assistance at this end to ensure satisfactory relations between the Mission and Canada House and, incidentally, to give to the Mission more of the joint character contemplated by the government.

I am showing this letter to Mr. Robertson and Mr. Wrong, also to Major-General Pope who, as Military Secretary of the War Committee, is particularly interested and who as former head of the Joint Staff, Washington, has close personal experience with the problems involved.

Yours sincerely,

A. D. P. HEENEY

SECRET. Early in the year the Prime Minister received a personal message from the United States President about United Nations planning in the international economic field.<sup>55</sup> In this message President drew attention to work which was being performed by Combined Boards and said he thought that time had come to consider part they should play in future and, in particular, how other countries should be associated in their work.

2. In his reply<sup>56</sup> Prime Minister concurred in President's remarks regarding good work which was being carried out by Combined Boards and suggested that their future status was a matter which might be discussed, in the first instance, between officials in Washington. At the same time a telegram was sent to our representatives in Washington informing them of these developments and asking for their advice as to best method of pursuing initiative which had been taken by United States Government in this matter.

3. Discussions among United Kingdom representatives in Washington have been proceeding and stage has been reached when they think that informal approach might be made to United States State Department with proposals on method of pursuing matter in so far as it concerns C.P.R.B., C.R.M.B. and C.F.B. A draft memorandum has been prepared for His Majesty's Ambassador and Resident Minister for Supply to hand to Mr. Stettinius which suggests that matter should be dealt with in two stages. Draft memorandum points out that owing to differences in work of several Boards discussions in precise terms about their future scope and work would be difficult, since what applies to one

Board does not necessarily or equally apply to another. It therefore suggests that United States, Canadian and United Kingdom officials directly concerned in operation of each Board, should, in first instance, examine together problems likely to be faced by their Boards in future, and particularly in Stage II. If, as we hope, there is agreement at working level on scope of work of each Board in Stage II, and on any necessary adjustments in methods of operation, next step would be for general questions arising out of these discussions to be considered by informal group consisting, we suggest, of representatives of United States State Department, Canadian Embassy, United Kingdom Embassy as well as of the Boards. Object of group would be to consider, in light of individual discussions, any general principles applying to future work of Boards, and probably such questions as relationship between Boards and countries not represented on them and relationship with any international commodity organization which may later be established. Discussions would at this stage be wholly exploratory and designed mainly to ascertain extent to which views of member Governments have been developing along similar lines.

4. We hope that the general procedure outlined will commend itself to the Canadian Government and that they will be ready to authorize their representatives at Washington to participate in the discussions suggested. On this assumption we have asked officials in Washington on United Kingdom side of Boards to enter into informal discussions with their United States and Canadian opposite numbers. We have also asked His Majesty's Minister (in absence of Ambassador) and Resident Minister for Supply to discuss procedure and draft memorandum with Canadian Ambassador before handing it to Stettinius.

5. We should like to emphasize our intention that discussions with United States Government at this stage should be exploratory. Our preliminary view is that Combined Boards should be maintained at least until end of Japanese war and, if possible, with their existing membership. We feel, however, that there are aspects, such as relationship of other United Nations with work of Boards, which are likely to assume considerable importance and that nothing but good can come from a preliminary exchange of ideas between countries represented on Boards as to how these and other problems should be dealt with when they arise.

FUTURE OF THE COMBINED BOARD

The boards, particularly the committees, should be perpetuated and the following steps taken: The terms of reference should be changed to replace the present war purposes with peace time purposes and the membership, particularly of the committees, should be widened to include countries with a major interest in the matters dealt with.

It is true that the boards have not lived up to the full promise of their terms of reference to act as overall planning agencies. The C.P.R.B. has not integrated production and resources of the member nations. While it exercised a degree of influence and stimulus, it was compelled by and large to accept programs already established and which had already gained momentum. The committees, however, have dealt most successfully with specific problems such as the allocation of critical materials, the designation of sources of supply, the location and size of stock-piles, and abnormalities and dislocations of production and distribution. Not only have the committees been able to deal with problems of war, but they have already shown an ability to deal with problems at least of the transition—such matters as allocation of supplies for relief.

(Some dissatisfaction is voiced with recent efforts of the committees in the matter of relief requirements; e.g., the Textile Committee of the C.P.R.B. has not made adequate provision of textiles. I would discount this failure. Representatives on the Textile Committee face on the one hand urgent known needs of their nationals, on the other a vague relief requirement. Before they will deprive their nationals, the relief need will have to become more immediate and definite.)

The success of the committees can be attributed to the fact that reasonable men can generally come to agree on a solution to a common problem if they consider the same facts.

Much of the value of the committees has been indirect in that knowledge of each other's programs has made it possible for member nations to reach independent decisions which reflected a comprehensive understanding of the world position.

The committees provide a useful international forum for the consideration of practical problems. They should be retained as a medium for consultation between governments. It is wise to retain them with, as far as possible, the same members. These men are mostly highly qualified and have influence in their own countries. They have worked together, in some cases for years, and have an appreciation of each other's problems and peculiarities.

The boards, particularly the C.P.R.B., operate under terms of reference related to the prosecution of the war. These terms of reference should be changed. It would be best if we could find an objective as unifying and compelling as the present one—the efficient prosecution of the war. However, objectives such as “preservation of peace”, “promotion of prosperity”, are too general and too controversial. Since the success of the boards in the past has been due to the ability of reasonable men to solve problems, it might be as well to be satisfied with endeavouring to retain the committees as a forum and more modest terms of reference might serve: such as “to serve as a medium for consultation between governments on questions concerning production and resources, trade and industry, and to make recommendations and reports to governments on such matters.” In suggesting such terms, I have in mind not the immediate future, or Period II, but Periods III and IV. The boards and committees will continue during Period II. The British may have a special case to plead during that Period for freedom from Lend-Lease and White Paper restrictions. It doesn't matter to us whether the terms of reference are broadened for Period II. We sympathize with and might support the U.K. insofar as Period II is concerned, but our long-run policy should be to put the terms of reference on a peace time basis—which calls for the terms to be narrowed rather than broadened.

One of the most promising fields of activity of the committees might be that of tariffs and obstacles to trade. It would be well if consideration of such matters were not initiated by the committees but if such matters were referred to the committees when it is considered advantageous to have men of experience and influence already in association consider problems which affect their industries.

The second step which should be taken, I think immediately, is to broaden the membership, particularly of the committees, including new countries with major interests as has been done on the Fish Committee of the Combined Food Board in the case of Newfoundland, and as is under consideration on the Textile Committee in the case of India. The importance of widening the membership of the boards increases daily. In war decisions of the boards agreed to by member nations have been practically self-implementing because of the dependence of other nations on the member nations for critical materials and shipping, and above all, for defence. As peace approaches these implicit sanctions lose their force. An effort must be made to assure that future decisions are acceptable to those affected by them. This can best be achieved by providing those nations with an equal opportunity of having their representatives consider the facts and be a party to the decisions reached.

The desired step, of course, is to have the committees incorporated into a world organization; in which event whether the boards themselves continue is of little moment. However, if there is no such world organization, effort should be made to maintain the boards themselves with their membership broadened to include the same nations as are contemplated for membership on the highest council of the world organization.

I do not deal with the question of the division of markets. Once the urgency of the war is removed and the inter-dependence for materials and wartime controls themselves are eliminated, there appears little that an international organization can do about dividing markets because the members do not yet enjoy, or seem likely to enjoy, a mandate from their people which would enable them to enter into agreements which might serve to exclude their industries from one world market or another. The only suggestions for divisions of markets which would be acceptable nationally would be those in the obvious financial interest of the industries concerned. It would hardly be possible, however, say for Canada by international agreement to deprive one industry of its world market even though it were in the national interest to do so.

Washington, August 29, 1944

Sir,

I wish to refer to your teletype EX-3034 of July 21st, 1944,<sup>57</sup> in which you approved of a procedure outlined in a letter from the British Embassy to the Acting Secretary of State for the purpose of carrying on discussions regarding the future of the Combined Boards.<sup>57</sup> The first stage of these discussions, in which Executive Officers of the Combined Boards participated, has not yet been completed, though it is hoped that it will be shortly. Stage 2 contemplated a discussion on the diplomatic level of general principles covering the future activities of the Boards. It was suggested by the British Embassy, and the suggestion was agreed to by the State Department, that in this stage representatives of the State Department, the United Kingdom Embassy and the United Kingdom Minister Resident, as well as the Canadian Embassy, might participate.

2. The United Kingdom authorities in Washington are, I understand, somewhat disturbed at the delay in reaching stage 2 of these discussions. It is proposed, therefore, that Sir Ronald Campbell shall address a communication to the State Department, which it is hoped will expedite this matter. The terms of this letter are attached to this despatch, and it will be sent to the State Department very shortly. The last paragraph of the letter, which refers to the Canadian participation in the forthcoming stage 2 discussions, was discussed with me before it was included. In view of the fact that you had already agreed to the procedure in question, I felt it safe to agree to the inclusion of the paragraph in question. I would be grateful, however, if you would confirm this agreement and also at the same time communicate to me the names of the Canadian representatives to participate in the subsequent discussions.

My dear Mr. Under-Secretary,

In your letter of August 11th† about the procedure for discussions regarding the future work of the Combined Boards, you were good enough to tell me that you had communicated with the U.S. members of the three Boards and asked them to conclude the preliminary discussions within the Boards as soon as possible. I understand from the United Kingdom representatives on the Boards that the discussions have made substantial progress and it is our view that the time has come when further consideration might be given to the establishment of the informal group mentioned in the fourth paragraph of my earlier letter. We should propose that the group should be composed on the U.K. side of Mr. Marris and Mr. Opie of the British Embassy, Mr. F. G. Lee of the Treasury Delegation, Mr. R. B. Stevens of the Civil Secretariat (representing the Minister Resident) and of the United Kingdom executive officers of the three Boards concerned. It would be clearly understood that the functions of the group would be exploratory only and that its findings would be referred to the Governments concerned and to the U.K., U.S. and Canadian members of the Boards.

If you agree that we are now ready to take the next step in these discussions perhaps you would be so good as to give consideration on your side to United States membership and to suggest a date on which a preliminary meeting might be held.

I have been in touch with the Canadian Chargé d'Affaires on this matter and I understand that he is in general agreement with this proposal and will communicate with you separately regarding Canadian representation.

Ottawa, August 31, 1944

Your despatch No. 2064 of August 29th, future of Combined Boards. You were quite right to agree to the inclusion of the final paragraph of Sir Ronald Campbell's letter. As the discussions seem likely to last some little time, the personnel should be found from the Canadians now in Washington and should include a senior representative of the Embassy and the senior men most in touch with the work of the Combined Boards. If the presence of anyone from Ottawa seems desirable, perhaps a meeting could be arranged on an appropriate date. In the meantime I shall collect the views of the Departments most concerned here and send you a memorandum of them.

Washington, October 5, 1944

Following for Angus and Pierce from Pearson, Begins: I have received your draft memorandum on the future of the Combined Boards. I wonder whether we should come out so categorically for "Perpetuation." I think a strong case can be made for continuation for a period after the war, and that we should support this, but perpetuation is something else. I doubt myself whether the Boards in their present form, or anything approaching that form, should be perpetuated. The basis of their membership must be broadened and I feel certain that in the post-war period membership on committees will not satisfy this demand.

2. I think, also, that we should associate any continuing Boards with United Nations functional organizations to be established; particularly, that we should recommend that they derive their authority from the proposed Social and Economic Council which, in turn, will be an off-shoot of the United Nations. I think we should assume that some such general United Nations organization will be created. You know more about this matter than I do, but I must say that I feel grave doubts about encouraging the Boards to be active in the field of tariffs and obstacles to trade.

3. The British have, I believe, already prepared their case for submission at the opening meeting on Monday. I am seeing them tomorrow about it, and hope to telegraph some information in the afternoon. Ends.

Dear Dr. Barton,

When I was in Ottawa on my way to the UNRRA Conference,<sup>58</sup> I left with you a draft of recommendations concerning the future of the Board. I discussed this with Mr. Angus in Montreal and then sent along a number of suggestions to Mr. Roll<sup>59</sup> who was working this up in the absence of Mr. Hutton, on behalf of the Executive Officers. We have had another session on it since my return, and we have finally agreed to a draft, copy of which I am enclosing for your information.

You will note that we have shortened up the recommendations into five rather terse, but nevertheless completely understandable points. In the explanatory notes which follow, we have not changed in any sense the wording of the reasons why the Board was established or the duties of the Board, although Mr. Angus was rather anxious that we should make it clear that, while this was a three-member board, nevertheless, we should have the interests of the other nations in mind. I think you will find that this point is made quite clear in the next sections of the document which follow.

Yours faithfully,

COMBINED FOOD BOARD

RECOMMENDATIONS CONCERNING THE FUTURE OF THE BOARD

The Combined Food Board recommends:

1. That there be no change in the existing terms of reference except that where reference is made to the U.S.A. and U.K. Governments, reference should be made also to the Canadian Government;

2. that the life of the Board should be presently defined as continuing so long as shortages of supply or shipping exist or until it is agreed that the work of the Board shall be dealt with by some other international mechanism. In any case the Board should continue in existence until the cessation of hostilities against Germany and Japan and for a period of six months thereafter, during which period the position is to be reviewed and agreement reached regarding the future of the Board;

3. that the membership of the Board be not expanded;

4. that the membership of the Commodity Committees of the Board be expanded for the purpose of promoting and securing more effective combined programming in respect of major foodstuffs entering into international trade, and to this end invitations be extended to the governments of such countries as may be agreed;

5. that the Board establish and maintain closest contact with international organizations, such as the Food and Agriculture Organization, which are concerned with long-term plans in the field of food and agriculture.

FUTURE OF THE COMBINED FOOD BOARD

In this memorandum we set out the main considerations which have led us to put forward the foregoing recommendations.

I.

(A) We recommend that there should be no change in the existing terms of reference, since experience has proved that the original terms are appropriate.

The Combined Food Board was established in the middle of 1942 by the President of the United States and the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom. The Canadian Government accepted, on October 28th, 1943, an invitation to join the Board. The membership of the Board consists, therefore, of representatives of the U.S.A., the U.K. and Canadian Governments.

The C.F.B. was established:

“in order to coordinate further the prosecution of the war effort by obtaining a planned and expeditious utilization of the food resources of the United Nations.”

The duties of the Board were stated to be:

“To consider, investigate, enquire into, and formulate plans with regard to any question in respect of which the Governments of the U.S.A. and the U.K. have, or may have, a common concern, relating to the supply, production, transportation, disposal, allocation or distribution, in or to any part of the world, of foods, agricultural materials from which foods are derived, and equipment and non-food materials ancillary to the production of such foods and agricultural materials, and to make recommendations to the Governments of the U.S.A. and the U.K. in respect of any such question.

To work in collaboration with others of the United Nations toward the best utilization of their food resources, and, in collaboration with the interested nation or nations, to formulate plans and recommendations for the development, expansion, purchase or other effective use of their food resources.”

The original terms of reference are very comprehensive. A brief outline of the development of the work of the Board may aid in making clear why we believe that the terms of reference should not be altered.

(i) From its inception, the Board and its committees have had as one of their main tasks the equitable division between various claimant countries of the total supplies becoming available to them; that is to say what has come to be known as “allocation.” During 1943, as international shortages became more pronounced the number of commodities under “allocation” had to be extended.

In considering allocation problems, full weight has necessarily been given to the circumstances of war and notably to the shortage of shipping. The need to economize the use of ocean shipping has resulted in the concentration of effective demands upon sources of supply relatively near to consuming centres. There have thus emerged regional shortages of supplies. Similar regional shortages of exportable supplies have at times arisen due to inadequacies of internal transport or storage or specialized man-power shortages. In order to deal with these regional problems the Board has found it both desirable and necessary to formulate and recommend combined programmes whereby the supplies becoming available in any given region could be equitably and efficiently distributed to external claimants. One example of this form of combined programming was the movement of Caribbean sugar during 1943, when the total sugar supplies available to the United Nations were adequate; another was the supply programme of exports of North American bread grain due to possible shortages in exportable supplies.

Thus the Board has found it necessary to deal not only with allocation problems in the strict sense, that is as applied to commodities in overall international short supply, but also with other combined programming problems arising from the needs of the war effort. This general task of formulating combined plans in order to ensure that common wartime problems may be equitably and efficiently resolved now constitutes in our judgment a most important and essential function of the Board.

As far as recommendations for allocations in the strict sense are concerned, the Board has concerned itself and will continue to concern itself only with items which are in short supply and which are needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies related to the war and to the transitional period and to items the transportation of which involves so substantial a use of shipping that uncontrolled movements might lead to undue wastes of shipping or related facilities.

(ii) The Combined Anglo-American Area Committees, (e.g., the C.C.N.A.<sup>60</sup> and its successor the F.E.C.<sup>61</sup>), and the Anglo-American Economic Warfare authorities have periodically submitted various programmes of requirements and supplies to the Board for recommendation as to availability and sources of supply. These reviews by the Board have necessitated the consideration of the international or regional supply and demand positions of many commodities, some of which have not been under strict international allocation.

Recently the development of requirements programmes for liberated and occupied areas which have been submitted to the Board for recommendation as to availability and sources of supply, by the C.C.A.C., by UNRRA and by the "Paying Allies" have further emphasized the necessity, in the common interest, for the Board to develop combined supply programmes. In view of the agreements which were reached at Atlantic City whereby both UNRRA and the Paying Allies submit their programmes to the Combined Boards, it is to be presumed that the Combined Boards will continue to perform this function as long as the Boards and UNRRA exist.

(iii) The Board has found it necessary to make recommendations to governments regarding increased production of various foods, such as oils and fats, pulses, etc. In certain cases it has also found it desirable to secure the formulation, and itself to approve, detailed plans for the development of production resources in overseas territories, including the financial terms on which the increased production would be purchased.

(iv) The Board has also found it desirable to secure information regarding relative national levels of consumption and to secure that member countries exchange information regarding proposed significant changes in their consumption of particular commodities.

(v) Thus, commencing with the strict international allocation of a limited range of major foodstuffs, the Board has found it essential to extend the field of its work to cover any aspects of production, distribution and consumption of foodstuffs which are of common interest. We are satisfied that at this time no narrowing of the existing terms of reference is practicable, no further widening is necessary.

(B) We consider that judged by present indications with regard to the availability of shipping and supplies of essential foodstuffs, it is necessary to contemplate continuance of the life of the Board until the termination of hostilities against both Germany and Japan, whichever is the longer, and for a subsequent period of six months during which time the position is to be reviewed and agreement reached on the future of the Board. So long as there exist large and changing military demands on the food supplies and on shipping, combined action will be required to insure that military demands are met in the most equitable and efficient manner possible.

Apart from military demands, however, there are the emerging requirements of the liberated areas and it is to be expected that as the war approaches its close there will be an increasing pressure on the part of those countries, which as a wartime necessity have severely restricted their consumption of food, to relax the stringency of their restrictions on consumption, thus putting further strain upon international supplies of certain important foodstuffs. Speaking in general terms, 1945 will almost certainly be a year of difficulty as regards the proper management of food supplies. Bread grains are today the only major foodstuffs in plentiful supply and even in their case there are likely to be considerable regional difficulties, e.g., demands upon Australia are likely to be in excess of the available supplies. During 1945 there may well emerge surpluses of certain types of food, especially if military requirements are to be reduced substantially and military reserve stocks to be liquidated rapidly. Against this, however, there is to be set the very considerable needs of the liberated areas as well as of certain other countries.

As regards 1946, it is not possible at this time to make any confident predictions. Failing bad harvests, supplies are likely to be more adequate than in 1945. There may, however, be certain real and continuing shortages, e.g., of animal proteins.

However, we consider the Combined Food Board to be essentially a wartime organization. Once hostilities have ceased, we think it desirable that there be a further six months period during which the Board can consider the international supply and demand position in order to determine how far international control and regulation might be relaxed without causing serious disturbance, to consider what common problems regarding the international production and distribution of foodstuffs are likely to continue and if necessary to make recommendations to governments as to the manner in which these longer term problems might best be considered.

(C) We consider that the membership of certain of the Commodity Committees of the Board should be expanded.

Before developing the reasons for this recommendation, we feel it desirable to draw attention to the fact that the Board can make recommendations to governments, and can do no more; it is for governments to accept or reject them. The governments to whom the Board's recommendations are presented are not confined to the member governments.

Shortly after the Combined Food Board was established, the London Food Committee was formed. This Committee has now been superseded by the London Food Council on which are represented the governments of the U.K. (which covers also the British Colonial Empire), Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Southern Rhodesia, and India. The closest contact is maintained between the L.F.C. and its committees and the C.F.B. and its committees. The recommendations of the L.F.C. are communicated to the C.F.B. and any comments which the C.F.B. may have to make are referred back to the L.F.C. All the C.F.B. recommendations are submitted, through the L.F.C. to the member governments of the L.F.C. for the concurrence of those governments. Contact is maintained and agreement secured in all relevant cases with the governments of France and Belgium through Combined Area Committees and Tripartite Committees; with the European Neutrals through the Anglo-American Economic Warfare authorities, and with all other governments through other area organizations and through diplomatic channels.

In addition, the Combined Food Board has approved, in the interests of efficient purchasing and international distribution operations, a series of centralized purchase schemes whereby the appropriate agency of one of the member governments enters into bulk or long-term contracts with non-member producing countries for the total exportable supplies which can be made available. Thus the purchase of Cuban sugar is entrusted to the Commodity Credit Corporation, of South American meat and animal fats to the Ministry of Food, and of Brazilian rice to the Ministry of Food within the framework of an agreement concluded between the governments of Brazil, U.S.A. and the U.K. It is to be noted that in no cases are these bulk purchases, or purchases under a long-term contract concluded without the approval of the government of the supplying country; in certain cases, the contract or the bulk purchase is made direct with the government of the producing country.

Finally, it has already been found desirable in the case of certain commodities to extend the membership of the Commodity Committees beyond the U.S.A., Canada and the U.K. Thus for example Newfoundland is represented on the Fish Committee and France on the Fertilizers Committee.

However, with the liberation of Allied territories in Europe, it is in our opinion desirable that where necessary the membership of Commodity Committees should be further expanded to include representatives of those countries which have an important influence upon the international exchange of the foodstuffs concerned, either because of the exportable production of their countries, or of their import requirements for that foodstuff. Thus we believe that France, Belgium, the Netherlands and Norway should be invited to become members of appropriate committees. Specifically we suggest for immediate action that representatives of France be invited to become members of the Oils and Fats, Sugar and Cocoa committees, representatives of Belgium be invited to become members of the Cocoa Committee, and representatives of Norway be invited to become members of the Oils and Fats committee. At a subsequent date, when it appears likely that the resources of the Dutch East Indies will once again become available to the United Nations, we recommend that the representatives of the Netherlands should be invited to become members of the Sugar Committee, the Tea Committee and of the Oils and Fats Committee. We suggest further that if in the near future it should be decided that the supply and demand position in respect of coffee is such that combined programming or allocation is considered essential, representatives of Brazil, France and Belgium be invited to become members of that committee.

II.

We have discussed the desirability of recommending that the membership of the Board itself should be expanded by the inclusion of other governments and have concluded that this is not at present desirable. We have also considered the problem which arises from the fact that the work of the Board, although concerned with current and wartime problems, may have an important bearing upon longer term developments in the field of food and agriculture. We consider it desirable therefore that between now and the termination of the Board the closest contact be maintained between the Combined Food Board and international bodies such as the Food and Agriculture Organization which are concerned with long term plans. Such liaison would moreover provide opportunity for consultation between the countries concerned with the current operations of the Board and other United Nations.

It was not intended in the draft memorandum to advocate continuation of the Boards in their present form beyond the transitional period. If the form of the Boards is not changed and if they are not linked with United Nations functional organizations then certainly they cannot last beyond that period. During this period we consider they have an important function to perform. In particular McIvor,<sup>62</sup> of Cereals Committee C.F.B., is strongly of the view that it is to Canada's advantage to continue that Committee for some time.

Chief Commissioner, Canadian Wheat Board.

General agreement here with the Boards' post-war activities eventually being linked with if not absorbed by United Nations functional bodies which may be set up to deal with matters now considered by the Boards.

Agriculture feels that membership, particularly of C.F.B., should not be widened unless the C.F.B. becomes absorbed in such a United Nations functional body. This view is occasioned by the difficulties presented by claims for membership based on prestige rather than functional value.

It may well be that unless something is done to widen the membership of the Boards, or at least the Committees, as suggested by the C.F.B., other countries will be unwilling to recognize their authority as allocating agencies even during the transitional period.

The function of medium of consultation will we think in the long run be more important than allocation but the question of using committees in matters of tariffs and obstacles of trade does not arise unless there is a change in the form, and even then it is suggested that they only be called in for advice when it may be considered advisable to obtain qualified technical opinion on the effect throughout the world on their industry of the adoption of certain policies.

We suggest further that an effort be made to make the terms of reference of the Boards realistic and related to the Boards' value as a medium of consultation rather than to their rapidly decreasing usefulness as allocating bodies. In war, their recommendation often carried the force of allocation because of the implicit sanctions underlying any pronouncement by the U.K., U.S. and Canada due to their control of many essential supplies and of shipping, and due in the last analysis to their willingness to compel conformity. These sanctions however fade in the transition and disappear in peace. To retain terms of reference which assume that the Boards will continue to exercise even their present authority might prejudice the preservation of what is really of value, the habit of intergovernmental consultation which they have developed. Ends.

Following for Angus, from Pearson, Begins: Following is the operative section of a memorandum prepared by the Combined Raw Materials Board for consideration at the discussions on the future of the Combined Boards to begin next Monday, Begins:

4. It is suggested that the Board should continue in being during the period of hostilities with its present membership and terms of reference, the objectives being:

(a) To continue the existing procedure of recommending allocation of materials in short supply;

(b) To consider and recommend action in regard to adjustments in production of particular raw materials which are likely to become in excess supply, including the disposal of surplus quantities;

(c) To initiate whatever steps are possible with regard to particular commodities in preparation for adjustment of their special difficulties in the transition period;

(d) To co-ordinate U.S.A. and U.K. views on the supply aspect of raw materials produced in enemy and neutral countries.

5. It is felt that a rigid plan of operation cannot be prescribed beforehand. As regards commodities in short supply it will doubtless be necessary to bring other countries into closer consultation than has hitherto been necessary, but suitable arrangements with UNRRA and the paying Allies should assist in this regard. It is understood that consideration is being given by both our Governments to the question of negotiating supply agreements with certain neutral countries to operate during the transitional period. The technique of the Board will have to be adjusted to special circumstances, dependent upon the organizations of the producing industry and consumers, as well as the relative demands of non-member countries. For example, hides, which are produced in many countries, present a quite different problem to jute where India is the sole producer, or to copper or aluminum where the countries producing worthwhile amounts are relatively few.

6. In some cases falling under paragraph 4 (b) and (c) above it may well be desirable to establish ad hoc Committees of representatives of the U.S.A., U.K. and third countries to advise Governments on the policies to be followed in the general interest. Whether such Committees should be formally initiated by the Board or should be established on the initiative of both Governments in parallel will depend upon the special circumstances of individual commodities. In general, however, where matters affecting the post-war position are concerned, it would be desirable for the commodity Committees to be established in parallel, although in such cases the Board should be represented either by direct membership of the Committee or at the secretariat level.

7. The work of the Board and any Committees which may be established on particular commodities should, as far as possible, be guided so that it can be fitted into any international commodity scheme if this should later be adopted as Government policy, whether for particular commodities only or generally. Memorandum ends. Full memorandum† going by bag. Ends.

C.P.R.B.

CONFIDENTIAL

SEPTEMBER 1ST, 1944

C.P.R.B. has considered the nature of the industrial and economic problems arising during the period between the defeat of some of the Axis countries and the end of the war and submits the following statement, as representing the appropriate revision of its functions to meet the problems which may arise.

In order to ensure that full consideration is given to mutual problems of industrial and economic production, the C.P.R.B., in addition to the functions which it has hitherto exercised, will deal with the following subjects of common interest to its member Governments.

It will:

(a) Continue to co-ordinate United States, United Kingdom and Canadian production resources to the end of winning the war. In doing this

(I) Full consideration will be given, in the co-ordination of the production programs of the member countries, to all relevant industrial and economic factors, to the end that no one country should have devoted to war production an undue proportion of its resources.

(II) There will be close collaboration with other United Nations in order to ensure the full utilization of their resources. Account will be taken of resources of neutral countries. The industrial output and resources of ex-enemy countries and their satellites will, as appropriate, also be taken into account.

(b) Facilitate reconversion and eventual return to normal economy in the United States, United Kingdom and Canada, bearing in mind the world position, by such means as the exchange of information on their adjustment program.

(c) Deal with problems arising from the needs of liberated areas for consumer goods and services and for supplies for rehabilitation and maintenance of industrial plant and public utilities. For this purpose also the resources of other United Nations, of neutral countries and of ex-enemy countries and their satellites will, as appropriate, be taken into account. Technical consultant services may be furnished with respect to determination of availability of equipment and installation of facilities.

(d) Assist in the solution of problems of surplus stores.

(e) Maintain equitable distribution of manufactured or partly manufactured goods which are subject to combined planning, at the same time arranging for mutual consultation in preparation for the progressive relaxation or elimination of controls.

(f) Act as a convenient forum for discussing future common industrial or economic production problems of the member countries.

Washington, October 11, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to report on a meeting which was held in Washington on Monday, October 9th, to discuss the future of the Combined Boards. This report will be preliminary and will be amplified after further discussions among the Canadian representatives who attended the meeting.<sup>63</sup> Mr. G. C. Bateman and Mr. G. C. Monture of the Canadian section in the C.P.R.B.; Mr. G. R. Paterson, Canadian Executive Officer of the C.F.B. and Mr. Pearson and Mr. Ritchie of this Embassy attended the meeting together with the U.S. and U.K. representatives.

2. The meeting considered the points of agreement which were apparent from the various papers (copies and extracts of which have been sent to you) submitted by the individual boards, and the statement of the general policy position of the U.S. Government as set forth in a paper on The Future of the Combined Boards,<sup>64</sup> three copies† of which are enclosed for your information). The points of initial agreement were found to be:

(1) That the Combined Boards as such must be continued as long as the war need exists. (The suggestion in the C.F.B. paper that the life of that Board should be extended for six months beyond the cessation of hostilities was held over for subsequent consideration as a possible termination date for the activities of the Boards).

No further report was located.

See United States, Foreign Relations of the United States, 1944, Volume II. Washington, U.S. Government Printing Office, 1967, pp. 80-84.

(2) That enlargement of the membership on the Boards proper is not feasible at present.

(3) That enlargement of committees of the Boards should be made, when appropriate, to include countries important as producers or consumers.

(4) That items in short supply and essential to the prosecution of the war or to the maintenance of essential civilian economies (including liberated areas) will be subject to allocation recommendations of the Boards.

3. After these points of agreement had been established discussion centered on three points on which it appeared that at least some clarification and possibly some adjustment might be necessary to secure conformity among the various views:

(1) The procedure to be adopted in the case of items which are not in short supply at a particular time (supplies being defined as global supplies on an annual basis). In the case of such "surplus" materials the official U.S. view, as expressed on pages 4 and 5 of the enclosed paper, was presented. It was agreed that combined recommendations concerning the disposal of such surpluses would not be feasible but that use might be made of the facilities offered by the Boards for consultation from which separate (but possibly parallel) recommendations might be made by the national members of the Boards to their respective governments. The Boards would be in no position to compel the individual governments to consult together through the Boards on the disposal of such surpluses. Consultation, when deemed desirable, could be informal. Recommendations emerging from such consultation might be confined to a mere descriptive statement of the problem or might go so far as to recommend solutions.

(2) The procedure to be adopted for capital goods items (i.e. reconstruction or recovery requirements) over and above those needed for military reconstruction or essential civilian rehabilitation when total supply of such goods is short. The consensus of opinion was that combined recommendations would be applied only to that portion of total supply which was needed for military reconstruction or essential civilian rehabilitation. Other requirements would not be subject to combined allocation.

(3) The relationship of combined board activities to prices in foreign markets. No definite view on this problem emerged from the meeting although it appeared to be generally considered that activities directed towards affecting prices in foreign markets should be confined to cases in which the commodity concerned was in short supply and supplies from the particular market were required to meet essential requirements for the prosecution of the war or the maintenance of essential civilian economies.

4. There was some discussion of the formal change to be made at this stage in the constitution or terms of reference of the Boards. This change might be marked by a revision of the charters of the individual boards, the issuance of a general statement of principles and/or the release of a formal statement to the press. It was recognized that difficulties might be encountered in drafting and issuing a general statement of principles and a corresponding press release. It was thought best at this stage to make only those revisions in the individual charters which appeared necessary to bring the operations of the individual boards into line with the sense of the general discussion at this meeting and subsequent meetings. A small drafting committee representing the three countries is to examine the individual charters in the light of these discussions and recommend the necessary changes for later consideration.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Our despatch No. 2350 of October 11th, future of the Combined Boards. The Drafting Committee on which we are participating will meet at 11.30 Monday morning, October 16th. The United Kingdom representative who will be Chairman of this Committee proposes to confine the activities of the Committee to reviewing the recommendations of the individual Boards (copies of which were sent to you with Mr. Paterson's letter of October 5th, our teletypes WA-5763 of October 6th and WA-5819 of October 10th) in the light of the discussion last Monday, with a view to making any necessary modifications in these recommendations in order to convert them into suitable charters or terms of reference for the individual Boards. There is a possibility that the United States members may suggest the drafting of a general statement of principles, along the lines of the Paper<sup>65</sup> enclosed with our despatch No. 2350, to be used as a guide in the interpretation of the charters of the individual Boards. The United Kingdom members will oppose this suggestion as they feel that the preparation and issuance of such a statement of principles would run into difficulties which can be avoided if the Committee's activities are limited to the drafting of suitable charters for the individual Boards.

We should appreciate instructions on the procedure which you wish us to follow together with any specific suggestions which you may wish to make for the new charters in the light of the recommendations of the individual Boards. My own view is that the United Kingdom approach to this problem is a sound one in present circumstances. I have a feeling that any statement of general principles governing the operations of the Boards in stage 2 or in the post-war period might arouse among non-member States certain fears and provoke certain discussions. This would, of course, depend on the nature of the statement which would be proposed by the United States. Our discussions last Monday, however, indicated that there is some danger of this statement going further than would seem to be desirable. However, you may have other views on this matter.

MEMORANDUM OF CONVERSATION

SUBJECT: FUTURE OF THE COMBINED BOARDS - DRAFTING GROUP

Participants:

Mr. J. W. Wyndham-White, Mr. Thomas Brand, U.K.
Mr. A. E. Ritchie, Canada
Mr. H. H. Fowler, Mr. C. C. Brown, U.S.
Copies to A-A—Mr. Acheson, BC—Mr. Hickerson, WEA—Mr. Taft, ECA—Mr. Haley, Mr. J. Wyndham-White and Mr. T. Brand of U.K., Mr. A. E. Ritchie of Canada, and Mr. Fowler, U.S.

On instructions of the tripartite committee assigned the task of reaching a conclusion on the future of the Combined Boards, the above group convened to consider the matter of drafting necessary papers. Prior to the discussion, a memorandum of conversation† setting forth the conclusions reached at the meeting on October 9<sup>66</sup> of the senior group was distributed. It was agreed that this memorandum presented an adequate account of the previous conversation and its conclusions.

In a substantive sense, the U.K., Canadian and U.S. representatives agreed on the broad questions relating to the future of the combined boards. There had not been a complete understanding, however, regarding the procedure to be followed in preparing the necessary papers. Three alternatives are available.

See Document 260.

The basic policy position of the U.S. Government, presented in a paper entitled "The Future of the Combined Boards", might be edited as a basic policy position of the three governments to be followed by all of the Boards. Alternatively, the basic policy position of the U.S. Government might be discarded and three papers prepared by the U.K. to govern the operations of the CPRB, the CRMB and the CFB, respectively,<sup>67</sup> might be edited to serve as a basis for operations in the future. Finally, the U.S. Government general policy position might be edited as a combined paper, followed by a revision of the three specific papers relating to the several Boards.

After considerable discussion it was agreed by the Canadian and U.K. representatives that, while they did not want to go "joint account" with the U.S. in preparing an edited draft of the general policy paper, the present draft of the paper contains nothing inconsistent with the agreements reached last Monday. Therefore, it was concluded that the U.S. side will redraft the three specific papers relating to each of the Boards, using the basic policy paper as a guide. Mr. Fowler and Mr. Brown agreed to do this. Revised drafts will be submitted to Mr. Ritchie for his clearance and concurrence prior to meeting again with the U.K. representatives for approval to report back to the senior committee.

This will leave us with a U.S. Government general policy position which it was generally agreed should be distributed to the operations personnel of the U.S. side of the Combined Boards, and with three specific papers describing revised terms of reference for each of the three Boards. The latter papers will then be combined papers as contrasted with the first, which would simply be a set of instructions to the U.S. side as to the appropriate policy within which they should operate.

It was agreed without qualification that a press release should be prepared to be issued jointly by the President and the Prime Ministers of Britain and Canada.

Dear Mr. Pearson,

The three documents dealing with the future of the Combined Boards, which were enclosed in your letter of November 8th,† have been circulated to the interested Departments here with a request that any criticisms should reach the Department of External Affairs by November 16th.

The Department of Trade and Commerce is interested in noting the proposal that the Combined Boards should give consideration to the problem of transitional surpluses and believes that their activities may assist in the orderly disposal of such surpluses as may be common to all of the countries participating in the Boards. It might be worth while examining this observation in greater detail as it is my impression that the United States is anxious that its surpluses of wheat and flour should be freed completely from Board control.

As no other observations have been received from any of the interested Departments and as they have been kept in touch with the correspondence on the future of the Combined Boards as it has developed, it is now safe to say that the drafts which you have submitted are likely to be acceptable to the Canadian Government.

Yours sincerely,

Washington, December 2, 1944

Dear Mr. Angus,

With reference to your letter of Nov. 18th and other communications which we have exchanged on the future of the Combined Boards, I am now enclosing three copies of the relevant documents which have resulted from our combined discussions here:

1. Memorandum on the Future of the Combined Raw Materials Board.
2. Memorandum on the Future of the Combined Food Board.
3. Memorandum on the Future of the Combined Production and Resources Board.
4. Press Release on the Future of the Combined Board.

With the exception of the C.R.M.B. memorandum in which the U.K. is proposing a number of minor textual changes these papers can now be regarded as in final form as far as the Committee here is concerned. They are of course still subject to formal examination and approval by the three member governments.

We regard these documents as generally satisfactory. There might be a number of minor changes which would improve the style of the papers but for operating purposes we regard these drafts as adequate for our purpose.

Concerning the remarks in your letter with respect to the problem of transitional surpluses, you will note the authority of the individual national agencies in handling this problem is specifically recognized and provision is made for the use of the Boards' facilities to reach "an agreed solution" only if the national agencies instruct the boards to undertake such action.

This letter is not to be regarded as a formal submission of these memoranda. Representatives of the U.S., U.K. and Canada are to meet, probably next week, to make the necessary arrangements for referring the final versions of these memoranda to the member governments for their formal consideration and approval. In the meantime, I feel that you may find it useful to have these documents. As I mentioned above, it is unlikely that any significant changes, apart from textual changes in the C.R.M.B. memorandum, will be made in these memoranda before they are formally referred to the Canadian Government.

Yours sincerely,

Memorandum by Tripartite Drafting Committee

Washington, November 22, 1944

MEMORANDUM ON THE FUTURE OF THE
COMBINED RAW MATERIALS BOARD

AUTHORITY FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF THE BOARD

1. The Board was established in January 1942, by a directive of the President and Prime Minister which read in part as follows:

Combined Raw Materials Board

"A planned and expeditious utilization of the raw material resources of the United Nations is necessary in the prosecution of the war. To obtain such a utilization of our raw materials resources in the most efficient and speediest possible manner, we hereby create the 'Combined Raw Materials Board.'"

The Board is operating under the following terms of reference:

(1) To plan the best and speediest development, expansion and use of the raw material resources under the jurisdiction or control of the two Governments, and make the recommendations necessary to execute such plans. Such recommendations shall be carried out by all departments of the respective Governments.

(2) In collaboration with others of the United Nations, to work toward the best utilization of their raw material resources, and, in collaboration with the interested nation or nations, formulate plans and recommendations for the development, expansion, purchase or other effective use of their raw materials.

It will be observed that the terms of reference for the Combined Raw Materials Board relate the operations to the effective prosecution of the war.

GENERAL DESCRIPTION OF OPERATIONS TO DATE

2. In the course of its work the Board has had contacts with representatives of others of the United Nations on various specific questions, but during a period when the U.S.A. and U.K. procurement agencies were purchasing maximum possible quantities and were in practice obtaining the bulk of the exportable surpluses of other producing countries the governmental contacts have successfully been handled by those agencies. The U.K. has, in the main, dealt directly with the Empire countries on matters with which the Board has been concerned, save in the case of Canada where liaison arrangements had been made through previously existing channels. In the case of Russia the arrangements have been made in connection with the Protocol, although there have been other discussions with Russian representatives. In all the above the Board has provided a forum at which activities associated with the prosecution of the war could be co-ordinated and overall plans agreed.

3. No attempt has been made by the Board to cover the whole field of raw materials. The effort has been concentrated rather on those materials in short supply, whether for production or shipping reasons, and to adjust the relative supply positions so as to secure the maximum output of finished products for the war effort and to affect maximum efficiency in the use of available shipping. The particular sphere of activity is constantly changing. As shipping conditions ease and as items pass from short supply to ample supply, allocation recommendations of the Board have been withdrawn. Thus, problems on most metals are now far less pressing, while such materials as hides, jute, woodpulp and lumber are now requiring special consideration and will probably continue to do so throughout the remainder of the war period.

FUTURE BASIS OF OPERATIONS

4. It is suggested that the Board should continue in being for the duration of the war against either Germany or Japan, whichever is the longer, unless it is decided by the member governments represented that any or all of the agreed principles should be terminated or modified earlier. The practice shall be continued of adding representatives of other countries to its working committees when this appears necessary to insure that their special position as important producers or consumers is taken into account. Member governments shall consult in due course to determine whether some of the functions of the Board need to be continued after the termination of hostilities.

5. The Board should continue its operations under the existing terms of reference, it being understood that in recommending allocations and other appropriate measures they shall relate to (1) items which are in short supply and which are needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies, and (2) items the transportation of which involves so substantial a use of shipping that uncontrolled movements might lead to a considerable uneconomic use of scarce shipping facilities. In deciding upon what items are not in short supply the Board will appraise what would be the net annual global position after the removal of allocation recommendations. Where the total supply of a commodity exceeds essential requirements, but is less than total demands, the Board should allocate the available supplies only to the extent necessary to protect the supply needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies.

6. Each member Government is expected through its representative on the Board to give the other government advance notification of any intention to effect substantial changes in the production or procurement of materials under review by the Board.

7. Subject to the principles enunciated in paragraphs 5 above and 10 below, the Board will co-ordinate U.S.A. and U.K. views on the supply aspect of raw materials produced in enemy and neutral countries and needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies.

8. The Board will make recommendations for coordinated buying with the object of preventing an undue rise in prices, only in respect of those items that are in short supply and at the same time are necessary for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies.

9. It is felt that a rigid plan of operating procedures cannot be prescribed. As regards commodities in short supply, it will doubtless be necessary to bring other countries into closer consultation, but suitable arrangements with UNRRA and the paying Allies would assist in this regard. In this particular connection the technique of the Board will have to be adjusted to special circumstances, dependent upon the organizations of the producing industry and consumers, as well as the relative demands of non-member countries.

10. The Board should transmit to its member governments such information as it may have available with respect to the position of particular raw materials which are likely to become in burdensome excess supply, in order that each country can establish its position and negotiate such special arrangements among interested countries as seem indicated by the circumstances of individual commodities. Any attempt to reach an agreed solution of a surplus problem through the machinery of the Board shall be undertaken by the Board only when in a specific case both member governments so instruct their representatives.

11. The work of the Board and any of its committees on particular commodities should, as far as possible, be guided so that it can be fitted into any international commodity scheme if this should later be adopted as government policy, whether generally or for particular commodities only.

MEMORANDUM ON THE FUTURE OF THE COMBINED FOOD BOARD AUTHORITY FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF THE BOARD

The Combined Food Board was established in June 1942 by the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States. The Canadian Government accepted, on October 28th, 1943 an invitation to join the Board. The membership of the Board consists, therefore, of representatives of the U.S.A., the U.K. and Canadian Governments.

The C.F.B. was established:

“in order to coordinate further the prosecution of the war effort by obtaining a planned and expeditious utilization of the food resources of the United Nations.”

The duties of the Board were stated to be:

“To consider, investigate, enquire into, and formulate plans with regard to any question in respect of which the Governments of the U.S.A. and the U.K. have, or may have, a common concern, relating to the supply, production, transportation, disposal, allocation or distribution, in or to any part of the world of foods, agricultural materials from which foods are derived, and equipment and non-food materials ancillary to the production of such foods and agricultural materials, and to make recommendations to the Governments of the U.S.A. and the U.K. in respect of any such questions. To work in collaboration with others of the United Nations toward the best utilization of their food resources, and, in collaboration with the interested nation or nations, to formulate plans and recommendations for the development, expansion, purchase or other effective use of their food resources.”

It will be observed that the terms of reference for the Combined Food Board are comprehensive, subject to the qualification that its authority relates its operations to the prosecution of the war effort.

FUTURE BASIS OF OPERATIONS

It is agreed:

1. that the existing terms of reference should be amended to the effect that where reference is made to the U.S.A. and U.K. Governments, reference should be made also to the Canadian Government;
2. that the Board shall continue in being for the duration of the war against either Germany or Japan, whichever is the longer, unless it is decided by the member governments represented that any or all of the agreed principles should be terminated or modified earlier. Member governments shall consult in due course to determine whether some of the functions of the Board need to be continued after the termination of hostilities;

3. that the practice shall be continued of adding representatives of other countries to commodity committees of the Board when this appears necessary to ensure that their special position as important producers or consumers is taken into account;

4. that the objectives of the Board should be as follows:

(a) To continue the existing procedure by restricting allocation recommendations and other appropriate measures to cases of (1) items which are in short supply and which are needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies, and (2) items the transportation of which involves so substantial a use of shipping that uncontrolled movements might lead to a considerable uneconomic use of scarce shipping facilities. In deciding upon what items are not in short supply the Board will appraise what would be the estimated supply and demand position after the removal of allocation recommendations. Where the total supply of a commodity exceeds essential requirements but is less than total demands the Board should allocate the available supplies only to the extent necessary to protect the supply needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies.

(b) To transmit to its member governments such information as it may have available with respect to the position of particular food items which are likely to become in burdensome excess supply, in order that each country can establish its position and negotiate such special arrangements among interested countries as may appear necessary. Any attempt to reach an agreed solution of a surplus problem through the machinery of the Board shall be undertaken by the Board only when, in a specific case, each member government so instructs its representative.

(c) To insure that the Board representatives of the several member governments advise the representatives of the other member governments in advance of effecting substantial changes in production or procurement of materials under review by the Board.

(d) To make recommendations for coordinated buying with the object of preventing an undue rise in prices, only in respect of those items that are in short supply and at the same time are necessary for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies;

5. that the Board establish and maintain closest contact with international organizations, such as the proposed Food and Agriculture Organization, which are concerned with long-term plans in the field of food and agriculture.

Washington, November 22, 1944

MEMORANDUM ON THE FUTURE OF THE COMBINED
PRODUCTION AND RESOURCES BOARD

The member governments have considered the nature of industrial and economic problems arising in the period following the defeat of either Germany or Japan. The following represents an appropriate restatement of the functions of the Combined Production and Resources Board, designed to meet the problems which may arise.

The Board shall continue in being for the duration of the war against either Germany or Japan, whichever is the longer, unless it is decided by the member governments represented that any or all of the agreed principles should be terminated or modified earlier. The member governments in due course shall consult together to determine whether some of the functions of the Board will need to be continued after the termination of hostilities.

The practice shall be continued of adding representatives of other countries to the working committees of the Board when this appears necessary to insure that their special position as important producers or consumers is taken into account.

The Board will continue to perform the functions it has hitherto performed, it being understood that in making allocation recommendations, it will confine such recommendations to (1) items which are in short supply and which are needed for direct war purposes or for the maintenance of essential civilian economies, and (2) items the transportation of which involves so substantial a use of shipping that uncontrolled movements might lead to a considerable uneconomic use of scarce shipping facilities.

In order to insure continued collaboration in the utilization of resources during a period of transition from total war to peace the Combined Production and Resources Board also will serve as a forum or focal point for consultation and interchange of information on mutual industrial and economic production problems. Without limitation of the foregoing, specific subjects of interest to the Board in the next phase include the following:

(a) The coordination of U.S., U.K. and Canadian production resources. Mutual exchanges of information and views on this subject will serve to promote a devotion to war production of the resources available to each member country on an equitable basis, and an adjustment of war production programs consistent with the combined interest of the member countries, and the continued satisfaction of war and essential civilian requirements during transitional conditions.

(b) The equitable satisfaction, from a supply standpoint, of essential needs of liberated areas.

(c) An effective utilization of production resources of other United Nations and enemy or neutral countries for direct war purposes and for the maintenance of essential civilian economies, through consultation with non-member countries and other appropriate authorities.

(d) The provision of assistance to the appropriate national agencies in coordinating the disposal abroad of government owned surplus property wherever such coordination is necessary or desirable, and consistent with the national policies of the member governments.

(e) Other problems regarding products likely to become in burdensome excess supply. These problems could advantageously be studied through the statistical and technical facilities of the Board. For this as well as for other purposes, the present procedure of exchange of information should be continued for the life of the Board. Further action in relation to surplus problems shall only be undertaken by the Board when, in a special case, each member government so instructs its representative.

IMMEDIATE. Following for Angus, Begins: With reference to my letter of December 2nd enclosing the November 22nd drafts of the various Papers on the future of the Combined Boards, the United Kingdom representatives in Washington are referring these versions to London and are recommending that they be approved by the United Kingdom Government. At the same time the drafts are being referred to the President's office by the State Department with a similar recommendation. Would you therefore please regard my letter of December 2nd as constituting a formal submission of these Papers to the Canadian Government with a recommendation from the Canadian representatives here that these documents be approved.

2. It is not intended that the memoranda on the individual Boards shall be published; at least not at this time. It is hoped by the United States and the United Kingdom representatives that they will be in a position to approve the issuance of the General Press Release on some date between December 15th and December 20th. We shall let you know in advance the exact date on which the release is planned as soon as the United States and United Kingdom reach a decision. It is hoped that the Canadian Government likewise will be able to indicate its formal concurrence in these documents before the earlier of the two dates mentioned in order that the issuance of the combined release may be made within the dates indicated.

3. Concerning the minor textual changes which the United Kingdom has proposed in the C.R.M.B. draft, I may say that none of the changes is of significance. I hope to send you a note on the changes in the C.R.M.B. draft during the day but in any case it would seem that your consideration of the documents need not be delayed since our interest in these documents is confined formally to the C.P.R.B. Charter, the C.F.B. Charter and the General Press Release. No changes have been made in these three documents apart from the suggestion that the paragraphs in the C.P.R.B. Charter should be numbered.

4. If there are any points in these memoranda which you might wish to discuss with the Canadian representatives in Washington, I understand that Mr. Bateman is in Ottawa until some time Tuesday and Mr. Paterson is also in Ottawa for a few days. Ends.

Following for Angus from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-5049 of December 22nd.† Future of the Combined Boards.

1. The United Kingdom has now proposed one further change in these documents in addition to the changes in the proposed press release reported in my letter of December 20th.† This proposed change would eliminate the words "during a period of transition from total war to peace" from the fifth paragraph of the C.P.R.B. Charter dated November 22nd, which I sent you with my letter of December 2nd. London has indicated that, with these changes, the documents would be acceptable.

2. The United States has accepted the proposed revisions in the press release and this change in the text of the C.P.R.B. Charter. The documents are not being referred back to the White House as the changes are regarded by the United States side as inconsequential.

3. In these circumstances it has been proposed that the press release might be issued on January 19. This particular date has the merit of coincidence with a Presidential Press Conference here. The United Kingdom representatives regard this date as feasible but have asked London for confirmation.

4. Could you let me know, therefore, whether all the documents as revised are acceptable to the Canadian Government, and whether the date of January 19th is an acceptable date for the press release.

5. To avoid any possible misunderstanding, we should probably repeat that it is the intention here that only the press release is to be published. The individual Charters are being regarded as confidential documents at this stage.

6. The Charters are, of course, being made available to the operating personnel in the Departments concerned. I understand from some of the Canadian Combined Board people here that they are anxious to have the Charters made available as soon as possible to the operating personnel in the interested Canadian Departments in Ottawa as they have detected an unfortunate tendency among some of the Operating Divisions in Ottawa to regard the Boards as relatively unimportant organizations which are on the point of folding up. You will probably wish to see that the new Charters are circulated to the Operating Divisions of the various departments concerned with a formal indication that the Boards will function in accordance with these Charters, which have been approved by the three Governments, until the end of the war against both Germany and Japan.

7. Finally, I might add that the State Department has promised to let us have within the next few days specimen copies of the documents, which they are having mimeographed, and we shall send them to you in order that any possible discrepancies between these documents and the documents in your hands might be checked before issuance of the press release. In the meantime, can you let us have your reply to paragraph 4 above. Ends.

Before any discussions on this subject with the Allies take place, the Combined Boards would like to receive the concurrence of the three Governments in the details of the arrangements proposed in their memorandum. For this purpose a representative of this Embassy will meet shortly with representatives of the State Department, the United Kingdom Embassy, and the Combined Boards concerned, to discuss the memorandum. Could you let us have your views on the memorandum as soon as possible? Begins:

Statement of Policy of Combined Raw Materials Board and Combined Production & Resources Board as to Participation of other United Nations

The Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Production and Resources Board desire the cooperation of other United Nations in the responsibilities with which they are charged by their respective member Governments on the economic side of the war effort. This cooperation becomes practicable as more nations are liberated and are in a position to estimate more precisely their essential needs and as they again become important producers or consumers of commodities in short supply.

The instructions from the President and the Prime Ministers of the United Kingdom and Canada<sup>68</sup> direct the Boards to hold themselves ready to develop effective cooperation with the liberated nations. With respect to certain critical commodities, the Boards are already dealing directly with the liberated nations in an attempt to meet their requirements so far as possible. Thus, in hides and leather, textiles, and lead, for example, representatives of other countries have participated in joint discussions concerned with the distribution of these materials. It is the hope and the plan of the Boards to develop further this participation of other countries in the international distribution of commodities in which such countries have a major consuming interest.

It is also the Boards' hope that as various of the liberated nations again become important producers of commodities in short international supply, these countries will be invited to participate in the deliberations of the Boards' Committees and staffs having to do with such commodities. The Boards also stand ready to consult continuously with other of the United Nations concerning more general problems affecting their interests in either the production or consumption of commodities falling under the jurisdiction of the Boards.

The two Boards have from time to time asked the various liberated countries for information as to their stocks, production, productive facilities, and requirements. Obviously, this information with similar data for the member countries and the other United Nations are necessary so that a complete picture of the supply demand situation will be available to the Boards in recommending the allocation of materials in short supply, and for the consideration where appropriate of the representatives of all the countries participating in the Boards' commodity discussions. Only in this manner can the desired degree of collaboration between all the more important producing and consuming countries be fully realized.

In order to determine how at this time this policy may best be put into practice, having regard on the one hand to the varying interests of the Allies and to the importance on the other of not unduly complicating the Boards' operations, the two Boards now propose to hold a round-table meeting with representatives of the Economic Missions of France, Belgium, the Netherlands, Norway and Denmark. At this meeting the methods of operation of the two Boards will be described and the question of association explored in a general way. On the basis of this discussion the Boards will meet with each Ally in turn to consider in more detail the particular fields in which it will be mutually profitable to associate the country concerned in the work of either Board. The possibility of holding regular periodic liaison meetings with the Heads of the Allied Missions will also be considered. Such meetings would enable the Allies to be informed of the continuing work of the Boards on a regular basis and also provide a forum for the discussion of such questions as the Allied representatives may wish to present. SECRET. In recent conversation with British Embassy official, Alphand, Economic Director, Ministry for Foreign Affairs, presented informally French case for membership on Combined Boards which he feels should be reconstituted on a power basis by admitting France and the U.S.S.R. to membership. The Commodity Committee should also include representatives of other countries with special claims to membership of particular Committees. The Boards would then be in a position to make overall recommendations on distribution of world supplies, and their work would be supplemented by the activities of other regional bodies such as European Economic Committee. Alphand realizes that such a proposal would involve complete change in construction of Combined Boards which have been concerned with organization of supplies in conducting the war against Germany and Japan. He takes view that U.S.S.R. membership might wait until after the defeat of Japan, but that there would be great advantage in getting the Russians to work within the inter-Allied organization. France's claim to membership is justified on following grounds; participation in war with Japan; her strategic position as a base of operations for eastern deployment; importance of French Colonial Empire, and French participation in occupation of Germany.

I would be interested to have your views on likelihood of acceptance of French case.

Ottawa, June 15, 1945

CONFIDENTIAL

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your telegram No. 370 of June 13th, concerning the future of the Combined Boards. It is interesting to hear of the views of M. Alphand, the Economic Director of the Ministry of Foreign Affairs. His proposals call for drastic changes in the character and purpose of the Boards which are not, in our view, practical or desirable.

2. The Combined Boards began as emergency bodies and, while there has been some discussion as to their continuance, the general opinion is that their activities should be confined to the period of shortages which will follow the conclusion of hostilities.

3. The Canadian view has been that the membership in the Boards and that the membership in their Committees should be enlarged to enable them to perform their functions in the most effective way. For this purpose it is necessary to associate with the Boards the Governments of those countries which are substantial exporters of commodities in short supply. In the case of the Combined Food Board, for instance, even small countries like Iceland may be represented on the Committee on Fish, while Denmark may be represented on the Committee on Dairy Products.

4. It would destroy the character of the Boards if they were composed on a power basis rather than on a functional basis, and any claim which France or Russia may have to membership on the Boards would, in our view, have to be justified on the position of the country in question as a supplier of exported materials. It is considered very important that during a period of shortage consuming countries should have confidence in the fairness of the Boards and that producing countries should have confidence in the Boards not being used in such a way as to give an advantage to their competitors.

5. There would be two serious difficulties in associating the U.S.S.R. with the work of the Boards. As has already been mentioned, the function of the Boards is likely to be temporary and the importance of the U.S.S.R. as an exporter might not develop until the period of shortages had come to an end. In the second place the work of the Boards requires that they should be in possession of detailed information as to the stocks, production, productive facilities and requirements of the countries with which they are dealing. The U.S.S.R. has not hitherto shown a disposition to supply information of this character.

6. The Boards have given very careful consideration to the continuance of their work, to the ways in which countries which are not at present members can be associated with it, and to the information which must be given in order to maintain confidence in the work of the Boards and to make it possible for this work to be discussed by the representatives of the Governments affected by it.

7. So far as I am aware there is no substantial difference of view between the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada on this general question. No formal agreement has, however, been reached and I should appreciate it if you will consider the information contained in this despatch as background material of a confidential character.

Ottawa, August 15, 1945

At the beginning of this year, the Governments of the United Kingdom, the United States and Canada, agreed to continue the tripartite Combined Boards for the duration of the war against Japan. The Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Production and Resources Board will probably be wound up fairly quickly. They cannot, however, be conveniently terminated from the moment the President of the United States proclaims V-J Day. The Combined Food Board, on the other hand, is likely to be very necessary for joint intergovernmental cooperation for the next year or two.

At a preliminary meeting in Washington today between the British and Canadian Embassies and the United States State Department, it was decided to recommend to their Governments, for approval and immediate issue, the following joint press announcement:

“On January 19th, 1945, the President of the United States and the Prime Ministers of Great Britain and Canada announced their decision to maintain the C.P.R.B., the C.R.M.B. and the C.F.B. until the end of the Japanese war. The three Governments have now decided that these three Boards will continue, for the time being, to operate on the existing basis. They will arrange without delay for a review of the work of each Board with the object of determining the necessity for continuing its operation.”<sup>69</sup>

I assume you will have no objection to being associated with this announcement.<sup>70</sup>

Mr. Makins of the British Embassy and Mr. Stone of this Embassy went to the State Department today and received the following memorandum on the question of the future of the Combined Boards, Begins: On August 29th, President Truman announced that the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada and the United States had jointly decided to continue for the time being the Combined Resources and Production Board, the Combined Raw Materials Board, and the Combined Food Board “to operate on the existing bases in order to ensure that there is no break in combined machinery which is handling various critical supply questions of immediate importance.”

It seems appropriate to this Government now to undertake definitive discussions with regard to the future of the Combined Boards. It is, therefore, suggested that conversations on this subject begin as soon as possible. If you agree, this Government will be glad to make the necessary arrangements for the meeting.

In order to expedite the conversations, there is transmitted a copy of a statement on “United States policy during the transition period with respect to short supply items.” Ends.

The text of the statement on “United States policy during the transition period with respect to short supply items” follows, Begins:

A press release was issued on August 29 in London, Washington and Ottawa.

None whatever. W. L. M[ACKENZIE] K[ING] 17-8-45.

1. The established foreign economic policy of this Government is to remove all wartime controls of international trade and Government participation in such trade as rapidly as is consistent with the objectives of this Government for an orderly economic transition from war to peace. These objectives include:

A. Prompt conversion of the economies of the world so as to maximize the production of goods and services required for domestic and foreign needs.

B. Stabilization of the general level of prices.

C. Equitable distribution of available supplies.

2. A continuation of some wartime controls may be required if the above objectives are to be attained. Control should be limited to products in global short supply, i.e., those which, in the absence of such control, would be subject to substantial world price increases. Control should be further minimized by limitation to products which are relatively important to stabilization, reconversion or rehabilitation programs. A tentative list of commodities likely to meet these conditions is appended.

3. The following procedure is recommended:

A. A committee should be created for each commodity for which control is continued and should be composed of representatives of the countries which are the principal producers or consumers of such commodity. Where Combined Board committees already exist they should be utilized and appropriately enlarged. These committees should in general exercise the functions now performed by the Combined Boards themselves.

B. The coordination of the American representatives on the committees concerned with food products should be centered in the Department of Agriculture and on other committees in the War Production Board or in such other United States Government agency as may later be established to take over the relevant functions of the agency. These agencies should be charged with the responsibility for consulting with all other interested departments and agencies of this Government on issues arising in the committees. The actions of the representatives of the responsible agencies should conform to the foreign policy of the United States.

C. Each commodity committee should be liquidated as soon as the conditions leading to its establishment, as stated in paragraph 2, have ceased to exist or as soon as it becomes apparent that the price increase which would follow the removal of control is necessary and appropriate to bring about the long term adjustment of supply and demand requisite to the restoration of a competitive market.

D. The Combined Boards as such should be terminated as quickly as practicable and in any case should terminate their functions immediately so far as each commodity is concerned for which a commodity committee is established. However, until the new committees assume responsibility in their respective fields, or whenever the prospective duration of the continued control does not justify or makes impractical the creation of new committees, the Combined Boards should be utilized to perform the necessary functions of control.

4. The effectiveness of the controls contemplated above depends upon the continuation of authority to control imports into the United States, to make public purchases abroad, and to control and to give priority assistance to exports from the United States of the commodities involved. Steps should, therefore, be taken to extend such authority if it should otherwise expire prior to the end of the transition period.

5. For illustrative purposes only a tentative list of products for which controls may be required follows. Such a list may be enlarged or reduced when supply requirements analyses, now almost completed, have been made.

1. Rubber
2. Tin
3. Bovine hides and leather
4. Newsprint
5. Lead
6. Antimony
7. Coal

Future of the Combined Boards. Reference my immediately preceding teletype.

In handing us the memoranda, the texts of which I gave you in my message under reference, Mr. Wilcox and Mr. Kennedy of the State Department said that the United States Government felt that the Combined Boards as such should be dissolved as soon as possible, but that there would remain certain commodities in respect of which there would be continuing problems, for varying lengths of time, of allocation and control. They, therefore, wished to propose the committee system to handle these problems. They said that their idea was that as soon as a committee was set up in respect of any commodity, the Combined Board, if still in existence, would cease to have responsibility for that commodity and the members of the committee would themselves take instruction direct from their Governments. Each committee would be attached in Washington to the appropriate department or agency of Government.

The following procedure was proposed as regards the meetings suggested in the first memorandum. The suggestions of the United States Government should be sent to the Canadian and United Kingdom Governments and to the members of the boards in Washington. As soon as the views of the Governments and of the members of the boards are made known to the two Embassies, representatives of the Embassies might meet again with representatives of the State Department to work out a series of meetings in which the problems of each board might be discussed and the future of that board settled in line with the general principles established for the dissolution of the boards.

I am, therefore, sending copies of this message and the texts of the State Department memoranda to Mr. Bateman and Mr. Paterson asking them for an expression of their views and I should be grateful if you would let me have the views of the Government and any instructions which you may see fit to send me. The United States authorities hoped that it might be possible for representatives of the two Embassies and the State Department to meet together again at the latest at the beginning of next week.

Your teletypes WA-5098 and WA-5099 of October 3rd, future of Combined Boards.

It has not yet been possible to obtain the views of all interested Departments. If you are pressed by the State Department, I feel it safe to tell them that we agree to the holding of discussions as soon as possible. In so far as the dissolution of the Boards is concerned, so long as a control comparable to that exercised by the Boards will continue to be exercised in respect to items in short supply in which we are interested, we are not likely to be particularly concerned as to whether this control is exercised by the Boards or by Committees. We welcome the inclusion of principal producers or consumers on the controlling agency. We have so far obtained the views of only the Wartime Prices and Trade Board on the items on which they would like to see international consultation and (where possible) regulation continued. The items are as follows:

Combined Food Board

All commodities at present under jurisdiction of Committees of the Combined Food Board, but particularly the following:

sugar

edible fats and oils meats
dairy products

Combined Production and Resources Board

textiles hides and leather

(I note that textiles was not included in para. 5 of your WA-5098).

Combined Raw Materials Board

The view of WPTB is that, while Canada has not been a member of this Board, Canadians have participated as observers on working groups in Washington and London concerned with the supply of newsprint and other pulp and paper products for liberated areas. If such consultations continue, it appears desirable that some form of Canadian participation should also continue.

If discussions are begun before you hear from us further, it would be well to ensure that our interests in the above Committees are brought to the notice of the United States authorities. Ends.

TELETYPE WA-5234

Washington, October 10, 1945

IMMEDIATE. Following for Dr. G. S. H. Barton, Deputy Minister, Department of Agriculture, Begins: Reference teletypes WA-5098 and WA-5099 regarding future of Combined Boards.

Mr. Paterson reports that at a meeting of the Combined Food Board held on October 8, a memorandum on the subject "Future of the Combined Food Board" was submitted for consideration by the members of the Board and received unanimous approval. The memorandum, which I am quoting herewith in full, was prepared at the request of the members of the Board by a special committee consisting of Dr. D. A. Fitzgerald, United States Deputy Member, Mr. Eric Roll, United Kingdom Deputy Member, and Mr. G. R. Paterson, Canadian Executive Office.

1. The Combined Food Board is to continue its operations without a definite terminal date on the basis of the statement issued by the President and the two Prime Ministers last January.<sup>71</sup> It is, however, agreed that the position will be reviewed on December 31, 1945, and on June 30, 1946, in order to determine whether the Board or any of its functions need to be continued for a further period.

Press release of January 19.

2. It is agreed that the Agricultural and Food Machinery Committee (Joint Committee with the CPRB), the Poultry Products Committee and the Tobacco Committee be abolished forthwith. It is also agreed in regard to coffee (which used to be dealt with by the Coffee, Cocoa and Spices Committee) that no separate committee be established.

3. It is agreed that the following Committees cease to exist on December 31, 1945, unless in the meantime agreement has been reached that any or all of them need to continue for a further period:

- Citric and Tartaric Acid
- Spices
- Essential Oils
- Vitamins

In regard to the last named Committee, it is noted that only Vitamin A continues under allocation.

4. It is agreed that the following Committees continue for the time being but that the position be reviewed not later than December 31, 1945, with a view to determining whether any or all of these Committees need to be continued beyond that date:

- Meat and Meat Products
- Cocoa
- Dairy Products
- Fishery Products (in respect of dried fish)
- Fruits and Vegetables
- Pulses
- Fertilizers (joint Committee with CRMB)

5. It is agreed that the following Committees continue for the time being but that the position be reviewed not later than June 30, 1946, in order to determine whether any or all of these Committees need to be continued beyond that date:

- Oils and Fats
- Sugar
- Cereals
- Feeds
- Rice
- Tea
- Fishery Products (in respect of canned fish)
- Seeds (in respect of legumes)

6. Rice. It is agreed that the position has radically changed owing to the opening up of supplying countries as well as with new claimants in the Far East, and it is recognized that the most urgent immediate problem is that of organizing the production and marketing of Far Eastern rice supplies. In order to cope with this situation, it is suggested that the Combined Food Board Committee on Rice shall continue as the authority for recommending allocations but that there be established two Sub-Committees, one situated in London, the other in Washington (or possibly in the field). These Sub-Committees would cover the newly-liberated Far Eastern producing areas as follows:

The London Sub-Committee would be concerned with India, Burma, Siam, French Indo-China and the Netherlands East Indies;

The Washington Sub-Committee would cover the Philippines, Formosa, Korea, Manchuria, China and Japan. These two Sub-Committees shall be concerned primarily with the problems of production and marketing. Their functions will be defined more closely later.

In addition to the above proposal, it is suggested that China be invited to become a member of the Committee on Rice as well as the second of the two Sub-Committees.

7. It is agreed that the general Committees which have hitherto been in existence (area questions, commodity questions and statistics and surveys) need not continue in being as formal Committees provided that the Secretariat of the Board is so organized as to ensure that general questions which cover a number of commodities or which raise issues which cannot be considered by a particular Commodity Committee are dealt with expeditiously. We will submit a separate paper on the organization of the Secretariat.

Comments by Paterson on the above are as follows:

(a) In accepting the dates for review of the position which were proposed by the United States member, Secretary Anderson, the United Kingdom member, Mr. Hutton, and Mr. Paterson did so on the definite understanding that June 30th, 1946, was the earliest date that the United States member had in mind for possible termination of the Board activities.

(b) Under Item 3, it was agreed that, insofar as Vitamin A is concerned, a special report should be made at the earliest opportunity. Mimeographed copies of the above memorandum will be forwarded as soon as available. In the meantime, it would be greatly appreciated if the Canadian position and comments were made known to us at the earliest possible opportunity, in order that we may be prepared to take part in the discussions on the future of the Boards referred to in WA-5098. Ends.

Washington, October 12, 1945

Reference my WA-5098 and WA-5099 regarding the future of the Combined Boards.

Following, for your information, is the text of a letter which Mr. Bateman has sent to Mr. Howe, dated October 10th, on the future of C.P.R.B. and C.R.M.B., Begins: Enclosed you will find copy of a memorandum on the future of the Boards forwarded to External Affairs from the Embassy.<sup>72</sup> You will probably have received a copy direct from External Affairs before this.

There is also enclosed a copy of a memorandum from the United States side of C.P.R.B. to Batt† recommending the continuation of a Combined Secretariat.

This morning I had a talk with Batt who, since his visit to Ottawa and his talk with you, has had an opportunity of a preliminary discussion with Clayton.<sup>73</sup> Later I saw Self.<sup>74</sup>

I asked Batt as to the feeling on the United States side regarding the recommendation for continuation of the Combined Secretariat and whether or not the State Department paper would preclude the possibility of this recommendation being implemented. Batt states that while Clayton was personally sympathetic to the continuation of some form of combined planning, he would meet with a good deal of opposition from a number of State Department officials. While the State Department paper would not preclude the possibility of the recommendation regarding the Combined Secretariat being discussed, he thought the chances were very heavily on the side of no action being taken. In fact, unless the matter was brought up by the Canadians or the British, he did not think the recommendation would be discussed at all. He expects further discussions with Clayton and with Philip Reed,<sup>75</sup> the latter having been asked by Clayton to get the views of some of the industrialists.

Batt's view is that the Combined Boards, i.e., CRMB and CPRB, should pass out of existence by 31st December. On the United States side he expects that a small international group will be retained which, on a staff level, will discuss or deal with problems that may arise. He visualized the possibility of an informal United Kingdom-United States group which would provide for an exchange of information and which would help to iron out the difficulties and remove the criticisms that arise between the two countries. He is apparently considerably disturbed about the lack of understanding between the two countries and the readiness of each to criticize the other. He considers such a group primarily a matter between the United States and the United Kingdom in which Canada would have no part.

I told him I thought that in matters of trade and finance, the Canadian-United Kingdom problems would be proportionately as great, if not greater, than those between the United States and the United Kingdom. His reaction was that he should establish between Canada and the United Kingdom an exchange of information similar to that which we visualized as a possibility between the United States and the United Kingdom. I told him that while, of course, there would be a direct contact between Canada and the United Kingdom, because of the importance of our relationship to the two countries, we occupied one point of a triangle, that the discussions between the United States and the United Kingdom might very well have an impact on Canadian economy and that I would not like to see this situation arise without our having an opportunity to sit in as an observer. He seemed to think there would be no particular objections to this. However, it seems to me quite obvious that a very substantial part of the United States thinking has given no consideration to Canada being in the picture after the dissolution of the Combined Boards.

On the British side it is expected that a certain staff will be maintained here until the Combined Boards dissolve and then will be moved over with the British Supply Council where they can still carry on discussions on a staff level. Batt, of course, had discussed with Self the suggestion he made to me regarding some form of combined informal discussions between the United States and the United Kingdom. Self, I think, feels with Batt that this is primarily a United States-United Kingdom matter and that if we were in the picture other Empire countries would also want to participate. Apparently Cripps is quite favourably disposed towards some form of continued collaboration but Self feels that if this developed into more than an interchange of information on trade and industry and matters of that sort, the proposal would meet with a good deal of opposition from the permanent service and would thus duplicate the attitude of the United States.

The general impression I have is that with the dissolution of the Combined Boards, both the United States and the United Kingdom would not be adverse to seeing us pass out of the picture. On the other hand, my feeling is that from the Canadian viewpoint, this would be a mistake.

We cannot obviously force our way in but, on the other hand, if an opportunity does offer to stay in, I think we would be wise to take advantage of it.

In view of this, when it comes to a discussion regarding the future of the Boards, as proposed by the State Department memorandum, I think the only thing we can do is play along except that we might express our appreciation of what has been accomplished through international planning and collaboration and to voice our disappointment that the State Department paper does not visualize a continuation of this collaboration in any form after the problem of shortages has been resolved.

I would like to suggest that you consider the advisability of discussing the matter with Mr. Malcolm MacDonald and telling him of our interest in any form of future collaboration between the United States and the United Kingdom. This would at least put the United Kingdom on notice of the fact that we are interested in what happens. Ends.

I should be grateful to have at your convenience your further comments to those sent to me in your EX-3595 of October 9th on this matter.<sup>76</sup>

I attended a meeting at the State Department this afternoon in the office of the Foreign Economic Adviser. On the State Department side there were present Messrs. Wilcox, Kennedy, O'Donnell; on the British Embassy side, Messrs. Makins and Hall-Patch; and myself from this Embassy.

Mr. Makins and I informed Mr. Wilcox that our two Governments agreed in principle to the proposals put forward by the State Department in respect of the dissolution of C.R.M.B. and C.P.R.B. I spoke, of course, in respect only of C.P.R.B. We also concurred in the memorandum on its own future which the Combined Food Board prepared,<sup>77</sup> the gist of which is that the position of this Board will be reconsidered at the end of this present year and again at the end of June, 1946. It was suggested, and generally agreed, that the provision for reconsideration at the end of June, 1946, would not necessarily preclude an earlier dissolution of the Board in the event that such earlier dissolution might be considered possible following the examination of the position of the Board which will be made at the end of 1945.

As far as the other two Boards are concerned, there was general agreement as to the urgency of setting up the continuing Committees, of determining the membership of these Committees, their location and the nature of the secretariat which will be necessary for their operation. It was further agreed that these were questions which could only be decided in consultation with the members and executive officers of the Boards themselves. These consultations are tentatively set as follows—in respect of C.R.M.B., Saturday, October 27th at 11.30 a.m., in respect of C.P.R.B., Monday, October 29th at 10.00 a.m. The United States will probably be represented at these meetings by Messrs. Batt, White and Whiting from the Boards, with two officials of the Department of State. The United Kingdom representation will be similar.

Our various communications concerning the future of the Combined Boards with particular reference to our despatches No. 2692 of November 17th† and No. 2764 of November 26th.†

As a result of further discussion on November 26th, the United States have abandoned their proposal for the establishment of a coordinating committee to replace the Combined Food Board during the period immediately ahead. The United States side had maintained (without any very explicit supporting argument) that a change in name and a broadening of membership of the central coordinating body, now known as the Combined Food Board, would have important political and psychological advantages. They had suggested certain other reasons for their preference for the coordinating committee arrangement which need not be examined here as you will find them discussed at considerable length in the minutes of the meeting† which will be sent to you as soon as agreement of the United States side to the minutes is secured. Against the principal United States objection to the continuation of the Combined Food Board it had been argued by the United Kingdom and Canadian representatives that there were also imponderable political and psychological benefits in retaining the Combined Food Board and that from an operating point of view changes in the membership of the central body for the relatively short period remaining would make for inefficiency in view particularly of the need for familiarizing new members and their staffs with the techniques developed through close collaboration among the United States, United Kingdom and Canadian members and staffs in the past. The United States side have qualified their acceptance of the United Kingdom and Canadian position by insisting rather firmly that in any public announcement concerning the future of the Combined Food Board [it] should be described as a "supervisory and coordinating mechanism" and that a statement should be included to the effect that "the Combined Food Board itself will be dissolved on June 30th, 1946 or sooner if conditions permit, although a few of the commodity committees may have to be retained beyond that date." We should be inclined to regard the acceptance of these two conditions as a relatively low price for the concessions which the United States side have made. We can see no real objection to the description of the Combined Food Board as a supervisory and coordinating mechanism since that is what the Board is at present in practice. Concerning the proposed terminal date, while we feel that it is somewhat unrealistic to select a precise date at this time, we consider that little will be lost by accepting the United States proposal since, in the event that some machinery proves necessary after June 30th to coordinate the remaining committees, the United States would probably recognize the need at that time as readily as we would. If, of course, the United States at that time opposed the further continuation of something resembling the Combined Food Board it would scarcely be possible for Canada and the United Kingdom to carry on without the United States. In other words, the most that can be secured at the moment is an extension of the Combined Food Board until June 30th, unless it is decided to terminate its operation earlier and we consider it better to accept this extension than any suggested substitute arrangement. On these points we find the United Kingdom representatives in close agreement with our views.

In my immediately following teletype† I am reporting the draft text of an announcement which it is proposed to make on the future of all three Boards. This draft text is considered acceptable by the representatives of the United States, United Kingdom and Canada who have participated in the informal discussion here. It is proposed that the press release should be made at 10:00 a.m. Washington time, Friday, December 7th, and we have been requested to let the United States and United Kingdom know urgently whether you agree and can clear the announcement within that time limit. It is understood that C.P.R.B. and C.R.M.B. are planning to call a meeting of countries other than neutrals represented on the commodity committees on December 6th in order to explain to them the new arrangements and that this meeting will be arranged as soon as the date of the press release has been confirmed by Ottawa and London.<sup>78</sup> A similar Combined Food Board meeting may be desirable.

I should say that there remain a number of fairly important questions of detail to be discussed (including the propriety of inviting the U.S.S.R. to become a member of those committees for which they have the necessary qualifications on the condition that they assume the same obligations as other members to exchange information, etc.), but it is felt that the agreement on the general public announcement, and even perhaps the issuance of that announcement, need not await the settlement of these various points. I shall be communicating with you on these points whenever they come up for discussion here.

Draft Note to U.S.S.R. Concerning Future of the Combined Boards.

The Soviet Government will be aware that during the period of war emergency the Governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada have endeavoured to secure the equitable distribution and allocation of foodstuffs, raw materials and manufactured products in short supply from their own sources and others to which they have had access through the medium of the Combined Food Board, the Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Production and Resources Board in Washington. Each of these Boards has set up a number of sub-committees concerned with particular commodities in short supply. Many countries with a major interest in the commodity concerned have been brought into close association with the work of these committees if their relationship with the Boards has not already been effected in some other way. Thus, for example, under the quadripartite protocol between the United States, U.S.S.R., United Kingdom and Canada any Soviet requests for supplies from sources within the purview of the Boards were sponsored before the Boards by the member country on which the request was placed.

It is the view of the three Governments that the Boards have performed an invaluable role in assembling facts, securing increased production and ensuring efficient distribution of commodities essential to the war-making capacity and civilian economy of the United Nations. With the termination of the war, however, the time has come to review the work of the Boards and to determine what part of their functions can be considered unnecessary or inappropriate in conditions of peace. The conclusion has been reached that the number of industrial commodities which remain in critical supply and which can be effectively allocated is not such as to justify the maintenance of the Combined Raw Materials Board and the Combined Production and Resources Board after December 31st, 1945, on which date they will accordingly terminate. Difficult supply conditions still persist, however, in rubber, tin, coal, hides, skins and leather, and broad-woven cotton goods and cotton yarn. It is accordingly being proposed by the Boards to the sub-committees concerned with these commodities that they should continue to operate for such further period as may be necessary in the light of supply conditions. As from 1st January, 1946, therefore, it is expected that these five committees will make themselves responsible for the continued allocation of such supplies of the commodities in question as are available to the associated Governments. For practical reasons, and in view of the temporary character of the arrangements, they will continue to conduct their business in Washington (and London in the case of the London Coal Committee). With the disappearance of the Boards, the responsibility for making procedural arrangements and for adding to their membership any countries which it may be desirable to associate with the arrangements by reason of their interest, whether as major producers or major consumers, in the commodities concerned, will naturally devolve upon the committees themselves.

In the field of agricultural products there remain a much larger number of commodities in critical short supply. These comprise beans and peas, cereals, citric and tartaric acid, cocoa and spices, dairy and poultry products, rice, seeds, sugar, vitamins, tea and fertilizers. In view of the inter-relationship of many of these commodities, it has been thought impracticable to place the committees of the Combined Food Board concerned with them on an independent basis at this stage, and the three member countries have accordingly reached the conclusion that it will be in the interest of all concerned to prolong the life of the Combined Food Board for a further period until 30th June, 1946. It is anticipated that the Board itself will be dissolved on June 30th, 1946, or sooner if conditions permit. After that date any food commodity committees which continue to be necessary for supply reasons will operate independently, as is proposed for the industrial material committees after 1st January. Meanwhile, however, the sub-committees of the Board, with which other countries are already associated as members, will continue the policy of enlarging their membership where this seems desirable.

The Government of the United States in agreement with the Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada have thought it appropriate to explain to the Government of the U.S.S.R. in detail the arrangements proposed for the allocation after the end of 1945 of these particular commodities which remain in short supply. The three Governments would be glad to receive any observations which the Government of the U.S.S.R. may wish to make in connection with the present communication, and to be informed concerning any interest which the Government of the U.S.S.R. may have in the work of these committees.

On the draft note to the U.S.S.R., I have indicated to the United States and United Kingdom that the version proposed on Saturday is generally acceptable to the Canadian authorities. The United States authorities have proposed the following minor changes which I mentioned to you on the telephone.

(a) In the penultimate sentence of paragraph 1, the word "has" should be changed to "had", making the final clause read "if their relationship with the Boards had not already been effected..."

(b) In the second sentence of paragraph 3, the words "and poultry" and the words "and vegetables" should be deleted and the word "dried" should be inserted immediately before the word "fruits." I have checked with Lewis of the C.F.B. who confirms that these changes are appropriate.

(c) In the fourth sentence of the third paragraph, the word "itself" is to be deleted after the word "Board."

(d) In the final sentence of the last paragraph of the note, it is proposed that the word "will" be changed to "would", making the sentence read "The three Governments would be glad to receive..."

Apart from these minor textual changes in the note, the United States had suggested a modification of the last sentence to make the invitation to the U.S.S.R. more explicit, but at the same time the United Kingdom had proposed that the invitation should be made even less explicit. In the circumstances, Wilcox of the State Department has indicated that he will attempt to secure United States approval of the original version in the Saturday draft and the United Kingdom representatives here have recommended to London the acceptance of that version.

I shall inform you of any further developments in connection with the language of the note in order that you might have the exact text for transmission to our Embassy in Moscow if you so desire, although I assume from your EX-4104 that you are prepared to have the United States representative make a single presentation on behalf of the three Governments. TOP SECRET

THE QUEBEC CONFERENCE, 1944

A second Quebec Conference has come and gone, the success of which has been fully the equal, if it has not surpassed, that which attended the first one held just over a year ago. Indeed, the similarity of the setting, the fact that the principals were the same as in 1943, and that the composition of the delegations had continued practically unchanged during the course of thirteen months, made it difficult at times for an observer to realize that the second Conference was not but a later sitting of the original meeting after a lapse of days instead of months.

2. The circumstances of this year's Conference, however, vastly differed from those which obtained in August, 1943. Then, the Italian Mainland was solidly ranged against us; the odds against a large-scale Allied invasion of Western Europe being undertaken in 1944 ranged, in the minds of certain sections of the Planning Staffs, from evens to three to one against; Japanese divisions stood in occupation of a section of the territory of India, and the whole series of successful United States and Australian operations in the Central, South and Southwest Pacific had hardly yet been begun.

3. Since then, Italy has been forced out of the war and is now seeking the status of a co-belligerent. In Western Europe, the German forces (having undergone further great punishment at the hands of the Russians) have lost a great battle and indeed the war, a fact which they plainly see but yet obstinately refuse to admit, to their ultimate disadvantage. Their Balkan position has crumbled, while their position on the Eastern front is not one from which they can derive much comfort. In Southeast Asia, Japanese forces, larger than any elsewhere engaged by the United Nations, have been thrown back into Burma, while in the Central and South Pacific the Japanese outer ring of defence has been smashed and the re-conquest of the Philippines is obviously about to be put in hand.

4. This great change in the military situation gave a note of confidence to the Conference which was absent a year ago. Indeed, it is to this feeling of victory that the speed with which the business on the agenda was transacted has been attributed. Whatever the principals may have intended, it is clear that on the first day the staffs were by no means sanguine that the Conference could be wound up within five days. Mr. Churchill and the President arrived in Quebec on the morning of Monday, the 11th of September, the Combined Chiefs of Staff met for the first time the following day, and the Conference may be said to have ended with Mr. Roosevelt's departure late on Saturday, the 16th. It was freely said that when Allies are winning complete accord and unanimity of view are easy of achievement. Possibly this dictum should be taken with a measure of reserve.

5. As was natural, the Conference gave much attention to plans drawn up to bring about the complete defeat of Japan. The Pacific area being under the strategic direction of the United States Joint Chiefs of Staff, the questions at issue were to decide the sequence of the steps that have more or less been planned in Washington to achieve this end, and also how best British Commonwealth forces could play their appropriate parts in these theatres of operations which hitherto, and actually still are United States spheres of responsibility. This latter point was perhaps the most contentious item on the agenda. The British were insistent that they had a score to settle with Japan and that they were determined to do so. They had, they said, a natural right to a seat, or seats, in the very front row and to this distinction they were in no mood to be denied. They eventually gained their point, though not without United States opposition, for it seems clear that as and when the measure of the British contribution of armed forces in the Pacific becomes such as to make it reasonable for them to do so, they may be expected to press that the management of the war against Japan be placed under the strategic direction of the Combined Chiefs of Staff and not left almost entirely within the discretion of the United States, a point which it may be surmised Admiral King<sup>80</sup> had not failed to foresee.

6. So far as the main strategy decided upon is concerned, it may be taken that the weight of operations will be through the Central Pacific, and for some time yet to come under United States operational command. Thus it may be expected that the final assault on Japan proper will be preceded by operations against suitable objectives on the coast of China and against the Island of Formosa. In addition, the re-conquest of the Philippines will be undertaken from the Southwest by General MacArthur, to whom a United States naval task force has been allotted for the purpose.

7. The operations to be carried out by the British cannot be so definitely stated. Apart from naval and air forces to operate in the Pacific under United States operational command, the Southeast Asia Command will undertake such operations as may be necessary to eject the Japanese from Burma and the Malay Peninsula, the first of which may not, in point of time, be long delayed. Thereafter, or perhaps to some extent concurrently, British Army forces based on Northwestern Australia will begin to move northwards, their probable objectives being firstly Borneo, and then the Chinese mainland at or in the general vicinity of Hong Kong. The co-ordination of possible British and United States operations against the Chinese Coast has yet to be arranged.

8. (The expected sequence and timing of operations have been communicated verbally to those principally concerned.)

Chief of Naval Operations of United States.

9. Needless to say, the question of Canadian participation in the Pacific war was also duly discussed but this has elsewhere been recorded.<sup>81</sup>

10. In addition to the grand strategy of the Pacific, major questions of the logistics required to support the proposed operations were also studied. The sea transport of the necessary forces from the European theatre to the Far East is of the first magnitude, and in consequence no easing of the present tight shipping situation is to be expected for a long time to come. For planning purposes the Conference took it that the defeat of Japan would require from 18 months to two years after the cessation of hostilities in Europe.

11. With the end of the war in Europe in clear view there was little down on the Combined Chiefs of Staff Agenda for that theatre of operations. One item only had been included prior to the opening of the Conference and this was the long standing question as to the division of Western Germany into British and United States zones of occupation. This question had long been debated and also deadlocked. In the British view the issue was fundamental. For centuries one of the governing considerations of their foreign policy had been to ensure that no Great Power should occupy the Low Countries lying across the narrow waters of the North Sea. For them the last four years had been perilous in the extreme; in future they were determined that there should be the closest possible association between the United Kingdom and, not only France, but also Belgium, Holland and Denmark. They knew where, in the ultimate analysis, security lay and they were in no mood to give way. If it was well enough, they argued, for the United States to maintain that the security of the Americas required them to establish bases ranging from Iceland to Dakar thousands of miles away, how much more absolute was their need for bases in the lands but a few score miles from their own shores.

12. Nor was the British view held only by the United Kingdom Delegation. It was freely stated that both General Marshall and Admiral King felt that the matter was of no military importance to the United States. Admiral Leahy, influenced no doubt by his experiences during the fairly recent tour of duty in Vichy France was reported to feel otherwise. Indeed, during the past summer there were indications in official communications across the Atlantic that, in the United States view France was for all practical purposes an enemy country.

13. The Combined Chiefs of Staff, having thrashed the question to and fro over several months, judged it to have become purely political in flavour and as such they submitted it for decision without further discussion to their respective principals. It is understood that a solution was found satisfactory to both sides, namely, that the British should occupy Northwest Germany and the United States the Southwest, but that in addition British forces should occupy all that part of Germany lying to the West of the Rhine, thus, together with the allocation of the port of Bremen as a United States base of supply, for all intents and purposes cutting off the latter's area of contact with the French.

My dear Sir Archibald Sinclair,

I am much concerned with the changes which have been made, are actually in progress, and are under consideration with respect to the Joint Air Training Plan. Changes either in the structure of the Plan itself, or its productive capacity.

Let me say at the outset that insofar as these changes may be considered a prelude to Victory, or an economy in finance and manpower, they are extremely welcome. The manner and method whereby they are brought about, and particularly whereby they are notified to the Managing Partner and Director, and principal financial contributor, namely, Canada, is open to the greatest objection from a Government and an Administrative standpoint. An attached list† of major changes within the past years will, I think, illustrate my point, but it is with respect to the last six months that I believe we have particularly sound grounds for complaint.

During that period we have been pressed on a high Government level, first, for a considerable expansion in the capacity and output of the Plan. Secondly, we had a visit from Mr. Malcolm Laing of A.M.T.<sup>82</sup> Department of the Air Ministry, who worked out, in conjunction with our officers, a detailed schedule of intake and output, of various categories of aircrew. Then, at the Quebec Conference, and in communications received later, grave concern was expressed at the possibility that Canada might fall short of her Aircrew commitments.

Acting on the information and recommendations of the United Kingdom Government, the United Kingdom Liaison Mission and Officers of your Ministry, we planned for an extension of productive capacity and put on an intensive, and may I say, successful aircrew recruiting campaign. The position now is that we have an ample supply of aircrew to whom as individuals we have promised immediate training, and we have a Training Plan working at peak capacity.

Then, on the 13th of November, the Right Honourable Malcolm MacDonald called on me on his arrival from Great Britain to advise that Air Ministry [had] now decided to close a certain number of Service Flying Training Schools and a corresponding number of Elementary Flying Training Schools.<sup>83</sup> This was followed by an official letter† and aide-mémoire dated November 15th.<sup>84</sup> Later by cable of December 5th,† from our own Headquarters in London, we were advised to hold back a very large number of aircrew who were scheduled to leave for Overseas on the 14th of December, as well as three other sailings scheduled to leave prior to the end of December. On the 11th of December, we were advised officially of the same request by the Right Honourable Malcolm MacDonald. Very naturally, compliance with these requests has occasioned a great deal of dislocation and expense and possibly may have brought about some deterioration in the morale of our personnel.

It has now been intimated to us, entirely unofficially, that within a short time there may be a request for a further curtailment of schools.

As I said at the outset of this letter, we can have no serious objection to such a request. Anything which will conserve our financial resources and save our young men from experiencing the hazards of training and our manpower generally for other purposes, will benefit Canada. But it is imperative that we know in advance what the proposals are and that we be assured that these proposals have been fully considered and decided upon at the highest Government level.

Therefore, while I appreciate that war requirements must of necessity be subject to continual revision, I should like to be given the assurance by you that you are cognizant of this state of affairs and that you are personally satisfied that these changes are essential. Further, I would ask that in future major changes contemplated be subjected to the strictest scrutiny by those concerned to ensure that no modification to the plan is asked that does not fully satisfy the above condition.

Moreover, the almost constant state of re-organization that we are experiencing as a result of these changes is bound, in the long run, to affect the morale and efficiency of the training force and perhaps lessen the quality of the output. It is having a disturbing effect on pupils and on the public at large. I am afraid that this complete reversal of policy with the resultant disbandment of Elementary and Service Flying Training Schools may lead to questions at the next Session of the House of Commons, which will be not only embarrassing but difficult to answer unless I am in a position to assure the House that such changes were absolutely unavoidable and essential to the successful prosecution of the war.

Dear Major Power,

You may recall that when the High Commissioner discussed with you the proposals for reduction in Air Training capacity in Canada (contained in the Aide-Mémoire which he communicated to you on 15th November), he expressed the personal view that these proposals would probably turn out to be only preliminary to a wider programme for greater reduction later on.

We have now been informed by the authorities in London that at a meeting of the Empire Air Training Scheme Committee held on 31st December which was attended by Air Marshal Breadner, some further consideration was given to possible future developments.

It was explained at the meeting that the United Kingdom authorities had given much thought to the problem which would arise in the transition from the first stage of the war to the second stage. It was pointed out that once Germany had been defeated, much fewer aircrews would be needed, because even if the total air forces were not then substantially reduced, much of them would be located in Europe where battle wastage would not be incurred. It was further pointed out that, as it takes about 18 months to train aircrews, it was desirable to plan that far ahead. Accordingly, if and when it became possible to assume that the war with Germany would end in 18 months' time, immediate steps would have to be taken to effect the progressive reduction in training capacity. The view was expressed at the meeting that, in the near future, we should probably have to make assumptions about the date of the defeat of Germany and adapt our plans accordingly. Otherwise, there would be a risk of large numbers of surplus aircrews completing training after the war with Germany was ended.

Reference was also made at the meeting to the shortage of manpower and to the extravagance in manpower in maintaining training capacity in excess of that needed to meet the requirements forecast for 18 months ahead.

The whole problem is under very active consideration with a view to deciding before the forthcoming Ottawa Conference on what assumptions future training plans should be based; but the United Kingdom authorities felt that you should be aware of the trend of the above discussion, although in fact it does little more than amplify what the High Commissioner has already intimated to you namely, that the reduction in training capacity already effected is likely to be only a preliminary to a wider programme of reduction which would have to be embarked upon later when the war situation became sufficiently favourable. They have asked me to assure you that you will be given the earliest possible intimation of any definite proposal for the further reduction of the training organizations in Canada, and that the plans for effecting any reductions would be worked out in full cooperation and consultation with the Canadian authorities and all the other partners in the Air Training Scheme.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, January 15, 1944

Dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

Many thanks for your letter of 12th of January which has crossed one of mine which I sent on much the same subject to Sir Archibald Sinclair. The information you have given me is most useful and I am grateful for this early advice.

I note with interest that the Air Ministry agree that it will be necessary in the near future to make an assumption about the date of the defeat of Germany and adjust training plans accordingly. This problem has been very much in my mind, especially as in our experience the total elapsed time from the date of enlistment to final acceptance in a squadron, due to congestion caused by over-production of trained aircrew, has been in excess of the eighteen months mentioned by Air Ministry. To this eighteen months or more must also be added the period of pre-aircrew training in Canada after enlistment in the Royal Canadian Air Force and prior to actual air training, due, as you are aware, to our need to ensure not only an adequate educational standard but also a pool of training material for the plan. Thus, at moment of writing, there is in Canada a supply of pre-I.T.S.<sup>85</sup> stage R.C.A.F. aircrew material amounting to normal intakes to the training machine of four months, i.e. 11,167 (R.C.A.F.). If, therefore, we are to avoid an excess of trained aircrew after the collapse of Germany, with consequent lack of air employment, discontent, etc., I think it is important that the assumption referred to above should be taken at once and not deferred until the forthcoming Air Training Conference which may or may not be held in March.

It would seem reasonable, therefore, that as the administrator of the Plan, Canada should take the initiative and proceed immediately with an interim reduction of training facilities up to, but not exceeding say 25%, leaving such further adjustments to be made when the ultimate figure has been decided upon by the Air Ministry in consultation with all partners in the Plan. This would have the beneficial effect of avoiding the sudden and drastic reduction of 40% foreshadowed as likely, and would permit us to take immediate steps to curtail enlistment of aircrew material which may ultimately prove an embarrassment.

Since these considerations also have an effect on the budget, it is desirable that our plans in this connection should enable me to make a reasonable forecast of the number of training establishments we will require during the financial year 1944-45 and to present a fairly stable figure to my colleagues. You will appreciate that the final budget figures must be presented within about a month's time, and should reflect such reductions in the B.C.A.T.P. as it may be possible to decide upon.

In addition you informed me in a recent letter<sup>86</sup> that due to the shortage of manpower in England it was very desirable to recall to England R.A.F. training establishments in Canada so as to provide much needed ground crews. My proposal to reduce the J.A.T.P. immediately by 25% would accomplish this very thing as it would obviously be expedient to make the reduction as far as possible by closing R.A.F. establishments in Canada and returning the personnel to England at an early date. It is in my mind that adjustments between R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. trainees in the B.C.A.T.P. could be made on the broad basis of entering into the B.C.A.T.P. schools in Canada 50% R.C.A.F. and 50% R.A.F., (the latter figure to include Australia, New Zealand trainees and Foreign Nationals).

It seems probable also that as a result of the saving in man power effected by this proposed reduction of 25% of the training organization R.C.A.F. personnel can be used to man certain O.T.U.s in Canada now staffed by R.A.F. personnel, the latter being returned to England to make good shortages there.

I will be glad if you will be so good as to transmit my suggestions in this connection to the Air Ministry and to request a very early reply as time obviously is pressing.

Yours sincerely,

C. G. POWER

Dear Mr. Power,

I am grateful to you for your letters of 12th and 15th January about changes in training requirements affecting the Joint Air Training Plan in Canada and I am indeed sorry that you should feel that you have cause for complaint about the way in which such changes have been brought to your notice. I am all the more pleased, therefore, to gather from your letter of 15th January that you are satisfied with the information which has been conveyed to you by our High Commissioner in Canada about the further changes now in contemplation.

The frequent and sometimes sudden changes in our training programme which have had to be made from time to time, have been forced on us by the march of events. The strategical and political situation changes rapidly and calls for frequent adjustments in the composition and distribution of our operational squadrons and these, in turn, react on the rate and the composition of our aircrew casualties.

Moreover, in the light of operational experience, many changes have had to be made in the manning of our squadrons, particularly the Bomber Squadrons. For example, as you will well remember, the decision to carry only one pilot in the heavy bombers caused a serious dislocation of the training programme.

For a variety of reasons, therefore, the planning of our flying training has been a very difficult and complicated task; and although I do not doubt that we have made mistakes, you will, I am sure, realise that in all that we have done we, like you, have had one object and one object only in view, namely to provide the Operational Commanders with the best possible aircrews in the right numbers and at the right times.

I am glad that you so readily accepted my offer that Harold Balfour and our Air Member for Training (Air Marshal Drummond) should go to Ottawa and discuss these and other matters with you round the table. They are leaving tonight. There is therefore no need for me to enter into further detail in this letter, which Balfour will deliver to you.

But I want to tell you how grateful my colleagues and I on the Air Council are to you personally and to the R.C.A.F. for the truly magnificent way in which you have responded to the many calls we have had to make upon you. The Joint Air Training Plan will always stand out as one of the best conceived and most efficiently executed measures for winning the war and it would be difficult to exaggerate the debt we owe to the "Managing Partner and Director."

Yours sincerely,

COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN; PROGRESS OF
CONVERSATIONS WITH U.K. REPRESENTATIVES

7. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported upon the progress of discussions with the U.K. Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Air and other U.K. Air representatives.

In connection with revision of over-all aircrew training requirements, the U.K. representatives had advanced as a basis for consideration a proposal which involved important policy decisions as to the nature and extent of Canadian participation in the air war against Japan. The United Kingdom suggested that in planning over-all reduction of the Air Training Plan, in anticipation of the defeat of Germany, it should be assumed that Canada would contribute squadrons and aircrew for the Japanese war, in the policing of Europe, and in ancillary air services, in the same over-all proportions to the total force, as at present. A further important assumption was that R.C.A.F. squadrons would serve with British and Allied Air Forces in the south-east Asia theatre.

8. MR. POWER submitted a draft statement of Canadian policy in respect to continuation of the Air Training Plan after March 1st, 1945. This was proposed as the basis for a statement to be communicated to the U.K. government through Captain Balfour.

The draft statement was to the following effect:

In the policing of Europe and in the Japanese war, Canada's contribution would be on the basis of a definite, as opposed to the present unlimited commitment. The process of demobilization must begin immediately upon the conclusion of the war with Germany and must be related to the policy determined by the Canadian government as to Canadian participation in the air war against Japan.

In this connection it might be advisable for Canada to participate in the Japanese war in closer co-operation with U.S. forces. If this were so, it would involve the unscrambling of R.C.A.F. personnel from the R.A.F., following the defeat of Germany, and the immediate preparation of plans for the return of R.C.A.F. personnel for regrouping in Canadian units and formations.

The Commonwealth Air Training Plan should be continued after March 31st, 1945, on the basis suggested by the United Kingdom, that is, a forty percent reduction in over-all training capacity. The objective of the Canadian government, however, should be to have at their disposal, following the conclusion of the German war, a fully integrated Canadian Air Force available for service in whatever theatre the government might decide that it could most usefully be employed.

9. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the statement submitted by the Minister of National Defence for Air be approved in principle as a preliminary statement of government policy in respect of the organization and employment of the R.C.A.F. in the period following the conclusion of hostilities with Germany, and as a basis for the revision of the Commonwealth Air Training Plan; and

(b) that, upon revision by the Minister and the Secretary, in consultation with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and approval by the Prime Minister, the draft statement be communicated to the U.K. government.

Dear Captain Balfour,

I am availing myself of your presence in Ottawa to hand you herewith a copy of an Aide-Mémoire of February the 10th, arising out of our discussions concerning the Commonwealth Air Training Plan. The contents of this document have been approved by the War Committee of the Cabinet as a preliminary statement of government policy.

I need hardly emphasize the high degree of importance and urgency which the Canadian government attach to this statement of policy.

[PIÈCE JOINTE/ENCLOSURE]

Aide-mémoire du ministre de la Défense nationale pour l'AirAide-Mémoire by Minister of National Defence for Air

MOST SECRET

Ottawa, February 10, 1944

Canada, which is making a full contribution towards the defeat of Germany, must now, on the assumption that Germany will be defeated before Japan, consider the position with respect to the Canadian contribution to the United Nations Forces in the war against Japan and in the occupation of enemy territories in Europe.

The Canadian government has been considering what should be its appropriate part in both these phases. It is of the opinion that the nature and extent of Canadian participation should be defined in advance, with as much clarity as possible.

Against Germany, Canada has been using all her strength. After Germany has been disposed of, the greatest emergency will be over, but heavy fighting will still have to be done in the Far East and much time may pass before a stable European settlement is achieved.

In the policing of Europe, any contribution by Canada would have to be carefully defined after consultation with other United Nations.

It is recognized by United States and United Kingdom strategic authorities that, in the war against Japan, physical conditions make impracticable deployment of the total manpower presently engaged in the forces of the United Nations. This being so, the Canadian government must now give careful consideration to the nature and extent of Canadian participation. The Canadian commitment must be determined in the light of such factors, amongst others, as Canada's place as a Pacific nation, her membership in the Commonwealth, and her close friendship and common interest with the United States, as well as her interest in completing the destruction of the Axis by the overthrow of Japan.

Any plans for the final campaign against Japan, which may involve the use of Canadian forces, should accordingly take account of the following amongst other factors: the deployment from Canadian bases of some part of the Canadian forces; the importance which the northwestern route to Asia, across Canada, may assume in the later stages of the war; the defence of the Canadian Pacific Coast; questions of supply and equipment. These and other related considerations may render it advisable for Canada to play her part in the Japanese war in very close co-operation with the United States, at any rate in certain operational areas.

The demobilization problem, which must necessarily involve the unscrambling of R.C.A.F. personnel from R.A.F. units, cannot be readily solved unless it is understood that after the German war is over R.C.A.F. personnel, who are presently attached to the R.A.F., will at once become effectively and unconditionally at the disposal of the Canadian government.

For all these reasons, plans should be put in hand forthwith to provide that, after the defeat of Germany, all R.C.A.F. personnel will be regrouped into Canadian units or formations.

The Canadian government is prepared to agree to the Commonwealth Air Training Plan being continued, as at present constituted, after March 1st, 1945, on the basis suggested by the United Kingdom government, namely, a 40% reduction in over-all training capacity. In so far as Canadian aircrew are concerned, however, the Canadian government feel that training should be so ordered that Canada will have at her disposal, after the period of deployment on the termination of the German war, a fully integrated Canadian Air Force available for service wherever the Canadian government may decide that it can be most usefully employed in the interests of Canada, of the Commonwealth, and of the United Nations.

IMPORTANT. Personal from Power to Sinclair.

Re Conferences held during the past week between Captain Balfour and myself, I feel it my agreeable duty to advise you that during the whole course of our conferences and discussions, Balfour showed not only a very thorough grasp of all the subjects but a willingness to see the Canadian point of view and made every endeavour to meet us. There were differences of opinion but due to his tact and diplomacy, it was possible to iron them out and achieve an agreement which will be unusually satisfactory to both parties. I am convinced that the decisions reached will be most helpful in increasing the morale of our forces, in encouraging them in their co-operation with yours and will be further evidence of the strength of our common purpose to defeat the common enemy. I much appreciate your thoughtfulness in sending Captain Balfour, Air Marshal Sir Peter Drummond, Mr. Howard and Mr. Laing over at this time. The general effect of their trip was to render unnecessary the holding of a large formal conference.

BRITISH COMMONWEALTH AIR TRAINING PLAN;
AGREEMENT WITH U.K. GOVERNMENT

27. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported that, as forecast in his report to the War Committee on February 9th, an Agreement with the U.K. government had been signed on February 16th, providing for a forty percent overall reduction in the output of the Training Plan by March 1st, 1945.<sup>87</sup>

In order to provide a working basis for planning this reduction in training output, it had been necessary to assume that the R.C.A.F. would be manning a certain number of squadrons after March 1945. For purposes of the Agreement this number had been fixed at ninety-three. Detailed arrangements for reductions in training intake were set out in Appendix "A" to the Agreement.<sup>1</sup>

Appendix "A" also set out "assumed forces to be deployed in the post-1945 war" and included 47 Canadian squadrons to the South East Asia Command, 26 to Europe and lines of communication and 20 to transport. This provisional allocation had been set down solely for the purpose of providing a necessary working basis for planning reduction in the training programme, without any commitment, and this had been made clear to U.K. representatives. Nevertheless it had been suggested that specific reference to numbers of squadrons and nature and theatres of employment might, in fact, lead to commitments as to the extent and nature of Canadian participation in the air war against Japan, and in the policing of Europe.

28. THE SECRETARY suggested that, if plans for the war against Japan and the policing of Europe proceeded to any extent on the basis of the allocation of R.C.A.F. squadrons set out in the Appendix, it might be difficult, perhaps impossible, at a later stage for the government to make other dispositions for the employment of the R.C.A.F.

Accordingly, it would be expedient to inform the U.K. government that the provisions of the Agreement for reduction of the Training Plan in no way detracted from the statement of policy contained in the Aide Mémoire handed to Mr. Balfour, that so far as theatres of operations or numbers of squadrons to be employed after the German war were concerned, no weight whatever could be put upon the provisional designation set out in Appendix "A" and that the Canadian government intend, after the period of deployment or [on?] the termination of the German war, to exercise effective control of all R.C.A.F. personnel.

29. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved signature by the Minister of National Defence for Air of the Agreement with the U.K. government, providing for the reduction of the Commonwealth Air Training Plan, subject to the despatch to the U.K. government, of a communication along the lines suggested by the Secretary.

Dear Mr. MacDonald,

You are aware that, on February the 10th, the Minister of National Defence for Air handed to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Air of the United Kingdom an Aide Mémoire containing a statement of Canadian government policy upon certain important points arising out of the recent discussions between our two governments regarding the Commonwealth Air Training Plan.

You will recall that the Aide Mémoire had reference to the position of the Royal Canadian Air Force after the defeat of Germany, and that, after drawing attention to the special factors which would affect the nature and extent of Canadian participation in the war against Japan, it expressed the willingness of the Canadian government to "agree to the Commonwealth Air Training Plan being continued as at present constituted, after March 1st, 1945, on the basis suggested by the United Kingdom government, namely, a 40 percent reduction in overall training capacity", and then went on to state the following qualification:

"In so far as Canadian aircrew are concerned, however, the Canadian government feel that training should be so ordered that Canada will have at her disposal, after the period of deployment on the termination of the German war, a fully integrated Canadian Air Force available for service wherever the Canadian government may decide that it can be most usefully employed in the interests of Canada, of the Commonwealth, and of the United Nations."

The Agreement signed, on February 16th, by Mr. Balfour and Mr. Power, on behalf of their respective governments, contains, in paragraph 1, a statement that the parties have accepted "certain assumptions for planning purposes", and Appendix "A" to the Agreement, establishing detailed arrangements for reductions in training, sets out the "assumed forces to be deployed in the post-1945 war" and a provisional allocation of ninety-three R.C.A.F. squadrons distributed between the Southeast Asia Command, Europe and lines of communication, and transport.

It was, I know, made clear to United Kingdom representatives at the discussions leading up to the signature of the Agreement that, for the reasons set out in the Aide Mémoire, the assumptions referred to could not be taken as implying any commitment on the part of the Canadian government as to the extent or nature of Canadian participation in the policing of Europe, or in the war against Japan. It is also recognized that the numbers and types of squadrons and theatres of operations mentioned in the Appendix are purely provisional and were inserted solely for planning purposes. Nevertheless, the Canadian government wish to avoid any possibility of misunderstanding which might arise in the future from the wording of the Agreement and, particularly, of its Appendix "A."

The War Committee of the Cabinet have approved signature by the Minister of National Defence for Air of the Agreement with the United Kingdom government on the understanding that nothing in the Agreement or the Appendix should be taken as modifying the statement of policy set out in the Aide Mémoire.

I should be grateful, therefore, if you would bring this communication to the immediate attention of the United Kingdom government, in order that, in planning future training and the disposition of squadrons at the end of the German war, they may be under no misapprehension as to the Canadian government's intentions in these particulars.

Yours sincerely,

W. L. MACKENZIE KING

My dear Prime Minister,

May I advert to your letter of February 25th in connection with the Aide Mémoire handed to the Parliamentary Under-Secretary of State for Air of the United Kingdom upon certain points arising out of the recent discussions regarding the Commonwealth Air Training Plan.

Your letter was brought to the immediate attention of the United Kingdom Government and I have now, in the absence of the High Commissioner, been asked to assure you that the assumptions embodied in the Agreement signed on February 16th were made for planning purposes only and are understood as not intended to commit Canada in any way as regards scale of her participation in the Japanese war or in the policing of Europe.

My dear Mr. Robertson,

I am sending you by hand a copy of a letter which I have today sent to the Rt. Honourable Malcolm MacDonald. The letter explains itself, but the background is this.

Air Ministry has known for some time that they have a large surplus of aircrew, over sixty thousand R.A.F. alone. Canada is producing for R.A.F. and for itself, yet we have been and are being asked up to this moment to carry out under the Agreement a gigantic plan expensive in money and manpower, with some fifteen thousand Canadians actually going through the process, none of whom may ever be needed either by R.A.F. or ourselves.

Air Ministry have shown to my officers, at least three weeks ago, copies of cables addressed to me indicating that they advise that the Air Training Plan be cut to practically nothing, yet Malcolm MacDonald has never received this communication for transmission to me.

I have deliberately avoided writing in the name of the Government of Canada in order to save you embarrassment, and have confined the issue to one between Air Ministry and my Department.

Yours very sincerely,

My dear Mr. MacDonald,

Under the terms of Article XIV of the Joint Air Training Plan Agreement of December 1939, repeated in substance in Article XXII of the amending agreement of June 1942,<sup>88</sup> all aircrew output of the Plan above Home War squadron requirements were to be available for service with the Royal Air Force.

This is a bilateral undertaking involving bilateral obligations. Canada's obligation to produce aircrews. United Kingdom's obligation to receive them.

The present Agreement expires on March 31st, 1945. Under the terms of the agreement many thousands of Canadian aircrew have been placed at the disposal of the R.A.F.

(1) Within the past few days, there have come from Air Ministry cancellations and suspensions of sailings involving many hundreds of Canadian aircrew output just on the point of embarkation.

(2) I learn from unofficial but authentic sources that it is the intention of the Air Ministry, even before the termination of the agreement on March 31st, 1945, to propose either to cancel its commitment to receive the Canadian output of aircrew or to indicate that its requirements will be reduced to a mere trickle.

(3) Unofficial but authentic reports now indicate that there are thousands of aircrew graduates surplus to requirements and that this has been known to Air Ministry for a considerable time, yet Canada, having received no official confirmation of that fact, has been allowed to continue the operation of the machinery of the Joint Air Training Plan, thereby aggravating the situation both for R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. by adding to this already onerous and expensive over-production.

(4) I suggest in all sincerity that even after making allowances for the exigencies of war operations, it would have been an act of elementary courtesy to a partner, which has fulfilled all its obligations, for Air Ministry to have formally notified the Department of National Defence for Air in Canada that such enormous surpluses of aircrew existed.

(5) Such early notification would have permitted this Department to effect substantial savings in finance and manpower.

(6) Will you be good enough to ascertain from Air Ministry at once and definitely and in detail just what are its present and future requirements in aircrew up to the date of termination of the Plan on March 31st, 1945. This in order that this Department may make such financial and manpower arrangements as will permit it to, on the one hand fulfill its obligations to the United Kingdom under the Agreement, and on the other, take such steps in the way of curtailment of aircrew output as may be necessary or desirable.

Since this matter of finance and manpower is an urgent one with us, I would appreciate it if you would cable Air Ministry for a reply.

Yours very sincerely,

CHARLES G. POWER

Dear Major Power,

The High Commissioner is away today on a visit to Boston, but before leaving he asked me to let you know that he has just received a communication from the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs proposing further reductions in the aircrew training organization. I understand that Captain Balfour, during his recent visit, foreshadowed further reductions in the organization in Canada and at that time indicated that reduction was likely to be at least 10 percent.

The Air Ministry have been endeavouring to arrive at a reasonably firm estimate of the further reductions necessary but they are not yet in a position to reach final decisions as the size and composition of the Force for the post-German phase of the war has not yet been agreed. In the meantime, the general course of the war and the planning assumptions which have been made in regard to the dates of the termination of the war with Germany and of the war with Japan render it essential that substantial reductions should be made in the aircrew training organization as a whole and it would be inadvisable to delay reductions until the ultimate requirements in detail have been worked out.

I enclose herewith for your information a memorandum on the further reductions now proposed in the Canadian training organization.† The High Commissioner was anxious that you should see this at once, but he will be back tomorrow and will be available to discuss the matter with you and to offer any further explanation.

The Air Ministry have mentioned in this connection that in the course of your discussions with Captain Balfour it was agreed that the Chief of Staff should pay a visit to the United Kingdom in order to discuss further reductions in the training organization. The Air Ministry mentions that they would like this visit to take place as soon as possible after the Canadian authorities have had an opportunity to examine the proposals which are made for further reductions.

Yours sincerely,

B.C.A.T.P.; FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS

10. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR submitted a letter which he had addressed to the Minister of Finance containing certain recommendations for settlement with the U.K. government on expiry of the current Air Training Agreement, March 31, 1945, and for subsequent financial arrangements. Copies had been circulated.

Under the original agreement, it had been provided that obligations, costs and residual assets, other than defence articles supplied by the United Kingdom and obtained under Lease-Lend, be apportioned between the participants as follows:

Canada 50%
United Kingdom 45%
New Zealand 2%

Disposal of residual assets would be a lengthy and complicated process that might delay final settlement for a number of years. Accordingly, it was proposed that the United Kingdom waive all interest in residual assets and be relieved of all costs of disposal of these assets subsequent to March 31st, 1945, subject to the qualification that the United Kingdom be given the right to receive, free of cost, any assets declared surplus, subject to cost of packing and transportation. In return, the United Kingdom should be relieved of liability to pay its share of outstanding obligations as of March 31st, 1945, and might, also, be relieved of liability for costs involved in winding up the B.C.A.T.P. subsequent to that date.

It was also suggested that Canada should not assume any financial obligation in respect of disposal of assets paid for in the United Kingdom and should, at the conclusion of hostilities, waive any interest in residual value of assets purchased for squadrons, reserve stocks and pipeline supplies. The cost of advanced training in the United Kingdom of aircrew replacements for the R.C.A.F. overseas squadrons might also be considered as offset by the cost of training R.A.F. pupils in Canada during 1945-46.

The whole situation had been discussed fully in London with the Air Ministry, and the proposals outlined in the letter to Mr. Ilsley should now be the subject of consultation with officials of the Department of Finance before being dealt with by the War Committee.

(Letter, Minister to Minister of Finance, Oct. 17, 1944, and enclosures—C.W.C. document 886).†

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that these proposals be referred to the Deputy Minister of Finance for consideration and consultation with officials of the Department of National Defence for Air, and report.

B.C.A.T.P.; PLANNED REDUCTIONS IN TRAINING; DISPOSITION OF SURPLUS AIRCREW

12. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR observed that the present Air Training Agreement of the B.C.A.T.P. would expire on March 31st, 1945.

Unofficial but authentic information had now been received that the Air Ministry intended, before that date, to take action which entailed such drastic reduction of air training in Canada as to make the continuance of the Plan, as such, impracticable. The R.A.F. were understood to have, at present, a surplus of as many as 60,000 trained aircrew. The Air Ministry had already cancelled sailings from Canada with the result that the numbers of surplus trained aircrew in this country were already large and sufficient to meet any contingency, irrespective of the 15,000 odd aircrew undergoing training.

In the circumstances it was intended that immediate steps be taken by the Department of National Defence for Air to bring the B.C.A.T.P. to an end. Action was being taken forthwith for the rapid progressive closing of schools so that after March 31st, 1945, there would remain only a small number of "shadow" stations which could be re-opened on short notice if the need arose.

Aircrew in Canada already trained would be immediately released and put "on reserve" so that their services could be recovered should they be required again at a later date. Trainees now in the schools, whose training could be completed by March 31st, would be retained until that date and then dealt with in the same fashion. All others not already in the training stream would be discharged forthwith. The R.C.A.F. would accept no further recruits in any categories.

In this connection a communication had been sent to the Air Ministry through the U.K. High Commissioner.

(Letter, Minister of National Defence for Air, to External Affairs, Oct. 16, 1944, and enclosed letter to U.K. High Commissioner).

13. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report.

*Minister of National Defence for Air

Ottawa, October 20, 1944

Dear Mr. MacDonald,

Thank you very much for your letter of the 16th instant and the information contained therein. In view of the uncertainty which has surrounded aircrew production for some time, I feel sure that you will agree with me that it would be to the advantage of all concerned to face the situation squarely as it exists at present.

A very careful and comprehensive review of the R.C.A.F. aircrew position has been made. I find that, as of October 6th, 1944, Canada had approximately 40,000 fully trained aircrew of all categories, to which must be added 3,500 in post-graduate training and nearly 13,000 anticipated graduates from current courses, or a total of 56,500 graduate aircrew.

Basing calculations on the European War being over by 31st December, 1944, a generous estimate of 23,000 has been made to cover the two-year replacement requirements for Western Hemisphere Operations and the 32 squadron force which it has been proposed Canada should provide for the post-German war.

After allowing for 5,000 casualties during the next six months (a high figure based on recent experience), plus the replacement of 18,000 tour-expired aircrew personnel, you will readily see that, as far as Canada is concerned we will have at least 10,500 trained aircrew personnel more than we require and that, therefore, no further aircrew production will be needed after April 1st, 1945.

In view of this situation (and I understand a similar one exists in the United Kingdom), the government has decided to cancel all Canadian aircrew intakes for those courses which cannot complete training before March 31st, 1945, the expiry date of the present agreement. It would appear that the operation of the B.C.A.T.P. as such, is no longer justified, especially as Australia and New Zealand are now in process of withdrawing, and that the Plan should be wound up as of March 31st, 1945.

I would ask you to refer to the "Balfour-Power" agreement of February, 1944,<sup>89</sup> which states: "It is agreed that, irrespective of any participation by the

Australian and New Zealand Governments, the Joint Air Training Plan in Canada will be continued beyond 31st March, 1945, to cover such aircrew training requirements as may be necessary to cope with the probable future war situation.”

We feel that in the face of the above figures it must be admitted that the requirements necessary to meet the war situation have been filled.

This decision should not be construed as indicating any lack of willingness to train Empire aircrew on the part of Canada. I am quite prepared to consider such training after April 1st, 1945, on any mutually satisfactory basis which may be agreed upon.

Recruitment for the R.C.A.F. has already been discontinued, and pre-entry aircrew to the number of 4,200 are being released from service with the R.C.A.F. and Canadian intakes to I.T.S. and E.F.T.S. have been cancelled. You are aware that Australia and New Zealand are not sending us any more personnel to train. Furthermore, I understand that the R.A.F. trainees flow to Canada has been temporarily suspended. It is suggested, therefore, that pending the completion of such alternative training arrangements in Canada as may be deemed desirable, that no further R.A.F. trainees be sent to the Dominion since they cannot complete training before the closing date of the schools, i.e. March 31st, 1945.

In order, however, to make quite sure that should unforeseen circumstances radically alter the present favourable war situation, we propose to maintain in being a shadow training organization of the nature outlined in the Appendix† to your letter of 16th October. This will consist of one I.T.S., two E.F.T.S.'s, four S.F.T.S.'s, two B. & G.S.'s,<sup>90</sup> two Navigation Schools, one Aircrew Graduate training school, and one Wireless School. These schools will be maintained on a care and maintenance basis at a high order of readiness. Buildings will remain heated, adequate staffs will be available to service equipment, and airdromes will be snow-compacted and available for use at any time, so that the whole organization can be operative at short notice. Should refresher training prove necessary, these schools will be available.

With regard to the number of R.A.F. trainees presently in Canada and awaiting training, it will be possible to absorb some of these into existing schools and finish their training before March 31st, 1945. Therefore, it is the intention to post to training schools such personnel, R.A.F. and R.C.A.F. as can complete current courses before March 31st, 1945, and your instructions will be sought in respect to the disposal of those R.A.F. personnel who cannot be so trained. Insofar as R.C.A.F. personnel who cannot complete their training before March 31st are concerned, they will be discharged. Those who do complete basic training will on graduation be posted to the R.C.A.F. Reserve.

AIR MINISTRY OBSERVATIONS REGARDING MAJOR POWER'S
LETTER OF THE 20TH OCTOBER ABOUT FUTURE
ARRANGEMENTS FOR AIR TRAINING IN CANADA

1. Major Power's view that the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan as such need not be continued and that such training arrangements as are needed after the termination of the current agreement should be such as can be mutually agreed between our two Governments, is accepted. It is not possible at the moment to state precisely the overall training requirements for the second phase of the war as these will depend upon the strength and composition of the target force finally agreed, including the contributions by the Dominions and Allies to that force. Furthermore, the actual date of the conclusion of hostilities in the European theatre may considerably affect aircrew requirements and training plans, if, in the event, it is very far removed from the hypothesis date which has been taken so far. Indeed, the war situation has already necessitated reconsideration of planning for Air Training purposes, on the assumption that the war with Germany will continue until June, 1945.

The following six notes were written on this copy of the memorandum:

2. The Air Ministry proposals provide for some restoration in the United Kingdom of basic flying training facilities, but the implementation of these plans depends in the first instance on the date by which hostilities in Europe come to an end. It is hoped, therefore, to conclude arrangements with the Canadian Government under which, if the re-establishment of this capacity is delayed by war developments, it will be possible to maintain adequate capacity in being in Canada. If this is not possible it will be necessary to improvise other arrangements such as keeping open schools in South Africa or Southern Rhodesia which would otherwise be closed.<sup>92</sup>

3. It has already been agreed that training courses should be reduced to the standard length with the object of training as many personnel by 31st March as possible, but it is desired to conclude arrangements under which all R.A.F. personnel, who have already been despatched to Canada, will be enabled to complete their training before they return to the United Kingdom even though this training extends beyond 31st March 1945.<sup>93</sup>

4. Whilst there are sufficient aircrew trained and under training to meet the planned United Kingdom requirements for some considerable time, it is not a practical course in the case of the R.A.F. to place them in a reserve. There are difficulties in the way of retaining them in flying training and it is not possible to keep them indefinitely without training. Policy will therefore be to release from aircrew duties those who are likely to be held up for an unreasonably lengthy period but to continue intakes to training of a limited number of new entrants. The Air Ministry therefore hope that it will be possible to continue the drafting of pupils to Canada as required, according to the capacity which can be made available in Canada for R.A.F. purposes.<sup>94</sup>

5. Another question which cannot be settled immediately is the O.T.U. capacity which will be required in Canada from now on for the second phase. It is hoped to be able to make final proposals on this question as soon as decisions have been reached to outstanding questions affecting the requirements.<sup>95</sup>

6. The Canadian Government will appreciate the difficulties in regard to forecasting training requirements. The Air Ministry are however in complete agreement with Major Power's view that we must deal urgently with the situation as it exists at present.<sup>96</sup> There are however bound to be many uncertain factors which the Air Ministry think could best be dealt with in

Dear Sir Patrick [Duff],

In reply to your letter of the 11th of November and the attachment thereto it is noted with satisfaction that the Air Ministry agree with the views I set out. Their willingness to conform is yet another example of the fine co-operation that has existed between us during the existence of the B.C.A.T.P.

It is observed in para. 2 of the Air Ministry's memorandum that it is hoped to conclude arrangements with the Canadian Government under which, if the re-establishment of training capacity in the United Kingdom is delayed by war developments, it would be possible to maintain adequate capacity in being in Canada. No difficulty is seen in making this provision and all requirements that can be foreseen will be provided for in the "shadow plan."

The desire of the Air Ministry to conclude arrangements under which all RAF personnel who have already been despatched to Canada will be enabled to complete their training before their return to U.K. can be met and arrangements to this end are in hand. The requirements outlined in para. 4 of the Air Ministry's letter can be met in the manner I suggested in page 2 of my letter of 20th October to Mr. MacDonald.

Finally it is not expedient for the Chief of the Air Staff to leave Ottawa at this particular juncture but arrangements are being made to send Group Captain Ireland, A.F.C., Director of Training Plans and Requirements, to England in about a week's time and the Chief of the Air Staff hopes to make a visit to England as soon as circumstances permit.

Yours very truly,

RE: WINDING UP OF FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS B.C.A.T.P.
MARCH 31ST 1945 AND SUBSEQUENT ARRANGEMENTS THERETO

My dear Colleague,

I submitted this matter some weeks ago to War Cabinet Committee and it was referred to your Department. It was understood that Dr. Clark was to get in touch with Mr. Norman, Financial Adviser of the BCATP, and the Officers of my Department. I am in fact keeping on the strength Air Vice Marshal Nairn who was to retire on November first in order that this matter may be dealt with by someone who is familiar with it.

My Officers now inform me that it is proposed to await the arrival of Lord Keynes before entering into any discussion of these matters. I suggest to you that the financial arrangements between the partners of the BCATP should not be subject to any concessions made to the United Kingdom Government in connection with any other matter such as Mutual Aid for instance, but should be settled on the straightforward basis of the obligations, commitments and interests of the partners of the Plan as such.

I would much appreciate it if you would ask Dr. Clark to get in touch with Messrs. Norman and Nairn so as to arrive at a solution of this matter as soon as possible.

It is the more important since I have prepared an announcement to be issued tomorrow that the Air Training Plan is winding up definitely on March 31st 1945, and that all Schools connected with it are to be closed.

Ottawa, November 18, 1944

My dear Colleague,

I have yours of November 16th, relating to the winding up of financial arrangements in connection with the Air Training Plan.

After Cabinet War Committee referred the general question to this Department, my Deputy had a meeting with Mr. Norman, Air Vice Marshal Nairn and other representatives of your Department, at which the proposals resulting from the conference in London<sup>98</sup> were again considered. My officials believe that, as a result of discussions at this meeting, it was unanimously decided that the question would have to be held up until the time of a general conference with the British authorities on the whole subject of financial relations between the two countries. Lord Keynes and his colleagues have been going to arrive in Ottawa for the last two or three weeks, but it is now definitely settled that they will be here next week. I understand that the primary reason for our officials reaching the unanimous conclusion referred to was that Lord Keynes had advised his Government that no decision should be reached with Messrs. Norman and Nairn about the future unless the past could be cleared up at the same time. In other words, he appears to be very anxious to reach some settlement about the past liabilities of the U.K. under the Air Training Plan, and he wanted his Government not to make any settlement about the future until consideration could be given to these old accumulated liabilities in connection with the general financial settlement. We understand that his advice in this respect has been accepted by his Government, and that he will wish to talk about these old debts during his visit next week.

Incidentally, I may say that my officials are not favourably disposed to any compromise in respect of the old debts, but merely felt that there was no use in talking to the British about the problems in which you are now primarily interested if their instructions were as I have indicated. I do not think there is any suggestion that financial arrangements between the partners of the B.C.A.T.P. should be "subject to any concessions made to the United Kingdom Government in connection with any other matter such as Mutual Aid for instance."

I also believe that it is the view of my officials that the questions which remain to be decided are primarily ones involving high governmental policy, rather than merely administrative questions which could be solved by a discussion between officials. However, I think that it would first be wise to see what attitude Keynes and his party do adopt, and we should know this in the course of another few days.

Yours sincerely,

J. L. ILSLEY

W/C Rylie
Mr. R. B. Bryce

The discussion commenced with Lord Keynes outlining their understanding of the original basis of the U.K. contribution to the current Air Training Plan. He said that originally it was expected that the U.K. would make their contribution in kind—mainly in Lend-Lease equipment and petroleum products—but that it was felt it would be more orderly if this were translated into a financial obligation toward which the contribution would be credited. Now, however, this expectation had not worked out and it was believed that the U.K. would end up with a substantial residual liability, which is now anticipated to be $266 million at March 31st. (This figure was corrected by Mr. Norman to something between $210 m. and $220m.) Lord Keynes said that the reason for this large liability of the U.K. is somewhat paradoxical, because it lies in the lower costs of many of the items of equipment which the United Kingdom had undertaken to supply. It appeared that the equipment required had not been as great as anticipated; that some was of a kind that could not be obtained on Lend-Lease but had to be purchased; that the anticipated cost of the equipment was too high, and, in fact, the costs had proven much lower, that the estimated costs had included Canadian taxes, which were not properly chargeable; that less oil and gasoline had been required than anticipated and the Lend-Lease component of the oil and gas had not been as large as was expected. For all these reasons the U.K.

contributions in kind had been smaller than was contemplated. On the other hand, however, the total cost of the scheme was not less than anticipated, and consequently the U.K. has a substantial liability remaining.

Mr. Norman, while not necessarily accepting all of Lord Keynes' points, confirmed that the original anticipations were not fulfilled. He said that the values of Lend-Lease items to be supplied by the U.K. had originally been set by U.K. officials and had proven to be too high in the light of reductions in costs. As regards gasoline and oil, the main reduction had been that the U.S. decided it would not pay refining and other costs in Canada but only the cost of the crude oil acquired. The cost for personnel and other types of expenditures had proven higher, rather than lower, but equipment had not. There had been a great many changes made in equipment right from the beginning. Mr. Norman said that arrangements had been made when the agreement was drawn up to include in the U.K. contribution the value of R.A.F. pay and allowances and payments on the Australian and New Zealand share in order to help bring up the total and not leave the U.K. with an undischarged liability. As regards equipment coming from different sources, the main change had been that Mosquitoes required for O.T.U.'s were produced in Canada rather than obtained on Lend-Lease. Mr. Norman said that the Canadian Government wanted the U.K. to take one-half the cost as its share because of Dr. Clark's fear that the items to be obtained on Lend-Lease would not amount to one-half the total costs. Dr. Clark confirmed that the way in which the agreement had been drafted (with U.K. assuming 50% of the liability) was due to his fears regarding the delays necessary in getting Lend-Lease supplies and his doubts concerning the willingness of the U.S. to furnish the equipment wanted on Lend-Lease terms. Lord Keynes said that the equipment asked for on Lend-Lease had been obtained in that way to a very large extent, but that it was the lower cost and values of it which had brought down the total value of the contributions. Only in the case of oil was it a matter of U.S. unwillingness to supply. Dr. Clark pointed out that for a time it looked as though the total costs would exceed the estimates and if that had been the case, Canada would have had to bear this excess.

Lord Keynes said that the U.K. had hoped to liquidate a good deal of the debt this year in respect of the first Air Training Scheme, but now that hope appeared to have been frustrated. Instead they must face a large accumulated liability on the second scheme, as well as the first. He asked what he could report to London as being in the minds of the Canadians in regard to this problem. Dr. Clark said that Canadian thinking had been mainly concentrated on the current requirements for Mutual Aid, rather than on the cleaning up of these arrears of obligations. If these arrears were added to the current requirements, they produced a staggering total. Lord Keynes agreed and said that he felt they should be kept in the background and should not confuse the immediate issue on meeting current requirements. There is everything to be said for treating them as a special question of different character to the remaining costs in Stage 2. Dr. Clark asked if Lord Keynes had any proposals to submit in regard to these accumulated obligations and said that Canada had not yet given a great deal of thought to the means of settlement. Lord Keynes said that his view was that the history of the obligation in regard to the second scheme was relevant and they were glad to have this opportunity to get some agreed interpretation of it. They do not wish to reopen the whole question of the apportionment of the costs of the scheme, but they feel the source of the accrued liability should be taken into consideration. He said it was unfortunate that it had not been arranged that if the U.K. were not able to obtain the necessary supplies and equipment on Lend-Lease, they should have been obligated to furnish them on some other basis, rather than assume a specified share of total costs. (Note—This is not what the agreement provided for.)

WINDING UP CURRENT PLAN

The discussion on the winding up of the current Plan and the settlement regarding residual assets was opened by reference to the earlier conversations both here and in London and to Mr. Norman's suggestion that the U.K. should give up its portion of the residual assets of the Plan in Canada and that Canada should give up its residual assets of the R.C.A.F. overseas, both sides to have the right to retain and transport to their own country equipment and stores they wished to use after the war.

Mr. Norman outlined the problem presented by the winding up of the Plan, which it had now been decided would conclude on March 31st next and would not be renewed. He said that $800 million had been spent on capital assets (apart from Lend-Lease equipment provided by the U.K.). If there was a residual value of 5% left in these assets when the Plan was finished, which he thought would be as much as could be expected, this would leave $40 m. to be divided between the participating governments. Allowance must be made for costs of disposition. There were also the "winding up" costs to be taken into account and which the U.K. was obligated to share under the existing agreement. It is impossible to estimate these in advance, and they depend very much on the policy to be followed in regard to the release of personnel. Thirdly, there are the commitments expected to be outstanding at March 31. These are now estimated to amount to about $30 m. of which the U.K. would be obligated to pay one-half under the existing agreement. Most of them are for orders which cannot be cancelled or costs of cancellation.[sic] It includes commitments in respect of Anson aircraft and Mosquito aircraft. The costs of winding up cannot be disentangled from the demobilization costs for personnel from overseas. Consequently, it has been suggested that the U.K. might give up its share of the residual assets and be relieved of its obligations in respect of winding up costs, costs of disposition of assets, and commitments at March 31.

Lord Keynes said that the U.K. felt the disposal of assets in Canada should be under Canada's control, and that they would like, if possible, the U.K.'s relinquishing of these residual assets to be balanced by Canada's relinquishing the residual assets owned by the R.C.A.F. overseas, apart from what they wished to bring back to Canada. He said that this exchange could hardly be justified actuarially but would be a very satisfactory arrangement from the U.K.'s point of view if Canada could see its way clear to do it. There was a brief discussion on this matter, and Dr. Clark indicated that the proposal would have to be taken up with the Canadian Government.

TRAINING IN 1945-46

It was noted that the formal Training Plan was ending March 31, 1945, but that there was some possibility the U.K. would wish to train R.A.F. personnel in Canada subsequent to that date. No definite figures were given as to the numbers which might be sent over for training, but Mr. Norman thought that the cost might amount to something as large as $30 million. On the other hand, there would probably be advanced training of Canadians overseas during Stage 2, which W/C Ryrie estimated might cost as much as $25 m. Mr. Bryce noted that neither of these items had been taken account of in the balance of payments, as both were indefinite and largely offset each other.

Dr. Clark asked what the possibilities were going to be of using for training next year the Lend-Lease equipment which the U.K. had supplied in the past. Mr. Norman pointed out that the U.K. had the disposal of this equipment and it would not be transferred to Canada in any event, but was, of course, subject to the rights of the U.S. He said it was vitally important for Canada to know whether it would be in a position to use this equipment without payment, or whether it would be necessary in some way to purchase or lease it for the period it was required for training during Stage 2. Lord Keynes said that they hoped there would be no difficulties from the U.S. end, and he thought the value of the use of the equipment might be offset against the cost of training U.K. personnel in Canada during Stage 2. Mr. Munro suggested that it might be satisfactory from the U.K. point of view and the U.S. point of view if R.A.F. men were trained by Canada at so much per head, the value of the Lend-Lease aircraft being credited against the amount owing. Mr. Norman felt there would have to be some form of written agreement on that point in order to make sure of Canada's right to use this Lend-Lease equipment.

Mr. Norman asked whether the general problem of the use or disposition of residual Lend-Lease equipment had been settled at all. Lord Keynes said that it had already arisen in regard to supplies in North Africa. The U.S. had made some inquiries of the U.K. and the latter had sent a rather unhelpful reply. At present the issue is in abeyance. Lord Keynes said that they had taken the view that it was not a departmental issue to be dealt with by officials, but rather a question on which the President would descend like God from heaven and decide whether or not the equipment was to be recaptured. The U.S. had considered selling certain surplus supplies to the Bedouins, but the U.K. had replied that so far as they knew the Bedouins had no dollars to pay for the surplus U.S. equipment.

PAYMENTS FOR RESERVE STOCKS

Air Vice Marshall Nairn stated that the Air Force was planning now to make a substantial payment in respect of reserve and pipeline stocks, as was agreed last August. They have had a detailed report† prepared on the matter by W/C Rhude. Rhude raised the question of whether the settlement to be made on the basis of his report was to be an outright payment once and for all, or whether there should be subsequent reviews of the reserve position and adjustments in the amounts payable. Mr. R. W. B. Clarke stated that there was a question of principle involved here, which ought, if possible, to be settled. Rhude pointed out that there might be two reasons why a subsequent review would show a lower figure than that for July 31st, which is now being determined. In the first place, there may be a reduction in the stocks held as the end of the war approaches, and in the second place, there may be an increase in the proportion of Lend-Lease equipment held by Canadian squadrons.

Lord Keynes said that he had understood the settlement was to be made once and for all on the basis of the figures established for July 31st, but if Canada pressed to have a review made, they could hardly resist. He hoped Canada would not press. If there are to be subsequent reviews, it will be difficult to take care of obsolescent equipment and in effect it would be apt to throw the cost of obsolescence on the U.K. Obsolescence which had taken place prior to July 31st last was not taken into account, because obsolete stocks were not to be included in the reserves in which Canada would share. To make a once and for all settlement, therefore, was not fair to the U.K. in regard to the past nor wholly fair to Canada in the future, but constituted a fair compromise. There was brief discussion on this issue, but no conclusion reached. It was recognized that the question of subsequent reviews of the figure used was bound up with the problem of recognizing obsolescence of equipment.

ADJUSTMENT FOR LEND-LEASE TRANSFERS

W/C Ryrie raised the subject of the adjustment to be made on squadron charges by reason of Lend-Lease equipment transferred to them. Dr. Clark said that last summer it was expected that Canada would pay the U.S. for the estimated Lend-Lease transfers, but that in the light of recent discussions it may still be an open question. Lord Keynes said he hoped it would be possible to find a way around this problem not at once, but when the right time comes to raise it in Washington. In the meantime they would attempt informally to find out if there is some legal way of avoiding payment by Canada to the U.S., particularly where the U.K. is not getting a direct payment for identifiable articles. He thought it might be possible for the U.S. Government to rule that the U.K. is using as much as they are getting by Lend-Lease, and consequently that they would not look to a third party obtaining some Lend-Lease equipment via the U.K. This doctrine of substitution has not yet been applied to munitions, but it has already been extensively applied in respect of non-munitions. There may be some difficulties in applying it to certain items, he said in reply to Dr. Clark, and some need to compromise. This doctrine of substitution had been devised to facilitate efficient operations and prevent Treasury reasons interfering with the most effective physical disposition of supplies. Mr. Goshen noted that it had been the same principle that made possible the Lend-Lease of Canadian loadings of munitions, since the U.K. had shown that they would be able to use their own boats for this purpose and have

U.S. boats used on other items that were eligible for Lend-Lease shipment, but that this would be less efficient than the arrangements in fact being made and that efficiency should not be jeopardized by the need to alter arrangements to bring them within Lend-Lease possibilities. There was some discussion regarding the timing of a decision on this Lend-Lease question, particularly as to whether or not it was necessary or desirable before the end of this fiscal year. Dr. Clark stated that it was not feasible from Canada's standpoint to leave it over until a general settlement of Lend-Lease arrangements at the end of the war. Canada could not afford to have a large liability for U.S. dollars hanging over its head; either Canada had to pay U.S. dollars in the near future or the U.K. had to accept responsibility for a settlement with the United States.

In regard to current operations, W/C's Rhude and Ryrie stated that the U.K. had not yet begun to charge the R.C.A.F. on a basis excluding Lend-Lease, even though, as Mr. Clarke indicated, the Air Ministry was forecasting its receipts on a net basis. Canada was making payments this current year on the basis of Canadian estimates of what the squadron charges would be, which come out very closely to the charges that are calculated in detail subsequently. They have not received bills as yet for the current fiscal year. There was general agreement with Lord Keynes' view that it would not be desirable for the Air Ministry to bill the R.C.A.F. on a basis excluding the Lend-Lease equipment, and Lord Keynes indicated that he would have that matter taken up with the Air Ministry.

RE: CONTINUED R.A.F. TRAINING IN CANADA; REPORT OF SUB-COMMITTEE

INTRODUCTION

1. On February 14th, the War Committee were informed by the Acting Minister of National Defence for Air that the U.K. Air Ministry wished to have certain limited R.A.F. training continued in Canada, after the expiry date of the Commonwealth Air Training Plan. After discussion, the Air Ministry's proposals were referred for examination and report as to financial aspects to the Departments of National Defence for Air and Finance.

The Air Ministry's proposals contemplate re-opening for R.A.F. training: 2 elementary flying schools, 3 service flying schools, 2 air navigation schools and certain operational training facilities; and for the Fleet Air Arm: 1 elementary and 1 service flying school; training to commence April 1st, 1945, reaching a peak in June with a pupil population of about 3,700; the programme to extend over approximately 12 months.

2. On February 21st, the question was again discussed by the War Committee, when the Acting Minister and the Chief of the Air Staff reported that the grounds advanced by the Air Ministry in support of their request for Canadian agreement to their proposals were as follows:

- (a) facilities—lack of aerodrome facilities in Great Britain;
- (b) time loss—the delay that would result if facilities had to be created in South Africa, if not made available in Canada;
- (c) transportation—the disadvantages of training in South Africa consequent upon shipping and other problems;
- (d) manpower—the extreme shortage of trained staffs in Great Britain.

3. The Chief of the Air Staff has also reported to the War Committee that the R.A.F. have turned over to the Army all of their previous surplus of trained aircrew, and that they now have no reserves to meet future operational requirements.

4. At the meeting of February 21st, it was reported, on behalf of the Department of Finance, that the Air Ministry's proposals might well be accepted, subject to the department's concurrence in detailed financial arrangements, and subject to the U.K. government securing the consent of the U.S. government to the provision of Lease-Lend supplies.

5. The War Committee then referred the whole question for examination and report to the present sub-committee, consisting of the Ministers of National Defence, the Minister of Munitions and Supply and the Minister of Justice, together with the Chief of the Air Staff, the Secretary and the Military Secretary.

PRESENT POSITION; TERMINATION OF
B.C.A.T.P. MARCH 31ST, 1945

6. On October 19th, 1944, on the recommendation of the then Minister, the government decided to discontinue all Commonwealth training as of March 31st, 1945, the expiry date of the current B.C.A.T.P. agreement. By this date it was expected that the supply of aircrew would be sufficient to meet any contingency.

This decision was made public by the Minister on November 17th and the liquidation of the Plan has been proceeding progressively since then.

7. In informing the U.K. government of the decision to terminate the Plan and to complete the closing of all schools by the following March 31st, it is to be noted that the Minister apparently contemplated the possibility of continuing some R.A.F. training in Canada after March 31st. In a letter of October 20th to the U.K. High Commissioner, Mr. Power expressed willingness to continue such further training on any mutually satisfactory basis which might be agreed upon.

There seems no doubt that the prospect of some continued training, after March 31st, was envisaged by both the U.K. Air Ministry and National Defence for Air and subsequent correspondence and conversations have proceeded on this understanding.

8. The sub-committee are informed by the Chief of the Air Staff that by March 31st next, all Australian and New Zealand aircrew in training in Canada will have graduated. All Canadian trainees in the Plan will also have completed their basic training by that date.

The last R.A.F. pupils capable of graduating by March 31st, entered the Plan on November 6th last. Since then, however, some 400 R.A.F. student pilots and navigators were accepted for training in Canadian schools without provision for the continuance of their training beyond March 31st, and, unless a decision is taken to the contrary, a monthly flow of U.K. trainees into Canadian schools will continue up to the end of March.

R.C.A.F. TRAINING AFTER MARCH 31ST, 1945; EUROPEAN AND PACIFIC REQUIREMENTS

9. The sub-committee are informed by the Chief of the Air Staff that for the purpose of maintaining R.C.A.F. squadrons engaged in the war against Germany and to be retained for the continuation of the war against Japan, it is planned to carry on certain R.C.A.F. training activities after March 31st. These will be on a limited scale and will consist of refresher courses and operational training, utilizing aircrew in the Force.

IMPLICATIONS OF ACCEPTING AIR MINISTRY'S PROPOSALS; MANPOWER; FINANCE

10. The total staff required for the establishments contemplated by the Air Ministry's proposals is estimated at a total of 12,000. Of these, 3,000 would, in any event, be needed for continued R.C.A.F. training for Phase II (See para. 9 above).

The net additional personnel involved would, therefore, total some 9,000.

11. In large measure the equipment needs for the programme proposed can be satisfied from items already procured on B.C.A.T.P. account. It will be necessary to procure stores in limited quantities only, including bombs and ammunition, spares, crude petroleum for the production of oil and petrol, and possibly a few aircraft of operational types.

12. The overall cost of the training programme proposed by the Air Ministry is estimated at $35 millions.

Towards meeting this cost, it is estimated that the U.K. government would be able to contribute stores and equipment (to be obtained in large part from the United States under Lease-Lend) to a value of $16 millions, leaving a balance of $19 millions, which would be the estimated net cost of the training to the Canadian government.

It is estimated, however, that stores and equipment required for the proposed continued R.A.F. training programme would amount to only $7 millions, which would leave a balance of supplies valued at $9 millions available to the R.C.A.F. for their own use, thus reducing the R.C.A.F. cash requirements for training after March 31st by that amount.

13. It is pointed out by the Financial Adviser to the B.C.A.T.P. that equipment previously supplied under Lease-Lend arrangements is available to Canada only so long as R.A.F. training is being conducted in this country.

Should R.A.F. training in Canada be entirely discontinued, it is understood that such equipment would be subject to withdrawal by the United States. This has a direct bearing upon the programme of refresher and operational training planned by the R.C.A.F. subsequent to March 31st next (see para. 9 above), since this programme is dependent upon the availability of Lease-Lend aircraft, equipment and supplies, valued at approximately $23 millions.

RECOMMENDATIONS

14. Having considered the situation as set out above, the sub-committee recommend that the War Committee approve acceptance of the U.K. Air Ministry's proposals for continued R.A.F. training in Canada after March 31st, 1945, and the conclusion of an agreement between the two governments for this purpose, on the following conditions:

(a) that such training be continued for a limited period only not exceeding one year from April 1st, 1945, and, in any event, that it be limited to the training of aircrew estimated to be required for operational employment in the war against Germany and Japan;

(b) that the U.K. government undertake to transfer training from Canada to the British Isles as soon as operational and other conditions in the United Kingdom permit, and that trainees be taken back progressively to U.K. schools as and when this becomes feasible;

(c) that the agreement be terminable by either government upon notice of, say, two months; and

(d) that the terms of the agreement be settled between officials of the Departments of National Defence for Air and Finance, and approved by the Ministers of both departments prior to submission to the War Committee for the purpose of authorizing execution on behalf of the government.<sup>99</sup>

AIR FORCE; REQUEST FOR ADDITIONAL
R.A.F. TRAINING IN CANADA

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the War Committee meeting of March 14th, reported that the U.K. government had now requested a small addition to continued R.A.F. training in Canada.

The request involved the training of a total of 814 additional aircrew, 286 navigators, 198 air bombers, and 330 instructors, to March 31st, 1946. No additional schools would have to be opened and estimated cost would be $3,185,000.

Since training facilities were not available in the United Kingdom, it was recommended that the request be accepted and this additional provision be included in the memorandum of agreement to be entered into between the two countries as a result of the War Committee's decision of March 14th.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(Minister's memorandum to War Committee, April 18,† and attached letter, U.K. High Commissioner to the Minister, April 13, 1945†—C.W.C. document 980).

9. THE COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that provision for additional R.A.F. training to the extent indicated might be included in the final agreement with the United Kingdom which would then be submitted to Council for authorization.

organization for the period from the first day of July, 1942 to the thirty-first day of March, 1945;

AND WHEREAS Article 14 (d) of the said Agreement provided that should changes in training arrangements occur which, in the opinion of the Financial Adviser appointed in accordance with Article 21 of the said Agreement, materially affect the cost of the organization, the liabilities accepted by the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand would be adjusted accordingly;

AND WHEREAS, such changes having occurred, it is desirable to adjust the said liabilities as provided in the said Agreement;

It is therefore agreed as follows:

1. In lieu of the liability for the sum of seven hundred and twenty-three million dollars Canadian (less payments received by the Government of Canada from or on behalf of the Governments of Australia and New Zealand in respect of training for the period from the first day of July, 1942, to the thirty-first day of March, 1945, under the provisions of Article 20 of the 1942 Agreement) assumed by the Government of the United Kingdom, by Article 14(a) of the 1942 Agreement the Government of the United Kingdom shall assume a liability for one-half the total cost of the combined training organization for the period from the first day of July, 1942, to the thirty-first day of March, 1945 (hereinafter referred to as the "training period"), less payments received by the Government of Canada from or on behalf of the Governments of Australia and New Zealand in respect of training for the period from the first day of July, 1942 to the thirty-first day of March, 1945, under the provisions of Article 20 of the 1942 Agreement;

2. In determining the total cost of the combined training organization:

(a) there shall be included the costs necessarily incurred during the training period in the process of any winding up of the said organization which may have commenced prior to the thirty-first day of March, 1945;

(b) there shall be deducted:

(i) the amounts received in respect of assets, other than scrap, disposed of during the training period;

(ii) the fair value, to be determined as hereinafter provided, of assets transferred to any department or agency (except assets transferred to War Assets Corporation for disposal or to other Government agencies for care and maintenance) of the Government of Canada for which no amount is received under paragraph (i) hereof;

(c) Article 19 (d) (v) and 19 (d) (vi) of the 1942 Agreement shall be deemed to include all grants and gratuities paid upon demobilization and the cost of educational benefits, resettlement schemes, vocational training and all other benefits provided upon demobilization including costs of demobilization and demobilization leave;

(d) the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada shall each be financially responsible for the demobilization of its own personnel serving with the combined training organization either as staff or pupils, except that the Government of Canada, as administrator of the combined training organization, shall bear the following costs:

(i) the costs up to a demobilization centre in Canada in respect of all personnel who are demobilized in Canada;

(ii) the costs up to the date and place of embarkation in North America in respect of personnel who are not demobilized in Canada;

3. For the purpose of Article 1 of this Agreement, the total cost of the combined training organization shall be determined by adding to the statement of total expenditure appearing in the "Statement of Expenditures British Commonwealth Air Training Plan, No. 2" to be prepared as of the thirty-first day of March, 1945, by the Comptroller of the Treasury of the Government of Canada in accordance with Article 2 hereof, the amounts mentioned in Article 4 hereof, and deducting therefrom the amounts mentioned in Article 5 hereof;

4. The amounts to be added to the said statement of total expenditure pursuant to Article 3 hereof are as follows:

(a) the fair value, to be determined as hereinafter provided, of any assets transferred to the combined training organization by any department or agency of the Government of Canada during the training period and which are not included in the said statement of total expenditure;

(b) any other expenditure not included in the said statement of total expenditure but agreed by authorized representatives of the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada, to be properly chargeable to the costs of the combined training organization;

5. The amounts to be deducted from the said statement of total expenditure pursuant to Article 3 hereof are as follows:

(a) expenditures incurred in the manning and recruiting of all R.C.A.F. personnel (except those required as staff of the combined training organization) and in the training of R.C.A.F. ground personnel for service outside of the combined training organization;

(b) the fair value of any assets, referred to in Article 2(b) (ii) hereof, which have not been included in the said statement of total expenditure;

(c) amounts covered by the settlement relating to the costs of air training in Canada prior to the first day of July, 1942, authorized by Order-in-Council of the Government of Canada, P.C. 107/7730 dated the sixth day of October, 1943† and agreed by authorized representatives of the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada as being included in the said statement of total expenditure;

(d) any expenditure included in the said statement of total expenditure but agreed by authorized representatives of the Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada not to be chargeable to the combined training organization;

6. The Government of Canada shall have complete authority in connection with the disposal of assets of the combined training organization, except assets which are definitely identifiable as having been wholly or almost wholly supplied to the Government of the United Kingdom by the Government of the United States of America under the Lease-Lend Act.

7. In determining the fair value of any asset transferred as contemplated by Articles 2(b) (ii) and 4(a) of this Agreement regard shall be had primarily to its value in the use to which it is to be put, or to which it is likely to be put within the foreseeable future, but consideration may also be given to its actual initial cost, the extent to which such cost was abnormal and its estimated useful life;

8. The fair value of any asset transferred as contemplated by Article 2(b) (ii) and 4(a) of this Agreement as agreed between the Department of National Defence (Air) and the Department or Agency of the Government of Canada from or to which it is transferred shall be subject to the approval of the Financial Adviser appointed in accordance with Article 21 of the 1942 Agreement;

9. The Governments of Australia and New Zealand, having renounced all claims to residual assets under Article 27 of the 1942 Agreement, have been relieved of all liabilities and costs under the said Article;

10. The provisions of Article 27 of the 1942 Agreement shall be cancelled and in place thereof the following shall be substituted:

“On the termination of this Agreement, any obligations accruing in respect of the combined training organization, and any costs necessarily incurred in the process of winding up the organization, shall be borne by the Government of Canada. Residual assets, other than defence articles supplied to the Government of the United Kingdom by the Government of the United States of America under the Lease-Lend Act shall become the property of Canada.”

11. Notwithstanding the provisions of Article 10 hereof, the Government of Canada shall make available to the Government of the United Kingdom without cost, any equipment acquired for the purpose of the combined training organization and declared surplus to the requirements of the Canadian Armed Forces and junior training organizations and civil flying clubs in Canada, which the Government of the United Kingdom may require for Air Force purposes, or in order to make contributions to junior training organizations or civil flying clubs in the United Kingdom, provided that the Government of the United Kingdom shall bear the costs of transporting and packing such equipment.

MEMORANDUM OF AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE GOVERNMENT OF THE UNITED KINGDOM AND THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA CONCERNING THE TRAINING OF AIRCREWS AND CERTAIN RELATED MATTERS

Signed at Ottawa, July 5, 1945

1. For the purpose of this Agreement:

(a) "U.K. aircrew" shall be deemed to include pupils of the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy and pupils sent by the Government of the United Kingdom from any allied country or from any part of the British Commonwealth other than Canada, Australia and New Zealand.

(b) "U.K. staff personnel" shall be deemed to include personnel loaned by the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy for the purposes of carrying out this Agreement.

2. The Government of the United Kingdom and the Government of Canada agree that joint arrangements for the training in Canada of U.K. aircrew and R.C.A.F. pupils shall be continued under this Agreement after 31st March, 1945, on which date the Agreement between the Governments of the United Kingdom, Canada, Australia and New Zealand dated 5th June, 1942, providing for the training of aircrew in Canada, terminated.

3. This agreement shall be in force from 1st April 1945, until 31st March, 1946, provided, however, that it may be terminated at any time by either Government upon two months' notice.

4. The Government of the United Kingdom undertakes to transfer all U.K. aircrew from Canada to the United Kingdom for training as soon as operational and other pertinent conditions permit, and that trainees be taken back progressively to United Kingdom schools, as and when this becomes feasible.

5. The Government of Canada agrees to accept for training all U.K. aircrew sent by the Government of the United Kingdom provided that the number of U.K. aircrew in training (exclusive of operational training) shall not at any one time exceed:

Elementary Flying Training School .....	400 pupils
Service Flying Training School .....	720 pupils
Elementary Flying Training School (Royal Navy) .....	280 pupils
Service Flying Training School (Royal Navy) .....	280 pupils
Air Navigation School .....	1,380 pupils
Bombing and Gunnery School .....	180 pupils
Central Flying School .....	60 pupils

6. The operational training organizations as now constituted shall be maintained and operated at the presently planned capacity and the training of U.K. aircrew therein shall be in such numbers and categories as may be agreed upon from time to time between the two Governments.

7. Notwithstanding Articles 5 and 6, the Government of the United Kingdom agrees that the training of U.K. aircrew under this Agreement shall not exceed the estimated aircrew requirements intended for operational employment in the war against Germany and Japan.

8. The Government of Canada agrees to provide, maintain and operate the necessary training organization for the efficient carrying out of the training provided for in this Agreement.

9. The type of aircraft to be used for the training of aircrew shall be such as may be agreed upon from time to time between the two Governments.

10. The courses of training to be given shall be in accordance with such syllabi of instructions and of such lengths as may be agreed upon from time to time between the two Governments.

11. Except as provided in Article 12, the Government of Canada shall provide the aircraft, equipment, supplies, facilities and services necessary for the purposes of this Agreement.

12. At the request of the Government of Canada, the Government of the United Kingdom shall provide such aircraft, equipment and supplies, for the purposes of this Agreement, as can be made available either from United Kingdom Government stocks or from articles supplied to the Government of the United Kingdom by the Government of the United States of America under the Lend-Lease Act.

13. The Government of the United Kingdom agrees to lend the Government of Canada U.K. staff personnel in such ranks and numbers as may be agreed between the two Governments but instructors so lent shall not exceed 50% of the instructional personnel required for the training of U.K. aircrew.

14. Except as provided in Articles 15 and 17, the Government of Canada shall assume liability for all costs and expenses connected with the training carried out under this Agreement. This liability shall include, inter alia, the settlement of any claims arising in Canada out of the negligence of any U.K. aircrew or U.K. staff personnel while acting within the scope of their duties or employment and the issue of pay and allowances at R.C.A.F. rates and under R.C.A.F. regulations, to, or in respect of, U.K. staff personnel and U.K. aircrew, other than allowances in respect of their families and dependents residing outside Canada, for the period from the date of arrival in Canada up to and including the day preceding:

15. The Government of Canada shall not assume liability for the following costs and expenses:

(b) pensions and other non-effective benefits to, or in respect of, U.K. staff personnel and U.K. aircrew;

(c) grants or gratuities to U.K. staff and U.K. aircrew paid upon demobilization, costs incurred from the date referred to in Article 14, (i), (ii) or (iii) above, as appropriate, in respect of educational benefits, re-settlement schemes, vocational training and all other benefits provided by, or on behalf of, the Government of the United Kingdom for U.K. staff and U.K. aircrew upon demobilization, including costs of demobilization and demobilization leave;

(d) pay, allowances, transportation, uniforms and other expenses of U.K. staff personnel and U.K. aircrew, in respect of periods before the date of arrival in Canada and from the date referred to in Article 14 (i), (ii) or (iii) above, as appropriate;

(e) packing, loading and transportation costs arising outside Canada in respect of such aircraft, equipment and supplies as may be made available under Article 12.

16. The Government of Canada shall deduct from pay issues in Canada and shall pay quarterly to the Government of the United Kingdom for disbursement under R.A.F. or R.N. regulations, the following amounts:

(a) assigned pay at the rates prescribed under the R.C.A.F. regulations from the R.C.A.F. pay of U.K. staff personnel and U.K. aircrew in respect of whom Family Allowance or Dependent's Allowance is being issued under R.A.F. or R.N. regulations;

(b) voluntary assignments from the R.C.A.F. pay of U.K. staff personnel or U.K. aircrew, payable to persons residing outside of Canada;

(c) any other deductions from pay required to be made for payment outside Canada under R.A.F. or R.N. regulations.

17. The Government of the United Kingdom shall assume liability to pay to the Government of Canada capitation fees for the training of U.K. aircrew in Canada from 1st April, 1945, at weekly rates to be agreed between the two Governments. Such capitation fees shall be determined on the basis of the estimated costs of carrying on the training programme plus an appropriate allowance for overhead costs, excluding however, the costs of such assets as may be available from the residual assets of the British Commonwealth Air Training Plan and any expenditure properly chargeable to the costs of that Plan. The Government of Canada shall credit against the liability so determined:

(a) the value of such aircraft, equipment and supplies as are made available under Article 12; and

(b) payments made quarterly or otherwise by the Government of the United Kingdom to the Government of Canada of the equivalent in Canadian dollars of the pay (but not allowances) at R.A.F. or R.N. rates, as may be appropriate, of U.K. staff personnel and U.K. aircrew for the period from the date of arrival in Canada up to and including the day preceding:

- |                                                   |                                                                                                                            |

18. The Government of Canada shall in consultation with the Government of the United Kingdom, appoint an officer to act as Financial Adviser on such matters affecting the cost of the air training under this Agreement as may be referred to him by either Government. The Governments of the United Kingdom and Canada shall be supplied with a copy of any report made by the Financial Adviser and shall be entitled to obtain from him information on all matters arising out of Article 17.

19. The title to defence articles supplied to the Government of the United Kingdom by the Government of the United States of America under the Lend-Lease Act and used for purposes of training under this Agreement shall remain with the Government of the United States of America.

NAVY; ACQUISITION OF CRUISERS AND DESTROYERS
FROM THE UNITED KINGDOM

13. THE SECRETARY referred to the decision taken at the meeting of November 3rd, 1943, and reported that the U.K. government had now offered to make available to the Canadian Navy, as a "free gift", two Fiji class cruisers and two Fleet destroyers. The destroyers would be completed early in 1944, and the cruisers during the latter part of the year.

A communication had also been received from the First Lord of the Admiralty, congratulating the R.C.N. upon its achievements during the war and welcoming its "advent as a 'big ship' navy able to take an even greater part both now and after the war in maintaining the Naval traditions of the British Commonwealth."

(Telegrams Nos. 3234 and 3254, Canadian High Commissioner, London, to External Affairs, Dec. 22 and 24, 1943.)<sup>101</sup>

14. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES pointed out that this transfer of cruisers and destroyers to Canada had originated in the several proposals submitted to the War Committee at Quebec, on September 8th last, by the then First Sea Lord, at Mr. Churchill's request, as a method of assisting the serious manpower shortages of the Royal Navy. The War Committee had, however, on November 3rd, 1943, approved in principle the transfer of vessels of these types to the Canadian Navy.

Addition of these vessels would not necessarily imply the creation of a large postwar establishment, but would create a better balanced Navy. The Australian Navy, for example, now had several cruisers.

15. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to the communication from Mr. Alexander,<sup>102</sup> pointed out that it appeared to imply the maintenance of Commonwealth naval forces to which Canada would contribute. Such a conception was opposed to Canadian national policy and practice and this impression should be corrected in replying to the British proposal.

Furthermore, the official communication from the Dominions Office based the proposal upon the expansion of the Canadian Navy, whereas it had, in fact, originated in the U.K. government's own suggestions as to methods by which Canada could assist in meeting the grave shortage of British naval personnel. This, too, should be pointed out clearly to the United Kingdom.

16. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that, in accepting the cruisers and destroyers indicated, it be pointed out clearly to the U.K. government:

(a) that these vessels were being accepted by Canada, not for the purpose of expanding the Canadian Navy, but as a measure of "assistance to the Royal Navy in meeting the present shortage of naval manpower", as proposed by Sir Dudley Pound<sup>103</sup> at Quebec;

(b) that, nevertheless, acceptance could not involve commitments respecting use of the vessels subsequent to transfers; they would become an integral part of the Canadian Navy and, as such, necessarily at the sole disposal of the Canadian government and Canadian Parliament.

17. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES, referring to the decision at the meeting of December 16th,<sup>105</sup> reported that it now appeared possible that, since the craft in question were to be used in a common British-American-Canadian operation, the U.S. Navy might make a special exception to normal procedure and permit the craft to be transferred to the R.C.N. for the period of the operation and, for the purpose, to be commissioned as H.M.C. ships.

18. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, authorized acceptance of the landing craft in question on the terms described by the Minister.

(b) aircraft carriers (c.v.e.'s)<sup>106</sup>

19. MR. MACDONALD, referring to the discussion of the question at the meeting of December 16th, said that it had been ascertained that the U.S. government could not transfer these vessels to Canada by sale. Accordingly, it was proposed that two carriers, now under lease-lend to the Royal Navy, be manned and operated by Canadian officers and ratings, the R.N. Fleet Air Arm to provide flying personnel, and the ships to remain units of the Royal Navy. This would effectively assist in relieving the manning difficulties of the Royal Navy and, at the same time, provide useful experience to Canadian personnel in carrier operation.

20. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that he remained of the opinion expressed at the meeting of December 16th. The proposal involved undesirable postwar commitments.

21. THE MINISTER OF JUSTICE felt that it would be unsatisfactory to have R.C.N. personnel man vessels which would remain units of the Royal Navy controlled by the Admiralty.

22. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE was of the opinion that the proposal would enable it to be contended in the United States that Canada had accepted lease-lend by "back-door" methods. We had sought to avoid giving any ground whatever for such an accusation - it would be a mistake to do so now.

23. MR. MACDONALD stated that, in the light of the discussion, he was not disposed to press the proposal further, at present.

24. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, deferred consideration of the proposal.

(c) loop mine layers

25. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES referred to a proposal for the purchase of two Loop mine layers from the United States. An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

TELEGRAM 58

Ottawa, January 9, 1944

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Your telegram No. 24 of January 4th.† An earlier reply could not be returned to message given in your telegram No. 3234<sup>107</sup> since this could not be considered by War Committee until this week. In my immediately following telegram there is given text of communication which you should address to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs.

You will note that in our reply the transfer of these ships is not referred to as a "free gift", since the transaction should be regarded as "reverse Mutual Aid." There is considerable criticism in parts of Canada of the continued despatch of great quantities of war supplies to the United Kingdom without return in kind, and we feel that the transfer of these vessels, if properly represented, can be a useful counter to such criticism. On the other hand, if the announcement states only that the ships are a gift to Canada, this purpose would not be fulfilled. An announcement only in these terms might likewise be taken to infer obligations with respect to their employment.

The opening sentence of the communication addressed to you by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs did not state correctly the circumstances in which this proposal was made at Quebec. Mr. Churchill and the First Sea Lord introduced it as one of several proposals whereby Canada could assist in meeting the grave shortage of British naval personnel. It was on this basis that the matter has been discussed and not repeat not in relation to the expansion of the Royal Canadian Navy. Our reply therefore seeks to set the record straight on this point.

We have considered carefully the advantages of alternative courses, and we have decided with some hesitation to accept the ships without payment by Canada. We have considered purchase (which would have the effect of reducing the value of Mutual Aid supplied to the United Kingdom from Canada by the cost of the vessels) and also acceptance on loan, subject to return after the war. It is by no means unlikely that the Admiralty is unaware of the present financial relations between the United Kingdom and Canada.

See Volume 9, Document 337.

We feel that it must be clearly understood, both by the United Kingdom authorities and by the public, that no strings are attached to the transfer of ships. They become, for all purposes, Canadian ships, entirely under our control. The last sentence of the First Lord's message to you, quoted in your telegram No. 3254, has caused us some concern in this connection.

We consider it necessary that the transfer of the ships should be announced simultaneously and in identical terms in London and in Ottawa. We suggest that the announcement might be as follows: Begins:

The Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, the Honourable Angus Macdonald, announced that, pursuant to discussions initiated during the Quebec Conference by the United Kingdom Government, arrangements had now been completed for the transfer from the Royal Navy to the Royal Canadian Navy of two modern cruisers and two fleet destroyers.

The transfer of these ships to the R.C.N. may be regarded as "reverse Mutual Aid." They will come under Canada's exclusive control in the same way that large numbers of fighting ships, notably corvettes, minesweepers and frigates built in Canada, have been transferred to the United Kingdom and are now units of the Royal Navy. In both cases, the ships are made available, without regard to financial considerations, to the service where it is believed they can contribute most effectively to the common war effort of the United Nations.

The addition of these four ships, of the latest design and modern armament and equipment, to the Royal Canadian Navy will contribute greatly to its strength and balance, and will enable it to play a still greater part in the defeat of our enemies. It provides a striking example of the close co-operation and mutual assistance which have characterized the relations of the two navies from the moment of the outbreak of the war. Ends.

Please take this up immediately with the United Kingdom authorities with a view to arranging a release date towards the end of next week.<sup>108</sup> You should also communicate orally the substance of this telegram to Lord Cranborne and to Mr. Alexander.

Ottawa, January 9, 1944

IMPORTANT. SECRET. With reference to my immediately preceding telegram, following is text of the communication to be addressed to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, Begins:

A press release was issued on January 17.

With reference to your letter of December 22nd,<sup>109</sup> I am happy to inform you that the Government of Canada is very willing to assist in meeting the shortage of British Naval personnel by accepting for service in the Royal Canadian Navy the Fiji class cruisers Minotaur and Superb and the fleet destroyers Valentine and Vixen.

With regard to the conditions of transfer of these ships, the understanding of the Government of Canada is that they will become an integral part of the Canadian Navy. As such, they will be, of course, at the sole disposal of the Canadian Government. It is, in our view, essential that the action of the United Kingdom Government in making these ships available without cost to the Canadian treasury should be related directly to the provision of war supplies, including a large number of fighting ships, by Canada to the United Kingdom without cost to the United Kingdom Treasury. We therefore feel it to be in the common interest that this transaction should be regarded as reverse Mutual Aid and not as a "free gift."

In your letter you referred to the discussions at Quebec concerning "the possibility of expanding the Royal Canadian Navy." I am desired to point out that the matter arose at Quebec as one of a series of proposals advanced by Mr. Churchill and Sir Dudley Pound for Canadian assistance to the Royal Navy in meeting the present shortage of naval manpower.

It had been hoped by the Canadian Naval authorities that the two cruisers would be ready for service before the dates mentioned in your letter. I assume that the possibility of these dates being advanced could be discussed between the Naval Staffs. Ends.

NAVY; ACQUISITION OF AIRCRAFT CARRIERS

28. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES, referring to the discussions at the meeting of January 5th, 1944, reported that no British-built carriers of the kind under discussion would be available until January of next year. In the circumstances, further consideration should be given to the proposal that two carriers, now on lend-lease to the United Kingdom, be manned for the Royal Navy by Canadian personnel. The cost involved for maintenance and operation would be about $4 million per year. The personnel involved would total some 900.

The Canadian Navy would obtain valuable experience for the future in air-sea co-operation. The expenditure and manpower involved should be considered in the light of the recent large reduction in the programme of construction of escort vessels.

29. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, approved in principle the manning of two R.N. aircraft carriers (C.V.E.s), in accordance with the recommendation of the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services.

SECRET. Your telegrams 58 and 59, 9th January.

1. May I suggest that an expression of thanks should be incorporated in communication addressed to Dominions Secretary. Although acceptance of vessels will assist Admiralty in meeting shortage of personnel for the duration of the war and transaction, as pointed out, should be regarded as reverse Mutual Aid, the vessels are being given to Canada and it would seem appropriate that transfer should be acknowledged as a gift just as Canadian contributions under Mutual Aid have been similarly acknowledged here.

2. Am assured by Lord Cranborne that there is no question whatever as to our complete ownership and control of these vessels in perpetuity. The last sentence of First Lord's letter referred to in your No. 58 is merely complimentary reference to significance of Canada's naval effort now and after the war, as emphasized by our willingness to accept these ships.

3. Would appreciate early reply so that I may answer Dominions Secretary's letter without undue delay. In view of the assurances conveyed to me you may wish to revise the text set forth in your telegram No. 59.

Ottawa, January 18, 1944

My dear Vincent,

I feel that I should give you a further explanation of the reasons which led me to send you my telegram No. 87 of January 13th† suggesting that you should not press your view that we ought to return a more generous-sounding answer on the question of the transfer to Canada of the two cruisers and two destroyers.

The question was discussed at considerable length in the War Committee on January 5th and as so often happens it provided an occasion for an exchange of views on broader questions. After the discussion Heeney and I prepared the two telegrams to you, Nos. 58 and 59 of January 9th, in the light of the views expressed by the Ministers in the War Committee and especially by the Prime Minister. These telegrams were sent to Mr. King, who spent a considerable time revising them and finally approved them for despatch with a number of changes. He, incidentally, suggested that our draft sounded too grateful although it survived his revision without any important change.

I, therefore, felt sure when your telegram No. 116 of January 12th arrived that Mr. King would not be willing to fall in with your proposal and that it would do no good to anyone concerned if we laid it before him. Heeney quite agreed with this view and I sent you my personal message with his concurrence. I have now removed from the departmental files your telegram No. 116.

Yesterday I received your personal letter of January 7th† in which you say that you would be glad to have further informal comments on the currents of opinion here on intra-Commonwealth relations. I shall try to put something together for you before the end of this week. This particular incident concerning the Navy shows that it is important that we should try to keep you privately more closely in touch than is possible in official communications. The trouble is that the volume of work in the department seems to grow more rapidly than our capacity to deal with it and Norman and I have, I think, never been so hard pressed as in the last few months.

I had lunch yesterday with George Ferguson<sup>110</sup> who is leaving today for England with the party of Canadian Journalists. I suggested to him that he might have a private talk with you on the trend of opinion in Canada on Commonwealth questions. He is something of a crusader on these matters and in consequence his emphasis at times is inaccurate. On the whole, however, his views should be treated with respect.

To return to the Naval question, I realize that the instructions given to you imposed on you a rather unpleasant task and I can assure you that we did the best we could in the circumstances.

Yours ever,

HUME [WRONG]

P.S. It is not easy to analyze an atmosphere, and this letter is not very illuminating. There is a feeling here that the U.K. is very prolific with its requests on Canada and much less prolific with its appreciation of what we have done. We sent you on Jan[uary] 15th a copy of a personal letter from Power to Sinclair<sup>111</sup> on our really very serious difficulties over the rapid changes of mind on the output of the B.C.A.T.P. Power gets incensed over the too small recognition given the R.C.A.F. in Air Ministry publicity. The prevailing assumption in high quarters in the U.K. that everyone wants closer Commonwealth union acts as an irritant. I'll try to explain these impalpables at greater length, but they are hard to put on paper and we could get much further if we could talk them over.

PARTICIPATION OF CANADIAN FORCES (ARMY)
IN WESTERN EUROPEAN OPERATIONS

7. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE read the text of a communication from the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, First Canadian Army, to the Chief of Staff, Canadian Military Headquarters, London, regarding the roles allotted to Canadian Army formations.

In this communication, Lieut.-General Crerar expressed the view that approval of the government to Canadian participation had been conveyed at the time of the inclusion of Canadian formations in the 21st Army Group; no further action in this respect was now necessary.

As to the actual operations impending, General Crerar expressed great confidence in the higher direction and Command of General Montgomery and was of opinion that plans and preparations had been soundly conceived and carefully made. Given reasonable fortune they would have decisive results. Lieut.-General Stuart concurred in these views.

(Army Message, Minister of National Defence, from the Chief of Staff, C.M.H.Q., London, April 25, 1944).†

8. MR. RALSTON said that, in reply to his request for particular advice, the Army Commander had subsequently reported that he was satisfied that the tasks allotted to Canadian formations in the forthcoming operation were feasible operations of war and that the plans formulated for these Canadian formations, with the resources available, were capable of being carried out with reasonable prospects of success.

The Chief of Staff, Canadian Military Headquarters had concurred in General Crerar's view.

(Army Message, Minister to Chief of Staff, C.M.H.Q., London, April 26, 1944, and reply, May 1, 1944).†

9. MR. RALSTON said that General Stuart and General Crerar had suggested that official instructions setting out the government's formal direction to have Canadian troops participate should now be sent to the Army Commander; in this connection, it would be desirable to have the desire expressed that, except in cases of emergency, Canadian forces should work together under the First Canadian Army, and that Canadian formations in Western and Southern Europe should eventually be united under the Army.

(Army message, Chief of Staff, C.M.H.Q., London, to the Minister, May 1, 1944).†

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the reports of the Minister and, on his recommendation, agreed that instructions be forwarded to the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, Canadian Army Overseas, for participation in prospective European operations of Canadian forces under his Command.

It was specifically agreed that the instructions should make reference to the desirability of Canadian formations in Western and Southern Europe being united under the Army and that this should not be restricted to the post-armistice period.

TOP SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister, Begins: We have been approached by General Eisenhower in the following matter.

He is anxious that any statements that may be made at the opening of "OVERLORD" should be framed in accordance with a general line of policy and has suggested that the following considerations should be borne in mind:

- (a) No appeals should be made to the people of Europe for immediate action;
- (b) The nationality of the troops involved in the Allied forces should not be disclosed until such time as the Supreme Command consider it safe to release that information;
- (c) Nothing should be said from which it could be inferred that the initial landings are the only ones to be made;
- (d) It should not be suggested that the country in which the initial landings take place is the only country in which landings will be made.

The Prime Minister in informal discussion indicated that he agrees generally with these proposals. They have also been communicated to President Roosevelt.

I have no doubt that these considerations are already in your mind but, in the circumstances, I have been asked to put them to you and ask whether you would also agree that any statement, which you may find it desirable to make on this occasion, should conform to the above suggestions. I am sending a similar communication to the other Prime Ministers. Ends.

EUROPEAN OPERATIONS; INSTRUCTIONS TO ARMY COMMANDER

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE submitted and read draft instructions to the General Officer Commanding-in-Chief, First Canadian Army, for participation of Canadian Army formations in impending operations "in combination" with military forces of the United Kingdom (21st Army Group). On May 3rd, the War Committee, upon submission of reports by Lieutenant-General Crerar, had approved such participation by the Canadian forces under the General's command.

Particular attention was directed to paragraphs 10 and 11, regarding subsequent concentration of Canadian formations now serving apart from the First Canadian Army.

(Letter of instructions, Chief of the General Staff to G.O.C.-in-C., May 19, 1944).

7. THE PRIME MINISTER commented upon paragraphs 10 and 11.

In recent conversation with him in England, General Montgomery had expressed some concern lest "national" considerations should interfere with military necessity or advantage, emphasizing how important it was that he should have freedom to employ formations under his command so as to ensure their maximum effectiveness in operations. Mr. King had assured General Montgomery that, while the Canadian government felt it desirable that Canadians should serve together, no "political" considerations would be permitted to interfere with military effectiveness; Canadian policy in this respect was subject always to such over-riding military considerations. At the same time, considerations other than military should not be permitted to interfere with Canadian policy in the matter of having Canadian forces serve together.

These assurances had been entirely satisfactory to General Montgomery, and Mr. King had communicated the substance of these conversations to General Crerar.

8. MR. RALSTON agreed with the views expressed by the Prime Minister. It should not, however, be forgotten that (subject to what Mr. King had said), since in our view Canadians fought better together, the concentration of Canadian formations was also a "military" consideration.

9. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved the instructions submitted with certain amendments to paragraph 11 thereof.<sup>112</sup>

We are very anxious to avoid any repetition of misunderstandings between governments about the wording of official announcements which developed during the opening days of the "HUSKY" operation.<sup>113</sup> To this end we have agreed to the use of the word "Allied" as the initial description in the official communiqué of the forces taking part in "OVERLORD." We feel that this same usage should be strictly followed in all proclamations, avis, etc., which may be issued at the same time as the first official communiqué and that specific reference to the fact that United Kingdom or United States forces are engaged in these operations should be withheld until such time as the Supreme Command consider it likewise safe to release the information that Canadian forces are involved. No acknowledgment has as yet been received concerning the views expressed in my telegram No. 93 to Dominions Office about references in official statements to United Kingdom and United States forces. We are very anxious to make sure that such specific references will not be made until information on Canadian forces can be released. Please check this point.

It is assumed that the use of the word "Allied" as the official description in the initial communiqués applies to naval and air forces as well as the ground troops. If this is not so, it is desired to know as soon as possible what distinction will be made and at what stage there may be reference to national air or naval forces.

A message from Stuart to Murchie of May 31† gives the information that a "stand-by" warning will be sent via radio thirty minutes before release of the first communiqué. As no indication can be given to assist the monitors as to the time that the warning is likely to be received, it would be useful to know what form it will take. This is being checked by Murchie with Stuart. Arrangements also indicate that simultaneously with announcement of the communiqué over the radio the text will be sent by direct cable circuit to O.W.I.<sup>114</sup> in Washington and from there to Ottawa. This may involve some delay and I should like to know whether it might be possible to have the text sent simultaneously en clair via Canada House as a "clear the wires, most immediate" message. If this could not be done very quickly, it would be of no assistance, but if it could be accomplished with sufficient speed it might help as radio reception of the communiqué may not be good.

The second stage of announcements will be that at which specific reference is made to the participation of national forces. It is very desirable that adequate warning should be received here of the first communiqué which will so identify participating forces, as the Prime Minister will doubtless wish to make a statement here at the very first opportunity. At least four hours' notice of this would be desirable. Presumably such notice could be given to you to be transmitted to me immediately, if possible including actual text. Please ascertain whether this can be arranged as the government attach importance to this feature.

Full details on the points referred to above would be appreciated as soon as possible. Ends.

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Following for Robertson, Begins: Your telegram No. 1062 of June 2nd. Official statement at the opening of OVERLORD. The United Kingdom authorities have impressed upon the Chief of Staff SHAEF the importance of making no specific reference to the United Kingdom and United States forces until such time as Canadian forces can also be mentioned. Until then the word "Allied" will be employed and will cover the naval and air forces as well as the ground troops.

2. With regard to the standby warning before the release of the first communiqué and the arrangements for cabling the text of the communiqué, United Kingdom authorities are of the opinion that these are matters which can be most effectively handled by General Stuart with SHAEF. I have discussed this with General Stuart who is taking it up as a matter of urgency with SHAEF.

3. With regard to the question of adequate warning being given of the first communiqué containing specific reference to the participation of national forces, the United Kingdom authorities consider that in this matter also the only really satisfactory channel of communication would be through SHAEF to General Stuart and thence to N.D.H.Q. They point out that in a situation of this kind which may develop rapidly from day to day, and possibly from hour to hour, the use of any other channel would complicate matters and involve delays. General Stuart is accordingly raising with SHAEF the question of the arrangements for informing the Canadian Government in advance of the first communiqué which will identify the participating forces.<sup>115</sup> Ends.

CENTRAL MEDITERRANEAN OPERATIONS

17. THE PRIME MINISTER enquired whether any decisions had been taken regarding future operations in the central Mediterranean which might involve the First Canadian Corps.

18. THE U.K. PRIME MINISTER emphasized the heavy character of the fighting now going on in Italy. It could be expected that these operations would continue to be arduous for some time to come. Future strategy in the Mediterranean theatre would have to be determined according to the progress of events and it was hoped that the Canadian Corps would continue with the Allied forces there until the job was done.

TOP SECRET. Addressed Canada No. 161, New Zealand No. 210, Union of South Africa No. 67.

In conjunction with United States Chiefs of Staff, our Military Advisers have been considering arrangements for occupation of certain areas in Mediterranean theatre in the event of German disintegration or withdrawal.

2. The Directive issued to General Wilson by Combined Chiefs of Staff instructs him to plan for immediate despatch of:

Four divisions and small tactical air force to Austria, a division of British troops and small air force to Greece, approximately 2,400 men to Dodecanese, approximately one division to Venezia Giulia. It has been agreed that French and Italian divisions will not be used and also that United States forces will be withdrawn as soon as practicable after cessation of hostilities.

3. It is not at present intended to despatch forces from Mediterranean theatre to Hungary, Yugoslavia, Albania, Roumania or Bulgaria except such guards as may be required in connection with the distribution of supplies and possibly British naval assistance in the administration of Danube, if the Russians agree.

4. A further commitment after defeat of Germany will be maintenance of internal security in Middle East.

5. We are proceeding on the assumption that you will wish arrangements to be made for your forces in this theatre to be repatriated as early as possible after the defeat of Germany. You will, however, appreciate that repatriation time-table will depend on prevailing circumstances with regard to shipping, etc., which may involve some inevitable delay between cessation of hostilities with Germany and date of embarkation. We should be glad to know if you would permit Dominion forces to be used during any such interval in occupation duties in Austria, Greece or Dodecanese or for internal security duties in the Middle East should this be considered desirable.

Ottawa, October 22, 1944

IMMEDIATE. TOP SECRET. Decypher yourself. Following personal from the Prime Minister for Prime Minister Churchill, Begins:

1. I am faced with the most critical situation which has arisen since Canada's entry into the war. It is beset with possible consequences so dangerous to the remainder of Canada's war effort in Europe and Asia, to the future of Canada, to future relations within the Commonwealth, and to all Government war activities and policies, including those being considered with respect to organization for maintenance of world peace that I feel I should inform you of the situation, and seek information from you on certain matters which are relevant to the decision which we here will have to take.

2. The War Committee of our Cabinet had presented to it on the 19th instant a report by General Stuart, the Chief of Staff of the Canadian Army,<sup>1</sup> who returned from England with Colonel Ralston, the Minister of Defence, on the preceding day, which report is dated the 19th instant and concludes as follows:

(Quote) "I am satisfied that the reinforcements sent and being sent to both theatres have been well trained. I am satisfied that up to the present time reinforcements have been adequate in respect to overall numbers but, for a series of military reasons beyond my control, I must admit that reinforcements have been inadequate as to numbers in respect to the infantry arm. I am not satisfied, and I have attempted to express my reasons in this letter, that anticipated reinforcements will be adequate to meet future requirements of this war against Germany. I recommend, therefore, if the numbers required cannot be found from General Service personnel in Canada, that the terms of service of N.R.M.A. personnel be extended to include overseas service in any theatre." (End Quote).

3. To carry out any recommendation involving conscription for service overseas would necessitate the reassembling of Parliament which has been adjourned till January 31st, 1945, the most acrimonious discussion in the House of Commons, the possible defeat of the Government, and most certainly a dissolution of Parliament itself to be followed by a general election extending over two months, this length of time being required by our Election Act so as to permit of obtaining the votes of the Armed Services in different parts of the world.

4. Having in mind necessary preliminary Cabinet discussion, I doubt if Parliament could be brought together before the end of the first week of November, more likely it would be the middle of the month as our 7th Victory Loan campaign has just begun and ends only on November 13th. The discussion in Parliament might last till the end of November. The application of closure, for such a debate, at this time, is, I believe, out of the question. Assuming a dissolution on November 15 or November 30, it would be January 15 or January 30 before the results of the election would be known, and even then there would be no certainty as to the result. Whatever the result, a new Parliament would have to be summoned and assuming a verdict favourable to conscription more time would have to elapse before effective action could be taken.

5. The issue in Parliament and in a general election would be conscription for service overseas, either as necessary to maintain the Canadian army at full strength for the duration of the war in Europe, or as necessary for the winning of the war.

6. As the Government's policy of a general election in spring, if not before, was announced months ago, if at this stage of the war conscription for overseas service became an issue I can see no escape from the bitterest controversy Canada has ever known in her Parliament or in the country. How perilous such controversy might become at any moment and how far reaching in its consequences in relation to all further war and post-war plans, and for Canadian unity for years to come, I would not venture to predict.

7. This is the situation as I see it. I know what it would mean to our enemies to have a divided Canada to point to as evidence of the possible break up of the Empire if they can only continue resistance long enough. In these circumstances it would help me in taking the necessary decisions to have your views on two controlling questions (1) the probable duration of the war in Europe and (2) the likelihood of the Canadian Army being engaged in the next large operation. Field Marshal Montgomery told Ralston that he did not expect they would be needed for it. If you have any information on these points, I should be glad to have it.

8. In no way do I desire to shift any responsibility upon you for a decision. I am quite prepared, as it is my duty, to become responsible for any decision the Canadian Government may take in relation to any matter of policy in so far as it relates exclusively to the Canadian forces. I recognise however that in this matter I have a special responsibility to bring to the attention of yourself what is involved in the decision to be reached and wherein it cannot fail to have far reaching effects upon the immediate and prospective efforts of all the United Nations including those of the United Kingdom.

9. It is for these reasons that I have felt it necessary to bring the situation described to your attention and that I feel I must in the interests of all concerned, seek the widest measure of guidance and assistance in endeavouring to find a solution which will prevent the appalling consequences I foresee, if a course cannot be found which will avoid the risks involved in raising in Canada an overseas conscription issue at this time.

10. This I believe is the first and only occasion since the beginning of the war that I have felt it imperative to ascertain your views before deciding on a matter of policy which is one for the Government of Canada to decide. As, however, the present situation is one which is anything but exclusively Canadian in its bearings, I know you will appreciate why I feel it to be of the utmost importance to ascertain your views, in so far as you may wish to express them, before a final decision is reached.

11. I am glad to gather that your recent meeting with Stalin has had such satisfactory results. Kindest regards.

My telegram No. 2665.†

1. Mr. Mackenzie King came to see me this evening to tell me of the latest situation in the Cabinet.

2. The War Committee of Cabinet and also the full Cabinet have discussed conscription issue for the past three days. They may reach final decision at tomorrow's (Friday's) meeting.

3. Almost the whole Cabinet agree with view expressed in Mr. Mackenzie King's message to Mr. Churchill that raising of conscription issue now, when defeat of organised German resistance appears to be certain within a few months, will destroy national unity in Canada, prejudice Canada's future war effort in both Europe and the Pacific and have wide and grave post-war consequences. I need not go into detailed statement of reasons for this. The experience and judgment of Mr. Mackenzie King, supported by almost all his Ministerial colleagues, regard it as a fact.

4. Colonel Ralston, however, feels it his duty as Minister responsible for Army to urge immediate taking of whatever steps are necessary to introduce conscription. Mr. Mackenzie King still holds that these steps would involve a delay of almost three months before conscription could be imposed. Almost all his Cabinet colleagues agree with him that in present circumstances it would not be possible to introduce conscription except after Parliamentary debate and a General Election. Colonel Ralston disputes this and says that if he is defeated in the Cabinet he will resign. If a vote is taken in the Cabinet tomorrow he is likely to hand in his resignation then and there. Though two or three other Ministers agree at least in part with him on the general issue, Mr. Mackenzie King does not think they would go so far as to resign.

5. However, Colonel Ralston's resignation would start the train of evil consequences which Mr. Mackenzie King foresees if this situation is allowed to develop.

6. In the light of the above the two questions which Mr. Mackenzie King asked Mr. Churchill in his message contained in my tel. No. 2636 are of course very relevant. First, what are his views as to the probable duration of war in Europe? Second, what is the likelihood of the Canadian Army being engaged in the next large operation? The Canadian military authorities have assured the Cabinet that in any case the reinforcement position will be all right until the end of this year. They are worried about position after that. Their estimated shortage then, if the Canadian Army is to be maintained at its present strength, is 15,000 (fifteen thousand) men.

7. Mr. Mackenzie King fully recognises that Mr. Churchill needs ample time to make the enquiries necessary for considered answers. He does not press for a reply any earlier than is convenient to him. But he would be grateful if in meantime he could receive a message saying that matter is being carefully considered. This would enable him to keep the Cabinet from reaching a final decision and Colonel Ralston from deciding irrevocably on resignation before the Cabinet is in possession of such information on the two questions as highest authorities in London can provide.

8. By this means he could hold the situation for a few days. He hopes that he can avert the storm altogether. But at present it is brewing very badly and it may still get right beyond his control.

9. I told him that I would send you this report of the situation for Mr. Churchill's information.

I do not of course know what numbers are involved in the next six months or so.

Ottawa, November 7, 1944

No reply has yet been sent to telegram No. 161 of September 26th from the Dominions Office in which we were asked whether we would permit Canadian forces to be used on occupation duty in Eastern Europe in the interval between the defeat or withdrawal of German forces and the time at which repatriation would be possible. While this telegram has not been followed up from London, it is desirable that we should send a reply.

The Combined Chiefs of Staff have instructed General Wilson to despatch immediately after German disintegration or withdrawal the following forces:

1. Four divisions and a small air force to Austria;
2. One division and a small air force to Greece; (This has presumably been accomplished by the despatch of the British forces now in Greece)
3. 2400 men to the Dodecanese Islands;
4. About one division to northwestern Italy.

The request to us is based on the assumption that we will want our forces to be repatriated as soon as possible. It is not altogether clear from the telegram whether any U.S. forces will be employed but since the telegram states that it has been agreed that French and Italian divisions will not be used and that U.S. forces will be withdrawn as soon as possible after the cessation of hostilities, the inference is that the troops mentioned above are to be provided from the British Commonwealth. There is in addition a possibility that Commonwealth troops will be needed for the maintenance of internal security in the Middle East.

We might make the following points in our reply:

1. They are correct in thinking that we desire the repatriation of our forces in this theatre as soon as practicable. In addition to this we would welcome, if possible, the transfer of the Canadian troops in Italy to North Western Europe so as to unite all Canadian troops within the First Canadian Army.

2. If this proves quite impossible for reasons of transport so that the Canadian forces will have to remain in the Mediterranean theatre for some period after the end of hostilities, we would not be willing to have them employed in Greece, the Dodecanese or the Middle East. We are also not willing to provide any forces for occupation duty in Austria or northern Italy except on the most explicit understanding that this employment would be for the shortest feasible term. If, however, the intention is to repatriate the U.S. forces at present in Italy immediately the fighting ends, it will not be feasible for Canadian forces to be used for occupation duty even for a brief period.

3. In any event we could not permit more than one (?) division from the Canadian forces now in Italy to be used on temporary occupation duty.

I am not at all satisfied with this reply, which may be quite incorrect. I put it forward so as to have something to start from. I think Mr. Heeney plans to put the question on the agenda of the next War Committee and I am, therefore, sending him a copy of this note.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS IN TEMPORARY OCCUPATIONAL DUTY

15. THE SECRETARY read a communication from the U.K. government, enquiring whether Canadian forces in the Mediterranean theatre would be available, between the cessation of hostilities and the date of embarkation, for temporary occupational duties in Austria, Greece or the Dodecanese or for internal security duties in the Middle East.

(Telegram, Dominions Office to External Affairs, No. 161, Sept. 26, 1944).

16. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE<sup>117</sup> reported that the Chief of the General Staff recommended against this proposal on the ground that it had always been the intention that the 1st Canadian Corps in Italy should rejoin the 1st Canadian Army in Northwest Europe, as soon as practicable. In his opinion it was most desirable that Canadian occupational duties should be concentrated in one area instead of in several.

General A. G. L. McNaughton. J. L. Ralston had resigned November 1.

(Memorandum, C.G.S., Sept. 28, 1944).†

17. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that, in reply to the U.K. government's enquiry, it should be pointed out:

(1) that the government desired the repatriation of Canadian forces in the Mediterranean theatre as soon as practicable and, in addition, would welcome, if possible, the transfer to Northwest Europe of Canadian troops now in Italy so as to unite all Canadian forces within the 1st Canadian Army;

(2) that, if the uniting of Canadian forces under the 1st Canadian Army proved quite impossible for reasons of transport so that Canadian troops would have to remain in the Mediterranean theatre for some period after the end of hostilities, the government would not be willing to have them employed in Greece, the Dodecanese, or the Middle East, nor would the government be willing to provide occupation forces for duties in Austria or Northwest Italy except on the most explicit understanding that it would be for the shortest feasible term.

It was also agreed that representations should be made to the effect that the government would expect that, at the end of hostilities, shipping would be made available for the repatriation of Canadian forces in the same proportion as for U.S. forces, and that reference to this should be included in the reply to the U.K. government.

Ottawa, November 14, 1944

TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 161 of September 26th. We are now able to give a considered reply to your enquiry concerning the possible use of Canadian forces for temporary occupation duty in the Mediterranean theatre.

2. You are correct in assuming that the Canadian Government wishes arrangements to be made for the repatriation of Canadian forces in this theatre as soon as possible after the defeat of Germany. The Canadian Government, furthermore, would welcome the transfer, if possible, of Canadian troops now in Italy so as to unite all Canadian forces within the First Canadian Army even before the defeat of Germany.

3. We realize, however, that the reunion of Canadian forces under the First Canadian Army may prove impossible for reasons of transport, and that Canadian troops may have to remain in the Mediterranean theatre for some period after the end of hostilities. In that event we would not be willing to have Canadian formations stationed in Greece, the Dodecanese or the Middle East. If operational or other considerations pointed to the desirability of employing some Canadian troops for occupation duty in Austria or Northeast Italy, we would consent only on the most explicit understanding that this employment would be for the shortest feasible term in the light of the repatriation arrangements.

4. We note that it has been agreed that United States forces will be withdrawn from this theatre as soon as practicable after the cessation of hostilities. We desire to make it clear that we would expect that shipping would be made available for the repatriation of Canadian forces in the same proportion as for the repatriation of U.S. forces. You will readily appreciate that we could not agree to the general return of U.S. forces from the theatre to this continent before repatriation of Canadians began.

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET

I beg to append a brief note on my call on Mr. Roosevelt on Wednesday afternoon, 15th November.

I first conveyed to the President your warm congratulations on his reelection. Mr. Roosevelt seemed very pleased to receive your message and particularly asked me to convey to you the expression of his warmest regard.

I then proceeded to acquaint him of the Army reinforcement problem now confronting the Government. Briefly, I said that the seriousness of the position had first been reported to the Cabinet War Committee by the then Minister of National Defence on 19th October. I described the situation that Mr. Ralston had anticipated would exist on 31st December next.

I then told him the grave view you took of the matter and explained how you had given it anxious and prolonged consideration, not only to ensure that it be examined from every possible aspect but also so as not to jeopardize the success of the current Canadian War Loan, and not least, to avoid any possible adverse effect on his Presidential electoral campaign.

I added that you had several times observed that should events in Canada develop in such a way as to bring about an attempt to enforce overseas conscription at this stage of the war, then there could be little or no hope of carrying the assent of our people to the proposition of the use of force contained in the Dumbarton Oaks scheme for international security.

When I rose to take my leave, the President again asked me to bring you his best wishes and to assure you that he would be glad to be of any possible help to you in the psychological field.

TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 221 of 14th November. We have noted the desire of the Canadian Government to reunite, if possible, all Canadian forces within the First Canadian Army, though this may, we fear, prove impossible not only for reasons of transport, which you mention, but also because at any rate in the foreseeable future, the resulting weakening of our forces in the Mediterranean might involve risks which could not be accepted.

2. We are grateful for permission to use Canadian troops for occupational duties in Austria or north east Italy and confirm that this employment would be for the shortest possible time.

3. We fully appreciate the desire of the Canadian Government that Canadian forces should be repatriated pari passu with United States forces. When the time comes, every effort will be made to meet their wish consistently with operational requirements which you will, we are sure, agree must be overriding.

SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: I feel you might like to have some comment from Canada on the controversy arising from the events in Greece, Italy and to a lesser degree Belgium. I have read with the greatest interest the reports of your vigorous defence of your policy at Westminster yesterday<sup>118</sup> and I am glad to note that the debate ended in your being upheld on the vote of confidence by such a large majority.

2. You are doubtless already aware that the situations giving rise to this controversy, especially that in Greece, are causing some concern in Canada. I am doing what I can to avoid any declaration which might conceivably increase your difficulties. The leader of the C.C.F. questioned me in the House of Commons on December 6th concerning the attitude of the Canadian Government, and I give the text of his question and of my reply in my immediately following telegram.<sup>119</sup>

3. Naturally we have been particularly anxious over the trans-Atlantic discussion of these matters which has followed the issue by Stettinius of his public statement.<sup>120</sup> The winds that blow in the United States do not lose their force at the international boundary. Public opinion in Canada is worried over both the events themselves and their repercussion on Anglo-American relations.

4. Please do not think that I am passing judgment on the necessity of British military action against ELAS<sup>121</sup> or on the suitability of Count Sforza<sup>122</sup> for high office in Italy. I fully appreciate the difficulties and dangers which have to be faced and know that there is no simple solution of these problems. I thought that you might wish to learn from me, however, of the interest with which the development of these incidents is being followed here.

5. May I add as a postscript that if the views held by the Greek community in Canada are any clue to Greek opinion, there is very little monarchical sentiment among the Greeks.

ARMY; EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN TROOPS
IN SOUTH-EAST EUROPE

22. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS read a telegram from the U.K. government in answer to the message sent, following the meeting of November 9th, with regard to the employment of Canadians in temporary occupation duty.

The U.K. government noted the Canadian desire to have Canadian forces united within the First Canadian Army at the earliest opportunity, but pointed out the impossibility of such a move, at this stage, for reasons of transport and the resulting weakening of Allied forces in the Mediterranean.

The U.K. government expressed appreciation of the government's consent to the employment of Canadians for temporary occupational duty in Austria and Northeast Italy and noted the desire that Canadian forces be repatriated pari passu with U.S. forces. Every effort would be made to meet this wish, when the time came, consistent with operational requirements which, it was pointed out, must be over-riding.

(Telegram No. 207, Dominions Office to External Affairs, Nov. 29, 1944).

23. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE read a message from Lieutenant-General Montague,† reporting a conversation which Major-General Weeks<sup>123</sup> had had with Field Marshal Alexander prior to the former's departure from the Mediterranean theatre.

This indicated the likelihood of the Canadian Corps' being in rest and training for January and February and the possibility of their employment, subsequently, in an amphibious operation against the Dalmatian Coast.

It was not clear whether or not the Corps Commander in Italy possessed under his instructions authority for movement of the Corps for such an operation and a copy of Lieutenant-General Foulkes' instructions† had been requested from Canadian Military Headquarters, London. The position would be reviewed when these had been received.

24. THE PRIME MINISTER stated that it should be quite clear that Canadians could not be employed in such an operation or, indeed, despatched from Italy without the government's approval.

Operational areas for Canadian troops should be carefully restricted; otherwise there was danger that they might become involved in civil strife such as was now taking place in Greece and other liberated countries.

25. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the reports given and agreed that, upon receipt of further information, the Minister of National Defence would consider further the question he had raised with a view to subsequent report.

We are, therefore, about to amend his instructions so as to make it clear that Canadian troops may not be sent outside Italy without the concurrence of the Canadian Government. This formal step seems necessary since I have given a public assurance that Canadian troops will not serve in Greece without the consent of the Canadian Government.

1. I was surprised and grieved at the suggestion that you might find it necessary to issue a public statement that Canadian troops shall not be used in Greece. Such a statement could only increase our difficulties and postpone a settlement of the present troubles in that country. It would be generally regarded throughout the world as a dissociation of Canada from the policy of His Majesty's Government and a marked reflection on our credit and honour. We went into Greece at the invitation<sup>126</sup> of a Greek Government composed of all parties including E.A.M. and Communists. We went in with the approval of the United States and the assent of Russia to bring to the Greek people food and order. We cannot abandon this task without loss and a blow to British prestige. It is on such occasions as this that the British Commonwealth should stand together.

2. We have never in fact had any intention of proposing that Canadian troops should be sent to Greece. Specific orders to this effect have been sent to Field Marshal Alexander and your mind may, therefore, be quite at ease on that point. But a public statement at the present juncture by the Canadian Government that they had asked for such an assurance would be disastrous. The United States landing craft and aircraft are continuing their assistance to the British troops after the point had been decided at Washington. It would be a great pity for Canada to take isolated action and for the Empire to be wounded in this fashion. I shall be broadcasting tomorrow (Sunday) night on the subject of Greece.<sup>127</sup> Ends.

ARMY; EMPLOYMENT IN MEDITERRANEAN AREA

15. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported that, since this question had been discussed by the War Committee on December 11, he had found that, under the present instructions, the authorized employment of the Canadian Corps extended to the whole Mediterranean theatre.

Canadian Military Headquarters, London, had, therefore, been instructed to issue a directive to the Commander of the 1st Canadian Corps limiting to Italy the area in which Canadian forces could be employed.

16. THE PRIME MINISTER said that, in advance of the action taken by the Minister, he had sent a message to the Prime Minister of the United Kingdom stating that the government felt it essential that no Canadian forces should be despatched to Greece, except after the government had had an opportunity to consider and to approve any proposal to this end; the instructions of the Corps Commander were, therefore, being amended accordingly.

(Telegram No. 239, External Affairs to Dominions Office, Dec. 15, 1944).

17. MR. KING then read subsequent messages on the subject which had passed between the U.K. Prime Minister and himself.

Mr. Churchill had at first misunderstood the Canadian position; in his reply he had expressed surprise and concern that it might be found necessary for the Prime Minister to issue a public statement that Canadian troops would not be used in Greece.

It was, of course, not intended that any public statement be made. The point which it was desired to have perfectly clear was that Canadian forces would not be employed outside of Italy without the government's consent. A later message had cleared up this misconception satisfactorily. The government's position was now understood in London and a definite assurance had been received that there was no intention of employing Canadian troops in Greece.

(Telegrams No. 217 Dominions Office to External Affairs, Dec. 16; No. 241 External Affairs to Dominions Office, Dec. 17; No. 221 Dominions Office to External Affairs Dec. 19, 1944).

18. GENERAL MCNAUGHTON said that, in this connection, there were certain complex questions relating to the directives and orders of detail issued to Canadian Commanders, which required clarification. These were now being studied by the Judge Advocate-General and the Legal Advisor of the Department of External Affairs.

19. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted with approval the reports of the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence.

18. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of December 11th, reported that a directive had been issued by the Combined Chiefs of Staff to the Supreme Allied Commander, Mediterranean, on the subject of the occupation of territories in this theatre, in the event of an enemy withdrawal.

This directive had been issued at the request of the representatives of the U.K. Chiefs of Staff as a direct consequence of an exchange of telegrams between the Canadian and the U.K. governments and the effect was to restrict the employment of Canadian troops to temporary occupational duties in Austria and North-East Italy.

On the Italian front we cannot prevent the Germans withdrawing a number of divisions for use elsewhere if they so desire. We have therefore come to the conclusion in the general interest that we should withdraw five divisions from the Mediterranean so as to strengthen the forces under Field Marshal Montgomery. The President has suggested that these divisions should be Canadian and British. In view of the wishes you have expressed that the whole Canadian Army should be united in north-west Europe, I naturally warmly welcomed the President's proposal which has given us all great satisfaction. TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 207 of 29th November, 1944. The question of the repatriation of our forces after the defeat of Germany is causing us increasing concern. The encouraging reports from the Western Front give grounds for believing that the time is rapidly approaching when we shall be in urgent need of reasonably firm data on which to base our demobilization and reconstruction plans and when the public demand for information as to what will be both possible and probable under this head, will become most insistent.

2. While we naturally recognize that operational requirements should take precedence over those of repatriation, the fact that an appreciable number of our men are in their sixth year of service abroad, and that as regards the Army alone upwards of 100,000 men have already served for 3 years and more without any home leave, makes the Canadian problem a most pressing one.

3. We understand that the matter of combined shipping requirements has lately received the consideration of the Combined Chiefs of Staff, and, in the circumstances, we feel that some indication of a monthly rate at which it should be possible to effect the repatriation of Canadian service men not required for the war against Japan, or for occupation duty in Germany, should shortly be possible.

4. We have been led to understand that all or practically all of the troop-carrying capacity on the North Atlantic will be of British registry. If this be so it would appear that your staffs should soon be in a position to say what proportion of this tonnage could be made available and when, to meet our pressing needs.

5. You will, we are sure, be well aware of the importance that the Canadian people attach to this whole matter, and in the circumstances we should be glad of your support in this connection. We should also be glad of an indication as soon as possible as to the probable programme of repatriation of our troops and the likely monthly rate at which this can be done.

1. You will note in the minutes of the special committee of the Cabinet of April 19th,† which I have forwarded to the Prime Minister, that the provision of shipping for repatriation of overseas forces and dependents was considered and the decision reached that strong representations should be made for the allocation of additional space for Canadian personnel.

2. Pursuant to this decision Murchie has instructed Montague to ask for additional space sufficient to move at least 150,000 persons during the first six months after VE day. This would compare with an estimated 80,000 which C.M.H.Q. London reported as being provisionally allocated to Canada.

3. Prior to your departure you drafted a telegram to Massey informing him that in all probability he would shortly be receiving instructions to take up this general question with the United Kingdom authorities with a view to improving the Canadian allocation. SECRET AND PERSONAL. Reference your telegram No. 941 of April 4th† and our telegram No. 934 of April 19th.† The Government is very much concerned about the general problem of passage priorities for returning personnel after the end of hostilities in Europe. In conversation with the Prime Minister in Washington last month, President Roosevelt agreed that Service personnel not required for occupation duty should be brought back from Europe to North America in the order of their service overseas. This would involve a strict chronological priority, i.e., men, whether Canadians or Americans, who had been overseas for four years would be brought back before men who had been over for three years and so on. The President intended to have his own Service advisers work out the practical implications of this principle, but it is not yet clear whether he was able to do so before his death.

As you will fully appreciate, the question is one of great importance to the Government and people of Canada. We feel that some procedure will have to be worked out for associating Canada with decisions determining the allocation

I expect you will shortly receive instructions to take up this general question with the United Kingdom authorities. In the meantime, it may be helpful for you to know that the Government views the whole problem with a good deal of concern which has not been lessened by recent proposals for the sudden emergency movement of servicemen's dependents, of which they had received very little warning and for which they had not been able to make suitable reception arrangements.

1. As you have already been informed in my telegram No. 1010 of April 30th, the government are very much concerned about the general question of passage priorities and the provision of shipping for returning personnel after the end of hostilities in Europe. The Ministers responsible feel that great difficulty and unrest will be bound to ensue unless the proposed allotment of shipping to Canada is very much improved and the allotment of shipping proceeded with on a basis which recognizes the principle of priority of "first over, first back." To this end the government wish you to make the strongest possible representations to the appropriate authorities in London.

2. In this connection you will recall the Prime Minister's discussion with Mr. Roosevelt, referred to in my No. 1010 when it was agreed in principle that service personnel, whether Canadian or American, should be brought back from Europe to North America in strict chronological priority, based on their length of service overseas.

3. Recently the general question was considered by a special committee of the Cabinet. The committee were informed by the Minister of National Defence that, according to estimates provided by C.M.H.Q., London, shipping likely to be made available to Canada in the six months following the defeat of Germany would be sufficient to lift only 80,000 out of a total, including dependents, of some 400,000 Canadians. The Cabinet committee felt that in view of public demand for the return of substantial numbers of service personnel reasonably soon after VE day, the provisional allotment reported by C.M.H.Q. would be quite inadequate.

4. It should be made clear to the United Kingdom authorities that the government will expect at least equal treatment with the United States forces on the principle of "first over, first back," but that in no event would an allotment of less than the stated minimum of 150,000 be acceptable. It need hardly be emphasized that the government are prepared to take any shipping space in excess of this minimum that may become available.

5. In this connection you will doubtless recall, and have occasion to re-emphasize, the strong arguments peculiarly applicable to Canadian forces, as set out in my telegrams numbers 221 and 81 of November 14th, 1944, and April 2nd to the Dominions Office, particularly length of service overseas away from home.

6. The United Kingdom government will appreciate, in addition, the importance of personnel being returned in sufficient numbers to permit service demobilization to proceed step by step with industrial demobilization so that men may be fitted into employment as jobs develop.

7. The government desire that you press for consideration of this question at the soonest possible moment so that advance preparations may be made for organization overseas and in Canada.

8. You might take up the whole question personally with Lord Leathers.<sup>134</sup>

9. I suggest that you give copies of this telegram to Montague and the Canadian Joint Staff Mission.

SECRET. 1. With reference to my telegrams numbers 1010 of April 30th and 1033 of May 1st, 1945, the government have given further consideration to the urgent question of the provision of shipping for the repatriation of Canadian overseas forces.

2. As a result of full examination of the situation by officials of the Departments of Munitions and Supply and National Defence, it has been concluded that, if adequate additional space cannot be provided from United Kingdom sources, the only practicable alternative course by which the minimum accommodation necessary could be obtained would be to recall 30 oil burning cargo ships of Canadian ownership, at present employed by the United Kingdom Ministry of War Transport in order to convert them for the carriage of from 500 to 700 men each. These ships would have to be in permanent ballast to permit maximum use.

3. In the general interest this course would involve serious results which the Canadian government wish to avoid, if at all possible. It would mean a reduction in cargo capacity from North America to Europe of 750,000 tons or more during the next 12 months; it would inevitably entail serious interference with the construction of transport ferries in Canada, for the British Admiralty, and would slow down urgent ship repairs in Eastern Canadian yards.

4. Please inform the United Kingdom authorities that the matter is regarded as of such urgency and importance, that the government will, nevertheless, be compelled to take this course if additional space cannot be made available in accordance with the representations contained in our earlier telegrams.

DESPATCH A 173

London, May 15, 1945

Sir,

1. I have the honour to report that in accordance with the suggestion contained in paragraph 8 of your telegram No. 1033, of 1st May, I saw the

In fact, the reference is to telegram No. 1069 of May 4, the preceding document.

This was later changed to 132,200.

Minister of War Transport on the morning of Saturday, May 12th, in connection with the problem of the movement back to Canada of Canadian service personnel. I left with Lord Leathers a copy of my letter to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs of May 10th. I enclose a copy of this with this despatch.

2. In my conversation with the Minister I emphasised the importance which we attach to the problem and pointed out to him that the figure of 150,000 service men and women, whose movement to Canada in the first six months after the conclusion of hostilities we regard as of urgent importance, was a minimum number. As we have now been informed that 132,200 can be moved with the shipping already provisionally promised, the gap between this figure and our minimum is only about 17,800, which ought to be bridged without difficulty.

3. Lord Leathers was extremely sympathetic and undertook to do everything in his power to meet our difficulty. He pointed out that American troops to be returned to the United States en route for operational duties in the Pacific would naturally have priority over any servicemen returning for demobilisation, but he said that he realised troops given such priority must be actually designated for redeployment in the Pacific area. What he feared, however, was the return of large numbers of American troops from whom forces for service in the East would be selected after their arrival in the United States. This would naturally involve priority being given now to large numbers of American servicemen who would be demobilised on their return. Lord Leathers fully realises the validity of the "first over first back" formula as applied to Canadian and American forces so long as this does not apply to personnel returned with the definite purpose of further service in the Far East.

4. You will no doubt have seen the communiqué from the United States War Department issued on May 9th outlining its plans for redeployment and demobilisation.† The figure of the men to be returned in the first six months after "VE Day"—over 2,000,000—is very large and clearly indicates how watchful we must be if we are to secure our proper share of shipping.

5. Lord Leathers promised to let me know as soon as possible the result of his enquiries following my visit. Thus I shall simply say that I am doing all I can, in what you will agree is an extremely complex situation, to meet the Canadian need, and that I shall telegraph you immediately I hear from Lord Leathers.

I have etc.

Ottawa, May 17, 1945

2. In my telegram No. 1033 of May 1, 1945, the second paragraph referred to the discussions of the basic principles regarding repatriation of Service personnel between the Prime Minister and Mr. Roosevelt and to the agreement in principle that Service personnel whether Canadian or American should be brought back to North America from Europe in strict chronological order based on their length of service overseas. It is not clear whether the provisional figures of 132,200 referred to above were worked out before or after your discussions in which you put forward the need for recognizing the principle arrived at with regard to keeping Canadian and American repatriation policies in line with an irreducible minimum of 150,000. A report on this point would be appreciated and if the points have not been raised and urged already, they should be put forward without delay. If they have already been taken, they should be discussed again and re-emphasized in the light of the inadequacy of the provisional arrangements referred to above.

3. While the provisional total figure of 132,200 as the number of Canadian Service personnel likely to be moved to Canada during the next six months is an improvement upon earlier estimates and will provide some basis for planning, you will no doubt emphasize in discussions with United Kingdom authorities that this figure falls considerably short of the 150,000 which the Government regard as the absolute minimum.

4. As mentioned in my telegram No. 1010 of April 30 it is the view of the government that it would be urgently necessary to work out arrangements with the United Kingdom for associating Canada with decisions determining passage priorities. This is essential both as a means of ensuring the proper representation of Canadian interests and for the smooth operation of repatriation machinery.

5. It is the view of the government that the detailed allocation, as between the three Services, of space assigned for the transport of Canadian personnel should be left for the decision of the Canadian authorities to be made on the recommendation of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London, and therefore whilst noting the provisional assignment of 132,200, the government reserve the right to determine the specific apportionment of any such space between the various Canadian services in accordance with details to be worked out by the Canadian authorities.

6. For your own personal information we do not understand the individual figure given for R.C.A.F. in Dominions Office telegram No. 101.† If this refers solely to personnel of squadrons destined for the Pacific, the total of 55,000 is obviously much too high. We would not wish to do anything which would have the effect of reducing the overall Canadian allocation but point out that R.C.A.F. personnel are to be returned on a basis of priority similar to that of other Services and this being so the proportions between the three Services would have to be substantially altered from that indicated by the United Kingdom.

TOP SECRET. Your telegram No. 1171 of May 17th, repatriation of Canadian service personnel.

2. You will soon receive my despatch No. A. 173 of May 15th which reports talk I had with Lord Leathers and encloses copy of my letter to Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs† concerning Canadian need for repatriation of minimum of 150,000 service personnel in next six months' period.

Conversation with Leathers followed up by discussion with Joint Staff Mission, as a result of which I have sent him a letter,† a copy of which is going forward to you by bag. This letter was written before your telegram arrived. It incorporates, however, your instruction that Canada reserves the right to determine as between the services the detailed allocation of space assigned for transport of service personnel.

3. The provisional figure of 132,200 was worked out prior to submission of Canadian position to United Kingdom Government. Gap between this figure and our minimum is small, however, and, I am satisfied, should be bridged without difficulty.

4. Referring your paragraph 6, you may wish to know that the explanation of the R.C.A.F. 55,000 figure is that it is based on an earlier computation of what would be the VLR<sup>137</sup> (R.C.A.F.) force. The present plan is to use the difference first for the balance of the Canadian division for the Far East and second for long-term repatriates chosen on the "first over, first back" basis from all three services.

5. Urgent Canadian need for repatriation of maximum possible number Canadian service personnel in next six months is fully understood here and SECRET. 1. I refer to my No. 1194† and preceding telegrams concerning the allocation of shipping space for the transportation home of Canadian service men and women and their dependents.

2. Information supplied by the Department of National Defence indicates army personnel, who have been in the European zone in excess of three years, i.e., antedating 31 March 1942 approximate date of arrival of first U.S. forces, exceeds 92,000. Including Air Force and Naval personnel this figure would be well in excess of 100,000.

3. On the principle of "first over first back" agreed upon by Mr. Roosevelt earlier this year as a basis for the allocation of Atlantic shipping, and with the exception of personnel actually destined for Pacific operations, Canada would be entitled to an absolute priority for approximately 100,000. Thereafter allocation of passages as between returning Canadian and U.S. Forces would be determined by numbers of the respective countries awaiting return and their comparative lengths of service overseas.

4. In my immediately following telegram† the estimated distribution of Canadian army personnel in the European zone is given. I presume you can obtain similar information from Naval and Air Force heads in London as to their strengths.

5. You might discuss with Major General Young, Q.M.G.,<sup>138</sup> presently in London the implications of these figures in relation to the agreed principle and, thereafter, consider the desirability of reviewing with U.K. authorities the basis upon which Atlantic shipping is being allocated to the United States and Canada, with the purpose of improving our allocation.

London, June 1, 1945

SECRET. Your telegram No. 1264 of May 30th, allocation of shipping space for Canadian service personnel.

I saw Lord Leathers again on Wednesday, May 30th, and strongly pressed for allocation of troop transport capacity of minimum 150,000 for 6 months commencing July 1st. Minister was, as before, sympathetic and I am convinced he is doing all in his power to meet our wishes. I am satisfied that it will serve no useful purpose to ask for accommodation beyond 120,000 [150,000?], which is suggested in your telegram under reference and indeed might prejudice our position.

2. I asked Lord Leathers if it would assist him if our Prime Minister sent personal telegram to Mr. Churchill urging the allotment of accommodation 150,000 as already requested. He said it would, and I strongly urge that this should be done. It will be important that in this telegram the allotment of the 132,200 passages, already referred to in Dominions Office telegram No. 101 of May 10th,† should be referred to as a firm offer which, although appreciated, is quite insufficient, and it should be stated very clearly that 150,000 is minimum figure which we feel we can accept. I suggest that this telegram to Mr. Churchill should be sent without delay.

3. With reference to paragraph 5 of your telegram No. 1171 of May 17th, United Kingdom authorities have given me the assurance that Canadian Government is free to allot shipping space.

Ottawa, June 5, 1945

SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. Our High Commissioner now has actively under discussion with the Minister of War Transport the allocation of shipping for redeployment of Canadian forces and the repatriation of those to be demobilized on their return to Canada.

2. In this connection we have received word through the Dominions Office (circular No. D.798 of May 11th)† that arrangements have been made for the allocation of transport capacity during the current six months to lift 132,200

Canadian service personnel, including those being redeployed to the Pacific theatre, ex-prisoners of war and those being repatriated for demobilization.

3. It is quite apparent from an examination of our position that, unless our allocation of shipping can be substantially improved, the return of large numbers of Canadians will be long delayed. The figure of 132,200 which we take to be a firm offer, is an increase on earlier estimates that we have received. We appreciate this improvement, though it still falls far short of the amount which my colleagues and I feel that the circumstances require.

4. One of the principal factors in the situation is, of course, the large numbers of U.S. personnel who will have to be transported from Europe. A few months ago when I discussed this problem with Mr. Roosevelt he agreed that, in the allocation of shipping for the repatriation of servicemen to this continent, the "first over first back" principle should be applicable as between U.S. and Canadian troops. The President informed me that I could definitely count on this being done and I so reported to the Cabinet on my return from Washington.

5. I need not remind you that a large number of Canadians have been in the European zone for five years or longer. I am informed that in excess of 100,000 Army and Air Force personnel have been there for more than three years, i.e. before 31st March 1942, the approximate time of arrival of the first U.S. forces. On this principle and, with the exception of personnel actually destined for Pacific operations, Canada would be entitled to an absolute priority in the allocation of Atlantic shipping for approximately 100,000. The figures announced by the Minister of War Transport have apparently been calculated without reference to this principle.

6. The problem has recently been reconsidered anxiously by the Cabinet and we are quite convinced that some substantial improvement will have to be made. Movements on a larger scale will require to be made possible, by one means or another, in view of public demand for the return of Service personnel in the reasonably near future, and in view also of the importance to the national economy of personnel being returned in sufficient numbers to permit demobilization to proceed step by step with the reconversion of industry.

7. We have had under consideration the possible conversion of Canadian-owned freighters now under the control and operation of your War Transport Ministry but since the adoption of this course would materially reduce the cargo space available for the relief of the distressed countries, we hesitate to resort to such an extreme measure.

8. I would be grateful if you would give this urgent question your personal attention. We realize that shipping commitments for the long term are difficult to make in present circumstances but an immediate allotment of a minimum of 150,000 for the six months with some indication of a further allotment capable of lifting the balance of Canadians within the subsequent six months would go far towards a solution of this most anxious problem. Ends.<sup>139</sup>

London, July 4, 1945

SECRET. Montague showed me late this morning a telegram from Murchie, CGS 344 of July 3rd,<sup>1</sup> which sets out text of statement given by Minister of National Defence yesterday,<sup>140</sup> I gather, on the subject of arrangements for repatriation of Canadian service personnel.

2. Only this morning I sent the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs the following letter:

"I wish to refer to the secret telegram from my Prime Minister to Mr. Churchill, No. 136 of June 5th, concerning the question of the allocation of shipping for Canadian forces now on this side. This telegram expressed, as you will recall, the urgent Canadian need for an allotment of a minimum of 150,000 in the next 6 months, together with an indication of a further allotment capable of lifting the balance of Canadians within the subsequent 6 month period. So far this message has not been answered, and the purpose of this letter is to express the strong hope that such may be possible without further delay.

You will wish to know that the present position is made more complicated by virtue of the fact that, shortly after hostilities ended, Canadian newspapers published a story to the effect that the large majority of servicemen would be home by Christmas. There was and is, of course, no foundation for so optimistic a report. Nevertheless, my Government decided it would be best to defer an official denial until such time as a public statement could be made reflecting accurately the true situation and prospects.

The longer silence is maintained, and our troops are kept unaware of the position, the more difficult it will be to deal with their disappointment when the truth is known. Canadian service authorities believe that unless a statement is soon made, they will be faced with a dangerous situation in terms of the morale of the Canadian forces overseas. Thus, in relation to the Canadian domestic situation as well as our forces on this side, it is important that the telegram from your Prime Minister may soon be forthcoming, since on it must depend this very necessary public statement as well as complex service plans.”

3. I am unaware of the precise circumstances which prompted National Defence announcement, but presume it is the result of growing public pressure in Canada for information on existing position. I feel it my duty to tell you that I much regret the making of this announcement without first consulting this office. Statement says that assurance of minimum total of 126,000 has been given during the remainder of 1945. While this is, of course, the case, I have taken the position all along that 150,000 at the least would alone meet the Canadian requirement. The National Defence release weakens the Canadian case in my view, since I fear that it will be construed as Canadian acquiescence in 126,000 figure.

4. Notwithstanding statement, I propose to continue to press for larger minimum figure and will explain Canadian statement as an interim Canadian measure to allay Canadian anxiety in a manner which would not embarrass United Kingdom Government. Please confirm that this approach is satisfactory to you.

SECRET. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins: My telegram No. 136 of 5th June referred to the urgent necessity of obtaining a minimum allotment of 150,000 for the six months period ending 31st December 1945 for the purpose of returning to Canada the Canadian Service personnel for duty in the Pacific and a substantial proportion of the long service personnel who have been overseas for three years and more.

2. We are now informed that the present allotment will probably not exceed 126,000 during this period. On this basis more than 140,000 Canadian Service personnel with overseas service of up to three years will still remain overseas at the end of the year.

3. It is considered of the highest importance in the interest of maintaining morale and discipline of Canadian forces overseas that we should be able to satisfy our troops that their repatriation is being accomplished at a reasonable rate and that they are being treated fairly in comparison with other nations.

4. I would strongly urge that a further allotment of at least 24,000 be made to bring the total shipping for Canadian personnel during the last six months of this year up to the minimum of 150,000 requested and that some indication be given as to the shipping that will be available thereafter to complete the repatriation of Canadian troops other than those allotted for duty with the occupation forces in Germany. TELEGRAM 148

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram No. 136 of June 5th, 1945.

1. You will realise that the figure of 132,000 given to you in Dominions Office telegram No. 101 of 10th May† was a tentative figure for guidance in your planning. It was not intended as a firm offer and, in fact, various changes in the operational background have already necessitated a new review of our troop shipping commitments during 1945.

2. On the basis of this revised plan, we shall be able to send back to Canada 146,200 of your men by the end of the year, and you will see that this figure is very little short of the 150,000 asked for by you. It is in any case a planning figure which may or may not be exceeded in the event.

We hope that it will be possible to give a high priority to the repatriation of the remainder of your men during 1946, in common with those of the other Dominions, so that the whole task may be speedily accomplished.

3. We have given every consideration to the alternative means suggested by you. You have yourself mentioned the disadvantage of reducing available cargo space, and there would be the further disadvantage of seriously affecting other vital work being carried out in your shipyards. I feel sure you will agree that these disadvantages outweigh the small increase to the troop-shipping capacity in the Atlantic which would result.

4. You also referred to President Roosevelt's promise to you that the first over first back principle should be applied to the return of Canadians and Americans across the Atlantic. The position as between the United States and ourselves is that, as a result of discussion, we have undertaken to make available to the United States certain British troopship capacity for redeployment purposes. The United States authorities were not entirely satisfied with this assistance and would have liked to press us for more. Our present deployment plan is based on our original undertaking to the United States and we cannot give them any more capacity without a corresponding reduction in the rate of repatriation of British Commonwealth forces. We feel, therefore, that an appeal by you to the United States authorities would merely result in the United States Government demanding yet further assistance from us, which, as I have already shown, could only be given at the expense of the capacity available to the British Commonwealth. Ends.

SECRET. Your telegram No. 1872 of July 4th. Service repatriation. It is entirely in order for you to continue to press for larger figure and to explain in the manner you suggest the statement issued by the Minister of National Defence. The disturbances at Aldershot<sup>141</sup> emphasize the importance of securing repatriation of at least 150,000 this year and the statement published here certainly did not indicate acquiescence in any lower figure.

2. The Prime Minister is today sending a further telegram to Mr. Churchill. While the latter may not be able to give it personal attention until after the Berlin Conference, I am sure that you will take every opportunity of pressing the views put forward in telegram 136 of June 5th and in today's telegram.

2. Minister of National Defence considers that figures given in Mr. Churchill's telegram 148 are not an improvement on those used in his recent press statement. There may be confusion over period to which the figures relate. Our minimum request has been for 150,000 in last half of 1945 whereas Mr. Churchill's figure of 146,200 seems to include troops repatriated during June. Please consult C.M.H.Q. on these points.

London, July 9, 1945

MOST IMMEDIATE. Your telegram No. 1555 of July 7th, service repatriation.

1. All my representations, both verbal and written, have been on basis of minimum allocation of 150,000 for last half of 1945, that is to say beginning 1st July. I took it to be implicit in this request that this figure had no reference to any shipping given to Canada prior to that date. C.M.H.Q., in fact, raised on Saturday afternoon possibility that Mr. Churchill's figure of 146,200 included personnel repatriated during June.

United Kingdom authorities now confirm such to be the case and suggest Canadian request is met, since first plan contemplated 132,000 as from July 1st, but readjustments possible shipping for additional 14,200 during June.

2. I do not consider United Kingdom decision satisfactory, since all my representations have been on basis that June cushion would not affect request for minimum of 150,000. Thus, if you concur, I would propose sending following letter, subject to any amendments you might suggest, to Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs, Begins:

On instructions from my Government, I wish to draw to your attention certain considerations raised in the top secret telegram from Mr. Churchill to my Prime Minister, No. 148 of 6th July, which deals with the question of the allocation of shipping for Canadian forces on this side.

Mr. Churchill indicated in his telegram that, on the basis of revised planning, it would be possible to send back to Canada 146,200 Canadian service personnel by the end of this year. It was first assumed that this figure referred to the six month period effective 1st July. It is now understood, however, that it relates rather to the period from when reallocation began. In actual fact, the request of my Government has taken into account the number of Canadians likely to be moved in the month of June. Thus I regret to tell you that the suggested arrangement fails to meet the urgent Canadian need.

You already know and, I feel certain, sympathize with the factors which make it necessary for Canada to require, apart from any personnel moved in June, a minimum of 150,000 in the next six months. These considerations have been brought to the attention of the United Kingdom Government in my letters to you and the Minister of War Transport, as well as in the most recent telegram to your Prime Minister, No. 164 of the 6th July. The problem of the maintenance of morale and discipline among Canadian forces who have been overseas for so long, is, as you will understand, an extremely difficult one. The Canadian service authorities are doing their utmost to control the situation. Nevertheless, only shipping on the basis I have suggested will, I am satisfied, meet the objection that forces of the United States, most of whom have been in this country for a much shorter time, are being given improper preference.

The purpose of this letter, therefore, is to ask that the decision indicated in Mr. Churchill's foregoing telegram should be reviewed in order that a solution no less favourable than 146,200 as from July 1st should be secured. My Government is much concerned about the position, and in these circumstances I trust that an early answer to this letter is possible. Ends.

3. C.M.H.Q. have been consulted about this telegram and agree with its content.

4. In view of considerations raised in this telegram, no statement by this office on shipping situation will, of course, be made.

Ottawa, July 10, 1945

Your telegram No. 1906 of July 9th. Service repatriation.

It is now clear that the difference between the figure given in Mr. Churchill's telegram No. 148 and our minimum request is at least 18,000 and not 3,800 as Mr. Churchill implied. In view of this substantial difference we concur in despatch of your draft letter to Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs subject to following alterations:

1. Add the following to last sentence of second paragraph: "since it falls short apparently by 18,000 men of the figure regarded by the Canadian Government as an essential minimum."

2. Paragraph 3, first sentence, for "in the next six months" read "in the last six months of 1945."

3. Paragraph 3, last sentence, for "improper preference" read "undue preference."

4. Paragraph 4, first sentence, for "146,200" read "150,000."

Since unexpectedly heavy arrivals will take place towards the end of July, the Department of National Defence is issuing a short statement designed primarily to warn the Canadian public of the strain on the railway system and to urge that civilian travel be restricted as much as possible. There is no indication that the increased July movement will add to the total programme for the balance of the year.

Dear Mr. Abbott,

As you are aware we have been trying for some time to get as definite a commitment as possible from the United Kingdom Government that the rate of repatriation of our forces overseas will be satisfactory to us. After discussions with General McNaughton the High Commissioner in London was authorized on July 10th to write in fairly strong terms to the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs following up his previous representations on the subject and expressing dissatisfaction on some points with the decisions notified by Mr. Churchill in his telegram to the Prime Minister No. 148 of July 6th.

Before an answer was received to this letter the change of Government took place in the United Kingdom which caused a further delay. Canada House some time ago renewed pressure on the United Kingdom authorities and the enclosed telegram No. 2485 of August 29th from the Acting High Commissioner conveys the rather unsatisfactory results attained. It would appear from this that we may have to wait until discussions in Washington due to begin on September 15th have ended before we can get a fresh commitment from the United Kingdom authorities. Mr. Pearson will probably be in Ottawa next week and he may bring back from London more information with him. We should certainly do our best to ensure that at the discussions in Washington our needs are properly presented and satisfactorily met.

Yours sincerely,

Dear General,

We have completed our shipping review which is now going up to the Combined Chiefs of Staff for approval. When we get back home we will, of course, have to clear it with our masters there, so the following is advance information as to the probable rate of repatriation of Canadian personnel over the next six months.

November .....	11,400
December .....	31,600
January .....	44,900
February .....	45,000
March .....	23,400
April .....	31,500
Total .....	187,800

This completes the job on the basis of the figures which we have, which are

Army .....	171,800
R.C.A.F. ....	16,000
Total .....	187,800

It is possible that we will be able to increase the lift available in February and March and so complete the job one month earlier, but this will be subject to further consideration in December when the situation will be clearer and we will know the extent to which shipping will be surplus to American requirements. So far as attaining a measure of parity with American repatriation, it appears from their schedules that they will not complete either in the Pacific or the Atlantic until approximately June, but in the case of the latter the really heavy movement will be completed in February and subsequent movement will be at a reduced rate. I hope that acceptance capacity in Canada will be able to deal with the arrivals in the first quarter of next year. The figures I have given above are for Canadians only. There will be in addition five or six thousand additional personnel in each month. As regards actual ships, we have cleared with Cunard that Queen Elizabeth can continue to run to Halifax through the winter, and I see no reason why she should not remain indefinitely on Canadian service. It is probable that the Queen Mary will remain on American service through the first half of next year and that we will retain the equivalent lift which they are now making available to us on account for their use of the Queen Mary. Please treat all this as private information as it is, of course, not yet definite, though I believe it to be a reasonably accurate forecast of the future. I should be glad if you would pass this to General Young with my best regards and regrets that was unable on this occasion to include a visit to Canada during my short stay in North America.

My dear Mackenzie King,

I had hoped to be able before now to give you some indication of the shipping available for the repatriation of your Forces. However, negotiations with the Americans, on which all our plans depended, have taken longer than we anticipated, and, although full details of the proposed shipping moves up to June, 1946, are not yet settled, I thought that, in view of your anxiety over this problem, you should know roughly how the repatriation of your men is planned to be achieved.

2. The Americans are returning to us the Queen Elizabeth and the Aquitania, which were lent to them until the end of 1945, and providing us with an equivalent personnel lift in place of the Queen Mary the use of which they are retaining for the present, but even so the total available shipping is inadequate for all our needs, and an all-round reduction in the rate contemplated for repatriation both of your men and of ours, trooping, and other movements is inevitable. In particular, the repatriation of all prisoners of war and internees from the Far East is being given priority over everything else and I am sure that you will agree that this is right. It is an expensive movement, for their special needs permit of only 60 per cent of a ship's normal capacity being used.

3. On present plans, we shall have repatriated to Canada 162,000 men between July and December 1945 and we hope that repatriation will be complete by the 30th April, 1946.

4. I am sure you will appreciate that these figures are estimates only and that unforeseen developments may result in our being unable to keep to this programme. We are most anxious to get your men home as soon as possible: our endeavour has been to allocate the shipping available as fairly as possible between all the requirements.

Yours sincerely,

ARMY; AIR FORCE; NAVY: ATTACHMENT OF CANADIAN OFFICERS FOR SERVICE IN THE PACIFIC AND ASIA

14. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported that Canadian Military Headquarters, London, had proposed the attachment of up to 30 Army officers to British units in Southeast Asia, for a minimum period of from four to six months, to acquire training and operational experience in that theatre. The Commander, Canadian Army Staff, Washington, had submitted a similar proposal for attachment of 10 officers to Australian, New Zealand or U.S. forces operating in the Southwest Pacific.

These proposals were recommended for approval as providing some preparation for eventual participation by Canadian ground personnel in these theatres, should such participation be decided upon.

15. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES said that the Naval Staff had also agreed upon the desirability of seeking experience for a number of R.C.N. officers in the Pacific theatre and had suggested attachment to the Royal Navy for this purpose. Nothing had come of the proposal so far.

16. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported that the Air Staff were exploring a similar plan with respect to selected R.C.A.F. officers. It was thought to be important to have personnel acquainted in advance with conditions in the Pacific theatre in case it were decided, at some future date, to have Canadian units participate in operations there.

17. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that measures of preparedness of this kind were no doubt valuable, perhaps essential, from the military point of view. It should be clearly understood, however, that they would not imply any commitment with regard to the nature or extent of Canadian military participation in the war against Japan. Decision on these questions would be taken as matters of policy, at the proper time.

18. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved selection and attachment of small numbers of suitable Army, Navy and Air Force personnel to United Kingdom and other Commonwealth forces and to U.S. forces in the Pacific and Asiatic areas, it being understood that no decision would be implied thereby as to the nature and extent of Canadian participation in these theatres.

Ottawa, January 14, 1944

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I am asking for some guidance with respect to the enclosed draft project of a letter to Sir Archibald Sinclair. This sins against the canons of the Department of External Affairs

- (1) in that it is direct communication with a Minister of a foreign power;
- (2) in that there seems to be some assumption with respect to the future course of the War, which might very well be left to present Joint Planners;
- (3) in that there seems to be some wholly unauthorized and unorthodox mention of very high policy with respect to war with Japan, etc.

Therefore, veto it for all you are worth and, if necessary, submit it to higher authority but I am convinced that we should draw the attention of Sir Archibald to some of the problems which may arise in connection with demobilization of the R.C.A.F., particularly those mixed up with R.A.F.

*Projet de lettre du ministre de la Défense nationale pour l'Air
au secrétaire d'État pour l'Air de Grande-Bretagne*

Draft Letter from Minister of National Defence for Air to Secretary of State for Air of Great Britain

My dear Sir Archibald Sinclair,

RE: ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE DEMOBILIZATION

Whilst it is generally recognized in this country that the war is by no means over and the heavy sacrifices are still to be expected, the subject of service demobilization is attracting the greatest possible public attention.

We, as a Government, have of course made our plans for rehabilitation, vocation and university training, postwar employment, etc., for ex-service men following their repatriation and discharge from the Services but with respect to the R.C.A.F. the antecedent problem to that of rehabilitation, namely, that of demobilization provides certain difficulties which I think should receive preliminary consideration and discussion on a ministerial level since it involves matters of government war policy, government policy in international affairs and is bound to affect the Canadian national economy.

With respect to the Canadian Army, the matter is comparatively easy of solution as repatriation and demobilization will in all probability be carried out by Armies, Divisions and Brigades, etc.

But the Canadian Air Forces are in an altogether different position, particularly with respect to aircrew and groundcrew, radio mechanics, who are distributed all over the world, attached to R.A.F. units and in isolated lots.

Unless a grave injustice is to be done to these men, they must be given the opportunity of such priorities of demobilization based on length of service, type of service (intensive warfare or otherwise), distance from home, opportunity for employment, necessity or desire for further education, etc., as are open to members of other Canadian Services and of their comrades in the Air Force employed at home, or in the Joint Air Training Plan.

I understand that your Government has given a great deal of thought to this question, and to the complex problem of priorities, but I assume that you have taken into consideration the economic interest of your own Country and the desires of your own people, and properly so. But, it is not only possible but probable, since your home and overseas conditions and commitments will differ from ours, that your plans will also be different and unapplicable to our men. Canada must therefore work out its own plans, at the same time recognizing that individuals in the R.C.A.F. and R.A.F. forces are so intermingled that unscrambling will be an extremely difficult matter.

For instance, individual Canadian aircrew members are attached to R.A.F. units in Egypt. They may even form an important part of the squadron aircrew strength. The war in Europe will be over but the war with Japan will still be going on. The squadrons will probably be inactive from a combat standpoint with morale inevitably deteriorating, the men asking for action or repatriation, the relatives and the Canadian people clamouring that their boys be given an opportunity to be rehabilitated. It will not be a valid answer to say to the Canadian people that we must await the decision of the R.A.F. as to whether a particular squadron is to be retained in Egypt, or sent to other theatres before Canadian personnel are repatriated. In other words, the future of Canadian men must not be dependent on the convenience or interest of individuals or governments of any other country.

It is because this question of Canadian demobilization as it affects the R.A.F. should be given immediate consideration and plans prepared for action to be taken in the light of events as they occur, that I have taken full charge of these matters in my own department, and any preparations, preliminary or otherwise, will be under my direct control. I suggest that as a preliminary we agree on certain considerations which must be taken into account, the first being the phases it is anticipated the Air Forces of both Countries will have to go through. These might be somewhat as follows:

- (a) Period after defeat of Germany, but war with Japan still in progress; this might be termed the "European Policing" phase;
- (b) Period of war with Japan; this might be termed the "War with Japan" phase;
- (c) Period of policing by the United Nations until re-establishment of satisfactory civil governments in the European and Asiatic areas has been completed and methods of maintaining world peace have been decided; this might be termed the "Postwar Policing" phase.

With regard to (a) Canada will of course make its contribution;

With regard to (b) Canada's position as a Pacific Power, as a member of the Commonwealth, and as an American Nation make it necessary that she shall take part in the subjugation of Japan;

With regard to (c) the extent and character of Canada's contribution will no doubt be the subject of discussion with the other Allied Nations.

I believe it should be laid down as a firm and agreed principle that methods and priorities of demobilization of its own nationals is a matter for the decision of each Government alone.

Generally speaking, all these matters will no doubt be finally solved on an inter-government level, but prior to the final solution, we as responsible ministers for important branches of the Armed Services of our respective Countries must endeavour to work out in a broad and general way the effect of any Government decisions on the welfare of the individual whom we have presently under our charge.

I suggest for your immediate consideration that a joint committee of Air Ministry and Canadian Department of National Defence for Air be set up, on a high officer or official level reporting directly to their respective Ministers with instructions to report on:

1. What methods and procedure should be followed in order to enable the Canadian Government to proceed as rapidly and as efficiently as possible with R.C.A.F. repatriation and demobilization, having regard to the assumptions with regard to phases mentioned above.

2. What steps can be taken to bring about a regrouping of R.C.A.F. personnel so that they may take fullest advantage of the Canadian Government's plans for repatriation, demobilization and rehabilitation.

3. What methods and procedure should be followed in order to give to R.C.A.F. personnel attached to R.A.F. the benefits of pre-demobilization training and instruction to fit such personnel for civil life in Canada whilst they are still attached to the R.A.F. and before any re-grouping takes place. In my view this training must begin at once during off duty hours.

Finally, I realize that this is a very complicated matter and that its solution will require the best thoughts of our best men but I have high hopes that a solution can be arrived at which will (a) not interfere with the successful prosecution of the war, (b) protect the interests of both our countries, (c) take into consideration the future careers of our men as individuals.

RE: R.C.A.F. DEMOBILIZATION PLANS

Mr. Power has, on a couple of occasions, mentioned in War Committee the urgency of making plans now for the demobilization of R.C.A.F. personnel, emphasizing the special complexity of the problem because of the fact that R.C.A.F. personnel are distributed all over the world throughout the R.A.F.

Mr. Power feels that he should get on, at once, with demobilization arrangements which will necessitate, at the outset, conversations with the Air Ministry and agreements as to the treatment to be accorded Canadians who are serving with the R.A.F. He would like to communicate to the U.K. Secretary of State for Air, without delay, along the lines of his attached draft letter.

Mr. Power, however, appreciates the fact that the nature and extent of Canada's air participation in the war against Japan, which is an important factor in determining demobilization arrangements, is a matter of high government policy upon which no final decision has been taken. He, therefore, submits this communication for your observations.<sup>143</sup>

You may wish to have the matter of policy put before War Committee at the next meeting for determination at least on general lines.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR WITH JAPAN

13. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported that he had recently communicated with the U.K. Secretary of State for Air, in connection with plans for the demobilization of the R.C.A.F. Since this problem inevitably involved important questions of government policy, particularly with regard to the nature and extent of Canadian participation in the war with Japan and in the policing to be carried on after the war, he had consulted the Prime Minister, in advance, upon the terms of this communication.

It had been stated therein that Canada's position as a Pacific Power, as a member of the Commonwealth, and as an American nation, made it necessary that she take part in the subjugation of Japan; the extent and character of Canada's contribution to postwar policing activities would, no doubt, be the subject of discussion with other Allied nations.

(Letter, Minister of National Defence for Air to U.K. Secretary of State for Air, Jan. 18, 1944.)

The Chief of Staff, Canadian Military Headquarters, London, in reporting upon this meeting, had asked for an indication of government policy upon the Army's participation in occupation forces and in the war in the Far East.

(Army Message, C.O.S.93, C.M.H.Q., London, to N.D.H.Q., Ottawa, May 19, 1944).†

24. THE PRIME MINISTER said that it had been evident at the Prime Ministers' meeting in London that British plans for the war against Japan had not reached any final stage. It had been clear, however, that the United Kingdom contemplated that Naval and Air Forces would be the principal British participants.

No suggestions had been made as to any contribution on the part of the Canadian Army. Indeed, no plans had been mentioned in London for Canadian participation of any kind, although he had a communication for the Minister of National Defence for Air as to the part which might be expected of the R.C.A.F.

There had been no evidence that any thought had been given to the possibility of Canadian Air Forces participating in operations with U.S. forces from the northern Pacific.

25. MR. KING said that it was, of course, understood that Canada would play her part in the war against Japan. The form and extent of such participation should, however, receive careful consideration and should accord with Canada's special position and interests.

 See Document 229.

26. THE SECRETARY observed that, on March 1st, the War Committee had noted with approval a report of the Post-hostilities Advisory Committee in which a Canadian contribution to the forces of occupation had been put tentatively at an Army Brigade Group and seven Air Squadrons.<sup>145</sup>

27. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed to refer, for consideration and report, to the Post-hostilities Advisory Committee the question of Canadian participation in European forces of occupation, and to the Chiefs of Staff, with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary, the question of Canadian participation in the Japanese war.

RE: CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

THE POSITION OF THE THREE SERVICES:

1. At a first informal meeting in London between the U.K. Chiefs of Staff and the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, questions were raised of the form and extent of Canadian participation in the Japanese war. Lieut.-General Stuart, in reporting this discussion, asked for an indication of government policy on this point, and the War Committee, on May 24th, referred the matter to the Chiefs of Staff, with the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Secretary.

2. The subject had already come up in concrete form in respect of the R.C.A.F. During the Power-Balfour discussions leading to the last revision of the B.C.A.T.P., tentative figures were submitted by the Air Ministry's representatives as to the numbers and types of squadrons which the R.C.A.F. might provide at the conclusion of hostilities in Europe.

Before signing the revised Air Training Agreement,<sup>146</sup> the War Committee approved an Aide Mémoire to the U.K. government (February 10th, 1944),<sup>147</sup>

the effect of which was to inform the United Kingdom that Canada, at that stage, could make no commitment as to the form or extent of her air participation in the war against Japan, pointing out that it might be necessary to contemplate close co-operation with U.S. forces and that, in any event, it was the government's intention to work toward a fully integrated Canadian air force.

3. The U.K. Secretary of State for Air recently communicated to Mr. Power a new and substantially reduced estimate of the number of Canadian squadrons to be employed, after the defeat of Germany, in occupation and transport and in operations against Japan in the South East Asia theatre.†

4. The Navy had had under consideration the despatch of a flotilla of six frigates for service in the Indian Ocean.

5. Before the Prime Minister's departure for the recent London meetings, each of the services had provided him with preliminary papers on the form and extent of Canadian military participation in the Japanese war.

These papers indicated the following possibilities, as a basis for discussion:

Navy—the provision of fleet units, contribution of escort vessels and landing craft for Far Eastern waters, in addition to the naval defence of Canada, much reduced anti-submarine protection in the Atlantic and possible contribution to mine clearance in Europe;

Army—one division from the Army overseas, for co-operation with British forces in South East Asia; brigade groups from the Army in Canada for service in the Eastern Pacific, possibly in co-operation with the U.S. forces;

(Note—Under present policy Army forces for participation in the Pacific would have to be obtained from the Army overseas and it is unlikely that such forces could be made available until the war against Germany has been determined);

Air Force—participation by Canadian squadrons from South East Asia and the North Pacific (if the latter develops as a major sphere of offensive operations), 45 operational and 15 transport squadrons were tentatively suggested.

(Note—These figures are now reduced to a total of 58 including those required for European occupation.)

STRATEGIC AND POLITICAL CONSIDERATIONS:

6. Mr. Robertson and Mr. Heeney met with the Chiefs of Staff on June 7th and reviewed the position in relation to probable Allied strategy at the close of the European war and the particular interests of Canada as a member of the Commonwealth and as an American nation.

7. It was apparent from Mr. Robertson's report of discussions at the Prime Ministers' meeting and from information obtained by the Chiefs of Staff from other sources that, as yet, British and U.S. strategic authorities had agreed upon no over-all plan for the final phases against the Japanese.

8. The present position was as follows:

(a) the British were concentrating their efforts in South East Asia and were apparently committed to no particular long-term strategy for the assault upon Japan;

(b) the United States (with Australian assistance in the South) were conducting the Pacific war as part of what was no doubt a major U.S. plan for the eventual reduction of Japan;

(c) the possibility of attack from the North Pacific could not be determined until it was known whether Soviet bases would be made available.

9. From the purely military point of view, at the end of the German war, it would be the simplest course for Canadian forces (Navy, Army and Air) to continue in combination with British forces in British operational theatres rather than to participate in theatres under United States direction. This tendency would lead to Canadian participation in South East Asia.

10. The U.K. government would tend to encourage such employment of Canadian forces as an element in the "British" contribution to the eventual defeat of Japan.

The United States would not be likely to request Canadian co-operation in the Pacific since they would have adequate forces of their own in theatres under their strategic direction.

11. On the other hand, Canadian and indeed Commonwealth interests might be better served if the Canadian contribution to the war against Japan were made in an "American" theatre, namely the North or West Pacific.

(With respect to the Air Force it was with this in mind that the Canadian government communicated to the U.K. government by the Aide Mémoire of February 10th, with particular reference to the air war. It was the government's view that Canada could not have her air force serving solely in South East Asia, if a U.S. air offensive against Japan were mounted from the North East Pacific.)

(With respect to the Army, it is felt by the Army Staff that Canadian Army participation should be at a stage and in a theatre in which operations are directed against Japan proper or against the Japanese Army in China, rather than in preliminary campaigns in Burma or the Malay Peninsula. The value of such participation from the point of view of national prestige would be much greater and the training and experience of Canadian overseas personnel would be better suited to such operations without extensive re-training which would be required for service under tropical conditions. The timing of such participation and the question as to whether it would involve operations from South East Asia or from the American side would depend upon the over-all strategic plan.)

CONCLUSIONS:

12. It was felt that the same considerations which had led to the Aide Mémoire of February 10th, with possibly somewhat less force, applied to the contributions which might be made by the Canadian Army and the Canadian Navy.

13. The decision taken upon the communication from Sir Archibald Sinclair would determine the form and extent of the Canadian air effort against Japan.

14. In view of the tendency referred to in paragraph 9 and the anticipated dispositions of the U.K. and U.S. governments (and the Combined Chiefs of Staff) referred to in paragraph 10, it was felt that if the government were of the opinion that Canada should be free to make her national contribution to the war against Japan in the North or Western Pacific, the matter should be discussed at an early date, as a matter of high policy with the U.K. and U.S. governments.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

9. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of May 24th, submitted and read a report of the Chiefs of Staff, the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Secretary.

The question of R.C.A.F. participation in the war against Japan had already come up in concrete form as a result of the recent communication from Sir Archibald Sinclair to Mr. Power.† The Navy had had under consideration the despatch of a flotilla of six frigates for service in the Indian Ocean. The Army had tentatively suggested employment of one division from the Army overseas for co-operation with British forces in South East Asia, and brigade groups from the Army in Canada for service in the Eastern Pacific, possibly in co-operation with the U.S. forces.

It was apparent that, as yet, British and U.S. strategic authorities had agreed upon no overall plan for the final phases against Japan.

The present position was analyzed as follows:

(a) the British were concentrating their efforts in South East Asia and were apparently committed to no particular long-term strategy for the assault upon Japan;

(b) the United States (with Australian assistance in the South) were conducting the Pacific war as part of what was no doubt a major U.S. plan for the eventual reduction of Japan;

(c) the possibility of attack from the North Pacific could not be determined until it was known whether Soviet bases would be made available.

The natural tendency for Canadian forces to operate in combination with British forces would lead to Canadian participation in South East Asia. The U.K. government would tend to encourage such employment of Canadians and the United States would not likely request Canadian co-operation in the Pacific.

On the other hand, Canadian and Commonwealth interests might be better served if the Canadian contribution to the war against Japan were made in an American theatre, namely, the North or West Pacific.

The considerations which had led to the Aide Mémoire of February 10th to the U.K. government, applied also to the Army and Navy.

It was felt, therefore, that if the government were of the opinion that Canada should be free to make her national contribution in whatever operational theatre the government thought fit, the matter should be discussed at an early date, as a matter of high policy, with the U.K. and U.S. governments.

Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, June 14, 1944,—C.W.C. document 805).

10. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that the suggested R.C.A.F. contribution of a total of fifty-eight squadrons of various types, to which reference had been made, included all purposes for the post-German war period—operations in all theatres (47), occupation of Europe and lines of communication (11).

Air Marshal Breadner had reported that it was understood that any substantial Canadian air effort through Russia would come out of this total.

11. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to the importance of the considerations set out and the conclusions expressed in the report submitted, and decided that communications be sent to the U.K. and U.S. governments, informing them of the government's views as to the manner in which Canadian forces were to be employed against Japan.

It was also agreed that the proposal for employment of fifty-eight R.C.A.F. squadrons, after the German war, be accepted tentatively, as a basis for planning and subject to review in relation to the whole Canadian contribution at that time, also on the distinct understanding that no commitment were implied as to the theatre or theatres in which these squadrons would be employed, decision in respect thereto to be determined by the Canadian government.

Ottawa, June 27, 1944

TOP SECRET. Following from Prime Minister to Prime Minister, Begins:

1. The United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff have recently discussed, in general terms, with the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London, the part which Canada might take in the war against Japan after Germany is defeated.

2. So far as we are aware, no overall strategy has been settled. In this connection you will recall that during the Prime Ministers' meetings in London, no definite proposals were advanced as to possible roles for the various Commonwealth forces in the final phases against Japan.

3. The Cabinet War Committee has recently considered with our Chiefs of Staff, the matter of Canadian participation and feels that the attention of the United Kingdom government should be drawn to certain special considerations which apply, in this respect, to the position of Canada.

4. You will recall that on February 10th last, in connection with discussions between the two governments concerning the future of the Commonwealth Air Training plan, Captain Balfour was handed an Aide Mémoire which drew attention to certain factors which would affect the nature and extent of Canadian air participation in the Japanese war. In that document particular attention was drawn to the importance which Northwest Canada might assume at a later stage as a base of operations against the Japanese islands.

5. These considerations led to the conclusion expressed in the Aide Mémoire that plans should be put in hand immediately for the re-grouping of R.C.A.F. personnel and for the ordering of training so that, after the end of the German war, a fully integrated Canadian air force would be available for service wherever the Canadian government might decide that it could be most usefully employed.

6. The United Kingdom Air Ministry recently communicated to the Minister of National Defence for Air an estimate of the number of Canadian squadrons which might be employed, after the defeat of Germany, in operations against Japan and in the work of occupation and transport. The War Committee of the Cabinet have accepted this estimate as a basis for planning, subject to review in relation to the overall Canadian contribution at that time, on the understanding that no commitment was implied as to the theatre or theatres in which these squadrons would serve.

<sup>148</sup>Le texte de ce télégramme fut répété à l'ambassadeur aux États-Unis avec la requête que les autorités pertinentes des États-Unis en soient avertis.

The text of this telegram was repeated to the Ambassador in the United States with the request that it be made known to the appropriate United States authorities.

7. We realize that much will depend upon whether it is feasible to conduct operations against Japan across the North Pacific. Should such operations prove possible the Canadian government would probably wish to have the principal R.C.A.F. participation given effect in that theatre. It would clearly be very difficult to have the major Canadian air effort based, say, on South East Asia if large United States forces were to operate from Northwest America. This, as you know, has been an area of very close collaboration in defence and development between Canada and the United States.

8. While the considerations mentioned in the preceding paragraphs of this telegram are of special and immediate importance in relation to the R.C.A.F., they are also likely to affect the form and extent of the participation of Canadian military and naval forces and the theatre or theatres in which they are to be employed after the defeat of Germany. In addition, these arrangements will obviously be influenced by the extent to which Canada will contribute to the forces required for the pacification of Europe. Ends.

ARMY; ENLISTMENT OF CANADIAN-BORN JAPANESE

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE reported that a request had been received from the Australian government to enlist certain Canadian-born Japanese in the Canadian Army, for attachment to Australian forces for service as translators and interpreters.

The Army Staff were not in favour of enlisting such personnel and suggested, alternatively, that Australia be permitted to enlist them direct into the Australian Army. White personnel from the Army Japanese language school could be made available for attachment to Australian forces and Australian personnel might make use of the Army school.

A request had also been received from British Security Co-ordination for the services of Canadian-born Japanese with the Indian Army for psychological warfare work. It had been proposed that they be enlisted into the Canadian Army, discharged on arrival in India and re-enlisted into the Indian Army.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

9. THE MINISTER OF MINES AND RESOURCES AND THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY saw no reason why limited numbers of Canadian-born Japanese should not be enlisted in the Canadian Army.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the subject raised an important question of principle which should be considered by the full Cabinet, it being understood that, pending such consideration, the Minister of National Defence would report as to whether or not there was objection, on purely military grounds, to the enlistment of Canadian-born Japanese in the Canadian Army.

AIDE-MÉMOIRE ON THE EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES
AFTER THE DEFEAT OF GERMANY

Summary of Telegrams

In these telegrams the Canadian Government have expressed their anxiety to obtain an early decision, in advance of Germany's defeat, on the re-allocation of their forces after the defeat of Germany to meet the needs of: -

- (a) Demobilization
- (b) The occupation of Europe
- (c) The war against Japan.

Demobilization

2. The Canadian Government state that against Germany Canada has been using all her strength and they suggest that after Germany's defeat the greatest emergency will have disappeared. Moreover, physical conditions make impracticable the deployment of the present total manpower of the United Nations forces against Japan. The Canadian Government wish, therefore, to give careful and early consideration to the nature and extent of their participation in operations against the Japanese. They further state that the problem of a partial demobilization of Canadian forces must necessarily involve the unscrambling of R.C.A.F. personnel from R.A.F. units after the German war is over and that the personnel should become unconditionally at the disposal of the Canadian Government, in order that a fully integrated Canadian Air Force can be formed.

The Occupation of Europe

3. The Canadian Government state that any contribution by their forces to post-war operations in Europe will influence the extent of their participation against Japan and that this contribution would have to be carefully defined after consultation with the other United Nations.

The War against Japan

4. In considering the employment of their forces against Japan the Canadian Government draw attention to Canada's place as a Pacific Nation, her membership of the Commonwealth and her close connections with the United States. They stress the desirability both from operational and logistic standpoints, of basing their forces in Western Canada for close co-operation with U.S. forces, especially as operations in the North Pacific would enhance the importance of N.W. Canada as a base. The Canadian Government point out the difficulty of having the major Canadian air effort based, say, in S.E. Asia, if large United States forces were to operate from North West America.

Strategic Background

5. After the defeat of Germany, the maximum British naval, land and air effort will be directed against Japan. The size of the forces allotted to occupational duties in Europe and to the defence of the lines of communication to the Far East will be the minimum necessary to attain our objects. British manpower will be severely strained to meet the requirements and any contribution which the Canadian Government may be prepared to make towards these requirements will be most welcome.

6. All our studies have shown that sooner or later it will probably be necessary to undertake major operations in the North Pacific in order:

(a) To gain bases from which to control the sea of Japan, increase the scale of air attack on the Japanese homeland, and, finally, invade or occupy the main island of Honshu.

(b) To open a sea route to Russia should she join in.

7. Although it is perhaps more likely that such operations will not start before the spring of 1946, it is quite possible that they may begin some time during the summer of 1945. In this case the most likely operation would be the capture of the Northern Kuriles, but an assault on Hokkaido in 1945 is just possible.

8. At any rate, it is considered very desirable at this stage, to retain the ability to start operations in the North Pacific during the summer of 1945, and it would clearly be of advantage that an Imperial force was readily available if and when it became necessary to switch a large proportion of the Allied effort to the North Pacific.

9. Although this attempt to allot to the North Pacific its probable place in the operational programme is a statement only of our own views and has not been agreed with Washington, we believe that the United States authorities hold similar opinions. Moreover, it was provisionally agreed at SEXTANT<sup>149</sup> that:

“In the event of the U.S.S.R. entering the war, operations in the North Pacific may assume far greater importance and may involve a major redeployment of forces.”

Conclusions

10. The proposal of the Canadian Government would, therefore, be most acceptable on strategic, as well as on political and administrative grounds, if operations in the North Pacific were to develop at an early date. On the other hand, British manpower is so stretched that there would be considerable advantages in concentrating the maximum British and Commonwealth forces either in South East Asia or in the South West Pacific.

11. Although we cannot make any firm recommendations until the main strategy is decided, in the following paragraphs we balance up these conflicting claims and summarise our views, as formed at this stage, on each of the three Services:

a) Naval. For the quickest possible defeat of Japan, very strong Allied naval forces will be needed. Whether the main British naval effort is made in the Bay of Bengal or the South West Pacific area, Canadian naval forces would form a valuable addition, particularly in destroyers and escort vessels. The switching of Canadian naval forces to the North Pacific should be possible if such a move is considered desirable when a firm date for operations in this area is made.

(b) Army. From the strategical point of view, there would be little advantage in moving Canadian land forces direct from Europe to the South West Pacific or the Bay of Bengal. Having regard to movement, maintenance, and training considerations, it would be desirable for Canadian land forces to be moved to Canada as early as practicable, where they will be available for operations in the Far East, the area for their use to be decided as the situation develops.

(c) Air Force. Whilst the Canadian desire to operate their air forces in the North Pacific is appreciated, we should nevertheless welcome their participation initially as a part of the main British effort from South East Asia or the South West Pacific. It would be desirable for the Canadian heavy bombers to form part of any Imperial strategic bomber force wherever it may be deployed, one of the possible areas of deployment being the Maritime Provinces. The move of other Canadian squadrons to the North Pacific should be possible but will have to be reviewed when plans for operations in that area are firm. Canadian home based G.R.<sup>150</sup> squadrons might be a valuable contribution to North Pacific operations.

The Cairo Conference, November 22 to 27.

12. We have not sufficient information to say what percentage of the present Canadian armed forces is represented by the deployment we suggest in the Appendix. Only the Canadian Chiefs of Staff can give an accurate estimate of this. The total British forces recommended by the British Chiefs of Staff as required one year after Germany's defeat are about 70% of the present total British strength. On a similar basis the total strength of the Canadian armed forces one year after Germany's defeat would be about 510,000.

APPENDIX

NAVAL FORCES

Availability of Canadian Naval Forces

1. The undermentioned ships and craft are manned or will eventually be manned by the Royal Canadian Navy. They are suitable for service in the war against Japan, being similar to R.N. ships intended for the Pacific. At present they are operating, or planned to operate, against Germany and are unlikely to be used in any numbers in the Japanese theatre until Germany is defeated.

Two 6-inch cruisers (Uganda and Minotaur)

Two Escort Carriers (FAA personnel are R.N.)(Nabob & Puncher)

Five Tribal Class destroyers

One A/A<sup>151</sup> Ship (Prince Robert)

One hundred and eleven Escort Vessels (of various modern types, some of which are being specially converted)

Two LSI (M)<sup>152</sup> (Prince David and Prince Henry)

Four Algerin Class minesweepers

2. The following Canadian vessels are also in active service now, though they are not of types considered suitable for the Japanese war:

53 Bangor Class Minesweepers

10 old destroyers

86 Corvettes (Flower class)

85 Coastal Craft.

With the exception of the majority of the coastal craft and a few Bangors and corvettes on the Pacific coast, all the above are operating in the Atlantic or in U.K. waters.

3. On the defeat of Germany, the vessels mentioned in paragraph 2 above will, with certain exceptions (see paragraph 5), be surplus to requirements and their crews will, we suggest, be available either for demobilisation or for manning more modern ships. It would be of the greatest help to us if the Canadian Government could see their way to man additional modern ships, observing:

(a) That British naval manpower will be stretched to its utmost to provide crews for ships fighting the Japanese.

(c) The considerable number of trained Canadian naval officers and men that would be available.

4. The possible employment of this surplus might be to man some of the following:

- (i) A flotilla of Fleet destroyers
- (ii) Ten Frigates
- (iii) Three Escort Maintenance Vessels.
- (iv) A flotilla of LST<sup>154</sup> 3
- (v) A flotilla of Support Craft (LCG<sup>155</sup> and LCS (R)<sup>156</sup>)

As an alternative to some of the above, Canadian personnel would be of value as part complement to R.N. cruisers, carriers, or in the Fleet Air Arm.

Possible Employment of Canadian Warships

Europe

5. A comparatively small naval force will be retained in Europe for control and mine clearance duties. We might suggest to the Canadian Government that, as there is an overall shortage of minesweepers, their contribution should be the 53 Bangor class minesweepers as well as a few of the Flower class corvettes mentioned in paragraph 13 above.

The War Against Japan

Operations with main British forces

6. The use of the Canadian cruisers, destroyers and escort vessels will be of great importance in our operations; without the Canadian escort vessels we are unlikely to be able to provide adequate A/S<sup>157</sup> and A/A protection for our expeditions.

The 2 L.S.I.(M) and the 30 L.C.I.(L) are included in the 3 divisional lift already planned and are essential for that purpose. If the Canadian Government felt that they were unable to man them, we should be unable to replace them from British sources.

Operations in N. Pacific

7. While we appreciate the desire of the Canadian Government to hold their navy ready for action in the N. Pacific we consider that, rather than retain it for this purpose, there is a strong case for throwing in its weight in support of firm operations with the British and other Imperial naval forces. Moreover, when operations for the N. Pacific are firmly planned, the matter can be reviewed in the light of the strategical situation at the time, bearing in mind that the switching of Canadian naval forces from one theatre to another should be possible.

8. On balance, therefore, we recommend the Canadian Government to allow their naval forces to reinforce the main British fleet operating against the

Japanese as soon as practicable after the defeat of Germany, without prejudice to a later decision when a date for operations in the N. Pacific has been decided.

LAND FORCES

Availability of Canadian Land Forces

9. The present strength and disposition of Canadian land forces is:

(a) In or intended for France

Two infantry divisions

One armoured division

One armoured brigade

(b) In Italy

One infantry division

One armoured division

One armoured brigade

All the above divisions have a proportion of Corps, G.H.Q. and L. of C. troops.

(c) In Canada

One holding division of two brigades.

10. Allowing for a measure of demobilization after the defeat of Germany, it is suggested that three divisions would be a reasonable contribution by Canada, of which two would be employed in the war against Japan, and one in the occupation of Europe.

Possible Employment of Canadian Land Forces

The Occupation of Europe

11. In order to relieve the acute British manpower problem it has been suggested that the Canadian Government should be asked to contribute one "occupation Group" for the occupation of Germany, preferably organised as an infantry formation of approximately 25,000 men.

The War against Japan

Operations in the North Pacific

12. The main invasion threat against the Japanese homeland may be directed across the North Pacific. It is very desirable that Imperial forces should participate in these operations.

13. This contribution could conveniently be made by Canadian land forces for the following reasons:

(a) the problems of maintenance and general administration would be simplified if they were based on Canada.

(b) movement to the North Pacific area is likely to be more expeditious than to the South. Although, in general, all available personnel shipping is earmarked for the movement of British forces to the Far East for a period of six months, not all this shipping will in fact be used until the third month. Before this peak period is reached, we hope it may be possible, by taking advantage of moves in connection with the repositioning of shipping, to provide for the movement to Canada of part at least of the Canadian forces, although there will be heavy calls upon shipping at this time. Shipping will also be released gradually towards the end of the period required for redeployment, and a proportion might likewise be made available for this purpose.

(c) a shorter period of training is likely to be required to prepare the forces for operations in the North Pacific. It may be advantageous to keep the whole Plough Force in being for these operations. Alternatively the Canadian component might be useful as the nucleus of a training organization.

Operations with the main British effort

14. Whether the main British effort in the war against Japan takes place in the Bay of Bengal or the S.W. Pacific, it should clearly be on the maximum scale possible.

15. The over-riding problem is that of movement. It would not be possible to move Canadian forces to the Far East for these operations during the first six months after the defeat of Germany except at the direct expense of British and Indian forces within the tentative programme. If it were decided to move Canadian land forces to the S.W. Pacific after the completion of this programme, on the assumption that Germany is defeated by the 1st October 1944, the two divisions would not be operationally available until approximately the end of 1945, having completed a period of five months training, which would include jungle training. At about this time, large scale operations may be commencing in the North Pacific and U.S. forces would have to be used in place of the possible Canadian contribution, and might have to use Canadian bases.

Conclusions

16. From the strategical point of view there would be no advantage in moving Canadian land forces direct from Europe either to S.W. Pacific or to the Bay of Bengal. We suggest, therefore, that the Canadian land forces allocated to the war against Japan should be moved to Canada as early as practicable, having regard to the many urgent calls on personnel shipping. From Canada they would be well placed either to take part in operations in the North Pacific, or in operations elsewhere in the Far East in accordance with later developments in the situation.

AIR FORCES

Availability of Canadian Air Forces

17. The R.C.A.F. at present consists of some 70 squadrons, of which 41 are Article XV squadrons<sup>158</sup> serving outside Canada. The analysis of this force is as follows:

<sup>158</sup>La note suivante était dans l'original:

Medium-range transport	2	—
	29	41

It is proposed to form 3 medium range transport squadrons (Article XV) in the near future. By the end of 1944 one medium range G.R. squadron will have been converted to long-range G.R. and one of the home-based miscellaneous squadrons will have been disbanded. 3 A.O.P.<sup>161</sup> squadrons will be formed in mid-December 1944, mid-January 1945 and end of February 1945 respectively.

18. In order that a fully integrated Canadian Air Force can be formed after the German defeat, the Canadian Government are anxious that the unscrambling of R.C.A.F. personnel from R.A.F. units should be completed as soon as possible and that the R.C.A.F. personnel should be concentrated in the Article XV squadrons until the squadrons are 100% Canadian manned. These problems are at present the subject of negotiations between the Air Ministry and the Canadian Ministry of National Defence for Air.

19. The Canadian Government have recently accepted as a basis for planning, an estimate by the Air Ministry of 58 Canadian squadrons which might be employed after the defeat of Germany. This estimate was originally based on an arbitrary cut in the Canadian air force after the German defeat. The Canadian acceptance of the estimate was subject to review in relation to the overall Canadian contribution on the defeat of Germany and to the understanding that no commitment was implied as to the theatre or theatres in which these squadrons would serve. The 58 squadrons are provisionally divided into 47 for the war against Japan and 11 for occupational duties in Europe and on the L. of C.<sup>162</sup> to the Far East.

Possible Employment of Canadian Air Forces Europe and L. of C.

20. The Air Ministry have proposed to the Canadian Government that their contribution of 11 squadrons should be divided into 4 heavy bomber, 4 single-engine fighter and 3 medium range transport squadrons. This proposal has been provisionally accepted by the Canadian Government.

The War against Japan

21. The analysis of the 47 squadrons to be contributed by the Canadian air force is at present the subject of discussions between the R.C.A.F. Headquarters in Great Britain and the Air Staff. The analysis by squadrons proposed by the Air Staff is:

- 14 Heavy Bomber
- 12 Single-engine fighter
- 2 Long range day fighter
- 1 Night fighter
- 2 Flying boat
- 2 Long range G.R.
- 1 Light bomber
- 2 Air/Sea rescue
- 8 Long range transport
- 2 Medium range transport
- 1 A.O.P.
- 47

A. Heavy Bombers

22. The Canadian contribution of 14 squadrons would probably best be employed as part of the British heavy bomber force for the war against Japan with the main force.

If we obtain the use of bases in the Maritime Provinces, we hope the Canadians would contribute to any Empire bomber force which is despatched there.

B. Fighters and Light Bombers

23. It is hoped that the Canadian day and night fighter and light bomber squadrons will be available to operate in support of land forces with the main British effort in South East Asia or South West Pacific.

24. When large-scale operations are opening in the N. Pacific, and if Canadian land forces take part, it should be possible to release the Canadian fighter and light bomber squadrons to operate in support of their own forces.

25. It is anticipated that there will be a considerable shortage of F.A.A. fighter squadrons for the war against Japan and the Canadian escort carriers are at present carrying R.N. F.A.A. units. It might well be desirable to convert a few Canadian fighter squadrons for operating from the escort carriers which they man.

C. Coastal Air Forces

26. It is hoped that the Canadian coastal squadrons will be available initially to operate in conjunction with British operations either in South East Asia or South West Pacific. Should the G.R. force in the N. Pacific need reinforcement before any squadrons could be released from South East Asia or South West Pacific, the Canadian Government might consider meeting this requirement from any home-based Canadian G.R. squadrons, which are not included in the Canadian contribution of 58 squadrons.

AIR; EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN SQUADRONS IN SOUTH PACIFIC

1. THE SECRETARY submitted a proposal of the Minister of National Defence for Air for the despatch of three R.C.A.F. fighter squadrons and a Fighter Wing Headquarters to the Southwest Pacific theatre for attachment there to the U.S. Army Air Force.

These squadrons (involving with Wing Headquarters some 930 officers and airmen) were now employed on western hemisphere defence. In view of the improved strategic situation they were no longer required for this purpose. Nor could they be employed in the European theatre. They were, therefore, available for operations in the war against Japan.

To insure uniformity of material, re-equipment of the squadrons with U.S. type aircraft, etc., would be necessary. Estimated costs were $35,310,000 for capital outlay and first year of operation, and $26,610,000 annually thereafter for operation and maintenance.

2. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the view that while it would, perhaps, be desirable to send a token force to a theatre of primary Australian and U.S. interest, there were difficulties in accepting a specific commitment of this kind before the general pattern of strategy for the Pacific war had been settled, and Canada's part therein agreed upon.

3. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY pointed to pressing shortages of manpower in war industries, suggesting that serious consideration be given to the desirability of releasing surplus Service personnel for this purpose.

4. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, deferred consideration of the proposal in the absence of the Minister of National Defence for Air, and pending definition of the role of the Canadian Services in the war against Japan.

RE: CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. I am attaching a copy of an aide-mémoire which has been handed to our Joint Staff Mission in London by the War Cabinet Secretariat, on behalf of the U.K. Chiefs of Staff. This is to form the subject of discussion, this week, at a meeting of the U.K. Chiefs with the members of the Mission.

This document has clearly been prepared after an examination of the aide-mémoire handed by Mr. Power to Captain Balfour on February 10th<sup>163</sup> concerning employment of the R.C.A.F. after the defeat of Germany and of subsequent enquiries made by the Mission regarding plans for the Far Eastern war.

2. The rapid progress of operations in Europe, and the early prospect of conversations on the highest level, give urgency to the need for a definition of government policy regarding the employment of Canadian forces upon the defeat of Germany.

The problem is not only one of the extent of the Canadian contribution to European occupation and operations against the Japanese, but also of the nature of Canadian participation in the Japanese war, i.e., with whom and where are Canadian forces to be employed.

3. During the debate on the External Affairs estimates,<sup>164</sup> and on other occasions, you have stated that, upon Germany's defeat, Canada will play her part against Japan. Mr. Ralston has made similar statements, but the government have not made any final decisions as to the extent or nature of Canadian participation.

4. On a number of occasions, the War Committee have considered the problem and, on June 7th, following your return from the Prime Ministers' meeting and at the War Committee's direction, the Chiefs of Staff, with Robertson and myself, reviewed the whole matter in relation to probable Allied strategy and the particular interests of Canada. The paper which I prepared following this meeting (copy attached)<sup>165</sup> was presented to the War Committee as a joint document on June 14th, it being then agreed that the considerations set out therein should be brought to the attention of the U.K. and U.S. governments.

5. Your telegram to Mr. Churchill of June 27th (copy attached) followed this meeting. In it you drew attention to the special considerations which applied to the position of Canada, particularly in relation to possible operations based in the Northwest. In this connection, you will recall that the aide-mémoire of February 10th had emphasized Canada's place as a Pacific nation, her membership in the Commonwealth and her close friendship and common interest with the United States.

6. With regard to the extent to which Canadian forces will be actively employed after the defeat of Germany, the following figures have been discussed:

(a) European occupation:

The Post-hostilities Advisory Committee<sup>166</sup> have suggested -

Navy—a purely token contribution;

Army—1 brigade group (approximately 5,000 all ranks);

Air force—7 squadrons (some 5,000 men in all).

Note: These figures were submitted to the War Committee, but decision deferred,<sup>167</sup> since Mr. Ralston wished to consider further the Army participation. He is likely to propose what is regarded as a fairer proportionate share for this duty, viz. 1 division and ancillary troops (some 25,000 men).

The figures for the Air Force are already out of date.

(b) War against Japan

No figures have been submitted to the War Committee, but the Navy are thinking in terms of a reduced establishment for service with the Royal Navy;

The Army staff are planning tentatively in terms of 1 division;

The Air Force have a tentative basis for planning (authorized by the War Committee) at 58 squadrons, of which perhaps 47 would be engaged against Japan.

7. The U.K. Chiefs of Staff, in the attached aide-mémoire, after noting the Canadian government's views, propose for consideration by our Staff Mission in London what is, in effect, the addition of Canadian Air and Naval forces to British formations in Southeast Asia or in the Southwest Pacific.

For the Army, they suggest the early return of Canadian formations to Canada and the participation of two Canadian divisions, as "Imperial" forces, in any North Pacific operations which may be decided upon or in operations elsewhere in the Far East.

The whole approach of the U.K. aide-mémoire is, not unnaturally perhaps, from the point of view of the British manpower situation. The U.K. Chiefs of Staff evidently wish to consider the forces which the Canadian government are willing to have engaged as available to meet the total requirements for "Commonwealth" zones of operations, or as "Imperial" forces to be employed elsewhere. The net results of accepting their proposals would be to have our Navy and Air Force operate with British forces from bases in Southeast Asia or the Southwest Pacific, and our Army in the North Pacific or elsewhere as may fit in with the final strategic plan.

8. We are, of course, very much handicapped in not knowing the general strategic plan upon which the Combined Chiefs of Staff will proceed against Japan when Germany has been defeated. It seems entirely probable, indeed, that many of the principal questions remain, as yet, unsettled.

Until the over-all strategy has been determined and made known to us, it appears to me, however, that Canada should avoid, so far as possible, partial commitments in respect of any one Service for any specific theatre. In any conversations which may take place at the Staff level, we should continue to stress the necessity of being free to make decisions in the knowledge of the over-all strategy and in the light of the considerations to which the attention of the U.K. government has already been drawn.

While it may be that the only practicable solution will be to have the R.C.A.F. and the R.C.N. continue to serve, in more distant theatres, with the Royal Air Force and the Royal Navy respectively, care should be taken to avoid the government's being presented with faits accomplis. If major operations in the North Pacific do develop, it would, at the least, be embarrassing for the government to find that, when they were undertaken, all available Canadian Air and Naval forces were irrevocably committed elsewhere.

9. At my suggestion, Robertson and I met the Chiefs of Staff last week to consider the British aide-mémoire, but without much result. The Chiefs felt that they could not properly or usefully offer joint advice to the government without instructions to that effect, nor could they submit proposals except to their respective Ministers.

I did, however, speak to Mr. Power and he agreed to send a message to Breadner* before the Mission's meeting with the British Chiefs of Staff, drawing attention to your telegram of June 27th to Mr. Churchill, and asking him to make it quite clear to the U.K. Chiefs of Staff that the Canadian government had not changed its attitude and persisted that, if hostilities took place in the North Pacific, Canada's principal effort should be in that theatre.

10. It seems to me that the Canadian military effort against Japan should be a balanced one as between the three Services, one which meets the requirements of the special Canadian position as enunciated in the aide-mémoire of February 10th and in your telegram of June 27th and one which is not disproportionate to our resources.

Would you consider having the War Committee refer the problem to the Chiefs of Staff with Robertson and myself for the preparation of proposals on this basis? These could be submitted to the Ministers of National Defence and form the subject of a joint recommendation on their part to the War Committee. Perhaps this course could not usefully be followed until we know more of the over-all strategic plan.

RE: CANADIAN ARMY PARTICIPATION IN THE PACIFIC WAR AND IN THE ARMY OF OCCUPATION IN GERMANY

1. On the 28 June 44 the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London addressed to the British Chiefs of Staff a questionnaire† containing a number of questions with a view to obtaining general strategic information on the conduct of the war after the defeat of Germany.

BRITISH PROPOSALS

2. As a result of these requests an Aide-Mémoire, containing suggestions as to the possible employment of Canadian Forces after the defeat of Germany, has been prepared by the Joint Planning Staff of the British War Cabinet and submitted to the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in London.

3. This Aide-Mémoire makes clear that any Canadian contribution to the Army of Occupation and the Japanese war will be most welcome in view of the severe strain on British manpower.

3. [sic] The Aide-Mémoire points out that it is most desirable at this stage to retain the ability to start operations in the North Pacific during the summer of 1945 and that from a strategical point of view there would be little advantage in moving Canadian land forces direct from Europe to the Southwest Pacific or to the Bay of Bengal. Instead it would be desirable for Canadian land forces to be moved to Canada as early as practicable, where they would be available for operations in the Far East. The Aide-Mémoire suggests that a reasonable contribution by Canada in the war against Japan would be two divisions.

4. In dealing with the occupation of Europe, the Aide-Mémoire suggests that the Canadian Government should be asked to contribute one "Occupation Group," preferably organized as an infantry formation of approximately 25,000 men.

CANADIAN PROPOSALS

5. In assessing the British proposals it is considered that Canada's contribution should not be on the basis of relieving British manpower but rather on a fair and reasonable contribution based on Canadian capabilities in relation to the proportionate continuing effort of the United Kingdom and the United States.

6. It is agreed, however, that it is most important that Canadian troops should be with any forces that might be engaged in operations in the North Pacific (either through Hawaii or through the Aleutians). Their use in this area would ensure that Canada would be represented at the final assault on the Japanese homeland; this is a most important consideration as a means of avenging Hong Kong and restoring Canadian military prestige in the Far East. In addition this North Pacific area is one of particular importance to Canada—both geographically and politically.

7. Insofar as the size of the contribution to the war against Japan is concerned, there is no indication as yet of the total forces that will be required. It does appear, however, that the Canadian contribution will in any event be only a small proportion of the total forces engaged. In these circumstances it is considered that one division with the necessary ancillary troops and reinforcements would represent a compact force which could be readily administered and adapted for operations with a larger force to which it would be detailed. The use of a division has the further advantage in that it is the minimum self-contained formation and would enable the Canadian contribution to be kept separate and not lost as an appendage to a United States or British force.

8. It is estimated that a force of this size could be brought back to Canada, re-organized as might be necessary, both as to personnel and equipment and made available for operations in the Pacific Theatre within six to eight months after the conclusion of hostilities with Germany.

9. If this scale of participation and the method proposed are approved, it is essential that steps should be initiated at once to communicate this decision to the United States Chiefs of Staff so that, when planning for this area is considered, the Canadian contribution may be fitted in from the start.

10. The proposed Canadian participation in the Army of Occupation in Germany of one Occupation Group, organized as an infantry formation of approximately 25,000 men is a reasonable pro-rata contribution. Since this group will be organized around a division, it will have the advantage of providing a self-administering unit well suited to keeping separate the Canadian contribution.

PROPOSALS RECOMMENDED

11. (a) Canadian contribution—war against Japan

One division with necessary ancillary troops.

To be brought back to Canada for re-organization and training with a view to employment in the North Pacific area (either through Hawaii or the Aleutians).

(b) Canadian Participation Army of Occupation—Germany

One Occupation Group, organized as an infantry formation of approximately 25,000 men.

CANADIAN ARMY PARTICIPATION IN PACIFIC OPERATIONS

Air Marshal Leckie has doubtless kept you advised as to the proposal now being discussed both in Ottawa and in Washington, that a number of R.C.A.F. squadrons be posted to the S.W. Pacific to serve under United States operational command. As I understand it, the idea originated in the mind of General Kenny, U.S. Army, and that the reception it has received in Ottawa has not been unfavourable. While A.V.M. Walsh<sup>169</sup> was good enough to take me into his confidence from the outset he did so with the request that I treat this question as being Top Secret in the fullest sense of the word.

This possible action on the part of the R.C.A.F. inevitably brings up the question of the Canadian Army's participation in the Pacific Theatre of operations. I first brought this question to the attention of your predecessor in May of last year. I did so again last Autumn when action was taken to attach observers to the United States and Australian Armies in the South and Southwest theatres, respectively.

The problem is a difficult one. We are pretty fully committed in Europe, while at home the difficult N.R.M.A. situation, so far as I can judge, is unlikely to undergo much change. The possibility of United States operations along the Northern route towards the Kuriles has of course always been attractive as possibly it might be looked upon by the Government as being merely an extension of the Attu and Kiska operations. I sounded out the Americans in this connection last October and gathered (and so reported) that there was nothing planned for this part of the world that, in point of time, might make it of special interest to Canada. Since then I have kept touch with my American sources of information and as advised in our C.J.S. Report of 10th May of this year†, and otherwise, the situation in this respect remains unchanged.

The extent to which your ideas under this head may have developed in Ottawa during the last month or two, is unknown to me. It has seemed to me however that plans of this kind take time to mature and time, in accordance with its invariable habit, keeps moving on. I have therefore judged it expedient again to bring the question to your attention.

You will recall that in their telegram No. 108, dated 27th June of this year, External Affairs advised the United Kingdom Government that the question of Canadian co-operation with the forces of the United States in the war against Japan, was very much in their minds. In that telegram considerable importance was attached to the likelihood of operations via the Northwest route, though what basis there was for this assumption has never been quite clear to me. I was of course aware that the United States Army in pressing for the rehabilitation of our Northwest Airways, did so on the grounds of increased operational need. There is a difference however between ferrying considerable numbers of aircraft and the conduct of important combined operations.

As I see it the United States Chief of Staffs plan in the main to bring about the defeat of Japan from the South or Southeast. As previously reported it is to be expected that the re-conquest of the Philippines will be initiated during the course of this Autumn. The task may prove somewhat lengthy. In any event the next step, after the Philippines, is likely to be the capture of a port in South China, or the island of Formosa, though as far as I can gather nothing in this respect has yet been decided. Quite recently I have gathered that the United States, cheered by their recent successful operations, may be toying with the idea of by-passing the Philippines and making a direct assault on Formosa. This of course is anything but firm. Should, however, this course be adopted it is possible that the plan to capture a port on the coast of China may fade into the background. The point, while by no means established, may be an indication that little material help can reasonably be expected from the Chinese.

The entry of Russia into the Pacific war will of course change the strategic picture in a number of respects. It is however by no means certain that this will materially affect the Canadian problem. Stalin has yet to evince a predilection for combined forces. The accommodation of the U.S. Army Forces at Russian bases on the Eastern Front (to facilitate "Shuttle" bombing) is looked upon as quite an achievement. Nor does there seem to be any good reason to believe that in the event of a Russian entry into the war against Japan, Stalin will change his views in this regard. Rather would it appear that he might be content to receive material aid in the way of equipment and stores, and that it will better suit his taste to play a lone hand in Eastern Siberia and Manchuria. On the other hand the establishment of a U.S. air base, or bases, in Eastern Siberia can not altogether be ruled out. This however would not call for extensive ground forces.

In such circumstances it is understood that the United States Chiefs of Staff are of opinion that it might be of advantage to establish a base in the Northern Kuriles so as to permit of the safe passage of convoys to the ports at the mouth of the Amur River always provided that, after the defeat of Germany, Russia will be in need of supply or that she would welcome the stationing of United States Air Forces within her territory. In such an eventuality Canadian participation would presumably be as welcome to the United States as it was at Kiska a year ago.

The uncertainty surrounding all this however seems to be such as to make it a doubtful basis for our planning. It might well come off but then again it might not. And at best the Kuriles would be unlikely to rank as a major theatre. Nor do they constitute a very salubrious part of the world.

Again, the Kiska example to the contrary notwithstanding, the matter of inter-allied military co-operation in distant theatres is one that usually takes a considerable time to work out in all its necessary detail. The fact that the climate of these theatres so greatly differs from that to which we are accustomed at home, brings up questions of special training, acclimatization, special organization and special equipment. If then, a decision were taken today that our Army should join with the United States in Pacific operations, it might well be that the troops would not actually find themselves in contact with the enemy for some 8 or 10 months to come.

A year ago such a lapse of time would have been of no importance but it is open to question if the same can be said today, when surely it is not rash to believe that the defeat of Germany may be achieved this Autumn. In such circumstances we might well, in respect of the Pacific war, find ourselves left at the post, usually an uncomfortable position from almost every point of view.

In the light of all this it occurs to me that it should be expedient for us to intimate without delay to the United States Chiefs of Staff, or through other channels, that we are desirous of co-operating with them in the Pacific war. Indeed, as a consequence of External Affairs telegram No. 108 mentioned above, I had expected that by this time we would already have received instructions to this end.

The size of our contingent we could fix now, say, a brigade group similar to the force we sent to Kiska. Nor, I suggest, should we allow the N.R.M.A. situation to bother us to any undue degree. As I understand it, our European reinforcement position, calculated at 3 months intense wastage, is secure until the end of the present calendar year, that is to say, at the end of December we shall have some 60,000 officers and men in our reinforcement units and depots abroad and upwards of the same number at home. Should therefore the European war come to an end in October or November we shall find ourselves with full echelons of reinforcements, a situation that might expose us to the charge of having played so safely as to have acted not altogether in accordance with the national interest. Has the time not come to appreciate the situation anew, and to take what down here the Americans refer to as "calculated risks"? In other words, could we not safely cut into our reinforcement reserves to the extent of some 5 to 10,000 men and put some of our operational units at home on an overseas operational basis. Action to this end would not, I suggest, be an unreasonable risk to take. To delay our doing so at this stage of the war might adversely affect us before many more months have passed.

Admittedly the Pacific picture I have painted is not as clear or certain as it might be, but it is nevertheless in line with the trend of events that we have been periodically forecasting to you, not incorrectly, these last 18 months and more. Actually, there has been a very recent indication that formal decisions as to the strategy to be followed in the Pacific may well be struck within the next month or so. Whatever these may eventually prove to be they are unlikely materially to affect the measure and form of our co-operation and, as I have said, it would seem that early decision and action on our part is clearly indicated.

MAURICE POPE
Major General

London, August 26, 1944

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: Am sending for your own private information following telegram from Chiefs of Staff to J.S.M, Washington, about our strategy for the war against Japan. Text begins:

As agreed at Sextant Conference, we have devoted prolonged study to strategy for the war against Japan. We have considered how best our forces can be disposed and what operations they should carry out, taking into account undertaking given by His Majesty's Government at Casablanca Conference that on defeat of Germany we should assist the United States to the utmost of our power in defeating Japan.

2. Several important developments have taken place since Sextant Conference.

(I) The advance of United States forces across the Pacific has been accelerated.

(II) The Japanese have strongly reinforced Burma, and their strength in that country has risen from four and a half to ten divisions.

(III) The capture of Myitkyina rules out reinforcement always foreseen in any purely defensive policy in North Burma.

(IV) The likelihood of aggressive action by the Japanese Fleet in the Bay of Bengal is now remote.

(V) Progress of the war against Germany on all fronts has been such as to render possible the partial or total collapse of Germany which might free forces from European theatre in coming months.

(VI) We now have overwhelming air superiority in the South East Asia theatre.

The following paragraphs contain our proposals in light of above developments.

Operations in South East Asia theatre.

3. The present Directive to South East Asia Command prescribes, as a first task, the protection of the air link to China and so far as is possible the support of further construction of the Burma Road (which cannot be completely opened until 1946) and of pipe lines to Yunnan (which are also progressing slowly). In addition we have, of course, to defend the frontiers of India. We are thus committed to a long drawn out struggle in the jungles and swamps against an enemy who has superior lines of communication to those which we possess. The wastage from sickness and disease amounted during the campaign of 1944, up to June 30th alone, to 282,000 in addition to a loss in killed, wounded and missing of approximately 40,000. Clearly, therefore, we should invest every effort to liquidate this highly undesirable commitment if it can by any means be done.

4. Admiral Mountbatten<sup>170</sup> has put forward two plans. The first plan (CHAMPION) is to continue to engage the Japanese in North Burma. This, in our opinion, will merely lead to a continuation of the present unsatisfactory state of affairs and we feel bound to reject it.

5. The second plan (VANGUARD) put forward by Admiral Mountbatten is to capture Rangoon by an air-borne operation to be followed by the opening of the Port of Rangoon and maintenance of expedition by sea. This plan is now believed practicable by large measure of air superiority which we enjoy in this theatre and by Japanese inability any longer to dispute our sea lines of communication to Rangoon.

6. The capture of Rangoon and Pegu (twenty miles distant) will, at a stroke, sever the enemy's main lines of communication to the interior of Burma by road, river and rail. This will give us opportunity of liquidating once and for all, under most favourable military conditions, our commitments in Burma by destruction of Japanese forces.

7. Until such time as Rangoon operation can be launched, it will be essential to contain Japanese by offensive action south of Myitkyina.

8. The bulk of necessary resources for Rangoon are already available, and we now ask Combined Chiefs of Staff to agree to the above plan in principle, and that good effort should be made to provide from our combined resources the balance of forces required. We propose that General Wedemeyer should proceed to Washington as soon as possible to expound outline of plan to United States Chiefs of Staff, and to provide them with any local information they may require.

9. We are now building up a strong fleet in the Bay of Bengal, the bulk of which, including our newest battleships, will not be required for operations outlined above in South East Asia theatre. It is our desire, in accordance with His Majesty's Government's policy, that this Fleet should play its full part at the earliest possible moment in main operations against Japan wherever greatest naval strength is required, and thereafter its strength should be built up as rapidly as possible.

This Fleet by mid-1945 could probably comprise four battleships of King George V class, six fleet carriers, four light fleet carriers, 15 escort carriers, 20 cruisers, 40-50 fleet destroyers, 100 escorts and a considerable fleet-cover, the whole constituting a force which could make a valuable contribution in crucial operations leading to the assault on Japan. This Fleet, built up as fast as possible, would operate under United States Command.

10. If for any reason United States Chiefs of Staff are unable to accept support of a British Fleet in main operations (which is our distinct preference), we should be willing to discuss an alternative. The suggestion we would make in this event is the formation of a British Empire Task Force under a British Commander, consisting of British, Australian and New Zealand land, sea and air forces to operate in Southwest Pacific theatre under General MacArthur's Supreme Command. This alternative, if decided upon, would still enable British Fleet to be well placed to reinforce United States Pacific Fleet if this should later be desired.

11. We have asked for an early expression of the views of the United States Chiefs of Staff on all the above proposals. The urgency is dictated by need to work out as soon as possible logistic problems involved including development of necessary base facilities. Text ends.

2. Reactions of United States Chiefs of Staff not yet received.

3. This will let you see how matter stands at present. Ends.

1. Attached is the draft communication to Mr. Ralston, for your signature or revision, regarding government policy with respect to Canadian participation in the war against Japan. I have left the salutation and the closing blank thinking that you might wish to write them in by hand.

I think that I have covered all of the points mentioned in your first draft† (returned herewith), though I have changed the order and expression very substantially and have added a number of others.

The draft speaks for itself, but I would like to draw attention particularly to the wording proposed for the final paragraph, in which Mr. Ralston is asked to bring the matter to the attention not only of the Chiefs of Staff, but to that of the other two Ministers of National Defence. It seems to me appropriate that this should be included, for Mr. Ralston has no formal relationship to the Chief of the Air Staff or to the Chief of the Naval Staff, except through Mr. Power and Mr. Macdonald, and in virtue of his general statutory responsibility for co-ordination of the three Services.

I have not marked the letter "Confidential" or "Secret."

2. I am also sending you, herewith, a copy of the Army proposals which Mr. Ralston wishes to have discussed at tomorrow's meeting of the War Committee.<sup>171</sup> These proposals seem to me to fit in with the considerations which you have in mind as applicable to the Canadian position, for they contemplate the return of Canadian formations to Canada and eventual operations against Japan in the main Pacific theatre. They are also quite modest in extent, involving only one division in addition to that proposed for occupation duty in Europe.

The decisions to be taken regarding the nature and extent of Canadian participation in the war against Japan, once Germany has been defeated, are so important that I feel they should receive, at the earliest possible moment, the careful consideration of the Cabinet as a whole, as well as that of our colleagues of the War Committee.

The government should, of course, take no major decisions in this matter until the general Allied strategy has been determined. Meantime, it is, I believe, essential that no commitments should be made as to either the manner or extent of the employment of Canadian forces when the war in Europe is at an end. It is also essential that, in the preparation of plans and in any discussions carried on at the Staff level, the Services should have clearly in mind the considerations which formed the subject of my message of June 27th to the United Kingdom Prime Minister, and certain other considerations of equal importance to which I shall refer.

You will recall that my telegram to Mr. Churchill<sup>172</sup> followed discussion of this problem in the War Committee.† In it, referring particularly to the Air Force, I drew attention to Canada's position as a Pacific nation and to her close collaboration and common interests with the United States, which, with our membership in the Commonwealth, would necessarily affect the nature and extent of our participation in the Japanese war.

In this connection I pointed out that, if major operations were to be conducted across the North Pacific, it would probably be desirable to have the principal R.C.A.F. participation in that theatre. I said that, while these considerations were of special and immediate importance in relation to the R.C.A.F., they were also likely to affect the form and extent of the participation of Canadian military and naval forces and the theatre or theatres in which they would be employed after the defeat of Germany. In addition, the message concluded, these arrangements would obviously be influenced by the extent to which Canada would contribute to the forces required for the pacification of Europe.

In the aide-mémoire which, with the approval of the War Committee, was handed to the U.K. Parliamentary Under-Secretary for Air on February 10th last,<sup>173</sup> it was made clear that the above and other related considerations might render it advisable for Canada to play her part in the Japanese war in very close co-operation with the United States, at least in certain operational theatres.

With regard to the extent of participation by Canadian forces in the war against Japan, our contribution to forces of European occupation, as has already been pointed out, will be an immediately relevant factor. So far no final decisions have been taken in this matter. Further, Canadian opinion will, I feel certain, expect that in reaching decisions as to further commitments, the government will have regard to the measure of Canada's military effort in the long struggle to defeat the Axis powers in Europe.

Questions relating to demobilization of the Services have also a direct bearing upon the extent to which presently serving personnel should be further employed in operational roles when hostilities against Germany have come to an end.

The problem is also one which should be related to the general financial position of the government. This is a matter which, as you know, has been causing me increasing concern. The expansion of Canada's Army, Navy and Air Force and the vast extent to which we have been providing to other Allied nations, under Mutual Aid and otherwise, food, weapons and war supplies of all kinds, have far exceeded anything deemed possible in the early years of the war. To these heavy expenditures for war there have already been added, during the present Session of Parliament, the immense commitments involved in the government's programme of social legislation, including provision for the re-establishment of ex-Servicemen in civil life.

The relationship of the overall financial position to possible commitments for military undertakings at the end of the European war is, I know, as fully appreciated by you as by myself. I doubt, however, if, except for the Minister of Finance, its full significance is equally apparent to other members of the government. I am further concerned lest those responsible for the preparation of military plans should fail to realize the magnitude of this problem with which the government is confronted.

The Canadian military effort against Japan should, in my opinion, be one in which the form and extent of the participation of each of the three Services is determined in relation to the plans of the other two. It should be one which meets the requirements of the special Canadian position. It should be one which is not disproportionate to our resources and which takes into consideration the other large external and domestic commitments of the government. It is upon these considerations that government policy should be determined and the Service programmes settled in the light of overall Allied strategy.

My purpose in writing you this letter is to request you to emphasize with your colleagues the Minister of National Defence for Air and the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services, and with the Chiefs of Staff the necessity of having regard to these considerations in the preparation and submission of proposals for consideration by the Cabinet.

Robertson, to whom I have shown the attached draft to Mr. Ralston, feels that you might well take the occasion to write a simultaneous letter, in similar terms, to Mr. Howe.

There is much to be said for this since the production programme should be related directly to the military effort, and from the financial and manpower points of view there is, perhaps, more danger of over-commitment in the industrial than in the military sphere. The industrial programme also directly affects the problem of demobilization.

I have, accordingly, prepared the attached draft letter to Mr. Howe,† using much the same language as appears in the draft to Mr. Ralston. If you decide to send this letter you might, perhaps, add a P.S. to Mr. Ralston's letter, to the following effect:

“P.S. Inasmuch as the considerations set out above are directly relevant to the Canadian production programme, I have today written to our colleague the Minister of Munitions and Supply emphasizing the importance of having his officials avoid new substantial future commitments until overall decisions can be taken upon government policy for the period following the defeat of Germany.”<sup>174</sup>

Dear Mr. King,

I have your letter of August 30th regarding Canadian participation in the war against Japan.† My information leads me to believe that the United States considers itself well able to finish this war, and that help from Canada is neither needed or desired.

The United Kingdom government is well aware of the view of the United States, and is most anxious to assert its right to participate, in order that it may have a part in dictating peace terms in that area.

Canada has no territory in the Pacific, and has no reason to take an active part in the war against Japan, other than to give aid to our Allies, in return for their help in the war in Europe. If our help is not wanted by the United States, I do not see why we should insist on participating. I see no purpose in our operating against Japan in combination with the United Kingdom.

As far as war production is concerned, practically all our programme is for the war in Europe. We have always been ready to produce to the limit of our capacity for the European war, and I think that we should continue to do so until the war ends. To cut back now would be to spoil our record, when the effort is nearing an end in any event.

After the war, we must protect our best market to the extent of helping the U.K. rebuild its economy. We must also do our share in helping to restore Europe. In my opinion, these two obligations will take up any slack in our own domestic economy through the reconstruction period.

I am cutting back our various programmes as rapidly as the demands of the European war will permit. I have notified our shipbuilders that no more government contracts can be expected. I am also cutting back our aircraft programme in the field of trainer planes as rapidly as the R.C.A.F. will permit me to do so.

You will appreciate that this Department is a servant of the Armed Forces, and that we can hardly refuse to place any order sent us from our own Services. The extent to which we provide munitions for a war with Japan must, therefore, depend on the extent to which orders for such a war are placed by our three Armed Services. Our only other participation is in the form of Mutual Aid to Australia and New Zealand in an amount authorized by the Mutual Aid Board.

Yours sincerely,

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

28. THE PRIME MINISTER said that the decisions to be taken regarding the employment of Canadian forces, once Germany had been defeated, were so important that they should receive the early and careful consideration of the Cabinet as a whole, as well as that of the War Committee.

Major decisions should not be taken until the general Allied strategy had been determined. It would then be possible to reach conclusions upon Canadian participation in the Japanese war which would be appropriate to Canada's special position, and not disproportionate to our resources. Meantime, it was essential that no commitments should be made as to either the manner or extent of the employment of Canadian forces.

The attention of the U.K. government had already been directed to certain special considerations which would affect Canadian policy, with particular reference to the theatre or theatres in which Canadian forces would be employed. In this connection reference had been made to Canada's position as a North American nation and to her special interest in any operations in the North Pacific area.

In reaching decisions as to further military commitments, the government should have regard to the measure of Canada's effort in the long struggle to defeat the Axis in Europe and to the fact that, in the war against Japan, Canadian assistance would not be required to the same extent.

The problem was also one which should be related to the general financial position of the government, a matter which had been causing increasing concern. The expansion of the forces and the vast scale upon which Canada, at her own expense, had been providing supplies of all kinds to other Allied nations had far exceeded anything which had been thought possible in the early years of the war. To these heavy war expenditures there had been added, during the present Session of Parliament, the large commitments involved in the social legislation programme, including extensive provision for the re-establishment of ex-Servicemen.

These serious financial considerations were directly relevant to possible commitments for military undertakings at the end of the European war. They also had a direct and important bearing upon the size of the industrial effort. The acceptance of further new commitments in war production should take account of the government's other large external and domestic obligations.

29. MR. KING read from a message from the U.K. Prime Minister regarding the disposition and operational employment of Commonwealth forces for the defeat of Japan. This problem was to be the subject of early discussion with the U.S. Chiefs of Staff when several proposals would be advanced by the United Kingdom.

It was even further evident, in the light of this information, that it would be inappropriate and undesirable for Canadian forces to participate in the southern theatres of operations.

(Telegram 123 Dominions Office to External Affairs, August 26, 1944).

30. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR observed that one important factor in determining the extent of Canadian participation would be the limited rate at which demobilization could be effected. Irrespective of their employment large numbers of Service personnel would remain in uniform for some time after hostilities had ceased in Europe.

With regard to the Air Force, a proposal was before the War Committee for three squadrons and a Wing Headquarters to be based on Australia and to be employed with the U.S. Army Air Forces in that theatre. The War Committee had already approved, as a basis for planning, a total of 58 R.C.A.F. squadrons for European occupation and for operations against Japan. Present Staff planning had reference to employment of the bulk of these squadrons in combination with the R.A.F. in Southeast Asia, but no firm commitment had been given for their use in that theatre and they could be directed to the North Pacific if major operations were undertaken there.

31. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE read a report from Lieutenant-General Stuart upon a meeting which had taken place between the Canadian Joint Staff Mission and the U.K. Chiefs of Staff for preliminary consideration of the problem under discussion.

It had been pointed out to the U.K. Chiefs, at this meeting, that no decisions had been made by the government as to the strength of Canadian participation in occupation or in the war against Japan, and that no decisions could be made on these questions until further information became available to the government.

Lt. Gen. Stuart had expressed the opinion, on enquiry, that the government might consider one division with necessary ancillary units for Europe and a maximum of one division for employment against Japan, also that the government would prefer Canadian forces to be employed in the North or Central Pacific rather than in the South Pacific.

(Nat. Def. telegram C.O.S. 212, C.M.H.Q. London, to N.D.H.Q., August 30, 1944.)<sup>7</sup>

32. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the policy to govern the nature and extent of the employment of Canadian forces at the end of hostilities in Europe should be considered by the Cabinet as a whole, that final decisions thereon should not be taken until the general Allied strategy had been settled and that, meantime, the problem should be further explored by the Ministers of National Defence with their Service advisers.

Ottawa, September 6, 1944

A meeting of Cabinet was held in the Privy Council Chamber on Wednesday, September 6th, 1944 at 3.00 p.m.

The Prime Minister (Mr. King), in the Chair.

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. THE PRIME MINISTER made reference to the meeting to be held in Quebec, in the immediate future, between Mr. Churchill and President Roosevelt, and the Combined Chiefs of Staff.

Before this meeting took place, agreement should be reached as to the general policy of the government in the matter of Canadian participation in the Japanese war. This subject had been under consideration by the Cabinet War Committee for some time. It should now be considered by the Cabinet as a whole.

No final decisions could be taken until after the Quebec meeting, when it was expected that over-all Allied strategy would be determined, but Canadian representatives should be in a position to state, at Quebec, an agreed government view upon the nature and extent of the Canadian contribution.

2. THE CABINET, after extended discussion, agreed that, at the end of the war in Europe, Canadian military forces should participate in the war against Japan in operational theatres of direct interest to Canada as a North American nation, for example in the North or Central Pacific, rather than in more remote areas such as Southeast Asia, that government policy with respect to employment of Canadian forces should be based on this principle and that the form and extent of participation by the three Services should be determined following the forthcoming meeting at Quebec.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE

OCCUPATION; WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. THE SECRETARY submitted and read a note summarizing previous discussions in the War Committee and in the Cabinet.

The War Committee and the Cabinet had agreed that Canadian forces should play an appropriate part in both the pacification of Europe and the war against Japan, and had discussed proposals which had been put forward tentatively by the Services.

Specific proposals involving a division with ancillary formations for occupational duty and a similar force for employment in the North or Central Pacific had been submitted by the Minister of National Defence on the recommendation of the Chief of the General Staff, with the suggestion that if the latter were approved in principle it be communicated to the U.S. Chiefs of Staff so that joint planning might be initiated.

Copies of the Secretary's note and of the Army proposals were circulated.

(Secretary's memorandum, Sept. 13, 1944—C.W.C. document 854; National Defence memorandum, Aug. 23, 1944—C.W.C. document 846).

2. THE PRIME MINISTER said that it had been arranged that the War Committee with the Chiefs of Staff were to meet Mr. Churchill and the U.K. Chiefs of Staff the following day. It was desirable, therefore, that further consideration be now given to questions which would be discussed on that occasion.

The employment of Canadian forces against Japan had been considered at length by the Cabinet on September 6th, at which time it had been generally agreed that, at the end of the war in Europe, Canadian military forces should participate in the war against Japan in operational theatres of direct interest to Canada as a North American nation; for example, in the North or Central Pacific, rather than in more remote areas such as Southeast Asia; that government policy with respect to employment of Canadian forces should be based on this principle and that the form and extent of participation by the three Services should be determined following the present meeting at Quebec.

No firm decisions should be taken until a clear indication had been received as to the extent to which Canadian forces were either desired or needed during Stage II. If there were a possibility of major operations in the North or Central Pacific in which Canadian forces could participate, the Canadian contribution should be in that area and not in the South Pacific or in Southeast Asia.

3. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES said that his understanding of the Cabinet's conclusion was that it represented a preference for the more northerly theatres rather than a refusal to permit Canadian participation in other theatres. In the final analysis, strategic considerations would govern and the enemy must be fought wherever he was, irrespective of geography. This was particularly true in the case of the Navy.

4. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE said that his attention had been drawn to the necessity for complete re-equipment of Canadian squadrons should they be employed in combination with U.S. rather than with U.K. forces. If this were so, the large expenditure involved should be taken into consideration in determining the nature of participation by the R.C.A.F.

5. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR pointed out that the extent to which R.C.A.F. squadrons serving in combination with U.S. forces would require to be re-equipped and the cost involved had not yet been established and was still under examination.

Reports from the R.C.A.F. Mission which had visited Southeast Asia indicated that there were great difficulties in the way of R.C.A.F. participation there. Even if Canadian squadrons served in the North or Central Pacific, a substantial number of Canadian aircrew would continue to serve with R.A.F. squadrons in India and Burma.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE explained the Army proposals, reading reports from the Chief of the General Staff and the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, Washington.

In the circumstances, the Chiefs of Staff should confer on the subject of the Japanese war with the U.S. Chiefs of Staff following consultation with the United Kingdom.

7. THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF described the serious practical difficulties involved in the employment of the R.C.A.F. in Southeast Asia. On the other hand, if the R.A.F. did not participate in any other theatre and R.C.A.F. squadrons were employed elsewhere, they would serve in combination with U.S. forces and extensive re-equipment, involving an initial capital outlay of some $185,000,000 would be necessary. If Canadian squadrons served with the R.A.F., much of the equipment presently available could be utilized. Further, the R.C.A.F. was at present dependent upon the R.A.F. supply organization and, in the event of service with the United States, a new Canadian supply organization involving additional manpower would be required.

8. THE CHIEF OF THE GENERAL STAFF expressed the opinion that the Canadian Army could make a greater contribution to the defeat of Japan in the North or Central Pacific. Further, service in Southeast Asia would require extensive special training and preparation.

9. THE CHIEF OF THE NAVAL STAFF said that U.K. and U.S. Naval forces would participate against Japan in the Pacific in close co-operation. The Canadian Navy could provide appropriate units for service with the Royal Navy.

Little new equipment would be required, but the newer Canadian vessels, such as frigates, destroyers, Algerines, cruisers and escort carriers, would be employed. Preliminary consideration had been given to maintenance of the R.C.N. during Stage II at seventy percent of its present strength and the employment of perhaps 30,000 men afloat and a roughly equivalent number ashore.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, confirmed the conclusion reached by the Cabinet on September 6th to the effect that Canadian military forces should participate, as a matter of preference, in the war against Japan in operational theatres of direct interest to Canada as a North American nation, for example in the North or Central Pacific, rather than in more remote areas such as Southeast Asia, and that government policy with respect to employment of Canadian forces should be based on this principle.

WAR AGAINST JAPAN; PARTICIPATION BY CANADIAN FORCES

1. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed appreciation of the opportunity of having the War Committee and the Chiefs of Staff confer with Mr. Churchill, the other United Kingdom representatives present and the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff.

2. MR. KING explained that the question of the nature and extent of Canadian participation in the Japanese war had been receiving the consideration of the government and their military advisers.

In recent discussions, it had been generally agreed that, at the end of the war in Europe, Canadian military forces should participate in the war against Japan, in operational theatres of direct interest to Canada as a North American nation, for example, in the North or Central Pacific, rather than in more remote areas, such as Southeast Asia, that government policy with respect to the employment of Canadian forces should be based on this principle and that the form and extent of participation should be determined following the present Quebec meeting.

This represented a statement of preference in the matter of operational theatres. The government would be prepared to have Canadian forces employed in the Northern Pacific or in the Central Pacific area, the latter to include operations from as far south as Hawaii, and against, for example, Formosa or the Philippines.

The government could not take firm decisions nor could plans be made for appropriate Canadian participation until the general strategic plan for accomplishing the defeat of Japan had been settled. The roles to be allotted to U.K. forces—Navy, Army and Air, in the execution of the overall plan would affect the form of Canadian participation.

In general, the government felt that the Canadian military effort should be in the main areas of assault through the North or Central Pacific and not in remote tropical theatres.

3. THE PRIME MINISTER OF THE UNITED KINGDOM emphasized the difficulty which the United Kingdom itself was experiencing in having the United States agree to participation by British forces in the Pacific. He would discuss with the President what might be possible in the matter of Canadian participation in the light of the statement made by Mr. King. The difficulty was that there were only a limited number of "front seats" for the Japanese war.

Detailed plans for operations against the Japanese and as to the part to be played by the British forces had not yet been settled. Only that morning it had been agreed that a full strength British Battle Fleet would operate, under United States command, in the main Pacific theatre. This would offer an opportunity for employment of units of the Canadian Navy in accordance with Canadian policy. It had also been agreed, in principle, that a substantial long range bomber force would be provided by the Commonwealth for the bombing of the Japanese Islands.

Solely for purposes of planning and subject to regular review, it had now been agreed to assume that the war against Japan would terminate eighteen months after the end of European hostilities.

4. THE U.K. CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF said that in discussions with the Canadian Air Staff, a total number of 58 R.C.A.F. squadrons had been employed in preliminary planning for the occupation of Europe and for the war against Japan.

It was now proposed that the British would provide 40 long range bomber squadrons against Japan and it had been suggested that, of these, Canada might provide from 14 to 18. These arrangements, however, were subject to further consideration with the United States Chiefs to Staff. Further, the figures suggested for the R.C.A.F. component were not rigid in any way and could be adjusted to meet the decisions of the Canadian government.

5. MR. CHURCHILL said that plans for land operations in the Central Pacific had not been finally determined, nor were the final intentions of the United States known in the matter of a campaign in the North Pacific. Participation by the British Army would probably be concentrated in Southeastern Asia.

British personnel serving against Japan would be given the benefit of special rates of pay.

Any participation by the Canadian Army might appropriately be made in the Central or North Pacific where it could represent the Commonwealth. It would not be appropriate or necessary to have Canadians serve in the tropical or semi-tropical areas of Southeast Asia.

In any case the war against Japan would not be a war of numbers but would consist largely of attacks by Naval and Air Forces. In these circumstances, it should not be expected that large numbers of Canadian Army personnel would be called upon to participate.

In summary, it would appear appropriate to suggest that Canadian Naval and Air formations should participate in the war against Japan in direct co-operation with British forces while any role allotted to the Canadian Army would be carried out in co-operation with the forces of the United States.

6. THE CHIEF OF THE IMPERIAL GENERAL STAFF observed that the main operation against Japan would probably take place across the Central Pacific with, perhaps, a subsidiary operation from the North.

7. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the view that the proposed allotment of R.C.A.F. squadrons to the Pacific under discussion between the U.K. and Canadian Staffs was too heavy in itself and disproportionate to the contributions contemplated for the other Services. This proposal would require further consideration in relation to the commitments to be made with respect to the Army and Navy.

It was essential that plans be so ordered that Canadian forces would be available for employment against Japan in the later decisive stages of the war. This would be an important consideration in determining government policy as to the measure of participation by the Canadian Navy, Army and Air Force.

In deciding upon the part which Canada would play in accomplishing the defeat of Japan, the government had to take into consideration the capacity and readiness of the Canadian people to assume further financial commitments of great magnitude in addition to those resulting from the war effort to date and the heavy undertakings involved in the programme of social legislation, including the extensive provisions made for the re-establishment of ex-Servicemen.

8. MR. KING suggested that, in the circumstances, the Canadian Chiefs of Staff should now confer with the U.S. Chiefs of Staff with regard to the role which Canadian forces might play in the Pacific.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE

SIR ALAN BROOKE referred to the discussion that had taken place at the meeting of the War Committee of the Canadian Cabinet with Mr. Churchill and U.K. representatives earlier in the day, and suggested that the present meeting should consider in more detail questions relating to employment of Canadian forces after the end of hostilities in Europe.

The United Kingdom were basing their occupational plans for Europe on the assumption that the Commonwealth contribution would be of the order of ten occupational groups for Germany, four for Austria, and a small force for Greece. In addition, certain forces might have to be provided for the Middle East to deal with security problems there, notably the Jewish-Arab problem in Palestine.

All calculations were still provisional, particularly as the question of the allocation of zones in Germany between the United Kingdom and the United States had not been settled. Earlier estimates of the forces likely to be required had proved far in excess of U.K. resources. By relying on the air threat and on the free use of air-borne armoured forces, it was thought possible to reduce their over-all commitment which still, however, remained a very heavy one.

Army

The forces of occupation would be organised as occupational groups, rather than divisions for the reason that once hostilities had ended, considerable economies could be made in artillery, engineer and other ancillary units of a division. The over-all total of an occupational group was between 18,000 and 20,000 men as against 40,000 for a fighting division, including rear echelons. It was hoped that the Canadian government would agree to the provision of one occupational group.

LIEUTENANT-GENERAL MURCHIE said that the proposals now under consideration were on the basis that Canada would provide one composite group, drawn from the Canadian forces now in Europe. This would consist of some 25,000 men. He asked whether an estimate could be made of the period over which the occupational forces would be required.

Sir Alan Brooke said that dismemberment plans for Germany, which were now generally favoured, would probably result in prolonging the period of occupation, although in later stages, considerable reductions in forces should be possible.

It was, at this time, quite impossible to give any useful estimate of how long the occupation would last. He saw no reason, however, why, during the later stages, personnel of the occupational groups should not be relieved by younger men from home. The shipping situation would unfortunately prevent this taking place during the early stages of the occupational period.

Sir Alan Brooke then gave a brief outline of the personnel shipping situation which would confront the Allies at the end of hostilities in Europe. The redeployment of forces for the war against Japan would absorb practically all personnel shipping for many months. After that, demands for the repatriation of Dominion forces who had been serving overseas, the movement of prisoners of war, and the relief of civilians would have to be considered.

It was hoped to obtain some relief by converting cargo vessels for troop carrying purposes and by increasing the capacity of the ships where possible. Men returning home would probably prefer the discomforts of an over-crowded ship to a period of waiting. Nevertheless, the question of settling priorities in the allocation of personnel shipping was going to prove difficult to solve.

Lieutenant-General Murchie said that Canadians were naturally very anxious to "marry up" formations of the First Canadian Army as soon as possible.

Sir Alan Brooke agreed that this was most desirable and would be brought about as soon as the war situation and the opening up of communications in Europe permitted. It was, of course, impossible to shuffle divisions around at this stage of operations.

In connection with the war against Japan, he said that the initial British land effort would be in Southeast Asia. When operations there were nearing completion, a decision would have to be made as to whether further efforts were to be concentrated against Singapore or in the Southwest Pacific area or elsewhere.

Lieutenant-General Murchie said that consideration was being given to the provision of one Canadian division to participate in the Pacific war. Canada was most interested in operations in the Central Pacific or in its Northern Wing, if an attack should be mounted in that area. This interest was based on geographical considerations and not because the Central area contained the main U.S. effort. It would, however, be some time before the Canadian division would be ready, since it would have to be reformed from units withdrawn from Europe.

Air Force

SIR CHARLES PORTAL said that he was hoping for a contribution of fourteen Canadian squadrons in the occupational air forces. He understood that, in the war against Japan, the Canadian government wished that R.C.A.F. participation should be in the main Pacific theatres and not in Southeast Asia.

Formal U.K. proposals would be forthcoming for consideration by the Canadian government and would be along the following lines:

	Europe	War against Japan
Heavy Bombers	4	18
Fighters (Day)	4	14
Air Sea Rescue	—	1
Long Range Transport	4	8
Medium Transport	2	2

It would be noted that whereas under earlier proposals which had been used as a basis for planning, eleven R.C.A.F. squadrons were earmarked for Europe and forty-seven for the war against Japan, under the new proposals the total for Europe would be fourteen and for the war in the Pacific forty-four. The grand total of fifty-eight remained unchanged.

Sir Charles Portal then explained that, upon the earlier basis for planning, the U.K. Air Staff had been hoping for a Canadian contribution to the Southeast Asia Command. From conversations he had had with Air Marshal Leckie, it now seemed unlikely that this hope would be realized; in consequence, some 8,500 ground staff and 16,500 men for rear echelons would have to be provided in that area by the United Kingdom. This might eat into the total of 48,000 personnel which it had been hoped to provide from the United Kingdom in support of the Canadian air forces in the war against Japan. These figures were exclusive of air field construction units.

The build-up in the Pacific theatres was scheduled to commence in May 1945 and might continue until the following September. Bases might be located on the Chinese coast in the area of Formosa.

As regards the rate at which the buildup should be undertaken, Sir Charles Portal said that he understood that Canada might wish to delay the provision of heavy bomber squadrons in the initial stages.

The rate at which squadrons could be accepted in the newly constructed air bases in the Pacific was very limited, and he thought that this delay could be easily arranged by substituting British for Canadian squadrons in the earlier stages if so desired by Canada. He would like confirmation of this point.

AIR MARSHAL LECKIE undertook to inform the British Chief of the Air Staff on this point.

Navy

VICE ADMIRAL JONES said that there would likely be a token Canadian Naval force provided for service in European waters and that it would include the minesweeping detachment.

SIR ANDREW CUNNINGHAM said that, arising from the discussions which had taken place earlier in the afternoon, it was now proposed that R.C.N. participation against Japan might appropriately be with the British fleet operating in the Pacific.

Vice Admiral Jones agreed that employment of Canadian Naval units in this way would be in accordance with government policy.

In conclusion, Sir Alan Brooke expressed thanks on behalf of his colleagues of the U.K. delegation to Canada for the excellent arrangements which had been made in connection with the Octagon Conference. These arrangements were a model of efficiency and he would very much like the Canadian Chiefs of Staff to convey to those responsible the grateful appreciation of the U.K. Delegation.

NOTE FOR FILE

After talking with Prime Minister on 15th instant following his conference of that morning (15th) with Mr. Churchill and Mr. Roosevelt, I authorized with P.M.'s approval the C.G.S. on afternoon of 15th to make an appointment with the U.S. Chief of Staff, General Marshall, to indicate what the Canadian Army were doing for purposes of planning, without commitment, and to discuss methods whereby mutual planning could be worked out to integrate Canadian Army component.

Québec, September 16, 1944

1. In accordance with your instructions I arranged an interview with General G. C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, United States Army, to confer with him regarding the role which the Canadian Army might play in the Pacific.

2. At 10:00 hours this morning accompanied by General Pope, Military Secretary, Canadian War Cabinet Committee, I was received by General Marshall.

3. I said to him that for some time the Canadian Authorities had been considering the role their armed forces might play in the Pacific on the conclusion of hostilities in Europe. I went on to say that I was authorized to confer with him regarding possible role of Canadian Army in Pacific operations but without making any actual commitments. It was their desire that this participation be carried out in those areas in which Canada had a direct interest, namely, the Central and North Pacific. I informed him that I understood that my Prime Minister had discussed this question generally with the President of the United States.

4. So far as the Army was concerned, I said that any operation in the extreme North, for example the Kuriles, did not appear particularly attractive. Such an operation would appear to be a subsidiary one. It was the Canadian desire to share in the final assault on Japan.

5. I also said that as far as I could judge limitations of time and space would make it impossible for the Canadian Army to participate in any earlier operation that might be planned. The force that would be employed would, of necessity, have to be selected from those now serving in the European theatre. The troops would naturally have to be reconstituted in some measure and be returned to Canada where they would be given leave and be re-equipped and trained, as might be necessary to fit them for the operational role in which they would be employed. I further stated that we had been thinking that the size of the Force would be approximately one division and such other ancillary troops as might be required from the Services point of view.

6. General Marshall stated that this question of "making room" had been discussed very fully during this conference. He was of the opinion that there were advantages from the psychological, or perhaps one might call it the political point of view, for the inclusion of Canadian Forces in the Pacific area. He considered that a division was a compact formation to fit into the planning and that it would be very desirable that its personnel have had previous battle experience. He said that the question of equipment might be a limiting factor although it was a matter of detail which could be worked out later. In reply to his question I stated that naturally we would prefer to use our own equipment but realized that the supply arrangements might make this impossible in all types.

7. General Marshall went on to say that while he did not foresee any insurmountable obstacle to the inclusion of a Canadian Force with the U.S. Army Forces employed in the Central Pacific, this proposal would need further study by his staff and he asked if he might have an Aide-Mémoire for this purpose.

8. I attach a copy of the Aide-Mémoire handed to General Marshall.

Québec, September 16, 1944

This morning General Murchie (C.G.S. Canada), accompanied by General Pope, Mil. Sec. to the Canadian Cabinet War Committee, said that for some time the Canadian authorities had been considering the role their armed forces might play in the Pacific on the conclusion of hostilities in Europe. It was their desire that this participation be carried out in those areas in which Canada had a direct interest, namely, the Central and North Pacific.

So far as the Army was concerned, General Murchie said that any operation in the extreme North, for example, the Kuriles, did not appear particularly attractive. It was the Canadian desire to share in the final assault on Japan proper. So far as he could judge limitations of time and space would make it impossible for the Canadian army to participate in any earlier operation that might be planned. The force that would be employed would of necessity have to be selected from those now serving in the European theatre.

The troops would naturally have to be reconstituted in some measure and be returned to Canada where they would be given leave and be re-equipped and trained, as might be necessary to fit them for the operational role in which they would be employed.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE; EUROPEAN
OCCUPATION; WAR AGAINST JAPAN

5. THE PRIME MINISTER referred to the meetings at Quebec on September 13th and 14th and to conversations there with U.K. and U.S. representatives.

It was now quite evident that, so far as Canada was concerned, military necessity could not be regarded as the governing consideration in determining the extent of Canada's participation in the Pacific war. At the end of European hostilities the United States and the United Kingdom would have at their disposal much larger forces than could actually be employed against Japan. In these circumstances, the decisions as to participation by the Canadian Services should be governed by a lively sense of the government's responsibility for safeguarding the human and material resources of the nation as well as in the light of the considerations which he had emphasized in recent meetings of the War Committee and of the Cabinet when the subject was under discussion.

The Defence Ministers might now put forward specific proposals in the light of what had transpired since the meeting of September 13th.

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE pointed out that the Army proposals had already been submitted to the War Committee.

They included the provision of one "occupation group" for Europe, requiring some 25,000 men, and one division with ancillary troops for the war in the Pacific, which, with necessary reinforcements for one year, would require about 30,000 men.

The total cost of these forces would be approximately $141,700,000 during the next fiscal year. Of this amount $46,650,000 would be required for the occupation group, and the balance for the division for the Pacific. Of the latter amount $15,500,000 would be non-recurring.

The total figure did not, of course, represent estimated over-all Army expenditures since there would be, in addition, the large continuing expenses for other troops not yet demobilized, and the cost of maintaining necessary military facilities in Canada.

7. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that the proposed contribution of the R.C.A.F. to the occupation of Europe and to the war against Japan had now been reduced to thirty-two squadrons. Personnel involved would total some 32-33,000 or roughly half the number of R.C.A.F. personnel at present serving overseas.

Of these, seven squadrons would be employed in Europe, and the remaining twenty-five in the war against Japan. The total manpower requirements of this programme included provision for replacements (some 5,000), for necessary ancillary units (some 4,000) and approximately 6,000 airfield construction personnel who might be provided by the Army.

Capital equipment required for these thirty-two squadrons would cost approximately $160,000,000. This figure might be reduced by utilizing present equipment valued at approximately $90,000,000. Annual maintenance would be in the neighbourhood of $331,000,000.

With respect to other Air estimates, the maintaining of the Home War Establishment and the cost of the B.C.A.T.P. should be capable of reduction from $700,000,000 to between $250,000,000 and $300,000,000. This would mean that, on the basis of the present proposals, total estimated requirements for the coming fiscal year would amount to from $650,000,000 to $700,000,000, compared with the present fiscal year's total of $1,100,000,000.

The proposal for the despatch of three squadrons to Australia for service in the South Pacific† was being withdrawn. If any forces were required for special operations in the Northern Pacific, suitable groups could be made available from the thirteen remaining Home War Establishment squadrons.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES said that plans for Naval participation against Japan were still unsettled. They could be adjusted to comply in extent with whatever policy might be determined.

The tasks which the Canadian Navy might usefully undertake would be escort work and anti-aircraft duties in the Pacific, and minesweeping in Atlantic and European waters. The larger units might be employed in actual combat duties.

9. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE said that his advisers were of opinion that it would be reasonable to provide for a total budget of not more than $4,000,000,000 for the next fiscal year, that is, one which would reflect an over-all reduction of approximately one third from the present level. To make this possible expenditures for the Services and for Mutual Aid would have to be reduced by fifty percent.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the Services be directed to prepare, for consideration at the next meeting, statements of total requirements for the next fiscal year, in terms of money and manpower.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE; WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. THE SECRETARY submitted a memorandum prepared by the Military Secretary from information furnished by the Chiefs of Staff and containing a tentative forecast of Service requirements for the fiscal year 1945-46, in terms of manpower and money.

This memorandum was submitted as a basis for further consideration of Staff proposals for participation in the occupation of Europe, in the war in the Pacific and with respect to Home War Establishments and personnel awaiting demobilization. The grand total of the financial estimates made amounted to $2,242,000,000. The figures were, however, tentative and had been furnished only as a basis for discussion. Copies of the memorandum were circulated.

2. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES explained the implications of the Naval proposals. 20,258 men afloat for service in the Pacific, with some 30,000 ashore to support the overseas effort, would enable the Canadian Navy to man all of the larger vessels expected to be available at the time, including 2 cruisers, 2 light carriers, 25 destroyers, 54 frigates, 12

corvettes (improved), 12 Algerines and the 3 Princes. For Europe, some 3,000 men would be required. This would permit the maintenance of a proposed minesweeping force of 30 vessels.

The financial costs were complicated by the necessity of carrying over from the present fiscal year some $149,000,000, which represented, for the most part, ship construction and the purchase of Naval stores already committed for. The plans put forward were tentative only and could be reduced in any degree to meet the decisions of the government.

3. THE PRIME MINISTER expressed the opinion that the Naval proposals were altogether too high, and quite disproportionate to an appropriate Canadian effort in the Pacific. These figures should be drastically reduced to provide less burden upon both manpower and financial resources.

4. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE explained further the Army proposals. They involved one occupation group for Europe, one division with ancillary formations and reinforcements for the Pacific and for demobilization at the maximum rate of 20,000 a month. The costs for the next fiscal year were estimated at $1,030,000,000. This included $300,000,000 carry-over from the present fiscal year but did not include gratuities.

The proposals for Europe and the Pacific accorded with previous discussions in the War Committee and in the Cabinet. The estimated $98,000,000 for the Pacific force included $20,000,000 for U.S. equipment.<sup>175</sup>

5. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE enquired as to the possibility of reducing the Army's estimates in respect of personnel other than those to be employed in Europe or in the Pacific war.

In this connection, an important element consisted of the maintenance of N.R.M.A. personnel on pay and allowances.

It was to be noted that total R.C.A.F. requirements were now estimated at $832,000,000 rather than the $650,000,000 to $700,000,000 mentioned the previous day by the Minister of National Defence for Air.

From the financial point of view, it would be essential to provide decreased war expenditures in the next fiscal year if the total Budget were to be kept substantially below that for the current year.

6. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to defer decisions upon the employment of Naval, Army and Air Forces at the end of hostilities in Europe, pending re-examination of the proposals submitted.

<sup>175</sup>La note suivante était dans l'original:

The following note was in the original:

Revisions now indicate that the figure of $20,000,000 for U.S. equipment should read $15,000,000 which would reduce the total estimate to $93,000,000.

*Mémoire du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

Ottawa, October 2, 1944

At the meeting of the War Committee on the afternoon of September 23rd, the Minister of National Defence submitted a recommendation to provide for the enlistment of up to 300 Canadian born citizens of Japanese racial origin in the Army. The purpose indicated was to train them for use in the Pacific war as translators, interpreters, for psychological warfare, and so forth. The training would be carried out in a special center, and all volunteers would be investigated prior to enlistment. At the time, decision by War Committee was deferred.

This question is one in which the Australian military authorities, the British Security people and the Indian Army, as well as ourselves and the Japanese in Canada, are closely interested. You will recall that originally the Department of National Defence felt that there were objections from the military point of view to enlistment of these people, but it has now been decided that no such objection exists to enlistment for the limited and specific purposes indicated. In the United States there has, of course, been enlistment of Japanese persons in special combat units which have been in action in Italy, and, in addition, the Nisei there have been drawn on for special translation and psychological warfare work and given training at a special camp in Minnesota. We have received requests from the Australian Army for 50 Nisei, British Security are looking for a large number (the figure of 200 has been mentioned), and the Indian Army would also like to secure as many as they can. We are given to understand that the Japanese persons in Canada constitute about the only remaining reservoir that can be drawn on by the Allied forces to provide persons for this type of work.

Apart from the usefulness of the Japanese persons to our military effort through their enlistment and training as indicated, I think there would be great value in the move for domestic reasons. On the one hand it would meet a great deal of the criticism that has been levelled against the Japanese on the ground that they are not cooperating with the Canadian authorities nor contributing to our war effort. On the other hand it would greatly improve the morale of loyal Japanese who have wished to do something in this war to show their loyalty to Canada but have, for the most part, been deprived of an opportunity.

If we do not take steps to provide for enlistment and training ourselves, the Australians and British will wish to secure their services directly. While this might meet the needs that are felt for the special work in the war in the Pacific, it would mean that both this country and the Japanese here would lose almost entirely the indirect benefits that would be involved in their enlistment into the Canadian forces.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF EUROPEAN HOSTILITIES

17. THE PRIME MINISTER said that the extent and nature of the Naval and Air participation in the Japanese war remained for decision.

18. THE SECRETARY referred to a statement of the estimated cash requirements of the R.C.A.F. for 1945-46 amounting to $832 million. This table gave a break-down in both manpower and dollar costs for thirty-two squadrons overseas, the Commonwealth Air Training Scheme, and Western Hemisphere Operations (sixteen operational squadrons). It also indicated an over-all reduction in strength from about 220,000 at April 1st, 1945, to 105,000 at March 31st, 1946.

19. MR. KING felt that the proposed total of thirty-two R.C.A.F. squadrons overseas (seven for Europe and twenty-five for the Pacific) should be related to the Air Forces which the United Kingdom intended to employ in these theatres. The War Committee should also have a statement as to the role it was proposed this Canadian force would play in the general strategy.

Furthermore, what was the basis of the estimated need for sixteen squadrons for "Western Hemisphere Operations?"

20. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE thought that the figure of $832 million was very high. It was based on a rate of demobilization of approximately 10,000 a month. Could not this rate be substantially increased?

21. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES observed that rates of demobilization had been tentatively agreed upon at 20,000 per month for the Army, 10,000 for the Air Force, and 5,000 for the Navy. The extent of participation in the Japanese war should first be determined and demobilization of the remainder proceed then at the maximum rate possible.

22. MR. KING pointed out that British participation in the Far East was based directly upon British interests in that area. The same was true of the United States.

The situation was quite otherwise for Canada. We had no essential interest in that part of the world and the government should be careful not to make the mistake of endeavouring to put up too good an appearance. On the contrary, we should provide token forces and nothing more. The Canadian people would not support the commitment of large human and financial resources in the Japanese war.

23. THE MINISTERS OF JUSTICE, MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY AND TRANSPORT agreed generally with the Prime Minister.

24. MR. MACDONALD said he was prepared to cut the Naval contribution down to a figure of 10,000 men afloat, though he would prefer a figure of some 13,000 which would provide a better balanced force.

25. MR. KING suggested that if the Navy and Air Force cut their proposals to a percentage of their present overseas strength comparable to that involved in Army plans, the result would probably be appropriate.

26. MR. MACDONALD then enumerated the warships that would be manned by forces of 13,000 and 10,000 men afloat.

The Chief of the Naval Staff properly felt that the force, whatever it might be, should be a balanced one.

A force of some 10,000 men afloat would probably be composed of:

- 2 Cruisers
- 1 Carrier
- 2 Fleet Destroyers
- 4 Tribal Destroyers
- 4 Crescent Destroyers
- 4 River Class Destroyers
- 27 Frigates
- 6 Algerines

This was subject to further consideration by the Naval Staff.

27. MR. KING, referring to the operational theatres in which Canadian Naval forces might be employed against Japan, referred to the policy which had previously been determined by the Cabinet as a whole, namely, that Canadian participation should be in theatres of direct interest to Canada as a North American nation, for example, the North or Central Pacific rather than in more remote areas such as Southeast Asia.

Decision as to the participation of the three Services should be firmly based on this principle of policy which had been communicated to Mr. Churchill and the British Chiefs of Staff at Quebec and which they now fully understood and appreciated.

Canadian planning could go forward only on this basis.

The Naval and Air Staffs should submit detailed proposals showing the composition of the Canadian forces they respectively recommended for participation in the Pacific, together with a statement of the functional roles proposed for them and how they would fit in with the British forces with whom they would be serving.

28. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed to defer decisions as to the extent and nature of Naval and Air participation in the Pacific.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE (NAVY AND AIR FORCE)

15. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES submitted a memorandum, copies of which were circulated, setting out the proposed extent and nature of the Navy's participation in the war against Japan.

Briefly, these proposals involved the following units:

in the Central Pacific, (for operation with a British fleet under Admiral Nimitz)

(a) two cruisers, one anti-aircraft ship, some forty frigates and ten corvettes - total complement 8,812 officers and men;

(b) two light fleet carriers and ten fleet destroyers—complement 4,600 officers and men—to be added later; and,

in South East Asia, (for operations in the Indian Ocean and the Bay of Bengal)

(c) six special ships (two LSI (M), the Prince David and the Prince Henry, and four tribal destroyers)—total complement 1,726 officers and men.

(Minister's memorandum to the War Committee, Oct. 11, 1944—C.W.C. document 882).†

16. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that the memorandum submitted was based on the aide mémoire that the Canadian Joint Staff Mission, London, had received from the British Chiefs of Staff last July regarding participation of Canadian forces against Japan.<sup>176</sup> It did not take into account the agreed statement of government policy as to appropriate operational theatres which had been communicated to Mr. Churchill and the United Kingdom Chiefs of Staff, on September 14th, at Quebec. It was essential that this policy be adhered to by the Services and that Canadian forces should not be despatched to South East Asia.

The present proposals involved the employment of some 15,000 officers and men afloat. It had been hoped that, in the light of previous discussions, it would have been possible to keep the total strength to 10,000 or possibly 12,000.

See sub-enclosure 2, Document 387.

The proposal to have units serve in the Indian Ocean ((c) above) could not be accepted but, as the numbers involved represented a reduction to about one-third of the present numbers afloat, the forces enumerated in (a) and (b) above, for Central Pacific operations, might be approved.

17. MR. MACDONALD said that he would forego the proposal to despatch units to the South East Asia Command.

The Chief of the Naval Staff was anxious that Canadian Naval representation in the Pacific should consist of a well-balanced force. Actual compositions in terms of the various categories of ships would require further careful review. The financial implications of these proposals also remained to be worked out.

18. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the Naval forces for service in the Central and North Pacific, as listed in para. 5(i) and para. 7 of the memorandum submitted (total complement approximately 13,412 officers and men) be approved, subject to such changes in composition as further examination might prove to be desirable, and subject to approval of financial estimates of the cost of maintaining these forces.

ENLISTMENT OF CANADIAN-BORN JAPANESE

23. THE SECRETARY referred to the recommendation of the Department of National Defence discussed at the meeting of September 23rd.

24. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the recommendation submitted, for enlistment of Canadian-born Japanese in the Canadian Army, could not be approved, but that such personnel might be enlisted in Canada in the Armed forces of other United Nations; the position of Canadian-born Japanese so enlisted in Canada not to be affected in consequence of such enlistment and service.

EMPLOYMENT OF CANADIAN FORCES AT THE END OF HOSTILITIES IN EUROPE; AIR FORCE; NAVY

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR referred to revised proposals for R.C.A.F. participation in the Japanese war set out in a memorandum, copies of which had been circulated.

The R.A.F. plan for air operations against the mainland of Japan was still somewhat nebulous. The present purpose was to move the squadrons eastward to air bases which would be established on the coast of China.

7. MR. POWER, commenting upon his revised proposals, recalled that the earlier proposal, which had been accepted for planning purposes only, called for some fifty-eight R.C.A.F. squadrons for the occupation of Europe and for operations against Japan. The plan submitted, after the Quebec meetings, provided for seven squadrons for occupational duties and twenty-five for the Japanese war—a total of thirty-two squadrons.

It was now proposed that the number of R.C.A.F. squadrons should be thirty-three, eleven for occupation and twenty-two for operations against Japan. The extra squadron involved no substantial difference in cost for the reason that it would be a comparatively inexpensive "sea rescue" squadron and also because of the increase in occupational squadrons which would be less costly to maintain than those assigned to offensive operations.

These revised proposals, which were recommended for approval, provided for reduction in the numbers of men involved from 33,000 to 23,000. This had been achieved by eliminating administration and airfield construction units. The estimated cost involved in providing these thirty-three squadrons would be $366,114,000.

Total estimated cash requirements of the R.C.A.F. for the fiscal year 1945-46, including the above amount for European occupation and the Far East, would amount to $715,400,000, as compared with $832,000,000 involved in the proposals previously submitted.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES said that it was very difficult to calculate accurately the amount of the Naval estimates for 1945-46. The Navy's participation in the war against Japan would involve expenditures of some $141,000,000. Demobilization at home would require approximately $63,592,000. There would also be a carry-over of approximately $108,000,000. This would amount roughly to $313,000,000, but for estimating purposes, it would be safer to say that the Navy's total requirements for the next fiscal year would amount to from $315 to $350 million.

8. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that the Minister of Finance had hoped to be able to include all Service estimates for 1945-46 to something in the neighbourhood of one and a half billion dollars. The amounts involved in the proposals now before the War Committee for the Army, Air Force and Navy came to something over two billions.

The next step should be to consolidate the estimates received from the three Services for consideration by the Department of Finance. Decisions could then be taken by the War Committee in the light of Mr. Ilsley's report from the financial point of view.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, referred the matter of estimates involved in the proposals of the three Services to the Minister of Finance for examination and report.

JAPANESE WAR; TRANSFERS OF R.C.N.
VESSELS TO ROYAL NAVY

1. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES reported that an enquiry had been received from the Admiralty as to whether the government would be prepared to release such appropriate Naval units as the Canadian Navy did not intend to employ and which the Royal Navy might wish to man and operate against the Japanese.

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that there would be no objection to complying with the Admiralty's request in this respect and that the use of vessels not required by the Canadian Navy might be made available to the Royal Navy for service in the Japanese war.

Dear Mr. Robertson,

I have received a telegram from the Dominions Office stating that the Admiralty have under review the requirements for the maintenance and repair of the Fleet which will be sent to the Central Pacific in accordance with the decisions of the recent Conference at Quebec.

It is intended that running repairs and maintenance should be carried out as far as possible by ships of the Fleet train, but their capacity will be limited.

Australia will be the Fleet's rear base, but, even when the facilities there are fully manned and augmented by the despatch of such special repair ratings (dockyard) as it is possible to send from the United Kingdom, they will be insufficient to deal with more than a proportion of the repair work which will have to be done by shore establishments. New Zealand has undertaken to place her available repair facilities at disposal for this purpose. But the Admiralty would also welcome the co-operation of Canada in this matter.

Accordingly the Admiralty trust that the Canadian Government will find it possible to keep the repair yards on the west coast of Canada fully manned, so that they may be available for ships of the Royal Navy in addition to those of the Royal Canadian Navy serving with the Pacific Fleet, which it is assumed will normally proceed to Canada for any major repairs.

The Admiralty also wish to seek the assistance of the Canadian Government in manning two of the repair ships of the Fleet train which are being built in the United States. Great difficulty is being experienced in obtaining sufficient special repair ratings (dockyard) from United Kingdom sources, and it would be a most important contribution to the maintenance of the Fleet's operational strength if Canada could help in this way. The complement of a repair ship is approximately 470, of which the special repair ratings amount to some 210. I understand that the Canadian Naval Mission overseas has been furnished with full information on the subject.

I should be glad if you would communicate the foregoing to the appropriate Canadian authorities and be good enough to let me have their views at as early a date as possible.

Yours sincerely,

PATRICK DUFF

ARMY; PARTICIPATION IN OPERATIONS AGAINST JAPAN

3. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE submitted and read recommendations of the Chief of the General Staff. These conformed with plans which had already been considered at length by the Cabinet War Committee.

It was proposed that Army participation should extend to one division, with necessary ancillary troops (total personnel 30,000), that the force should operate in the Central Pacific under U.S. higher command and that the formation and personnel selected be brought back to Canada prior to departure for the operational theatre.

The area of operations and acceptance of U.S. command had already been agreed to by the War Committee.

The bulk of the force would have to be selected by the Army Commander from personnel now overseas. This selection would be made from men who expressed a preference for this duty and were prepared to forego priority in demobilization. It might be necessary to supplement their number by detailing some men from lower demobilization priority categories and by taking some specialists, even though in higher priority brackets.

The force would be concentrated in the United Kingdom prior to departure for Canada, where it would be assembled, after leave, for re-organization and training.

4. GENERAL MCNAUGHTON said that he had gone into these proposals carefully. In his opinion they constituted a reasonable and appropriate plan for participation by the Canadian Army. It was necessary that an early decision be made in order that plans could proceed with U.S. authorities.

It was not intended to provide for any general re-engagement of personnel composing the force but no difficulty was anticipated in obtaining sufficient numbers from those who expressed a preference for this service. There might be exceptions in a limited number of cases, perhaps with certain specialists. In any event, however, it was to be noted that all personnel would be of General Service category, whose employment in the Pacific required no extension of their present terms of engagement.

Approval of the proposals submitted was recommended.

5. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved the proposals submitted by the Minister for Canadian Army participation in the war against Japan.

Ottawa, December 9, 1944

Dear General Marshall,

You will recall that on the morning of 16 September at Quebec, my predecessor, Major General Pope, in company with Lieut. General Murchie, (C.G.S., Canada), met you and indicated Canada's desire to participate in the assault on Japan following the defeat of Germany. A summary of this preliminary discussion was contained in an Aide Mémoire addressed to you under date of 16 September.

On the 20th November 1944 the Canadian Government approved a proposal that Canadian Army participation should consist of one division, with such ancillary troops as may be required.

The Canadian Government further approved that this Force should operate in the Central Pacific Area, and, subject to your concurrence, under the higher command of the United States Forces.

As it is desirable that the bulk of our Force be composed of battle experienced troops, the division to form the Canadian Force is to be selected and designated by the Army Commander Overseas.

On this basis planning is proceeding on the assumption that the Force will probably not be ready to take part in active operations until six months after the termination of hostilities against Germany, unless developments are such as will enable the Force to be released from the European Theatre prior to that time. Of necessity, personnel selected will be brought back to Canada, granted one month's leave and then refitted and reorganized for Pacific operations.

Although, as I have indicated, the date on which the Force can be released from Europe is uncertain, nevertheless, for planning purposes, it is necessary that we should know:

(a) Whether the participation of the Canadian Army in the Central Pacific under the higher command of the United States Forces is acceptable to the War Department.

(b) In broad outline the probable employment of the Force and, so far as possible, its strength, composition, and organization, so that plans for the selection of the major units concerned can now be put in hand.

I would welcome the opportunity of discussing these matters further, either with yourself or your staff, at any time which may be convenient to you.

I will be out of town until Wednesday afternoon, 13 December, but will be available at any time thereafter.

With kindest personal regards,

Yours sincerely,

H. F. G. LETSON

AIR; PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN OCCUPATION; JAPANESE WAR

19. THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF reviewed the Air Force proposals.

These now involved the employment of a total of thirty-three squadrons, eleven for Europe, twenty-two for the Far East. In addition, there would be required in Canada from six to fifteen, depending on the extent to which patrolling and escort work would be required in Western Air Command.

The R.C.A.F. in the Pacific would be employed with the R.A.F., which would eliminate the necessity of re-equipping with U.S. equipment, apart from transport aircraft.

20. AIR MARSHAL LECKIE felt it necessary to recommend, in addition, the provision of an aerodrome construction unit of some 6,000 men to meet the anticipated requirements of the probable theatre of operations. In earlier discussions, it had been thought that such a unit might be provided by the Army.

21. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that Air Force participation of eleven squadrons for European occupation and twenty-two squadrons for operations against Japan be approved, and that decision with respect to the provision of an aerodrome construction unit be deferred.

My dear General Letson,

With reference to your letter to General Marshall, dated 9 December 1944 concerning Canadian Army participation in the war against Japan, the Joint Chiefs of Staff accept the proposal that a Canadian Army Force of one division with such ancillary troops as may be required will participate in the war against Japan under the higher command of United States forces, with the understanding that this force will be available for use in any of the operations mounted in the Pacific.

The desirability of advancing planning measures for this project is recognized. However, present uncertainty as to the date the Canadian troops can be made ready for operations precludes decision at this time as to their exact employment.

Ottawa, December 27, 1944

Dear Mr. Holmes,

With reference to your letter of 20 December,† I would advise that the War Committee have now reviewed the considerations regarding the maintenance and repair of the fleet to be sent to the Central Pacific which, in the first instance, were brought to our attention by Sir Patrick Duff in his letter of the 8th November last.

As regards the repair yards on the West Coast, I would point out that, for the most part, these facilities are controlled by private firms and that consequently the question of keeping them fully manned is, primarily, not a naval one. There will, however, be no difficulty in the way of keeping them in full operation during the period in question and available for ships of the Royal Navy as well as to those of the Royal Canadian Navy. I would add, in this connection, that questions of relative priority of R.N. as compared with R.C.N. and merchant shipping repair work would have to be determined in each case by arrangement between Naval Service Headquarters and the Admiralty.

The Admiralty's suggestion that Canada might contribute some 420 special repair ratings to assist in the manning of two of the repair ships of the Fleet train now being built in the United States, raises a question which does not admit of easy solution. The allocation of these men for the purpose in question could only be made at the expense either of the combatant fleet or of other essential repair commitments. Moreover, in view of differences in rates of pay, scales of victualling, disciplinary regulations and usages in the two Services our Naval authorities feel that this proposed mixing of crews is not in the best interests either of efficiency or morale and, in consequence, should be avoided. Rather does it appear that a more acceptable alternative might be for the Royal Canadian Navy to accede to the Admiralty's earlier request that they man two escort maintenance vessels for duty with the Pacific Fleet, provided that this can be done within the limits of the approved programme for our naval participation in the Pacific war. I understand that this aspect of the matter is being discussed direct between Naval Service Headquarters and the Admiralty.

Yours sincerely,

Ottawa, January 8, 1945

Sir William Glasgow<sup>178</sup> called this morning as he had been instructed by his Government to take up the matter of the Japanese Canadians whom the Australian authorities have been hoping to obtain for Psychological Warfare purposes. We have had a good deal of correspondence with Mr. Davis<sup>179</sup> on this matter.

As a result of an investigation by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police three Japanese Canadians were found in British Columbia who appeared to be suitable for the purposes required by Australia, that is to act as announcers or monitors. The men were willing to go until it was drawn to their attention that no actual guarantee of re-entry could be given to them. They then informed the Royal Canadian Mounted Police representative that they were not prepared to accept the offer. It was not known finally whether the men were suitable as they had not yet been examined in the Japanese language. We felt, however, that this would not usefully be done until all other questions were cleared up.

Sir William informed me that the experiments conducted in Psychological Warfare directed against Japan from Australia had been highly satisfactory and the Australian authorities regarded it as a matter of urgency to obtain one or two Japanese Canadians for these purposes.

I explained to Sir William that under the existing law the men would be permitted to leave the country for this purpose and would equally be permitted to return. It was, however, theoretically possible though not probable that they could be refused re-entry. The Australian authorities, I gather, would be reluctant to accept the men on these conditions and the men themselves are not willing to go without an assurance.

I told Sir William that I would bring this matter to your attention especially as he urged the importance of the matter.

EMPLOYMENT OF JAPANESE-CANADIANS FOR SPECIAL DUTY IN AUSTRALIA

14. THE SECRETARY, referring to the decision taken at the meeting of October 11th last, reported that, as a result of investigation, three Japanese-Canadians had been found whom the Australian government wished to employ for special duty in connection with psychological warfare. A barrier to their so doing, however, was the unwillingness of such personnel to accept this employment unless the government guaranteed their re-entry into Canada after the war.

An explanatory note had been circulated.

(Secretary's note, Jan. 16, 1945—C.W.C. document 921.)

15. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS explained the position.

It would clearly be impossible to include, in any postwar deportations to Japan, any Canadians of Japanese race who accepted war employment under the Australian government. On the other hand, under the decision of October 11th, it was not possible to give any guarantee for their re-entry into Canada without which they were unwilling to accept this employment. The Australian government were very anxious to obtain their services.

16. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE felt that the original Army recommendation, namely, that such persons be taken into the Canadian Army and then loaned to Australia, offered the best solution. If this procedure were adopted, there need be no publicity involved and it could be arranged that personnel so enlisted serve without uniform. Such men were capable of making a valuable contribution to the war.

17. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that suitable Canadians of Japanese race, to a maximum, for the present, of one hundred, might be accepted for enlistment in the Canadian Army and for subsequent loan to the Australian government for special duty.

It was also agreed that no publicity should be given to this decision and that the Minister of National Defence would consult the Minister of Veterans Affairs before action was taken.

R.C.A.F.; EMPLOYMENT OF OPERATIONAL
SQUADRONS OVERSEAS

22. THE PRIME MINISTER pointed out that government policy as to the areas in which Canadian forces should be employed against Japan had been clearly established immediately prior to and following the last Quebec Conference. Nevertheless, certain R.C.A.F. squadrons were apparently serving in India or South-east Asia and a recent newspaper report indicated that Air Marshal Breadner was proceeding to India.

In the circumstances, the Secretary had been directed to obtain a complete statement of the areas in which all overseas R.C.A.F. squadrons were now operating.

23. THE SECRETARY reported that Acting Chief of the Air Staff had provided the report requested by the Prime Minister.

This report indicated a grand total of 45 overseas operational squadrons, located as follows:

- 24 in the United Kingdom,
- 17 in Holland, Belgium and France,
- 2 in India (medium range transport),
- 1 in Iceland, and,
- 1 in Italy.

There had also been a general reconnaissance squadron in Ceylon but this had ceased operations on December 4th last.

(Memorandum, Acting Chief of the Air Staff to the Acting Minister, Jan. 16, 1945, Appendices A, B, C, D.)†

24. THE ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that, on enquiry, it had been ascertained that the two transport squadrons in India had been authorized for employment there in July, 1944. On September 29th, the Air Officer Commanding in Chief Overseas had been informed by the Minister of the government's decision as to areas of operations but, upon word that withdrawal of these squadrons would prove embarrassing at that time, their return had been deferred.

It was also stated by the Air Staff that these two squadrons were designed as a link in lines of communication to support the authorized Canadian force which would operate against Japan upon the termination of European hostilities.

(Memorandum, Acting Chief of the Air Staff to the Acting Minister, Appendices D and F.)†

25. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE expressed the view that the Air Officer Commanding in Chief, R.C.A.F. Overseas, should report to the Chief of the Air Staff of whom he was independent under existing arrangements. The position of this officer should be regularized and brought within the normal channel of responsibility.

In this connection, the recently approved instructions of the Joint Staff Mission had been carefully drawn to define the joint relationship of the Mission to Ottawa.

26. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted the reports of the Secretary and Acting Minister of National Defence for Air, and agreed that the Acting Minister should forthwith pursue actively the matter of the return of R.C.A.F. squadrons from India and amendment of formal relations of the Air Officer Commanding in Chief Overseas to the Chief of the Air Staff and the government.

AIR; EMPLOYMENT OF R.C.A.F.
 SQUADRONS BASED IN INDIA

26. THE ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the meeting of January 24th, read a reply received from the Chief of the Air Staff who was now in Britain.

Air Marshal Leckie reported that, as matters now stood, it would be impossible for the R.A.F. to relieve these squadrons from their present assignment until the conclusion of the German war. The Air Ministry were aware that the employment of R.C.A.F. squadrons in the India-Burma theatre was contrary to Canadian government policy, but their position was not such as to enable them to effect relief until the conclusion of the war in Europe would make R.A.F. replacements available.

The R.C.A.F. took the view, too, that personnel of the two units in question were acquiring experience which would prove of great value when the time came for the R.C.A.F. to operate with the R.A.F. in the war against Japan.

(Air Force Signal, C.A.S. to the Acting Minister, Jan. 27, 1945).†

27. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the Acting Minister's report and agreed, in the circumstances, to the continued employment of the two R.C.A.F. transport squadrons in the India-Burma theatre, it being understood, however, that the arrangement with the Air Ministry for return of these squadrons on the conclusion of the war in Europe would be strictly adhered to.

NAVY; LOAN BY UNITED KINGDOM OF CARRIERS AND DESTROYERS; JAPANESE WAR

11. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES reported that the Admiralty had offered to transfer on loan to the Royal Canadian Navy two Light Fleet Carriers (Colossus Class) and a Flotilla of eight Crescent Class Fleet Destroyers, all from new construction, for employment with the Canadian naval forces in the Pacific area.

While it was intended that these ships be employed in accordance with the government's established policy as to appropriate theatres of operations for Canadian forces, the Admiralty appreciated that urgent operational requirements or logistic difficulties might necessitate the temporary deployment of any or all of them in an adjacent theatre, i.e., the Indian Ocean, in such event the Admiralty would represent the circumstances to Naval Service Headquarters, and would hope that favourable consideration would be given to such representations.

It was recommended that acceptance of these units on the conditions set out in a memorandum which had been circulated be approved.

(Minister's memorandum Feb. 14, 1945—C.W.C. document 940).†

12. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that the Admiralty's reservation as to possible employment of these vessels in southern waters would be a definite departure from the well defined policy of the government and, as such, should not be accepted.

13. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE raised the question of purchase rather than loan.

From the purely financial point of view, if these units would be required by the Navy after the war, it would be preferable to buy them now. The solution might be to take them on loan now with the understanding that Canada could purchase from the United Kingdom later on should the government desire to do so.

14. THE WAR COMMITTEE after further considerable discussion, agreed that the Admiralty offer to transfer these vessels on loan to the Canadian Navy be accepted, on the understanding that Canada would have the right to buy the carriers at a later date should she so desire and on condition that their employment be restricted to the Central and North Pacific areas in accordance with previously decided government policy.

Ottawa, February 15, 1945

Attention Major-General R. B. Gibson

The decision of the Cabinet War Committee on January 7th<sup>180</sup> that a maximum of one hundred Canadian nationals of Japanese race might be accepted for enlistment in the Canadian Army raises a number of questions with which this department has been concerned. I understand that they have already been discussed with you by Mr. Glazebrook.

During the past year or two requests have been received from other Commonwealth Governments for Japanese-Canadians qualified to undertake particular tasks connected with the war. The request which gave rise to the decision of the War Committee was from the Australian Government for two or three men suited to act as monitors in connection with the Allied Political Warfare Committee in Australia, on which Committee Canada is represented. Persons apparently qualified for such work had been located and interviewed by an officer of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police. A further test in language was necessary before a final choice was made, but efforts to get these men for the Australian Government were abandoned when it was thought that no assurance could be given them about their eventual re-admission to Canada.

Under the authority of the War Committee decision such persons can now be enlisted in the Canadian Army. In view of the urgency of the Australian request it would be desirable that such persons when finally selected should be sent to Australia with the least possible delay. We should be glad to take up with the Acting Australian High Commissioner possible arrangements for transportation. Unless some arrangement could be made for escorting these men, it might be desirable, if you are willing, that they should go in civilian dress. Since it is also desired that they retain their status as Canadian soldiers while in Australia, I should be glad to have your views as to the form of attachment which would be most feasible. Their work, of course, will be of a non-military character and when it was proposed to send them as civilians the Australian Government was prepared to pay salaries and expenses. Under the present situation I presume that some different type of arrangement will be necessary.

You are aware, I think, of another request from the Australian authorities, transmitted through the Canadian Military Attaché, Colonel Cosgrave, for some fifty Japanese-Canadians for the Australian Armed Forces as translators and interpreters. The War Committee decided against this request on July 5th, 1944, but I presume it could now be met under the authority of the recent decision. I take it that this aspect of the situation is one which concerns your department.

In fact, the date was January 17. See Document 417.

In view of the circumstances under which the question of Japanese-Canadians being enlisted into the Canadian Army and loaned for special purposes came up in connection with the first Australian request mentioned above the decision of the War Committee was to the effect that such persons might be accepted for enlistment and for subsequent loan to the Australian Government for special duty. There is, however, a related case which might properly come under this decision. As you know, permission was given to British Security Co-ordination to secure a maximum of thirty-five Japanese-Canadians for loan to the British Army and for subsequent use in Psychological Warfare in South East Asia. The actual sending of this group was delayed in view of the difficulty of establishing the status of the men in relation to their return to Canada. It would, I think, be desirable and proper that they should be enlisted in the Canadian Army and immediately thereafter to the War Office. I understand that the War Office is prepared to provide for their basic military training at the same time as for training for their special work. This again is a matter of some urgency and it is desired by the United Kingdom authorities that the group in question should be transported at the earliest possible date. To avoid difficulties which might arise if the men were sent in a troop ship, prior to any military training here, efforts are being made to see whether air transport could be provided for the fourteen men now ready.

I should, therefore, be glad to have your views on whether the Department of National defence is prepared to proceed with meeting the above requests under the authority granted by the War Committee on January 17th, and secondly your recommendations on the specific questions raised, particularly in relation to the first and third groups. I might say on the first point that I regard the War Committee's decision as settling a question of policy, viz. that of accepting for enlistment in the Canadian Army suitable Canadians of Japanese race whose services are required for the war effort of other Commonwealth Governments. Within the limit of 100 men set by the War Committee I think you can proceed to meet Australian, United Kingdom or Indian Government requests to the extent that suitable men are available.

NAVY; PROVISION OF VESSELS FOR THE PACIFIC WAR

3. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to the decision at the previous meeting, said that he had asked the Minister of National Defence for Naval Services to review the nature of the proposed Naval participation in the war against Japan and to indicate the effect of accepting on loan from the Admiralty the two light fleet carriers and eight fleet destroyers which had been offered.

In this connection it was particularly important for the government to know what disposition would be made of other R.C.N. destroyers now in commission or under construction.

4. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES submitted a report upon the position regarding R.C.N. units.

Taking into account one that would come into commission next May, the Canadian Navy had now 15 destroyers. Of these, nine were of the River class, all of which were old; the newest had been built in 1935; all had had five years war service. This type of craft was not altogether suitable for service in the Pacific owing to limited endurance and lack of anti-aircraft equipment. Moreover, due to age, maintenance would be a heavy item. All these had been obtained from the Admiralty.

Of the remaining six destroyers, two were of the "V" class, fairly modern (four to six years old), and were quite suitable for use in the Pacific. These had been obtained from the Admiralty without cost to Canada.

The remainder of our destroyer strength consisted of four Tribals. These were good ships and carried heavy armament. They were, however, deficient in endurance and were not well suited for service with a task force of the kind contemplated.

Canadian cruisers and light fleet carriers would need not less than a flotilla of eight destroyers for efficient work to form an effective screen for the larger vessels.

5. MR. MACDONALD said that the destroyers to be obtained on loan from the Admiralty (of the Crescent class) would be in substitution for older vessels now in commission.

When the new vessels had been taken over, the destroyers now in commission would be continued in use in the Atlantic or for training, or be laid up, as circumstances indicated to be desirable.

Acceptance of these destroyers from the United Kingdom would not in any way involve an increase of the strength of 13,412 men at sea in the Pacific; the total number contained in the approved Naval programme.

It seemed far more satisfactory in every way that the Canadian Naval force operating with the Royal Navy in the Pacific be equipped with these new destroyers, rather than frigates or the destroyers presently in commission.

6. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted with approval the Minister's report and confirmed the decision taken at the meeting of February 14th for acceptance of carriers and destroyers for service in the Pacific.

ENLISTMENT OF JAPANESE CANADIANS

Reference your letter of February 15, 1945, on the question of enlistment into the Canadian Army of Canadian personnel of Japanese racial origin.

I would advise you in the first place that all arrangements are now in hand for the enlistment and despatch to the United Kingdom of the personnel to be loaned to British Security Coordination for special duties in South-East Asia. It is anticipated that 14 of such men who have now been selected will be despatched under escort of an officer by troopship sailing early in March and as other suitable personnel up to a total of 35 are selected, action will be taken to enlist them into the Canadian Army and despatch them to the United Kingdom.

As a result of further discussions with Mr. Glazebrook of your Department, it has now been arranged that the three men selected for duty with the Allied Political Warfare Committee will be enlisted into the Canadian Army in Vancouver where, I understand, the men are now located. Full particulars concerning these men should therefore be furnished to this Department so that arrangements can be completed for their enlistment into the Army.

Insofar as their despatch to Australia is concerned, it is considered that the Australian authorities should assume this responsibility, including escort if they go in uniform, and it is requested that you initiate action in this regard. Should it prove impossible for the Australian authorities to effect suitable arrangements, then the Canadian Army will arrange for the despatch of these men but they will be sent to the United Kingdom in uniform in a normal troop movement and there handed over to the Australian authorities in London for subsequent despatch to Australia.

For the purposes of Army administration, it is necessary that some Australian military authority be appointed to whom these men will be attached. It has therefore been decided to attach them to the Directorate of Military Intelligence, Australia, by whom they may be seconded to perform any necessary duties either in a civilian or a military capacity. I would ask that this arrangement be cleared with the Australian authorities.

Finally, the three men for Australia will hold the rank of private and will be paid accordingly by the Canadian Army. The nature of the duties they are called upon to perform in Australia may warrant higher pay, but as it will be difficult to arrange for their military promotion, particularly as their employment may be civilian rather than military, it is suggested that Australia should undertake to augment their rate of pay to the extent deemed appropriate. It is requested that this arrangement also be taken up with the Australian authorities for their concurrence.

The remaining request for the loan of Canadian Nisei concerns 50 men to serve as translators and interpreters with the Australian Military Forces. Appropriate action is being taken by the Army to secure and enlist suitable personnel.

I agree with the interpretation which you have placed on War Cabinet Committee's decision as expressed in the penultimate sentence of the last paragraph of your letter.

R.C.A.F.; PARTICIPATION IN WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. THE ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to discussions of this question following the Quebec Conference, pointed out that, at the meeting of December 11th, 1944, it had been agreed that twenty-two R.C.A.F. squadrons should be employed in the Pacific against Japan.

At that time, plans had been based on the understanding that the United States would make operational airfields in the Pacific theatre available to the R.A.F., with which these R.C.A.F. squadrons would be serving. It had now been ascertained, however, that the United States would not be in a position to do this and, as a consequence, it would be necessary for the British force to provide construction and other services for their own squadrons.

This changed situation immediately raised the important question whether the R.C.A.F. contingent should be expanded to include supply, construction and ancillary units which would permit of their organization as a fully integrated and independent group within the British force, or whether plans should be revised so as to reduce the number of R.C.A.F. squadrons and provide the necessary services within the total numbers of R.C.A.F. personnel earlier contemplated.

In order to provide twenty-two R.C.A.F. squadrons with adequate construction, supply and ancillary services, it was estimated that a total strength of 40,000 men would be needed. Previously it had been estimated that the total R.C.A.F. contribution (in Europe and the Pacific—thirty-three squadrons) would call for total personnel of some 23,000.

In the circumstances, the War Committee's direction was required as to the basis upon which R.C.A.F. planning should proceed.

2. THE CHIEF OF THE AIR STAFF described present plans for the operation of British heavy bomber squadrons in the Central Pacific.

It had been contemplated that the twenty-two R.C.A.F. squadrons would comprise one-third of the total British force employed in that theatre, and, following earlier discussions in the War Committee, R.C.A.F. plans had been proceeding on that basis.

The difficulty concerning airfield construction to which the Minister had referred had, however, materially altered the situation and, in the new circumstances, it had been suggested that Canada undertake to provide construction and supply units. In this connection, it was to be noted that, from the point of view of developing a fully integrated Canadian force, it was desirable that R.C.A.F. squadrons provide their own services and not depend upon the R.A.F. It would be difficult to achieve this objective below the level of one of the three planned groups, but to do this, it would be necessary to increase R.C.A.F. manpower commitments for the Pacific to approximately 40,000 men.

3. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the extent of R.C.A.F. participation in the war against Japan should not exceed, in terms of manpower, the numbers contemplated at the time the War Committee approved the overseas employment of a total of thirty-three R.C.A.F. squadrons (in European occupation and in the Japanese war) namely, some 23,000 men, and that the Air Staff re-examine the position in the light of the new circumstances, with a view to the preparation and submission of plans, on this basis, for an appropriate Canadian contingent to the Pacific.

NAVY; REPAIR FACILITIES FOR ROYAL NAVY FOR PACIFIC OPERATIONS

24. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES, referring to consideration of earlier proposals from the Admiralty on this subject at the meeting of December 11th last, reported that the U.K. High Commissioner had made a recent further request for provision by Canada of a substantial number of special ship repair ratings and ship's complements for service with the British Pacific Fleet.

While this request was being reported to the War Committee, it was not the intention to make any proposals in this regard at the present time.

25. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted the Minister's report.

MILITARY PARTICIPATION IN THE PACIFIC WAR;
JOINT RE-EXAMINATION OF SERVICE PROGRAMMES

26. THE ACTING MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported that Air Marshal Lloyd, who had been designated to command the British Air forces which were to operate in the Central Pacific against Japan, had visited Ottawa following discussions in Washington with the U.S. Army Air Corps.

Air Marshal Lloyd had ascertained that the British forces would have to provide all of their own supplies and services. It was planned that they would operate in the first instance from Luzon, though there was a possibility that they might be able to share some airdromes with U.S. Forces. He had enquired if it would be possible for the R.C.A.F. to provide construction and supply units even at the expense of a reduction in the number of Canadian operational squadrons.

27. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE felt that this further information as to the unsettled nature of plans for the British bomber force emphasized the importance, in the national interest, of making every effort to bring about some measure of integration in the Pacific programmes of the three Canadian Services. In the circumstance, the Navy were bound to operate with the Royal Navy, but the operations proposed for the Army and the Air Force might be re-examined to advantage with this object in mind.

It was, therefore, suggested that the War Committee direct the Chiefs of Staff to enquire into this matter and to submit recommendations. It might prove that, as a result of this enquiry, instead of the Army providing one division to serve entirely under U.S. operational command, it would be possible to provide Army units capable of building airfields for the Canadian squadrons and of undertaking their local defence. Such a change of role might adversely affect the morale of Army personnel involved, but this difficulty was capable of solution.

Looking beyond the proposed establishment of an Air force in the Philippines, it was possible that an operation such as the seizing of an island from the Japanese might be feasible for a Canadian force. No increase in the overall Canadian commitment was contemplated but the situation was one which deserved careful review with the above considerations in mind.

28. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the Chiefs of Staff be directed to review the matter of the employment of Canadian Naval, Military and Air Forces in the Pacific theatre of operations, and to submit recommendations as to how the approved contribution of each Service could best be employed, having in mind the desirability, in the national interest, of making provision for close association between the several Canadian forces in operations to be undertaken in the Pacific theatre.

Ottawa, March 17, 1945

In the last paragraph of my note on my recent visit to Washington,† I guardedly referred to the fact that in conversation with a United States friend it was made clear to me that his country would be glad if the co-operation of the R.C.A.F. with the United States Army Air Corps in the Pacific War could in some way be arranged.

In thinking the matter over it has occurred to me that I might now usefully elaborate the point.

Throughout the course of the war, it has been abundantly clear that, from the aspect of defence, the United States have a special interest in Canada. Two years ago the remark was made to me by an officer of the State Department that no matter what the views of the United States or Canadian Military might be, he proposed to press that as a North American Nation, Canada should be invited to play a part in the task of ejecting the Japanese from the Aleutians. In line with this thought my United States friends, both military and civil, always take the ground that in respect of North American defence we are members of the same team. So much is this so that I have repeatedly noticed that they seem almost to resent our Commonwealth connections generally, and our connection with the United Kingdom in particular.

I believe that our suggestion last Autumn that a Canadian division might be associated with the United States Army in the invasion of Japan was very welcome to them, and that had it not been made, ways and means of intimating to us the desirability of such a course of action would have been found.

The idea that the R.C.A.F. might also associate itself with the United States Army Air Corps is another instance of this special interest. It seems to have originated entirely from the United States side, and I understand that the question has already been mooted to our officials by the United States Ambassador to Canada. It was said to me that while it could not be said officially, we could take it that any possible reluctance on our part because of difficulties in the way of using United States equipment could be composed.

Presumably word of this will come from National Defence for Air in due course.

PERSONAL AND TOP SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: You will remember that at Quebec last September I drew attention to the vital importance that we attach to having a share in the main operations against Japan. The President accepted the offer of the British Fleet and agreed to the participation of British Air Forces in the bombing of Japan.

2. For reasons which your staff will be able to explain to you fully it is most desirable that the British and Canadian bomber force should be self-contained and not dependent on the Americans for the construction of airfields and the provision of other facilities. There has been some difficulty in finding a satisfactory base for a self-contained force, but the American Air Force staff are now prepared to offer a suitable area in the valley of the Cagayan in northern Luzon. We are very anxious to accept and the Chiefs of Staff are approaching the United States Chiefs of Staff at once in an attempt to close with the offer.

3. I am sure that you share my view that our Air Force must have an important share in the main operations against Japan and I hope that you will give your blessing to the efforts which we are making to ensure that our joint contribution should be prompt and effective. Ends.

PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR; RE-EXAMINATION OF SERVICE PROGRAMMES; CHIEFS OF STAFF REPORT

17. THE SECRETARY, referring to the discussion at the meeting of March 7th, submitted a report of the Chiefs of Staff consequent upon their re-examination of Navy, Army and Air Force plans for the Japanese war, with particular reference to the question of providing a separate self-contained force of all arms.

The report, after reviewing the factors involved, concluded that, on the scale of participation presently planned, only tasks of minor importance would be allotted to a composite force, and that, without a greatly increased commitment on the part of all three Services, participation on a self-contained basis should not be considered.

It was, therefore, recommended that the approved contribution of the Navy and the Army should be with the Royal Navy and the U.S. Army respectively, as planned, and that the R.C.A.F. be employed with the R.A.F. R.C.A.F. participation would be to the best advantage in the form of a Canadian self-contained group, but this would require an increase in manpower of some 20,000 over the present authorized figure; the alternative would be to make R.C.A.F. units (to include 13,000 personnel) available to the Air Ministry to be used in whatever capacity they would best assist the R.A.F.

Copies of the report had been circulated.

(Memorandum, Chiefs of Staff Committee to the War Committee, March 20, 1945—C.W.C. document 960).†

18. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR said that the situation with respect to Air Force plans had now altered.

A message from Air Marshal Breadner† had indicated that the whole question of R.A.F. participation in the Pacific was under review. In these circumstances it was desirable to await further developments before any decision were taken.

In connection with future Canadian operations, authorization for an exploratory tour of public relations officers to the Pacific theatre had been requested. In view of the uncertainty as to the area in which the R.C.A.F. would be engaged, it seemed doubtful if anything would be gained by such a visit.

19. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE said that he had recently authorized Army Public Relations (Lieutenant-Colonel Malone) to make a trip of this nature. The matter might be discussed by the Chiefs of Staff with a view to co-ordinating the publicity enquiries for the three Services.

20. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, approved the recommendations of the Chiefs of Staff in so far as they applied to Navy and Army, and deferred decision on the question of the form of Air Force participation.

PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR;
PARLIAMENTARY STATEMENT

21. THE SECRETARY reported that the Prime Minister proposed to make a short statement in Parliament, in the near future, on the government's intentions as to Canadian participation in the war against Japan.

The statement would inform the House that there would be no conscription for service in the Pacific, that Naval and Air Force units to be despatched to that theatre would be constituted on a voluntary basis, and that the Army contingent would be made up of volunteers, plus short service G.S.<sup>181</sup> personnel; no difficulty was anticipated in obtaining the numbers of personnel required for any of the three Services.

The Prime Minister had also mentioned the matter of prior consultation with U.K. and U.S. authorities regarding certain features of the announcement.

A draft of the proposed statement was submitted for consideration.

22. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the Ministers of National Defence consider the draft statement submitted and communicate their suggestions for any revisions therein to the Secretary, with a view to the preparation of a final version to be made by the Prime Minister in the House of Commons in the near future.

You asked me to draft something as the basis for an interim reply to Mr. Churchill to his telegram concerning R.C.A.F. co-operation in the proposal for a combined bomber force to operate from the Philippines.

Pope has discussed the matter with Leckie who says that Breadner now informs him that substantial changes in the overall R.A.F. plan are now under consideration.

Briefly, the R.A.F. are considering a force to consist of a headquarters and two groups (previously, you will remember, they had been planning for three groups) as a self-contained contingent complete with construction units, protection and the rest.

The R.C.A.F. were originally asked to provide approximately one-third of the force, or one group plus. Apparently the R.A.F. now propose that the R.C.A.F. should still provide the one group plus, or approximately one-half of the total force. Breadner is taking the stand that Canada will require to re-examine the whole position and that the matter is one for settlement at the government level.

As you know, Pope has very serious reservations about the whole proposal. Northern Luzon is some 1,600 miles from Tokyo; the assembling of a force and the construction of the airfields will take time, and the sands seem to be running out against Japan with considerable rapidity. In the circumstances, Pope suggests an interim reply to Mr. Churchill along the lines of the draft attached.<sup>182</sup> I have spoken to Robertson and he and I agree, and feel that it

PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR

4. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to recent discussions in the War Committee, said that it was proposed that he make a general statement upon Canadian participation in the war against Japan at the opening of the debate upon the War Appropriation. The Ministers of National Defence would then explain Service programmes in detail.

As to the general policy it should be borne in mind that the form and extent of Canadian participation could not now be determined finally. Plans required to be worked out in co-operation with U.K. and U.S. authorities without disclosure to the enemy; they could only be definitive after the end of European hostilities. Shipping limitations were another factor which made delay inevitable. As to the Navy, its participation had been pretty well settled, but the Air Force's and the Army's plans were far from complete.

In these circumstances it was not intended to mention numbers or units involved and decisions would have to be taken later on on the basis of need.

Some time ago the Cabinet had been in agreement that there would be no conscription for the Japanese war and that Canadian contingents should be formed from personnel who elected to serve in the Pacific.

5. THE CABINET, after considerable discussion, agreed that the Prime Minister's statement should describe anticipated employment of Canadian forces in general terms only and without reference to numbers involved, and that final decisions would have to be taken by the next Parliament.<sup>183</sup>

It was also agreed that the government would not undertake any commitment, the implementing of which would require conscription. The contingents to be sent to the Pacific would be formed from personnel of the three Services who volunteered especially for such services; it was appreciated that this decision meant that the form and extent of Canadian participation would necessarily remain indefinite for the present.

You will recall having replied to Mr. Churchill's request for your co-operation in the matter of making the proposed British and Canadian bomber force for the Pacific fully self-contained, that you were concerned to ensure that we did not find ourselves involved, on somewhat scanty premises, in a disproportionate commitment. You added that particularly was this so since the practical utility of some of the proposals which had been made seemed open to question as respects considerations of both time and space.

The present proposal, so far as we know it here, is that the combined R.A.F.-R.C.A.F. force should establish itself in Northern Luzon, in the Philippines, to the end that it might participate in the bombing of Japan.

It is a commonplace to say that the Pacific is an ocean of vast distances. The distance from Luzon to the most southerly of the main islands constituting Japan (Kyushu) is approximately 1,000 miles. From Luzon to Tokyo measures over 1,500 miles. This latter distance is, I believe, beyond the effective range of our equipment, and consequently it is planned that our aircraft should stop en route to refuel at some intermediate point held by the United States forces.

The United States Air Force is now bombing Japan from Saipan, the distance to Tokyo from which is 1,400 miles. For this purpose they are using their Super-Fortress Aircraft, which have a far greater range of action than anything we are likely to have.

The United States, however, have recently taken Iwo Jima in the Volcano Islands. It is 750 miles from Tokyo. They are now attacking Okinawa, in the Ryukyus, which is still closer to Japan. Unquestionably the bombing of Japan can far more effectively be carried out from these two points than it can from Luzon. Moreover, as the United States also plan to provide themselves with an additional base on the east coast of China, again within reasonable bombing distance of Japan, it is difficult to avoid the thought that the proposed British-Canadian bombing effort from far-off Luzon may perhaps show up rather poorly.

Nor should the element of time be disregarded. The United States are fully up to, or ahead of, their programme, and the general strategic picture of the Pacific is constantly changing. It will be a matter of some months before the combined R.A.F.-R.C.A.F. force can be made ready, and the base, with its airfields, fully established. What the picture will be by then cannot be foretold with assurance. It seems likely, however, that it will not be such as to favour the Luzon proposal.

In addition to all this, the possibility at some future date of Japan being bombed from the Russian Maritime Province should not be lost to view. The distance between Vladivostock and Tokyo is a little over 600 miles.

This very brief examination, I suggest, indicates that before entering on any definite commitment the Government would do well to seek firmer premises than have yet been given, and to require that the practical utility of the proposal be convincingly sustained.

Another thought has occurred to me, I hope not unworthily. As you are aware, we may fairly shortly expect to hear of a British-Australian invasion of North Borneo. This might, in due course, lead to the occupation of Sarawak, which is not very far (500 miles or so) from Singapore. Should we undertake the Luzon commitment, we might later be asked to agree to a change of objective, namely, Singapore, which exercises a powerful attraction on the British mind.

I need hardly say that all this is but a personal view.

I attach a map on which the places named herein have been clearly marked.†

NAVY; AIRCRAFT CARRIERS; PACIFIC SERVICE

14. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES referred to discussions proceeding with the Admiralty with respect to the two aircraft carriers which U.K. authorities hoped to be able to make available to the Canadian Navy.

It now appeared that the transfer of these vessels could be made in due course. The question arose, therefore, whether Canadian personnel now serving should be posted to these ships to "infiltrate" British crews, or whether, in view of government policy regarding service against Japan, it would be necessary to have them re-volunteer for the Pacific.

15. THE PRIME MINISTER said that government policy in this respect was now settled and no commitments in respect of manning Canadian vessels should be undertaken beyond the number that could be provided for thereunder, that is by volunteers.

16. THE WAR COMMITTEE noted, with approval, the Prime Minister's observations, it being understood that acceptance of the carriers in question would be determined by the numbers of Navy personnel who would be available for service in the Pacific under the voluntary system and that the position would be examined from this viewpoint.

ARMY; PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR; ORGANIZATION

3. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE submitted a copy of a letter proposed to be delivered by the Commander, Canadian Army Staff, Washington, to the U.S. Deputy Chief of Staff, seeking further information regarding certain phases of the operation proposed for Army participation against Japan, and suggesting that Canadian staff officers co-operate with U.S. officers in Washington in working out appropriate plans.

It was proposed that the Canadian force be an armoured division with necessary ancillary troops, a substantial proportion of whom would have had combat experience in Europe. Information was sought with regard to the probable time of operation and training, type of equipment, organization and supply, and similar matters.

This action was within the scope of settled government policy, the Cabinet having approved the employment of an Army contingent involving 30,000 personnel.

An explanatory memorandum had been circulated.

(National Defence memorandum, April 10, 1945, and attached appendices—C.W.C. document 972).†

4. THE COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the action contemplated was consistent with approved government policy and approved despatch of a communication along the lines indicated.

AIR FORCE; PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR; U.K. PROPOSALS

5. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the War Committee meeting of March 29th, reported that word had now been received from the Air Officer Commanding in Chief, R.C.A.F. Overseas, that the U.K. government would shortly put forward specific proposals for employment of R.C.A.F. squadrons in a British bomber force to operate from Northern Luzon.

These proposals would specify ten very long range bomber squadrons and three very long [range?] transport squadrons—a total of thirteen—and, in addition, aerodrome construction personnel to the number of 10,000—a total, with reserve, of 28,400 men. Added to the eleven squadrons for occupation duty in Europe, they would involve a total Air Force commitment for Phase II of 36,400 personnel.

This would not provide for normal Canadian ancillary units, such as base pay and records office, repair and equipment depots, maintenance groups, or a field hospital.

Air Vice Marshal Johnson's message had indicated that U.K. authorities contemplated that the advance portion of the aerodrome construction units might sail from England on May 1st, or from Canada on May 15th.

The Air Staff had reported that it would not be possible for the R.C.A.F. to provide the trained construction personnel required within the time available.

An explanatory memorandum including an estimate of the financial commitment involved—a total of $322,400,000, capital and maintenance—had been circulated.

(Air Force message C244, R.C.A.F. H.Q. Overseas to H.Q., Ottawa, April 14; memorandum, Minister of National Defence for Air to War Committee, and attached memorandum, April 17, 1945 - C.W.C. document 979).†

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE said that the Army were not in a position to supply troops for aerodrome construction purposes in the Far East.

7. THE COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that proposals of the character described in Air Vice Marshal Johnson's message should not be entertained by the government until full and satisfactory information had been provided by the strategic authorities establishing the practical utility of the operations contemplated, particularly in relation to considerations of time and space;

(b) that no sufficient reason had been advanced for considering an increase in the agreed commitment for Air Force participation in the Pacific war;

(c) that, in any event, Canadian aerodrome construction units could not be supplied; and

(d) that Air Vice Marshal Johnson be directed to communicate these views to U.K. authorities, pointing out that more detailed information would be required concerning the nature of the operations contemplated and their military utility in relation to the general strategic plan for the defeat of Japan, before any decision could be reached by the government on the subject of Canadian participation.

RE: ENLISTMENT IN ARMY OF CANADIAN-BORN JAPANESE AND LOAN TO AUSTRALIA, WAR OFFICE OR TO U.S. WAR DEPARTMENT

1. Purpose

(a) To increase to a maximum of 250 the existing authority to enlist in the Canadian Army, Canadian-born citizens of Japanese racial origin (Nisei).

(b) To loan such personnel, when enlisted, to the Australian Military Authorities, to the War Office or to the U.S. War Department, as the necessity may arise.

(c) The existing authority to enlist 100 Canadian-born Japanese for subsequent loan for special duty was granted by the War Committee of the Cabinet on 17 January, 1945. Against this authority a total of 88 have been enlisted to date and either assigned to service or are undergoing training.

2. Considerations

(a) Canadian-born Japanese form a potential pool of considerable value for use as interpreters and translators and in other spheres of operational activity.

(b) To date, urgent requests for the services of upwards of 420 Canadian-born men of Japanese origin (Nisei) have been received from the Australian Government and from the War Office. In addition, Canadian requirements with the Pacific Force are estimated to be 20.

(c) The existing authority for the enlistment of 100 does not permit an adequate contribution to existing requirements. On the other hand, it is not considered that there are sufficient Canadian-born men of Japanese origin suitable to meet the total requirement. It is considered, however, that a total of 250 could be obtained.

(d) The Australian Government reports great difficulty in securing personnel capable of reading and speaking Japanese. Information of vital operational importance is to be obtained from the interrogation of Japanese prisoners and inspection of captured Japanese documents.

(e) While the Australian Government has suggested enlistment in the Australian Military Forces, it has been considered more appropriate to enlist this personnel in the Canadian Army and subsequently place them on loan.

3. Costs

(a) Canada to pay all costs of training and outward transportation. After arrival at destination, borrower to pay all costs except pay and allowances which would continue to be borne by Canada. Borrower to pay return transportation.

(b) The estimated cost to Canada on a maximum basis for nine months 1945-46 is $164,730 of which $31,100 is non-recurring. Funds are available in Army estimates.

4. Proposal has been

(a) Recommended by Minister of National Defence.

(b) Recommended by Chief of the General Staff.

(c) Reviewed as to financial aspects and concurred in by Deputy Minister (Army).<sup>184</sup>

ARMED FORCES; DEMOBILIZATION;
PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR

4. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY, observing that labour demands in Canada were, at present, higher than at any time during the war, re-emphasized the necessity for prompt action in demobilizing personnel from the three services if essential reconversion needs were to be met.

On May 1st the Cabinet had agreed that, immediately following V-E Day, the Services should proceed with the acceleration of demobilization to the maximum capacity.

5. THE ADJUTANT GENERAL reported that, during the week ended May 12th, a total of 789 men had been discharged from the Army. Existing instructions concerning discharge were being consolidated, with a view to enlarging groups eligible for discharge.

<sup>184</sup>La note suivante était écrite sur ce memorandum:

Army demobilization at the maximum rate could not proceed without serious results until more definite information were available to personnel as to the character and size of the Pacific force. This was most important in relation to recruiting.

(Memorandum, Adjutant General to the Minister, May 16, 1945).†

6. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR NAVAL SERVICES reported that 605 persons had been discharged from the Navy during April and that this rate had persisted since V-E Day. Instructions, however, had been issued that approximately 2,600 ratings, with high release priority and not volunteers for the Pacific, should be discharged as soon as the necessity for continued Atlantic escort work had been removed.

(Memorandum, Acting Chief of Naval Personnel to Minister, May 16, 1945).†

7. MR. ABBOTT pointed out that lack of specific information as to the government's intentions with respect to participation by the three Services in the Pacific was jeopardizing the recruiting of volunteers for that theatre. In consequence demobilization was also being delayed.

It was essential that, at the earliest possible moment, a statement be issued giving such details as might be consistent with security regarding the size and nature of Canadian Pacific forces including terms of service and special arrangements for pay and leave, and the location and timing of training.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR reported that, since November, 1944, 33,097 Service personnel had been discharged from the Air Force. Of these, 1,784 had been discharged in the week ended May 4th. At present discharges were continuing at approximately the same rate.

Lack of precise information as to the nature of R.C.A.F. participation in the Pacific war remained an obstacle to accelerated demobilization.

(National Defence for Air memorandum, May 15, 1945).†

9. THE COMMITTEE, after further considerable discussion, agreed that it was of the utmost importance and urgency that a statement be issued forthwith as to the nature and extent of participation in the Pacific war by the three Services, and directed the Secretary, in consultation with the Ministers of National Defence and appropriate Service officials, to prepare a draft statement for submission to the Cabinet the following day and, upon approval, for immediate communication to the Prime Minister with a view to its release at the earliest possible moment.

R.C.A.F.; FORM AND EXTENT OF PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR

10. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at a meeting of a special Cabinet Committee on April 19th, reported that the situation with respect to R.A.F. employment in the Pacific was still nebulous; it had proved impossible to procure any definite plan from the U.K. government.

Further tentative proposals were under consideration by the Air Officer Commanding in Chief, R.C.A.F. Overseas, in consultation with the U.K. Air Ministry, and would be submitted at the earliest possible date.

(R.C.A.F. message, A.O.C. in C., Overseas to C.A.S., May 14, 1945).†

11. THE COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the Minister's report.

ARMY; PARTICIPATION IN WAR AGAINST JAPAN

12. THE SECRETARY referred to previous discussions at a meeting of a special Cabinet Committee on April 19th.

The Chief of the General Staff, as a result of recent discussions with the U.S. War Department, now proposed that, as a basis for further planning, the Canadian force should:

(a) consist of an Infantry division, possibly reinforced with armour, with a proportion of service and supporting troops;

(b) be employed as a follow-up unit in the main operation;

(c) use United States Army equipment and maintenance, except for uniforms;

(d) be reorganized along United States Army lines (unless further examination indicates such action will delay employment);

(e) be trained in the United States under the overall supervision of the United States Army Ground Forces;

(f) be supplied as a normal United States Army division and based in accordance with operational plans; and

(g) be returned to North America after cessation of hostilities in a priority consistent with that applied to other forces engaged in the Pacific war.

If United States approval was secured for the above proposals detailed planning would then proceed at the Staff level. The U.S. Joint Chiefs of Staff regarded this as a matter of some urgency, and government approval was now sought subject to the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence.

(Army summary to the Special Committee of the Cabinet, May 16, 1945).†

13. THE CHIEF OF THE GENERAL STAFF explained that the inclusion of an armoured regiment in the field force would give representation to the Armoured Corps and would permit of Canadian armoured support to Canadian infantry formations.

Under the schedule proposed by the United States, personnel for this force would sail from Europe about July 1st and would concentrate for specialized training in the Western United States about September 1st. They would be ready for operational employment by about March 1st of next year.

14. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE enquired as to the estimated financial implications of the proposals—particularly with respect to the use of U.S. equipment and the overall requirement by the Services for U.S. funds.

15. THE COMMITTEE, after further discussion, noted that the proposals submitted by the Chief of the General Staff, were within the scope of approved government policy for Army participation, with respect to manpower, and agreed that an estimate of the financial implications relating to the use of U.S. equipment be submitted to the Cabinet for consideration.

ARMED FORCES; PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR; PUBLIC STATEMENT

1. THE SECRETARY reported that at a meeting held the previous day, May 16th, a special Cabinet committee convened by the Minister of Munitions and Supply and including the Acting Minister of National Defence, with military advisers in attendance, had come to the conclusion that it was of the utmost importance and urgency that a statement be issued forthwith as to the nature and extent of participation in the Pacific war of the three Services.

A draft statement, prepared following the special Cabinet committee's meeting, in consultation with the Ministers of National Defence, was submitted.

(Draft statement re participation by Canadian forces in Japanese war, May 17th, 1945.)† an armoured element in the Pacific force had been discussed. The committee had noted that this proposal was within the scope of approved government policy for Army participation with respect to manpower, and had agreed that an estimate of the financial implications of the Army's Pacific programme be submitted to the Cabinet for consideration.

4. MR. ABBOTT said that the armoured element proposed would consist of a tank battalion which would require a total of 720 personnel all ranks at an estimated cost of $4,600,000. This would not involve exceeding the total number of 30,000 men which had been the figure approved by the Cabinet for the Army Force.

A statement was submitted showing the estimated total cost for the Army Force from September 1st, 1945 to March 31st, 1946, covering initial equipment and training, despatch to the United States, embarkation leave and despatch overseas, at $70,205,620, of which $61,951,620 (Canadian) would be payable in U.S. funds.

These proposals were acceptable to the Department of Finance.

5. THE CABINET, after discussion, approved in principle the proposals submitted by the Minister with respect to the composition and financial implications of Army participation in the war against Japan.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins: Your telegram No. 79 of March 27th, 1945.†

1. I have thought it well to await the outcome of discussions between British and United States Chiefs of Staff on participation of British Commonwealth forces in strategic bombing of Japan before I communicated with you again on this matter.

2. Rapid development of United States operations in Pacific has changed American plans for deployment of their forces and it was not until 30th May that we received an authoritative proposal from the United States Chiefs of Staff. My immediately following telegram contains a note by the Staffs on this proposal.

3. Since deployment of our force depends on taking our full share of the constructional work, we have to find some 15,000 constructional troops and despatch them in the early drafts.

4. You will recognize the difficulty we have in meeting this requirement in view of commitments in other theatres and the urgent call for repair of war damage in this country. We expect to find 12,500 towards this total and I ask that you will find the remainder, i.e., 2,500 or more if that is possible to sail from Canada not later than 30th September. The more you can find the less this V.L.R.<sup>186</sup> requirement will detract from important operations elsewhere.

5. I am most anxious to know that this general proposition has your approval. I remain convinced that it is of future importance to us all that a British Commonwealth force should participate in the strategic bombing of Japan.

6. I am reluctant to press you at this moment for a very early reply, but owing to delays in fixing this scheme with the Americans little time is left for plans and preparations. Ends.

London, June 16, 1945

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins: My immediately preceding telegram. Following is note by the Staffs on American proposal, Begins:

1. The Americans propose that a British force of the order of ten squadrons should be based in the Ryukyus. They say that under present conditions they are unable at present to formulate plans for the British force of 20 squadrons, but should later developments warrant they would welcome the employment in the Pacific of the remaining ten squadrons.

2. Staff conversations in Washington amplify this proposal as follows.

The ten squadron force is to be based in Okinawa and is to share a base area with American strategic bombers. The Americans will be responsible for operating the ports and for defence of the base area. The British to be responsible for the logistic support of their force and for meeting their share of the construction of airfields and installations.

3. We view this proposal with much greater favour than any hitherto projected. It provides us with a base within close striking distance of Japan and relieves us of the costly undertaking of developing a base area and port with British resources alone. We are, nevertheless, given to understand that the offer of an air base in Okinawa is conditional on our providing our full share of constructional troops, which is key factor in American deployment, and that at least 15,000 would be expected.

4. Since delay would have risked the withdrawal of this offer, we have deemed it advisable to accept in principle and Staff discussions in Washington are to commence in immediate future to determine plans for the reception, deployment and support of the force.

5. Detailed planning on this new basis is proceeding here and Canadian Staffs in London are being kept fully informed.

6. Plans at present contemplate that this ten squadron force should comprise two Canadian, one Australian, one New Zealand and six R.A.F. squadrons. We also count on three Canadian transport squadrons to contribute to the support of the force over the air routes from United Kingdom and Canada. It is hoped that first squadrons will be operating in Pacific by December.

7. Larger Canadian share in striking element of this force is unlikely to be practicable owing to time factor, but it is hoped that another six Canadian heavy bomber squadrons will be made available for the second contingent of 10 squadrons if and when this is approved. Ends.

Ottawa, June 19, 1945

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. Before I received your personal telegrams Nos. 134 and 135 of June 16th, concerning participation of Commonwealth forces in the strategic bombing of Japan, my colleagues and I had already given consideration to the proposal of the United States Chiefs of Staff on the basis of preliminary information communicated to R.C.A.F. Headquarters in London by your Chiefs of Staff.

2. The latest proposal appears to us to be much more realistic and satisfactory than previous suggestions with respect to which, as I indicated to you in my personal telegram No. 79 of March 27th, we had had serious misgivings.

3. The government have, therefore, approved the employment of two R.C.A.F. VLR bomber squadrons and three transport squadrons with the forces to be based in the Ryukyus, on the basis of the note by the United Kingdom Staffs as set out in your telegram No. 135, and our Air Staff have been instructed to plan accordingly.

4. The extent to which we may be able to assist with respect to construction personnel is, at present, being actively explored. For the moment, however, we are unable to commit ourselves definitely to any specific number, since it is not known how many men in this category can be made available. We will communicate with you on this subject as soon as the position in this respect is clearer.

5. As to any Canadian participation in a possible second contingent of ten squadrons, it is of course understood that we can make no commitment at this time. Should such a proposal be forthcoming, at a later date, it would have to be considered in the light of all relevant circumstances and in relation to other Canadian commitments in the Pacific and elsewhere. ## AIR FORCE PARTICIPATION IN JAPANESE WAR

4. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR referred to the recent exchange of telegrams between the Prime Minister and Mr. Churchill with respect to the employment of R.C.A.F. squadrons with the British force to operate from the Ryukyus.

It was evident from a subsequent message<sup>f</sup> received by the Chief of the Air Staff from Sir Charles Portal that definite plans were proceeding for a second echelon of ten squadrons to follow the first contingent in which it had been agreed that two Canadian bomber squadrons would participate. The Air Staffs had been planning on the basis that the R.C.A.F. would provide six of the ten VLR squadrons which would make up the second echelon and the return of R.C.A.F. personnel to Canada and the extension of O.T.U. facilities was being planned accordingly.

5. MR. GIBSON said that, in the circumstances, a definite Cabinet decision was required at an early date as to whether the R.C.A.F. would provide squadrons for this second contingent or whether Canadian participation would be limited to the force approved by the Cabinet at the meeting of June 20th. The training and demobilization programmes of the Air Force would depend upon the decision taken in this respect.

6. THE PRIME MINISTER observed that the maximum extent of R.C.A.F. participation during Stage II had been fixed by the Cabinet, in terms of manpower, at 23,000 and that this included the squadrons to be employed in European occupation as well as those to be employed in the Far East.

Within this limitation, a complete statement should be prepared and submitted to the Cabinet, setting out in terms of squadrons, manpower and finance the programme recommended by the Minister for operations in Europe and in the Pacific. The Cabinet would then take the responsibility of deciding and the Air Staff could proceed accordingly.

7. THE CABINET, after further discussion, agreed that the Minister have prepared for consideration at an early meeting a statement of recommended proposals for the employment of the R.C.A.F. during Stage II in the European and Pacific theatres.

It was also agreed that, pending further decision by the Cabinet, Air Staff planning be confined to arrangements for forces, the employment of which had already been approved.

Cabinet Conclusions

Ottawa, July 11, 1945

A meeting of the Cabinet was held in the Privy Council Chamber on Wednesday, July 11th, 1945, at 4.30 p.m.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Ilsley) in the Chair.

R.C.A.F. PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

1. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the meeting of June 28th, submitted a statement on R.C.A.F. participation in the war against Japan.

A request had been received from the United Kingdom for provision of six heavy bomber squadrons to form part of a second echelon of ten squadrons to follow the first echelon, in which two Canadian bomber squadrons (together with three R.C.A.F. transport squadrons) would participate in accordance with the decision of the Cabinet on June 4th. This would make a total of eight R.C.A.F. bomber squadrons and three transport squadrons in the Pacific, together with nine occupational squadrons in Europe. The twenty squadrons would be provided within the authorized ceiling of 23,000 men.

The total non-recurring costs for the Pacific would be $143.5 millions, together with $192.1 millions recurring, of which $134.1 millions non-recurring and $141.8 millions recurring would be repayable to the United Kingdom. The European occupation force would cost $42 million annually, of which $34.5 millions would be payable in the United Kingdom, together with non-recurring cost of $5 millions repayable in the United Kingdom.

Copies of this statement, together with an explanatory note, had been circulated.

2. MR. GIBSON pointed out that eleven Canadian squadrons in the Pacific would not be excessive in proportion to the part to be played by the United Kingdom, New Zealand and Australia, particularly in the South Pacific and Burma areas. Meanwhile, delay of decision in Canada was raising criticism in the United States and was impeding the completion of U.K. plans. It was quite clear that the U.K. authorities had been counting on the proposed assistance and had made their plans accordingly. The Canadian government, in fact, should be considered committed to this support.

3. THE MINISTER OF PUBLIC WORKS pointed out that the plans submitted by the R.C.A.F. did not include reinforcements, which might, in due course, bring the figure above 23,000, and suggested the desirability of reducing the number of squadrons in order to allow adequate margin for reinforcements within the ceiling.

The telegram forwarded by the Prime Minister to Mr. Churchill on June 19th was a clear evidence of the fact that the government was not, at that time, committed to the extent of participation now recommended by the R.C.A.F.

4. THE SECRETARY OF STATE pointed out that the War Committee's decision of February 28th, 1945, in establishing the figure of 23,000 for R.C.A.F. activities overseas during Stage II, had set this figure as a ceiling which was not to be exceeded, but had not authorized commitments up to this figure. Accordingly, it might be argued that any impression in the United Kingdom that Canada was committed to a given degree must be based upon direct communications with the Department of National Defence for Air.

It might also be argued that the government was not sending personnel to the Pacific in order to win the war against Japan since we were not required for this purpose, but merely to maintain national prestige.

5. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY expressed the opinion that the proposed R.C.A.F. participation in the Pacific did not, when taken by itself, seem unreasonable, but when considered in relation to the existing size of the R.C.A.F. in Canada and overseas and the slow rate of R.C.A.F. demobilization, the proposal took on more serious aspects.

Any approval of further R.C.A.F. participation in the Pacific should be made conditional upon substantial and immediate reductions in the size of the R.C.A.F.

6. MR. GIBSON reported that the present strength of the R.C.A.F. was about 160,000 of which some 100,000 were in Canada. Demobilization was, at present, taking place at between 4,000 and 5,000 a month. Air Staff officials had stated that it was difficult to increase this rate in view of present commitments.

7. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE expressed willingness to approve the R.C.A.F. proposed participation in the Pacific, but supported the case for immediate and substantial demobilization by the R.C.A.F.

8. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE pointed out that, in earlier discussions, it had been suggested tentatively that 2 1/2 men were required in Canada for every man overseas during Stage II and that, on this basis, a total R.C.A.F. personnel of 80,000 would be required in Canada and overseas, leaving 80,000 available for demobilization.

If the Minister of National Defence for Air could report further upon the total numbers required in Stage II, it would clarify the situation as regards R.C.A.F. participation in the Pacific.

9. THE CABINET, after considerable further discussion, requested the Minister of National Defence for Air to report at the next meeting on the total number of R.C.A.F. personnel required in Canada and overseas during the war against Japan, and expressed the general opinion, although not unanimously, that, subject to this figure being satisfactory, it would be prepared to approve the participation of six additional R.C.A.F. bomber squadrons in the Pacific, as recommended by the Minister of National Defence for Air, and the consequential reduction of R.C.A.F. European occupation squadrons from eleven to nine.

R.C.A.F.; PARTICIPATION IN THE WAR AGAINST JAPAN

5. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the meeting of July 11th, presented a report on proposed reduction of the R.C.A.F.

Total R.C.A.F. strength on January 31st, 1944, had been 232,600. This had been reduced to 178,600 by June 1st, 1945, of whom 61,600 were overseas and 117,000 in Canada. Of the personnel overseas, 30,600 would be available for demobilization; the balance would be required for overseas commitments during Stage II and supporting service in Canada.

Reduction in Western Hemisphere operations, training and essential services would release, by March, 1946, a total of 48,400 for demobilization of the 117,000 presently in Canada. This would make a total of some 79,000 persons available for demobilization by March, 1946, leaving the total strength of the R.C.A.F. after that time at about 99,600.

6. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed:

(a) that the participation of six additional R.C.A.F. bomber squadrons in the Pacific theatre and the reduction of R.C.A.F. occupational squadrons in Europe from eleven to nine, as recommended by the Minister of National Defence for Air, be authorized, it being understood that overseas commitments would remain within the approved ceiling of 23,000; and

(b) that the Minister of National Defence for Air be directed to initiate demobilization from the R.C.A.F. at the rate of 10,000 persons per month, as of August 1st, 1945; this rate to be maintained until March 31st, 1946.

RECRUITMENT OF CANADIAN NISEI

1. Reference our conversation of today, this memorandum records the situation at present with regard to the enlistment of Canadian Nisei.

2. Of the 250 which we were authorized to enlist on the two authorities issued—one for 100 and the second for 150—we have been able to recruit only 125 in all. The disposition of these is:

At S-20 Japanese Language School	52
To S.E.A.C. <sup>187</sup> (For MO I (SP) <sup>188</sup> )	35
To Australia	3
At B.T.C.s <sup>189</sup> and in Depots	35
Total	125

3. Requests for the services of Canadian Nisei are:

Canada (For M.I.I.T.I. <sup>190</sup> of CAPF <sup>191</sup> ) (includes 30% replacements)	19
Australia (includes 3 already sent)	200
S.E.A.C. (includes 35 already sent)	200
War Office	186
U.S. War Dept. (Pacmirs <sup>192</sup> )	20
Total	625

4. There is a paper deficiency between demands (625) and authorized supply (250) of 375. But this deficit will be greater because it is now believed that we will not be able to recruit the entire 250.

5. Nisei response in the West, where we had hoped to get most of the recruits, has been unexpectedly poor. This is attributed to two things:

(a) Lack of publicity. The Nisei resent their secret recruitment, asserting that this confirms them in their doubts of the Government's good faith towards them, and indicates, they say, that their services are not appreciated; and

(b) The activities of the "Loyalty Commission." The R.C.M.P. have been interviewing the Nisei to ascertain who among them wishes to return to Japan after the war. A very large number have declared themselves in the affirmative. This has had a very detrimental effect on recruiting.

7. We will be unable to meet even 30 per cent of the demands. In view of this, and of the changed aspect of the Pacific War, I suggest that the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs be advised of the foregoing facts so that he can clarify the situation for Australia, and that the War Office be advised that, in view of the indifferent response, we are at present unable to meet any of their requirements, undertaking to review the situation later, should the Pacific War continue.<sup>193</sup>

Colonel Turnbull discussed this matter with Mr. Glazebrook and Colonel Murray, D.M.I., when he was in Ottawa and was informed that there were only 20 Nisei with proper qualifications in all Canada and that of this number Canada required 18 for purposes of Canadian Pacific Force. Are these now required by Canadian Army?

Australian Army now advises that their requirements for Nisei are more urgent than ever. It seems impossible for Canada to meet their complete requirements, but 20 would be of great help. Even a smaller number would be welcomed. What can be done to carry the long outstanding Australian request?

I would like this matter to be settled definitely as soon as possible as it is next on agenda of War Cabinet here.

This question has been fully examined by Minister of National Defence who informs us that it is feared that due to a variety of conditions it will not be possible to meet the Australian request.

For your own information the number that was suitable for recruitment was only half the authorized total. Some for various reasons were returned to civilian life after V-J Day and the remainder are already committed to Canadian and other duties.

You should inform Australian authorities that every effort has been made to supply personnel to them and it was only unexpected difficulties that have prevented us from doing so.

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Your telegrams No. 316<sup>195</sup> and 317+ of December 18th. Mutual Aid Agreement.

1. You have doubtless received text of Australian refusal to accept Article X of proposed Agreement which was communicated by Glasgow<sup>196</sup> on December

High Commissioner of Australia.

23rd.<sup>197</sup> Will you please deliver personally to Mr. Curtin as soon as possible the message from the Prime Minister given in my immediately following telegram?

2. For your general guidance in your discussion with Mr. Curtin our feeling is that the Australian Government has adopted an indefensible position which they will in any case probably be unable to maintain in other connections. If they intend to pursue a course of extreme economic nationalism their commercial relations with Canada will in any event be impaired. We might as well face the issue now when very substantial benefits to Australia amounting perhaps to $75,000,000 or $100,000,000 under the Mutual Aid programme are involved.

3. We have framed our financial policy on the premise that the accumulation of war debts was undesirable and we have, therefore, furnished a great quantity of war supplies to other United Nations at the expense of the Canadian treasury. We are not seeking to drive any bargain with Australia; we are only supporting policies under which fair trading is possible and bargaining between governments reduced to a minimum. We consider that pursuit of a reasonably liberal international commercial policy after the war is a logical consequence of the wartime methods of furnishing supplies adopted by the United States, Canada and the United Kingdom, which have been deliberately designed to encourage liberal trade policies after the war.

4. The reference to publicity in the message to Mr. Curtin is not intended as a threat. The Mutual Aid procedure will be discussed at length during the next session and the Government will have to explain why no agreement has been concluded with Australia. Such an explanation may well provoke unwelcome discussion of Australian policy here and in other countries, but we do not see how it can be avoided. Public knowledge of the Australian action would be sure to arouse doubts in other countries about the intentions of the Government of Australia, and might well impede progress in developing not only beneficial international commercial relations but also joint action in other matters.

IMPORTANT. SECRET. My immediately preceding telegram. Following is message from Prime Minister for Mr. Curtin, Begins:

Your High Commissioner in Ottawa has informed me that the Australian Cabinet is unable to accept the proposed Article X of the Mutual Aid Agreement between our two countries. I greatly regret this decision and hope that you will find it possible to reconsider the position. We have considered the suggestion that there might be substituted for this Article a reference in the preamble to the fact that Australia and Canada have accepted in principle the general objectives set forth in the Atlantic Charter<sup>198</sup> and in Article Seven of the Master Lend-Lease Agreement.<sup>199</sup> We feel, however, that we cannot agree to this alternative, as the question appears to us of greater importance than would be implied by a mere general reference of this character.

It seems to us logical and, indeed, essential, that the Mutual Aid Agreements should contain a re-affirmation of the main points of the general international economic policy which we are all pledged to pursue after the war by our acceptance of the Atlantic Charter and by the formal undertakings into which we have entered with the Government of the United States.<sup>200</sup> Our Mutual Aid policy and Act were deliberately formulated to fit into post-war economic international relations of this character and to make them more workable by eliminating the accumulation of large war debts among the United Nations. The Canadian Parliament and the Canadian people have accepted the heavy financial burdens of Mutual Aid with this expectation in view.

It is for this reason that we believe it essential that all our Mutual Aid Agreements should contain an assurance that the nations receiving this assistance also look forward to international economic relations of this character. We had naturally believed that Australia and the other countries participating in Mutual Aid subscribed to the principles in question, because they had so declared in their agreements with the United States. If, under these circumstances, the Government of Australia should not find it possible to reconsider their decision not to re-affirm their support of these principles, we would be obliged to consider that the Government of Australia is out of sympathy with the general philosophy behind the Mutual Aid policy and therefore that its requirements from Canada would have to be obtained on some other basis.

We have, of course, no desire or intention that the flow of essential war supplies to Australia from Canada should be interrupted. If, however, your Government is not ready to sign the Agreement, we consider that we must make new arrangements for the financing of these supplies. The only alternative appears to be that we should provide essential supplies under a credit to be repaid within an appropriate period after the war.

Under any such arrangement it would be necessary, as you will realize, to make a public explanation of the reasons which have prevented us from fulfilling our intention of providing essential supplies to Australia out of the Mutual Aid vote without cost to the Australian Government. Ends.

My telegram No. 32 of January 30th.†

1. I saw the Prime Minister as indicated in previous telegram and was told that matter in issue had been further discussed and he asked me to see Evatt.

2. I had no discussion with Prime Minister on merits of dispute nor any suggestion by him as to any counter proposals, as he evidently wanted discussion to be conducted by Evatt.

3. He did ask me to convey to our Prime Minister his opinion that letter which I delivered to him from Mr. King was much too strongly worded and contained comments which should not in his opinion have been made thereto.

4. I did not discuss this with him as I felt that it was wiser for me to get from Evatt details of their objections.

5. I saw Evatt same afternoon and his first comment was that they did not like tone of letter to Prime Minister. I got out the letter and we read it and I asked him to tell me what was objectionable in it, and was told that they took exception to inference set out in last sentence, third last paragraph, wherein it was assumed that refusal to agree to Article 10 meant lack of sympathy with general philosophy behind Mutual Aid.

6. I believe what really hurt them was being definitely put on the spot by the letter. I would not follow this up further as Evatt had his say and then set it aside.

7. Evatt was most friendly, conciliatory and agreeable and quite different from his usual attitude.

8. He stated that they had attempted to reach solution through Glasgow but had failed and he asked that negotiations hereafter be conducted here.

9. He suggested we should make an entirely new approach to problem and forget the past and start again.

10. The whole problem was created here by their unwarranted assumption of construction which Canada would place upon proposed Article 10 and construction which would be placed on Article 7 Lend-Lease Agreement by United States and construction which would be placed on Atlantic Charter by the United Kingdom.

11. They have jumped at conclusion that said clauses and Charter have one meaning and one only namely, that it involves only reduction of tariffs and other trade barriers.

12. They feel here that primary emphasis to be placed upon construction of clause is that there should be international collaboration designed to promote employment, production and consumption of goods and international agreements by which countries bind themselves to pursue domestic policies aimed at full employment and higher standards of living.

13. The whole dispute seems to reduce itself to one constructive clause. As stated they assume we read it to mean that there is only one thing to be done and that is to reduce tariffs. They on the other hand read it to mean primary emphasis on domestic policies to curb full employment and when there is full employment in the world and consequent rising standards of living and greater purchasing power, then it will be possible more effectively to adopt practical measures to lower tariffs and they are in agreement that they should be lowered.

14. Evatt therefore suggests that Article 10 remain in Agreement as draft and that coincident with Agreement a note be delivered to you, the terms of which I hope to send you by telegraph to-morrow.

15. He says that if you are in accord with views set out in said note and so state that matter ends there, agreement will be signed as drafted.

16. If, however, you cannot accept terms of note, he proposes that preamble be amended by including an additional sentence acknowledging receipt of note so that Australia can argue subsequently that we had notice of interpretation they will place on Article X.

17. Please see my despatch No. 12 of January 14th.†

TELEGRAM 36

Canberra, February 2, 1944

1. My telegram No. 33 of January 31st, Mutual Aid.
2. I have received from Doctor Evatt the memorandum referred to in paragraph 14 thereof. Accompanying this was an aide-mémoire largely dealing with letter from Mr. King to Mr. Curtin referred to in paragraphs 3 and 5 of said telegram, and reiterating in much more forceful terms than he expressed to me personally their objections as stated in said paragraphs.
3. Aide-mémoire contains some other comment about Canada's obligation as a United Nation and as a sister Dominion to grant Mutual Aid to Australia and comment about public discussion in the event of failure to agree.
4. Aide-mémoire requested me to telegraph full contents to you.
5. I called Doctor Evatt in Sydney and reminded him of his own suggestion that we should forget past negotiations and start afresh, and told him that if I sent forward this aide-mémoire I was afraid it would merely divert discussion from agreement to an altercation about implications contained in Prime Minister's letter.

6. He then instructed me to strike out paragraph asking me to telegraph aide-mémoire and said to use my own judgement as to what if any portion thereof I should send.

7. In my opinion no good purpose is to be served by getting into a discussion of Prime Minister's letter and this should be a closed incident and in exercising discretion he has given me I am not sending memorandum referred to in telegram No. 33.

8. Understanding is that if you are in accord with contents of this memorandum it should be incorporated in a note and acknowledged by a note, and preamble of the agreement should be amended to contain the following recital "and whereas in their understanding of conditions upon which such war supplies are made available by one United Nation to another, the Government of Canada and the Government of Australia have agreed on interpretation set out in schedule attached to this agreement as defining their duty in pursuit of general economic objectives specified in Article 10 hereof."

9. Alternatively if you cannot see your way clear to accept the above mentioned proposal then the Australian Government is willing to sign Mutual Aid Agreement a recital to be prepared referring to interpretation placed by the Australian Government alone on Article 10, such interpretation as set out in memorandum to be included as a schedule to agreement.

10. I would strongly urge you to agree to alternative suggestion because you are not thereby binding yourself in any way to accept their interpretation but are merely giving them the opportunity of indicating to everyone beforehand point of view they are going to take when it comes to the actual implementing of Atlantic Charter, Lend-Lease Article 7 and Article 10.

11. To my mind memorandum is a rather platitudinous reiteration of the various articles under consideration with a hint that in their opinion post-war collaboration is conditioned upon pursuit of domestic policies aimed at full employment.

12. I cannot see that any limitation upon your interpretation of Clauses will arise because of your permitting them to make this interpretation part of the agreement as a schedule, and in fact I think it perhaps would be well if their viewpoint so expressed is reduced to writing and made part of a public document.

13. After all we should remember that the war is not over nor is the end in sight and that like every other nation (Australia?) is in throes of trying to make up her mind as to what should be done in post-war world.

14. I believe regardless of the way Australia is now thinking as we approach the end of the war and move into post-war period conferences such as the Relief Conference, proposed Monetary Conference and other similar Conferences will be held and that Australia will take her place therein and will by force of circumstances have to join the other nations in dealing with various problems and that ultimately Australia will find herself in approximately the same position as every other nation in dealing with post-war problems regardless of her present line of thought. I doubt the wisdom of forcing a showdown on interpretation or policy at this moment as I feel that time and circumstances will do a great deal to change their attitude.

15. For these reasons I am strongly of opinion that you should now accept my recommendation and enter into the agreement making this one-sided interpretation part thereof as suggested.

TELEGRAM 37

Canberra, February 2, 1944

Following is memorandum referred to in my immediately preceding telegram, Begins: Interpretation of Article 10 of Canadian-Australian Mutual Aid Agreement. Attached aide-mémoire of February 1st, 1944.

In the Declaration of Washington, dated January 1st, 1942,<sup>201</sup> the Australian Government, like the Canadian Government, adhered to the Atlantic Charter. Each Government has also accepted general principles of Article 7 of United States-United Kingdom Mutual Aid Agreement of February 23rd, 1942.

2. Article 10 of Canadian-Australian Mutual Aid Agreement is a paraphrase of the general principles set out in Article 7.

3. In entering into a Mutual Aid Agreement with Canada, the Australian Government desires that its interpretation of these general principles should be clearly understood.

4. The Australian Government bases its interpretation on fundamental provision contained in Clause 79 of the Atlantic Charter,<sup>202</sup> which accepts international objective of "improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security." The Australian Government, accepting this noble objective, unreservedly believes that Article 7 of the United Kingdom-United States Agreement is intended as a further expression of the same objective, and also that such objective can best be attained by attaching primary and indeed supreme importance to adoption of measures designed to promote full employment and increased production and consumption of goods. This is made reasonably clear by verbiage of Article 7 itself.

5. In view of the Australian Government these international undertakings mean that a high level of employment in all countries is a fundamental condition for better standards of living throughout the world and resulting increases in production and consumption of goods.

See Volume 9, Document 131.

In fact, Clause 5. See Volume 7, Document 327.

6. The Australian Government will, in the immediate post-war period, support such form of economic collaboration, as should make it unnecessary for countries to adopt policies of aggressive economic nationalism, but at the same time it is our view that it is necessary for countries which are not fully developed or which are highly dependent upon a narrow range of exports to be able under any agreement

(a) To use such economic measures as may from time to time prove necessary to ensure continued stability. The need for these measures will decrease to the extent that international collaboration proves successful, and

(b) To develop and diversify their industries.

7. Furthermore, the Australian Government is of the opinion that it is reasonable to expect all international agreements on economic collaboration should take into special account the industrial development, the dislocations and accumulated needs resulting from prolonged diversion from peacetime production, in countries which have long been engaged in a total war effort. February 1st, 1944. Ends.

For your private information Glasgow received the full text of the Aide Mémoire from Evatt and showed it to Wrong and myself on February 1st. You showed admirable judgment in securing from Evatt deletion of his request to telegraph its contents in full since receipt of so unreasonable and bad tempered a reply might have gravely affected our relations with Australian Government and even prejudiced renewal of Mutual Aid procedure. IMPORTANT. Your telegrams Nos. 36 and 37 of February 2nd. 2. Full Cabinet met on Tuesday and I judge that Agreement as amended was considered thereat.

3. Evatt asked me to see him yesterday which I did.

4. He told me that when they gave amendments to Article he forgot to consider the recitals in Agreement and that he had since had a copy of the Agreement telegraphed here.

5. He pointed out that third recital in its text as drafted was inconsistent with Article 10 as amended, and that he would like to have either recital entirely eliminated or altered to read "Whereas it is expedient that conditions upon which such war supplies are made available by one United Nation to another should not be such as to prejudice a just and enduring peace, but should be in accordance with economic objectives set out in Article 5 of the Atlantic Charter.”

6. As I read the Agreement under discussion, the primary object thereof is granting of mutual aid and terms and conditions under which it will be granted and some of the post-war objectives aimed at in granting thereof in manner provided. Into this contract has been inserted what is strictly speaking an extraneous clause in the form of Article X. In this we have followed largely the Lend-Lease Agreement into which Article 7 has been injected, and in regard to which there are, so far as I can see, no recitals relating thereto. If I am correct in this, then if you eliminate Article 10 the recital in question is still necessary to state the general objectives of Mutual Aid Agreement. If you eliminate recital then Article 10 can still be contained in Agreement just as Article 7 is thrown in Lead Lease Agreement. Thus, in my opinion, recital and Article are not inter-dependent. Article 10 states the general post-war objectives of contracting parties and recital merely states that goods are being supplied not only to help in present war but to create a condition which will further the course in post-war period of provisions of Article 10. Only to this extent is there any relationship between the two clauses.

7. Consequently I pointed out to him that in my opinion this recital and Article 10 were not directly related the one to the other and that recital referred not to post-war policy but to immediate conditions under which war supplies were being made available and object was not to leave a burden of debt after the war which would create a burden on post-war commerce or lead to the imposition of trade restrictions on a just and enduring peace.

8. He agreed that in constructing proposed agreement strictly on a legal basis that position I took was correct but that he was concerned about construction which would be placed upon recital by ordinary citizen and not by members of the legal profession.

9. He then suggested that Article 10 as amended would be improved by a repetition of the economic objectives set forth in said Article 5, and he suggested after final word “charter” that there be added the following words: “that is to say the objectives will be securing for all improved labour standards, economic advancement and social security.”

10. Of course it is not necessary for me to point out that Article 10 presently refers to the whole of the Atlantic Charter and proposed amendment merely stresses one article thereof.

11. I told him that agreements had been signed by Canada with Soviet Russia and United Kingdom Governments and I did not think you could alter these at this date to meet his desires.

12. He then suggested that if we could not go all the way to meet him that we leave the recital as it is but adding the proposed words to Article 10.

13. He asked me to do my best at least to have his wishes met respecting his proposed amendment of Article 10 and I told him that I would do my best so to do, but that I could not hold out much hope.

14. He finally told me that if the Canadian Government insisted, Australia would sign Agreement as is, but would much appreciate our Government meeting him on further amendment of Article 10.

15. Refer to paragraph 3 of my despatch No. 37 [sic] of February 7th,† relating to views of Federal Executive of the Labour Party on Article 5 of Atlantic Charter. It would appear that the Government here would like to ignore Article 4 of the Charter.

IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Your telegram No. 74 of February 24th. Please inform Dr. Evatt that since we have completed our negotiations with the United Kingdom and Soviet Governments we regret that we cannot accept his suggestions for amending either the Recital to the Agreement or Article X.

2. The Third Recital in the preamble is in essence a statement of the motives which have led the Canadian Government to furnish without payment large quantities of war supplies to their allies. We consider it appropriate that the Governments which accept these supplies should recognize in this way the policy under which the supplies are furnished. This policy has been designed to avoid the creation of war debts which would distort and reduce the flow of trade after the war. No other Government has raised any objection to the language proposed by us. Your interpretation of it in relation to Article X is correct. If huge war debts were built up through the sale of war supplies an expanding world economy, as envisaged in Article X, could have no chance of realization.

3. Mr. Evatt's further suggestion for amending Article X raises a new point. If we were to accept it, would it not appear that both Canada and Australia were seeking to disavow paragraph 4 of the Atlantic Charter? In any case the Atlantic Charter is well enough known for it to be unnecessary to quote part of its language in this Agreement.

4. You should talk to Evatt on the above lines making it clear that he has received our final proposals and that we wish to be informed at once whether Australia accepts the Agreement as it stands.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the recent exchange of letters between your Financial Adviser and the Department of Finance regarding the provision of supplies under the Canadian Mutual Aid Act to the British West Indies.<sup>205</sup> This note will confirm the decision of the Canadian Government to provide Mutual Aid to the British West Indies in the form of flour to the approximate value of $1.00 per capita. In doing so, we propose to use the population figures which have been provided through your office. Our understanding is that the correct figures are as follows:

Bahamas .....	60,000
Barbados .....	156,000
Jamaica .....	1,237,000
Leewards .....	140,000
Trinidad .....	506,000
Grenada .....	86,000
St. Lucia .....	59,000
St. Vincent .....	39,000
Dominica .....	43,000
Bermuda .....	32,000
Br. Honduras .....	61,000
Br. Guiana .....	354,000

Since it is proposed to offer this Mutual Aid flour to the West Indies immediately, in view of the short position in which some of the Colonies find themselves, it would be appreciated if the United Kingdom Government could notify the respective Colonial Governments in the West Indies at the earliest possible moment that the Canadian Government is prepared to offer them limited amounts of flour under the Mutual Aid Act. It would be desirable in doing so, however, to refrain from mentioning the basis on which the amounts will be determined. It is proposed that each Colony will be informed of the precise quantity of flour to be supplied by the Canadian Trade Commissioners in the West Indies. The Trade Commissioners will also issue a public statement giving the nature and purpose of this action under the Mutual Aid Act. We would suggest that if any publicity is to be given to this matter by the Colonial authorities, it should be correlated with the proposed statement by the Canadian Trade Commissioners.

While it is not proposed that this Mutual Aid transfer should be contingent upon any particular use of the funds resulting from the sale of the flour provided, it has been noted with approval from the letter of your Financial Adviser to the Deputy Minister of Finance, dated December 1, that your authorities propose that these proceeds should be used in the first place to contribute toward expenditure, if any, on cost of living stabilization policies, and that any balance should be transferred to a Suspense Account for post-war use. I would appreciate it if your authorities could inform us, after the operations are concluded, what disposition has been made of these funds.

We propose to deal separately with the various Colonies listed above.

I should be glad if you would inform me whether the United Kingdom authorities concur in the arrangements set forth in this note.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

The High Commissioner is to-day addressing a Note to the Secretary of State for External Affairs in reply to his Note No. 1 of the 4th January concerning the provision of Mutual Aid to the West Indies. In connexion with this Note I have been asked by the United Kingdom Government to let you know that they wish to make certain corrections in the population statistics relating to the West Indian Islands which formed the basis of the Canadian offer of Mutual Aid.

2. In the first place the figure for the population of Jamaica should be 1,247,000. Secondly, the figures for the individual Windward Islands should be as follows:

Grenada .....	91,000
St. Lucia .....	73,000
St. Vincent .....	63,000
Dominica .....	53,000

Finally, the figure which you gave for the Leeward Islands should be 87,000. This latter correction is due, I fear, to an error in the figure of 140,000 which this Office gave recently to the Department of Trade and Commerce. That figure now proves to have included the figure for Dominica which belongs of course to the Windward and not to the Leeward group of islands. I much regret this error.

Yours sincerely,

R. GORDON MUNRO

No. 6

Ottawa, January 19, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your Note No. 1 of the 4th January last, about the provision of supplies to the British West Indies under the Mutual Aid Act. The United Kingdom Government have requested me to convey to you in reply their warm thanks for this gesture on the part of the Canadian Government which they feel sure will be equally appreciated in the West Indies.

2. In order to implement the Canadian Government's proposals the United Kingdom Government propose to telegraph to the various West Indian Governments in the terms of the following message. Begins.

(1) The Canadian Government has informed His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom that Canada is prepared to offer, under the terms of the Canadian Mutual Aid Act, a defined quantity of flour to each West Indies Government. Each Colony will be informed by the Canadian Trade Commissioners in the West Indies of the precise quantity of flour involved in its particular case.

(2) As the Canadian Government have made no suggestions regarding the method of procurement to be employed, there is clearly great advantage in continuing with present procurement procedure if it is working satisfactorily, and provided that

(a) it can, or can be made to, ensure that the entire benefit of this generous gift by the Canadian Government passes to the Governments concerned and that no part of it accrues to merchants, and

(b) it will fit in with whatever supply arrangements the Canadian Government have made at their end. You should agree this latter point with the Canadian Trade Commissioners and will no doubt keep the British Colonies Supply Mission closely informed.

(3) In agreement with the Canadian authorities it has been decided that the fund resulting from the re-sale of the flour to the public may be used in the first place to assist in the finance of any existing policies of stabilization of the cost of living. Any balance not required for that purpose should be placed in a suspense account for use after the war.

(4) The Canadian Trade Commissioners will be issuing a public statement giving the nature and purpose of this action under the Mutual Aid Act and it is desired that any publicity by the West Indies Governments should be correlated with the proposed statement by the Canadian Trade Commissioners.

(5) I shall be grateful if you will inform me of the arrangements finally made. Ends.

Before the Secretary of State for the Colonies transmits this message to the Governments concerned, I am asked to enquire whether the Canadian Government concur in the terms in which it is framed.

3. If the Canadian Government propose to issue any statement in Ottawa concerning these proposals the United Kingdom Government have expressed the hope that they may be given an opportunity of seeing beforehand the draft of this statement in case they should have any comments.

I have etc.

No. 9

Ottawa, February 3, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your Note No. 6 of January 19th concerning the provision of supplies to the British West Indies under the Mutual Aid Act. I regret that it has not been possible to reply to your Note at an earlier date. Further consideration has been given to the question of the publicity to be accorded to the gift and this has been responsible for the delay.

I suggest that it would be desirable to alter in certain respects the terms of the telegram which the United Kingdom Government propose to send to the various West Indian Governments. I attach a copy of the instructions which were sent by the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Canadian Government Trade Commissioners in the West Indies under date of January 12th. These instructions have now been acted upon by the Trade Commissioners and the information in them has been communicated to the Colonial Governments. You will observe that they cover the question of methods of procurement of flour. It would, therefore, be desirable that paragraph 2 of the proposed telegram should be altered in order to correspond with the instructions issued to Trade Commissioners.

It has also been decided that for the present no publicity shall be given either by the Canadian Government or by Trade Commissioners in the West Indies to the gift of flour. I suggest, therefore, that paragraph 4 of the proposed telegram should be deleted and that there should be substituted for it a statement that the Canadian Government wish no publicity to be given to the gift at the present time and that further instructions will be sent to Canadian Trade Commissioners in the event that there is a change in this position.

I have been informed by the Department of Trade and Commerce that most of the colonies have replied to the offer made by the Trade Commissioners accepting the proffered assistance. The Government of Bermuda, however, has indicated that they do not wish to accept the offer preferring to purchase the flour they require from the Canadian mills in accordance with their previous practice.

Finally, I desire to express the appreciation of the Canadian authorities for the warm thanks extended in your Note by the United Kingdom Government to the Canadian Government for the provision of this assistance from Canada to the British West Indies.

Ottawa, June 29, 1944

Dear Mr. Fraser,

You will recall our discussion when you called at this office last week in regard to the continuance of the supply of flour to the British West Indian colonies under Mutual Aid for the coming year, on a basis similar to that included in last year's Mutual Aid Programme. I informed you then that before expressing a definite view on this matter I would like to consult our officers who had attended a meeting last week in New York with the principal Supply Officers of the different colonies, as I thought that it would be desirable to obtain through them as much information as possible with regard to the reaction of the different West Indian colonies to last year's flour supply arrangements.

Some eight or ten of the West Indian Supply Officers who attended the meeting in New York came on to Ottawa and were here during the earlier part of this week. Thus we had a good opportunity to obtain from them their views in regard to the flour supply arrangements.

Each delegate with whom the matter was discussed stated that Canada's action had been very greatly appreciated, not only by the Governments concerned but by the citizens of the colonies. In practically every colony the benefit of the Canadian Mutual Aid flour arrangement is being used to maintain the overall cost-of-living, or to hold down the retail price of some specific imported commodity. Most of the colonial representatives expressed the hope that last year's gift of flour would be repeated during the current year, and they stressed the great value to the colonies of the assistance that Canada has been able to give them in this form.

Having initiated this type of assistance to the British West Indian colonies, I think that its continuance on the same basis as last year should be provided for in the current Mutual Aid Programme. I will appreciate it if you will be good enough to let me know, as soon as possible, what decision on this matter is reached by the Mutual Aid Board, in order that in the event that renewal of the arrangement is authorized we may give prompt attention to the procurement of the supplies required.

Yours faithfully,

Dear Mr. Master,

At the meeting of the Canadian Mutual Aid Board on Monday of this week, opposition developed to the further extension of Mutual Aid to the Caribbean Area. The Hon. Mr. Ilsley and the Hon. Mr. St. Laurent were the two Ministers who were inclined to oppose granting of further Mutual Aid. The question was left for final decision until the next meeting of the Board.

My own view in the matter is that, while we might have been ill advised in granting Mutual Aid to the Caribbean Area in the first instance, we would now be equally ill advised if we were to stop this assistance. It would obviously be infinitely better if we had never commenced than to have granted a certain amount, obtained due publicity, expressions of thanks and appreciation from the Colonies concerned and then only to discontinue it while Mutual Aid was still being granted to other countries. The amount of money involved is infinitesimal compared with the total. The value from a trade point of view is, I believe, considerable and should undoubtedly be the means of introducing Canadian flour to Islands that had not previously known the Canadian product.

If the Department agrees with the principle involved, it would seem desirable that Mr. MacKinnon should be briefed for the next meeting of the Mutual Aid Board.

Yours faithfully,

G. R. HEASMAN

SUPPLY OF CANADIAN FLOUR UNDER MUTUAL AID TO THE B.W.I.

At the last meeting of the Mutual Aid Board no decision was reached as to whether Canada would again supply flour under Mutual Aid to the West Indies on the same basis as was in effect last year.

I had written to Mr. Karl Fraser, stating that this Department would recommend renewal of last year's arrangement. However, I understand that one or two members of the Board—Mr. Ilsley and Mr. St. Laurent, I believe,—were not prepared to accept this recommendation without further consideration.

This question will come up again at the next meeting of the Mutual Aid Board and the attached brief has been prepared by Mr. English, giving the grounds on which we believe that it would be unwise not to renew the arrangement.

You will recall that last year you and I attended a Mutual Aid Board meeting where this subject came up, and that I was then rather loath to accept the proposal that had been worked out for supplying flour to the West Indies. However, the Board went ahead with that proposal and flour was actually supplied. The whole arrangement appears to have worked out very well. Certainly, the West Indian colonies have been very appreciative.

My present view is that, having made the initial step of starting Mutual Aid to the West Indies, we would defeat a large part of our purpose in doing so by cutting them off now. I cannot say definitely what their reaction would be, but I think they would wonder why we had been so anxious to give them Mutual Aid flour last year and why we should now, without any change in their circumstances, be so anxious to cut it off. I would feel that we would run some risk of having done ourselves more harm than good in regard to retaining their commercial good-will.

While we need not press the case too strongly, there is appended a brief, which summarizes the main facts in the case as we see them, for your information in discussing this problem when it comes up again at the next meeting of the Mutual Aid Board.<sup>206</sup>

MUTUAL AID FLOUR FOR THE B.W.I.

1. Policy During 1943-44:

It was decided to extend a measure of Mutual Aid direct to the B.W.I. during 1943-44 in order to -

(a) Assist the Colonies in their endeavours to meet the rising cost of living resulting in some measure from the increased cost of goods imported from Canada;

(b) Make it known to the Colonies that Canada's mutual aid gift to the U.K. was in fact assisting the Colonies;

<sup>206</sup>La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

The following note was written on the memorandum:

Noted by the Minister—Aug[ust] 11/44 P[ICKERSGILL]

- (c) Create goodwill for Canada;
- (d) Further consolidate our trade position with the B.W.I.;
- (e) Ensure that a shortage of sterling would not interfere with the Colonies in the procurement of essential supplies from Canada.

2. Minutes of the Mutual Aid Board (Dec. 1943).

“The Board wish to see some of the West Indies’ essential requirements in Canada provided directly to these Colonies under the authority of the Mutual Aid Act. Trade figures indicate that the value of exports this year from Canada to the West Indies as a whole will exceed by many million dollars the value of imports to Canada from the West Indies. The exports in question are very largely essential supplies for the maintenance of the civilian population of the Colonies, and the provision of some portion of them as Mutual Aid would be consistent with the objectives and the terms of the Mutual Aid Act. The Board are aware that the effect of providing these supplies directly to the colonial authorities as Mutual Aid, instead of providing them or something else, directly to the United Kingdom, will have the effect of reducing the budgetary assistance afforded by Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom, and of giving a corresponding assistance directly to the budgets of the Colonies in question. The Board believe, however, that this relatively small share of the budgetary assistance afforded to the United Kingdom can reasonably be diverted to the Colonies concerned and that the United Kingdom will be in a position to take it into account and to ensure that it does not produce undesirable results, for example, in contributing to inflationary tendencies.”

3. Basis Used in Provision of Mutual Aid During 1943-44.

(a) It was decided to extend Mutual Aid assistance to each of the B.W.I. Colonies in the form of flour to the amount of $1.00 per capita of the Colonies.

(b) Flour was adopted as the means because it was the only commodity common to all the Colonies, and its procurement and distribution was a relatively simple matter.

(c) On decision of the Board, it was agreed that wheat for the manufacture of this flour should be drawn from the Crown Wheat Account at the fixed price. This enabled flour to be made available at a standard price of $1.80 per barrel.

(d) The Colonies concerned, their populations, and the quantity of flour provided to each under Mutual Aid are as follows:

Colony	Population	Bbbs. of Flour
Bahamas	60,000	8,800
Barbados	156,000	22,800
Br. Guiana	354,000	52,000
Br. Honduras	61,000	8,800
Dominica	53,000	7,600
Grenada	91,000	13,200
Jamaica	1,237,000	182,000
Leewards	102,000	15,200
St. Lucia	73,000	10,800
St. Vincent	63,000	9,200
Trinidad	506,000	74,000
Bermuda	32,000	nil
Totals	2,788,000	404,400

4. Reception of Offer by the Colonies:

Each of the Colonies, with the sole exception of Bermuda, gratefully accepted the offer of Mutual Aid assistance from Canada. Letters from a number of the Governors or other authorities of the Colonies expressed appreciation for the Canadian gift. (see letters attached†)

5. Use of Proceeds from Mutual Aid Flour

(a) Bahamas: Proceeds from sale of flour would enable the Government to accumulate a fund which would be used to subsidize sale of rice at a retail price of 1 d. per pound lower than would be otherwise necessary for a period of 9 to 12 months. This would be physiologically beneficial, as rice is one of the most important necessities largely consumed by the poorer classes of the community, and is controlled and rationed by Government. This would also lower cost of living by three points. (Ref. letter Acting Colonial Secretary in Jamaica, file 35310, March 11, 1944)

(b) Barbados: Retail price of flour has been reduced from 6¢ to 5¢ per pound for the remainder of the year. (verbal statement by Controller of Imports)

(c) Trinidad: Using proceeds of sale of Mutual Aid flour to maintain retail price of flour despite rising cost of commercial purchases and increased consumption. Any surplus after this operation would be used for subsidizing other Canadian produce such as equalization fee on oats and salt fish. (Ref: letter of Jan. 11, 1944 from Governor of Trinidad, file 35310.)

(d) Jamaica: Proceeds to be used to assist in holding cost of living at not over 60% above the base period. (Verbal statement by Competent Authority)

6. Reasons for Continuation of Mutual Aid Flour to B.W.I. During 1944-45

(a) In absence of export ceiling prices, cost of many Canadian products such as flour have continued to rise during the past 12 months, while at the same time price to Canada of most B.W.I. produce such as sugar, molasses, etc., continues at relatively fixed basis.

(b) Desirability of continuing assistance to B.W.I. in combatting rising cost of living.

(c) Importance of B.W.I. as a market for Canadian products, as shown by the following figures of Canadian exports in recent years:

1938 .....	$14,102,918
1939 .....	$14,914,622
1940 .....	$21,825,169
1941 .....	$39,289,314
1942 .....	$35,425,662
1943 .....	$37,990,176

(d) The B.W.I., as a group, continue to have an adverse balance of visible trade with Canada as shown in the following:

1942 .....	$19,858,569
1943 .....	$13,012,954

Continuation of Mutual Aid should make it less urgent for the B.W.I. to reduce their purchases from Canada on grounds of shortage of Canadian exchange.

7. Proposals for 1944-45

In view of the very favorable impression created in the Colonies by the extension of Mutual Aid assistance during the past year, and in order further to aid the B.W.I. in maintaining their cost of living within reasonable levels, it is recommended that -

- (a) Mutual Aid be continued to the B.W.I. during the current fiscal year;
- (b) Such assistance be in the same form as during the past year, i.e. flour at the rate of $1.00 per capita;
- (c) Wheat for this purpose be made available to millers from Government Account at a fixed price.

8. Cost

The cost out of Mutual Aid funds would be not more than $2,788,000.

5. WEST INDIES - EXTENSION OF THE PROVISION OF FLOUR UNDER MUTUAL AID

The Board gave consideration to a letter of June 29th from the Acting Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce to the Director of Administration recommending extension of the provision of flour under Mutual Aid to the British West Indies. The amount is approximately $2,500,000. (C.M.A.B. Doc. No. 87).

The suggestion had been made that this item be not continued this year or at least reduced by half. The Department of Trade and Commerce however, had reported that Canada's action had been of great value to the colonies and greatly appreciated by both the Governments and the citizens of the colonies. It favoured continuation of the arrangements.

The Board, therefore, approved the provision of flour as Mutual Aid to the British West Indies, in an additional amount, in each case, equal to that approved last year.

2. For various reasons, we have not had the opportunity to formally ask the Americans to declare their hand, and I have therefore endeavoured to build up a picture from scraps of information picked up informally at random. I have set this out in the attached memorandum which for what it is worth should be qualified to the extent that:

(a) I have not had access to information about the strategic and political policies involved, either vis-à-vis the Chinese, or United States-British problems involving the question of revised control and responsibility in that theatre which has doubtless resulted from Mountbatten's appointment.

(b) It is impossible to deal adequately with a supply problem independent of the factors mentioned in (a) and finally, (but not least)

(c) The United States agencies concerned in Washington, are themselves handicapped by lack of detailed information about the current supply picture, and in particular on the stockpile situation in India.

3. Your attention is directed to the following points:

(a) The wide discrepancy in United States estimates (more accurately described as guesses) of the India stockpiles of United States material which vary from 100,000 to 300,000 tons.

(b) The scale of equipment of Chinese ground forces as compared with United States standards, i.e., one United States division equals two Chinese.

(c) United States shipments to India even since pressure was brought to bear on us to limit Canadian supplies for China of those items most readily transportable by air, have probably not been restricted by the same limitation.

(d) As mentioned in our teletype to External<sup>209</sup> and contrary possibly to Mr. Wrong's impression, no pressure has been put on us to withhold our shipments. It is the form they are taking, however, which may cause trouble.

4. It seems, therefore, that a number of points (in addition to the inclusion of motor vehicles) should be the subject of discussions with the Americans:

(a) Further provision of Canadian supplies up to our maximum, and possibly revision of the limits previously agreed.

(b) United States concurrence, in view of their own hitherto relatively unrestricted shipments of supplies, to our sending other items not limited by size or weight to transport by air.

MOST SECRET

UNITED STATES SUPPLY POLICY FOR CHINA

I. Supply by United States War Department

So far as I have been able to determine, the War Department program for Lend-Lease aid to China consists of:

(1) The equipment and training in India of thirty Chinese divisions under the 1943 United States Army Supply program. Equipment for fifteen United States divisions, equivalent to thirty Chinese divisions, was to have been shipped by the end of 1943. The training program is proceeding.

(2) Assignment of planes to the Chinese Air Force to permit of their cooperation with the Fourteenth Air Force, and assignment of transport planes to the Burma-China air route, sufficient to supply the Fourteenth United States and Chinese Forces.

In addition to increasing Chennault's<sup>210</sup> 14th Air Force to an undisclosed strength, 1943 assignments to the Chinese Air Force are 300 fighters and 48 bombers. The supply of the above combined United States-Chinese Air Forces is expected to put a strain on the most optimistic air transport plans.

(The margin of air freight space optimistically estimated as being available for other purposes, including the Chinese Forces in China, will not be over 1,000 tons for any month through 1944).

(3) Assignment of equipment for an additional thirty Chinese divisions for delivery in India through 1944.

War Department authorities realistically consider this program to be the optimum of Lend-Lease aid which can be afforded to China prior to a successful Burma campaign.

II. United States Stockpiles in India

India, under present conditions, is the supply base to meet the above program. Limited harbour and rail facilities in India have already been heavily overtaxed by this program. Even prior to the Quebec Conference the United States authorities (War Department and Lend-Lease) began to investigate the transportation and storage problems created in India by the flow of United States supplies to that country. As a result of General Stilwell's<sup>211</sup> recommendations further steps were taken towards the end of 1943 to estimate the existing India stockpiles in terms of strategic needs, in order to determine how far shipments from the United States could be reduced.

Commanding General, United States Fourteenth Air Force.

Commanding General, United States Forces in China, Burma and India, 1942-44.

No report worth serious consideration however, has yet been prepared by the United States War Department on the United States stockpile position in India or on port and harbour congestion. Three reports have been submitted, but as these were contradictory (one was unfavorable, one was favorable and the other not definite enough to be acted upon), two additional men have been assigned under General Farriss (United States-New Delhi) to submit such a report as soon as they can.

Meanwhile, guesses as to the total United States stockpile position have varied considerably from 100,000 to 300,000 tons without any indication of a breakdown by:

- (a) Items intended for the Chinese Army and Air Forces proper,
- (b) Items intended for General Stilwell's Chinese troops,
- (c) Items intended for the United States Army Air Force in China.

The impression in Washington is that no very clear breakdown can be obtained as supplies of each of the three categories are drawn upon as they are needed and in accordance with their proximity to the point of despatch by air into China. It is widely accepted, however, that regardless of the ultimate user, the total is too large.

The Supply Division of the General Staff of the United States War Department has recently reviewed, or are in the process of reviewing, the whole supply program for China for 1944. On the basis of information now available General Maxwell<sup>212</sup> is likely to recommend cancellation of all requisitions for equipment in excess of that required for the existing 30 division establishment under General Stilwell. The 1944 program was to have been closed by January 15th, and even if General Maxwell's recommendation is not accepted by the General Staff, this indicates how seriously out of line the stockpile is in relation to existing facilities for transporting supplies into China by air or other means.

Meanwhile supplies for ground forces are being tapered off, but not suspended. Early in January, only around 8,500 tons of equipment had been held up as a result of the November 20th discussion of the Munitions Assignments (Ground) Committee, but pending submission of the report by General Farriss, the quantity of supplies so affected will increase.

III. Transportation Facilities

(a) Air Transport

Reference is made in paragraph I-(2) above to the margin of air freight space of 1,000 tons per month in 1944 available for cargo over and above that needed to maintain the United States-Chinese Air Force in China.

In September, for the first time, the monthly amount of cargo flown into China totalled 10,000 tons. This rate is expected to be maintained. Of this amount 7,000 tons is reserved for General Stilwell leaving, in theory, 3,000 tons for the Chinese forces including their air force. In fact, however, other priority demands are understood to have reduced this frequently to around 500 tons per month. The 1,000 tons estimate may be similarly affected from month to month. It is this space which the Chinese must utilize to get Canadian supplies into China, unless they are prepared to await the outcome of a successful Burma campaign.

(b) Proposed Routes

At present two overland routes are being constructed:

(1) A joint rail and road route commonly described as "The North West Highway", as a result of special negotiations between the Russians and Chinese. This road which is based on Karachi goes to Zahidan (rail junction) to Meshed through eastern Iran and, if present plans do not change, to Ashkhabad. From this point by combined rail and road supplies are to be shipped eastwards into China. However, for nearly six months United States equipment including about 1,200 heavy trucks which were given the Chinese and 2,400 trucks which were given the Russians have not been used and the United States authorities are faced with the decision of withdrawing the equipment for other purposes since the Chinese and Russians so far have failed to reach satisfactory working arrangements for the construction and operation of this route.

(2) The North East Highway, usually referred to as the "Ledo Road" or the "Yunan-Assam Road" is the route being constructed to meet the Burma Road above Sitchang by cut-off through Batang. The rail-head for this route is Sadiya from which a more southern route is at present under construction and which joins the Burma Road at Sitchang.

Neither of these routes is likely to be fully opened for transportation until the fall of 1944 at the earliest, even assuming in the first case the Russians and Chinese solve their difficulties, and in the second that good progress, which is dependent in part on successful military operations in Burma, is made.

IMMEDIATE. MOST SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: Your EX-4909 and EX-4910, December 21st,† re supplies for China. Due to illness of Major General Burns<sup>213</sup> and resignation of E. B. Van Buskirk (F.E.A.) on American side and lack of certainty about representation on the Canadian side, no meeting of the Joint War Aid Committee has been possible, but some information has been developed on an informal basis regarding United States

 Chairman, United States Section, Joint War Aid Committee.

intentions towards China and other general aspects of the situation which I am bringing to Ottawa in memorandum for Saturday.<sup>214</sup>

2. There are several specific points, however, which require comment meanwhile:

(1) The J.W.A.C. has not been advised of our intention to ship trucks or other vehicles not specifically cleared by the Committee (see schedule attached to minutes of first meeting of August 24th enclosed with despatch No. 2157 of September 18th†), which is, so far as we know, the only indication given to the Americans of the types of equipment to be sent by us.

Admittedly some of this equipment, carriers, lorries, tractors, etc., may be considered as "spares and accessories and maintenance gear" for the 6 pdr and 40 mm. guns, but we had assumed, until receipt of your EX-316 of January 22nd,† that all items being sent to India could be transported by air into China. The American viewpoint at the time the list was cleared was that Canadian shipments within the agreed stockpile maximum definitely should be limited to those items most readily transportable by air. This attitude is confirmed by the Joint War Aid Committee Minutes of the second meeting September 16th (see enclosures to despatch No. 2205 of September 27th† covering the discussions of the 25 pdrs.).

You should note that Taylor<sup>215</sup> and Gaud<sup>216</sup> in agreeing to schedule of supplies for China as approved by Joint War Aid Committee, deleted the following items along with others, from the original Canadian list of July 22nd, 1943†:

Motor vehicles and artillery tractors for above mentioned artillery units—600 tons.

Bren gun carrier, complete with spares and accessories and maintenance spares for 24 months, according to British scale—400 tons.

Small mobile radio units and 4 x 2 cargo trucks, in quantities according to availability. (No tonnage specified).

(2) It is apparent we should now report details furnished in your EX-316 to the Joint War Aid Committee, and not run the risk of being questioned later on a possible discrepancy. We might with some justification claim the motor vehicles were essential as accessory equipment, if it were not for the fact that they comprise such a large portion of the first shipment and that we seem to have reinstated some of the items deleted, as stated above, by agreement and not subsequently approved.

(3) Therefore, in notifying the United States (and possibly also the British) authorities, how are we now to explain the inclusion of such a large tonnage of motor vehicles? We should also be advised of the terms in which shipping clearance for India was made by London as we have withheld transmission of the breakdown of shipment to ensure that United States and British receive the same information concurrently.

(4) Regarding Peers' discussions with you on December 6th,<sup>217</sup> there has been no pressure brought to bear on us to have Canadian shipments held up, even though the Munitions Assignment Committee here decided on November 20th to withhold shipments of United States supplies pending full report on the stockpile position and port congestion in India. This decision did not suspend immediately United States shipments of items previously assigned and en route to that theatre; it merely ensured that items then being assigned from December production would not be shipped in the two or three following months' period, or at least until the United States War Department had had the chance to investigate.

Therefore advice given Carmichael<sup>218</sup> by Clay<sup>219</sup> is in accordance with the facts.

(5) Referring to paragraphs 10 and 11 of your EX-4909 of December 21st, re Bren guns. We have never been brought into this picture nor have we heard any complaints from the United States side. As representatives of the United States Army Service Forces attend the Ottawa Assignments Committee meetings, they presumably feel they have adequate opportunity to press their case.

(6) Re 3.7"a.a."<sup>220</sup> guns. I understand provision to China of 120 of these has been approved by the Mutual Aid Board. We have so far not been asked by Fraser to clear this item here. We would appreciate particulars, especially in view of the fact that this item was also deleted by agreement here from an earlier list. Ends.

Ottawa, February 5, 1944

Dear Mr. Wrong,

I phoned you last evening with regard to the question brought up in your memorandum to me of February 4th† regarding teletype WA-653 received from Washington. As I am just leaving for Washington I have not time to go through the files to pick out the exact reference to items in the schedule pertaining to complete equipments. They mention ancillary stores and in all my discussions with the U.S. Army and Munitions Assignment Committee there has never been any question in my mind but that they understood that the items in the Chinese list included ancillary equipment. The trucks, universal carriers and motor vehicles are in direct ratio to the number of guns on the schedule as worked out between the British Army Staff and the Chinese officers. In all our discussions we have taken pains to point out that we are sending complete equipments complete in every detail. I particularly discussed this some months ago with Colonel Haylor, one of General Wright's<sup>221</sup> assistants, when he was in Ottawa, and discussed this point with U.S. officers in Washington, but I will take it up next week in Washington and explain our position.

With regard to Item 6, there was no decision by the Board to supply these 3.7 guns to China. You will recall that it was a production question of where the British have cancelled a number of 3.7 guns and the parts were already at the plant the cancellation charges would amount to approximately $4,000,000, and for an additional estimated $400,000 we could put these parts together and complete 120 of the gun equipments. We subsequently got 20 from the Department of National Defence and only put together 100. These will be in reserve if and when the Joint War Aid Committee decide that Canada should make them available to China. We therefore never requested a clearance of this item by the Joint War Aid Committee but it is an item which I will discuss with the Americans when I am in Washington this coming week.

I am sending this to you in haste but hope it covers the points raised.

Yours very truly,

SECRET. Following for Wrong from Pearson, Begins: In further reference to your EX-4909 and EX-4910 December 21st† and my WA-653, re supplies for China. For the record it seems desirable to confirm that information given you by Fraser in his letter of February 5th is substantially correct. During his recent visit to Washington Fraser satisfied us that the Americans had been kept informed through the Canadian Munitions Assignment Committee, or as a result of their visits to Ottawa, of the provision by Canada of ancillary equipment including vehicles. In fact, at a recent meeting with War Department officials here the Canadian policy of furnishing spares and complete ancillary equipment was commended.

It should, however, be explained that these officials did not include Colonel Gaud who was the officer most concerned with this matter at the beginning. He is now in Chungking.

The British Staff people in Washington are far more uneasy about this matter than the Americans. They think that we really had no business sending this mechanical transport to India for the Chinese when we should have known very well that it would not reach its destination possibly for years. They feel that our action could in no way be said to be helpful to the general prosecution of the war, especially at present when the congestion in Indian ports and on the railroads was embarrassing to a degree. I believe the British Joint Staff people here may advise London as to the situation to see if any influence could be brought to bear on us from there to cease, as they would put it, wasting our material in this manner.

As regards the 3.7 A.A. guns, this item, to our knowledge, was not discussed with the Americans during Fraser's recent visit. Providing we are properly briefed in advance the question of our supplying could be raised at the next Joint War Aid Committee meeting if necessary. This is provisionally scheduled for February 28th. Allen has written Fraser requesting complete details on this subject as well as guidance on the advisability of necessity [sic] of extending the Indian stockpile limit. In addition, I suggest we be provided with a detailed breakdown by items (quantity and tonnage) of any further shipments scheduled for the Chinese up to the existing stockpile maximum. Ends.

*Memorandum from Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs
to Prime Minister*

Ottawa, March 2, 1944

The Mutual Aid Board yesterday had before it the enclosed memorandum prepared by Wrong suggesting the need for reviewing the policy of sending further munitions to China under Mutual Aid. Mr. Howe proposed, with the concurrence of Mr. St. Laurent and Mr. Gardiner (the only other members of the Board present), that the question should be submitted to you for your views before a final decision was taken. The Board agreed to permit the assembly of a second shipment of munitions which would be ready to leave by the end of May but instructed the Director of Administration not to make any shipping arrangements until the Board had considered the matter again. It would be possible to hold this consignment in Canada until there is some evidence that the stores now en route to India can be moved into Chinese territory. If they were held in Canada, we could divert them to other destinations. Once they are unloaded in India they become the property of the Chinese Government.

There has been a great deal of difficulty and confusion over the supply of munitions to China. Dr. Soong and officers of China Defence Supplies have been most vigorous in pressing their claims. The guns which we have sent to them are said to be surplus to requirements for ourselves or other countries and we could also supply from surplus stocks heavier guns, both 25 pounders and 3.7 A.A. guns. Some of the equipment going with the guns, including the range-finders and radio equipment, is not from surplus stocks and I imagine that the ammunition could be directed to other destinations where it would be more likely to be used. The British Army Staff in Washington have raised very strong objections to our provision of motor transport to the Chinese based on the two grounds that this will merely deteriorate in overcrowded depots in India and that motor transport is in short supply. The Mutual Aid Administration maintains that the motor transport which has been shipped is not in short supply.

I think that we might request the Chairman of the Canadian Joint Staff Mission in Washington to raise with the Combined Chiefs of Staff the question of the strategic need for these supplies. This is after all the fundamental question under the Mutual Aid Act. The sort of clearance which has taken place with the U.S. members of the Joint War Aid Committee in Washington does not seem to me to be a satisfactory determination of strategic need. If the result of this enquiry indicates that we should discontinue the provision of munitions we should then investigate other possible means of aiding China by the provision of supplies under Mutual Aid.

Mr. Howe at the meeting of the Board mentioned your discussions with Dr. Soong and Madam Chiang Kai-shek<sup>222</sup> and it was because of this that he asked Wrong to see that the question was submitted to you before further action was taken.<sup>223</sup>

C.M.A.B. DOCUMENT NO. 54

MUTUAL AID FOR CHINA

1. For the reasons set forth below, it is suggested that Canadian policy for the provision of munitions to China should be re-examined, and that the Mutual Aid Board should consider the following questions:

(a) Is the provision to China of further munitions warranted under the Mutual Aid Act, which requires the distribution of war supplies in accordance with strategic need?

(b) If this question is answered in the negative, are there other grounds which would warrant further shipments, such as the creation of goodwill towards Canada and general considerations of external policy? If so, does the Mutual Aid Act permit the provision of supplies on these grounds?

(c) Although a large balance is outstanding from the original Canadian offer to China, have conditions changed since the offer was made to an extent which would warrant its review? Especially, would we be justified in making no further shipments until we receive some evidence that the stores now en route are likely to be employed in the war against Japan?

(d) If it is decided to continue to ship ordnance and small arms under the original offer, should we continue to ship with them motor vehicles needed for use in other theatres?

2. The first shipments of Canadian munitions to China under Mutual Aid are now at sea. They consist of 5,490 tons of artillery, automatic small arms, vehicles and ammunition, including 108 6 pounder guns, 48 Bofors A.A. guns, 644 trucks, tractors and other vehicles, 7000 Sten and 5,700 Bren machine guns and 2,220 tons of ammunition for the artillery and Sten guns.

These discussions took place during Dr. Soong's visit to Ottawa from February 28 to March 1, 1942, and Madam Chiang Kai-shek's visit, June 15 to 17, 1943.

<sup>223</sup>La note suivante était écrite sur ce mémorandum:

The following note was written on the memorandum:

I agree with what is set forth on p. 1,<sup>224</sup> this memo. W. L. M[ACKENZIE] K[ING] 3-2-44.

<sup>224</sup>Les trois premiers paragraphes.

The first three paragraphs.

3. At Chinese request the munitions will be unloaded at Karachi. This is the base for the proposed north-west highway to China, the route for which runs through eastern Iran into Soviet territory and thence eastward to China across Sinkiang. The latest information is that the Russians and Chinese have not succeeded in reaching agreement for the operation of this route, and that the United States are considering the withdrawal of 1,200 heavy trucks given to the Chinese and 2,400 trucks given to the Russians for use on it. The prospects, therefore, seem to be that the Canadian munitions will remain indefinitely in store at Karachi. Once landed they can only be diverted to other uses with the consent of the Chinese Government, since they become Chinese property on delivery.

4. The shipment of these supplies to Karachi instead of to Calcutta as originally expected indicates that the Chinese do not intend to attempt to fly any of the stores into China from India. It also indicates that the stores will not move into China over the Ledo road from Assam into Burma and thence to China if this route is opened successfully; it is now under construction and if all goes well might carry traffic before the end of 1944. As for air transportation the most recent information is that an average of not more than 1,000 tons per month will be carried this year into China for the use of Chinese forces. The chief demand on space is for maintenance of the United States-Chinese Air Forces in China, and this is currently taking around 90% of cargo capacity. This demand will increase, since the United States is expanding both their own Air Force in China and the Chinese Air Force.

5. The United States Government is providing equipment for 30 Chinese divisions, to be trained in India. This is equivalent to equipment for 15 U.S. divisions. Huge stock piles have already accumulated in India, and it seems to be generally agreed that the size of these is entirely out of line with transport possibilities.

6. We have agreed with the United States that Canada will not maintain a stock pile in India of munitions for China in excess of 12,500 tons. We offered to supply the Chinese last August with the following munitions in addition to those mentioned in paragraph 1:

- 252 additional 6 pounder guns,
- 48 25 pounder guns,
- 55,000 additional Sten machine guns,
- 14,300 additional Bren guns,
- 180,000 Browning pistols,
- 50,000 binoculars
- 2,000 rangefinders, together with ancillary equipment, ammunition, etc.

7. The total weight of the munitions offered at that time, according to a list received on August 18th from the Mutual Aid Administration was 13,151 tons. No allowance was made on this list for the weight of motor vehicles which were not shown on it. The motor transport just shipped to India, however, weighs 2,380 tons. If transport on the same scale were to accompany the remainder of the artillery, the total weight of our offer would be far in excess of 12,500 tons. At the meetings of the Board and Joint War Aid Committee and in the correspondence exchanged when our offer was being made there were constant references to the restriction of our supplies to China to munitions that could be moved by air. Because of this, we disappointed Dr. Soong by cutting out from our offer 25 pounder and 3.7 A.A. guns which he was very anxious to obtain.

8. The British Army Staff in Washington have raised strong objections to the shipment by Canada of motor transport to India for China. The United States authorities have not taken the same line; indeed, they are shipping equipment on a much greater scale. The British view seems to be that the wasteful despatch of American equipment makes it all the more desirable that Canada should not follow a bad example, especially in the case of motor vehicles which are in short supply.

9. The despatch of Canadian munitions to China was arranged following long continued pressure from Dr. T. V. Soong, then Chinese Foreign Minister residing in Washington. Dr. Soong has now returned to China and has been deprived of his functions as Foreign Minister, head of China Defence Supplies and President of the Bank of China as a result of differences with Chiang Kai-Shek.

10. The Canadian Minister in Chungking has advocated that such assistance as Canada can give to China should take other forms, notably the provision of medical supplies and personnel, arrangements for technical training of Chinese students, establishment of a Canadian Air Transport Service into China and, if possible the despatch of a Canadian contingent. Dr. Penfield<sup>225</sup> and other Canadians who have recently been in China maintain that medical assistance in various forms is the most crying need.

11. Reports received from many sources support the view that the delivery of munitions to Chinese military representatives in India is not likely to hasten the defeat of Japan. (The lavish American shipments remain under control of General Stilwell). Apart from the reasons already indicated, the state of confusion, corruption and inefficiency now rampant in China, the virtual cessation of active operation against the Japanese forces, and the inclination of many influential Chinese to regard the Chinese communist armies as the greatest menace, are general factors to be taken into account in deciding what more should be done in extending Mutual Aid to China.

I recently sent you a note on Mutual Aid supplies for China, together with a memorandum which had been referred to you for your opinion at the request of the Mutual Aid Board. One or two further items of information on this subject have now come to hand.

We have learnt from Washington that the project for a northwest highway to China based on Karachi and running through Persian and Soviet territory has definitely fallen through. The United States has transferred to their own forces in India 3,600 trucks allotted for use on this highway. Our advice is that while it might be possible for the Chinese to move a trickle of supplies by this route as a result of local arrangements with Soviet authorities it has disappeared as a project for regular transportation of munitions into China. Even if the Soviet Government were ready to lend its full cooperation there are long stretches along the route which are almost impassable.

In the memorandum before the Mutual Aid Board the weight of the supplies now at sea en route to Karachi was given as 5,490 tons. I find that the actual shipping weight was 6,033 long tons.

So far as I can judge from our Departmental records there was throughout an understanding that the provision of any munitions to China was contingent on the development of adequate means of transportation into China.

CANADIAN MUTUAL AID FOR CHINA

I have read with interest your C.M.A.B. Document No. 54, Mutual Aid for China, and have taken the time to read through file 4929-F-40C, Supplies for China Under Canadian Mutual Aid Act. The story is an intensely interesting, if at times elusive one. I fully agree with your suggestion that our policy needs re-examination at this time. May I set down certain observations that have occurred to a mind quite innocent of the whole subject on reading the file for the first time.

1. Our first two shiploads of war materials (including gift of wheat for Eastern India) are consigned to the Chinese Ordnance Officer, Karachi. As stated in paragraph 3 of your memorandum the supplies, once landed, become Chinese property and we have no further control over their disposition.

2. All United States war supplies for China are consigned to General Stilwell who is charged with seeing that they are effectively employed against the Japanese enemy. Canadian war equipment, ready for immediate use, will be the only such equipment over which the Chinese have full control to employ as they see fit, as I understand no British or Russian war supplies are being made available to the Chinese at present.

3. Since the Chinese have requested us to land the supplies at Karachi they are not likely to wish to send them into China by air or the Burma Road, when opened. The only alternative is the Sinkiang route. Our information is that the Russians are stalling Chinese plans to open this route. We could check on this again in Moscow, Chungking, London and Washington. One reason that might be advanced for Russian hesitancy in opening this route to war supplies for China (apart from correctness to Japan) is that they may fear that such war supplies may be held up in south Shensi where they would be used as a threat, if not in actual operations, by General Hu Tsung-nan's armies which are presently blockading the Chinese Communist area.

4. If this thesis is developed further it might be argued that with General Stilwell controlling American war supplies arriving in Southwest China, certain elements in the Chinese Army and Government might be very glad to have this Canadian artillery, ready for use with trucks, spares and ammunition, without any strings attached, in the Northwest to deploy against the Communists. The possibility of Canadian Mutual Aid supplies being used as the principal Central Government heavy equipment in a civil war against the lightly armed Communist troops is fraught with grave consequences for the future of Sino-Canadian relations.

5. If considered desirable, these supplies might still be deflected to Eastern India and placed in care of General Stilwell.

6. By giving careful consideration to the possible outcome of our present gift, we need not abandon the whole program of Canadian Mutual Aid for China. Japan is still the enemy and China the principal base from which the attack must be launched. But we should give more consideration to the political implications of our gifts as the United States and the United Kingdom do. I would suggest the following procedure as a basis for discussion:

(a) We need to follow up our equipment to see that it is effectively used by the Chinese against the Japanese. This might be done by sending a few Canadian Ordnance Officers with it to supervise unloading, assembly, train Chinese troops in its use, report on its effectiveness, etc., or better:

(b) We might well consign our supplies to General Stilwell, who controls air transport into China (and would, therefore, have an interest in moving our supplies), makes the distribution of United States equipment in China, and follows it up by sending United States combat teams to the front with the equipment to see it used. A Canadian Military Mission (Odlum might head this at first) might be attached to General Stilwell's staff to assist him in seeing that this Canadian equipment is effectively used.

(c) In Naval Message of October 1st from Washington† reference was made to the possible establishment of a United Kingdom-United States-China "China Goods Transit Board" in India and it was suggested that Canadian participation would be helpful. This suggestion would seem to have much merit, as it would in this way be possible to ascertain from our own representative (Perhaps use T. & C.'s Sykes now in Bombay) just what the transportation situation is in India.

7. Canada has no logical geographical sector in which to operate in the Pacific war, as is the case with all of the other participating powers. Our corner of the Northeast Pacific is screened off from the enemy by a United States defense curtain dropped from Adak and Dutch Harbour in the Aleutians to Pearl Harbour in Hawaii. In reviewing the possibilities of a Canadian contribution toward the winning of the war in the Pacific, one returns to the thought that the provision of munitions and supplies under the Mutual Aid Act is perhaps the major contribution we can make.

8. If air transport into China is the principal bottleneck at the present time, it would not be unreasonable to consider whether Canada could be of assistance in relieving this situation by supplying transport planes and expanding ground facilities in co-operation with General Stilwell as suggested in 6.(b) above. We have the aircrew and groundcrew. If we lack the transport planes, consideration might be given to the possibility of expanding the production in Canada of this type of aircraft which would be useful in commercial operations after the war.

You have before you a memorandum of March 3rd [2nd] covering a memorandum on munitions for China on which the Mutual Aid Board wished to have an expression of your views. The question is likely to come up again at a meeting next week of the Mutual Aid Board.

One point was perhaps not made as definitely as it should be in these papers. The Canadian supplies will be delivered at Karachi to the representative there of the Chinese Government and they become from that time Chinese property. These stores cannot, therefore, be requisitioned for other use except with the consent of the Chinese Government although I think it not impossible that if they were badly needed by Lord Louis Mountbatten the military authorities in India might ignore the technicalities. The supplies going from the United States to India for Chinese use remain the property of the United States and are all consigned to General Stilwell and not to the Chinese. They can, therefore, be diverted as the need arises; and the Army equipment is intended in any event to be used by the Chinese forces training in India under Stilwell's command.

The papers sent to you on March 2nd gave the reasons for doubting whether these supplies could get to China within a reasonable time. Apart from the transportation problem, however, there are high questions of policy concerning the use to which the Chinese might put them if they do arrive in China. It is true that they will be technically obligated by the Mutual Aid Agreement which they are about to sign to employ them in the joint and effective prosecution of the war, but we would have no means of preventing their use against the Communist forces in Northwestern China and there would be a strong temptation in certain quarters in Chungking to do this. If delivered in China the Canadian supplies will be the only modern equipment ready for use and complete which the Chungking Government will have at its sole disposal without any strings. If they were used against the Communists (who are said to be quite lacking in artillery and to be short of automatic weapons) we should find ourselves in the unfortunate position of aiding one side in a Chinese civil war in a manner which would be strongly resented by the Soviet Government.

I am wondering, therefore, whether this aspect of Mutual Aid does not contain such serious political problems as to deserve examination with the State Department and Foreign Office.

Ottawa, March 22, 1944

RE: MUTUAL AID - SUPPLIES TO CHINA

I have had a third discussion with the Prime Minister on this subject and, as you will see from papers returned to the Department today, he has approved:

- (1) of the substance of your note of March 2nd;
- (2) of an inquiry being made, as suggested, through the State Department and the Foreign Office.

On a previous occasion, Mr. King told me that he had never given an undertaking to Dr. Soong that any particular kind of munitions or supplies would be furnished. He had made it clear that the governing condition must be the strategic need of the materials involved. He certainly still holds to this view.

On reviewing the papers this morning, Mr. King added he thought there was now a clear case for reviewing all the arrangements involving the sending of military supplies to China via India.

Dear Air Marshal Leckie,

It is desired that enquiries should be instituted, through the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington, with the Combined Chiefs of Staff, in order to clarify the question of the strategic essentiality of the provision of munitions to the Chinese Government by Canada under the Mutual Aid Act. Major-General Pope is already familiar with the problems involved through his membership of the Washington Advisory Mutual Aid Committee and the Joint War Aid Committee, United States and Canada.

I enclose a copy of memorandum dated February 29th,<sup>228</sup> which has been considered by the Mutual Aid Board. In view of the questions of foreign policy involved, the Board referred the matter to the Prime Minister for his opinion. In the meantime, the Board instructed its Director of Administration, as a temporary measure, to assemble in Canada the items which it was expected to include in the next shipment for China, but to make no shipping arrangements without further instructions.

Later information makes necessary the correction of one or two points mentioned in this memorandum. The actual weight of the shipments of munitions now at sea is 6,033 long tons and not 5,490 tons. Information has been received that the negotiations between the Chinese and the Soviet Governments for the opening of an overland route to China from Karachi, through Iran, Soviet Asia and Sinkiang, have made no progress; the Canadian Ambassador in Moscow was informed, on March 22nd, by the Chinese Ambassador that trucks loaded with supplies for China were being returned to India from the Iranian-Soviet border.

The Prime Minister has authorized the question of the strategic need of these supplies to be taken up with the Combined Chiefs of Staff. He has also approved an approach to the Foreign Office in London and the State Department in Washington, in order to secure further information on the political questions involved. Instructions in this sense are being sent to the Canadian High Commissioner in London and the Canadian Ambassador in Washington.†

I attach a list† prepared by the Mutual Aid Administration which shows the commodities for which requisitions have been placed in Canada on Chinese account.† This includes the stores comprised in the first shipment, the volume of which is given in paragraph 2 of the enclosed memorandum. I also attach, however, a more detailed list of the stores in this shipment.† With reference to this list I understand that the bofors and six pounder guns have been furnished complete in every detail and the list does not show the ancillary stores, equipment and spares sent with the guns.

It is desirable that a final decision on the future programme of supplies for China should be reached as soon as possible, since production of the munitions offered to China is now proceeding in Canada. If these are not sent to India for China, other uses must be found for some of them and some orders will have to be cancelled. I should, therefore, be grateful if instructions could be sent to the Joint Staff Mission to explore the position as soon as possible.

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 588

Ottawa, April 3, 1944

MOST SECRET. 1. Reports received from the Canadian Ambassador in Chungking give so black an account of internal conditions in China as to suggest that the Central Government may disintegrate. They also indicate that little is being done by Chinese forces in China to prosecute the war against Japan and that there is constant pre-occupation in Government circles over the threat to their position of the Chinese Communist armies.

2. We shipped late in February the first consignment under the Mutual Aid Act of Canadian munitions for China, the chief components being 48 bofors guns and 108 6 pound anti-tank guns as complete batteries with all ancillary equipment, ammunition and motor transport, together with 7000 Sten and 5,700 Bren guns. Another shipment is being assembled for possible loading in May or June, and substantial orders for further artillery of various types and for automatic weapons are now in production. These munitions are being shipped at Chinese request to the Senior Chinese Ordnance Officer at Karachi. On delivery there title will be transferred to the Chinese Government.

3. We are aware that Chinese negotiations with the Soviet Government for the development of the over-land route from Karachi to China through Sinkiang have been suspended, and we have no information on Chinese intentions for moving the munitions from Karachi. We understand that virtually all the Army equipment which is being sent by the United States to India for China is consigned to General Stilwell, who is charged with seeing that it is sent where it can be used effectively against Japan. The Canadian equipment, complete and ready for use, may be the only ordnance over which the Chinese Government has full control after its unloading in India. The guns requested by China are not in short supply although there are certain shortages of ancillary equipment and motor transport. The guns, therefore, are not urgently needed for use by other forces against the enemy.

4. All Canadian supplies made available under the Mutual Aid Act must be furnished "in accordance with the strategic needs of the war." We are consulting the Combined Chiefs of Staff in Washington through the Canadian Joint Staff on the desirability on strategic grounds of continuing the shipments. The items included in the first consignment and a further programme for future shipment have been cleared with the United States authorities through the Joint War Aid Committee, United States and Canada.

5. We consider, however, that other than strategic considerations are involved in this matter, and we should be glad if you would informally secure from the Foreign Office an indication of their views on the advisability, on general grounds of policy, of continuing deliveries. We are instructing the Canadian Ambassador in Washington to make a similar approach to the Department of State. The Chinese Government has pressed us for provision of these munitions and there would be some embarrassment in reducing or discontinuing our program.

6. As a temporary measure we are assembling the components of the next shipment without making shipping arrangements. We do not wish to add to Chinese stockpiles in India until we are better satisfied that the first shipment now at sea will be employed "in the joint and effective prosecution of the war" as required by the Mutual Aid Act.

7. An early reply would be appreciated.

MOST SECRET. Your telegram No. 588 of April 3rd. Following informal and confidential views have been supplied by Mr. H. Ashley Clarke, head of the Far Eastern Division of the Foreign Office.

2. So far as the possibility of a disintegration of the Chinese Central Government is concerned, the Foreign Office do not consider that such a development is likely to occur for the following reasons:

(a) Although the situation as regards inflation is undoubtedly getting more and more out of hand, they consider that if economic collapse was coming in China it would have happened before now as by western standards the whole financial structure has been thoroughly unsound for the last six years.

(b) They do not think it likely that General Chiang Kai-shek would precipitate serious civil war with the Communists, at any rate while the struggle with Japan is still in progress. There will, no doubt, be local forays but they think that the Generalissimo realises that a full-scale attempt to liquidate the Communists would alienate opinion among China's allies, particularly in the United States.

(c) They do not consider that a revolt against General Chiang Kai-shek has any chance of success, both because of his hold over the esteem of the Chinese people and also because of the dependence of so many Chinese officials on the machine built up by Finance Minister Kung and the Chief of Police, both of whom are whole-heartedly devoted to the Generalissimo. They take the view that "nothing in China is ever as bad or as good as it seems."

They had received very depressing reports from China last autumn, and they understand that at that time many well-informed observers believed that the régime was on the verge of immediate collapse, but the structure held together.

3. So far as the problem of the continuance of mutual aid is concerned, they point out that the United Kingdom is continuing Lend-Lease supplies to China, and for your confidential information are on the point of concluding, after long negotiations, the Agreement for a loan of £50,000,000 to China on terms originally suggested by the United Kingdom Government, i.e., that it would have to be limited to the sterling area. They hope that this loan will have some moral value in checking inflation, although they are somewhat dubious as to its practical value in this connection.

4. The Foreign Office view, therefore, is in favour of continuance of Canadian mutual aid deliveries to China on general grounds of policy. They consider, however, that these political considerations must be subject to the decision of the Combined Chiefs of Staff as to the desirability, on strategic grounds, of continuing the shipments. Ends.

Yesterday I left with John Carter Vincent of the Far Eastern Division of the State Department a memorandum† in the terms of Wrong's teletype EX-1465 of April 5th.† I also had a short discussion with him and Hickerson about the problem. The State Department also is worried about the Chungking situation but not, I gather, as deeply as General Odium is. In any event there is not any immediate prospect of this worry bringing about a change of policy in respect of aid to China. They are, however, discussing a procedure by which the title of goods lend-leased to China should not actually be transferred to the Chinese until such transfer is cleared with the United States military authorities in Chungking and India. They will attempt to make this procedure retroactive in respect of United States goods which are already in India but admit they may have some difficulty on this point. Vincent thought that we would be well advised to adopt this course ourselves. Hickerson is somewhat worried lest any change in our policy to China would be interpreted by the Chinese as the result of United States pressure on us. Vincent will examine my memorandum and will get in touch with me later concerning it. Ends.

continued delivery of Canadian war supplies to China. From the strategic point of view, it is desirable that China should be supplied with all the war equipment which can be made available and which can be transported to her up to the maximum she can employ in the common war effort against Japan. Unfortunately, however, at the present time it is impossible to deliver to China anything in the nature of heavy equipment, and light equipment can only be delivered in such quantities as can be included in the air line over the Himalayas by the Air Transport Command and China National Airways Corporation. At the present moment there appears to be no immediate prospect of opening a land route into China and little prospect of any large increase in the air lift over the Himalayas. The Combined Chiefs of Staff therefore suggest a temporary suspension of shipments under the Canadian Mutual Aid program, except for such items of small equipment which, by prior agreement with the Joint War Aid Committee, it appears probable can be included for air shipment by the Air Transport Command or the Chinese National Airways Corporation and which can be made available without detriment to the requirements of other theatres which may have higher priority. IMMEDIATE. SECRET. Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins: Mutual Aid Board yesterday afternoon considered question of despatch of further military supplies to China in light of the answer of the Combined Chiefs of Staff. The point under discussion was whether the second shipment of approximately 5,000 tons, which is now assembled and ready for despatch at Longue Pointe depot, should go forward. The Chinese Ambassador saw me on Thursday to ask about the reasons for delay in making this shipment and General Kiang<sup>230</sup> also took the matter up at length with Mr. Ralston.

The decision of the Board, after discussion, was that this shipment should go forward at once and that it should be regarded as the final shipment, at least until conditions change, except possibly for small consignments for carriage by air. It was stated that much of the equipment in this shipment was specially manufactured for Chinese use and could not be employed elsewhere.

I told the Board that, in my view, the proper interpretation to be placed on the opinion of the Combined Chiefs of Staff was that no further shipments should leave Canada, except after a fresh clearance (limited to items of small equipment) through the Joint War Aid Committee. The opinion was expressed that adequate clearance had already been given to this whole consignment which, incidentally, includes some 3,700 tons of trucks. (I understand that you or Allen has received a list of the components of the shipment but I shall try to send you a revised list which Fraser has promised me.)

I suggested to the Board that, in any case, orders to move this consignment should not be issued until General Pope, yourself and the other members of the Washington Advisory Committee had been consulted, and commented that I feared there might be repercussions on our working relations with the Combined Chiefs of Staff and the American side of the Joint War Aid Committee. A majority of the Board, however, approved the taking of steps to despatch the goods as soon as possible. I was authorized to inform you, at once, and I should welcome your comments and those of General Pope particularly.

A single shipload of munitions for China is not a matter of much moment and if, by letting it go, we can get clear of the business until transportation is assured, that will be a substantial relief. My chief concern is whether, having sought the views of the C.C.O.S., we shall now be regarded as acting against their opinion. Ends.

[Ottawa,] May 22, 1944

Mr. Pearson telephoned from Washington this morning to say that the Washington Mutual Aid Advisory Committee met today to consider the effect of the decision of the Canadian Mutual Aid Board to send a further shipload of munitions to China. He told me that the unanimous opinion of the Advisory Committee was that this action would cause serious complications with the Combined Chiefs of Staff. The CCOS had been requested by us to give an opinion on the strategic essentiality of our providing China with further munitions. They had recommended that only items which could be easily transported by air and were likely to secure air transportation should be despatched following clearance through the Joint War Aid Committee. The Advisory Committee felt sure that this recommendation could not be regarded as covering the despatch of artillery and motor transport. Mr. Pearson said that he would report officially on the opinion of the meeting but he wished first to secure a complete list of the items to be included in the shipment. (Mr. Fraser was in error in thinking that he had sent such a list to Washington.) It probably contained some supplies which could be sent forward at once under the CCOS's decision without causing any difficulty. Such items would be (1) equipment furnished by Canada to complement U.S. supplies to China and (2) small items of equipment likely to be carried in by air.

I have asked Mr. Pierce to try to get from the Mutual Aid Administration the full list of the shipment so that we may teletype it today to Washington. Mr. Heeney considers that the question should be taken up in the War Committee at its next meeting on the basis of the report of the Washington Committee when it is received.

General Pope has just sent me the following message, Begins: "As agreed, this afternoon I informally acquainted Sir John Dill and MacReady<sup>231</sup> with the subject matter of Mr. Wrong's message to you, External-2112 of 20th May.

Both were definitely of opinion that, having so recently sought the advice of the Combined Chiefs of Staff in the matter of Canadian Mutual Aid to China, it would be most unwise on our part to proceed with this proposed second shipment without further reference to Washington, i.e. the Joint War Aid Committee. MacReady was further of opinion that, as this was proposed to be our last shipment until a road to China has been opened, a favourable reaction might be expected.

I need hardly add that I entirely agree with the foregoing. I would add, however, that I believe Ottawa to be in error when it expresses the opinion that adequate clearance had already been given to this whole consignment. The Combined Chiefs of Staff letter of the 14th May<sup>232</sup> unmistakably rescinds the clearance previously given and in this there was no mention whatever of mechanical transport." Ends.

I think it might be useful if you were to mention in the War Committee tomorrow an immediate matter concerning the shipment of further munitions to China. You will remember that, after discussion in the Mutual Aid Board last March, the question of continuing shipments to China was referred to you by the Board for consideration and you agreed that the Canadian Joint Staff in Washington should ask the Combined Chiefs of Staff for their opinion on the strategic essentiality of carrying out the balance of the programme for the supply of weapons to China. The Canadian Joint Staff submitted the question to the Combined Chiefs of Staff on April 7th together with a list of the munitions for which orders had been placed in Canada with the intention of delivery to China.

The opinion of the Combined Chiefs of Staff was dated May 14th. It stated that from the strategic point of view it was desirable that China should receive all the war equipment that could be made available and that could be transported, up to the maximum her forces could employ. The opinion continued as follows:

“Unfortunately, however, at the present time it is impossible to deliver to China anything in the nature of heavy equipment, and light equipment can only be delivered in such quantities as can be included in the air line over the Himalayas by the Air Transport Command, and China National Airways Corporation. At the present moment there appears to be no immediate prospect of opening a land route into China and little prospect of any large increase in the air lift over the Himalayas. The Combined Chiefs of Staff therefore suggest a temporary suspension of shipments under the Canadian Mutual Aid program, except for such items of small equipment which, by prior agreement with the Joint War Aid Committee, it appears probable can be included for air shipment by the Air Transport Command or the Chinese National Airways Corporation and which can be made available without detriment to the requirements of other theatres which may have higher priority.”

The Mutual Aid Board at its last meeting on May 19th discussed what should be done, in the light of this opinion, with the munitions which have accumulated at the Longue Pointe depot for China amounting to a single shipload of something over 5000 tons. The Chinese have been pressing insistently for them to be shipped. The discussion in the Mutual Aid Board is described in the attached message, EX-2112 of May 20th, from Wrong to Pearson. Pearson telephoned yesterday to say that the Washington Mutual Aid Advisory Committee (which includes Mr. Bateman, General Pope, Mr. Plumptre and himself) had considered this communication and were unanimously of the opinion that the shipment should not go forward without further clearance in Washington. The Committee agreed that General Pope should discuss the matter informally with Sir John Dill and General MacReady. The attached message from him (WA-3156 of May 23rd) quotes a report from General Pope that both Sir John Dill and General MacReady felt that "it would be most unwise on our part to proceed with this proposed second shipment without further reference to Washington."

I believe that the Mutual Aid Administration is taking steps to move the shipment as soon as possible. I suggest that you might propose in the War Committee that the Mutual Aid Board should reconsider the position in the light of the report from Washington in the very near future. It looks quite probable that the verdict will be for the shipment to go forward with the concurrence of the military authorities in Washington, but it certainly seems desirable that their concurrence should be sought as otherwise our relationship with them may be seriously prejudiced.

MUTUAL AID; CANADIAN MILITARY SUPPLIES FOR CHINA

28. THE PRIME MINISTER enquired as to the position regarding further Mutual Aid supplies for China.

He had understood that, subsequent to a recent decision on the subject by the Mutual Aid Board, further word had been received from Washington which appeared to warrant reconsideration of the matter by the Board.

29. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY said that the Board had not felt that the opinion received from the Combined Chiefs of Staff affected the situation with respect to supplies now assembled and ready for shipment.

The only question had been whether this (second) shipload should include mechanical transport. It had been decided to proceed with the shipment as previously planned.

30. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE drew attention to the fact that the opinion of the Combined Chiefs of Staff had been categorical in its statement of strategic need. The feasibility, under present conditions of transport from India, of getting heavy equipment into the hands of Chinese forces had been the only difficulty. In the circumstances, the Board had felt justified in approving despatch of the second shipload, the essential item in which was six-pounder equipments.

31. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that the second shipment referred to by Mr. Howe should go forward, but that, for the present, no further commitments for military supplies to China should be made, the Combined Chiefs of Staff to be informed that the Canadian government understood that this course fell within their expression of opinion from the strategic point of view.

SECRET. For Immediate Action. Following for Pearson from Wrong, Begins:

1. Your WA-3156 of May 23rd. Military Supplies for China. The situation with respect to the despatch to India of the second shipment of Canadian munitions was discussed by the War Committee yesterday. The decision reached was that the Combined Chiefs of Staff should be informed immediately that this shipment (the content of which is being sent in a separate message)† was going forward to complete our present commitments to the Chinese; and that, in view of the previous clearance in Washington of the items in the shipment, its despatch should not be regarded as in conflict with the opinion given by the Combined Chiefs of Staff on the strategic essentiality of our munitions programme for China.

2. The most convenient and expeditious method of informing those concerned of this decision may be for the Joint War Aid Committee to hold a meeting at as early a date as possible, but we would be guided by the opinion of the members of the Mutual Aid Advisory Committee on the most suitable procedure to adopt. Whatever course may be followed, it can be made clear that no further shipments of munitions after this consignment will be despatched to India for China except after discussion in Washington through the established channels. Ends.

Dear Mr. Wrong,

Thanks for your secret letter of May 23rd,† regarding the second shipment of munitions for China. I agree that this should be cleared formally with the Combined Chiefs of Staff at the earliest possible moment.

I think it should be made clear to the Chiefs of Staff that the trucks involved in this shipment are only those which go to make up complete 6-pounder gun equipments. We have many times agreed with the Chinese that we would ship complete equipments, and I dislike to go back on our word. Mr. Ralston is convinced that 6-pounder equipments are required by strategic necessity and, as these are not useful without motor equipment, it seems to me that we have no option but to send them complete.

You will recall that the Mutual Aid Board decided not to ship motor trucks which had been planned for this shipment other than those to match the 6-pounders.

I feel that if we can make this shipment as now planned, we can say to the Chinese that we have carried out our agreement with them to the extent that transportation will permit. Until we do so, we are bound to be under continued pressure by the Chinese.

I trust that Mr. Pearson will make every effort to obtain concurrence on the details of the shipment which, I understand, are being supplied to you by Mr. Fraser.

Thanks for your help in this matter.

Yours truly,

Dear Mr. Howe,

Thank you for your letter of May 25th about the vexed matter of the second shipment of war supplies for China. I spoke to Mr. Pearson on the telephone yesterday and he then told me that they had arranged for a special meeting of the Joint War Aid Committee to take place on Monday morning, May 29th, in order to consider this matter. I am glad to say that he was optimistic that the Joint War Aid Committee would not make difficulties and he and the other members of the Canadian side of the Committee will all do their best to settle the matter.

He is of the opinion that it will not be necessary to raise the problem directly with the Combined Chiefs of Staff and that a discussion in the Joint War Aid Committee is the best course of procedure.

You will have received separately copies of two messages which we sent to the Embassy in Washington yesterday, Nos. EX-2189 and EX-2190,<sup>1</sup> on this subject. I am also repeating to Mr. Pearson by teletype your letter to me of May 25th.

Ottawa, May 30, 1944

Mr. Pearson informed me by telephone yesterday afternoon that the Joint War Aid Committee had agreed to the despatch of the second shipment of munitions for China. In giving their concurrence the United States side of the Committee had suggested that the Canadian Government should express to the Chinese authorities the hope that the supplies which Canada was shipping to India, for the delivery there to the Chinese Government, would be made available by China to the forces of other United Nations operating in that theatre if their transportation for use by Chinese forces was delayed and if the supplies were needed by other forces operating in the Southeast Asia Command.

Although we have not yet received a written report of the clearance, I think that it might be useful if you could give this information to the War Committee tomorrow and perhaps secure their authority for our addressing a communication to the Chinese Ambassador in accordance with the suggestion of the Joint War Aid Committee. The recent approach made to me by the Chinese Ambassador over the delay in making the second shipment provides a convenient opportunity for our notifying him that the shipment is about to be made and endorsing the suggestion of the Washington Committee.

If you can possibly work into the record some further statement to the effect that the War Committee considers that no further shipments should be made to China except in complete accordance with the opinion of the Combined Chiefs of Staff that might be helpful. Under this opinion we would be free to clear through the Joint War Aid Committee the despatch of small items readily capable of air transportation for which there was a reasonable assurance that transportation would be provided either by the U.S. Transport Command or the China National Airways Corporation. I think that we ought to limit any attempts at further clearance to small arms, binoculars and similar light items and should refrain from seeking to despatch any more artillery or transport until a land route is opened and in full operation.

MUTUAL AID; CANADIAN MILITARY SUPPLIES FOR CHINA

1. THE SECRETARY, referring to discussions at the previous meeting, reported that word had been received from Washington that the Joint War Aid Committee had confirmed clearance of the third Canadian shipment.

Canadian members of the Committee, at the request of the U.S. side, had agreed that the Canadian government should be asked to express to Chinese authorities the hope that, in the event of circumstances arising which prevented the Chinese from using the Canadian supplies, such supplies would be made available to the forces of any other of the United Nations who might have need of them for the successful prosecution of the war.

(Army Message J.S.78, Canadian Joint Staff, Washington, to Chiefs of Staff Committee, May 29, 1944).†

2. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, noted the Secretary's report, approved communication to the Chinese Ambassador in accordance with the suggestion of the Joint War Aid Committee, and agreed that any further shipments of war supplies to China should be cleared through the Joint War Aid Committee in order to ensure that such shipments were in accordance with the views of the Combined Chiefs of Staff, from the strategic point of view.

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to the enquiry which you addressed last month to Mr. Wrong<sup>233</sup> concerning the despatch from Canada of a further shipment of munitions for delivery in India to representatives of the Government of China. As you may already be aware, arrangements have been completed for the despatch of this consignment of munitions which will leave a Canadian port for India in the very near future.

The Canadian Government is, of course, anxious that war supplies furnished to other United Nations under the Mutual Aid Act are employed against the enemy as quickly as possible and they are concerned that the munitions delivered in India for Chinese use should not by reason of transportation difficulties be held in storage in India if they are required by other forces. I should be glad, therefore, if you would inform the Chinese Government that the Canadian Government hopes that, in the event of circumstances making it impossible for the Chinese Government to use this material at the present time, the Chinese Government will make the material available to any other of the United Nations which might have need of it for the successful prosecution of the war.

Sir,

I have the honour to acknowledge receipt of your note No. 14, dated June 5th, concerning the despatch from Canada of a further shipment of munitions to China.

In reply, I wish to express to you, and through you to the authorities concerned, my deepest thanks for the expeditious manner in which the Canadian Government has complied with my request for the delivery of the above-mentioned shipment. It goes without saying that, when they are despatched to the theatre of operations in China, this and other consignments of Canadian munitions which are now stored in India will be of tremendous assistance to the war effort being put forth by my country.

In regard to the hope expressed by you that this material may be made available to any other of the United Nations in the event of its delivery being made impossible by transportation difficulties, I have already wired my Government. Pending the receipt of a reply, I should like to state that the Chinese Government is naturally most anxious to see that the difficulties involved are speedily removed so as to enable our armed forces to avail of the valuable assistance extended by the Canadian Government.

I think that you should see the enclosed telegram, No. 172 of July 29th, from General Odlum† and copy of the letter from Wrong to Mr. Howe of today† commenting on its contents. Our desire to assist China by providing munitions under Mutual Aid has borne no fruit because of the impossibility of effecting delivery. On top of the transportation problem we have now received the opinion of the United States Military authorities in Chungking to the effect that the Chinese forces for which the equipment was desired are unlikely to be equipped in time to be a factor in this war and that the Chinese themselves may have in mind the equipment of a post-war Army.

We already have in store in Karachi a stockpile of 12,500 tons of Mutual Aid munitions for China, none of which has been moved since the first consignment was delivered several months ago and little or none of which seems likely to be moved. When we add to the other considerations the internal situation of the Chinese Government, I feel that we have done quite as much as we are justified in doing by establishing the stockpile in India and that the supplies now in store in Canada or in process of manufacture for the Chinese should be sent elsewhere if they are needed for operational use. We know that some of them would be welcomed by the French. I understand that Mr. Howe is going to go into the production aspects immediately and that the question will be discussed by the Mutual Aid Board next week. It was referred to at a meeting of the Board last night.

M. This is identical with the Agreements signed with the United Kingdom, Australia and China<sup>235</sup> except that it was necessary to make some alterations in the language of the preamble and at one other point because the French Committee is not recognized as a Government and is, therefore, not one of the United Nations.

It is desirable that the Agreement should be signed in time to be tabled shortly after the recess of Parliament ends. M. Bonneau has to go to Quebec on Friday afternoon. I think that we could have the text ready for signature on Thursday afternoon or Friday morning if that will suit your convenience. I have not consulted Mr. Howe who will, I suppose, sign with you as in the case of the other Agreements.

The French have pressed very strongly that the Agreement should be signed in both English and French originals and I feel that we should certainly agree to this. Although the Russian and Chinese Agreements were signed in English only, we cannot refuse to sign with the French Committee in one of our official languages. I am, therefore, having the text prepared for signature in both languages.<sup>236</sup>

MILITARY AND CIVILIAN SUPPLIES FOR THE FRENCH

A meeting was held in Room 123, East Block, on Monday, November 13th, for the purpose of discussing the question of military and civilian supplies for the French.

Those present were:

Mr. Wrong
Mr. Angus
Mr. Pierce
Mr. Fraser
Mr. MacKay-Smith<sup>237</sup>
Mr. Bryce
Lieut.-Col. McCrimmon<sup>238</sup>
Mr. Weiss<sup>239</sup>
Mr. Riddell<sup>240</sup>

It was noted that requisitions for both civil and military supplies for the French had been held up for over three weeks following the recognition of the French Provisional Government and the anticipated release of French gold and currency holdings in the United States and Canada. The French, meanwhile, have been pressing for a reply of some kind to their requisitions. They are under the impression that general assurances were given to M. Monnet that extensive supplies of all kinds would be available to them under Mutual Aid. There seems now, however, to be general agreement, in view of the improved financial position of the French and of the changed war situation, that the commitment to the French should be reviewed and more carefully defined. It was agreed at the meeting that in making such a review the following considerations should be kept in mind:

1. that the total financial resources made available to the French by the unfreezing of French holdings on this continent were not sufficiently great to meet both the immediate needs of the French for relief, and their long-term needs for reconstruction;
2. that it was desirable that the French should be left with some working balance of holdings on this continent at the conclusion of the war;

<sup>240</sup>Adjoint du sous-secrétaire d'État aux Affaires extérieures.
Assistant to Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs.

3. that Canadian policy in regard to French holdings would have to be concerted with that of United States and the United Kingdom, although it is doubtful if any French holdings of gold or dollars exist in the latter country;

4. that the French should not be able to secure, through Mutual Aid, relief supplies for which payment would be required, if they were made available through UNRRA.

5. that requisitions should not be accepted for military supplies that had to be put into production or civilian supplies that could not be delivered in the current fiscal year.

The French are at present making requests for military supplies to the value of about $25,000,000. and naval supplies to the value of between six and seven million dollars. Requests for civilian supplies are being received at the rate of five or six a day, and include a wide range of products such as agricultural equipment, ships, engines, electrical equipment, railway ties, wireless equipment, lead arsenate, dockyard equipment. Requests have already been granted and orders placed for military and naval equipment up to the value of over fifteen million dollars and civilian supplies up to nearly seven and a half million dollars.

Discussion largely centred about an attempt to define the criteria by which further supplies could be made available to the French under Mutual Aid. A simple distinction between military and civilian supplies would not suffice in this situation. Most of the military supplies requested were admittedly for the use of the so-called "sovereignty" troops employed on garrison duty in North Africa, whose activities bear little relation to the war; some of the civilian supplies, on the other hand, directly affect the French war effort. It was pointed out that Mutual Aid supplies for the United Kingdom are made available only after the financial position of the U.K. Government has been carefully scrutinized, whereas our knowledge of the French financial position was inadequate. No inquiry, however, has been made into the financial position of the Soviet Government in granting Mutual Aid supplies to that country. In regard to military supplies, it was generally agreed that the request for equipment for sovereignty troops was inadmissible, but that we would be prepared to assist in the equipment of French troops being trained for service against the enemy.

In conclusion, there was general agreement that the following recommendations should be placed before the Mutual Aid Board:

1. that all existing specific commitments to the French should be fulfilled;
2. that supplies under Mutual Aid should not be granted to the French for the use of sovereignty troops in North Africa, but that certain strategic military items could be made available under Mutual Aid from production or surplus stores during the present fiscal year and other available items might be procured by the French on either a reimbursable Mutual Aid arrangement or a credit basis;
3. that the requisitions of the French Navy be regarded as eligible under Mutual Aid;

4. that in regard to requisitions for civilian supplies, the criterion might be applied; "It is of importance in waging war against the enemy."

It was decided that a breakdown list of requirements should be prepared by the C.M.A.B. Administration for presentation to the Board in categories as outlined above and also the suggested policy which might be adopted, which includes possible reimbursable Mutual Aid or credit arrangements for items not eligible under Mutual Aid.

It was agreed that, when policy has been clarified by the Board, a full explanation should be given to the French representatives in Ottawa.

MILITARY AND CIVILIAN SUPPLIES FOR THE FRENCH

A meeting was held in Room 123, East Block, on Saturday morning, November 18th, for the purpose of discussing with the representatives of the French Provisional Government the application of the Mutual Aid policy of the Canadian Government to the types of supply which were being sought from Canada by France. The meeting was attended by:

G. Bonneau, Esq., French Delegate
G. Raoul-Duval, Esq., French Delegation
G. Paul Boncour, Esq., French Delegation
F. C. Gilbert-Berthiez, Esq., French Delegation
H. H. Wrong, Esq., Department of External Affairs
H. F. Angus, Esq., Department of External Affairs
S. D. Pierce, Esq., Department of External Affairs
R. G. Riddell, Esq., Department of External Affairs
Oliver Master, Esq., Department of Trade and Commerce
J. H. English, Esq., Department of Trade and Commerce
R. B. Bryce, Esq., Department of Finance
G. R. Heasman, Esq., Mutual Aid Administration
Lieut.-Col. A. M. McCrimmon, Mutual Aid Administration
S. A. MacKay-Smith, Esq., Mutual Aid Administration.

The policy of the Canadian Government was explained to the French representatives. The present position in regard to Mutual Aid was based in part on the changed situation which has arisen out of new strategic circumstances. The establishment of strategic necessity was the basic consideration in applying the Mutual Aid Act but, in determining this, some importance was inevitably attached to the question whether the Government concerned commanded any means of procuring essential supplies other than the use of the Mutual Aid vote; and therefore it was relevant to note that the financial position of the French Government was likely to improve materially in the near future.

The Canadian Government would be prepared to provide, under Mutual Aid, available military and naval supplies which would contribute directly to the prosecution of the war. It was recognized that the United States had undertaken to equip the French armies in Europe, but it was suggested that items which the United States might not be able to furnish or which we might be able to furnish more readily or quickly, could be provided by Canada under Mutual Aid. On the other hand, it would not be possible to make available, under Mutual Aid, supplies for the use of garrison troops in North and West Africa.

In regard to civilian supplies, provision could be made under Mutual Aid only in the case of goods which would be of direct importance to the prosecution of the war and which could be delivered within a reasonably short period of time.

It was recalled that France had not requested UNRRA to furnish relief supplies without payment, and it was pointed out that if Canada undertook to furnish France with what were in effect relief supplies under Mutual Aid, Canada would be undertaking a larger burden for the financing of relief than the fair share which she had undertaken to supply through the international agency established for that particular purpose. Consequently the Mutual Aid Board felt it should not furnish, as Mutual Aid, supplies of a type which UNRRA was furnishing to countries in need of them.

In the course of the discussion, examples were suggested as illustrations of this policy. Material urgently required and immediately available for the purpose of restoring production in the coal and steel industries might be regarded as of importance in the war effort. On the other hand, in the case of agricultural implements, for example, combines for taking off future crops could hardly be regarded as eligible for Mutual Aid, although there might be some agricultural implements urgently needed for immediate requirements of a war nature which could be justified. The French representatives inquired in regard to an order for electric motors for Tunisia. It was suggested that insofar as these motors were for use in naval yards or military repair establishments, they might be available under Mutual Aid. Supplies which would have a very substantial post-war value, for example locomotives, would fail to secure the approval of the Mutual Aid Board. It was difficult to make fully clear in advance the distinction between goods for civilian use which would be accepted and those which would be rejected if applied for under the Mutual Aid program. The end use of any product would be of great importance in reaching a decision and the French representatives would be expected to make a case for the inclusion of any particular product in the Mutual Aid program.

At the same time the Canadian Government wished to assure the French representatives of their desire to put into operation a working system by which the French could secure supplies which were available in Canada without undue delay. If the existence of alternative methods of securing supplies were kept in mind, greater speed in the delivery of goods could be assured. For this purpose it was suggested to the French that they provide themselves with a cash account through which payment could be made for spot items that were not acceptable under the Mutual Aid program. Supplies available in Canada and required for the equipment of French garrison troops in Africa could be purchased in this way.

The French representatives raised the question of the purchase of supplies on credit and asked if the system established under the Export Credit Act was yet working. They inquired specifically if a requisition for trawlers, which had been rejected by the Mutual Aid Board, could be presented with the object of purchase through the extension of a long-term credit. They were assured that application could now be made for credits of this nature.

The French representatives next inquired whether or not anything in the nature of reimbursable lend-lease were available in Canada. It became clear during the discussion that the term "reimbursable lend-lease" had not been clearly defined. It was not certain, for example, that arrangements of this nature in the United States represented a short-term credit. It was suggested that, since the resources available under the Mutual Aid Act were limited, the Board would probably be unwilling to make use of its funds for the purpose of advancing credits. It would not appear now that the French Government would require short-term credits in view of the balances of gold and foreign exchange it would have at its disposal. It was also pointed out that any reimbursable Mutual Aid arrangements which could be contemplated by Canada would presumably be only for purposes of enabling the Mutual Aid Administration to act as agents with power to make short-term advances on behalf of the French Government in cases of urgency.

In summary, it was made clear to the French representatives that there were three possible ways of acquiring military and civilian supplies in Canada. The first was through the Mutual Aid Act; the second through payment of cash and the third through the extension of long-term credits.

At the close of the meeting Mr. Bonneau spoke of the importance of establishing, during the present emergency, channels of trade which would persist into the post-war period. He hoped that the knowledge which the French were now gaining of Canadian products would lead them to look to Canadian markets in the future. There was general agreement that the points mentioned by Mr. Bonneau were important and should be constantly borne in mind.

DESPATCH 330

Ottawa, November 25, 1944

SECRET

Sir,

I have the honour to enclose for your information a copy of the record of a discussion between representatives of the French Provisional Government and representatives of various Government Departments, concerning military and civilian supplies for the French, which took place on Saturday, November 18th. The application of the Canadian Mutual Aid policy to the problems of supply presented by the French has been under consideration here for some time. The French requisitions have included a wide variety of products, including military supplies for the garrison troops in North and West Africa, naval supplies both for immediate use in the prosecution of the war and for permanent use in French naval installations, and civilian supplies of various kinds.

These questions were considered by the Canadian Mutual Aid Board at a recent meeting at which the following general statements were adopted as guides in applying the Mutual Aid policy to the French requests:

1. That all existing specific commitments to the French should be fulfilled;
2. That supplies under Mutual Aid should not be granted to the French for the use of sovereignty troops in North Africa, but that certain strategic military items could be made available under Mutual Aid from production or surplus stores; and that other available items might be procured by the French on either a reimbursable Mutual Aid arrangement or a credit basis, or for cash;
3. That the requisitions for the French Navy be regarded as eligible under Mutual Aid;
4. That in regard to requisitions for civilian supplies, the criterion might be applied: "Is it of importance in waging war against the enemy, and can it be supplied quickly?"

The decisions of the Board were communicated to the French representatives at the meeting the record of which I am now forwarding. In the course of the meeting the French representatives were assured that the Canadian Government desired to find means of making available to the French, as speedily as possible, any supplies for which they had need and which could be secured in Canada. For this purpose various procedures were suggested by which supplies which were available in Canada could be released to the French rapidly.

The decisions of the Mutual Aid Board together with the arrangements which are nearing completion for the release of French funds frozen in Canada should place the French in a position in which it will be possible for them to secure extensive supplies of various kinds in Canada. They will also have at their disposal funds which have been made available to them in Ottawa in payment for the francs used for the pay of Canadian troops in France.

Dear General Vanier,

A line in amplification of our despatch No.330 of November 25th concerning Mutual Aid policy may be of some value to you. One point which I wish to make quite clear is that requests for supplies from the French are being considered in just the same way as requests for supplies from other foreign countries. There is not one Mutual Aid policy towards France and one towards China and Russia. With respect to supplies for the United Kingdom and other parts of the sterling area fundamentally the determination of what can be charged to the Mutual Aid vote is the same as that made in the case of France and other foreign countries. Our financial relationships with the United Kingdom are, however, very complicated. In practice they make over to us all their Canadian dollar receipts and we pay for the goods and services furnished from Canada either from these receipts or from the Mutual Aid vote, depending on how the balances stand. The criteria of eligibility for Mutual Aid, however, are a constant factor.

Our information is that at present the United Kingdom is furnishing the French with essential military supplies under their Mutual Aid Agreement with France. They are requiring cash payment for all civilian supplies and do not intend to extend credit to the French for the purchase of such supplies. The United States similarly are furnishing military supplies to France under straight lend-lease but are providing all civilian supplies under what is known as reimbursable lend-lease, which is probably equivalent in effect to a short-term credit. We are prepared to furnish essential military supplies which follow the definition of purpose in the preamble to the Mutual Aid Act, under Mutual Aid, and we are also prepared to provide under Mutual Aid certain restricted categories of civilian supplies which will contribute directly to the prosecution of the war and can be furnished quickly. Thus we are not at present applying as strict a standard of eligibility as the standards adopted in either the United States or the United Kingdom in so far as the provision of civilian supplies is concerned.

The French have been asking us for widely assorted lists of civilian supplies required for metropolitan France and the French colonies. Virtually all of these items cannot be regarded as eligible under Mutual Aid which requires the distribution of war supplies under the Act to be made "in accordance with strategic needs in such manner as to contribute most effectively to the winning of the war." The French financial position has now changed so that it is possible for them to pay cash for most of the miscellaneous things that they want to get from Canada. The Order-in-Council releasing the French Government funds held here was passed on November 27th and they will be able to draw on these funds as soon as we are notified from Paris who is authorized to sign on their behalf; the total amount involved is almost 160 million U.S. dollars. The much larger amount of gold belonging to the Bank of France will also be released as soon as the necessary formalities have been complied with. I do not wish to give you the impression that we intend to strip the French bare of their foreign exchange. We cannot, however, be harder financially on the United Kingdom than on France, and we think that they should now be able to pay cash for at least a large range of miscellaneous small orders which they wish to place here. If they attach great urgency to getting equipment for their garrison troops in Africa they could also purchase what we are able to provide. We have assured them that we are prepared to consider the extension of a credit under the Export Credits Act for the provision of reconstruction supplies, but they should now be able to buy for cash their miscellaneous spot items.

The French here have been having great difficulty in getting financial matters cleared in Paris. We arranged with them, as you know, some time ago to pay them Canadian dollars in Ottawa for the francs which we were needing for the pay of Canadian troops in France. There has been lying idle in Ottawa for some time the proceeds of this arrangement because the French representatives here have not been able to get authority to draw on the account. I hope that this difficulty will very soon be resolved.

We have been rather concerned to hear reports that the French feel that we are more restrictive than the United States in arranging for the provision of supplies. Of course the volume that they draw from the United States is vastly greater and the United States is able through their supply services in France and North Africa to investigate needs in a manner not open to us. We have, however, a working arrangement with the United States authorities for clearing French requests through the Joint War Aid Committee in Washington and this arrangement works not too badly. Close collaboration with them is quite essential for a series of reasons, such as the avoidance of duplication, the arrangement of shipping priorities and the assessment of strategic need.

As you know, we feel that confusion would result if we did not concentrate as far as possible in Ottawa the discussion of these supply questions. You should, however, have a general understanding of what the position is. It is quite true that the French have not secured as much from us under Mutual Aid as they expected to get or we expected to give when we offered them Mutual Aid in the summer of last year. It took them a very long time indeed to develop their own procedure and it is only within the last couple of months that they have set up a Supply Council in Ottawa through which their requests are channeled. Until then we were receiving unrelated requests from half a dozen different sources.

Finally, I should add a word about the general position of Mutual Aid. The existing vote will be entirely exhausted by the end of this fiscal year. The form and the amount of its renewal are not yet decided and are matters of high Government policy. Until a decision is taken we are virtually inhibited from placing orders for the manufacture of Mutual Aid supplies which cannot be delivered until the next fiscal year. We shall let you know when the policy of the Government on this point has been determined.<sup>241</sup>

Yours sincerely,

DESPATCH 150

Ottawa, February 12, 1944

SECRET

Sir,

With reference to my telegram of yesterday, I have the honour to enclose a copy of the Mutual Aid Agreement signed on February 11th between Canada and the United Kingdom.<sup>242</sup> The Agreement with the Soviet Government<sup>243</sup> signed on the same day is identical with the enclosure except in the following respects:

(a) Because of the special Protocol procedure for determining supplies to Russia Article III of the Soviet Agreement has been altered to refer to this procedure;

(b) Article VII has been dropped from the Soviet Agreement in view of Russia's neutrality in the war against Japan. We have in fact given no cargo ships to Russia; if we were to do so while retaining title this would be an invitation to the Japanese to interfere with the trans-Pacific traffic to Vladivostok;

Further expenditures on Mutual Aid were provided for under the War Appropriation Act, No. 1, 1945, assented to April 16, 1945. See Canada, Statutes of Canada, 9 George VI, Chapter 3.

<sup>243</sup>Voir Canada, Recueil des traités, 1944, N° 4.
See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 4.

(c) For similar reasons the words "or in ocean transit" in Article VIII have been dropped from the Soviet Agreement.

2. We have undertaken to enter into an exchange of notes with the United Kingdom Government on the interpretation of Article V of the Agreement setting forth the conditions governing the diversion to other countries of war supplies containing an element of Mutual Aid. Certain supplies, probably containing such an element, have already been diverted to third countries for some consideration. The terms of the exchange of notes are being worked out between the financial authorities here and the United Kingdom High Commissioner's Office.

3. The application of the Mutual Aid procedure to war supplies going to the United Kingdom has involved complicated financial arrangements which are now in operation.<sup>244</sup> The practical effect of these arrangements is to ensure that the receipts of Canadian dollars by the United Kingdom Government are in general devoted to the payment for Canadian supplies and only the cost of those supplies which is not met by current receipts is charged against the Mutual Aid vote. The substitution of the Mutual Aid procedure for the billion dollar gift has also necessitated what may be described as the dissection of the sterling area with the purpose of arranging that other Commonwealth countries should receive as direct Mutual Aid from Canada (rather than indirectly via the United Kingdom) the Canadian war supplies which they are unable to pay for from their current receipts, direct and indirect, of Canadian dollars. Negotiations are still proceeding with various Commonwealth Governments on the exact methods to be adopted. Difficulties in completing the technical arrangements have not, however, interfered with the movement of Canadian supplies.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

35. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE reported that an early decision was required upon the means to be adopted in meeting the heavy financial deficits which the

U.K. government were incurring in excess of present provisions in respect of war supplies purchased from Canada.

36. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE explained that total United Nations' requirements were estimated at some $15 hundred to $16 hundred million, of which the greater part represented supplies for Britain.

The Mutual Aid appropriation of $8 hundred million, together with a carry over from last year's appropriation of $87 million, would meet part of these requirements, but a net deficit of some $7 hundred million would remain. This would fall almost entirely upon the United Kingdom.

It should be borne in mind that the balance of this $7 hundred million represented war supplies already delivered or for which there were firm commitments. It should also be borne in mind that Canada had an important stake in the future prosperity and sound financial position of the United Kingdom.

During the recent Prime Ministers' meeting in London, U.K. Treasury officials had made certain suggestions to the Under-Secretary of State for External Affairs:

(a) that Canada assume responsibility, at an estimated cost of $120 million, for advanced and operational training of R.C.A.F. personnel in Britain;

(b) that the present capitation rate of 4/6 per man per day to cover maintenance of the Army overseas be raised to cover increased costs of maintenance on a basis of active military operations;

(C.M.H.Q. were of the opinion that the capitation rate should be 18s to 25s which was the estimated average cost of maintaining an army on active operations. U.K. officials have suggested that the rate should be 30 to 35 shillings in view of the fact that the Canadian Army was very heavily armoured).

(c) that Canada assume a proportionate share, estimated at $250 million, of the U.K. costs of carrying reserve stores which were drawn upon by the R.C.A.F. and Canadian Army.

37. DR. CLARK suggested that it might be reasonable to go some distance toward accepting the first and second ((a) and (b) above) of these proposals. The third, however, did not seem reasonable in view of the fact that the supplies involved were built up in substantial part by gifts or by Mutual Aid assistance from Canada.

In addition the U.K. government might fairly be expected to reimburse Canada in gold or U.S. dollars for the U.S. dollar content of Canadian war supplies produced in Canada for British account. This would involve probably some $250 to $275 million in U.S. funds.

The remaining gap might be met by a Canadian credit to the United Kingdom on the basis of an open-book account.

(Deputy Minister's memorandum, June, 1944).†

38. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR observed that the proposed increase in R.C.A.F. squadrons from forty-four to fifty-eight, referred to earlier in the meeting,<sup>245</sup> would carry with it an obligation for equipment and maintenance which might run from $200 to $300 million.

39. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, authorized negotiations with the U.K. government along the following lines:

(a) Canada to assume responsibility for the cost of advanced and operational training in Britain of R.C.A.F. personnel;

(b) Canada to assume responsibility for increased capitation payments to the U.K. government for the Canadian Army Overseas at an increased rate to be worked out by C.M.H.Q. with the approval of the Department of Finance on a basis of actual cost of Canadian formations;

(c) the U.K. Treasury's suggestions regarding carrying charges on reserve stores in England to be refused;

(d) the U.K. government to be requested to make payment to Canada in gold or U.S. dollars for the U.S. content of Canadian war supplies provided to Britain;

(e) an open book credit to be granted to the U.K. government for any remaining deficit of Canadian dollars.

U.K.-CANADA FINANCIAL RELATIONS;
 R.C.A.F. EXPENDITURES

12. THE MINISTER OF NATIONAL DEFENCE FOR AIR, referring to the discussion at the previous meeting, submitted a report recommending that, in considering assumption of any further liabilities on behalf of the R.C.A.F. overseas, priority be given to payment of the costs of additional R.C.A.F. squadrons.

Proposals for the formation of fourteen additional R.C.A.F. squadrons for overseas service, following the conclusion of the German war, had already been discussed and tentatively accepted as a basis for planning. These proposals would involve an estimated initial cost of $36,000,000 and an annual recurring cost of $111,000,000.

This expenditure would be more justifiable than assumption of the costs of advanced and operational training in Britain which, under existing agreements, was borne by the U.K. government.

13. THE PRIME MINISTER questioned the wisdom of making further substantial reductions, at this time, in the amounts of the U.K. government's indebtedness.

14. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after discussion, agreed that the decision taken at the meeting of June 14th be amended to substitute costs of additional R.C.A.F. squadrons overseas, as recommended by the Minister of National Defence for Air, for the costs of advanced and operational training in the United Kingdom.

NOTES ON MEETING IN OFFICE OF MINISTER OF FINANCE
TO DISCUSS UNITED KINGDOM FINANCING - AUGUST 1/44

The meeting had been arranged as the first of several discussions between Lord Keynes and others on the U.K. side and Canadian Ministers and officials, to deal with the general financial arrangements between Canada and the United Kingdom and their relation to Mutual Aid and to Canadian war expenditures overseas. Those present included, on the U.K. side, Lord Keynes, Sir Wilfred Eadie, the Hon. Mr. R. H. Brand, Rt. Hon. Malcolm MacDonald, and Mr. Gordon Munro; and on the Canadian side, the Hon. Mr. Ilsley, Dr. W. C. Clark, Mr. Graham Towers, Mr. Norman Robertson, Mr. Hume Wrong and Mr. R. B. Bryce. Mr. Ilsley was in the chair from the time the meeting opened at 9.30 a.m. until 11 a.m., when Dr. Clark took the chair until the meeting ended at 11.30 a.m.

Lord Keynes opened the discussion with a long statement setting forth the external financial position of the United Kingdom and its relation to the period of the war against Japan and the immediate post-war situation. In commencing, he said that the general problem facing the U.K. is to get through the Japanese phase of the war, which he called "Stage 2", with sufficient overseas reserves and borrowing power left that it would be possible for the U.K. then to weather "Stage 3"—the transitional period of three years or more during which the United Kingdom's imports are likely to exceed its exports by a wide margin. Unless satisfactory arrangements can be made, the U.K. will be faced now with the possibility of depleting its essential reserves or incurring debts outside the sterling area which will use up its safe margin of borrowing power before the difficult and critical years of Stage 3 are reached.

Lord Keynes referred to the discussions with Mr. Ilsley and Dr. Clark at Bretton Woods on this general subject and said he felt some explanation was desirable of how it was that the U.K. could contemplate further borrowing from sterling area countries during Stage 2 on top of its present indebtedness to the sterling area, while asking Canada to offer her further assistance during this period. Before considering the situation of individual parts of the sterling area, he wished to emphasize that an important part of the explanation is to be found in the arrangements under which the various parts of the sterling area have lodged their currency reserves with the U.K. and turned over to the U.K. all their net earnings outside the sterling area. Consequently, part of the sterling debt incurred by the U.K. represents essentially the accrual of dollars to other parts of the sterling area which the U.K. is having to purchase and use itself for current purposes.

Lord Keynes then went on to discuss the situation in respect of the various parts of the sterling area. In the case of New Zealand there has been no accumulation of sterling. The balances held by New Zealand in London remain just the working balances which they held at the beginning of the war. They handed over substantial earnings of U.S. dollars to the U.K. while at the same time they have had to supply Mutual Aid to the United States, as reverse Lend-Lease, on a substantial scale. Had New Zealand been able to retain the dollars which she earned, she would be better off.

Australia until recently had not increased its sterling holdings to any substantial extent. However, she has recently been earning a substantial surplus of dollars, mainly from the expenditures of U.S. troops in Australia. These have been turned over to the U.K. for sterling and as a consequence Australia has been building up its sterling balances until they are now larger than the normal pre-war levels. Had Australia been able to retain the dollars she earned, she would be in a much stronger position than she will in fact be in after the war. In the meantime, Australia is having to furnish very substantial aid to the U.S. forces. Australians claim that they are being put in a most unfavourable financial position as a consequence of this very substantial Mutual Aid given the U.S. and the turning over of their dollars to the sterling pool. She is meeting a small maturity of some £8 million out of accumulated sterling in the near future. Of course, Australia has very substantial long-term sterling liabilities. In turning over their dollars to the U.K., Australia feels that they have put themselves completely in the hands of the U.K. as far as their post-war reserve situation is concerned. Lord Keynes later in the discussion emphasized that sterling reserves before the war could be considered as equivalent to gold, but there would be a new situation at the end of the war when the U.K. will be quite unable to ensure convertibility for all the balances held in London by the various parts of the sterling area.

Turning to South Africa, Lord Keynes noted that this Dominion has not had to bear anything like the financial burdens during the war that the other Dominions had. She was meeting substantial expenditures during the fighting in North Africa, but recently her war expenditures have not been on a scale anything like that of Canada, for example. Consequently she has had no real financial problem as we would understand it. She has piled up a good deal of her own gold. She has made all of her external payments through the U.K. and pays the U.K. whatever gold is required to obtain the foreign exchange for this purpose. She has paid off all but about £30 million of her public debt and is prepared to repatriate this remaining amount in gold whenever the U.K. wishes, but the U.K. has not wished as yet to avail itself of this option.

In answer to a question by Dr. Clark concerning the repatriation of private securities, Lord Keynes said that South Africa has been purchasing Kaffirs from London for some time. Until lately the Bank of England had no accurate figures on the matter, but has made some inquiries in recent months. Offhand, his opinion was that it might amount to perhaps £10 million a year, which would be a substantial movement but not an enormous one. Mr. Ilsley noted that this repatriation of private securities is a suggestion often put forward in Canada and the Government is criticized for not having bought back some, or even all, of the U.K. holdings of Canadian private securities. Lord Keynes noted that the U.K. has deposited very large amounts of these Canadian securities as security for its Canadian dollar loan.

Lord Keynes went on to discuss the situation in respect of the Crown Colonies, which he said might produce some embarrassment for the U.K. after the war. The U.K. is in the position of trustee in regard to these Colonies and cannot require them very well to contribute to the costs of the war, although they have been encouraged to make interest-free loans to the U.K. when they had budget surpluses that would enable them to do so. The U.K. now owes these Colonies an amount in the neighborhood of £500 million, and these Colonies are "stuffed with money." A large part of the amount owed to these Colonies represents their various reserves held in the U.K., notably their currency reserves and their pension fund reserves. There has been some accumulation of funds as well from the net accruals of foreign exchange turned over to the sterling area pool. In answer to a question, Lord Keynes indicated that the West Indies have not accumulated large reserves during the war, and that the most important holders were various African Colonies. Later in the discussion Lord Keynes stated that the U.K. would probably have to be more ready to provide foreign exchange to these Crown Colonies for their sterling than would be necessary or possible in the case of other holders of large sterling balances.

India is, of course, the largest holder of sterling balances arising out of the war. An important part of these balances represents Indian currency reserves. Another important part represents the accumulation of India's net dollar receipts which have been turned over to the sterling area pool. Of these a large portion arose out of commercial operations—indeed, such a large part that the U.K. Cabinet was surprised when the figures were made known to them. It has commonly been thought in the U.K., as elsewhere, that a large part of these sterling balances held by India represented the expenses of the Indian Army borne by the U.K. in accordance with the financial agreement between the two countries, but in fact investigation has shown that this constitutes a much smaller part of the total than was expected. The largest item of all, constituting more than half the total debt, consists of payments by the U.K. to India for her very substantial munitions output required for use outside of India, mainly in the Middle East. The fact that the U.K. has had to go into debt to India to buy this munitions output indicates that the situation is not parallel to that in other parts of the Empire, and in particular, that India has clearly not gone anything like the same distance as Canada in the provision of war supplies to the common cause.

It was noted, however, that what India herself has done is huge, despite the burden that the U.K. has assumed in financing India. Sir Wilfred Eadie pointed out that Indian war and defence expenditures during the war period have amounted to approximately £590 million, which might be compared with a figure for the same period at the pre-war rate of perhaps £120-£130 million. This should be viewed in relation to the very limited financial power of the central Government, whose total tax revenue was formerly about £195 million a year, which was recently increased by about £60 million a year. This limited financial power is due to the enormous population which lives at a bare subsistence level. The whole of Indian agriculture, in fact, is exceedingly difficult to tax in any way. Lord Keynes noted that India's industrial population was taxed much like the rest of us. He also noted that India has suffered very substantially from the economic effects of the war. For example, the famine, caused very largely by the loss of food imports from Burma (and presumably as well by the shortage of transport due to war needs), has probably brought about a greater loss of life than that in all the Allied armed forces. Lord Keynes stated that the whole question of financial relations with India has recently been reconsidered by a Committee of the United Kingdom Cabinet, with a view to reopening the whole situation if that appeared justified. Even the Indians realize that they have done relatively well financially out of the war, as a nation. However, there are very great difficulties in securing any alteration in the arrangements. They would need to be approved by the Viceroy's Council, which includes only two English among a considerable number of Indians. The U.K. has been told that if it presses for a revision of these financial arrangements, all of the Indian members of the Viceroy's Council would be apt to resign. While the U.K. Government therefore feel that the end of the story has not yet been reached by any manner of means, they do not wish to make it too exciting at the present time. Consequently their conclusion is that it is the course of wisdom to do nothing further about the Indian arrangements at present.

Egypt is the other large creditor of the U.K. at present, holding balances which probably amount now to something between £250 and £300 million. Hers is an outrageous case. She is, of course, still a neutral country. The United Kingdom was in very serious difficulties there in the early part of the war and had to agree to quite unreasonable propositions. In particular, as Sir Wilfred Eadie pointed out, the British forces had to buy as much as possible of their foodstuffs locally, and the Egyptians were well aware of the difficulties of the British and exploited their bargaining position. Moreover, it was necessary to induce a substantial increase in the acreage planted to various crops, although it was not possible to provide the farmers with any goods in return. Consequently quite substantial prices had to be offered as an inducement, for example, £40 per ton for cereals. There is no doubt, Sir Wilfred said, that the U.K. was badly stung. However, this was inevitable. A good deal of the Egyptian balances arose from this process. Lord Keynes pointed out that the fate of much of these Egyptian holdings of sterling was somewhat obscure. A considerable part of them represents the holdings of individuals and unofficial bodies, held by the Bank of Egypt.

Lord Keynes went on to speak of the neutrals. With the European neutrals it has not been possible to make very satisfactory arrangements. Most of the U.K. expenses have been for secret service work, the Red Cross, and prisoners of war assistance, and obviously she was not in a position to bargain in these fields. In Portugal there have been very heavy expenses in connection with pre-emptive buying, particularly in the case of wolfram, where the price paid has been 30 to 40 times the pre-war price. These European expenditures have had to be covered in gold. Therefore, although no debts have been accumulated, the expenditures have caused quite considerable depletion in the U.K. reserves.

In the case of the South American countries, the U.K. debts are not large and in all cases are less than the assets held by the U.K. in those countries. Lord Keynes said they would doubtless be dealt with by the liquidation of assets, but the U.K. preferred to do it when their bargaining position was better.

Even the financial arrangements with some of the smaller Allied nations have caused the U.K. difficulty. For example, the U.K. has accumulated debts to Norway of some £60-70 million, due largely to payments to the Norwegian Merchant Marine which managed to escape from Axis control. In the case of Greece, the figure of £50 million was given as an approximate total of British obligations, some of which, however, were funds given to Greece during the period immediately before her occupation.

After this long review of the situation vis-à-vis the various countries, Lord Keynes noted that it is difficult to get any useful analogy to the Canadian case. Unquestionably Canada has given the U.K. a much better deal than anyone else has. The United States has, of course, given a greater absolute amount of assistance, but there have been bickerings and disputes over details, which have not been present in Canada. As a consequence, the U.K. authorities have appreciated this detailed cooperation, as well as the magnitude of the total assistance. He admitted that the U.K. cannot defend itself against the charge that in its relations with Canada "one good deed leads to the expectation of another." He pointed out, however, that in the other cases where the U.K. has not been able to secure as favourable arrangements, it has not lain within their power to act otherwise than they have acted. It is now the intention of the U.K. Government to take advantage of the improved war situation to stiffen up wherever possible. Undoubtedly in the earlier years of the war there was some financial appeasement. It was considered absolutely necessary at the time. The only place where it was on a great scale, however, was India, and, to a lesser extent, Egypt.

Lord Keynes stated that there is no doubt the U.K. will have to borrow up to the full amount which she will be able to repay. They feel very definitely, however, that the amount which they will be able to borrow and repay will be barely sufficient for Stage 3. If they are forced to use it in Stage 2 for financing their requirements during the war against Japan, they will have an appalling problem in Stage 3 which will necessitate very severe restrictions upon imports. If the U.K. have to start incurring war debts to the U.S. during Stage 2, it will create a most embarrassing problem for all of us. In the case of Canada, he believed it would be easier for Canadian authorities to continue assistance of the Mutual Aid type in Stage 2 than it would be to do anything of that nature in Stage 3. They assume that all assistance in Stage 3 must take the form of credit. As regards the sterling area in Stage 3, it is expected that far from being able to borrow sterling from them, the U.K. will have to reduce its obligations because they represent in part the exchange reserves of the sterling area, some of which will have to be used for the purchase of imports from the dollar area. The politique that is being followed is to borrow further from them during Stage 2 and repay something during Stage 3.

At this point Mr. Ilsley noted that it is not going to appear very reasonable to the Canadian public if the U.K. is borrowing from Canada and paying back its obligations to the sterling area. He said that already people in Canada were showing some interest in the $12 billion figure given for U.K. obligations and that in the Banking and Commerce Committee, for example, this figure had been mentioned and it had been said that "Canada has none of it," or at least only $700 million. He said that the only answer he has been able to give to Canadians who point to this large accumulation of sterling and suggest that Canada should accumulate sterling similarly, is to say that it is blocked in the U.K., or will be. In answer to this Lord Keynes said that it is quite safe to forecast that it will be blocked and will not be convertible except by special arrangements or possibly in the case of the Crown Colonies, where an unusual obligation exists. For the rest, it will probably have to be liquidated in the purchase of goods by the U.K. Mr. Ilsley said that he would take no exception to the principle of allowing these accumulated sterling balances to be used for the purchase of goods from the U.K. In fact, he said he had told Canadians a number of times that the only way in which such an accumulation of sterling could be liquidated was by purchasing more from the U.K. or selling less to the U.K. Lord Keynes noted that the Indians had been quite pleased to hear that the U.K. would be ready to provide goods to liquidate their sterling obligation to India, with the inference that the Indians were fearful that they might not be able to realize in any way upon a part of this accumulated sterling.

Dr. Clark, picking up a remark made about British exports in Stage 2, asked whether the U.K. would not be able to get back into the export market more quickly than the U.S. Lord Keynes said that was not the way things were moving at present, in fact quite the contrary was the case. The U.K. is prevented by its shortage of manpower from getting back into the export market, and will probably remain short of manpower even in Stage 2. This will be due in part to the large army of occupation which it will be necessary for the U.K. to maintain in Europe, as it is now understood that the U.S. will be maintaining only relatively small occupation forces, so that the areas not occupied by Russia will fall to be occupied by the United Kingdom. Moreover, it was pointed out that the U.S. already has a large margin available for civilian consumption, some of which can be diverted to export purposes and which in any event makes it possible to devote additional resources converted from war production to export purposes, rather than domestic requirements. Sir Wilfred Eadie pointed out that at the beginning of Stage 2 much of the British manpower will be far away from the U.K., and it will take a considerable period to repatriate it.

Lord Keynes gave some figures concerning prospective U.K. trade for 1945. He said that exports in 1943 had amounted to about £300 million in value. At the prices expected in 1945 this would be equivalent to £350 million. It is forecast that exports in 1945 will in fact be £450 million, i.e., up by about £100 million over the 1943 level in real terms. However, the price of imports is also expected to be higher and the volume of imports is so great that the U.K. expects to be further behind than ever in 1945. It is thought that imports worth £1,100 million in 1943 prices will be required, but that they will in fact cost £1,400 million. Sir Wilfred Eadie pointed out another factor bearing on the export possibilities—the relatively concentrated war industry in the United States, designed comparatively recently, and noted that the aircraft, for example, required for the war in the Far East, would be produced in a few large plants. In the U.K., on the other hand, Mosquito aircraft, a type that would be very urgently needed for the Pacific war, were built almost entirely by the furniture trade, which could not possibly be reconverted to peacetime requirements until the production of Mosquitoes was suspended. Lord Keynes pointed out too the reduction in civilian consumption in the U.K. compared with the U.S. Their figures indicated that in real terms civilian consumption in the U.S. had gone up from 100 before the war to 115, whereas in the U.K. it had gone down from 100 to 79. Moreover, workers in the U.K. were working far longer hours and under greater strain. The moment that Britain relaxes, much of her present effort will disappear and the time will be used for leisure, which is very much required after the great strain of the war. This, as well as the other influences, will prevent a quick resumption of export trade.

Lord Keynes said that before the war the U.K. had an excess of overseas assets over overseas liabilities of approximately £3,500,000,000. She expected to end up after the war a net debtor to the extent of about £2,000,000,000. How she is going to make good this change in her capital and income position by means of an expansion of exports is very difficult to envisage. No other country has a similar problem arising from the war. Russia has, of course, suffered great devastation and loss internally, but she has accumulated no external debt and has gold which may amount to as much as £1,000,000,000. Her problem is essentially to revise her internal economy which, though difficult, is within her own control. Britain on the other hand must reorganize its external economic relations and achieve a great increase in export sales, which are very much more difficult to control. The debt that Britain must pay is not large in relation to her total income, but to turn it into exports is exceedingly difficult. It will require 3 to 5 years to readjust the current balance of payments to the new situation. It is going to require action which will be a frightful disappointment to the British public, who have been hoping for a return to a good life and a normal life after the war. Sir Wilfred Eadie pointed out that it will require a type of reconversion similar to that required in the transition from peace to war. It will involve priorities for exports. The British housewife will be severely disillusioned when she learns that the cotton and wool trades of England are fully occupied, yet supplies in England of these commodities are still seriously short.

Mr. Bryce asked what the British expectation was in regard to their terms of trade after the war. Lord Keynes said that they had been assuming much the same terms of trade as before, but that his feeling was that this was a somewhat pessimistic assumption for the short run and optimistic for the long run. He thought the scarcity of manufactured goods immediately after the war would favour the U.K., while on the other hand the U.K. must expect that over the long run the price of the farm products and raw materials which they buy could not remain in as favourable a relation to the prices of manufactured goods as they were before the war. Asked whether the disappearance of the export power of Germany and Japan after the war would not help the U.K., he said that his own belief was that this would be of considerable help to Britain in building up her export trade, and that the effect of it was being underestimated in the U.K.

There was a brief discussion of the way in which it might be possible to put in simple terms the reason why the U.K. has had to borrow substantial amounts from sterling area countries while getting Mutual Aid from Canada. It was recognized that it was difficult to put the argument in simple form or to generalize easily to cover the various types of individual cases involved. It was suggested that emphasis might be laid upon the fact that sterling area countries handed over their currency reserves to the U.K., and, secondly, that they were turning in their net earnings of dollars to the U.K. for sterling. Mr. Towers and Dr. Clark felt that the point about the currency reserves would be difficult to put in a way that would be clear or convincing to many Canadians, but the other point might be more convincing. Mr. Ilsley noted, however, that it would be hard to use these arguments because his colleagues and, he feared, the public, might point out that we had little in the way of reserves that we might have been able to turn over at the beginning of the war and were not able to add substantially to them during the early years of the war. In fact, we had had to use up some of our dollar reserves in order to provide goods to the U.K.—a situation which is the reverse of that which is being suggested as a basis for a justification of borrowing from the sterling area.

There was a brief discussion of the question as to whether India had not made a special arrangement to get some gold, or assurance of gold, from the U.K. Lord Keynes said that the suggested arrangement did not in fact come off. The U.K. had, however, been selling substantial amounts of gold in the Indian market, which itself provided India with gold which might some day be used to buy abroad. However these gold sales were being discontinued and as a consequence it may be necessary to make some arrangements in 1945 by which India will be assured of some gold reserves.

Mr. Ilsley pointed out that the Canadian Government is in a weak position now in regard to Mutual Aid and similar policies. Public sentiment is changing and becoming less generous and more self-seeking. Many now feel that Mutual Aid was a noble experiment which worked for a time but cannot be maintained. He said that Canada must not be put in a position where she has to stand out in front of the procession in a matter of this kind. If she had had some followers among other countries, it would be easier to maintain a Mutual Aid policy. Commenting upon this, Lord Keynes noted that if Canada uses up Britain's capacity to borrow now, she will have difficulty selling to Britain in Stage 3. He pointed out that the British position was not as strong as it appeared. They have not played up their true position, because part of their strength has been due to people not knowing their weaknesses. Mr. Brand pointed out that in any event, Canadians can realize that in helping the U.K. they are helping a country that is itself bearing a full share of the burdens of the war.

Mr. Ilsley noted the suggestion which the Canadian Government had put forward that Britain should pay for the estimated United States content of munitions provided to her this year by Canada. In addition, the Canadian Government has made certain proposals in regard to expenditures overseas, and has suggested that the balance of the deficit be accumulated on credit. He noted that the U.K. authorities did not wish to pay us in United States dollars as had been suggested, and did not wish to incur debts to us at this time. He wished to confirm this reaction. He also noted that there has been considerable agitation in Canada that we should repatriate private Canadian securities held in the U.K. In particular, however, he wished to emphasize that it would be hard to justify Canada ending the war owing the U.K. more in the form of securities and otherwise than the U.K. owes to Canada. Lord Keynes replied to this saying that at the end of Stage 3, as he contemplated it, Mr. Ilsley's contention would be met, and that it was essentially a problem of timing now. He could see no other solution to the difficulties to be encountered in Stage 3 than credit terms, and felt that the purchases on credit should be reserved for that period.

At this stage Mr. Ilsley explained that it would now be necessary for him to go to the House of Commons, and wondered whether the discussion might continue in his absence on the detailed proposals which the U.K. representatives said they would wish to put forward. After brief discussion, it was agreed that the meeting would continue with Dr. Clark in the chair.

Lord Keynes outlined the general nature of the suggestions which the U.K. had in respect of the current fiscal year and in respect of Stage 2. They think that there are various types of accounting adjustments relating particularly to the expenses borne by the Canadian services overseas, some of which would not stand the critical scrutiny of the Canadian authorities but the remainder of which, taken together, would more than look after the deficit which cannot be financed by Mutual Aid this year. These adjustments would not require an additional Mutual Aid Appropriation, but an increase in the Canadian War Appropriation itself. Lord Keynes then went on to discuss the problem of Stage

2, which he thought would commence before the end of the current fiscal year. He said that the Canadian authorities do not at present know the general plans of the U.K. in regard to this stage, but some information on this may be furnished in about a month's time. He said it appeared to him that the distribution of effort by Canada between fighting on the one hand and the provision of munitions and other supplies on the other, would likely change to a greater emphasis upon supplies than on fighting, as compared with the present. He noted that now Canadians are doing perhaps one-seventh of the real fighting being done by all the forces of the Commonwealth. He thought that if Canada reduced its total effort in about the same proportion as the U.K. and the United States were expecting to reduce theirs, the result would almost certainly be a greater reduction in Canada's share of the fighting than in her share of the provision of munitions. This arose because of the nature of the Canadian contribution and of the fighting that would be done in Stage 2. The effects of this shift in emphasis would cut both ways to increase the Mutual Aid Appropriation in relation to the War Appropriation. Canadian expenditures for their forces in the U.K. and the sterling area would be decreased and therefore U.K. receipts from Canada would be decreased, and her need to obtain supplies on Mutual Aid rather than by purchase would increase. On the other hand, the Canadian War Appropriation would also decline, while the Mutual Aid Appropriation, for the reason noted, would have to be maintained, and possibly even increased, if expenditures were to be allocated as at present. Lord Keynes said that from the British point of view this was not a welcome development, as it would look too much as though they were receiving larger gifts from Canada and less as though Canada was simply participating in the war in the proportion which she felt was rightfully hers. He also noted that this might occasion misunderstanding and difficulties in Canada itself. For this reason the U.K. authorities have been considering what possibilities there might be for a rearrangement in the financial relations between Canada and the U.K. for Stage 2 as compared with Stage 1.

While the U.K. authorities had not yet completed their study in this matter, they thought that something more like the arrangements between the United States and the U.K. might prove better for Stage 2 in the case of Canada and the U.K. Under the present arrangements, Canada sells or provides under Mutual Aid to the U.K. everything which the U.K. gets from this country, and pays the U.K. for everything which Canada or Canadian forces get from them. This involves a great deal of accounting. The U.K.'s arrangements with the United States used to be similar to this. They have, however, been changed, and now there is practically no accounting between the two countries, the United States furnishing various supplies to the U.K. on Lend-Lease, and the U.K. in turn furnishing services, materials and equipment to the United States on reverse Lend-Lease. The possibility of applying the United States formula to Canada would depend on the relative magnitudes of the figures for munitions, food and other supplies received from the U.K., and on the requirements for the Canadian forces in the U.K. and elsewhere in the sterling area. Subject to further consideration of these magnitudes, what the U.K. has in mind is that all payment for munitions and supplies transferred between the two countries would be stopped, and each country would bear the cost of munitions provided to the other on its own defence appropriation. The U.K. believe that they would then be able to pay for everything else required from Canada except food. They would suggest that food, and only food, from Canada should be provided to the U.K. during Stage 2 on Mutual Aid. It would be relatively easy then to make the transition into Stage 3, as the transfers of munitions would cease and the food which the U.K. had been receiving on Mutual Aid they would then purchase on credits which they would wish to arrange with Canada for this period. Lord Keynes argued that this arrangement for the three stages would make a logical and coherent whole, involving first the cleaning up of outstanding accounts this year, then the new arrangements for Stage 2 described above, and finally, credits in Stage 3. He said he was afraid that if the present basis were continued, not only would there be the difficulties in Stage 2 arising from the disproportion between Mutual Aid and war expenditures, but the accumulation of arrears in accounts might not be cleaned up until many years after the war.

There was some discussion of the extent of the effort that was probably going to be necessary during Stage 2. A figure of 66% of the present effort was mentioned as a possibility for the U.K. and the United States. There was some doubt as to whether an effort of this magnitude could effectively be brought to bear against Japan, but Lord Keynes and Sir Wilfred Eadie emphasized that there would be a shift to more expensive types of fighting and equipment. The possibility was noted that the extent of the war effort would probably decline during the period, but it might be expected to average something like the percentage suggested. Further work is being done on the plans for this period, however, and it is hoped that in about a month's time concrete proposals will be ready. It is expected that the U.K. and the United States will both be reducing their efforts in about the same proportion, and the general nature of the program is being agreed between them.

Dr. Clark asked what the suggestions were that the U.K. had in respect of the current fiscal year. Lord Keynes outlined them, but noted that almost certainly some of them will be destroyed by the critical analysis of the Canadian authorities. The first two items concerned Mutual Aid matters; the others concerned the expenditures of the Canadian services overseas. In the first place Lord Keynes noted that there was apparently a large tax element in the munitions costs for Mutual Aid account. He said that that seemed unreasonable to the U.K. authorities and that it should be possible to make a rebate of these taxes as is done in the case of purchases of munitions by the U.K. and other governments. He said that he understood the amount involved was of the order of $200 million. Dr. Clark indicated that he felt there was not a great deal in this point and it could be satisfactorily explained. The second point mentioned was the fact that capital costs of ships are being charged to Mutual Aid to the U.K., when in fact they do not pass to the U.K. Lord Keynes said they did not know the exact figures involved for the ships, but thought it might be more reasonable not to charge the capital costs of the ships to Mutual Aid. Dr. Clark noted that in the United States the capital cost of ships was charged to Lend-Lease, and that might reasonably serve as the precedent in the Canadian case. Lord Keynes commented, however, that Lend-Lease is not subject to a ceiling, as is Mutual Aid, but covers all the items which are regarded as eligible for Lend-Lease. He noted that transfers to the U.K. under Lend-Lease this year will be larger than ever before.

The suggested adjustments concerning expenditures of the Canadian forces were the ones already put forward to the Canadian Government in London, but they had further material on them now and have studied the points raised by the Canadian authorities in regard to them. The first item is the capitation rate applicable to the Canadian forces serving in active operations. The second is the cost of advanced air training in the United Kingdom. The third is the cost of the reserve stores of military and Air Force equipment maintained by the U.K., including stores in transit. On the other side of the account there are to be considered the $200 million owing on air training, which has not yet been brought to charge against the U.K., and a possible excess of the value of munitions delivered over the total of the accounts presented for payment. He said the U.K. authorities were concerned over the divergence between our estimate of payments on account of munitions and the Department of Munitions & Supply estimates of the value of deliveries. They could understand there were bound to be some arrears in the payments for munitions, but did not like to contemplate arrears of the size that would be suggested by the difference in these figures.

He stated that their gross figures for these adjustments amounted in all to a very large total—considerably larger than the gap remaining to be financed. The points about the ships and the taxes on Mutual Aid supplies were, of course, primarily questions of Canadian policy. The others, however, were points very largely of fact and interpretation, as the U.K. believed that it was the intention of the Canadian Government that the U.K. should not be out of pocket as a consequence of the operations of the Canadian forces. Difficulties arise in part, however, from the accounting troubles being experienced by the U.K. authorities, who are not able to provide the Canadian departments with all the documents and accounts which they would like to have. Lord Keynes said that these various points were being set out in a paper which he would give to Dr. Clark tonight. The second part of the paper, relating to Stage 2, is not yet ready but would be prepared very shortly.

The meeting closed with a brief discussion of how much of the material that had been covered during the morning might usefully be discussed at the meeting of the Mutual Aid Board in the evening. It was decided that it would be most useful for the Mutual Aid Board if Lord Keynes could deal briefly with the general financial background of the U.K. situation and with the nature of their views in regard to Stage 2 and its relation to Mutual Aid.

OUTLINE OF DISCUSSIONS TOWARDS A FINANCIAL SETTLEMENT

For many months past the financial arrangements between the Dominion and the United Kingdom have been on the generous lines that any deficiency of sterling area resources has been automatically made good by Mutual Aid or equivalent means. This method of handling has been, in fact, so much more generous than that employed by any other member of the British Commonwealth or Ally, that it did not seem to the British Treasury to be worth while, in the pressure of war, to discuss the accounting basis in the detailed way which would have been proper and necessary if a matter of cash payment had been in view. The choice of method appeared to them to be largely a question of domestic Canadian accounting; namely, whether a particular item of expense should be charged to a Mutual Aid or to a Defence Appropriation.

In the course of time, however, this has led to a very anomalous state of affairs, in which the underlying realities of the situation are liable to be obscured and a position is reached which is difficult and inconvenient to both Treasuries alike.

This may be so for two reasons. In the first place, Canada has always taken the line that she is financially responsible for her own direct war effort. But, as will be shown in what follows, this is no longer directly and explicitly the position, as it should be. Canada is, in fact, meeting part of the cost of her own war effort via the Mutual Aid appropriation, although the latter purports to be a financial contribution to the Allied war effort. In the second place, as a result of this, the Mutual Aid appropriation has to be inflated, if it is to fill the gap, to a figure which might appear to the public to be somewhat out of proportion, thus making the provision of adequate aggregate assistance politically difficult to defend; whereas an increase in the Defence Appropriation, by charging to it what properly belongs there, would be merely implementing what Canadian public opinion already accepts as right and proper, namely, that this Appropriation should bear the actual share of the costs of the common war which corresponds to the Canadian direct participation in operations.

The British Treasury representatives, therefore, suggest that in the course of the present discussions, the following matters should be examined:

1. Certain criticisms or suggestions, set forth below, relating to the accounting basis, which has gradually grown up, largely, but not entirely, concerned with the various respects in which the British Exchequer appears at present to be bearing costs which arise out of the Canadian share of operations.

2. A suggestion that the 1944/45 apparent excess of requirements over the Mutual Aid appropriation might be cleaned up out of the various items brought forward under (1) above, with the accountants on both sides crying quits as at March 31st, 1945.

3. A new and much simplified arrangement as from April 1st, 1945, as set out in the last section of this memorandum.<sup>246</sup>

I. THE ACCOUNTING BASIS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE U.K.

In several respects which are discussed in detail below there seems to be a prima facie case for re-examining the accounting basis between Canada and the U.K. from which the residual amount to be covered by Mutual Aid results. Hitherto the U.K. Treasury, for the reasons explained above, have acquiesced in, or agreed to, a number of arrangements which have the effect, and cumulatively a considerable effect, in inflating this residual difference. For the sake of clearness the points raised below are stated more categorically and with a greater apparent precision than the information, at present at our disposal, really justifies. We ask to be excused for this. We have thought that a frank presentation of the broad facts, as they have been represented to us by the Departments in London, will help on the discussion even if they turn out on examination to be imperfectly accurate or capable of a different explanation. For in so far as the Departments in London have been misled, it is important that they should learn the real facts.

The following analysis will show that the sums at issue are very large indeed. The U.K. Treasury feel that the time has now come when a determined effort should be made to arrive at a logical and reasonable basis of accounting which really measures the amount properly covered by Mutual Aid after Canada has borne the true expenses incurred on her behalf by the U.K. in respect of that part of the common war effort which is Canada's own.

1. The Sales and Exchange Taxes

It is understood that manufacturers of munitions are liable in the first instance to certain taxes. When these products are subsequently exported, there is generally speaking a rebate. For example, if the munitions are supplied to an American or other foreign Power, the tax element is refunded. When the United Kingdom were meeting payments for munitions out of the billion dollar grant a similar refund was made. It seems on the other hand that for the past year or more the full amount of taxes has been charged against Mutual Aid. This would only be even technically correct, if that part of the total expenditure which is applied to munitions is particularly selected out of the total expenditure in order that it may be deemed to be chargeable on Mutual Aid, and none of it on the other receipts of the U.K. However this may be, is there sufficient justification for charging these taxes on Mutual Aid? It is from the point of view of the Canadian Treasury taking out of one pocket and paying into another, and merely means that the true financial burden of Mutual Aid is that much less than it appears to be.

See Document 508.

We have no exact information as to the amount of tax element included in the existing estimates of expenditure. The level of duties apparently varies widely between different types of munitions; merchant vessels are virtually exempt, but tanks have to pay as much as 20% of the net price. If duties were remitted on Mutual Aid contracts, we believe that the saving (i) retrospectively on the year 1943-44 and (ii) prospectively on 1944/45 might be as follows:

(i) The period September 1st 1943-March 31st 1944.

The following table shows disbursements by Mutual Aid Board in respect of munitions contracts financed by U.K. cash receipts account and by the Mutual Aid Appropriation. It shows the amount of duty included (on assumption that the proportion of duty to price is the same as in the D.M.S. figures), in $ millions.

	Disbursements		Duty as % of gross price	Duties contained
	Cash	M.A.		Cash	M.A.
Aircraft	—	35.3	12	—	4.2
Trucks	—	211.4	13	—	27.5
A.F.V.'s	—	48.6	16 $\frac{2}{3}$	—	8.1
Guns, ammunition	10.5	157.5	8	0.8	12.6
Merchant vessels	—	160.3	2 $\frac{1}{2}$	—	4.0
Naval vessels	8.4	12.4	10	0.8	1.2
Misc. equipment	0.1	64.0	10	—	6.4
	18.9	689.5		1.6	64.0

In any case, presumably, we shall get back the $1.6 millions in respect of cash contracts; but it would seem that remittance of duty on Mutual Aid contracts would yield an additional $64 millions in 1943/44.

(ii) The Year 1944/45.

D.M.S.<sup>247</sup> estimates production on our account in 1944/45 at $1,667 millions. On this footing, the amount of duty included might be about $180 millions; for there are more high-tax items in our programme for 1944/45 than in 1943/44. The Finance Department, however, estimates the prospective payments at no more than $1,247 millions. Judged by the actual experience of the second quarter of 1944, this may be nearer the mark. In this case the duty element might be about $133 millions. To the extent that the programme is deemed to be partially financed by funds from U.K. Cash Receipts Account, there would be an automatic rebate of some part of this. But for purposes of calculating the balance of payments, if it is agreed that Mutual Aid contracts should be exempt from tax, the whole $133 millions should clearly be subtracted.

2. The Capital Cost of Ships charged to Mutual Aid

The ships, which are being built in Canada and made available to the British Ministry of War Transport are charged to Mutual Aid although they remain Canadian property. We contested this on principle last year. Nevertheless there did not seem any very strong reason for pressing this so long as Mutual Aid was sufficient to cover the whole of the difference, since the issue became one of internal Canadian accounting. In so far, however, as there is any question of Mutual Aid being insufficient to cover the gap, so that accounting methods may affect the question of a possible payment by the U.K., then it would seem prima facie unreasonable that we should be required to pay for ships which do not become our property. We have no accurate estimate of the amounts involved, but the figure of $150 millions has been mentioned for 1943/44, and a further $100 millions for 1944/45.

3. The Capitation Payments

This is a complicated issue where no final settlement has yet been reached between Canada and the British War Office. There can be no doubt, however, that the provisional basis under which the capitation rate is being charged very considerably under-estimates the out-of-pocket expenses in which the British War Office is involved in respect of the Canadian forces. It does not seem very satisfactory that the British Treasury should in fact bear an important part of the actual cost of the Canadian forces abroad and that this out-of-pocket loss should then have to be made good by what in form appears to the outside world as a gift from Canada.

In arriving at the correct figure two partly separate and partly overlapping issues arise.

The first is the question of what figure is appropriate on the basis that the Canadian forces are not in action. The difficulty here is that the Dominion authorities are accustomed to much more meticulous accounting in matters of detail than has proved practicable in United Kingdom in war conditions. We have had the same difficulty in reaching satisfactory conclusions with the United States and other Dominion authorities. The War Office represent that if they were to be in a position to provide the full detailed accounting figures which the United States and the Dominions have asked from them, it would involve employing a number of accountants and clerks, which might run into two or three divisions. They argued convincingly (at any rate in Dunkirk days) that it is more important to fight the war than to satisfy auditors. But most inconvenient delays and a somewhat indeterminate outcome have been the result. Indeed the present methods of discussion have so greatly delayed the fixing of definitive capitation rates that we have been unable as yet to obtain Canadian agreement to a rate, other than provisional, for any period subsequent to 30th September, 1942, although the rate should have been revised at six months intervals, in accordance with the changes in costs which have inevitably occurred since the original date. The British War Office would like to see the rates settled on a simpler system, the general basis of which would be that whilst, of course, they have no desire to overcharge C.M.H.Q. for the upkeep of their forces, there is little to be gained against the general background of the financial relations between the two countries by attempting a minute calculation of details.

Whilst it is believed that for one reason or another provisional rates are too low even on the present assumed basis of charges, it is, of course, impossible to give an accurate estimate of the cumulative undercharge up-to-date.

Secondly, there is the further issue that the basis on which we are attempting to work out the capitation rate is not based on the full cost of maintaining Canadian forces when engaged on active operations. The capitation rates which have been under discussion have been based on the average U.K. Army organisation and therefore represent appreciably less than the Canadian order of battle. Here also it is not possible to give the exact estimate of the increase involved in bringing the charge to the basis of the actual costs. The War Office think that $100 million per annum is a fair estimate but it might be more.

4. The Cost of Advanced Air Training in U.K.

This question has been raised previously on the ground that the U.K. are involved in considerable expense on Canadian account for which they have not received sufficient return. It has been contested on the Canadian side on the ground that the principle of charging this item on the U.K. should be regarded as part of the general agreement relating to the finance of air training and as a quid pro quo for Canada bearing a high proportion of the costs of training which take place in Canada. We are, however, informed that those concerned in London question whether there is much substance in the contention that the high cost of E.A.T.S. [E.F.T.S.?] borne by Canada is an adequate quid pro quo for the U.K. bearing the cost of advanced training of R.C.A.F. personnel outside Canada. Actually the Canadian share of the cost of E.A.T.S. [E.F.T.S.?] is in strict relation to their proportion of the personnel concerned. If Canada accepts the principle that they should bear the full cost of their forces, it would seem to follow without much question that this commitment also should be accepted. This would be again an example of the principle that the U.K. should not be put in the position of having to ask for Mutual Aid until after Canada has fully discharged actual expenses which the U.K. have incurred on behalf of the Canadian forces.

The amount involved is $120 millions per annum based on the numbers under training a year ago. If the liability is accepted, this amount would be properly chargeable for a period of more than one, perhaps as much as two, years, but being based, as mentioned above, on the numbers under training a year ago, it may require some revision for the current year.

5. The Cost of Reserve Stores

This also is not a new matter. Under the existing system Canada is only charged with stores as from the date when they are actually delivered to the Canadian forces. This, of course, falls considerably short of the out-of-pocket expenses actually incurred, for military operational needs require that there should be a very large quantity of stores in regular flow between the factories all over the world and the actual theatres in which they are delivered to the Canadian forces; moreover, in all theatres, considerable reserves, both of a strategic and of a tactical nature, must be held available. In the sort of war in which we are engaged, these quantities in reserve and in transit form a very large proportion of the total munitions requirements of the Services. It is true, of course, that these reserves and stores in transit are not specifically earmarked for the Canadian forces, but an appropriate proportion must be properly attributed to them. This principle has already been acted upon by Canada in its application to the U.K. in the Air Training Agreement of June 1942<sup>248</sup> which provides that the United Kingdom will assume liability for the sum representing one-half of the established cost of the Combined Training Organization to March 31st, 1945, less certain payments by Australia and New Zealand. In the interpretation of this Agreement the cost is regarded as including all expenditure necessarily incurred in connection with the organization including purchases of equipment whether required for immediate use or for reserve. The Agreement itself does not refer explicitly to reserves but our representatives have accepted this interpretation without question and regard these costs as being necessary and reasonable elements in the total cost of the claim.

This is, of course, of the nature of a capital charge. To assess charges to the Canadian forces for this purpose as a regular annual payment, while at the same time charging them with stores as they are issued, would certainly involve double counting. But as stores are issued to the Canadian forces a corresponding quantity must be replaced in the reserve and in the pipeline, so no double counting can possibly arise if a capital payment is made in respect of the due proportion of the total reserve and stores in transit. Without such a capital charge, indeed, the British are, in effect, being asked to carry the entire overhead of the Canadian military establishments under their strategic responsibility. The actual amounts involved are substantial but further work would have to be done to make them at all precise. The Air Ministry estimate very tentatively that they hold reserve stores against requirements of the R.C.A.F. of $100 millions to which they add a further $250 millions in the pipeline. The War Office is unable as yet to give a figure but it must certainly be very considerable; the total British Empire production of army equipment is of the order of $5,000 millions a year and, even if reserves and stocks in transit represented only three months' production and the Canadian Army represented only one-eighth of the British Empire forces, the quantity attributable to them would be some $150 millions.

These figures are, of course, gross and are subject to various offsetting items, for example in respect of the Canadian or Lend-Lease element in supplies issued and charged to the Canadian forces. But these offsetting items are certainly of altogether less order of magnitude than the substantive figures. Full particulars are not yet available, but preliminary enquiries have yielded the following results:

See C. P. Stacey, Arms, Men and Governments: The War Policies of Canada, 1939-1945. Ottawa, Information Canada, 1970, pp. 564-78.

(1) The War Office estimate the Canadian element in supplies issued and charged to Canadian forces at $16 millions for the financial year 1943/44. A similar proportionate element would, of course, enter into the reserve stores if Canada were to pay for them but we cannot estimate this until there is a better estimate of the value of the reserves for which the War Office are responsible (see above). In Air Ministry stores, which are a major item of cost, the Canadian element is very small indeed. In the above figures we have included all supplies of Canadian origin, although some of these were purchased for cash and not obtained on Mutual Aid terms. This clearly loads the figures to a certain extent in Canada's favour.

(2) In principle Canada is not charged with Lend-Lease supplies, and, in so far as the latter are unidentifiable, Canada receives from us a calculated rebate which is refunded; Canada is then left to settle the matter with the United States. The amount involved under the existing arrangement may be of the order of $15 millions for Air Ministry stores only.

It seems clear from the above analysis that the cost of reserves and stocks in transit to be borne by Canada is several times greater than any reasonable estimate of the offsetting items. We cannot yet place a firm figure on this cost but it seems quite possible that the net charge to Canada might be of the order of $500 millions.

To avoid any possible misunderstanding, it should be pointed out that these reserves and stocks in transit do not relate to partly finished munitions or munitions in process, but are wholly additional to the capital locked up in the latter form. It would not be appropriate to bring in the question of munitions in process in this context since this presents, of course, the same problem to Canada in respect of the munitions being manufactured there as it does to the U.K. The reason why the cost of reserve stores is at present falling wholly on the U.K. is that the British Departments take delivery at the beginning of the process of distribution and consequently are held liable for their cost at a much earlier date than that at which the corresponding munitions are delivered to the Canadian forces in the field.

6. The Effect of Relative Prices

The position here is difficult to ascertain and we do not propose to bring it into the calculation. Nevertheless it seems worth mentioning in this context.

The Departments in London seem to know very little as to how the Canadian prices are built up. But we are told that they find it difficult to reconcile known deliveries with the expenses which have been charged, unless Canadian prices are very appreciably in excess of British prices. In so far as this is the case, Canada is in effect putting the munitions into the Empire pool at one price and taking them out for the use of the Canadian forces at another price. Evidently this is one of the anomalies to which the present basis of accounting, under which the U.K. pays for all the munitions she uses, may very well lead.

We have been given one or two examples which might be worth examining. The reported Canadian cost for Mosquito airframes is $56,000 as compared with a cost of $40,000 in the U.K. This is believed to be in line with the general level of relative costs. Twelve months ago, however, the Ministry of Aircraft Production were given an estimate of $500,000 per airframe for Canadian-built Lancasters. A comparable U.K. figure is $100,000. Whilst M.A.P. do not know how the above figure of $500,000 is made up, they find it difficult to see how it can be so high. It is an unsatisfactory feature of past arrangements that, so long as we believed that Canada was meeting the cost, whatever it might be, we did not consider it our business to look into the matter ourselves. It would seem extremely probable that in the case of the Lancasters there may be some misunderstanding, but that the matter should be left like that without any examination and without our hitherto having asked for one, is not very satisfactory. We must repeat that this is one more consequence of our having regarded the Canadian charges as not effectively our business.

7. The U.K. as a Residual Claimant on Mutual Aid

The present system is apparently that UNRRA and all the other Allies get their Canadian expenditure met in full out of Mutual Aid and the U.K. is left with the residue which might represent a dividend of 66 per cent or less of total expenditure. Since the U.K. has borne a greater financial responsibility than anyone else and is in fact more deeply encumbered, exactly the reverse procedure might be more easily justified. At any rate we would urge that this method of accounting deserves reconsideration, and that in the event of the total aid being insufficient all those concerned should share a responsibility for the deficiency in their proper proportions.

8. The Outstanding Liability in Respect of the Air Training Scheme up to June 1942

It should not be overlooked that there is one substantial item which counts the other way. The U.K. have an outstanding liability estimated at $200 millions in respect of the Air Training Scheme up to June 1942 which has never yet been brought to account. If, as we hope, the whole question of accounting will be gone into afresh with full regard to the various considerations urged above, then we should expect that this also will be brought to account as an offsetting item. Clearly there are strong arguments for getting it out of the way; and some of the items mentioned above could perhaps be conveniently regarded as an offset to the $200 millions here in question.

9. Possible Arrears of D.M.S. Payments

It would be very helpful if we could know the explanation of the wide difference between the D.M.S. estimate of $1,567 millions for munitions during the current financial year and the Department of Finance's figure of $1,247 millions. Is the difference due to different estimates as to the amount of goods which will have been delivered, or to different estimates of the amount which will have been brought to account? In the latter case does it mean that there are considerable arrears being carried forward? If there are such arrears being carried forward, then it is suggested that any such arrears should be brought into any general settlement relating to the period up to March 31st, 1945.

II. A SUMMARY OF THE POSITION UP TO MARCH 31, 1945

The latest estimate available to us of the deficit in the current financial year on the existing basis is as follows: (all figures in millions of Canadian dollars)

Sterling Area Payments
Munitions	1247
Food for U.K.	534
Other imports	468
Services, etc.	271
Total	2,520

Sterling Area Receipts
Exports	215
Services, etc.	149
Payments for Canadian Forces Overseas	801
Total	1,165

This shows a deficit of 1355, which should be reduced by 91 because of payments on capital account and currency and other adjustments, leaving a figure of 1264.

The carry over from the old Mutual Aid appropriation, together with the residue of the new Mutual Aid Appropriation available for the sterling area, is estimated to provide 596, leaving a gap of 668 so far unfilled.

If, as is proposed, Canada assumes the cost of 14 additional squadrons, estimated at about $85 millions for the current year, the prospective deficit is reduced to $585 millions.

It is not easy to arrive at a reliable total of the various items set forth in Section I of this memorandum. But the following may give a rough idea of the order of magnitude involved:

	$ millions
Rebate of taxation	200
Capital cost of ships	250
Capitation Payments	100
Advanced Air Training	200
Stores in reserve and pipeline	500
	1,250

Against this there is the United Kingdom debt of 200 for Air Training and arrears due in respect of munitions delivered before March 31, 1945 but not brought to account.

It may well be that some of these items will not survive scrutiny and criticism or may be considerably reduced in amount. Nevertheless, unless London is very seriously in error, there would appear to be enough in hand to cover the assumed gap of 583.

CANADA'S SHARE OF THE WAR EFFORT IN REAL TERMS

It may serve as a useful background for the suggestions which we have put forward if an attempt is made to estimate the Canadian share of the aggregate war effort during the current year. Getting away from financial measures and dealing in terms of physical output and fighting force, inevitably calculations of this kind are not exact. But it is believed that the figures given below are sufficiently close to the right order of magnitude to throw light on the realities of the position.

This method of measurement is particularly significant if in Stage II it is intended that the precise form which the Canadian contribution takes should be changed whilst maintaining her proportionate share in the neighbourhood of the present level.

(i) Canada's Proportion of Fabrication

The following table shows the percentage distribution by sources of supplies of munitions to the British Empire pool at end 1943. These are calculated on basis of physical output at common prices:

	U.K.	Canada	Rest of the Empire	U.S.A.	Total
Navy (including merchant ships and repairs)	13.4	2.8	0.6	3.5	20.3
Army	20.9	6.3	1.4	13.9	42.5
Air	26.0	1.3	0.3	9.6	37.2
Total	60.3	10.4	2.3	27.0	100.0

Thus it appears that Canada is producing about one-tenth of the total supplies to the British Empire forces and Allied forces (including Russia) in so far as they are supplied from the British pool; about one-seventh of the total British Empire production; and about one-sixth of the U.K.'s own contribution. Canada's contribution can also be re-arranged in the following form:

Canadian Production as Percentage of

	Total supplies to Empire	Empire Production	U.K. Production
Navy (including merchant ships and repairs)	14	17	21
Army	15	22	30
Air	3	5	5
Total	10	14	17

(ii) Canada's Proportion of Fighting

It is less easy to determine the proportion of the British Empire fighting—that is to say of the consumption of munitions—for which the Canadian forces are responsible. It certainly cannot be done by counting heads, for the Canadian fighting effort is very highly concentrated in heavy bomber squadrons and in spearhead troops; these forces' expenditure of equipment is far in excess of that of the average squadron or division. On the other hand, Canada's naval effort is concentrated in the escort field which calls for less equipment per man than is needed to maintain the battle fleets.

We are not in a position to embark upon the detailed comparative review of military statistics which would be necessary in order to establish Canada's fighting share on a firm basis. But in the year 1944/45 in which the whole overseas Canadian Army will probably be continuously engaged at a high level of battle activity and in which the Canadian-manned heavy bomber squadrons are likewise very fully employed, we do not think that Canada's share of the fighting being done by the forces of the British Empire can be much less than one-eighth. In the air the proportion is certainly materially greater than this having regard both to the numbers of Canadian personnel and to the high proportion of heavy bomber squadrons. At sea the proportion is certainly somewhat less. But this figure of one-eighth would seem to us a reasonable over-all average which could be properly applied for the purposes of these calculations.

(iii) The Relationship between Canada's Production and her Consumption of Munitions

If the above statements can be accepted as approximately correct, Canada's consumption of munitions in real terms must be in the neighbourhood of seven-eighths of her own production. Let us now compare this with what is happening in financial terms.

Canada's total munitions production in 1944/45 is approximately $1,950 millions made up as follows:

Canada's War Appropriation	500
War Supplies Limited	150
Supplies to U.K. and other foreign countries	1,300

1,950<sup>249</sup>

or, say, 2,000

If her consumption is seven-eighths of this, it follows the amount she would have to pay out on the other side for munitions consumed would be 1,750. In fact the amounts paid out may be estimated at:

Canada's own direct supply as above	500
Capitation payments in respect of munitions	500 <sup>250</sup>
	1,000

The financial transactions thus suggest that Canada's forces consume only about one-half of Canada's munitions production. This could be consistent with the facts of Canada's share of British Empire munitions production (namely one-seventh) only on the obviously absurd assumption that Canada's forces will in 1944/45 do only one-fourteenth of the Empire's fighting.

This rough reckoning suggests that on the existing basis Canada's payments for munitions supplied to her forces by Britain may be some 750 less than they should be. The calculation is inevitably rough and overmuch significance should not be attached to this figure.

We have previously argued that (apart from arrears which apply most particularly to reserve and transit stocks) the true cost of keeping Canada's forces supplied in 1944/45 should include at least an extra 100 for bigger army capitation payments, 85 for additional squadrons and 120 for advanced air training, together with some 1944/45 contribution in respect of reserve and transit stocks. These are not all munitions payments of course; but they are specific examples of points at which we think Canada's payments are too low.

The remainder of the 750 short-fall is probably explained by the difference in prices which, except in cases in which Canadian equipment is clearly distinguishable from equipment produced in other sources, must result in munitions being charged by the British to the Canadian forces more cheaply than Canada charges on British orders for the same munitions. There is clearly a wide variation between British and Canadian prices; for example, aircraft prices in Canada are double those in the U.K., but Canadian truck prices are probably somewhat lower than those of U.K. But the figures in these tables would be consistent if the calculation were correct in other respects with a general view that the prices charged for Canadian munitions are, on balance, about 25%-50% higher than U.K. costs.

We believe that the physical facts of Canada's production and consumption of munitions support our contention that the financial arrangements between the two countries fail to represent reality. We do not in the least suggest that this is other than a pure accident of the way in which events have developed; in particular, the entry of the whole of the Canadian overseas army into active operations makes a tremendous difference. But it would seem to us undeniable that, when the financial arrangements lead to a result obviously so different from the physical realities, those arrangements should be modified.

SECRET AND CONFIDENTIAL

Ottawa, August 6, 1944

STATISTICS BEARING ON THE DIMENSIONS OF THE UNITED KINGDOM'S
PROBLEM OF EXTERNAL FINANCE IN THE TRANSITION

1. It is generally recognised that the problem of British external finance after the war will be greatly aggravated compared with 1919, because (1) the absolute amount of our overseas indebtedness is much greater, (2) the loss of our foreign investments available as a reserve is more complete, and (3) the current adverse balance of overseas trade which we shall have to meet by an increase of our exports is much larger.

2. It is not so generally recognised that, in addition, two considerable mitigations which were present last time will be absent. The policy of restraining the rise of prices has many advantages, but it will greatly increase the real burden of indebtedness as fixed in terms of money. The other outstanding difference is that last time we borrowed money from the United States which we used to meet our requirements in all parts of the world, so that we ended the war without abnormal indebtedness to any other country; whereas this time the United States has only aided us with goods she could herself supply and has not furnished us with cash to buy goods from elsewhere. Thus, nearly the whole of our 1914-18 external debt was canalised into the American debt—and that we shuffled out of. On the assumption that this time we intend to pay, the fact that we owe money all over the place has, as we shall see, some important offsetting advantages to our export trade. But it means that the effort required to emerge without loss of honour, dignity and credit will be immensely greater.

3. The Government's post-war domestic policy is based on the assumption that we shall be able to import all the raw materials and foodstuffs necessary to provide full employment and maintain (or improve) the standard of life. This assumption is, at present, an act of blind faith. No means of making it good has yet been found. The object of this memorandum is to analyse the dimensions of the problem, reserving, for the moment, the means of solution.

4. So long as lend-lease and Canadian Mutual Aid continue, the true situation is masked. The following is an approximate balance-sheet of the British overseas position in 1943:

Total Expenditure	£ Millions	Total of Receipts	£ Millions
I. Expend. not met out of L/L and M/A		I. Receipts outside L/L and M/A
General Imports	590	General Exports	300
Overseas War Expend. on Munitions and U.K. forces abroad	750	Earnings from Dom. contributions to war expend. and American forces in U.K.	280
Other "invisible" payments	250 1,590	Other "invisible" income	360
		Net overseas indebtedness & loss of assets	650 1,590
II. Expend. met out of L/L and M/A
General Imports	560	L/L and M/A received	1,710
Munitions & ships	1,150	Less M/A accorded	500 1,210
		M/A accorded by U.K.	500
	1,710		1,710
	3,300		3,300

5. This table can be re-arranged as follows:

1. General Imports "invisible" payments	1,150	1. General Exports "invisible" income	300
	250		360	660
	1,400
11. Overseas War Expend. on Munitions etc. & U.K. forces abroad	1,900	11. Receipts for war expend. on behalf of Dominions and U.S.	280
		Mutual Aid accorded to Allies	500
		L/L and M/A received less M/A accorded 1,210		1,990
		111. Net Deficit	650
	3,300			3,300

If all military expenditure were to cease to-morrow the imports of food and raw materials which we should require, whilst to some extent changed in character, would not be reduced in amount since there will be more, not fewer, men in the country to consume food and to be employed in working up raw materials. Provisional estimates which have been made indicate that at the prices of 1943 that year's figure of £1,150 millions for our imports would not be much below our import requirements in the first post-war year. Thus if overseas war expenditure and receipts, and lend-lease, and mutual aid given and received were to cease immediately, the absolute amount of the net overseas deficit on current account would be actually greater than it is now by about £90 millions a year, or say £750 millions a year, unless and until it can be covered by increased exports and increased "invisible" income from shipping, etc. Indeed, it is clear that there will be no time-lag in our import needs, except to the limited extent to which we can live on stock-piles, surplus stores and salvage. Perhaps the aggregate amount of the once-for-all relief from this source might be guessed at £300 to £400 millions, but our stocks are so ill balanced that the enjoyment of this relief would have to be spread over a period. More accurate statistics bearing on this are expected from the Ministries of Supply and Food. On the other hand, there will be a considerable time-lag in the development of exports to fill the gap and a still longer lag in the date of payment for them. Even if the export deficit can be made to taper off over a fairly short period of years, the accumulated excess of imports over exports, before equilibrium is reached, will be very large. If we were to increase our overseas income, visible and invisible, by £250 millions in the first year, by a further £200 millions in the second year, by a further £150 millions in the third year, and by a further £250 millions in the fourth year, thus reaching equilibrium on current account in the fourth year, which would be a tremendous and, probably, impossible task, the cumulative deficit would nevertheless amount to £1000 millions in the first three years. At any rate, it is clear that this rate of progress is altogether out of the question, unless immediate active preparation is made for the recovery of export markets.

6. So far it has been argued that all overseas war expenditure will cease forthwith at the end of the war. In fact this will not be the case. For reasons both of security and of transport the demobilisation and repatriation of troops will necessarily be spread over a considerable period; and meanwhile heavy expenses will continue to be incurred overseas. It is also believed that the British forces will be asked to accept a major responsibility for the occupation of enemy territory after the end of hostilities. Our cash expenditures abroad on military account, which amounted in 1943 to about £750 millions a year, will not suddenly sink to zero when the war comes to an end. At present we can make no reasoned guess as to the rate at which or the period over which such expenditure will continue. Further, on the basis of our present policy (which has been entered upon more or less regardless whether we can afford it,) relief and reconstruction abroad will be another large source of expense. To begin with, there is our contribution of £80 millions to UNRRA. This does not (at present) include our share of the cost of relief to enemy countries or of relief during the military period elsewhere. The possibility of contributions to the projected Bank for Reconstruction and Development must also be taken into account. Finally, it is strongly argued in some quarters (and with considerable force) that there are important markets in which we shall not get a footing for our exports unless in the early years we are prepared to furnish a considerable volume of goods on credit. What the cumulative total of all this is likely to be in the early period, it is very difficult to guess. Would anyone care to put it at less than £500 millions net in the first three years after the war, unless there is a considerable change in the present trend of policies?

7. The above makes no provision for the liquidation of overseas war indebtedness largely in the shape of demand-balances accumulated in London, which at present can be drawn upon with varying degrees of freedom. Finally, therefore, there is the question of the lowest rate at which we must allow these balances to be repaid and drawn upon, if we are to maintain our honour and credit. The largest elements in the total indebtedness, as for example, to India, are not, in this connection so dangerous in proportion to their amount as the smaller sums which we owe to a great variety of smaller creditors. Once we owe (say) £500 millions to India, which is far greater than we can possibly discharge in the early period, a further increase to £1,000 millions does not really affect the dimensions of the early-period problem. Thus we have to regard the composition of the debt as well as its aggregate. In particular there are certain claims against us to which we shall have to accord a high priority. The Crown Colonies have lent to us the whole of their currency reserves. The populations of these countries are full of money and starved of goods. Can we by blocking the reserves held against the money, compel them to remain in this position for an indefinite period? We also hold the greater part, or the whole, of the currency reserves of Ireland, India, Egypt and Palestine.

8. Apart from the larger creditors and excluding certain less liquid liabilities, the following smaller and more dependent or necessitous countries held sterling resources in London at the end of March 1944 as follows:

	£ Millions
West African Colonies	76
East African Colonies	72
Other British Africa (excluding South Africa)	34
Ceylon	39
Malaya	95
Hong Kong	32
British West Indies	54
Palestine	93
Other Colonies and Mandates	79	574
Iraq	64
Netherlands and Colonies	53
Belgium and Colonies	17
Free France and Colonies and French blocked balances	64
Norway	43
Greece	59
Iceland	9
China	21
Persia	15	345
		919

9. There are, in addition, the following liabilities of more varying degrees of urgency:

(a) the balances in the major sterling area countries whose currency reserves we hold

	£ Millions
India	797
Egypt	297
Eire	93

(b) the balances of the sterling area Dominions

	£ Millions
Australia	77
New Zealand	22
South Africa	24

(c) the secured loans, &c., from the United States and Canada

	£ Millions
United States	79
Canada	162

and (d) the Special Account balances owing to South America and neutral Europe

	£ Millions
Argentina	52
Brazil	23
Other South and Central America	12
Portugal (a gold liability)	62
Other neutral Europe	16

10. The grand aggregate, as at the end of March, 1944, stood at £2,670 millions. By the end of 1944 the figure will exceed £3,000 millions. Admittedly a considerable proportion of this, say, a half or even two-thirds, can be funded, or represents normal working balances and currency reserves which will be maintained and therefore, constitute no immediate danger. (Nevertheless even this half will add considerably to our future burden if any significant amount of interest is payable on it.) It is the remaining one-third to one-half, i.e., £1,000 to £1,300 millions as at the end of 1944, which is dangerous, because it represents entirely abnormal accumulations which the countries concerned will certainly seek to withdraw at the earliest opportunity. Unless, therefore, steps are taken to the contrary, it would be prudent to assume that during the transitional period as a whole attempts will be made to utilise at least £500 millions, either in the shape of British exports or by demanding foreign currency in exchange.

11. As matters now stand and before reckoning any relief from the application of the various remedial measures open to us, we are left, therefore, with the following prospective deficit during the transitional period of (say) the first three years after the war.

	£ Millions
Excess of normal imports over exports (visible and invisible)	1,000
Overseas cash expenditure arising out of the war (i.e. liquidation of war expenses and demobilisation in overseas theatres, costs of occupation, relief, re-construction loans, export credits, etc.	500
Repayment of abnormal sterling balances	500
Total deficit	2,000

Nor is there any certainty that equilibrium will have been reached at the end of the three years. There is no need to stress the extreme precariousness of all the above estimates.

12. Nevertheless there are certain important reliefs from the above which it lies within our power to make and which certainly will have to be applied in greater or less degree. In the first place it is evident that the scale of repayment of abnormal sterling balances, which we should probably be called upon to make if we put no special obstacles in the way, estimated above at £500 millions in the first three years, can, if necessary, be avoided. Some repayments will be unavoidable, but it may be possible largely to offset these by a further growth of balances in other directions. Thus, to take an optimistic view, a net repayment of the aggregate of these balances might be avoided altogether in the first three years.

13. In the second place, as mentioned above, there are certain abnormal stocks of commodities which can be drawn upon gradually. Unfortunately in terms of value far the greater part of these stocks consist of wool, which can only be liquidated over a much longer period than three years if the current clip is also to be properly looked after.

14. In the third place, the above estimate of import requirements is based on a normal scale of importation of manufactured and semi-manufactured goods as well as of food and raw materials. If necessary—and probably it will be necessary—whole classes of manufactured imports will have to be totally excluded during the transitional period.

15. By these various means the total deficit to be cared for might be brought down to (say) £1250 millions; and even less, if very stringent rationing of domestic consumption, continues to be enforced in certain directions, i.e. where consumption is at the cost of imports or loss of exports.

16. The weakness in this calculation lies in the assumption of so rapid and so large a recovery of exports within three years. The Board of Trade do not at present see their way to confirm the above estimates as being reasonably possible. Such an expansion will certainly be impossible unless the American Administration can be persuaded to regard an unfettered British export drive, beginning in 1945, as compatible with the continuance of lend-lease or equivalent aid. In this respect, what is political play to them is a matter of life or death to us.

17. Apart from these special difficulties which we shall hope to overcome, it is essential that our degree of demobilisation during Stage II must be sufficient, not only to allow the beginning of a return to more normal civilian standards, but also to provide an appreciable surplus for export. We have been fighting two years longer than the United States on a scale far more exhausting in relation to our resources, and we ought not to be asked to sustain much longer a proportionate effort so much greater measured in terms of sacrifice.

18. The Gold and Dollar Balances of the U.K.

A year before the outbreak of war our reserves were very substantial and stood at £1,043 millions. The expectation of war led to a large-scale withdrawal of foreign balances, and at the outbreak of war we were reduced to £620 millions. At the commencement of Lend-Lease (April 1941) we were practically cleaned out, having gold and dollar reserves of £66 millions with £63 millions gold liabilities against them, so that our net reserves were down to £3 millions. Thereafter came the Jesse Jones loan; the old (pre-Lend-Lease) commitments had been substantially met; almost all our current requirements from United States were for a time lent-leased; and the Sterling Area was beginning to gain substantial earnings from the United States troops; with the result that our reserves began to rise quite steadily. They are likely to reach a peak between £400 and £500 millions before the end of 1944. Unfortunately, a livelier awareness by the United States Administration of this recovery in our reserves than of the much greater depletion of our net resources has led to a substantial curtailment of lend-lease facilities, and at the same time a reduction of our earning power corresponding to the increase in reverse Mutual Aid, with the result that we are now mainly dependent on our precarious earnings from the United States troops in the Sterling Area to prevent our reserves from falling. When the war in Europe is over, our dollar account may be seriously on the wrong side, i.e. our reserves will begin to fall, even if lend-lease continues as at present; whereas we have recently been warned that after the end of the German war the continuance of lend-lease facilities on the present scale must be deemed uncertain. Thus, as matters now stand, we shall be likely to emerge from the Japanese war with reserves materially less than the £500 millions for which, at one time, we were hoping. Since reserves of about £300 millions probably represent somewhere near the bed-rock figure below which we should not allow our reserves to fall except for the gravest cause and in extreme urgency, it follows that, unless there is a change in the situation, the relief we can obtain by drawing on our reserves in the transitional period is so small in relation to our possible requirements that it is hardly worth bringing into the picture.

19. Fuller statistics of the gold and dollar reserves in relation to our liabilities are given below:

Reserves	31st Aug. 1938	31st Dec. 1939	31st Dec. 1941	31st Dec. 1942	31st Dec. 1943	30th June 1944

20. The increase in Reserves in 1942 and 1943 was not the result of our receiving lend-lease assistance on such a scale that our normal current earnings of dollars exceeded our requirements. The normal dollar earnings of the U.K. fell short of our own dollar requirements by $287 millions in 1942 and by $240 millions in 1943; and our total dollar earnings, including pay of U.S. troops in U.K., fell short by $237 millions in 1942 and $50 millions in 1943.

Of the above items on the credit side, $828 millions represent dollars acquired from the rest of the sterling area, which has involved a corresponding increase in our liabilities, and $182 millions represent gold provided for the repatriation of South African sterling securities, which represents no increase in our assets.

21. A major improvement in our reserve position can only be achieved if the American Administration can be persuaded that it is as much in their interest as in ours to facilitate the growth of our reserves up to a level more commensurate with our responsibilities. As we approach the war settlement, it will not be convenient to either party that we should always have to plead in forma pauperis to be excused from full participation. It may prove politically difficult for the United States Administration to furnish us at a later stage with cash dollars, as distinct from assistance in kind, even though they may wish to do so; yet for many purposes it will be cash that we shall need. It will be a cause of general embarrassment if one of the three Great Powers responsible for settling the world has no free cash at all. The seriousness of this prospect is not as yet fully realized by those who will be most hampered by it if it arises. On the assumption that we end the Japanese war with net gold and dollar reserves not much above £300 millions, not only would the amount be negligible which we could regard as available; but our free resources would be entirely out of proportion to those of our associates. The United States would have sixteen times as much; Russia two to three times; France more than double; Belgium, Holland, Switzerland with comparable absolute amounts and much greater free amounts; and so on. Our position would be ludicrously out of proportion to our responsibilities. We should, therefore, aim at an end-war figure of at least £500 millions net and refuse to undertake any post-war liability to Europe or to anyone else until it was assured to us.

22. In the immediately preceding paragraphs, a continuing restriction on imports and on the level of domestic consumption has been indicated as a necessary ingredient in the solution. To understand the difficulty of this, it is necessary to appreciate the severity of the present restrictions and to experience at first hand the measure of cumulative strain and fatigue from which everyone in England is now suffering. So far as consumption is concerned, this is well illustrated by the following comparison worked out on the basis of the material provided in the British Budget White Paper and in the U.S. Survey of Current Business for April 1944:

	United Kingdom (1939 = 100)
	1939	1940	1941	1942	1943
Expenditure at current market prices	100	103	109	116	119
Expenditures at constant prices	100	88	82	81	79
Market prices (including indirect taxes)	100	118	133	143	150
	United States of America (1939 = 100)
	1939	1940	1941	1942	1943
Expenditure at current market prices	100	106	121	133	147
Expenditure at constant prices	100	105	113	112	115
Market prices	100	101	107	119	129

This table shows that in real terms the intenser labour effort has been accompanied in U.K. by a reduction of 21 per cent in real consumption, whilst in U.S. it has been accompanied by an increase of 15 per cent. In other words, the war effort has allowed an improvement in the position of the American consumer relatively to that of the British consumer of nearly 50 per cent.

23. Mutual Aid accorded by U.K.

Mutual Aid accorded by U.K. is now running at about one-third of the aggregate Mutual Aid and Lend-Lease received.

Figures relating to British Mutual Aid trickle in months after the event and even now the record up to the end of last year remains incomplete. The following table, however, gives almost the whole story to December 31st, 1943.

In the case of the U.S.A. the above falls considerably short of the grand total up to March 1944 since it excludes the following which have also to be added in:

	£ millions
(1) Capital expenditure in U.K. afforded as reciprocal aid	155
(2) Goods and services outside U.K. afforded as reciprocal aid	50

(particulars of which are received seriously in arrears)

24. Assuming aid in recent months at approximately the same rate, total aid to the U.S. up to June 30th, 1944 was not far short of £600 millions, and to others about £400 millions, making a grand total approaching £1,000 millions. Mutual Aid to the U.S. on this great scale (which would be still greater if converted to equivalent American costs) has undoubtedly played a major part in creating a political and psychological background in which much else has been made possible. Nevertheless it has been, and is currently, far in excess of the U.K.'s net capacity to supply out of its own resources. The U.K. has had no net current overseas surplus out of which to make this return contribution towards the war expenditure of the U.S. From the balance sheet point of view she has had to borrow it where she could from almost every country in the world and thus incur a greater overseas war debt than would have been incurred otherwise. The balance sheet of international payments in paragraph 4 above shows that at the present time the major part of the overseas war debt, which the U.K. is now incurring, is in order to make the above contribution to the war expenditure of the U.S. This balance sheet aspect of the Mutual Aid (or reverse lend-lease) accorded to the U.S. must not be lost sight of, however necessary and inevitable it may be that, on the one hand, we should have to borrow in all parts of the world to balance our account in order, on the other hand, to keep up good appearances for political reasons in the U.S. It is certainly not an example of the joint pooling of war expenses according to capacity.

25. In the same context as Mutual Aid, it should be remarked that, apart from specific Mutual Aid, we have seldom charged the Dominions the full cost which we have incurred on their behalf for that part of the war effort which purports to be their own. Rather than bargain with those who have done so much for us, we have preferred to give way before any complaint which had any plausible ground behind it, even though it left us, in fact, out of pocket.

26. The loss of pre-war overseas assets

The above aggregates of war indebtedness incurred by the U.K. take no account of loss of pre-war overseas assets disposed of during the war in order that the growth of war indebtedness may be correspondingly less. The amount of such disposals was estimated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his Budget Speech at about £1,000 millions. The balance which remains is largely unmarketable and it is not easy to estimate its capital value. A recent attempt, however, has been made to estimate both what has been lost and what still remains on an income basis, as follows:

NET INCOME FROM INVESTMENTS ABROAD (£millions)

	1938	1943
Lord Kindersley's estimates of amounts distributed as interest and dividends to U.K. residents, including income tax thereon. (Lord Kindersley's estimates do not include any income from Eire)	185	Bank of England provisional estimates on a similar basis to Lord Kindersley's, but including Eire less Eire	122 8    114
Undistributed profits, U.K. office expenses, etc.; believed to be estimated by Board of Trade at some	30	Undistributed profits, U.K. office expenses, etc., as in 1938; in addition. E.P.T. <sup>255</sup> and N.D.C. <sup>256</sup> paid by U.K. registered companies; dividends unpaid, or paid to the Custodian. In all, probably some 20/30, say	26 <hr style="width: 50%; margin-left: auto; margin-right: 0;"/> 140
Less, payments to non-residents on their investments in U.K. (in the case of Eire, a net payment) believed to be estimated by Board of Trade at some	15	say	10

27. It would be unwise to capitalize the income for 1938 and for 1943 at the same rate. Dividends on equities are probably now higher than in 1938, and the fall in capital outstanding no doubt somewhat greater than simple comparison of the two incomes would indicate. Nevertheless the broad conclusion seems to be that about one-third has been disposed of or otherwise lost as a result of hostilities. If the pre-war value was round £3,500 millions, the remaining value is now round £2,500 millions.

28. Against this, we have to reckon with a net indebtedness on short term of £3,000 millions as at the end of 1944. The year 1945 might add £500 millions to this, and the post-war transition, on the basis of the most optimistic assumptions, will add not less than another £1,000 millions. (This calculation neglects both the small excess of reserves over net short term liabilities at the beginning of the war and the unpredictable level of reserves at the end of it.)

29. Thus the U.K. will have begun the war with a net creditor position of (say) £3,500 millions and will have ended it with a net debtor position of (say) £2,000 millions (i.e. £4,500 millions liabilities less £2,500 millions assets). Nearly the whole of this loss she will have incurred in favour, not of neutrals, but of her own Allies and Associates, as the price of their assistance in the common effort.

30. Now that the concluding stages are, we hope, in sight, weaknesses, which formerly it was necessary to conceal, it is now proper to confess. The object of doing so is to help all those concerned to view the position realistically. The object is not to make complaint. Whether wisely or unwisely, we have waged the war without regard to financial consequences deliberately and of set purpose. For better or for worse, it has been our own fault, as anyone who has spent the war in the service of the British Treasury must be well aware. The final outcome is the result of several ingredients. In the financial field we have never escaped from the consequences of the Dunkirk atmosphere, when we felt alone: that this is our war; that if anyone helps it is very nice of them, but we cannot, of course, expect that it should be otherwise than on their own terms; that so far as we, but not they, are concerned, the future must be entirely sacrificed to the overwhelming needs of the present; and that if anyone wants a douceur he must, in the interests of getting on with the war, have it. Of course this was never the whole truth,—in relation to the other members of the Commonwealth, for example. Nevertheless, our financial policy was vitally influenced by this ingredient of appeasement, right and inevitable once, not so clearly necessary now. Next there is our position as a Great Power, equal in authority and responsibility and therefore equal in the assumption of burdens. This is the ingredient of pride and prestige—easily understandable, but, too long continued, nevertheless short-sighted if pride and prestige are, in fact, to be preserved. And, finally, the most sympathetic and natural of all the ingredients, the habitual and almost unthinking open-handedness of a family which has always felt rich and for whom the acceptance of liabilities had become not so much a sacrifice as a convention.

31. Our own set habits are, in fact, the greatest obstacle in the way of changing the atmosphere. All our reflex actions are those of a rich man, so that we promise others too much. Our longings for relaxation from the war are so intense that we promise ourselves too much. As a proud and great Power, we disdain to chaffer with others smaller and more exorbitant than ourselves. Having been so recently in dire extremity, our financial diplomacy is rooted in appeasement. Above all, the financial problems of the war have been surmounted so easily and so silently that the average man sees no reason to suppose that the financial problems of the peace will be any more difficult. The Supply Departments have demanded of the Treasury that money should be no object. And the Treasury has so contrived that it has been no object. This success is the greatest obstacle of all to getting the problems of this memorandum taken seriously. And when we come to exports, no one ever seems to suppose that we need expect to be paid cash for them in full—exports for relief purposes, exports on credit, exports for prestige and propaganda, exports below world price so as to gain satisfied customers five years hence; never exports so that we can live.

32. The Principles of Solution

It is not the purpose of this memorandum to offer, or to debate, the solution. Nevertheless there are certain general principles to which we must hold henceforward with the utmost resolution, if we are to escape the natural consequences of the overseas financial policy which we have adopted hitherto. In conclusion, therefore, it may be useful to indicate one or two of them.

33. We do not intend to seek outside assistance in meeting the war debts which we have incurred to the other Sterling Area countries and to neutrals. We propose to meet these over a period of years in the shape of British exports and perhaps, in the case of certain neutrals, by a further disposal of our pre-war investments in their territories. But we shall ask those concerned to agree that, in view of the origin of the debts, the interest element shall be reduced to a minimum or altogether extinguished. That is to say, it is the capital sum which we shall endeavour to repay in full. Furthermore, subject to only minor exceptions, repayment must take the form of direct British exports, mainly additional to the normal course of trade, and cannot take the form of free exchange, of which we see no prospect of possessing a sizeable surplus in the foreseeable future. The abnormal war balances can be made available to those who own them only by instalments and only subject to these conditions. During the transitional period we may be able to arrange to allow certain transfers of indebtedness between our creditors within the Sterling Area. But in no case shall we agree to borrow outside currencies in order to make sterling war indebtedness available to buy exports from outside. All this is rooted in the inescapable necessities of the case. In so far as we find ourselves in a position to make exceptions, it will be the Crown Colonies which will have the first claim on us. That criticism and complaint is bound to arise on the part of other exporters, we cannot help.

34. To Canada and the U.S. which lie outside both the Sterling Area and the Special Accounts system, we owe so far no war debts, except certain secured loans of relatively small amount (£79 millions to U.S. and £162 millions to Canada), of which the debt to Canada carries at present no interest. We shall urge with all the force in our power that ways be found by which this freedom from war debts can be maintained for the remaining period of the war, and that uncovered indebtedness to Canada and the U.S. begins only with the peace.

35. What good reasons can we offer for asking from those who have been especially generous to us so to continue, when we are not cavilling at incurring further war indebtedness in favour of those who have been less generous? Have we any better reason than the obvious one that a good deed breeds the expectation of another? Yes, it can be argued that we have a better reason. For an analysis of those to whom we are incurring further debts shows that there is no true analogy. For let us consider in detail to whom are we incurring further war debts:

(1) Latin America. The amounts are moderate and fall far short of what they still owe us. If we liquidated our assets there on the scale on which we have already liquidated our assets in Canada and U.S., there would be less than no war debts left.

(2) European Allies. The amounts are not large and do not represent any net gain by them, since they will be immediately engulfed for reconstruction.

(3) The Crown Colonies. Here our position of trusteeship and our over-riding authority put it out of the question that we should, by our own decision, exact large sums from them.

(4) India, Egypt and the Middle East. Egypt is neutral. The others have never accepted the same unlimited liability to participation in the efforts of the war which we and certain others of our partners have accepted.

(5) The other Dominions. Here we are in fact incurring no war debt in excess of the sterling Government securities remaining to be repatriated (a process already complete in the case of Canada). On the contrary New Zealand has no prospect of abnormal balances and, if Australia accumulates a small surplus through her earnings from U.S. troops, this would only enable her to make a small beginning of the repatriation of sterling Government debt which Canada has completed.

36. There is, moreover, a further important respect in which there is no analogy between the position of the sterling area countries and that of Canada and the United States. Most of the sterling area countries (the important exception is South Africa) have lent the U.K. the whole of their currency reserves and have accumulated no outside resources whatever against the large volume of outstanding currency which their consumers will doubtless wish to turn in part into imported goods as soon as the war is over. India, for example, has turned over to the U.K. the whole of her large dollar earnings. Australia is doing the like in respect of her current considerable receipts from the U.S. troops. Thus an appreciable part of the sterling owed by the U.K. to the rest of the sterling area is simply the counterpart of the dollar earnings and other external receipts which they have turned over to us. Some indication of the magnitude of these receipts is given in the table in paragraph 21 [20?] above. This table shows that in 1943, for example, the U.K. received from the rest of the sterling area in actual gold and dollars no less than $515 millions, which were added to the U.K. gold and dollar reserves at the expense of the gold and dollar reserves of the rest of the area. No aid parallel to this has been afforded by the two North American countries lying outside the sterling area. The two methods of financial aid are widely different in character and it is not easy to make a useful comparison between them.

37. With the advent of peace we hope to borrow both from Canada and from the U.S. in so far as we still have expenses to meet which are a sequel of the war and can be properly regarded as part of the same story. Our purpose will be to keep this residual aid to the smallest possible dimensions. Terms, which lie within the capacity of repayment which we reasonably foresee for ourselves, must be fixed at the outset. We are not prepared to take a chance on the question of repayment, whatever view others might be prepared to take. Rather than accept terms which we can doubtfully satisfy, we shall prefer to do without and live perforce as best we can within our own temporarily limited means. We are fearful, lest, in the spirit of the greatest goodwill, there may be pressure on us to accept too much on conditions which we cannot clearly fulfil. If war debts begin to accumulate before the transition from war to peace is reached, we see little possibility of being able to accept on these conditions what we shall sorely need.

Mémorandum du ministère des FinancesMemorandum by Department of Finance

Ottawa, August 6, 1944

MEMORANDUM OF COMMENT ON UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS FOR ADJUSTMENTS IN FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS
FOR THE FISCAL YEAR 1944-45

1. General Nature of Proposals

The United Kingdom authorities apparently recognize that an additional Mutual Aid Appropriation this year cannot be anticipated and that consequently some other means of covering the excess of their payments to Canada must be devised. On their own side, however, they feel quite clearly that they cannot pay Canada a large amount from their gold and United States dollar reserves, as Canada has suggested, and cannot borrow on a substantial scale from Canada during the current year. The reasons for this attitude lie in their general financial situation and in the prospects of its development during Stage 2 of the war, i.e., when hostilities with Germany are finished but those with Japan are still proceeding, and in Stage 3, the period of transition after hostilities, during which time British exports will fall quite considerably short of being sufficient to pay for their imports. This general financial situation has been discussed orally and is being covered in a separate memorandum. Any explanation of it is, therefore, being omitted in this memorandum.

The U.K. feel that the size of the deficit to be financed, subject to the conditions noted above, necessitates a general re-examination of the financial arrangements between Canada and the U.K., particularly in respect of the Canadian forces overseas. The U.K. feel that these arrangements have not been wholly logical up to date, but that they did not matter as long as Canada was bearing any additional costs involved in the form of Mutual Aid or its equivalent. The U.K. authorities feel this re-examination is justified by the puzzling difference between the real share of the fighting and the production of munitions being undertaken by Canada on the one hand, and the financial results from the expenditures in connection with these on the other. They note that Canadian forces at present appear to be doing about one-eighth of the fighting being done by British Commonwealth forces, and to be producing about one-seventh of the British Commonwealth production of munitions. On the other hand, however, Canada is paying the rest of the Commonwealth relatively little for the munitions her forces are using in relation to the payments she is receiving from the rest of the Commonwealth for the munitions which she is producing. The U.K. suggest that the rearrangements which they propose will help to overcome this disparity.

The result of their re-examination is a series of proposals, including two which relate to Mutual Aid and would make the existing Appropriation go further, and three relating to the expenditures of the Canadian forces abroad and which would be necessary in the view of the U.K. if Canada is to bear the full cost of its own fighting services, as it has undertaken to do. If all these suggestions were adopted, the expenditures to be covered by Mutual Aid would be reduced and the United Kingdom receipts from Canada increased by a total amount much more than the prospective deficiency to be covered, and the excess would probably be enough to counter-balance the amounts owing by the United Kingdom in respect of Air Training accounts.

The U.K. suggest in broad terms that arrangements along the lines proposed for this year would leave the accounts roughly balanced by March 31st next, that then next year's situation could be re-examined in the light of plans for the war against Japan still to be developed, and that finally the U.K. would hope to borrow substantial sums from Canada during Stage 3, i.e., the transitional period following hostilities, during which time her indebtedness to Canada would rise to a total equal to all Canadian indebtedness to the U.K.

2. General Comments

The broad U.K. case is not unreasonable on grounds of fairness and equity. Undoubtedly the U.K. have been bearing a much heavier relative cost than the other English-speaking Allies. In particular, her international costs in the form of deterioration in her international position have been heavy—heavier than any of the Allies, while many countries, including Canada and the United States, have improved their international position despite the assistance they have given to the U.K. In addition, of course, the U.K. have suffered a substantial reduction in their consumption during the war by comparison with North America, where consumption has probably increased. There is no doubt that the U.K. will face very real difficulties after the war in adjusting itself to the change from being a substantial international creditor to being a substantial international debtor.

The war, of course, has been so much closer to the United Kingdom than to North America that it is only to be expected that the British people are much more prepared to accept heavy burdens than the people in North America.

On broad grounds of Canadian policy, it appears desirable if it is at all possible to leave the U.K. strong enough at the end of hostilities to weather the difficult few years of transition to peace without a complete and enduring sacrifice of multilateral trade, from which we benefit so substantially, and without requiring severe restrictions on imports from North America. We certainly want the U.K. to be in a position to buy food from Canada during this transition period. Moreover, there does seem to be a real Canadian interest in having the U.K. left after the war with financial strength and prestige sufficient to enable her to play an important part in the post-war world, both economically and politically. The U.K. representatives point out that they will need both financial reserves and borrowing powers in peacetime if they are to play their appropriate part among other larger powers in helping to preserve international security.

The general argument put forward that it will be necessary for the U.K. to borrow substantial sums from Canada in Stage 3 and that no other solution to their difficulties in Stage 3 seems possible, appears to us to be reasonable. Certainly it would be very much more difficult to give any other form of financial assistance to the U.K. once hostilities have ceased. On the other hand, it is difficult to see on what basis the U.K. authorities are able to assess their borrowing capacity so accurately and their needs in Stage 3 so accurately that they find they cannot possibly add a few per cent to their post-war debt in order to cover a part of their present requirements, particularly when they are continuing to incur very substantial debts at the present time to the sterling area. This suggests that there is an element of arbitrariness in their decision that they will exhaust their borrowing capacity from North America in Stage 2 and in the rigid distinction which they appear to make between debts incurred to the sterling area and to North America.

While recognizing the above general points put forward by the U.K., it is also necessary to recognize the difficult position in which Canada has been placed. This difficulty springs from the fact that much of Canada's contribution to the war must go in the form of supplies to be used by the forces of other countries. Our figures indicated that up to date Canada has had to furnish much more in the way of such free assistance in proportion to her national income than has the United States, for example, and probably much more than any other country. This provision of supplies for other forces to use inevitably has the appearance of a gift, to a large proportion of the public. This seems to be true no matter how the transaction may be dressed up and presented and no matter how much emphasis may be laid upon the fact that furnishing munitions is no less a duty and no less an appropriate form of participation in the war than furnishing fighting forces. It is unfortunately not a matter of logic or fundamental justice that is involved, but the limitations of public opinion and attitudes formed long before the Lend-Lease idea really took root.

It must also be recognized that Canada herself is a heavy debtor on international account, and it is difficult for a nation long accustomed to regard itself as heavily in debt to richer nations to take action which her citizens are bound to regard as generous rather than merely part of her duty. Despite the great worsening in the international position of the U.K. as a result of the war, Canada will be in proportion a heavier debtor internationally than the U.K. when the war is over, due, of course, to the very large amount owed by Canada and by Canadians to the United States. Of course, it must also be recognized that Canada's debt has been incurred very largely for constructive purposes, while the U.K.'s situation has deteriorated during two wars largely to provide funds for fighting and not to leave the U.K. in a better economic position than before.

Canada's difficulty as a debtor country appearing to make large gifts to other countries is made all the greater when Canadians realize that there is only one other country assisting the U.K. in the same way, and that is the very rich United States. Indeed, Canadians see other nations piling up huge post-war claims against the U.K. as a result of their wartime activities. India and Egypt are the main examples, but to a lesser extent Australia is now accumulating claims. Those aware of the true situation realize that there are explanations for this apparent disparity, but it would be very difficult, if not impossible, to put across such explanations to the general public. Moreover, to put them across it would be necessary to call attention to the fact that India has, to some extent, been dragged into the war against her own will, and emphasis on this is hardly likely to improve Canada's international relations at the present time.

It is obviously undesirable in the case of Canada, as in the case of any other nation, that the maximum flow of men and supplies to the war fronts should be impeded by any financial arrangements which would appear to the public and to Parliament as unreasonable, and which would limit the supplies which Parliament and the public were prepared to contribute to an amount less than what is physically possible.

The general nature of the solutions proposed by the U.K. involving increased war expenditures is open to the general objection that it will be difficult to justify making radical changes now in practices that have grown up over the course of five years and to alter the general agreed basis of division of costs in respect of the Air Forces and their training. Consideration will have to be given to the possibility of making satisfactory public explanations of the changes proposed. It may be possible to base such explanations on the fact that the amount and nature of the participation of the Canadian forces in the costs thereby involved have only become clear now that they are fully engaged. Moreover, it might be argued that the question of a share in the equity in reserve stocks and supplies in transit only becomes important as the end of the war approaches and the question of losses on such stocks arises.

3. Taxes on Mutual Aid Supplies

The U.K. question whether it is justified to tax munitions being provided to them under Mutual Aid, pointing out that the munitions which they purchase and which they did purchase under the contribution made in 1942 were free from tax, and that the Mutual Aid Appropriation would go considerably farther if taxes were not levied on these supplies. They say that the financial burden of Mutual Aid is made to appear more than it is in fact by reason of these taxes.

The figures given by the U.K. for taxes on Mutual Aid supplies last year appear fairly reasonable at a total of $64 million. They are also fairly close to the truth in pointing out that the taxes on munitions for the U.K. and other parts of the sterling area for the current year would amount to about $180 million and in fact, it might be nearer $200 million if the value of munitions production is as large as is estimated by the Department of Munitions and Supply. It seems unlikely, however, that munitions provided to the sterling area will exceed, say, $1,300 million during the year, and the tax element in this might amount to something near the $133 million which the U.K. suggest. On the other hand, the munitions provided under Mutual Aid during the year are bound to be very much less than this—perhaps of the order of $600 million—and the taxes on these might be expected to be somewhere in the neighbourhood of the figure for last year, say $50 or $60 million. Account must be taken of the fact that taxes would not be payable in any event on the remainder of the munitions and allowance should be made for this in the balance of payments figures and the prospective deficit reduced correspondingly, say, by another $60 million.

The reason why taxes are payable in respect of munitions provided under Mutual Aid is because it is traditional to charge Canadian Government Departments with taxes on their purchases. In other words, expenditures and appropriations for expenditures are made on the basis of Canadian market prices. It is felt that this is necessary if Parliament is to have a clear understanding of the real costs involved by various government activities. Consequently if the costs to Canada of Mutual Aid are to be assessed in the normal way, both absolutely and in comparison with other appropriations, one should include taxes in the cost just as one does for goods going into domestic consumption or into domestic use by Government Departments.

There is, however, an important qualification in principle in the case of Mutual Aid goods. Taxes are not normally charged, or are rebated, on goods for export. For this reason, no taxes were payable on the munitions purchased by the U.K., including those purchased out of the $1 billion contributed by Canada in 1942. Therefore, if we are to think of Mutual Aid in terms of export values rather than domestic values, which may be the correct way of assessing it, one should exclude taxes. It would also be in accordance with the general intent of our revenue laws, which provide for the exemption from tax, or rebate of tax, for export goods.

This qualification in regard to exports is reinforced by the fact that food products normally subject to tax and being provided under Mutual Aid are not being taxed. The usual law relating to exports is being allowed to operate in respect of bacon and canned fish. Consequently it cannot be argued that the principle cited above in respect of charges to Parliamentary appropriations is being consistently followed.

It is difficult to say what, if anything, was the intention of Parliament in this matter. Formally, Parliament might be presumed to have taken into account that munitions were to be subject to tax unless sold to foreign governments, as the Order-in-Council providing for this, P.C. 1/3233 of April 19, 1943, was published on April 26th before or during the debate on Mutual Aid in 1943 and, of course, long before the debate in 1944. In fact, however, it may be doubted whether this fact was noted by any Members of Parliament in connection with the size of the Mutual Aid Appropriation, as there is no indication that their attention was drawn to it or that it was mentioned in Parliament. The Order-in-Council in question does not specifically provide that Mutual Aid supplies should be subject to tax, but instead provides specifically that a rebate shall be paid in respect of taxes on munitions sold to other governments. It may also be worth noting references made in the Appendix to the Budget<sup>257</sup> to the fact that only supplies purchased by Allied Governments would be eligible for exemption. Even here, however, there is no specific statement that Mutual Aid supplies are subject to tax.

4. Capital Cost of Merchant Ships

The U.K. argue that the capital cost of merchant ships being charged to Mutual Aid made available to the U.K., gives a wrong impression of the magnitude of that aid, since title to the ships is retained by Canada and the U.K. gets only the services of them during the war. As long as Mutual Aid was considered adequate to look after all requirements, this was of no particular importance to the U.K., but now that the total of Mutual Aid is limited, the charging of this capital cost to it reduces the amount which the U.K. could otherwise obtain.

During the last fiscal year, as reported in the Mutual Aid Report,<sup>258</sup> 91 merchant vessels were transferred to the U.K. under Mutual Aid, with a total value of approximately $159 million. It now appears that the transfers of merchant ships during the present year will be about half as much. Consequently the amount involved in this point is approximately $240 million.

One could, no doubt, defend the procedure under which the Mutual Aid Appropriation was charged only with the charter value of the ships because that is all that is being provided to the U.K. To do this, however, would require some other appropriation to which the capital costs could be charged and which could be credited with the charter costs charged to Mutual Aid. One could also argue that the merchant ships provided under Mutual Aid are being used in the services of all the United Nations, and that the U.K. is essentially only providing the crews and management to operate the ships which Canada has built. The U.K., of course, charge themselves and other nations for the services of the ships, and out of these charges meet operating costs and in addition apparently make some provision for insurance and depreciation, despite the fact that they have incurred no capital cost in connection with them.

It can equally well be argued, on the other hand, that the capital costs of merchant ships are a reasonable charge to Mutual Aid because it is a cost of enabling Canada to contribute to the common effort of the United Nations. The purpose of Mutual Aid, as repeatedly enunciated, is not to give specific help to our Allies, but rather to make a contribution to the common cause, and the fact that the full cost of the ships is charged to Mutual Aid does not need to imply that any particular Ally, including the one operating the ship, has benefited to that extent from our action.

Moreover, the fact that there may be some residual value to Canada in the ships is not inconsistent with the principle or purpose of Mutual Aid. It was clearly contemplated and understood that in some cases there might be some residual or reciprocal benefits accruing to Canada from Mutual Aid. It should also be noted that if any Mutual Aid ships are lost, Canada, through the Mutual Aid Appropriation, bears the capital cost of the ship and receives no insurance or other payment in respect of it. On the other hand, the U.K. appears to be collecting both the depreciation element and the insurance element in the charges made for the service of the ships, although, of course, in a great many cases she will herself be paying these charges from one pocket to another.

The final and apparently clinching argument on this point, however, is that Parliament has clearly and explicitly understood from the beginning of the Mutual Aid program that ships were to be purchased out of the Mutual Aid Appropriation and provided on a charter basis to the U.K. and possibly to other countries. An alteration in this procedure would have to be justified to Parliament on some ground other than the magnitude of the appropriation which Parliament itself has provided for Mutual Aid.

While it would accomplish nothing in substance, it might be reasonable to make clear in the accounts that the U.K. is not receiving a benefit represented by the full capital cost of these ships. This could be done by charging the capital cost to a separate account under the Mutual Aid Appropriation and then showing as one of the services provided to the U.K. the charter value of the ships.

5. Capitation Rates for Canadian Army Overseas

On this subject the U.K. proposes:

(a) that the capitation rates should be based on the estimated cost for the types of formation in which the Canadian forces are in fact employed rather than on the estimated average cost for the British Army as a whole, including the lower costs for line of communication and other troops not in the forward line of battle. Heretofore it was understood that the capitation rates would be based on the average costs rather than those appropriate to the order of battle of the Canadian forces themselves. The U.K., however, point out that it is their understanding that Canada wishes to bear the full cost of its own forces and would only be doing so if the capitation rates were based on the principle now proposed;

(b) that the rates should be established by agreement on the basis of reasonable estimates of cost rather than on the basis of meticulous accounting, which the U.K. argue is not possible nor desirable in the midst of war.

The principle advocated by the U.K. in (a) above has already been recognized and approved by the War Committee,<sup>259</sup> and there is therefore no need to discuss it here. It is understood that Canadian officials have been instructed to be prepared to recognize this principle and put it into effect in respect of Canadian forces in active operations, commencing with those in Sicily in July, 1943.

See Document 501.

Proposal (b) above is essentially an administrative matter and should be possible of accomplishment to the reasonable satisfaction of both parties. It is perfectly understood that the rates must be set on the basis of estimates rather than of complete records; indeed, the whole principle of capitation rates is to avoid the keeping of meticulous records. The practical question is the degree of supporting evidence that is necessary in making an estimate. Canadian officials feel that they must have sufficient information to enable them to make a reasonable judgment as to the appropriateness of the rates selected. The Financial Superintendent of the Canadian Army Overseas is the officer principally concerned with the establishment of these rates from the Canadian side and is, we understand, very intimately acquainted with the costs on which they are based. It was our understanding that he is prepared to agree to rates on the basis of estimates, provided that the War Office can furnish evidence that the rates suggested are reasonable. Apparently the War Office, on the other hand, feels that our officers are requesting an unnecessary amount of detailed information.

It might be suggested that the Financial Superintendent of the Canadian Army Overseas, and possibly senior officers of the Canadian Army Overseas, should be asked to report on this matter and to give their views as to the amount of latitude which should reasonably be allowed in reaching agreement on these figures. After consideration in Ottawa, some indication might be given as to the views here on the subject and then the officials overseas might keep their own Department and the Department of Finance informed by cable for some time as to the progress of negotiations, so that we in Ottawa can form some judgment as to the amount of evidence required and see that only as much is requested as seems reasonably necessary to discharge the responsibility of officers and officials to the Government, and of the Government to Parliament.

The U.K. estimate that about $100 million a year increase in the capitation rate payments would result from adopting the principle proposed in (a) above. It is hoped to get some opinion from Canadian officials overseas on this estimate in the very near future, but as yet no information has been received that would enable us to criticize this figure of the War Office.

6. Cost of Advanced Air Training In U.K.

The U.K. propose that the cost of advanced training of Canadian air crew in the U.K., which up to the present has been borne by the U.K., should be borne instead by Canada. The argument for this proposal, as for the previous one, is that this is a part of the full cost of Canadian forces overseas which Canada has undertaken to bear, and that there is no real counterbalancing item in the cost of the air training plan in Canada, as the U.K. is bearing 50% of that cost, which is approximately equal to the non-Canadian personnel being trained in Canada. The U.K. suggest that the amount involved in these costs is about $120 million per year.

The present division of costs of air training is based on the air training agreements between Canada, the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand. Under these agreements, Canada has undertaken to meet a specified share of the costs of training air crew in Canada, and it has been understood that training in the U.K. would be at the cost of the U.K. This intention is fairly clear in paragraph 16 of the original agreement, paragraph 9 of the further agreement of January 7, 1941, and paragraph 24 of the agreement of June 5, 1942.<sup>260</sup> When Canada undertook responsibility for the cost of pay and allowances for Canadians serving in the R.A.F. under the agreement of April, 1943, no mention was made of these costs of advanced training in the U.K., and it may reasonably be assumed that they were still to be borne by the U.K., either by implication or under the general phrase "maintenance and other expenses of personnel serving with the R.A.F." in paragraph 3(c). In this 1943 agreement, Canada did undertake to pay "all costs" of the R.C.A.F. squadrons formed in the U.K. This has not been interpreted up to the present to include the costs of the advanced training in the U.K. of the Canadian personnel entering these squadrons, but conceivably it might be so interpreted.

The original conception of Canada's share in the war in the air has undergone a gradual development since the original air training agreement. The principal change has been the formation of R.C.A.F. squadrons overseas, then the assumption of their costs by Canada, then the assumption of the full costs of pay and allowances of the Canadian personnel in the R.A.F., and further the increase in the number of R.C.A.F. squadrons, culminating in the recent decision to increase the number from 44 to 58. The present proposal of the U.K. would be consistent with this development, even though it amounted to a modification of the present agreements and understandings. In particular, the assumption by Canada of the advanced training cost for the Canadian personnel entering R.C.A.F. squadrons would seem logical and an essential part of the cost of providing such squadrons which Canada undertook to bear in 1943. It seems somewhat odd that Canada should bear the costs for personnel in these squadrons through all their early training and subsequently when they are in operation, but expect the U.K. to bear the cost during the interval when they are training in the U.K. This could only be satisfactorily explained if Canada could claim that in the costs of the B.C.A.T.P. she was bearing an undue proportion which counterbalanced the costs for advanced training being carried by the U.K. Such does not appear to be the case.

The present 50/50 division of costs of the air training plan now in effect is approximately equal to the number of Canadian and non-Canadian personnel which have been trained under the plan. During the two years from July 1, 1942, to June 30, 1944, the R.C.A.F. graduates from the training plan numbered 40,202, while the combined total of R.A.F., R.A.A.F. and R.N.Z.A.F. graduates numbered 39,396. (The number of graduates since the inception of the B.C.A.T.P. in 1939 is 57,714 for the R.C.A.F., and 45,726 for the other groups. This does not include graduates of the R.A.F. schools in Canada prior to July 1, 1942.) During the Air Training Conference in May

1942 when the present arrangements were being worked out, pupil intakes into the plan were agreed upon in the proportion that Canada would provide roughly 45% and the U.K. plus other Dominions and Allied Nations would provide 55%. This division of pupils, it is understood, was one factor in the determination of the division of costs, but it is understood and indicated in the Minutes of the Conference that other factors of perhaps equal importance were the financial implications of an extension of the old agreement on one hand and the continuance and expansion of R.A.F. schools on the other. Apparently the two approaches suggested a roughly similar division of the costs. It is believed that in the remaining period up to March 31, 1945, the proportion of Canadian graduates will be somewhat less than 50%, but it seems unlikely that this will reduce the total number of Canadian graduates to a figure significantly less than half the total of all graduates.

There are certain minor factors in regard to the B.C.A.T.P. which might justify some assumption of training costs in the U.K. by the U.K.; for example, the cost of a special school for training Radar mechanics for the R.A.F. was brought into the B.C.A.T.P., and Canada thereby met half the costs involved. Incidentally, it is also understood that Canada bore the expense of University courses for the pupils of this Radar unit.

On the whole, it might be reasonable for Canada to meet the costs of the advanced training in the U.K. of Canadian personnel receiving such training, to the extent or in the proportion that such personnel enter or have entered the R.C.A.F. squadrons. The assessment of these costs and the division would have to be made on a relatively broad and flexible basis, as it is understood that the men take various courses with larger units, including R.A.F. men, and when they have finished their training they may be transferred back and forth between the R.C.A.F. and R.A.F. squadrons. While definite information is lacking in Ottawa on the numbers involved, it is estimated that the costs for the personnel in the R.C.A.F. forces might amount to about 40% of the total, or, say, $50 million a year, if the U.K. estimate of the total is correct.

Whether Canada should go farther and assume the costs of advanced training for Canadians serving with the R.A.F. is essentially a question of Government policy which cannot be settled without knowledge of the Government's desire in the matter. Essentially it would mean that Canada was lending to the R.A.F. men with a greater degree of training than at present. Arguments could be found both for and against assuming these costs. For example, one could argue for it on the ground that when in 1943 Canada undertook to meet the pay and allowances for Canadians in the R.A.F., she was essentially undertaking to provide air crew for the R.A.F.'s use and maintain them. Logically, therefore, it might be argued that Canada should bear the costs of making such air crew fit for use, and essentially those costs of putting trained men at the disposal of the R.A.F. On the other hand, it could be argued that training and instruction of air crew goes on practically indefinitely, even while they are engaged in operations, and that no satisfactory division can be made between the costs of training and the costs of operating. In such case, the only logical division is that under which she would bear the costs up to the time when the personnel leave Canada and Canadian administration and enter the U.K. establishment.

Further information has been requested from the R.C.A.F. overseas on the costs of training and their comments on the U.K. estimate of $120 million per year. The figure given by the U.K. appears to be based on a rough figure of cost agreed with the R.C.A.F. for the whole period July 1/42 to March 31/45.

7. Cost of Reserve Stocks and Stocks in Transit

The U.K. propose that Canada should pay for an appropriate share of the reserve stocks and stocks in transit of munitions and other stores destined for the use of Canadian forces overseas as well as British forces. The Canadian forces do not maintain their own reserves nor lines of supply but draw their requirements from U.K. reserves. Up to date the U.K. has met the cost of these reserves and has borne the cost (except in the case of Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid supplies) of goods which have been delivered from the factory to shipping point but have not yet been placed in reserve. The U.K. argue that the cost of such stocks, both in reserve and in transit, is an essential part of the costs attributable to the forces using them, and that if Canada is to meet all the costs properly chargeable to her forces, she should bear a portion of the costs of these stocks.

The U.K. have noted the Canadian argument, emphasized by the War Committee, that a portion of the reserves or goods in transit has been provided by Canada as Mutual Aid or indirectly as part of the contribution to the U.K. in 1942, while another part represents Lend-Lease supplies for which Canada should pay not the U.K. but the United States, when and if Canadian forces receive them. The U.K. agree that these Mutual Aid and Lend-Lease supplies should be excluded from the costs which Canada should undertake to share, but they point out that these offsets are relatively small in relation to the total value of the stocks involved.

The U.K. have also agreed that if Canada should share in the costs of these stocks, she should receive a credit for anything realized from their liquidation or disposal. For example, if the stocks are used up in the closing period of the war, Canada should be credited with the proceeds of the sale or transfer to the various forces involved. On the other hand, if the stocks are held until they become surplus but have some disposal or scrap value, Canada should receive an appropriate fraction of that. This provision would be of considerable importance if the stocks in question are to be used up during Stage 2.

The U.K. estimate very tentatively that for the R.C.A.F. they hold reserve stocks to a value of $100 million and stocks in transit of $250 million. Estimates have not yet been prepared in respect of supplies for the Canadian Army, but it is suggested they might amount to $150 million, making a total of $500 million.

Although appearing to be a radically new proposal in the financing of the Canadian forces overseas, this proposal, when qualified with an allowance for Mutual Aid and Lend-Lease supplies and with the understanding that Canada would receive credit for her share in the stocks on liquidation, seems reasonable in principle. At first it seems surprising that it should be raised this late in the war when stocks have probably about reached their maximum, but when it is recalled that it was only last year Canada began to meet the costs of the Air Force overseas and that up to last year the Canadian Army, it is understood, maintained many of its own reserves and lines of supply in the expectation of serving as a unit, it is understandable that this issue was not an important one. Moreover, it is only as the possible end of hostilities comes into view, with consequent possibilities of surpluses and losses on stocks, that the question of sharing in the cost of such stocks comes to have any more significance than merely the interest involved on the working capital so tied up.

While the principle of this proposal may be accepted as reasonable, there is a related consideration which offsets to some extent the force of the argument. Both the U.K. and Canada have large amounts of capital tied up in munitions in the course of production which will be largely surplus and obsolete when hostilities cease. Each country will have to bear a substantial loss on this inventory in process at the end of hostilities, except to the extent that there are available funds in the U.K. Cash Receipts Account which Canada may apply to this purpose (unless there is some understanding between the U.K. and the Department of Munitions & Supply which is unknown to us). In proportion these losses are likely to be much larger to Canada in respect of production for U.K. forces than they are to the U.K. in respect of production for Canadian forces. Of course, to the extent that the conclusion of hostilities can be foreseen and risks assumed in anticipating it by tapering off production and liquidating stocks in reserve and in the pipeline, this loss on inventories in process as well as losses on reserves and pipeline can be reduced and production resources converted more quickly to reconstruction.

The figure of $500 million given for this element of costs to Canada seems high to us, although we are without information as to the amounts of stocks held and have only the meagrest information on the proportion for Canadian forces. Taking the Air Force stocks first on which the U.K. figures are given, the total of $350 million is equal to the whole annual maintenance cost of the Canadian squadrons this year. This ratio seems high, and particularly the proportion of it due to the pipeline. A large proportion of the maintenance costs—perhaps about $200 million per annum—is for aircraft. In the case of fighter aircraft, we appreciate there are substantial stocks which must be held as a strategic reserve and it is conceivable that they might equal a year's intake. Presumably, however, they are very largely produced in the U.K. and the pipeline will be short. A large part of the aircraft costs are for bomber squadrons, and it is the understanding here that in respect of heavy bombers "the production line is the reserve." If this is true, reserve stocks should be relatively small. Moreover, the pipeline may be long in the case of bombers and spares from Canada and the U.K. but these are the very items which it is agreed should be excluded from the costs which Canada should share. The pipeline in the case of U.K. production should be relatively short, particularly in the case of Canadian forces, nearly all of whom are based on the U.K. Reserve stocks and stocks in pipeline in the case of gasoline and oil may be a substantial proportion of a year's intake, but it appears that the annual consumption of the Canadian squadrons has a value of only approximately $20 million. Stocks of bombs and ammunition must presumably be held and there may be a fairly substantial amount in pipeline, but it would seem unlikely that very large stocks are held since reports have been received of limitations on the use of the desirable types of bombs and ammunition due to the shortage of stocks on hand. The annual intake of bombs and ammunition appears to be something of the order of $60 to $70 million or less. Other items covered in the squadron maintenance charges do not appear to involve significant stocks.

Information is lacking on which to make comments in respect of stocks held for Army purposes, but it may be noted that if Sherman Tanks are excluded, being furnished on Lend-Lease, the items on which Canada appears to draw on U.K. stocks would include food and forage supplies to a value of approximately $140 million, various ordnance and N.T.<sup>261</sup> vehicles and A.F.V.'s to the value of perhaps $110 million, of which a portion will be Mutual Aid supplies, and finally, some gasoline and oil comprised in the operating costs of vehicles, amounting to $25 million. Presumably it is not intended to take food stocks into account in these calculations. It is possible that reserves and goods in transit might amount in value to half the annual costs for the other items, but this would certainly need investigation by the technical officers concerned. The figures noted above are those derived from the Army estimates for the current year.

8. Effects of Relative Prices

The U.K. draw our attention to the fact that in general prices are higher for Canadian production than for U.K. production of corresponding items. They draw attention to the cases of Lancasters and Mosquito aircraft, where the disparity is indeed quite substantial. Our information is that the cost of Mosquito airframes is $110,000 in Canada, compared with the cost in the U.K. of $47,000, and the cost of a Lancaster airframe in Canada is estimated at $208,000 compared with a cost in the U.K. of $110,000. On the other hand, some items cost less in Canada, particularly some of the chemicals and explosives, and it is probable that the costs of motor transport vehicles are lower in Canada. On the whole, however, it is probably true that Canadian costs average more—perhaps 25% to 50% more—than those in the U.K. This does to some extent explain how it is that Canada pays the U.K. so much less for munitions on the whole than the U.K. pays to Canada.

The U.K. indicate that this disparity in prices means that what Canada contributes to the munitions pool is at a higher price on the average than the price she pays for similar items when drawing them from the pool. To the extent that this is true and is not specifically avoided, Canada would make a profit from the pooling of munitions. On the other hand, we understand that where Canadian equipment is specified, as for example, in the R.C.A.F. squadrons using Canadian Lancasters, Canada is charged the price appropriate to Canadian equipment. Similarly where U.S. equipment is specified, Canada is charged the U.S. price rather than the U.K. price.

Probably M.T.—Military Transport.

9. Outstanding Liability in respect of Air Training

In addition to the liability noted by the U.K. of $200 million in respect of training up to June, 1942, it is estimated that a further amount of $250 million will have accrued by March 31, 1945, in respect of training subsequent to June, 1942, making a total accrued liability of $450 million.

10. Possible Arrears in Department of Munitions and Supply Payments

The U.K. express anxiety over the apparent lag there has been in the past between the value of munitions shipments and the payments in respect of them, as this constitutes an unknown, and possibly substantial, claim on Mutual Aid funds or the U.K. itself. This lag was quite substantial up to March last, possibly involving several hundred million dollars of charges to Mutual Aid, but a determined effort was made in March, April and May to overcome this lag and it is now believed that it represents less than a month's invoices and, in respect of production for U.K. and Mutual Aid, would involve an unpaid liability of perhaps $75 to $100 million. Part of the previous lag was due to delay in establishing prices, but nearly all prices have now been set.

Ottawa, August 8, 1944

SUGGESTIONS FOR A REVISED FORMULA GOVERNING FINANCIAL RELATIONS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE U.K. AFTER MARCH 31, 1945

I. The Suggested New Formula

The object of the formula suggested below is to develop an accounting practice between the United Kingdom and Canada which would correspond more closely to the realities of pooling and would avoid the complicated cross-accounting in the present system. It is not intended to result in a higher total contribution from Canada, provided two basic assumptions are accepted, namely

(a) That the existing gap of $583 millions in 1944/45 is met by Canada by an increased Defence Appropriation or otherwise; and

(b) Canada is prepared in Stage II to make the same proportionate aggregate contribution to the total war effort as in 1944/45, though the separate parts making up this contribution would not all be reduced in the same proportion, for example the supply of food under Mutual Aid remaining unchanged. It will in fact be shown below that the new formula if it had been in operation in 1944/45 would have resulted, on assumption (a), in substantially the same Canadian contribution as the existing formula.

If, however, the old formula were to be applied in 1945/46, then, subject to assumption (b), a very considerable increase of Mutual Aid would be required, since although the cost of munitions supplied to U.K. would be somewhat reduced, the falling off of the offsets in respect of repayments to U.K. for servicing the Canadian forces abroad might fall by much more. Yet a substantial increase in Mutual Aid, at a time when the total war effort by U.K. was being reduced, would be very difficult to explain on both sides of the Atlantic.

We should emphasize that the new formula suggested below has not yet been examined in London but has arisen in our own minds as a result of what we have learned from our recent conversations in Ottawa. It should therefore be regarded as entirely tentative at the present stage. If the principle underlying the new formula is thought to be attractive, then further authority would have to be sought from London. It is not easy to appreciate its ultimate implications on either side without rather careful consideration. The new formula would be on the following lines:

(1) All Canadian munitions production would be financed by Canada from War Appropriations except in so far as there was a cash recovery in respect of W.S.L.<sup>262</sup> orders. These supplies would be assigned and transferred to British Empire forces—and presumably to the forces of others of the United Nations as well—without payment. This follows the general procedure as between U.S.A. and the British Empire; all U.S. munitions orders are financed by the War and Navy Departments, and by the Maritime Commission, and in no way enter into the Lend-Lease Appropriations. The transfers are charged up, it is true, as “Lend-Lease Exports” in the President’s periodic reports. This is appropriate to U.S., since the American forces are not equipped out of the British Empire pool but supply themselves overseas, in addition to their Lend-Lease contribution, which is not the case with Canada. Thus the analogy with our present arrangements with U.S. goes some way but must not be pressed too far.

(2) The U.K. would supply the Canadian forces overseas with everything they needed without payment of any kind. There would be no capitation payments or other charges and all such war services as hospitals, accommodation, etc., would be provided by the British. The only payment which the Canadians would be called upon to make within the sterling area would be in respect of the transfer of the pay of their forces. This again follows the arrangement which we make with the United States forces.

(3) The Canadians would also provide against their Defence Appropriation certain miscellaneous war services which they render to the British forces in Canada, such as, inspection, Atlantic transport, internal transport and shipping freight charges applicable to munitions. The question of responsibility for Air Training would have to be separately considered owing to Lend-Lease complications and it might be advisable that the U.K. should retain its present financial responsibilities in this respect.

(4) This might allow Canadian Mutual Aid to be limited to the Ministry of Food's programme covering the supply of food to the U.K. and incidental charges made by Canada for internal transport and freight charges on shipments of food to the U.K. in Canadian bottoms.

(5) All other transactions between Canada and the sterling area—e.g. purchases of raw materials from Canada and exports from the sterling area to Canada—would be financed as cash transactions. It is unlikely that any significant net claim would arise between the sterling area and Canada as a result of these transactions. If a surplus or a deficiency did arise it would probably not be of such dimensions as would cause serious transfer difficulties.

(6) The coverage of the pooling suggested above would be broadly similar to that of Lend-Lease and Reciprocal Aid with the U.S. except in regard to raw materials and manufactured articles, which are at present covered (in part) by American Lend-Lease, but would not be chargeable under the above proposal on Canadian Mutual Aid.

II. An Illustration of the Working of the New Formula by its application to the Current Year 1944/45 (All figures in million Canadian dollars.)

Under the present formula the direct charge in respect of the financial arrangements between Canada and U.K. falling on the Canadian Defence Appropriation was in the first instance 801. If the British contention is accepted, something of the order of a further 668 should be similarly charged, and the total charge on Defence Appropriation will be 1,469;<sup>263</sup> and the U.K. charge on Mutual Aid Appropriation is 596.

In order to show how the new formula would operate in the current year, it is necessary to make some allocation of transport and shipping freight charges between munitions and food. If the total net estimate of 105 under this head is allocated 50 to munitions and 55 to food, the charges to Defence Appropriation (ignoring Air Training) would be—

The following note was written on the original:

If some of the 668 gap were filled by taxation rebate, the Appropriation itself would not have to rise to this extent. But in that case the "Munitions from Canada" item in next table would be correspondingly lower.

Munitions from Canada	1,247
Pay of troops (say)	150
Other war services by Canada excluding Air Training	81
Transport and freight on munitions (say)	50
	1,528
The charge on Mutual Aid would be - Food for U.K.	534
Transport and freight charges on food (say)	55
	589
Thus the U.K. would have received 1,528 plus 589 =	2,117
instead of 1,469 plus 596 =	2,065
	an increase of 52.

III. The Working of the New Formula in Changed Conditions.

It is not practicable as yet to give any valid figures for Stage II, but there are certain more or less fixed points, namely—

(a) Whilst the requirements of munitions from Canada will be somewhat reduced as compared with Stage I, they will still be substantial.

(b) The offsets due to U.K. in respect of the Canadian armed forces will be reduced.

(c) The food programme will be substantially unchanged.

It will easily be seen that with a reduction in the offsets due to U.K., the deficit to be covered by Mutual Aid will rise very rapidly, especially if the reduction in the total Canadian Defence Appropriations in Stage II fall, as they are likely to do, much more on the internal than on the external Defence expenditure. For example, if the aggregate of external Defence expenditure and Mutual Aid were to be reduced to (say) 1,750, which might easily be the case, under the old formula two-thirds of this would fall on Mutual Aid and only one-third on the Defence Appropriations; whilst under the new formula these proportions might be virtually reversed.

Mémoire du ministère des Finances

Memorandum by Department of Finance

[Ottawa, August 1944]

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CANADA AND THE UNITED KINGDOM

COMMENTS BASED ON THE MEMORANDA SUBMITTED BY THE UNITED KINGDOM REPRESENTATIVES

1. When the first gift to the United Kingdom was decided upon, those who were responsible for recommending the decision, as well as those responsible for taking it, had in mind:

(a) That contributions of weapons, war materials and food stuffs required for winning the common war were not things for which one Ally should charge another.

(b) That the practice of cash on the barrel head involving repatriation of securities on a large scale, and the accumulation of a large war debt ($700 millions) had gone far enough, having in mind that impossibly large war debts are uncollectable and

(c) That Canada's position versus the United States would be an unhappy one if we continued to charge while the United States was lend-leasing.

No doubt each individual gave a different weighting to the various factors mentioned above, but they all had a bearing on the decision.

2. Has there been any reason to change the views which led to the taking of that decision? The only one of which I can think is the fact that the United Kingdom has accumulated, and is continuing to accumulate, a very large debt to certain countries. Her present intention is not to repudiate or scale down that debt, but to repay it in English goods over a period of years—I should think a generation or so. If a great many other countries are going to push the United Kingdom down, it may be asked why we should not get on that bandwagon and build up a claim for English goods some time in the future.

3. In giving this point consideration, I think we should try to assess:

(a) The likelihood of our wanting to exercise such a claim.

(b) The effect of our action on U.S.-U.K. financial relations.

Turning to the question raised in (a), we must remember that it will be a great problem for us to balance our accounts with the United Kingdom at the level of exports which we would like to maintain, without taking any goods in respect of past indebtedness. Superimpose on that the difficulties of taking sufficient additional goods gradually to discharge the U.K.'s borrowings from us during stage 3, and the, say, $600 millions war liability, and I think we are facing more than we are ever likely to manage. If the United States are so successful in the post-war period in remedying their balance of payments difficulties that the United Kingdom has sufficient U.S. dollars to spare to cover some unbalance in our current account, and also to do some repayment of old debt, that would be a much happier situation for Canada. But I see no reason to have faith in such a development in the foreseeable future.

Turning to (b), I should think that Canada's return to "cash on the barrel head" in part would have quite an influence on U.S. policy during stage 2.

4. The memorandum furnished by the United Kingdom indicates how extremely difficult their post-war situation is going to be—what restrictions and troubles their people face. The U.K. are desperately trying to keep enough cash on hand to retain some strength and independence after the war, and not to get themselves into a situation where they will have to default on their obligations. I think it is most definitely in Canada's selfish interests that the United Kingdom should achieve this objective. We need a strong United Kingdom in the worst possible way. We need a United Kingdom which has some chance of struggling through to multilateralism in due course.

5. For all these reasons, I believe that we should seek to find in the U.K. suggestions re taxes on mutual aid goods, capital cost of ships, capitation payments, etc., ways and means of covering the gap, subject to certain provisos and qualifications as follows:

(1) I do not think that we should give up all claims to U.S. dollars. Without going into detail, I express the view that our U.S. dollar situation is likely to be most uncertain in stage 2, and may be quite bad in stage 3. In both these stages we may have to try to extract some U.S. dollars from the U.K. I would put up the case that in fact we are not as rich in gold and U.S. dollars as they seem to think—not rich enough to spend hundreds of millions for their account—and that we must get a hundred million from them. If absolutely necessary, I would compromise at seventy-five millions, but nothing less.

(2) The financial arrangements between the U.K. and U.S. in stage 2 will be very important from our point of view. If the U.S. is tough and drains the United Kingdom of gold and U.S. dollars, then the United Kingdom will be in the extremely weak position which we would like to avoid. In such circumstances, we might just as well charge them for everything and make a job of it. The moral is that we have a stake in their U.S. arrangements, we should know what they are going to be, and our actions may be affected by the results. The U.K. should know this, and in case of need the U.S. should know it too. But I doubt whether this factor should or can influence our decisions for the 1944-45 fiscal year.

(3) We are also interested in the U.K.'s arrangements with her sterling area creditors. I gather that U.K. is going to have a meeting with them this autumn. Our interests lie in those arrangements being as tough as possible on the creditors. Specifically, it would suit us if they paid no interest at all on the debt, and we are particularly concerned by any commitments U.K. may take to make U.S. dollars available in settlement of the war-time balances. To the extent that the U.K. uses up U.S. dollars for these purposes, she has just that much less to make some payments to us against our favourable current account balance with her during or after stage 3.

6. I gathered from discussions with U.K. representatives that during stage 3 they expected to do some further borrowing from some of the sterling area countries, and at that time would take no responsibility for providing the sterling area countries with U.S. dollars. I assume that the sterling area countries would have the use of their hard currency earnings, and would not be expected to put them in the sterling pool except perhaps in certain cases where there was a surplus.

7. The U.K. memorandum implicitly assumes a narrow bilateral trading world, and the discussion is almost entirely in financial terms without even the sugar-coating of some reference to the possibilities of freer multilateral trading. There is something more than a suggestion that the U.K. plans to use its debtor position to develop preferred and perhaps exclusive trade positions in the sterling area. It seems highly desirable that there should be some discussion of post-war trade between Canada, U.K. and the sterling area. Will we get equality of opportunity in the sterling area or U.K. markets, or does the U.K.

propose to adopt the attitude towards Canadian dollar requirements of the sterling area which I think (see above) they intend to adopt towards U.S. dollar requirements? They may very well ask, of course, what help we can give in the way of encouraging imports from the sterling area by lowering tariffs or in other ways. However that may be—and, to repeat—I think we need more light on our prospective relations with the sterling area and on U.K. prospective financial arrangements with U.S. and her sterling creditors before we can come to a conclusion as to whether or not it will pay dividends for us to continue the fundamentally sensible war-time policy which was initiated at the time of the first gift.

UNITED KINGDOM PROPOSALS FOR FINANCING THEIR REQUIREMENTS IN CANADA DURING THIS FISCAL YEAR

Size of the Problem

It is roughly estimated that the deficit to be financed for the U.K. and the rest of the sterling area this current fiscal year is about 1075 million dollars, after allowing for the formation of additional R.C.A.F. squadrons this year. It is also expected that about $600 million of this can be met from Mutual Aid funds, leaving to be financed otherwise about $475 million. In addition the United Kingdom already owe Canada $200 million in respect of Air Training prior to July 1st, 1942 and is accumulating debt under the present plan which will amount, it is estimated, to $250 million by the end of the current fiscal year—making $450 million in all. The United Kingdom would wish, if at all possible, to meet this outstanding indebtedness this year, as well as the current deficit, so that its limited borrowing capacity would be available to buy essential foodstuffs and other supplies from Canada during the first few postwar years when she does not expect to be able to pay for her current requirements with exports.

*United Kingdom Proposals*1. Capitation Rates

That the capitation payments made by the Canadian Army overseas to the War Office in respect of troops in active operations should be based on an estimate of the full cost of the types of frontline and armoured formations which the Canadian forces actually comprise, rather than on the estimate of the average cost for all British Army formations including line of communication troops, etc.

This principle has already been accepted by the War Committee.<sup>264</sup>

See Document 501.

It is estimated that this change in principle might result in an increase from the present tentative rate of 15s. per man per day to 25s. per man per day, which would increase the payments by $26 million in respect of 1943-44 (Sicily and Italy), 15 million in respect of April-June 1944 and $100 million for the period July 1, 1944, to March 31, 1945—or say $140 million in all.

2. Advanced Training for Canadian Aircrew

The United Kingdom propose that Canada should bear the cost for the advanced training in United Kingdom of Canadian personnel graduating from the B.C.A.T.P. They argue that this is consistent with the principle that Canada bears the full costs of her own forces, and that it is not offset by any counterbalancing item in respect of the B.C.A.T.P. as Canada is now bearing one half the costs of that training plan and about one half the graduates from it are Canadians.

It is estimated by the United Kingdom that the annual costs of such training for all Canadian personnel is approximately $120 million per annum. The R.C.A.F. does not have information that would enable them to check this figure but has no reason to believe it is wrong.

It may be noted that about 25% or 30% of Canadian aircrew overseas are in R.C.A.F. squadrons, and this proportion will presumably increase as the additional squadrons, now authorized, are formed.

It would be necessary to decide from what date Canada's liability for these costs should start, if the principle is acceptable.

3. Sharing the Cost of Reserve Stores

The United Kingdom propose that if Canada is really to bear the cost of her own forces overseas, she should share with the United Kingdom the cost of the stores held in reserve and in transit for the use of the Canadian forces and the British forces. The United Kingdom agree that the lend-lease stores, and stores obtained from Canada under Mutual Aid (or the 1942 contribution) should be excluded in reckoning the reserves, the cost of which is to be shared. They also agree that Canada would of course receive credit for her share of any proceeds of the liquidation of such stores, including the using up of the reserves during the war, if that is possible.

The United Kingdom estimates that stores to the value of $150 million are held for the R.C.A.F. in reserves and in transit, and it is estimated very roughly that another $150 or $200 million are held for the Canadian Army overseas, including stores and equipment en route to the Italian front. The figure for the R.C.A.F. appears more or less reasonable (a higher figure had originally been given by the U.K. and it has been corrected after criticism here). The figure for the Army can only be worked out, even roughly, when more information is obtained. These figures may need to be corrected further for lend-lease and Mutual Aid content.

The Canadian Army point out that they hold in Canada general reserves to a value of about $47 million, in addition to those for home and North American defence, which are available for overseas forces, both Canadian and Allied. These should clearly be taken into account, with adjustments if necessary to exclude any obsolete or generally surplus material, if such material is also excluded from the U.K. stocks.

It is not proposed that the value of goods in process of production be taken into account in these reserves as it is realized that both Canada and United Kingdom have substantial sums tied up in working capital in the production of supplies for the other country.

Mr. Norman, Financial Adviser, under the B.C.A.T.P., has suggested that if Canada undertakes to share in these reserve stores overseas, arrangements should be made by which any residual post-war value in such stocks could be traded to the United Kingdom, in advance, for her interest in the residual assets of the B.C.A.T.P., each country being allowed to take home such equipment as it requires for its own post-war Air Force establishment. Possibly oil and gasoline stocks should be excepted from such an agreement because of their high post-war value.

4. Sales Tax and Customs Duties on Mutual Aid Goods

The United Kingdom suggest that there is hardly sufficient justification for charging taxes on Mutual Aid purchases when all other exports sold to other countries are exempt from such taxes. They point out that Mutual Aid would cover substantially more goods if the usual tax exemption or drawbacks on exports were allowed, and that the present arrangement makes the financial burden of Mutual Aid to appear more than it is in fact.

It is estimated that taxes paid on Mutual Aid munitions last year amounted to approximately $65 million, which could be rebated to Mutual Aid if the principle were followed that is followed in respect of sales to foreign governments. For the current year taxes on Mutual Aid supplies might amount to another $60 million.

5. Capital Cost of Ships

The United Kingdom point out that they do not in fact receive under Mutual Aid the capital value of merchant ships, only the use of them during the war period, but the whole cost is charged to their share of Mutual Aid. They suggest that it would be more reasonable to charge the capital cost to some other appropriation and only the value of the bare boat charter to Mutual Aid.

The value of ships charged to Mutual Aid last year was approximately $160 million and this year the total appears likely to be about one-half that figure, or $80 million.

FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM

1. THE PRIME MINISTER said that the problem of financial relations between Canada and the United Kingdom had recently been the subject of consideration by the Cabinet War Committee (meetings of June 14th and 21st). At present, conversations were being carried on in Ottawa with representatives of the U.K. Treasury with a view to reaching a satisfactory settlement of the important issues involved.

This problem was causing great concern and it was important that the Cabinet should now give it urgent consideration. The subject was one of a very confidential nature.

(Minutes of Cabinet War Committee, June 14, 1944, paras. 35 to 39, and June 21, 1944, paras. 12 to 14).

2. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE described the present position. The Mutual Aid appropriation was already running out and decisions were urgently required as to the policy to be followed with respect to the continuance of war supplies to the U.K. government.

Lord Keynes and other U.K. government representatives, now in Ottawa, had submitted certain proposals which the Deputy Minister of Finance would put before the meeting.

3. THE DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE described the present position and the various expedients which might be adopted to meet the United Kingdom's shortage of Canadian funds.

The U.K. representatives had been full and frank in their statement of the British financial position. The United Kingdom was unwilling to undertake large liabilities which they saw no present means of meeting. For solution of the problem, they had advanced proposals which involved the undertaking of additional obligations on the part of Canada in respect of Canadian overseas forces: increased capitation payments for the Army overseas, payment for advanced training of Canadian aircrew in Britain, sharing of the costs of reserve stores maintained in the United Kingdom for British and Canadian forces. They also proposed elimination of excise taxes and duties upon war supplies shipped by Canada to the sterling area.

If the government were prepared to accept such additional liabilities, they should insist upon the U.K. government paying in gold or U.S. dollars for the U.S. content of Canadian goods provided to Britain.

4. THE PRIME MINISTER enquired whether, in view of the large appropriations which had been made by Parliament at this Session for war service gratuities, social measures, and in relation to other legislation, Canada would be able, from present and prospective sources of revenue, to meet these payments and, in addition, assume the additional obligations involved in the U.K. proposals.

5. DR. CLARK observed that cash requirements necessary to meet the U.K. deficit had been forecast in the Budget statement of the Minister of Finance.<sup>265</sup>

The ability of Canada to meet the large commitments referred to by the Prime Minister depended upon the maintenance of a high national income and the success of the government's policies of full employment; these, in turn, depended upon a united country, supporting these social objectives.

As to settlement with the United Kingdom, it was in the Canadian interest to arrive at a settlement which would enable the British to buy our products after the war. This they intended to do if it were made financially possible.

6. THE CABINET, after considerable further discussion, agreed, with respect to the proposals put forward by the U.K. government's representatives, that the following would represent an acceptable basis of settlement between the two governments:

1. The payment by Canada on an increased capitation rate for Canadian Army personnel overseas, calculated upon the cost of Canadian formations rather than upon the average cost of U.K. forces; this principle to apply in respect of all active operations from the opening of the Sicilian campaign.

2. The payment by Canada of the cost of advanced training in the United Kingdom of Canadian aircrew who entered R.C.A.F. squadrons; this principle to apply from the date of Canada's assumption of the costs of such squadrons, or on their formation in the case of new squadrons.

See Canada, House of Commons, Debates, 1944, Volume IV, pp. 4168-87.

(This was subject to the concurrence of the Minister of National Defence for Air, subsequently communicated to the Minister of Finance by the Secretary.)

3. The contribution by Canada of her fair share of the cost of reserve stores and stores in transit, drawn upon by the Canadian Army overseas and the R.C.A.F. overseas, it being understood that, in calculating Canadian liability hereunder, allowance would be made for supplies provided to such stocks by Canada under Mutual Aid and under the "billion dollar gift" and that Lease Lend stores would be excluded from those whose cost Canada would share with the United Kingdom. It was understood further that, in calculating the Canadian contribution hereunder, allowance would be made for stocks held by Canada in this country or elsewhere for Canadian or Allied forces overseas.

4. The exemption of Mutual Aid supplies provided to the United Kingdom from the beginning of the present fiscal year from sales and other excise taxes, and eligibility thereof for drawback of customs duties, etc., as in the case of other exports.

5. Payment to Canada by the United Kingdom in gold or U.S. dollars of an amount equal to the estimated U.S. content of Canadian munitions transferred to the United Kingdom (and the rest of the sterling area) under Mutual Aid during the current fiscal year.

The undertaking of this obligation by the U.K. government to be a condition of the government's acceptance of a settlement along the lines set out in subparagraphs (1), (2), (3) and (4) above.

High Commissioner of Great Britain to Minister of Finance

Ottawa, August 29, 1944

Dear Mr. Ilsley,

I have been asked by the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs to convey to you the following message addressed to you by the Chancellor of the Exchequer:

"The Representatives of the Treasury have now reported to me on their conversations with you and your colleagues about the lines for a settlement of the current financial relations between our two countries. I much appreciate it that despite the heavy Parliamentary pressure upon you and your Department, time was made for so full an examination of the present problems and I gratefully recognise the understanding spirit in which those problems were approached by Canadian Ministers and Officials.

2. The basis of a settlement which your Department was authorised by the Council to convey to our representatives has been carefully examined. I understand that it can be broadly described as follows:

(1) Adjustment of capitation rates for Canadian army personnel overseas, as from the opening of the Sicilian campaign so that the full actual cost of Canadian formations will be borne by the Canadian Government.

(2) Assumption by the Canadian Government from 1st April, 1943, of the cost of advanced training in the United Kingdom of Canadian aircrews on entering R.C.A.F. squadrons.

(3) Contribution by the Canadian Government of her fair share of the cost of reserve stores and stores in transit drawn upon by the Canadian Army overseas and the R.C.A.F. overseas.

(4) Exemption of Mutual Aid supplies provided to the U.K. from the beginning of the present fiscal year, from sales and other excise taxes and eligibility thereof for drawback of Customs Duties, etc., as in the case of other exports.

(5) Payment to Canada by the United Kingdom in gold or United States dollars of an amount equivalent to approximately United States 80 million in respect of the estimated costs incurred in United States dollars in furnishing munitions supplies to the U.K. and the rest of the sterling area under Mutual Aid.

3. I confirm that the foregoing proposals are fully acceptable, in principle, to my Government. The details in regard to the several items will require to be worked out between the competent departments on both sides and I have given instructions to my officials for them to take any necessary action forthwith. I understand that it is your wish, as indeed, it is mine, that the settlement of these matters should be on broad and equitable lines.

4. May I, in conclusion, express my warmest thanks on behalf of my colleagues as well as myself for the generous response of the Canadian Government in the difficult situation which confronted us. The solutions which have been reached are yet another manifestation of Canada's continuing determination to play her full share in the common war effort. The pooling of our material resources has contributed in no small part to the success of your forces and ours in the field and we are indeed happy that arrangements between us should enshrine this spirit of common endeavour for a United Victory."

Yours sincerely,

TELEGRAM 140

London, September 7, 1944

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister for the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. At the coming Conference<sup>266</sup> I shall discuss with the President the problems of munitions and other supplies from the United States in Stage II on the basis of our agreed strategy for the Japanese war. I would like to take the opportunity of discussing with you similar questions as affecting supplies from Canada.

2. In munitions supply I shall suggest to the President that the British Empire armed forces should continue to receive the same proportion of their total munitions supplies from the United States as they are receiving now. This would mean that if we planned to produce two-thirds of our present munitions output during the first year of Stage II we could count on receiving supplies from the United States on Lease-Lend at two-thirds of the present level.

3. I would suggest to you that a similar arrangement as to amount of munitions supplies might be appropriate between Canada and the United Kingdom.

4. If this general idea is acceptable to you, your and our officials could then work out together the detailed munitions programme which could best fit into this pattern.

5. In non-munitions supply we shall ask the United States for a continuation of the present scope of Lease-Lend until the end of the Japanese war, but I shall not press the President for a specific commitment as to amount at this stage. We regard it, however, as indispensable that we should not contract more war debt before the end of the Japanese war, since to do so would delay our economic recovery and further postpone the time at which we shall be able to import freely and generally pay our way.

6. We shall ask Canada to send us as much food during Stage II as we are receiving now, and we shall also ask for substantial raw materials supplies.

7. I would like to speak to you about the best arrangements for discussions between our two Governments in order to settle these programmes and their finance.

8. I profoundly appreciate the contribution which Canada has made to the war, and I can assure you that the attitude of your Government has been the greatest possible encouragement to us all in the long and grim struggle with Germany that is now coming to a victorious conclusion. With continued help such as we now suggest I hope that we may be enabled to play our full part in

WAR PRODUCTION PROGRAMME AT THE END OF THE EUROPEAN WAR

11. THE SECRETARY read a telegram from Mr. Churchill on the subject of the Canadian war production programme following the defeat of Germany.

The message suggested that the Canadian government should act in concert with the United Kingdom and the United States in maintaining an over-all agreed proportion of the present munitions programme.

It was also indicated that Canada would be requested to continue the present level of food supply without reduction and to make available substantial quantities of raw materials as well.

(Telegram No.140, Dominions Office to External Affairs, Sept. 7, 1944).

12. MR. HEENEY submitted a report which had been received from the Minister of Munitions and Supply, indicating the nature and extent of present Canadian commitments during the balance of the present and for the coming fiscal years. Copies of the report were circulated.

(Report of Economics and Statistics Branch, Department of Munitions and Supply, Sept. 11, 1944—C.W.C. document 852).†

13. THE MINISTER OF MUNITIONS AND SUPPLY pointed out that this report did not constitute an adequate basis for an accurate forecast, since curtailment of certain orders might be expected following the defeat of Germany, while full information as to additional requirements of the Canadian Services had not been made available.

Canada would be making a fair contribution in "Stage II" if war production were maintained at roughly fifty percent of the present programme, rather than at the level of sixty-six percent suggested in Mr. Churchill's telegram. There might, however, be special arguments for the maintenance of our food production at a higher level.

14. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE said that there would be very serious financial difficulties in the way of meeting U.K. requirements during "Stage II".

The proposals advanced by Mr. Churchill were certainly unacceptable in their present form. Even if the programme suggested by Mr. Howe were approved, it would be necessary to provide for an increase in the amount of Mutual Aid funds to be provided for such a volume of supplies to the United Kingdom.

15. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further discussion, agreed that, in order to provide a basis for decisions in these matters, the three Services, in consultation with the Departments of Finance and Munitions and Supply, review immediately their present and estimated future requirements, on the assumption that European hostilities would terminate by the end of the present calendar year.<sup>267</sup>

THE PLACE OF MUTUAL AID IN STAGE 2 OF THE WAR<sup>269</sup>

This memorandum is concerned with only the economic, non-military aspects of Mutual Aid and of Stage 2. Considerations of high policy will determine the extent of over-all participation in this stage of the war, but the extent and form of participation will have a very important bearing on our ability to carry out a successful demobilization and conversion program. The conclusions reached below are dictated solely by Canadian self-interest.

1. The Economic Importance of Mutual Aid in Stage 2

We have had five years in which to mobilize the men and resources for our present war effort. Demobilization of the armed services and industry must take place in a much shorter time. While some demobilization is needed at the earliest possible moment to relieve the scarcity of labour and provide men and materials for civilian industry (and it is assumed that Stage 2 will permit a very substantial demobilization), it will be fortunate from the point of view of re-organization if demobilization can proceed by steps. The magnitudes involved are so great that the more abrupt the changes, the greater the danger of unemployment. Some unemployment is inseparable from the transfer of so many persons, and unemployment of from 3 to 8 weeks may be socially and politically tolerable. It is much less costly, however, to avoid mass unemployment than to overcome it once it has developed.

<sup>269</sup>Notes marginales:

Marginal notes:

This is the U.S. war.

Mr. Howe showed how we can't reconvert into [peacetime?] industries faster than U.S. Shipping pool 6 months after Japan.

Participation in Stage 2 being decided for reasons of high policy, it should be used to the full for the economic welfare of the country by (a) making it the basis of a step-by-step demobilization in which the rate at which service men and workers are discharged will not greatly exceed the rate at which they can be re-employed in expanded and reconverted industry; and (b) preserving a balance in demobilization which will minimize unemployment. It is this last point which has the most important bearing on Mutual Aid.

There can be no thought either of employing workers in the production of useless munitions nor of employing them in producing useful things to give away if they could at that time be producing goods which can be sold at home or abroad. Yet we can afford to invest some labour in the future of our exports markets. In fact, however, the rapid reduction in the war program which will necessarily follow the end of hostilities in Europe is likely to release labour at least as rapidly as it can be re-employed even if the pace of industrial demobilization is not forced by drastic reductions in Mutual Aid.

The provision of adequate Mutual Aid for the sterling area can contribute a vital balance (1) as between service demobilization and industrial demobilization and (2) as between export and home-market industries.

2. Balance between Service and Industrial Demobilization

The munitions program for Canadian requirements in Stage 2 will be small and the program for the U.S. also very small. It is assumed that the U.K. program will be reduced in any case by about one-half. If no Mutual Aid is available, and if, as anticipated, lend-lease is open or there is a pooling of supplies between the U.S. and the U.K. the U.K. program will quickly decline to very small figures. War workers can be turned out of factories very quickly. Because there is a shortage of labour (which will show a marked seasonal easing between now and May) considerable numbers of these workers can be absorbed quickly. To absorb additional numbers, the re-conversion and expansion of plants is necessary and that will take time. On the other hand, the physical process of demobilizing the services will not be quick. To force the abrupt demobilization of nearly all war industry would create mass unemployment as a prelude to the demobilization of the services. The result would inevitably be that demobilization of the services would be deferred and such deferred mobilization would cost more in money and much more in discontent and criticism of government policy than Mutual Aid.

Allowing for a considerable decline in Canadian service expenditures abroad, Mutual Aid at least equal to that of this year will be necessary if one-half of this year's U.K. munition program is to be retained. Even this will give us a program of industrial demobilization more rapid than that which the U.S. is facing with a good deal of fear.

3. Balance between Export and Home Market Industries

The balance between export and home-market industries is even more important. It is stated that currently 80 percent of our exports are for war. While this is an overstatement if it is meant that the demand will cease with war, it is still true that as the needs for war decline these exports will also decline. But Mutual Aid finances also exports which we expect in peacetime to sell in sterling markets,—wheat, cheese, bacon, metals, lumber.

Mutual Aid in Stage 2 should be looked on as a transitional policy. One justification of the policy is the taking of our appropriate share in the Japanese war in a balanced way which will facilitate orderly demobilization and re-conversion. The other is the maintenance of post-war export markets.

Making the most optimistic allowances for the prospects of South American, Chinese, Russian and other problematical markets, we cannot accept an abrupt shrinking of our exports to the United Kingdom to pre-war levels or lower.<sup>270</sup> The government has already laid too much emphasis on the importance of trade to admit of this. With the end of the European War, though there will still be some scarcities, many products will become relatively plentiful, and the United Kingdom will be able to switch her purchases to the markets for which she has means of payment. Rather than increase her external debt further during the war, she will prefer to take supplies even, if necessary, at much higher prices from the sterling area, from the Scandinavian countries with whom she can probably make favourable arrangements, and even from Argentina. She will buy from Canada what she can pay for. She may even be willing to borrow a small amount to pay for some essentials, but if she has to do this, she will reduce further her purchases on credit after the war, and will set herself the object of balancing her trade with Canada.

However optimistic we are as to the prospects of successful demobilization, we could not do worse than begin the process with a crisis in some of our major export industries.

We must face the question now as to whether we look to the U.K. as a market to which we expect to export over the decades after the war. If we do not, we must expect a major dislocation in trade on top of demobilization, a definite worsening of our external trade position, and a policy of floor prices for agriculture which will be completely unmanageable. If we think that she will again be an important and solvent customer, we should be prepared to invest in a valuable customer and finance her purchases through her period of difficulty for the purpose of maintaining our position in this market.

4. Mutual Aid plus an Export Program

A prudent policy will be that of financing U.K. imports from Canada, during Stage 2, on Mutual Aid and thereafter on a credit basis. Any attempt to insist on credits in Stage 2 will simply reduce the borrowings and imports in Stage 3.

Mutual Aid in Stage 2 should be linked to an agreed export program. This would include such supply of munitions as would be equitable in view of our overall share in the Pacific War, and as would permit the U.K. to proceed faster with her conversion of export industries so that we can obtain more imports from her. It would also provide minimum quantities of our staple exports for which we expect to maintain a post-war market in the U.K. Associated with the program should be an agreement on the part of the U.K. not to divert to other countries trade in commodities for which Canada has been historically a regular source of supply and which we are willing to supply at competitive prices. It should provide also for opportunities for new Canadian exports as we are able to increase our imports from the U.K. A similar program and agreement should be linked to any post-war credits.

Shipping control will limit our exports particularly if they seem unfair to U.S.

IMPORTANT. TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following from the Prime Minister to the Prime Minister, Begins: In my message of September 7th I told you that I hoped to have the opportunity at Quebec of discussing with you the question of supplies which we should need from Canada in stage two of the war. When we met we had some further general discussion of the large problems that are likely to arise at that stage as regards our manpower supply and financial position.

I hope that these matters can now be carried with you a step further. I am accordingly asking Mr. MacDonald to present to you a paper setting out the facts of our position and the nature of our needs from Canada in stage two.

I suggest that when this paper has been considered by your Ministers there should be full discussion of the whole matter with Mr. MacDonald and with Lord Keynes, who is now in Washington for parallel discussions with the United States Government. If this is agreeable to you, Lord Keynes would come to Ottawa at the first mutually convenient opportunity.

You will, of course, know that at the desire of the United States Government we are keeping all talks on this subject entirely confidential for the time being. Ends.

Dear Mr. Ilsley,

I am enclosing, for your information, copy of telegram No. 181 of October 8th from Mr. Churchill to the Prime Minister, concerning the procedure in discussing supplies from Canada to the United Kingdom between the time of the defeat of Germany and the defeat of Japan.

As you know, there was really no mention of these matters at the Quebec Conference, although Mr. Churchill had indicated to the Prime Minister that he wished to take them up on that occasion. It seems to me that the present proposal is quite satisfactory. Under it we should get from Mr. MacDonald a written statement of the position and needs of the United Kingdom, which would form the basis of a later discussion with Lord Keynes and Mr. MacDonald. I have spoken to Dr. Clark, who thinks that this is a good arrangement from our point of view. If you concur, I shall suggest to the Prime Minister that a brief answer be despatched to this telegram, stating that the arrangements suggested are entirely agreeable.<sup>271</sup>

Yours sincerely,

ARRANGEMENTS FOR SUPPLIES FROM CANADA IN STAGE II

(1) We (His Majesty's Government in the United Kingdom) have been considering the magnitude of the supplies which will be needed after the German armistice in order that we may play our full part in the war against Japan, and to carry out our military commitments in the occupation of Europe and elsewhere. During Stage II (by which we mean the period between the

<sup>271</sup>Aucune réponse ne fut trouvée.
No answer was located.

German armistice and the final end of hostilities) we have three major military commitments, that is to say

- (a) the Japanese war
- (b) the occupation of Germany, and
- (c) the protection of Imperial lines of communication and the maintenance of order in areas of British responsibility.

At the same time we have to maintain the civilian standard of living in the United Kingdom —indeed we feel that after five years of war and privation, it has become necessary to make provision for some slight increase in these standards. In particular, it has now become essential to release some manpower for the rebuilding and repair of houses. It is also our intention to release sufficient manpower to enable us to make a substantial beginning in the recovery of exports during 1945. The results of our stock-taking, particularly in relation to manpower and overseas finance, will be communicated to the Canadian Government in a comprehensive form before that Government is asked to reach final conclusions.

(2) We also hope at an early date to lay before the Government of Canada a series of detailed proposals concerning the supply and financial relationships between the two countries during Stage II. Meanwhile, the purpose of this paper is to suggest a general principle which might govern these relationships, and to give a preliminary indication of the scale of assistance which we shall be proposing.

(3) The general principle underlying our proposals is broadly as follows:

We propose the adoption of a pooling plan, by which, incidentally, the financial relationships between the two countries will be greatly simplified. Under this Canada will supply us freely with munitions and war services, and the United Kingdom will supply freely to the Canadian Forces all supplies and services obtained from the sterling area (except pay). The scope of Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom will then be limited to food and ancillary services and certain raw materials to be mutually agreed upon.

(4) This proposal represents a radical change in the basis of accounting between our two countries, but we believe that it follows the foundations of partnership in a common enterprise much more realistically than our arrangements in the past; it avoids much inevitable arbitrary accounting; it should prevent the periodic crises in our financial relationships which have always in the past been resolved by an act of generosity by Canada but which we cannot always ask to be so resolved; it is, moreover, thought to be of a nature which will commend itself to the Parliaments and to public opinions of the two countries as a fair and realistic sharing of the physical and financial burden of the Japanese war. The following will give some idea of how this proposal might work out in practice.

(5) An examination of the probable balance of payments with the sterling area reveals a gap greatly in excess of the current level of Mutual Aid. It is true that throughout the European war this gap has existed. In the first two and a half years it was filled by payments of gold and dollars, by repatriation of securities, and by the 700 million dollar loan—in this period Britain parted with capital assets and incurred debts to Canada to a total of $1,670 millions. In 1942/43 the gap was financed by the billion dollar gift, and we also advanced U.S. dollars to cover the deficit. In 1943-44 and 1944-45 the gap was financed partly by Mutual Aid. But Canada also undertook to bear a larger part of the cost of her Forces overseas, with the result that the gap left to be covered by Mutual Aid was kept down.

(6) But if this system were to continue during Stage II the gap to be covered by Mutual Aid would be much greater. Paradoxical as it may seem, the bigger Canada's fighting effort, the smaller is the gap since she has then to make larger payments in respect of her Forces overseas. On the other hand, if Canada's part in the war effort becomes primarily one of munition and food supply, the gap is then very wide indeed. During the European war, we have been able to rely on Canada's generosity and sense of what is right, and the gap has always been filled. But we are aware of the problems which confront the Government of Canada during Stage II, and we do not wish to place before them proposals which on the present financial basis can mean only one of two things—increased Mutual Aid appropriation or the incurring of war debts by ourselves.

(7) We suggest, therefore, that:

(a) Canada should provide munitions freely for the pool to the extent set out in the table (to be supplied) of estimated requirements. Canada would also provide freely all war services incurred in Canada on our behalf, e.g. inspection and inland freight on munitions.

(b) The United Kingdom should provide freely for the Canadian Forces overseas all supplies and services (except pay) which on shipping and supply grounds can most conveniently be obtained from within the sterling area.

(c) Canada would limit her Mutual Aid Assistance to the United Kingdom to cover food requirements, together with the ancillary transport services connected with this food, also certain raw materials to be determined as mutually convenient.

(d) The financing of the Air Training Plan would be the subject of separate arrangements, as has been the case in the past. We think, however, that these arrangements should be settled in general conformity with the above proposals.

(e) Other transactions between Canada and the Sterling Area, apart from such Mutual Aid as Canada may accord to other parts of the Commonwealth, would be financed on a cash basis.

(8) The cash transactions between the two countries would thus be in respect of the pay of Canadian troops within the Sterling Area and in respect of materials, manufactured goods and services together with certain miscellaneous payments (e.g. Naafi) not covered by Mutual Aid. We do not think that this would lead to any substantial problem between Canada and the Sterling Area and, so far as we can see, any residual deficit during Stage II should be manageable, provided that we are able during Stage II to increase our exports to Canada from the present very restricted level. The amount of orders which we can afford to place in Canada will inevitably have to be limited by the amount of Mutual Aid plus the cash income of the Sterling Area in Canada.

(9) It is suggested that the supplies and services referred to in 7(a) above would be met from Canada's War Appropriation and would—in addition to Canada's own expenditure on her Forces in Canada and on the pay of her Forces overseas—represent Canada's financial contribution to the common fighting and munition pool. At the same time, Canada would be drawing freely from the pool all the supplies which were needed by her Forces overseas from Sterling Area sources.

(10) We believe this to be in financial terms, a true representation of the war efforts of the two countries. It avoids all the complicated and arbitrary Service accounting which will become increasingly difficult in the conditions of the Japanese war; it states firmly and clearly what contribution each country is making, and charges it to the appropriate place in each country's internal accounts.

(11) We hope this plan will commend itself to the Government of Canada. For five years we have in fact been pooling our resources in the war against the common enemy. In physical terms, there has been a complete pooling of manpower and of supplies but this has never been openly endorsed in our financial arrangements. In this new stage of the war, it is surely right to bring our financial affairs into line with the physical realities of our respective war efforts.

(12) We had originally intended to furnish full details of our requirements as appendices to this paper. The adjustments necessitated by the recent decisions on strategy taken at Quebec, however, have not as yet been fully determined by the Service Departments. Our needs for raw materials in Stage II are also under re-consideration in the light of the revised supply programme. We believe, therefore, that time will, in the end, be saved if we are left free to take another three or four weeks in the preparation of these programmes, presenting them to the Government of Canada at the second stage of these discussions.

Nevertheless, the Government of Canada may like to have at this stage a rough indication of the probable order of magnitude of our proposals. As regards non-munitions, there is likely to be a considerable reduction in requirements for metals, partly offset by some increased requirements for agricultural and forestry products. On balance, we estimate that the sum to be charged on the Mutual Aid Appropriation might amount to $600 millions, and that the cost of providing munitions and other supplies and services referred to in paragraph 7(a) above on the War Appropriation would be of the order of $800 millions.<sup>272</sup> Against this Canada will be receiving benefits under paragraph 7(b) above as Reciprocal Aid.

The following note was in the original:

The munition requirements for the United Kingdom and other Empire countries will not exceed in total 70% of the 1944 level and may well be lower. Taking the Department of Finance's estimate for 1944/45 less internal taxation we calculate that 70% would amount in round figures to dollars 800 million.

RE: MEMORANDUM ON ARRANGEMENTS FOR SUPPLIES IN STAGE 2

There is a good deal to be said for this proposal as a clear and simple arrangement, but there are also certain difficulties in it.

The economic and financial considerations have primarily to do with the total amount of the supplies given whereas the particular method of dividing the appropriation is primarily of political importance.

On the economic and financial matters, I have already stated my opinions. Briefly, they are: (1) that we should not force, for financial reasons associated with mutual aid, a more rapid industrial demobilization than military considerations and those of fair participation in a joint war effort would dictate; and (2) that in the long run we shall lose heavily by trying to force the United Kingdom to borrow or part with more of its assets in Stage 2.

Politically there would seem to be two difficult aspects of the proposal: (1) that the estimated reduction of mutual aid on the more restricted basis from $800,000,000 to $600,000,000 will appear small in view of the exclusion of munitions from it. In other words, it will look phoney; (2) mutual aid for food and raw materials would perhaps be less easily accepted and understood than mutual aid in munitions.

However, there are some political opportunities in the proposal: (1) since the results of reciprocal aid under the proposed method of dealing with munitions would not be known until the end of the year, and, therefore, the net increase in the war appropriation, over what it would otherwise have been, need not be a matter of much political discussion. Some of it could probably be handled by a supplement to the war appropriation after the election and that ought not to be too difficult; 2) the fact that a change would be made in the system would permit the concentration of attention on the transitional character of Stage 2. Less emphasis could be placed on there being $600,000,000 of mutual aid than on the fact that mutual aid was disappearing with Stage 2, and would be succeeded by credits. It should also be made clear that to the extent that we were able to get imports from the United Kingdom, the amount of mutual aid could be decreased. I think a good case could be made out on this point, but only if the Government was willing to take an aggressive line.

The whole question really is: Is $600,000,000 mutual aid for food and raw materials easier to put across than say $1,200,000,000 for war and non-war with a much reduced war appropriation? There is nothing, of course, in the British proposal which reduces the amount of it required, or helps with the bargaining over the total amount. The danger is that some Ministers will avoid the question by saying they prefer $600,000,000 with no provision for reciprocal aid in the War Appropriation. If, however, it were agreed that pretty much the full British request was to be met, I would be inclined to think that the form proposed in this memorandum would be more easily accepted by the country.

Ottawa, November 6, 1944

I was talking this afternoon to Dr. Mackintosh about possible strings that we might attach to Mutual Aid of a trade policy nature. He has, I think, some very useful ideas in connection with this, which would fit in with Towers' ideas on Stage 3 and your own desire to find some quid pro quo to ask of the British which would enable us to gain support for a Mutual Aid program this year.

Mackintosh suggests in effect that we should ask the U.K. to guarantee us if not full Most Favoured Nation treatment (and that means Most Favoured Sterling Nation treatment), at least Most Favoured Nation treatment in respect of guaranteed quantities of the principal exports in which we are interested. The quantities on which they would grant us this treatment could take into account not only their prospective sales to Canada but also whatever credits we will be able to make available. In addition, he suggests that any Canadian dollars resulting from an increase in our imports from the sterling area would be devoted, at least to an agreed extent, to the purchase of Canadian exports rather than to the amortization of debts owing to Canada or other purposes.

I told you earlier this afternoon very roughly the sort of idea which Towers had put forward to me last Friday in regard to Stage 3.

It might be preferable to put up to the U.K. a proposition that we would provide them with Mutual Aid in Stage 2 on condition:

(a) that they would take at least certain minimum amounts of specified goods from us during that stage;

(b) that they would afford us Most Favoured Nation treatment during Stage 3, at least on certain guaranteed quantities of specified supplies, provided, of course, that we would make credits available to them for the purpose. (It might be necessary to settle at an early date on the terms of such credits.)

(c) that they would not use their Canadian dollars for the repayment of debt to us at more than a certain rate, possibly depending on our balance of payments;

(d) possibly that they would be prepared to pay for some fraction of their purchases in Stage 3 in gold or U.S. dollars.

I am a little alarmed at the unknown difficulties which may lie ahead in attempting to work out conditions applying to what is essentially a non-multilateral trading world which we have not yet explored at all. I think it is desirable that we should get someone to work on this right away, if we are to put it up to Keynes when he is here. I would therefore suggest that we ought to arrange a meeting as early as possible—say Wednesday morning—of yourself, Towers, Mackintosh, Robertson, Rasminsky, Master, Pierce, myself, and perhaps others, to discuss this matter and perhaps initiate some intensive work on it in the next few weeks.

The forthcoming discussions with Keynes should not be limited to the United Kingdom's financial difficulties during Stage II. If Canada is to be asked to make a substantial contribution, it is fitting that thought should be given at the same time to our problems. We should speak for Canada's trade interest in Empire markets and the spokesman should be you.<sup>273</sup>

We should express emphatically to Keynes our disagreement with the possible implication of the policy set out in the document "British Requirements for the First Year of Stage II," Annex A,† Page 2:

"Under existing arrangements countries in the sterling area are free to spend their sterling balances anywhere in the sterling area without restriction and to obtain external currencies on condition that they are required for essential goods which cannot be obtained from the sterling area ... It is not anticipated that a similar latitude to spend sterling balances outside the sterling area can be continued much longer."

Unless this policy is confined to balances built up during the war, it means that we are to be deprived of the opportunity even of competing in the markets of the Empire, to whose survival we contributed by depleting our resources and sacrificing our men. The effect on the ties between Canada and the United Kingdom will be anything from harmful to catastrophic.

Marginal note:

I agree. H. H. W[RONG]

Our dependence on exports is as great as the United Kingdom's. We shall end the war perhaps without a net debt but not substantially a creditor nation. If the British need exports to pull themselves out of debt, we shall need exports to keep from going into debt. It is not too much to ask that they lengthen slightly their period of recovery from war impoverishment to prevent our impoverishment during the peace that follows the war.

It is not too much to ask because they can contribute greatly to our well-being at no appreciable cost to their own. Our exports to the British Empire in 1939 were about $430,000,000, 47% of our total. The Keynes document estimates that British imports will have to be about $6,000,000,000. Our exports to them are the basis of our external trade. Their imports from us are a factor of much less importance to them. Much of the imports they must retain as essential. The portion of imports which they will be able to eliminate will be correspondingly less important to them but still seriously damaging to us.

We have sound grounds for urging that even if the U.K., with an eye to the U.S., adopts the policy in general an exception be made for Canada:

1) We are participants in the system of Empire preferences. While in the past, Canada, with the rest of the Empire, has shared its benefits, the preferences will be valueless if the British policy is put into effect. We shall find ourselves then receiving only the disadvantages that even nominal participation will attach to us in our negotiations with the United States and nations outside the preference area. Indeed, we shall be precluded from enjoying even m.f.n. privileges with, say, Belgium or the Netherlands, let alone benefit from preferences!

2) The British say on page 2 of their document:

"The British people, with the Dominions, is alone amongst the United Nations in having been in the front line from the first to the last day of the German war. It has expended itself in the effort and unlike most others of the United Nations, it has endangered its actual means of livelihood in the transition period after the war."

We can urge the same point of view.

3) Our dependence on exports is much greater than that of the United States. We can accept, if we have to, a limitation holding us to our prewar share of Empire markets and forgo, until a later stage in the British recovery, our right to compete for a greater share of the markets than we enjoyed in peace. This would provide the British with protection against the expected U.S. drive for expansion in American exports.

4) Unlike the United States, we are not a creditor nation of importance and we cannot stand a deterioration in our position to permit an improvement in the British position.

We should accompany our claim with an expression of our disposition to adopt a liberal import policy and a liberal credit policy. We shall probably have to agree that we cannot expect the U.K. to convert sterling balances but rather that we may have to advance credits to Empire countries.

Evidence accumulates pointing to the diversion of trade because of currency reasons, though it is difficult to attribute loss of trade specifically to one reason rather than another.

1) You know of the carbide case with Australia. The Australians have relaxed their restrictions and are now issuing import licenses.

2) You know of the agricultural implement case with Ireland, where we have difficulty proving that our interests are seriously affected, but know that the course of trade was altered for currency reasons.

3) We know too that the British West Indies have been advised by a representative of the Secretary of State for the Colonies that Canadian dollars are subject to the necessity of conservation.

4) We have just heard from the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Trinidad that the import restrictions agreed to at the Jamaica Conference in 1942,<sup>274</sup> because of the shortage of shipping, are still adhered to by the Trinidad authorities. We asked them to allow the import of apples and apple products, but were informed that no action could be taken until the currency situation was clarified.

As regards Britain's own trade:

1) We inquired recently on behalf of the Department of Trade and Commerce from the United Kingdom authorities as to whether they would welcome our sending prototypes of prefabricated houses. The U.K. reply expressed their gratefulness but said:

“As you will understand, the question of whether we can ultimately purchase prefabricated houses from Canada will have to be considered later in the light of our dollar position...”

2) Representatives of the Massey Harris Co. have just returned from the U.K. and report that they cannot get orders because of currency difficulties.

We can make it clear that we are putting forward our proposals in the present circumstances where the British show intention of retaining preferences and using currency as a weapon of trade. We can tell them that we are prepared to discuss with them and the United States the basic problem, untouched in the above, of solving the British difficulties in their balance of payments position, difficulties we fully appreciate. However, it is equally important that the British should appreciate our difficulties.

Following for Dr. W. C. Clark, Deputy Minister, Department of Finance, from A. F. W. Plumtre, Begins:

The Future of Lend-Lease

1. The Delegation from United Kingdom, headed by Lord Keynes, has now practically concluded its discussions with the American group under the Chairmanship of Secretary Morgenthau. Frank Coe is the Secretary of the American group and the bulk of the material which follows comes from him.

2. There has been little disagreement on the amounts to be involved in Lend-Lease during the year following V-E Day. The British requested, and the United States agencies concerned have accepted, one programme of roughly $3.5 billion of military supplies and another approaching $3 billion of civilian supplies. Both programmes involve reductions after V-E Day of 40 to 50 percent below current rates of supply. The civilian programme includes the following:

- $800 million to $1000 million for food;
- $800 million for shipping (both vessels chartered to the United Kingdom and also services of W.S.A.<sup>275</sup> vessels);
- $250 million to $350 million for petroleum products;
- $250 million for a variety of materials such as forest products, chemicals, etc.;
- $50 million or less for fully manufactured goods.

3. The chief source of disagreement has been the lifting of the White Paper.<sup>276</sup> The British particularly regret that they have not cleared this matter. It was one of the primary points of their mission and early discussions with the United States gave them reason to believe that they would gain it. Specifically, they hoped to get White Paper restrictions lifted as of January 1st, 1945. I understand they were planning to shift all their purchase of basic materials, such as steel, to a cash basis by that time, and that suitable adjustments were suggested in respect of stocks of such Lend-Lease materials in United Kingdom. However, the United States agencies have ultimately found themselves unable to go beyond a recommendation to the President that the United Kingdom should be freed of White Paper restrictions after V-E Day, except, repeat except, in so far as

- (a) Accumulated stocks of Lend-Lease materials are involved;
- (b) The United Kingdom exports involve materials that are still on the critical list.

4. As this indicates, the United States agencies are very concerned by the possible reaction of the public to whatever may be done. The keynote of the Administration's approach to the public (as sounded in some remarks by the President at Tuesday's Press Conference) will be that everything is to go along much as usual, and with little change. Public announcements are to be minimized. The hope of the United Kingdom that they could announce immediately the virtual abandonment of the White Paper from the beginning of 1945 has been completely shattered.

5. The cautious attitude of the United States agencies is reflected in the treatment accorded to the so-called "Chapter 3 items," a miscellaneous group of requests put forward in Chapter 3 of the British submission. In some cases, the British have suggested that Lend-Lease on these items should be retroactive. The United States has indicated that they cannot allow all these items, but that they hope to be able to permit enough of them to aggregate some $200 million from now until one year after V-E Day. They are at present engaged in explaining that they have not made a commitment to this effect. The Chapter 3 items include the following:

- (a) Civilian supplies of tobacco. It is unlikely that this item will be reinstated on Lend-Lease, particularly in view of the current shortage of cigarettes here, and despite Keynes' insistence that this shortage would continue whether tobacco for United Kingdom was Lend-Lease or paid for.

- (b) Sugar from non-United States sources. This item is also unlikely to be reinstated.

- (c) Materials for temporary housing. This item may be approved.

- (d) Certain special oil supplies.

- (e) Increased supply of shipping services. It has been suggested on various occasions in the past that the shipping services provided on Lend-Lease should not be confined to the movement of Lend-Leased (or Lend-Leasable) materials, but should cover other services of W.S.A. vessels.

6. The United Kingdom originally requested that they should obtain Protocol treatment which would give them absolute assurance on their Lend-Lease supplies. They receded from this view as it became clear that the firmness of the commitment was necessarily in proportion to its size. Accordingly, as the foregoing paragraph indicates, there are a good many loose ends left from the discussions, although some of these, including certain Chapter 3 items, will probably be cleared up in the next few days. Even then, as far as the United States side is concerned, whatever has been settled remains in the form of a recommendation to the White House and not an ultimate commitment.

7. At the beginning of the discussions the United Kingdom presented an exhaustive statement of the difficulties with which they were confronted. No doubt a similar statement will be presented in Ottawa. Amongst its salient features was the fact that the British balance of payments during the last few years had involved them in an annual increase of foreign indebtedness of something like $2.5 billion. They expect that this rate would continue in the first year after V-E Day, and that in addition they would lose something like $300 million of gold and United States dollars. There appears to be no substance in the widespread rumour that a loan was being discussed.

8. An attempt was made to bring the Dominions concerned (Australia and New Zealand) into the discussions at an appropriate point. This attempt was apparently unsatisfactory. There was considerable doubt as to whether the United Kingdom was or was not claiming for all war supplies and certain other materials to be Lend-Leased to the Commonwealth as a whole. Both Australia and New Zealand put forward requests for goods which obviously could not be provided by the United States on Lend-Lease, e.g., finished clothing. Finally, some misunderstanding apparently arose on the nature and scope of reverse Lend-Lease. All this emphasizes the wisdom of Canada's determination to steer clear of the whole business from the beginning.

9. In their discussions with the United Kingdom, the United States officials have assumed that the United Kingdom will continue to have access to supplies from Commonwealth sources. This, of course, has general implications in the field of supply. In addition it has political implications where Canadian Mutual Aid is concerned. I was informed categorically that the whole United States programme of Lend-Lease to United Kingdom would undoubtedly be jeopardized if the Canadian Government found itself unable to continue Mutual Aid at least on some broadly comparable basis. Ends.

MR. ILSLEY explained that he had called this meeting to enable his colleagues on the Mutual Aid Board to hear from Lord Keynes and Sir Robert Sinclair the information and proposals which the latter had put forward to Mr. Howe and himself at an earlier meeting and to discuss these proposals. The main proposals under consideration were the U.K.'s estimated requirements from Canada in the first year of Stage 2, which is taken as being the fiscal year commencing April 1, 1945, and the means of financing them. In addition, it was proposed to discuss three specific questions: the terms on which locomotives would be provided for the Indian State Railways, the liability of the U.K. for cancellation of contracts in Canada for the production of munitions for the U.K., and the proposed contracts for the purchase of bacon and beef by the U.K. in 1946. He asked Lord Keynes to introduce the general subject from the point of view of the U.K.

LORD KEYNES began with an exposition of the physical aspects of the problem, emphasizing the high degree to which the U.K. had been mobilized for war purposes and the necessity for some "moderate easement" in Stage 2. In addition he emphasized the necessity for commencing to rebuild the U.K.'s export trade in order that she might support herself externally after the war. In order to carry out the war effort in Stage 2 upon which she agreed at Quebec and secure an easement in civilian standards and some increase in exports, the U.K. is dependent upon aid in her war effort from the United States and Canada. In the discussions just concluded in Washington, the U.S. had undertaken to supply nearly all that the U.K. had requested from her, with the exception of certain items which could not be provided because of the limitations on available supplies. The U.S. had not refused any supplies on financial grounds. It was emphasized, however, that there was a limit to the war supplies which the U.K. could obtain from the U.S. in Stage 2, because of the types of supplies involved and the fact that types hitherto produced in the U.K. and Canada but not in the U.S. could not be put into production for the first time in the U.S. during Stage 2. While the U.K. is ceasing to get certain types of supplies from the U.S. under Lend-Lease, she will get certain other types of goods under Lend-Lease that she has not been obtaining recently. Lord Keynes emphasized that the U.S. war production and war effort as a whole in Stage 2 would be a high proportion of that in Stage 1—probably of the order of 75%—and that the assistance which she is giving the U.K. will enable the latter country to reduce her war effort in Stage 2 proportionately.

The program being requested of Canada provides for at least a proportional reduction in Canada's physical war effort, even though the U.K. requirements of food and raw materials are as a total maintained at approximately the level of Stage 1. In fact, it appeared that Canada's direct war effort and war production could be reduced by at least as much as, and possibly more than, that in the U.S. and the U.K. Consequently it would not appear that the U.K. is asking Canada to undertake more than her share of the common effort in Stage 2. By contrast, Australia and New Zealand cannot expect any degree of relaxation in Stage 2, because of the substantial requirements of the fighting forces in the Pacific and the need for those countries to maintain their own fighting forces.

LORD KEYNES went on to point out that the program asked of Canada was physically convenient for her as well as fair in proportion to the others. The munitions program for the U.K. is reduced to about 70% of the current year and permits a tapering-off in munitions production. MR. HOWE concurred in this. The food program, while possibly requiring some effort to maintain bacon production, was on the whole convenient as a continuing market for the expanded Canadian farm production.

LORD KEYNES went on to say that the difficulty arose when one attempted to translate the physical program into financial effects and to overcome the financial difficulties. He said that during the current year the U.K. is receiving approximately $2 billion from the Canadian Government, but nearly three-quarters of this is in the form of receipts from the Canadian forces overseas, i.e., something over $1400 million, while only the remainder—something over $500 million—is in the form of Mutual Aid. Next year, however, the receipts from Canadian forces will be very greatly reduced—probably by about $1 billion—amounting only to something over $400 million, and even this amount is highly uncertain, depending as it does on the rate of repatriation of Canadian troops in U.K. and the bases and equipment for the R.C.A.F. squadrons. Consequently, even though the requirements of the U.K. in Canada for munitions are reduced by approximately $350 million, it appears that Mutual Aid will be required on the scale of approximately $1200 million for the sterling area, apart from anything which other countries may require. That would be double the Mutual Aid which the sterling area is obtaining this year.

MR. ST. LAURENT inquired of Lord Keynes whether there would not be a counterbalancing benefit to the U.K. in the reduction of the expenditures of the Canadian forces in the sterling area, since these payments were made for goods and services and consequently the U.K. would be relieved of the need to furnish goods and services to the Canadian forces in an amount that must represent the physical equivalent of the total of $1 billion in expenditures. This should itself allow a considerable alleviation of the stresses on the U.K. economy and public. LORD KEYNES said that, broadly speaking, this was correct, but it should be borne in mind that it is the whole pool of resources contributed to the U.K. which is relieved, part of which they have met by borrowing in the past. Moreover, the U.K. was asking Canada and the U.S. to contribute less to that pool than in the past, so that both these countries were getting some relief from the reduction in the total calls upon the pool. SIR ROBERT SINCLAIR pointed out that the relief afforded by the lower demands of the Canadian troops had already been taken into account in the physical program on which their requirements had been based.

LORD KEYNES stated that the U.K. Government feel that the creation of debts during the war is not a proper means of settlement among Allies. The U.K. were having to borrow from certain sources, notably India and Egypt, but there were intelligible if not entirely convincing reasons why this is necessary, despite the principle to which London adheres strongly. If, for the sake of argument, this view of the U.K. Government can be accepted, the question then arises: what is the most convenient form in which to finance the excess of the U.K.'s requirements in Canada? This was, of course, a Canadian matter, but, said Lord Keynes, Mr. Ilsley had encouraged him to present to the group the suggestions which had previously been discussed.

MR. BRAND stated the underlying assumption is that Canada is a full partner of the U.S. and the U.K. in the war against Japan. MR. ST. LAURENT questioned whether the Canadian people were prepared to agree that Canada's interest in the Pacific war was sufficient to justify that assumption. Canadians felt that in the European war they should and would exert themselves to the full, but they did not feel that that was necessary for Stage 2. LORD KEYNES noted that both the U.K. and the U.S. were going to do less against Japan than they were doing in Stage 1, and the principal question is how much less and in what proportions the relaxation will be distributed. The British population has suffered a great deal more up to date than people on this continent, and it is now a question of how far they should be forced in Stage 2, and how far North America is prepared to give them some support and contribute to a fair division of the relaxation in the total effort that can now take place. In subsequent discussion Lord Keynes indicated that if Canada felt unable to supply the food which the U.K. requested, it would likely mean a poorer diet for the British public. If there was a moderate reduction in the munitions which Canada could supply below those requested, it would probably have to be made good from British production, with a consequent limitation on production for civilian purposes or exports. If there was a large gap between the munitions which the U.K. were requesting and those which Canada was able to supply, or if Canada, for example, felt it necessary to reduce substantially the number of air squadrons which she could provide, then the need might arise for a revision of the strategic decisions taken at Quebec.

LORD KEYNES at Mr. Ilsley's suggestion, went on to outline the apparent alternative methods of meeting the sterling area deficit. The first was to go on as in the past, in which event the sterling area requirements for Mutual Aid would appear likely to amount to approximately $1200 million. This would require considerable explanation and justification in relation to the reduction of Canada's direct war expenditures and participation in the fighting, because it would appear disproportionate. The second alternative was the suggestion which the U.K. had put forward in a memorandum some weeks previously, submitted by the High Commissioner and Mr. Munro to Mr. Ilesley.<sup>277</sup> This was that military and munitions efforts should be pooled, the Canadian forces supplying to the U.K. forces what equipment and services the latter required from Canada, and the U.K. forces likewise supplying to the Canadian forces what they required from the U.K. This would enable financial accounting to be dropped in respect of the military effort. Had such an arrangement been in force this current year, he said, there would have been an approximate balance between what Canada received and supplied. Next year, however, such an arrangement would benefit the U.K., as the Canadian contribution of munitions would be much higher than the supplies and services received by the Canadian forces. Lord Keynes later made clear that he included war services in the items which would be supplied without financial accounting, as well as munitions. He stated that the U.K. and the U.S. have abandoned a meticulous accounting between themselves in respect of military items. The U.S. forces furnish through Lend-Lease machinery the requirements of the U.K. forces, and the U.K. furnish to the U.S. forces anything which they ask for within reason. It was not suggested that Canada should go as far as the U.S. in this regard, but as far as possible under the circumstances. If this were applied in the coming year, it would appear to involve Canada's providing to the U.K. about $900 million worth of ammunitions, plus roughly $100 million of associated services, while the Canadian forces would receive perhaps something of the order of $350 million in services and supplies from the U.K. As MR. ILSLEY pointed out, this would mean a net addition to the Canadian War Appropriation of some $650 million, leaving about $550 million (the remainder of the $1200 m. mentioned above) required as Mutual Aid in the form of food and raw materials, of which about $60 m., Lord Keynes suggested, would be for parts of the sterling area other than the U.K.

In support of this pooling arrangement, LORD KEYNES cited several arguments. The first was its ease of presentation and explanation, the emphasis being put on the essential point of pooling military efforts without accounting. On the other hand, he recognized that the change to such a system at this stage would be hard to explain and justify and there would be danger of arousing suspicion. Secondly, the amounts to be required by the Services on both sides can only be estimated with great uncertainty at this stage, and if the precarious estimates proved wrong, difficulties might ensue were a Mutual Aid Appropriation based upon them. On the other hand, the food and raw materials items once decided upon can be forecast with relative accuracy and the amount of Mutual Aid required can be estimated fairly readily in advance.

Some discussion took place at this point regarding the forecast of the overseas expenditure of Canadian forces and the relation of such expenditures to bases and equipment used by the Canadian Army and the R.C.A.F.

LORD KEYNES went on to mention certain alternative suggestions which had been previously discussed by which part of the program might be differently financed. In the first place, he mentioned Mr. Howe's suggestion that the various naval vessels being produced for the U.K., including the victualling and maintenance ships, might be taken over by the Canadian Navy rather than the Royal Navy. If this were done, it would relieve the Mutual Aid Appropriation or pooling arrangements of costs to an amount of perhaps $250 million. There was a brief discussion of this suggestion, but no attempt to reach a decision. Lord Keynes then went on to point out that the U.K. was bearing a large proportion of the costs of maintaining prisoners of war in Canada. He suggested that there appeared to be little reason to justify the U.K. assuming this expense, and that it was instead reasonable to suggest that that country in which the prisoners were held should bear the cost of keeping them there. He said the amounts involved up to date for prisoners appeared to be something of the order of $25 million, and it was possible that the amount next year might also be $25 million. There was some discussion of this proposal as well. A third and somewhat similar item was the cost of the Joint Inspection Board carrying out the inspection of munitions production. The United Kingdom are paying about $30 million a year toward this cost at present. LORD KEYNES said his party believed it would be satisfactory if inspection became a wholly Canadian responsibility and Canada bore the costs of it. In answer to MR. HOWE he said that the Ministry of Supply had indicated their agreement to this, although he had not heard from the War Office. GENERAL MCNAUGHTON stated that he was definitely in favour of this suggestion and believed that it would be an improvement from the point of view of organization. He said he thought the War Office would agree to it, and that it was in accordance with a tendency which had been developed in Canada and the U.K. This change would help to make the channel of authority clearer and ensure finality in decisions regarding inspection. General McNaughton used this occasion to emphasize that he thought Lord Keynes was taking the right approach in saying that we should look first at the physical proposals and see that they are practicable and fair and that the organization is simple, and then we should let the financial arrangements follow.

LORD KEYNES stated that if these miscellaneous suggestions were followed, they would look after perhaps $300 million in expenditures and bring the apparent Mutual Aid requirements for the sterling area down from $1200 m. to $900 m. In this case, $1 billion might suffice to cover total Mutual Aid requirements. There was then some brief discussion as to the possible scale of Mutual Aid requirements outside the sterling area.

A brief discussion arose at this point regarding the alternatives of a Mutual Aid Appropriation to cover the total amount required, and the suggested pooling plan for military requirements. MR. ILSLEY also mentioned the possible alternative of lumping all requirements into the War Appropriation and allotting such funds as were required from time to time for Mutual Aid purposes. The discussion covered as well possible magnitudes of the war budget as a whole in Stage 2 and its relation to the degree of relaxation in the war effort in Canada and the U.K.

The meeting did not endeavour to reach a decision regarding the amount of Mutual Aid or its equivalent to be provided by Canada nor the form it was to take.

LOCOMOTIVES FOR INDIA

LORD KEYNES, at Mr. Ilsley's request, then took up the several specific questions which the British wished to raise, the first being the means of financing Canadian production of locomotives and other rolling stock for India.<sup>278</sup> He explained the great need of rolling stock in India and stated that Field Marshal Wavell<sup>279</sup> had placed it in the first order of priority in Indian military requirements for Stage 2. He acknowledged that the rolling stock in question, particularly the locomotives, would undoubtedly last well beyond the end of the war, but he emphasized, as he had emphasized to the United States in regard to the same issue, that the residual value of the rolling stock at present being obtained would be very much less than the very great additional depreciation which Indian rolling stock was suffering as a consequence of the war. He stated that the U.S. Government had agreed to provide under Lend-Lease the difference between the cost of the rolling stock required by India and the estimated value of the rolling stock to India at the end of the hostilities, which was estimated to be approximately one-half the cost. He noted that the Canadian Mutual Aid Board had ruled that rolling stock is not a suitable type of supply to be provided as Mutual Aid, and in regard to one request at least had specified that rolling stock must not be purchased out of Canadian dollars accruing to the U.K., since that would increase the amount of other supplies requiring to be provided on Mutual Aid. The U.K. Government do not wish to press further for a supply of rolling stock as Mutual Aid, but they do wish to have the right to purchase this rolling stock out of Canadian dollars currently accruing to the sterling area. They take this attitude in view of the urgent need for war purposes of such rolling stock and their desire to avoid the incurring of debts for war purposes. The Indian Government and Indian Railways would, of course, pay cash for the rolling stock when they receive it, under such an arrangement.

LORD KEYNES said that he feels it is too tough to require that such rolling stock be paid for in U.S. dollars, which would have to come from the U.K.'s gold and dollar reserves which are already lower than they feel is desirable and are being further depleted. He emphasized that the United States had already agreed to provide half the cost of American rolling stock to India on Lend-Lease terms, and it would worry the U.K. greatly if they had to use the U.S.

dollars saved by this action of the United States Government in order to pay for Canadian rolling stock.

MR. HOWE suggested that the earlier Canadian suggestion of making a loan for the financing of this rolling stock should be considered, and he felt that the objection in principle which the U.K. Government felt to war debts should not apply in this case, where borrowing is undertaken for a purpose that is normally covered by borrowing both in peacetime and wartime. LORD KEYNES stated that the objection to borrowing did not come from India, which was prepared and able to pay cash for these requirements, but came rather from the U.K. Treasury, who felt it would have to find the Canadian dollars required in the future to repay any loan incurred now for this purpose.

The meeting did not attempt to reach a conclusion on this matter.

CANCELLATION CHARGES

MR. ILSLEY opened the discussion on this item by stating that the liability of the U.K. in respect of costs incurred by Canada in the cancellation of contracts for the production of war supplies for the U.K. was not clear. The relevant documents did provide that balances in the U.K. Cash Receipts Account could be used for the purpose of meeting cancellation charges and the agreement under which Canada had taken over U.K. contracts in this country also provided that cancellation costs on such contracts would be met from U.K. funds if and to the extent that there were funds available in the U.K. Cash Receipts Account. Beyond this limited extent, however, there was, so far as he knew, no undertaking or definite understanding in regard to the degree to which U.K. would bear cancellation costs. At this time, when large scale cancellations may shortly occur, it seemed desirable to clarify the situation and reach some understanding.

MR. HOWE explained how it was that cancellation costs arose, and in particular the importance of the flow of parts and materials to production. He thought that the cost of cancellation was incidental to the contract itself and to production of the supplies and should be considered in discussing who should stand such costs.

LORD KEYNES said that cancellation costs will likely be substantial at the end of Stage 1 and later in Stage 2. He said that he understood Mr. Howe has regarded U.K. requests for supply as firm orders, and Lord Keynes stated that, in a sense, they were. On paper the position, however, is as Mr. Ilsley stated it and the U.K. believed it was desirable to straighten it out. Lord Keynes went on to emphasize that whether the costs of cancellation are covered in the Mutual Aid Appropriation or otherwise, there is much to be said for it being Canada's responsibility, so that Canada can take account of all the economic and social considerations involved in cancelling or cutting back production. The U.K. Government take account of these considerations in their own production and do not think simply of what will save the most money. If it were the U.K.'s responsibility to decide regarding Canadian production and if they were responsible for the costs, it would be natural that they would take the cheapest course, which might, however, be the wrong course in view of wider considerations. If the pooling proposal were followed, the responsibility and mechanics would be clearly in Canada's hands. If it were not, the mechanics would be more complicated, and the U.K. would have to inform Canadian agencies as and when they would not require further supplies.

MR. ST. LAURENT said that if Canada were going to accept responsibility for cancellation costs, it would involve more Canadian responsibility in the placing of the orders, and the Canadian Government would have to exercise more discretion at that time. He felt it was apt to be confusing if one Government initiates the orders and another is responsible for paying not only costs of delivery but any costs of cancellation if the first government decides it does not require the supplies. LORD KEYNES said that Mr. St. Laurent's conclusions seemed to him correct as to the additional responsibility that would be put upon the Canadian authorities, but he emphasized that the cancellations normally resulted from decisions of the Combined Chiefs of Staff, to whose decisions we were all subject. MR. HOWE emphasized that the additional responsibility which Canada would be assuming under this arrangement included any decision to taper off production as and when it appeared likely to be sufficient. SIR ROBERT SINCLAIR suggested that this responsibility would have to be exercised by Canada in consultation with the U.K. authorities. MR. ILSLEY thought that Canadian responsibility for cancellation costs, together with pooling arrangements, would take the brake off U.K. requisitioning in Canada. Already the responsibility of the Canadian Government was heavy in accepting these orders and making commitments, particularly commitments extending beyond the current fiscal year. It was true that Canada must decide whether or not to accept the requisitions and whether or not to discontinue or taper off production; it was true that Canada had discretion in the matter; but Mr. Ilesley emphasized that it was exceedingly difficult for Canada to check up on the essentiality of U.K. requirements. He said he had to take the view that because Mutual Aid was limited, we could depend on the U.K. doing their utmost to keep Canadian requirements to bare essentials. If through a pooling arrangement the extent of assistance Canada would give on munitions were not subject to such a limit, there would not be this check and it would be more than ever necessary for Canada to attempt to weigh the essentiality of British requirements. He felt the Canadian Government was now in a poor position to dispute the need for any request placed by the U.K. in the way in which they might dispute or refuse a request put forward by a Canadian Department for additional equipment or other expenditures.

GENERAL MCNAUGHTON emphasized this point and said that the difficulty of the Canadian Government, he believed, arose from their lack of information regarding strategic and operational requirements. He felt if Canada were to exercise the responsibility which would be involved in deciding whether or not to put supplies into production, and whether or not production should be stopped or tapered off, the Canadian Government would need much more information on which to base its decision of strategic essentiality and military requirements. The Canadian Government would have to exercise this substantial responsibility on the basis of the best and most responsible advice it could obtain. SIR ROBERT SINCLAIR said he felt this view was a wholly reasonable one and that the Canadian Government should be given any information it required to make a proper decision on these matters. He pointed out that Mr. Berry,<sup>280</sup> who had recently been in the U.K. to discuss the munitions program, had been given the whole picture, and that the requirements had been carefully explained to him. Sir Robert felt that General McNaughton and his officers should be able to obtain from the U.K. all that they required to know in order to ascertain the operational justification of the U.K. requirements. LORD KEYNES agreed with this view, and said that he believed Sir Robert Sinclair and himself ought to recommend that Canada be given full information on these matters to enable it to exercise the responsibilities for deciding what ought to be produced and when and how production should be curtailed.

BACON AND BEEF SUPPLIES FOR 1946

MR. GARDINER, at Mr. Ilsley's suggestion, outlined this problem. He stated that up to last year meat supplies for the U.K. had been provided on the basis of contracts extending over a year, but that last year, two-year contracts were entered into for bacon and for beef. We have now come to the end of the first year, and if production is to be maintained for U.K. purposes, it is necessary to restrict our products for shipment to U.S. markets and to give our producers the necessary assurance that will enable them to plan production for 1946 as well as 1945. Because of the long period of production involved, it was considered desirable now that each year negotiations should be entered into for the sale of bacon and beef products not only during the next succeeding year, but the one following that as well.

LORD KEYNES stated that the Ministry of Food agreed with Mr. Gardiner's views on this and were prepared to enter into contracts for the purchase of beef and bacon from Canada and had come to the Treasury for approval of them. The Treasury had pointed out, however, that financial arrangements are not made two years in advance, and the Treasury could not approve the Ministry of Food entering into commitments for 1946 unless they were able to get some assurance regarding their financial position in 1946. This was particularly difficult at the present time, because it was anticipated that 1946 would include a considerable post-war period in which Mutual Aid could not be expected. For this reason the U.K. Treasury felt that the U.K. Government should not sign firm contracts for the year 1946. Lord Keynes said that he felt in practice there is no doubt that finance will be arranged by one means or another, and he had been assured by the Ministry of Food that bacon and beef would receive high priority in the U.K.'s import requirements. They would not be marginal requirements likely to be dropped if the amount of finance available was something less than sufficient for all requirements. Lord Keynes said that they were expecting to borrow from Canada to finance requirements from Canada at the end of the war, but they did not know at this stage how much or on what terms. He felt that they should not enter into this question of borrowing or other financial provision in respect of one particular item such as this, but should rather take it up as a general arrangement later. In the meantime, he felt the best they could do would be to sign a contract establishing purchase prices for bacon and beef and the minimum quantities involved, but subject to the financial arrangements which may be made at that time. In addition, they were able to give the Canadian Government the assurance he had mentioned, that bacon and beef would have a high priority among the U.K.'s various import requirements. He added that he had inquired specifically regarding the relation of these bacon requirements to the position of Denmark and had been assured that notwithstanding what might be done in regard to Denmark, the Ministry of Food would require this Canadian bacon in 1946.

There was some discussion of the points raised by Lord Keynes during his exposition. MR. ILSLEY summed up Lord Keynes' proposal as he understood it to be that the prices and quantities would be fixed and agreed upon, but the payment and consequently the completion of the transactions would be subject to the financial arrangements which may be made at that time. Mr. Ilsley said that the Government would have to consider this proposal from the U.K.'s side and see whether it was satisfactory to them or whether they wished to make any counter-proposals.

Ottawa, December 1, 1944

A meeting of the Cabinet was held in the Privy Council Chamber on Friday, December 1st, 1944, at 12.00 noon.

The Prime Minister (Mr. King), in the Chair.

U.K. SUPPLY PROGRAMME IN CANADA; FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS; BEEF AND PORK PRODUCTS
CONTRACTS FOR 1946

1. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE reported upon the meeting held that morning of members of the Mutual Aid Board with Lord Keynes, Sir Robert Sinclair and members of the U.K. Treasury delegation.

U.K. requirements for Stage II (on the basis of the next fiscal year) were submitted, proposals for their financing being along the following lines:

(a) Assuming Mutual Aid to be carried on on the present basis, some $1200 million would be required to meet the needs of the sterling area alone, with a minimum additional $100 million for supplies to other countries. This might be reduced by some $300 million if Canada were prepared to assume the costs of certain Naval vessels building for the Admiralty in Canadian yards, and take on financial responsibility for maintenance of prisoners of war and the operation of the U.K.-Canada Inspection Board; or

(b) By restricting the Mutual Aid appropriation to food and raw materials and providing for munitions of war from the war appropriation—This would enable the Mutual Aid vote to be brought down to some $500 million; or

(c) By eliminating Mutual Aid altogether and providing for all British requirements in the war appropriation.

The alternative to accepting one or other of these proposals was to scale down Mutual Aid substantially and accept the consequent reduction in U.K. purchases.

2. MR. ILSLEY said that three specific items had also been discussed, namely, the provision of Mutual Aid funds for locomotives for India, Canadian assumption of cancellation charges, and long-term contracts with the U.K. government for supply of beef and pork products.

With regard to beef and pork, the United Kingdom were prepared in 1946 to accept Canadian supply at present prices and to give high priority thereto, subject to satisfactory financial arrangements to be concluded at a later date.

3. THE MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE said that he was satisfied to accept the plan proposed for supply of beef and pork products in 1946, in which Canada would undertake to provide minimum quantities, it being understood that the United Kingdom would accept larger quantities if they could be shipped.

4. THE CABINET, after discussion, agreed that the general proposals submitted by the U.K. government representatives should stand over for further examination and subsequent recommendation by the Ministers of Finance and Munitions and Supply, approval being given, meantime, to the conclusion of agreements with the U.K. government, along the lines suggested, for the supply of beef and pork products in the year 1946.

Ottawa, December 2, 1944

Dear Robertson,

A certain number of points have arisen out of our recent discussion about which it may be useful if I let you have a little supplementary information before I go away.

1. There was a suggestion that in these times of scarcity the U.K. was not allocating to Canada a fair share of British exports. Since the total volume of our exports is so enormously reduced, this is a misapprehension which can very easily come about. In fact, however, it is the exact opposite of the facts. I append a table showing in terms of value, not of volume, the changes in our export trade between 1938 and 1943. I need not emphasize the lesson of this table, which speaks for itself.

2. Another statistical figure which is, I think, of interest is given on Page 2 of the attached paper, which deals, incidentally, with other matters also. This shows that the Sterling Area countries have taken 8½ billions of Canadian goods in the five years 1940-44, and have paid for rather more than 6, leaving about a quarter to be financed by the billion dollar gift and Mutual Aid.

3. The same paper which contains the figures in 2. above, also makes the best calculation we can on relevant manpower mobilisation.

4. With some hesitation owing to the precarious assumptions on which it is based, I attach a note† prepared by the Board of Trade showing certain of our hopes in the way of increasing exports to Canada in 1945. My own judgment is that in some respects these estimates are too optimistic.

5. You may like to have the actual text of the statement I made to the Americans on the Sterling Area dollar pool.† We shall be grateful if this could be treated in its present state as strictly confidential. If any version, which is likely to be couched in rather different terms from this, is subsequently made public, we will let you know.

I am sending similar letters to Clark, Towers and Gordon.

Sincerely yours,

KEYNES

FINANCIAL ARRANGEMENTS FOR STAGE II

A number of points have been raised in the discussions to which we have undertaken to provide additional information. This note covers certain of them.

I. Possible Rearrangements in 1945-46

(a) Ships. It has been suggested that the cost of naval and merchant ships should be borne by War Appropriation, and that the ships should then be lent to the Royal Navy. The 1945-46 deliveries are estimated by D.M.S. as follows:—

	$ Millions
Merchant Ships	60.4
Naval Ships (inc. repair)	189.1
	249.5

The merchant ship item includes only victualling issue ships and maintenance-type vessels for the Fleet train; there are no merchant ships for normal commercial use. The naval ship item consists mainly of transport ferries, minesweepers etc; a small part of it consists of barges, tugs etc. which might not be suitable for the suggested procedure.

(b) Internment. The United Kingdom Government bears certain charges for the cost of internment of prisoners of war in Canada. These charges totalled $11 million in 1943-44 and are estimated at $15 million in 1944-45, but may increase to $25 million in 1945-46. It is suggested that this charge should be borne by Canada, and that this should be made retrospective [sic].

(c) Inspection. The United Kingdom Government bears part of the cost of the Inspection Board of the United Kingdom and Canada. This charge was $29 million in 1943-44; it is estimated at $30 million in 1944-45, and there will still be a substantial charge of possibly $20 million in 1945-46. It is suggested that some or all of this charge could properly be borne by Canada.

II. Proportion of Cost of Supplies from Canada borne by Empire Countries

In the five years 1940-44, more than 70% of the supplies of goods and services provided by Canada for the British Empire will have been financed by earnings or from sales of securities, gold and U.S. Dollars, the remaining 28% having been financed by the Canadian taxpayer or billion-dollar gift or mutual aid.

The figures are as follows, in million $:

	Payments to Canada by Empire Countries	Payments by Canada to Empire Countries
1940	822	403
1941	1,321	516
1942	1,826	557
1943	2,066	850
1944 (estimated)	2,500	1,650
 TOTAL 1940-44	 8,535	 3,976

Figures for 1940-43 from Dominion Bureau of Statistics International Branch; figures for 1944 estimated.

In round figures, Canada has supplied the British Empire with $8½ billion in goods and services:

	$ billions
Exports to U.K.	6.5	(nearly one-half mili- tations)
Exports to other Empire Services	0.8 1.2

These have been paid for as follows:

	$ billions
Exports from U.K.	0.6
Other Empire exports	0.5
Payments for Canadian Forces	2.2
Services	0.7
TOTAL EARNINGS		4.0
Sterling loan	0.7
Sale of securities, gold, U.S. dollars, etc.	1.4
TOTAL CREDIT		2.1
Billion dollar gift	1.0
Mutual Aid	1.4
TOTAL CANADIAN TAXPAYER		2.4
		8.5

The proportion financed by cash or credit is thus nearly 72%.

The liability under the air training schemes, now estimated at $425 million, is not included in the above, because the terms of settlement are not yet determined.

III. Relative Manpower Mobilization

One question which was raised was the relative extent to which U.K. and Canadian manpower are currently employed upon war work. This is an extremely difficult calculation to make, and comparison must necessarily be subject to a very wide degree of error, especially as the two countries' economies and war efforts differ so fundamentally. We have made certain estimates, however, and show the results with all reservation.

In Great Britain at mid-1944, 67½% of the occupied population was engaged on Government work. This includes men and women in the armed forces and civil defence, in the production of munitions and other supplies for the armed forces, in public administration, in war construction, and in mining, transport, public utilities and other general services to the extent that these services are working for the armed forces and munitions industries. For example, if half the transport services are employed on movements for the armed forces and munitions industries, then half the transport workers are "on Government work;" agricultural workers are treated as being "on Government work" only in respect of food production for the armed forces.

For Canada, it seems to us appropriate to regard "Government work" as including men and women in the Forces and in the manufacture of munitions and in the various ancillary services correspondingly. But an addition must also be made to cover the manpower engaged on production of exports of primary products which is just as integral a part of Canada's war effort as the Forces and the munitions industries. Making rather wide assumptions to relate the value of exports to the manpower engaged on producing and transporting them to port, we get the following approximate table:

Forces	770,000
Munitions	750,000
Export of non-munitions	700,000
Various other services	400,000
	2,620,000

Canada's total occupied manpower is about 5,100,000, which gives a ratio of about 51%. Appropriate allowance for the work of farmers' wives would raise this to about 56%. We believe that this figure is fairly comparable with the Great Britain figure of 67½%.

POST-WAR COMMERCIAL POLICY PROSPECTS

A PROPOSAL FOR AVERTING A BREAKDOWN IN INTERNATIONAL TRADE RELATIONSHIPS

I. Statement of the Problem

1. During the past year or so there has been a marked deterioration in the prospect of arrangements being agreed upon among countries which will permit of a high level of international trade on a non-discriminatory basis after the war. The main visible factor causing the deterioration has been the growing strength of the British influences favouring a bilateralist development of their trade. Certain American developments must also cause anxiety, in particular their agriculture price maintenance programme if it involves, as it almost necessarily does, export subsidies and import quotas. If no special action is taken to reverse present tendencies, one can look forward to a complete breakdown of international trade relationships after the war. This memorandum examines the nature of the problem, discusses some of the general political implications and the particular economic implications for Canada of a continuation of present tendencies, and suggests the general lines of a proposed solution.

2. The United Kingdom advised us in D.O. circular telegram No. D.1752 of November 30, 1944,† of their decision to propose that quantitative restrictions on imports of foodstuffs should be permitted as a permanent part of the rules governing international trade relations after the war. In his press conference in Ottawa on January 5, 1944, Mr. Hudson, U.K. Minister of Agriculture, made it clear that the British intend to foster their domestic agriculture and to cut down on imports of foodstuffs. The implications of this policy are aggravated, so far as Canada is concerned, by the second main trend evident in British policy. This is the growing strength and influence of the British groups which wish, for one reason or another, to foster trade within the sterling area after the war, while discriminating against the "hard currency" countries, mainly the United States and Canada.

3. There are a variety of motives determining U.K. attitudes in this matter of trade discrimination on currency grounds after the war. The motives are only partly economic; in part they are political in character. But there is one objective factor in the U.K. position which enables them to plead, with justification, that they have no alternative but to discriminate against imports from the dollar countries. This factor is their lack of dollar resources and their shortage of dollar earning power. During the war this has been made good by our billion dollar gift and Mutual Aid appropriations and by Lend-Lease in the United States (and in part, of course, by the repatriation to Canada and the United States of British-owned securities). After the war, when these sources of financial assistance come to an end, the British can claim that the sheer arithmetic of their position will force them (and the rest of the sterling area) to limit their dollar outlays to the inescapable minimum. In the recent U.K. Top Secret Memorandum entitled "British Requirements for the First Year of Stage II,"† the net U.K. gold and dollar reserves at the end of 1944 were estimated at $1,500 mm. as compared with gross gold and dollar reserves of $4,200 mm. in August 1938. On the other hand their short-term liabilities to foreigners in the form of sterling balances amounted to the colossal figure of $12,000 mm. compared with $3,000 mm. at the earlier date. In addition to the loss of liquid assets and the incurring of nominally liquid liabilities, the Chancellor of the Exchequer estimated last April that the British had liquidated overseas assets to the extent of about $4,000 mm. during the war. The British summarize their international capital position by saying that they entered the war a net creditor on international account to the extent of $14,000 mm. and will emerge a net debtor on international account to the extent of $5,000 mm.—a deterioration of $19,000 mm. in their overseas position.

Superimposed on this precarious capital position, the British must anticipate very large deficits in their current account transaction with the rest of the world during the years immediately after the war. Their pre-war income from overseas investments and shipping services will be greatly reduced. On the other hand, their import requirements for reconstruction purposes and to make good part of the consumption deficiencies of the lean war years will be very high, while time will be required for them to re-establish their export trades. They estimate that the accumulated deficit in the first three years after the end of the war against Japan will amount to $4-5,000 mm., without making allowance for repayment of any part of the abnormal sterling balances.

The British do not indicate how much of this deficit is expected to occur with the sterling area and how much with the non-sterling area. Bearing in mind, however, the level of their gold and U.S. dollar reserves (which are not much higher than the minimum balances needed to finance international trade and to hold as an emergency chest) they are, in default of special measures of assistance, quite entitled to argue that the only course open to them is to reduce their deficit with the dollar countries as much as possible.

4. So much for the objective facts determining the U.K. attitudes. Other considerations also enter. On the economic side, there are important groups in the U.K. which welcome the development of a closed sterling area which would discriminate against imports from the dollar countries, since they fear open competition with the United States and Canada. They are quite pleased to have this additional protection not only in the domestic market but also in important export markets—for under the policies now emerging the other parts of the sterling area would be forced to use the proceeds of their exports to the U.K. to buy goods there, and this regardless of price: the sterling would have nowhere else to go. The British are counting on post-war exports double the pre-war value (approximately 50 per cent higher in volume) but in view of the high cost position of some of their main industries, e.g. textiles and iron and steel products, some of them may well wonder how this can be achieved in the absence of Shachtian<sup>281</sup> bilateralist devices which enable the British to force their exports down other peoples' throats. A more sophisticated attempt at justification of trade discrimination on currency grounds has recently been made by the influential London Economist.<sup>282</sup> The argument runs that, quite apart from the difficulties of the British payments position, the dollar countries are undesirable trade partners since they cannot be depended on to keep their own houses in order by maintaining domestic prosperity and by balancing their international accounts at a high level, and hence threaten to become focal points of deflationary infection. In view of this, the Economist resigns itself with pleasure to the necessity of trade discrimination against the dollar countries: the British should, in this view, seek to balance their accounts with the dollar countries at a low level, borrowing the minimum amounts required to pay for indispensable imports which cannot be obtained elsewhere, and seek for trade expansion in other directions, namely with the "similarly expansive-minded" countries of the sterling area.

See issue of October 14, 1944, pp. 501-2.

On the political side, the imperialist group in the U.K. naturally welcomes anything which throws a cordon around the Empire. And it is obviously British policy to try to bolster their position by enlarging the sterling area (or creating a sort of semi-sterling area) to include the countries of Western Europe. The recent Anglo-Belgian Monetary Agreement,<sup>283</sup> limited though it is, is no doubt the forerunner of other and more extensive arrangements which the British will attempt to make with other European countries. Whether they will be successful is another question: the French show no disposition to become a minor constellation in the British orbit. However that may be, there is little doubt that the desire to create a unified bloc which will give her an influence in world affairs proportionate to that of the United States and the Soviet Union forms part of the explanation of the wish of some sections of British opinion to consolidate and develop the sterling area.

More basic perhaps than any of the explanations of this development already referred to is the deep-seated resentment, conscious or subconscious, which is felt in the U.K. against the present financial supremacy of the United States. It is difficult for us to realize to what extent the pride of the British, accustomed to regarding themselves as the world's banker, has been injured by having to approach the United States, hat in hand, for financial assistance in the war, to justify their dollar expenditures and their dollar balances, to accept limitations on their freedom of action regarding exports, and so on. It is not altogether surprising that some of them should have made up their minds that never again would they approach the United States in forma pauperis: that after the war was over they would run their own show in their own way and not have the United States in a position to tell them where to get off. The present undignified transatlantic squabble is a reflection of this attitude—as well as a foretaste of the political consequences which will inevitably follow in Anglo-American relations if the present trends in British economic policy are not reversed.

5. As to the direction of those trends, there can be no mistake. One need not rely on the verbal testimony of Mr. Hudson, the British Minister of Agriculture, who has said during his present visit to Ottawa that he and some of his colleagues have made it clear to Mr. Churchill that they will not stand for any “multilateral nonsense;” that countries which want to export to the U.K. after the war will have to take British goods in exchange and if they don't like that they can sell elsewhere; that the U.K. will “luxuriate in the position of a debtor country.” The facts are there to speak for themselves, and during the past few months, as the supply and shipping position have eased, numerous instances have come to the attention of Canadian officials of British or other sterling area countries refusing to grant import licences for goods we have supplied in the past on the ground that Canadian dollars could not be made available since the goods (even though essential in character) were obtainable within the sterling area. If any confirmation is needed that this policy will become tougher in the future it is to be found in the U.K. memorandum referred to in paragraph 3 above where it is explained (Annex A, page 2) that under existing arrangements, the countries in the sterling area are free to spend their sterling balances anywhere in the sterling area without restriction, and to obtain external currencies on condition that they are required for essential goods which cannot be obtained from the sterling area, but that it is not anticipated that a similar latitude to spend sterling balances outside the sterling area can be continued much longer.

6. The upshot of all this is that the upper hand in British public life is being gained by those elements which are opposed to whole-hearted British participation in a cooperative effort to develop a large volume of world trade on a multilateral basis after the war. The earlier hopes that out of the Article VII discussions<sup>284</sup> might come a bold expansive approach to trade relationships among countries have been steadily receding. It is worth recalling that public opinion, by a sound instinct, greeted with enthusiasm those sections of the Atlantic Charter and the Mutual Aid Agreements between the United States and other countries (duplicated in our own exchange of notes with the United States<sup>285</sup>) which gave promise of such an approach. These sections referred to “the fullest collaboration between all nations in the economic field” and to “a programme of agreed action ... directed to the expansion, by appropriate international and domestic measures, of production, employment and the exchange and consumption of goods.” In reacting favourably to these promises, public opinion was no doubt influenced by a recollection of the disastrous consequences of lack of cooperation in the 1930’s, by a belief that if cooperation was possible in war it should be in peace, by a realization that if the opportunity to work out a far-reaching programme of cooperative action was not taken before the war ended it would in all probability be too late.

7. These general considerations are just as valid as they have ever been, but each day that passes makes the attainment of the broad objectives originally contemplated less likely and strengthens the position of the bilateralist school in the U.K. The economic consequences of British discrimination against our exports on currency grounds would be extremely grave for Canada: the next section of this memorandum shows that our main hope of being able to overcome the difficulties of the transition period after the war lies in exporting on a large scale. The general political consequences of British bilateralism are even more painful to contemplate. One need only think of what the public reaction in this country will be if, after the billion dollar gift and the Mutual Aid assistance during the war, the British immediately turn around and put up discriminatory barriers against our exports, to imagine what the reaction will be in the United States, where there is less understanding of the genuine difficulties of the British payments position. Again there will be accusations of bad faith, again the cry that Uncle Sam has been played for a sucker, inveigled into supplying the British with what they needed free of charge, during the war only to be pushed in the face and told that their services were no longer required the moment the war was over. The anti-British elements in American public life which will again favour American withdrawal from world affairs will have been presented with a perfect beating-drum on a silver platter—and they can be relied upon to make use of it. Nor should it be thought that the U.S. Government will sit idly by and watch the British discriminate against American exports and, through bilateral trade deals, force competitive British goods upon the countries from which the British buy. More than one can play at the bilateral game and the Americans will undoubtedly feel that it is they who hold the blue chips in the form of enormous productive capacity and impregnable international liquidity. Rather than see the British pre-empt foreign markets through bilateral trade arrangements they will seek to capture those markets themselves through tied credits on easy terms. In short, if this development takes place, we shall have passed directly from military warfare against the Axis Powers to economic warfare among the United Nations. Canada, dependent as we are on the U.K. market for our main staple exports and on the U.S. market for our main imports, will be ground between the upper and the nether millstones. The economic consequences will be impoverishment all round; the political consequences are incalculable.

8. If it is thought that too grim a picture has been drawn and that what has been said above is unduly pessimistic, it is worth recalling that during the past 15 years those who took pessimistic views regarding the trend of affairs were invariably called Cassandra—and, as the subsequent events proved, the degree of pessimism expressed was never adequate. This was true of views expressed regarding the effects of commercial policies during the Great Depression of the early thirties; it was true of views expressed regarding the international political situation after 1933. In the past we have never been prepared to take adequate steps, and to take them soon enough, to deal with threatening situations we saw developing. After the lapse of a year or two we would have been glad to adopt the measures originally required but these had become inadequate with the deterioration of the position. If this same old story of “too little and too late” is not to be repeated once more, we must be prepared to take bold and even courageous measures at the outset, in order to prevent the situation from getting out of hand. The “cost” of such measures will be small compared with a realistic appraisal of the cost of the evils they are designed to avert.

9. As things stand at present, the hope of getting off to a decent start in international trade arrangements after the war is foundering on the rock of British balance of payments difficulties: through nothing short of a frontal attack on this problem can hope be revived. In the discussions which have taken place regarding commercial policy and international monetary plans during the past two years, the facts of the British position have obliged the officials of all participating countries to concede that during a transitional period of uncertain length after the end of the war the U.K. should retain the right to continue discriminatory trade and exchange policies. Restrictive and discriminatory measures labelled transitional will be as difficult to undo as similar measures labelled permanent: if adopted they will determine the whole course of international trade relationships for an indefinite period. The situation calls for vision of the type that inspired the original Lend-Lease conception and our own wartime financial arrangements with the U.K.

10. It has been shown in paragraph 3 above that the British international financial difficulties fall into two parts: (1) the prospective deficit in their international balance of payments on current account during the period after the war necessary for them to restore equilibrium, say 3 years, and (2) the question of the blocked sterling balances. It is the proposal of this paper, outlined in Section III, that Canada, in its own short-run material interest, should contribute to the solution of the first of these problems by offering the U.K. a credit large enough to keep our exports to the sterling area at reasonably high levels during the 3 years after the end of the Japanese war, on terms which take account of the real difficulties of the British international financial position. Acting alone, this is the most we could accomplish—to ensure ourselves against discrimination for a limited period of time. For a broader settlement of the British difficulties, linked to liberal commercial policy arrangements effective immediately after the end of the war, the United States occupies a key position. Such a settlement would involve corresponding action by the United States to deal with the postwar deficit of American dollars and some recasting of the war accounts which would relieve the British of a fair proportion of their overhanging liabilities in the form of sterling balances. The outline of such a settlement is given in Section III, paragraph 21. The next section of this paper is designed to show the immediate Canadian interest in taking the steps necessary to maintain our exports during the postwar period.

II. The Importance of Maintaining Canadian Exports during the Transitional Period

11. In planning for the maintenance of high employment in Canada in the years immediately after the war we must base our policies on the present structure of our non-war economy which is founded primarily on the production of primary products for export. The traditional dependence of our economy on external trade—a consequence of the highly specialized nature of our resources—is well known. In the past, when we have been able to dispose of our surpluses abroad at remunerative prices we have been prosperous and have been able to pay for the imports resulting from our prosperity; when world markets have been closed down on us we have had depression. Even during the war, our high level of activity has been mainly determined by production of goods for export rather than for our own use.

12. We must base our policies for the immediate postwar years on the existing primary industry structure for two reasons. In the first place we haven't time to change it. A drastic curtailment in our main export industries would involve painful adjustments and shifts of population which could only be made without great dislocation if spread out over a long period of time. In the second place, we do not yet know whether we shall have to make these basic adjustments or not. This depends primarily on the level of international trade after the war. We must do everything we can to cooperate with other countries to see that this is high. If it turns out that the policies pursued by other countries are such that we cannot count on large exports as the main dynamic element in our situation, then we shall have to adjust ourselves to the position as best we can, involving as it does a lower standard of living and a very high degree of state intervention if anything like full employment is to be maintained. But it would be as foolish to make this defeatist assumption regarding our long-run export possibilities before every opportunity of persuading other countries to adopt liberal trade policies has been exhausted as it would be optimistically to assume that God will provide and that in one way or another, without special efforts on the part of the Government, something like 2,000,000 people now in the armed forces and war industries will be readily absorbed into the civilian sector of the economy without displacing more than the few hundred thousand women and old workers who will want to quit their jobs when the war is over. Even under the most favourable circumstances, it is too much to hope that the demobilization of the armed forces and the reconversion of our war industries to peacetime uses can take place without temporary unemployment. The only hope we have that this inevitable unemployment will not degenerate into a cumulative deflationary movement with the threat of complete collapse is that we can somehow or other keep the civilian sector of our economy prosperous. Thinking of the first few years after the end of the Japanese war, our main hope of keeping the civilian sector prosperous is to export on a large scale.

13. We cannot, of course, hope to maintain the wartime volume of exports, (nearly $3,500 million in the past 12 months) after the war. About half of these consist of munitions of war and another quarter of abnormal wartime diversions which will gradually disappear. The value of our normal commercial exports is probably less now than it was in 1938, and in view of the rise in prices which has taken place in the interval, the volume must be considerably less. On the other hand if, when the Japanese phase of the war is over, we do no better than maintain our exports at their pre-war level, then we are bound to have considerable unemployment and a degree of economic disorganization which will enormously aggravate the problems of demobilization of the armed forces and reconversion of the war industries.

14. It is impossible to say what precise amount of exports we should aim at during the transition period after the Japanese war. Detailed studies which have been made suggest that exports in the neighbourhood of $2,000 million per year would be a reasonable target. At this level, exports would be not much more than half their value in the past 12 months; on the other hand, they would be double their pre-war value and, in view of the increase in prices, approximately 50 per cent higher than pre-war quantities.

15. An over-all export objective of $2,000 million per year involves exports to the U.K. of approximately one-third of this amount, or say $665 million. If the U.K. and the rest of the sterling area embark on the line of discriminating against Canadian exports on currency grounds, our chances of maintaining the Canadian economic structure without great disorganization are very slim. Our exports to the U.K. are of crucial importance to us not only on account of their over-all magnitude, but also because the U.K. takes so large a proportion of our total production of the particular commodities constituting the bulk of our exports to her that a sudden curtailment of her purchases would cause serious disturbance across the whole economic fabric.

16. For purposes of illustration the following figures are set out to show what our exports to the U.K. might be at the target figure of $665 million per year and how these compare with 1937 and 1943:

	1937	1943/44	Post-war objective
Wheat and flour	$91mm.	$190mm.	$125mm.
Meats	36	190	110
Other farm products inc. furs	61	50	145
Lumber	24	36	80
Other wood products and paper	21	40	35
Base metals	99	155	95
Fish	6	17	10
Others	46	49	65
	$384mm.	$727mm.	$665mm.

17. If the over-all export objective of $2,000 million is to be attained during the transitional period, the proposed credit to the U.K. will have to be supplemented by smaller but sizeable credits to other countries. It should be emphasized that what is being suggested here is not that the government should maintain through foreign credits the entire industrial structure created during the war, with the enormous financial commitments that would involve, but merely that the decision should be taken now to maintain in this way the basic primary economic structure—with financial commitments on a much smaller scale than the present war outlays. In the absence of such a programme, there is no doubt that as one primary industry after another got into difficulties, the government would be driven into ad hoc rescue measures which would involve it in financial outlays which might well equal those here proposed. The stimulative effects of such rescue measures would be largely lost for they would be taken at a time when confidence in the future was impaired through the distress of our main export industries. By contrast, the stimulative effects of assured export outlets would be considerable.

Prosperity and business confidence in Canada have always been associated with good export markets, and the maintenance of domestic employment and incomes in this traditional way is more likely to lead to private investment than will be the case if undue reliance is placed either on rescue measures or on public investment projects. Moreover, in contrast to certain other types of reconstruction project, the promotion of exports does not give rise to any constitutional problems. Nor does a plan for promoting exports require much in the way of preliminary blueprinting—this in contrast to other currently discussed schemes which are bound to remain in the project stage until long after V-day. It may be reckoned a final advantage of export stimulation that, in contrast to other measures, it can be accomplished with a minimum of state interference and without seriously disturbing our present economic structure.

18. One final observation may be made on the financial costs of this programme. The policy of keeping a floor under agricultural prices will in any case involve outlays to accumulate surpluses if world markets are closed to us and prices fall. To the extent that as a result of the present proposals we dispose of these surpluses abroad instead of piling them up in Canada, there is no net additional financial burden involved.

19. There is no doubt that the U.K. could use all the goods enumerated in the postwar objective shown in paragraph 16. The difficulty is one of payment, not absorptive capacity. One can only guess at the amount of Canadian dollars the U.K. will earn through exports to Canada. On the basis of pre-war experience, it would probably not be far wide of the mark to assume that, after making allowance for the invisible items, the U.K. might have about $215 million per year to pay for Canadian exports. This would leave a balance of, say, $450 million per year to be financed in order to maintain exports to the U.K. at the desired level. So far as the rest of the sterling area is concerned, their share in an export objective of $2,000 million might be, say, $130 million per year (our 1937 exports were about $105 million) of which they might be able to cover some $90 million through their own Canadian dollar income. On this basis, the sterling area deficiency of Canadian dollars would run to some $490 million per year or, say, $1,500 million for the 3-year period with which we are concerned.

III. The Proposal

20. It is proposed that we offer to extend a credit of $1,200 million to the United Kingdom to be used to make purchases in Canada during the three years following the end of hostilities with Japan (the balance of the estimated sterling area deficit of $1,500 million to be covered by the sale of gold or U.S. funds to Canada). The credit should be made conditional upon their undertaking not to apply, nor to encourage other countries in the sterling area to apply, greater restrictions against imports from Canada, whether by way of currency or trade (including bulk purchasing) policies, than they apply against similar imports from the sterling area, i.e. not to discriminate against imports from Canada on currency grounds, while remaining free, however, to impose such general import restrictions against all countries as they may find necessary to balance their international accounts.

21. The United Kingdom should be free to sell Canadian dollars obtained on credit to other members of the sterling area for the purpose of making current account payments to Canada. It is our purpose to ensure that, like the United Kingdom, the other members of the sterling area do not impose greater restrictions on imports from Canada than they impose on similar imports from other sterling area countries. If the U.K. intended to "freeze" the abnormal wartime sterling balances it would be relatively easy to accomplish this, for the situation would then be that only post-war accretions to the sterling reserves of sterling area countries (resulting from favourable balances with the U.K. or with each other) need be made convertible into Canadian dollars. The British have, however, intimated that they do not intend to block these accounts in this way, but rather to leave them (in theory at least) freely transferable within the sterling area. It follows from this that if the objective of non-discrimination on currency grounds is to be achieved the abnormal sterling balances must be reduced to a level where the British are able to undertake the obligation to convert them into foreign exchange for current account purposes (though not necessarily for capital transactions). At the present time the balances stand at $12,000 million and are not convertible into foreign exchange. Some of the countries holding the balances, in particular India and Egypt, are restive under this restriction. It has been suggested that if the creditor countries in a position to do so, e.g. the United States and Canada, were prepared to provide exports to the countries holding abnormal sterling balances up to a certain proportion, say, 25 per cent of those balances, arrangements might be made under which those countries would agree to write off a similar proportion of their balances. Using these proportions, the sterling balances would be reduced to $6,000 million, as compared with normal balances of $3-4,000 million—a not intolerable burden for the U.K. From the point of view of the United States and Canada the goods supplied to such countries as India and Egypt would, in effect, be a gift - but one which would bless the donor through the increased employment and domestic incomes as a result of the additional production of goods resulting therefrom. From the point of view of the countries holding the balances the assurance that a certain proportion would be convertible might well be considered adequate recompense for cancellation of a similar amount.

This proposal appears to have the elements of an arrangement which is really advantageous to all concerned, particularly when one bears in mind the general benefits of the liberal commercial policy arrangements with which it should be linked. Moreover, some recasting of the war accounts can be defended on grounds of equity in the distribution of war costs. The present situation is far removed from the principle enunciated by President Roosevelt—that no country should enrich itself at the expense of another as a result of the war.

22. Reverting now to the proposed credit of $1,200 million, the United Kingdom have made it clear that they will be very reluctant to borrow abroad on any considerable scale from the dollar countries after the war. They explain that they are determined to avoid assuming a fresh burden of debt beyond their capacity to pay and that rather than do this they will pull in their belts and go without. In fact, it may be that their reluctance is based on the feeling that the dollar countries are poor creditors since they cannot be relied on to maintain their economies fully employed (keeping their imports high) or to balance their international accounts at a high level. The British fears in this respect have an adequate foundation in fact; and if their reluctance to borrow is to be overcome it will be necessary to meet their legitimate fears regarding difficulty of repayment.

23. It is suggested that the proposed credit should be repayable at the rate of $60 million per year beginning ten years after the end of the hostilities against Japan. If, however, repayment in any year were to have the effect of reducing the U.K. holdings of gold and convertible currencies below a certain minimum figure of necessary balances, repayment would be deferred until it could take place without having this effect. On the other hand, if the U.K. were bringing her international reserves below the agreed minimum figure through repayment of debts to others, we should receive our equitable share. And in any case if the sterling area had a favourable balance with Canada, this should be used to effect principal payments due under the loan without regard to the level of the British gold and U.S. dollar reserves.

24. These repayment provisions may look unduly generous, but the plain fact of the matter is that our bargaining position is not strong and we shall have to go a long way to meet the United Kingdom if we are to overcome their reluctance to go into our debt on a considerable scale. The repayment provisions do no more than recognize the facts of the situation—that international debts can only be repaid through real transfers of goods and services and that countries will not allow their international reserves to run down below certain minimum figures. If real transfers are made impossible by the policies of other countries, and if reserves are at dangerously low levels, there will be default regardless of the character of the repayment provisions. What this proposal does is remove the odium of default by calling it contractual deferment. This has great advantages from the point of view of the debtor, whose prestige is involved, but it also has advantages from the point of view of the creditor. For deferment involves no parliamentary appropriation for write-off and there is, moreover, more hope of ultimately collecting on a governmental obligation which is alive and in good standing than on one which has been allowed to go into default.

The risk that the U.K. might indefinitely postpone any repayments by spending freely abroad so that its reserves were always close to the agreed minimum is not a serious one. We might not in fact be injured by such a policy. But in any case, if we were determined to collect on our outstanding credit, it would be open to us to force repayment by increasing our imports of goods and services from the U.K. and/or restricting our exports, thus establishing a favourable balance of payments for the U.K. to apply against the loan. The legitimate U.K. preoccupation which we must be prepared to meet—and which it is important for us in our own interests to have established as a general principle—is that the creditor cannot throw the debtor into default if the debtor's balance with the creditor is adverse and its relationship with other countries do not leave it with resources sufficient to repay the creditor in gold or acceptable currencies.

25. The U.K. will undoubtedly hold strong views on the rates of interest they are willing to pay on fresh external indebtedness. Since it will be open to them to obtain many of the things we wish to sell them from sterling area or semi-sterling area countries against sterling balances on which only the Treasury Bill rate is paid, and since the U.S. will undoubtedly be willing to make credit available for purchases there at low rates, it will be necessary for us to go a long way to meet these views. It is suggested that the interest rate should be 2 per cent on the portion of the credit made available in Canadian dollars and that some part of the credit be made available through our accumulating sterling on which we would earn only the U.K. Treasury Bill rate. This would reduce the over-all rate below 2 per cent.

IV. Summary and Conclusions

(a) A major salvage operation is needed, and needed quickly, if the present drift towards a complete breakdown in international trade relationships after the war is to be averted. Only intervention at the highest level, based upon considerations of the political as well as the economic consequences of present tendencies in the U.K. policies, holds out any prospect of success.

(b) The bilateralist, restrictionist school is now in the saddle in the U.K. So long as the U.K. is in a position to plead necessitous circumstances, they will remain in the saddle. The Gordian knot which must be cut is the British balance of payments difficulties.

(c) Canada should, as a minimum, make a large credit available to the U.K. on reasonable terms to maintain our exports to the sterling area during the three years after the end of the war and should seek, in conjunction with the United States, a broader and more general solution to the problem, involving a recasting of the war accounts combined with agreement on liberal and non-discriminatory commercial policies effective immediately after the conclusion of hostilities. The amounts involved are considerable, but in comparison with either the present scale of war expenditures or with the cost of the realistic alternatives, they are small.

(d) It is not certain that the U.S. would concert with us in such proposals or that the U.K. would accept them. But the stakes for which we are playing are too large for us to neglect any opportunities. U.K. policy is actuated by a variety of motives and it may be that if the objective difficulties in their international payments position are met they will cling to the sterling area-bilateralist line for other reasons. Only through constructive proposals to meet their real difficulties will we be able to smoke out the true U.K. position. It is in our interests to know where we stand as soon as possible, since their intentions have far-reaching implications on our domestic economic policies and on the trade relationships at which we should aim with other countries—particularly the United States.

Ottawa, January 20, 1945

NOTES ON MEETING OF MINISTERS AND OFFICIALS IN OFFICE
OF MINISTER OF FINANCE JANUARY 18, 1945, TO DISCUSS IMMEDIATE POST-WAR COMMERCIAL POLICY OUTLOOK

A meeting was held between 5 and 7 p.m. on January 18, 1945, in the office of the Minister of Finance, to consider the outlook for trade and related financial questions in the transitional period immediately following the close of hostilities against Japan, and the relation of this prospect to Mutual Aid and the action which Canada should take at present.

Those present included the Hon. J. L. Ilsley, in the chair, Hon. C. D. Howe, Hon. J. A. MacKinnon, Hon. L. S. St. Laurent, Hon. A. G. L. McNaughton, Dr. W. C. Clark, Mr. N. A. Robertson, Dr. W. A. Mackintosh, Mr. G. F. Towers, Mr. O. Master, Mr. J. E. Coyne, Mr. R. B. Bryce.

At the Chairman's request, Dr. Clark opened the discussion by pointing out that the Government was faced at the moment with making important decisions regarding the program for the next fiscal year and the estimated expenditure for this, including expenditure on Mutual Aid. There were quite a number of problems to be considered in this matter, of course, and there have been quite a number of discussions on them. He understood that recently further consideration had been given to the suggestion of having a single appropriation to cover all requirements, including Mutual Aid and also Reconstruction. He himself believed that such a single appropriation was probably desirable now, in view of the great uncertainty that existed about the course of the war in the fiscal year 1945-46. In the face of this uncertainty, if separate appropriations were made, it would be necessary to include a margin of safety on each and the total required for the three purposes, i.e., War Appropriation proper, Mutual Aid, and Reconstruction, would have to be substantially larger than the amount of a single appropriation which would be sufficient to cover the combined requirements, particularly because the circumstances which would make a larger figure for direct war expenditures necessary would also, for example, make smaller expenditures for Mutual Aid necessary, and smaller expenditures for Reconstruction. However, said Dr. Clark, this matter was being considered separately, as were the general programs for next year, and it did not seem necessary to discuss them at this meeting.

There was another aspect, however, to the Mutual Aid and related programs for next year which he felt it was desirable to bring to the attention of the Ministers concerned, and that was the prospect for Canadian trade in the period immediately following the end of hostilities, and the general financial relations between Canada and the United Kingdom during that period. He said that the developing prospects in this field appeared to be so serious, particularly the trend of Ministerial opinion in the U.K., that they justified the Canadian government doing what it could at the present time to improve matters. Moreover, he felt it difficult to recommend to the Government at this time a substantial measure of Mutual Aid without drawing to their attention the trade difficulties which Canada might face vis-à-vis the U.K. at the conclusion of hostilities.

Dr. Clark said that Mr. Towers had been giving some careful attention to this subject and had prepared a memorandum upon it in which he put forward a number of suggestions, and Dr. Clark thought it might be well if Mr. Towers would set forth the situation as he sees it. Mr. Towers then proceeded to outline what he considered the U.K. was likely to do after the end of hostilities against Japan and the termination at that time of Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid. Unless others make a different course of action possible, he felt the U.K. was going to establish a "cordon sanitaire" around the sterling area from an economic point of view, and would endeavour to develop and expand trade within that area and restrict it between that area and the rest of the world. These restrictions would be effected not only by the old-fashioned device of tariffs, but also by exchange control, import quotas and bulk purchasing policies. He said he thought it was the hope of the U.K. to bring others into this sterling bloc, particularly countries of Western Europe. Indeed ultimately the ambition might be to bring in most of the world outside of Canada and the U.S. (Later he indicated that a good deal of South America would probably not be included in any event, although Argentina likely would be.) The U.K. under these conditions would use economic pressure and bargaining in its trade. When it is charged that these anticipated policies are similar to the policies worked out for Germany by Dr. Schacht, the British reply that they are not intended to be so extreme. As far as trade with North America is concerned, they appear to contemplate agreed sales and purchases which would be linked in such a way as to ensure a market for British goods and the avoidance of competition. It would mean, of course, that the U.K. would have to discriminate against imports from Canada and the U.S. except insofar as special arrangements were made in individual cases as a result of bargaining.

All this, of course, would be contrary to the desires of Canada and the U.S. to achieve a greater freedom of international trade, a greater use of multilateral trade than existed before the war, and ultimately the convertibility of one currency into another. It was a most pessimistic outlook from the point of view of Canada and the U.S., as their trade would be bound to suffer, and their relations with the U.K. and the sterling area as a whole were apt to deteriorate not only on economic matters but upon the political plane as well.

Mr. Towers said the opinion that this course of developments was inevitable had been growing in the U.K. for some years and the policy involved had now many advocates. Dr. Mackintosh and the other officials who were in England several years ago and again last year had detected a noticeable growth in these opinions. Mr. Hudson, the British Minister of Agriculture, who was recently in Ottawa, supplied the clinching evidence as to the importance of this line of thought in U.K. political circles. Hudson had gone so far as to say that Article VII of the Lend-Lease Agreement was just a scrap of paper. Mr. Hudson had indicated that the U.K. expected to use its bargaining power to the full, for example, in buying Canadian bacon, and felt it ought to be relatively unimportant to Canada whether she had to pay something more for British coal than for American coal, as long as she was able to sell her products in Britain. Mr. Towers said he understood that Mr. Hudson, after what he had heard in Ottawa, was being somewhat less dogmatic and provocative in what he said in Washington, but his attitude nevertheless and his very strong influence in the British Conservative Party made clear the very great dangers in the outlook for Canadian trade. Mr. Towers said that he had asked Lord Keynes when the latter was in Ottawa several months ago if this type of opinion had yet gained the upper hand in Britain, and Keynes agreed that it seemed to have done so and would win out unless some good alternative were put forward. Mr. Towers said that he noted with great regret the pleasure with which many of the British, even those who can see the arguments against this policy, resign themselves to the course which they say is forced upon them.

Mr. Towers said that the great factor in impressing the U.K. with the need for some change in its policy as compared with the pre-war policy was the alteration in the balance of its international indebtedness, changing from being a net creditor on international account to the extent of the equivalent of $14 billion in 1939 to being, after the war, a net debtor to the extent of perhaps $9 billion. This result of the war, however, was by no means the only factor inducing British opinion to favour the type of policy described. Agriculture clearly does not want to have to compete with cheap imported food. British industry is worried over its costs and its ability to compete with American industry. Labour would like some guarantee of protection against the pressure of competition from abroad, and some assurance both of continuity of employment and the maintenance of the wage levels as achieved during the war. There is a widespread tendency in Britain to regard Canada and the United States as stiff competitors and poor customers, and to feel that the only way to deal with us is in the general manner described.

Mr. Towers said that if this type of opinion does gain the upper hand in the U.K. and is put into effect, the outlook can only be described as terrible. Immediately after the war the U.K. would start out with severe discrimination against Canada and the U.S. This would then appear to be the first fruits of the policies of Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid followed through the war. One can only imagine the disillusionment with which the people of the U.S. and Canada would view that development. The U.S., of course, can harm Britain greatly in retaliation if she is angered by this development. Should it result in general bad feeling, the political and economic consequences must be left to vivid imagination. For Canada the results would be particularly bad because of the great importance of her trade with Britain and the sterling area. Faced with this prospect, it would be very difficult for Canada herself to avoid having to discriminate against the U.S. in trade matters, and that, in turn, would be a most dangerous development. In order to overcome, so far as possible, this dangerous tendency, Mr. Towers thought that it was necessary to try to meet at least the reasons alleged by the U.K. to be those forcing her into this course of action.

The first of these alleged difficulties is the lack of dollar exchange and a reluctance to borrow, particularly to borrow beyond a limit that might force Britain into default. In order to meet this shortage of dollars without creating a risk of default, Mr. Towers suggested that we should consider offering to the U.K. a loan of $1 billion or $1¼ billions Canadian, which would be repayable at the rate of $50 million or $60 million a year, commencing after 10 years, with the proviso, however, that payment would be deferred during any year in which the British gold and U.S. dollar balances fell below an agreed minimum, unless the sterling area had a favourable balance of trade (or payments) with Canada. This loan would be expected to cover the period of transition immediately after the war while Britain was re-establishing her own export trade. If loans of this kind could be arranged with Canada and with the U.S., the U.K. could be assured of sufficient dollar exchange to meet her immediate requirements, and could also afford in future to follow an expansive trade policy without fear that in doing so she was endangering her financial position and exposing herself to the possibility of having to default on these loans. She would not need to default by reason of any shortage in her dollar position. If, on the other hand, we wished to obtain payment from the U.K., we could always do so, at least in theory, by increasing our imports and thereby providing the U.K. with the favourable balance of trade that would make the payment due and provide the currency with which to make it.

At this point there was a brief discussion, Mr. Howe noting that Keynes had said that he would not take a loan, Dr. Clark pointing out that Keynes' refusal had applied only to Stage 2, i.e., before the end of hostilities, and not to Stage 3, while Dr. Mackintosh noted that the British attitude was essentially that she would prefer to starve rather than be forced into default. Mr. Towers said that he had asked Keynes quite unofficially what the U.K. attitude toward such a loan was apt to be, and Keynes had indicated that it would probably be regarded as unacceptable because Canada and the U.S. would probably ask the U.K., as a quid pro quo, not to discriminate against imports from them.

Mr. Towers then went on to say that the U.K. would probably reject a loan of this kind linked to a condition of non-discrimination, because they would feel that they could not afford it when they had accumulated such huge debts to India, Egypt and the Crown Colonies in the form of abnormal sterling balances held by these areas. A policy of non-discrimination would mean that the U.K. would have to be prepared to sell dollars to India, who had plenty of sterling, in order to let India buy imports from the U.S. and Canada. In fact, the U.K. has been expecting that these huge sterling balances could only be used in the sterling area, and that they must discriminate against Canada and the U.S. as long as this mass of sterling is hanging over their heads. This situation had impelled Lord Keynes to wonder whether there was any way of dealing with these abnormal sterling balances in order that a more reasonable policy could be followed by the U.K.

Mr. Towers said that in the face of these difficulties, he wondered himself whether there could be a second type of measure, in addition to the loan he had suggested—a measure which would amount in effect to a recasting of the accounts for war expenditures in India and the Middle East. He wondered, for example, whether the U.S. could be persuaded to assume responsibility for, say, 25% of these abnormal accumulations of sterling balances, representing Britain's costs of the war in these parts of the sterling area. If so, it might be possible to make a deal with India, Egypt and the Colonies by which another 25%, say, of these balances would be written off. This would leave the U.K. with a liability for, say $6 billion instead of $12 billion, which is a much more manageable figure. With that degree of relief from its war indebtedness, the U.K. could reasonably run the risk of taking off the restrictions on trade between the sterling area and the dollar area. Mr. Towers went on to say that participation by the U.S. in an arrangement of this kind would only be possible, he thought, if some important political concessions by the U.K. were thrown in, something like a settlement with India on its political status, and other arrangements intended to meet some of the political problems remaining at the end of the war. He emphasized that if arrangements of this sort could substantially improve the economic and political outlook after the war, the expenditures involved on the part of the U.S., for example, would be small enough that the gain would far outweigh the cost. For example, the cost of taking over a quarter of these abnormal balances would only equal about two weeks' war expenditures by the U.S. As far as Canada was concerned, the importance of getting a satisfactory trade situation after the war was simply tremendous. If we are to have a sporting chance of maintaining full employment, we must have good export trade, at least in respect of our primary products. If we have poor exports, we shall certainly have great difficulty in securing full employment. We should, he thought, set an export goal of something like $2 billion, which is not extravagant in the light of our capacity and our goal of full employment. This would compare with export levels of $3½ billion now, and would be twice as much as the value of pre-war exports and perhaps a 50% increase in volume as compared with pre-war. As far as the financial cost to Canada is concerned, we are going to be faced with huge costs anyway if we do not develop proper export conditions. Costs of floor prices for farm products, for example, could represent a large part of the costs to which we would be put in joining in a proposition such as he had mentioned. The alternative is a very grim and forbidding one. It would mean that the end of hostilities would see only a shift from military warfare to economic warfare. Moreover, he pointed out, developments of this kind would also be bound to lead to more rapid socialization of the U.K. and Europe generally. It would be apt to leave the U.S. as the last great area of free enterprise, and this, in turn, was apt to exaggerate the political and economic differences created by the type of policies which had been described.

Mr. Towers went on to say that one might wonder whether he was being too pessimistic in describing this outlook, and he was inclined to think that way at times himself. Nevertheless in thinking back he realized that he had generally felt in 1928 and in 1930 that the views to which his analyses of the economic situation led him were too pessimistic and that things could not prove as bad as that. In the same way in the thirties he had been inclined to feel that somehow or other the outlook for the international situation could not be as bad as an objective appraisal of it seemed to suggest. In fact, however, during the last fifteen to thirty years, no pessimistic appreciation of the situation in advance had gone within miles of being too pessimistic. Events had, in fact, worked out so badly that real pessimism had been justified. Had we realized how bad the outlook was, action might have been taken to avoid some at least of the series of disasters, economic and political, that had been suffered, but always it had been the same story—"too little and too late." Therefore, he thought we should be thoroughly realistic in analyzing the present outlook and should not feel that a pessimistic conclusion is somehow unwarranted. If we did not take resolute action now to avoid the type of danger which he had described, he thought that in 1949, for example, the U.S. might say they wished that they had spent the money in 1946 necessary to enable international trade and international relations to be put on a sensible and non-discriminatory basis.

Following Mr. Towers' lengthy exposition there was some discussion on the proposals and on what immediate action might be feasible if it were decided that Canada should endeavour to avoid the danger which Mr. Towers had described. Mr. Ilsley asked Mr. Towers if he felt that Canada should take the initiative in seeing whether the U.S. would be willing to assume some of these costs which the U.K. had borne. Mr. Towers noted that some ideas of this kind had been talked about in the U.S. by a few; for example, Mr. Aldrich<sup>286</sup> of New York had made some proposals, but these suggestions had received relatively little attention. He said the U.K. had had absolutely no discussions with the U.S. on matters of this kind. He said he thought some of the people of the State Department had been thinking about these problems but he did not know for sure. He did not think Canada should institute formal discussions at this stage, but he felt it might be useful to have an informal chat with some of the people in the U.S. State Department. Mr. Ilsley asked if it would be wise to talk to Dr. White, of the U.S. Treasury, at this time as well, but Mr. Towers thought it would not be desirable at this stage, and Dr. Clark said that he thought Dr. White was too busy on the Bretton Woods measures to give much time to this. General McNaughton wondered whether the implication of Mr. Towers' outline was that the only foreign trade we could expect was that which we made possible by providing goods as Mutual Aid. Mr. Towers thought that this would not be the case, that beyond a once and for all contribution to help the U.K. tidy up its situation, the rest we should be able to provide on credit rather than Mutual Aid or its equivalent.

Dr. Clark then raised the issue of whether or not Canada should make any proposals or comments to the U.K. regarding the first of Mr. Towers suggestions, i.e., a credit during Stage 3 coupled with a vigorous expression of our opinion on the trend of U.K. thinking on post-war policy regarding trade and discrimination against Canada and the U.S. He felt that a proposal and comment of this kind might well smoke out true British opinions and might, indeed, serve the more constructive purpose of helping to influence the British policy toward multilateral trade. In the meantime, he thought it would be probably desirable to have informal talks with representatives of the U.S. State Department. He said he did not believe it was necessary to go on to consider Mr. Towers' second proposal regarding settlement of sterling balances as calling for immediate action. Mr. Robertson commented that all these proposals and questions were linked together. Mr. Bryce suggested that in addition it was probably necessary to bring in the question of the U.S. reducing its tariffs. Mr. Robertson said that would have to come up, and that there was more involved than just the avoidance of discrimination in trade. He thought the U.S. would wish to press for a multilateral convention on commercial policy, which would involve general tariff reductions. He thought the U.S. could hardly consider one without the other, and we have a substantial interest in seeing that both these aspects of commercial policy are dealt with.

Mr. St. Laurent asked some questions regarding the effects of a possible contribution to reduce the abnormal sterling balances, and Mr. Towers explained his suggestion a little further, particularly its implications in regard to trade. Mr. Robertson noted that this would probably make it possible for India and Egypt to spend some of their wartime accumulation of currency in Canada and the U.S. When Mr. St. Laurent asked what would likely happen to other areas of the world under the circumstances pictured by Mr. Towers, the latter stated that he thought there was bound to be a considerable fight for trade in South America, with Argentina inclined in the British direction. There would be a tug-of-war between the willingness of the U.S. to lend and the willingness of the U.K. to buy. Mr. St. Laurent noted that U.S. surpluses for export were relatively small in proportion to their total production, and therefore the U.S. was not so interested in developing good trading conditions as Canada was, and in regard to this Mr. Towers commented that as proportions, U.S. interest in trade was relatively less, but in absolute terms their exports were huge and the exports they hoped for were simply enormous. He said the people in Washington are now talking about exports of $10 or $15 billion a year—two or three times the figure for pre-war exports—and that they are speaking of having to finance $4 or $5 billion each year on credit, but that they were thinking only in terms of ordinary forms of lending and not worried about the ultimate problem of repayment. He said there was little doubt that the U.S. would be willing to lend enormous amounts of money. Mr. St. Laurent said that the alternatives to disposing of our goods abroad appeared to be to give, to lend, or to exchange for other goods. Of the three, he said the only really sensible course was to accept goods in exchange and use them. To this Mr. Towers replied that the only gift involved would be one initial transaction, that we would lend only to tide over the transition period and provide breathing space, and that buying foreign goods was the only long term solution. However, he noted that with a high national income we would buy a great deal but it would be largely from the U.S.

Mr. St. Laurent noted that there were many items in Canadian trade for which the U.K. is the only substantial market, and he felt that the importance of these must be recognized, particularly agricultural products. Mr. Master felt that one should not minimize the importance of Canadian exports of manufactured products, which had been quite substantial even before the war. Mr. Bryce suggested that much of Canada's pre-war manufactured exports to the sterling area appeared in danger because of developing sentiment for protection in other dominions. Mr. Robertson contended, on the other hand, that in regard to manufactured products, Canada had real opportunities because our ability to compete should be improved by our industrial development during the war, and if we have a reasonably large field made available to our foreign trade, we can hope to develop substantial exports of manufactured goods. There was a general expression of opinion that Canada's ability to compete in the production of manufactured goods had increased very greatly and would be relatively high after the war.

Mr. Ilsley brought the discussion back to the immediate problems by asking what bearing these considerations should have on policy for 1945-46. Mr. St. Laurent said that it suggests a fundamental difference in our whole attitude toward Mutual Aid. Under Mutual Aid the prime consideration has been strategic need and where implements and supplies for war are required, their provision has been considered the main point and whether a country could or could not pay has been considered secondary. Now these post-war considerations involve other issues. Mr. Robertson thought the emphasis might now have to be changed. Dr. Mackintosh thought it was desirable now to stress Mutual Aid as having two aspects: first, its primary purpose in making possible the most effective prosecution of the war through the provision of war supplies to those who need them most, regardless of ability to pay; and, secondly, its value in helping to effect the transition to post-war trade conditions, possibly being coupled with some commitments in regard to the policy that would be followed by countries receiving Mutual Aid during the period in which they are receiving it. He thought it would be desirable to make it clear publicly that Mutual Aid ends with the end of hostilities, and that credits would be the post-war solution to the type of problem to which Mutual Aid affords a wartime solution. Mr. St. Laurent wondered whether that was realistic, when in fact the U.K. can get along without Canada and the U.S. except for bilateral and balanced trade.

Mr. Robertson suggested that there was another hypothetical alternative to the system of bilateral trade which Mr. Towers had described, and that was a much closer relation between Canada and the U.S. He felt, however, that a solution along this track and, indeed, any solution that could be found if the U.K. persisted in the course which Mr. Towers had described, would take Canada outside the British preferential system and, indeed, outside the Commonwealth to all intents and purposes. He said he did not believe that Mr. Hudson and the other U.K. advocates of discrimination against Canada and the U.S. have realized the political strain which it would produce on the Commonwealth. He felt that those who are strong for the maintenance of the British Commonwealth have to put their weight behind the competitive solution to trade problems. Dr. Mackintosh agreed with this point of view and said he believed that the principle of trading with the sterling area was probably congenial to the British Prime Minister, but that a split with Canada would be most unwelcome to him. He thought neither he nor his advisers saw the way in which the former policy might lead to the latter result. Mr. Robertson noted that any split or disagreement with the U.S. would undoubtedly be most repugnant to Mr. Churchill. There was some discussion at this point concerning the group in the U.K. supporting a restrictionist trade policy, and it was noted that a group of younger Conservatives, including Mr. Hudson, were the prime movers, along with some of the older Conservatives such as Beaverbrook and Amery, and also some of the Labour Ministers, including Bevin.

Mr. Ilsley asked whether the meeting felt that Canada should attach some conditions to the provision of Mutual Aid this year—conditions respecting the policies which the U.K. should follow. Dr. Clark said he felt that was desirable, and that he could not conscientiously recommend Mutual Aid on the scale required if he believed that the U.K. was going to follow the type of policies that had been discussed. Mr. Robertson, on the other hand, said he thought such conditions were much more appropriately attached to measures taken or offers made in regard to post-war matters and not in regard to Mutual Aid during wartime. Dr. Clark then said he felt that at least Canada should express its view of the trend of opinion in the U.K. and point out what we felt the consequences would be to Canada and generally. He said he thought it would also be desirable to assure the U.K. that Canada would be prepared to play its part in providing credits on terms which we felt the U.K. could accept. He would urge upon the U.K. the necessity for some act of faith on their part to work out a solution to their problems in such a way as to make possible international trade on a multilateral basis. He doubted if it were wise to make any suggestions along the lines of Mr. Towers' second proposal. Mr. Robertson thought the first step might be to discuss the matter informally with the U.S. State Department. He thought the U.K. could agree to proposals coming jointly from the U.S. and Canada which they could not agree to if they came only from Canada. Dr. Mackintosh said he felt Canada could not ask the U.K. to give commitments regarding their policy after the war as a condition to providing Mutual Aid during the war. He thought that a quid pro quo in relation to post-war policy could only be attached to measures or offers concerning post-war matters. Mr. St. Laurent wondered if it were possible to put forward any suggestions or views to the U.K. without some idea of the U.S. attitude. He felt that in speaking to the U.S. it would be desirable to point out that if Britain adopts bilateral trade with Canada, it is apt to force Canada into bilateral trade or limitations on trade with the U.S., therefore the U.S. has a double interest in the question. Mr. Towers and Dr. Clark were both in favour of informal discussion with the U.S., but warned that it was quite unlikely any decision or commitment in regard to U.S. policy could be obtained.

Mr. Howe suggested that Dr. Clark, Mr. Towers and Dr. Mackintosh might get together and work out the form of a message which might be transmitted to the U.K. regarding these matters. Dr. Clark suggested that such message might be transmitted at the time that we inform the U.K. of the decision of the Canadian Government regarding Mutual Aid, and could be used as an indication of the basis on which Canada is working. Mr. Robertson suggested that he should speak to the Prime Minister regarding the question of having informal discussions with someone in the U.S. State Department. He thought that Clayton<sup>287</sup> was the proper man to approach there.

As the meeting concluded, there was a brief discussion over the magnitude of Mutual Aid requirements for next year and of the total budget that would be necessary. Mr. Ilsley wondered whether the Mutual Aid forecasts were not now too high, as it appeared the end of the war in Europe might be deferred until well beyond the beginning of the fiscal year. It was noted that this uncertainty was an important advantage of lumping Mutual Aid with other war requirements in getting an appropriation. Dr. Clark suggested that there was going to be a real problem in getting a budget down to a level below that of last year, and he felt the public would probably expect and demand a reduction, particularly as U.S. expenditures are being set 17% below those for the current year. General McNaughton said there was a reason for this, as the U.S. War and Navy Departments had continuing appropriations on which they could draw. Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Howe thought there was apt to be little criticism about the size of the budget and the size of expenditures in toto until the war was over. Dr. Clark thought that the Government might hear more of this matter from the public than previously. Mr. Robertson thought that the Government would have a good answer to any critics who felt their expenditures were too high.

MUTUAL AID; FINANCIAL RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED KINGDOM; COMMERCIAL POLICY

7. THE PRIME MINISTER, referring to earlier discussions of these questions, drew attention to increasing evidence of a tendency on the part of the United Kingdom to meet their grave financial problems by fostering the development of sterling area trade and restricting purchases from non-sterling countries.

<sup>287</sup>Secrétaire d'État adjoint des États-Unis.
Assistant Secretary of State of United States.

Such developments were of urgent significance to Canada from both the economic and political points of view. This trend of events and the growth of rival sterling and dollar areas would inevitably result in serious restrictions upon foreign trade which might easily bring about a severe depression in this country. It would, as well, react strongly upon Canada's relations with the Commonwealth and also upon the relations between the United Kingdom and the United States.

Officials of the Departments principally concerned had been giving a great deal of serious thought to this problem with a view to advising what steps might be taken by Canada to avoid the development of such a serious turn of events.

8. THE UNDER-SECRETARY OF STATE FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS submitted and read three draft communications to the United Kingdom, dealing with the continuation of Mutual Aid and with the general question of external trade policy.

These communications were to the following effect:

(1) The Canadian government were prepared to recommend the provision of Mutual Aid on the scale which had been requested by the United Kingdom until the end of the Japanese war, continuing the placing of contracts and making of other necessary commitments as required pending Parliamentary approval. During this period, the connection between Mutual Aid and the development of postwar commercial policy must become more apparent, since it would play its part in the improvement of the low wartime standard of living in the United Kingdom and the rehabilitation of U.K. export industries. Mutual Aid had been designed to avoid placing any burden upon postwar commerce or any imposition of trade restrictions and, in these circumstances, the Canadian government had become concerned over the development of a policy of discrimination against the purchase of Canadian products, in favour of the products of the sterling area.

Any deliberate policy by which dollars would be used to purchase only essential goods which could not be obtained within the sterling area would result in extensive diversion of trade from Canada, would be out of keeping with the purposes of Mutual Aid and must have severe political and economic effects upon the future of the Commonwealth. It would, in fact, create a new system of protection.

Discrimination against purchases in Canada was inappropriate and unnecessary. If, in a policy of non-discrimination, the requirements to be financed by Mutual Aid appeared likely to be greater than the Mutual Aid funds available, the Canadian government would be prepared to consult with the U.K. government and other authorities of the sterling area in order to meet the situation. The Canadian government urged the U.K. government to follow a general policy of non-discrimination between imports from Canada and the sterling area.

(2) In the period of transition following the defeat of Japan, positive constructive measures must be taken to avoid a narrow restrictive commercial policy. Hitherto, the special problems of the transition period had been recognized only in negative measures involving the postponement or suspension of the operation of certain long term agreed arrangements.

It would be impossible for the United Kingdom to re-establish her industry and trade position and her standard of living except through extensive imports. At the same time, Canada must maintain a high volume of exports during the same period and a large part of Canadian exports would be expected to go to the United Kingdom and the sterling area. It was realized that the U.K. government would be anxious to restrict its borrowing at this time to an amount within its capacity to pay. On the other hand, if the United Kingdom, in consequence, restricted its imports, it would hamper economic recovery both in the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

Loans of the conventional type would not be adequate to meet this situation and, accordingly, the Canadian government would be prepared to discuss ways and means of financing Canada's surplus of exports to the United Kingdom and the sterling area during the transition period. Dollars could be provided for expenditure in Canada by a long term credit, repayable by annual instalments some ten years after the end of the period. The terms of the credit would recognize that repayment would be dependent upon purchases from the United Kingdom and the sterling area; if sufficient foreign exchange for repayment were not available in any given year, for reasons beyond the control of the United Kingdom, payment would be postponed. An agreement of this sort would be designed to avoid any discrimination between the sterling area and the dollar areas as regards foreign trade.

Since it would be of the greatest importance if the United States were willing to enter into similar arrangements as well, Canada would be prepared to participate in either bilateral discussions with the United Kingdom or trilateral discussions including the United Kingdom and the United States.

(3) The third telegram to be addressed by the Prime Minister to Mr. Churchill emphasized the great importance and urgency attached to the views on trade policy set out in the other communications, and stressed the danger of the world breaking up into economic blocs, which must not only impede the achievement of a high level of world trade, but have very serious political consequences as well.

(Draft telegrams, External Affairs to Dominions Office, Feb. 13 and 14, 1945).†

9. THE MINISTER OF FINANCE pointed out that Mutual Aid requirements for the next fiscal year would probably amount to some $1300 million, of which $1150 to $1200 million would be required for the needs of the United Kingdom and the remainder of the sterling area.

10. THE WAR COMMITTEE, after further considerable discussion, approved for despatch the draft telegrams submitted, subject to minor amendment in the light of the discussion, and subject to the concurrence of the Minister of Justice.

Ottawa, February 23, 1945

SECRET 1. The Canadian Government has considered at length the substantial requirements in Canada of the United Kingdom during the fiscal year 1945-46 and the request of the United Kingdom Government to receive sufficient assistance in the form of Mutual Aid or its equivalent to enable these requirements to be obtained without the United Kingdom having to incur debt to Canada during that period. The Canadian government is prepared to recommend to the Canadian Parliament continuation for the time being of the provision for Mutual Aid on the scale which has been requested. Pending a Parliamentary appropriation for this purpose, which may be delayed if a general election precedes the next session of Parliament, the Canadian Government will continue to place contracts and make other commitments in order to maintain the flow of essential supplies from Canada during the early part of the next fiscal year, in the expectation that Parliament will approve the policy which it has been decided to recommend. Expenditures required for Mutual Aid or equivalent purposes which cannot be covered out of the existing appropriation before Parliament meets again will be provided during this period in the same manner as other expenditures for war purposes.

2. In communicating this decision, the Canadian Government feels it necessary to emphasize that Canadians have expected that Mutual Aid, together with similar arrangements extended by the United States, the United Kingdom and other nations, would make it possible to finance the transfer of war supplies between nations in such a manner as not "to burden post-war commerce or lead to the imposition of trade restrictions or otherwise prejudice a just and enduring peace," to use the words of the Mutual Aid Agreement between the United Kingdom and Canada.<sup>288</sup> It is in the belief that Mutual Aid is an essential contribution to these ends as well as to the winning of the war, and that through it and other forms of collaboration these purposes can be achieved, that the Canadian Government has reached the decision concerning the provision of Mutual Aid for the time being upon the scale proposed. Following the end of hostilities in Europe, the United Kingdom's shortage of Canadian dollars and need for Mutual Aid are expected to increase in size rather than diminish, and to a degree it will assume a somewhat different complexion. During this period Mutual Aid will contribute to the prosecution of the Japanese war on a scale which should make possible some improvement in the low wartime standard of living in the United Kingdom and a more rapid rehabilitation of United Kingdom export industries than would otherwise be possible. This draws renewed attention to the post-war implications of Mutual

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 3.

Aid, and links the policy of Mutual Aid directly to the development of commercial policy.

3. In these circumstances the Canadian Government must express its concern over the implications of the policy being followed by the sterling area in discriminating against the purchase of Canadian products and in favour of purchases within the sterling area. The reason for this policy during the initial period of the war, when conservation of dollar exchange was so vital to the United Kingdom, was understood. During recent years while Lend-Lease and Mutual Aid were being developed, this policy has been overshadowed by the limitations imposed by scarcities of shipping and supplies. As these limitations recede, following the end of hostilities in Europe, the policy of restricting purchases from Canada more severely than purchases from the sterling area and of providing dollars to other countries in the sterling area only if they are required for essential goods which cannot be obtained from the sterling area, is certain to result in many instances in which trade will be diverted from Canada to sterling area countries. If continued, this policy will undoubtedly set the pattern for the commercial policy of the post-war world. It is the evident direction of this policy, rather than the results of it up to date, which is disquieting. It is scarcely necessary to say that neither wartime collaboration nor nearly fifty years of preferential treatment of U.K. exports has prepared the Canadian public for such a development. It would be completely at variance with the intentions of the Canadian Parliament when it took the steps within its powers to halt the growth of intergovernmental debts. No Canadian Government could view it, economically and politically, save with the gravest concern for the future of the Commonwealth.

4. The limitation of sterling area purchases from Canada to essential goods which cannot be obtained anywhere in the sterling area, creating a new system of protection, will particularly as new capital investment is possible, give rise to vested interests in this diverted trade, which will frustrate attempts to develop under a code of commercial policy that wider area of world trade which is of equal concern to the United Kingdom and to Canada.

5. During the period in which Mutual Aid is in effect, Canada will be meeting by this means substantially all of the estimated requirements from Canada of the United Kingdom and sterling area as a whole, over and above what can be paid for out of sterling area receipts from Canada. Under conditions of wartime shortages of shipping and supplies, even with such alleviation as will be possible in Stage II, it is not anticipated that any large increase in Canadian exports to the sterling area would result from the termination of the policy of discrimination against imports from Canada. Moreover, it seems reasonable to assume that the United Kingdom, already burdened with such substantial sterling obligations, would not wish to increase these obligations by importing from the sterling area supplies which could not be justified as imports from Canada. Therefore it does not appear necessary for the United Kingdom and other sterling area countries to discriminate against imports from Canada in order to restrict total sterling area requirements from Canada to amounts which can be financed with the assistance of Mutual Aid on the scale which has been proposed. If in fact the change in policy led to a modest increase in total requirements beyond the amount which could be met from Mutual Aid together with current receipts from Canada, it does not seem unreasonable to expect the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area to finance such a relatively small excess from their own resources, in view of the magnitude of Mutual Aid being provided by Canada. If the excess threatened to grow to a size that would be unmanageable, the Canadian Government would be prepared to consult with the Government of the United Kingdom and other authorities in the sterling area regarding measures that might be taken to meet the situation. The United Kingdom Government may also be assured of the cooperation of the Canadian authorities in ensuring that the most effective use is made of Canadian funds available for meeting requirements of the United Kingdom and other parts of the sterling area.

6. Accordingly, the Canadian Government feels that a general policy of discrimination against purchasing in Canada, on the part of the United Kingdom and other countries in the sterling area, is unnecessary and inappropriate. Such a policy is inconsistent with the spirit of Mutual Aid and, if persisted in, will make it increasingly difficult for the Canadian Government to maintain the provision of Mutual Aid. Therefore the Canadian government urges the United Kingdom Government to follow a general policy during the period in which Mutual Aid is in effect of non-discrimination as between imports from Canada and from the sterling area. It is the view of the Canadian Government that this policy should apply in respect of imports purchased by individuals or authorities in other parts of the sterling area as well as in the United Kingdom. It is also felt that if the United Kingdom Government or the appropriate authority in any other part of the sterling area should consider it might be in its own interest to discriminate against public or private purchasing in Canada for exchange reasons, the Government of Canada should be consulted before action is taken.

7. It is desired to take this opportunity to express appreciation of the way in which the United Kingdom has endeavoured to maintain its exports to Canada during the war period, despite all the difficulties that have arisen. The Canadian Government, on its side, has greatly reduced and in some cases completely removed tariffs on United Kingdom goods entering Canada, in order to facilitate these exports, and has in many cases paid subsidies to enable essential goods to be brought into Canada and sold at ceiling prices. Further means of facilitating increased imports from the United Kingdom, both immediately and after the war, are under study by Canadian Government Departments. Action along these lines, and even the retention of the lower tariffs already temporarily in effect, will be made difficult if Canadian exports are being excluded from the United Kingdom market.

8. While this message has been centred primarily upon policies to be followed before the end of hostilities, it has been intended to make evident the Canadian Government's concern over the apparent trend of developments bearing upon post-war commercial policy, particularly in the so-called transition period. A second message dealing specifically with this question of commercial policy and related financial measures in the transition period is being sent forward today.

TELEGRAM

Ottawa, February 23, 1945

SECRET. Reference my immediately preceding telegram.

1. The Canadian Government and people have taken a very keen interest in the series of international conferences which have been held over the past several years with reference to post-war economic, financial and commercial cooperation among the nations of the world. These discussions and the specific agreements which it is hoped will grow out of them are of vital concern to Canada, which depends so largely upon export industries to provide domestic employment and upon imports to maintain a high standard of living. In addition to our own particular interest, we are convinced that no nation in the post-war world will be able to achieve full employment, at any rate on any but a very low standard of living, unless international agreement can be reached on measures to achieve the freest possible flow of world trade, and the most efficient development and use of the world's resources.

2. In these discussions and in the text of such agreements as have so far been reached, the special problems of the transition period immediately after the end of hostilities are recognized, at least to the extent of postponing or suspending the operation of certain clauses until rehabilitation and reconstruction have been largely achieved. The Canadian Government feel that this negative attitude to the international problems of the transition period is insufficient, and that positive constructive measures must be taken in order that the countries most directly concerned may surmount the special difficulties of this period as quickly as possible. We believe it is of the utmost importance that such difficulties should not be permitted to result in a narrow, restrictive commercial policy which would, both in the immediate post-war years and for an indefinite period thereafter, frustrate the attempt to re-establish international trade under freer conditions and in larger volume than before the war. We realize that the basic reason for any such undesirable development would be financial necessity, and in the course of this communication we shall develop certain proposals designed to overcome the financial difficulty, at least as regards trade between Canada and the sterling area.

3. It is clear that to restore her industry and re-establish her position as a great trading nation, as well as to raise the standard of living of her people substantially above the level to which it has been reduced in wartime, will be impossible for the United Kingdom except with the assistance of a very high volume of imports during the immediate post-war years. Conversely, Canada would be faced with extraordinary problems of readjustment and reduced activity if she were not able to maintain a high volume of exports during this period. A large portion of such exports would be expected to go to the United Kingdom and other parts of the sterling area. We realize, however, that the United Kingdom will not be able to pay for all of such imports during the period when her exports have not fully recovered from wartime restrictions and dislocations, except through the medium of international loans. Even for the bare minimum of the most essential requirements, the United Kingdom will have during this period an adverse balance of trade and a deficiency of current supplies of foreign exchange with which to pay exporters in other countries. Consideration of the amount of credit which will be required and of the nature and terms of repayment seems to us to stand in the forefront of the whole problem of the transition period.

4. The Canadian Government realize that the United Kingdom Government will be anxious to restrict its overseas borrowing after the war to an amount within its capacity to pay, but it would be most undesirable for all concerned if this were taken to mean that the United Kingdom had to confine itself strictly to an "austerity" level of imports at a time when it is quite possible that abundant surplus supplies of food, raw materials and manufactured goods will be available from North America and other exporting areas. Such an approach would unnecessarily hamper economic recovery in the United Kingdom and contribute to economic disorder throughout the world. Nor would it be desirable for the United Kingdom Government to seek merely to obtain loans of the conventional type with rigid repayment features under which, in adverse circumstances, technical default might occur for reasons entirely beyond the control of the United Kingdom. Loans of this character, presumably restricted to comparatively small amounts, would not meet the real needs of the transition period. On the other hand much larger loans, adequate to facilitate a more rapid and successful revival and expansion of peacetime trade and employment would be well within the ultimate capacity of the United Kingdom to repay, if the terms of repayment were sufficiently realistic and flexible, and recognized the dependence of such international debt payments upon conditions of expanding world trade and ample markets for United Kingdom exports. Loans of this character, indeed, would themselves aid in creating the very conditions upon which their ultimate liquidation depends, and by encouraging an expansive attitude to international trade both in the transition period and subsequently, would strengthen borrower and lender alike and assist in the attainment of high employment and in the development of liberal commercial policy throughout the world.

5. In pursuance of these objectives the Canadian Government would be prepared to discuss ways and means of financing Canada's prospective surplus of exports to the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area over its imports from that area during the transition period immediately following the termination of hostilities against Germany and Japan, in such manner as to encourage the largest possible flow of trade in both directions and remove any necessity for discrimination against the goods of either area in the markets of the other.

Under the plans we have in mind, Canadian dollars would be provided to the sterling area for expenditure in Canada over a period of several years, by a long-term credit which would be repayable by annual instalments commencing, say, 10 years after the termination of the transition period. The terms of the credit would recognize that such repayment in Canadian dollars, or in gold or United States dollars in lieu of Canadian dollars, depends upon the making of purchases of goods and services from the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area by Canada and other countries outside the sterling area. If in any year sufficient foreign exchange for debt repayment were not available to the United Kingdom from such sources and from its reserves of gold and dollars over and above its minimum requirements for working balances and reserve for emergencies, such inability to pay for reasons beyond the control of the United Kingdom would automatically cause the payment due in that year to be postponed, without the United Kingdom being considered in any way in default, until such time as payment could be effected in the manner contemplated.

6. The adoption of such terms of repayment of the proposed credit would, we feel, constitute a realistic approach to an otherwise difficult situation, and would base the financial arrangements on those conditions of world trade in general, and of trade between the sterling area and Canada in particular, upon which they necessarily and in fact depend. We believe that agreement on these matters could readily be reached so as to put our post-war commercial relations on a firm and satisfactory basis, and so as to remove any need for the United Kingdom or other parts of the sterling area to feel that they have to discriminate against imports from Canada in favour of imports from within the sterling area itself, or from any other part of the world. Similarly, Canada would expect to obtain imports from the United Kingdom and the sterling area on a non-discriminatory basis, and in increasing volume as supplies in such countries became available in the course of rehabilitation of their export industries.

7. We should like to commence discussions directly with you at an early date. In addition, however, we realize that it would be of the greatest importance to our own two countries and to the world as a whole if the United States were willing to enter into arrangements of a more or less similar character, and we should be glad to collaborate on this wider basis in the event of discussions to this end being held between the Governments of the United Kingdom and the United States.

Following from the Prime Minister for your Prime Minister. Begins:

1. I should like you to know that I attach very great importance to the views on trade policy set forth in our telegrams No. 45 and No. 46 of this date.

2. The important initiative which was taken by your Government in proposing commercial policy discussions in 1943<sup>289</sup> has not yet produced results which we regard as encouraging. With the passage of time, the objectives have tended to become more limited and the target date for their implementation deferred. I feel that unless some way is found of giving these discussions a new and constructive turn, we shall move into types of trade agreements after the war which are based exclusively on short-run considerations of expediency or necessity and which store up economic trouble for the future.

3. The main danger I have in mind is the breaking up of the world into economic blocs which trade more or less freely among themselves but discriminate against outsiders. My colleagues and I have been greatly disturbed by what appears to us to be a hardening of influential opinion in the United Kingdom against British participation in a cooperative effort to remove obstacles to expanding world trade generally, and in favour of bilateral deals and a form of sterling area isolationism.

4. I know that the international financial position of the United Kingdom has been seriously impaired as a result of the war and that countries in the position of Canada and the United States would not be justified in complaining at discrimination if they were unwilling to aid in the solution of your temporary payments difficulties. If, however, these problems were dealt with through concerted action along bold and imaginative lines, the path would be cleared for real progress in the general field of commercial policy. On the other hand, I am certain that restrictive measures adopted immediately after the war would set the pattern for the foreseeable future.

5. Our own economic interest is, of course, vitally involved in a high level of world trade on a non-discriminatory basis. I am, however, equally concerned at the political consequences, particularly on relations between the United Kingdom on the one hand and Canada and the United States on the other, of developments along the lines indicated in paragraph 2. More precisely, I feel certain that if the United Kingdom and the rest of the sterling area went in for a policy of discrimination against imports from North America immediately after the war without this course being absolutely inescapable, the general reaction in North America would be one of bitter recrimination and disillusionment. The atmosphere would undoubtedly strengthen the hands of those who are opposed to whole-hearted participation in world affairs.

6. I have no doubt that political developments of this character are precisely those which you would most wish to avoid. My main object in cabling is to let you know that in my view we are drifting in this direction and that there is need of positive action at a high level and at an early date if the situation is not to deteriorate beyond repair. Ends.

SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for Robertson from Hudd, Begins: With reference to Canada to Dominions Office telegrams No. 45 and No. 46 regarding Commercial Policy.

I thought you would be interested to know I have learned informally that these proposals have created an excellent impression at the official level and are warmly welcomed. They are regarded as realistic, constructive, imaginative and generous. I am not able to give you any indication of reactions at the Ministerial level or in other interested quarters. Ends.

TOP SECRET AND PERSONAL. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins:

1. I am very grateful to you for your telegrams Nos. 45, 46 and 47 whose helpful and constructive proposals are receiving the closest study.

2. Naturally with so many military and political questions requiring urgent decision I find it difficult to devote as much time as I should like to the problems of post-war commercial policy. Our officials have, however, been giving continuous study to these matters and we shall shortly be sending you some of the results. I shall do everything in my power to ensure that progress on these important matters is not unduly delayed. I can certainly assure you now that we, for our part, shall give the fullest weight to Canada's wishes and interests and will make every effort to come to an arrangement satisfactory to your country which has contributed so much to the common cause.

3. We are particularly grateful for your financial proposals which are most generous and a promising starting point for our future discussions. I cannot, of course, say anything definite without the fullest consultation with the Chancellor who is not in London at the moment. But I can assure you that I am most sensible of the generous and friendly spirit which inspires your suggestion.

4. Meanwhile I should like to say at once what a comfort it is to have your decision to see us through on Stage II. Canada has been a tower of strength to us throughout, but this does not lessen my gratitude for this fresh example of the helpful spirit in which you face the common problem. Ends.

TELEGRAM 56

London, March 21, 1945

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Your telegram No. 45. We are very glad to know that the Canadian Government has considered our request for assistance in the form of Mutual Aid or otherwise, sufficient to enable our requirements in Canada during the fiscal year 1945/1946 to be met without our having to incur debt to Canada during that period, and that the Canadian Government is prepared to recommend to Parliament continuation, for the time being, of provision for Mutual Aid on the scale requested.

2. We warmly welcome this decision of the Canadian Government, which will assure the continuation of the wartime principle of pooling of resources which has contributed so greatly to the common interests of the United Nations.

3. It will be remembered that, during the discussions which Lord Keynes and Sir R. Sinclair had with Canadian Ministers last November, the general question was raised whether the existing system of Mutual Aid should be continued into 1945-1946, or whether some other system, e.g., one of financial pooling, should be substituted for it. We should be glad to know what are the present views of the Canadian Government on this question.

4. We also greatly welcome the Canadian Government's declaration of its willingness to make interim arrangements, in the event that the necessary Parliamentary approval is delayed, to ensure that the flow of essential supplies from Canada during the early part of the coming fiscal year is not interrupted. We assume that on the strength of this decision United Kingdom Supply Departments can be authorized to proceed with the placing of such orders in Canada as are currently necessary. If any departure were required from the general lines of the programmes discussed with the Canadian Government last autumn, the consequential changes would be introduced only after prior consultation between our Supply Departments and Department of Munitions and Supply.

5. Apart from the foregoing questions of general principle, there are certain particular questions outstanding which concern the current financial arrangements between the two countries, e.g., the arrangements regarding cancellation of contracts and those for financing Indian orders for rolling stock.<sup>290</sup> It would be very helpful to us if an early decision could be reached on these questions.

6. We suggest that all the questions referred to in this telegram, which may be described as falling within the sphere of current Mutual Aid administration, can best be discussed in Ottawa between the appropriate Canadian Ministers and Departments on the one hand and the United Kingdom High Commissioner and his staff on the other. We should, of course, be ready to send out representatives as necessary to assist in such discussions.

7. My immediately following telegram sets out our preliminary views in reply to the wider questions raised in your telegrams Nos. 45 and 46.

London, March 21, 1945

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Your telegrams Nos. 45 and 46. We are grateful to the Canadian Government for their initiative in setting out so frankly the considerations which are causing them concern about the future trend of economic relations between Canada and the sterling area, and in putting forward proposals for meeting the problems with which we shall be confronted at the end of the war. As your telegrams recognize, these important issues must be viewed, not only against the hard facts of our own external position as it will emerge at the end of the war, but also in the light of our future economic relations with the United States of America. The whole problem has a political as well as an economic side. No easy solution can be looked for, and, in the unprecedented circumstances which confront us, we can only feel our way gradually as conditions permit in making plans for economic recovery, both for ourselves and for the rest of the world.

2. We are pressing forward with the consideration of those matters as rapidly as the state of the war permits, but we can only proceed by stages from the full application of the present measures of wartime control to the long term objective of freeing trade from the restrictions which such controls involve. These controls have been imposed as an unavoidable part of the concentration of all available resources on the war effort, and, so far as the trade between ourselves and Canada is concerned, it is, we think, true to say that they have always been operated in full consultation and agreement with the Canadian Government. Indeed, it has been our common aim during the currency of Mutual Aid to regulate the demands made upon Canada in such a way as to achieve the maximum economy in the use of the Canadian dollars which are thus made available to us. We share the Canadian Government's anxiety that these wartime controls should not outlive the necessities which gave rise to them and we look forward to co-operating with Canada in establishing conditions which would permit of their removal as soon as possible. In the process of change, we shall do all that lies in our power to make these controls tolerable and free from permanently harmful effects, both in day to day administrative working and in the gradual evolution of the principles underlying them.

3. We gratefully welcome your suggestion for the opening of discussions between our two Governments as to the best method of such co-operation. The questions involved, vitally important as they are to our two countries, are, of course, part of much wider questions affecting the whole future of international economic relations, particularly with the United States, and until further progress has been made in this field we shall be in some difficulty in carrying discussions to a definitive stage. But early discussions between us would be valuable and these, we suggest, might best be started on an informal and exploratory basis. There would be great advantage if some of the Canadian officials chiefly concerned could visit London in the near future for this purpose. It has occurred to us that this might be combined with the forthcoming visit of Mr. Hume Wrong to London for the talks preparatory to the San Francisco Conference. We would warmly welcome such an arrangement and we should be glad to know whether this suggestion would commend itself to your Government.

4. If such a visit can be arranged, we should hope to take advantage of it, not only for an informal exchange of views as to the immediate problems between us, but to consider possible ways of removing by administrative action particular difficulties which may arise. No less than the Canadian Government we are anxious that future trade relations between our two countries shall not be prejudiced by the policies adopted to meet wartime exigencies and even though it may not yet be possible to take the fundamental decisions which will determine the pattern of post-war trade, mutual consultation should be very helpful in ensuring that those decisions are not compromised by what is currently taking place.

Ottawa, April 27, 1945

Dear Mr. Munro,

You will recall that there have been numerous discussions over the past year regarding the means of accounting for and settling for supplies which the United Kingdom has received on Mutual Aid and which are diverted or transferred by the United Kingdom to other countries. The general policy in regard to these diversions or transfers has recently been considered by the Mutual Aid Board and they have asked me to inform you of their views. I believe Mr. Bryce has already indicated orally to you the general nature of the proposed arrangements. Decisions on this matter were delayed for a long period while the negotiations were proceeding about the financing of Military Relief supplies.

You will recall that one of the chief difficulties to be faced in applying any policy respecting the transfer or diversion of Mutual Aid supplies provided to the United Kingdom arose from the difficulty of determining whether individual shipments in question had been obtained by the United Kingdom as Mutual Aid or had been paid for by the United Kingdom in Canada. In framing the policy now approved by the Mutual Aid Board, we have endeavoured to take these difficulties of application into account, and I think it should prove workable both from your side and from ours.

It has been our understanding that the United Kingdom authorities concerned would notify us of all transfers to other countries of supplies which could be clearly identified as having been received from Canada as Mutual Aid, and would, wherever possible, seek the consent of the Canadian authorities before making such transfers. Our Mutual Aid agreement, of course, provides that Mutual Aid supplies will not be sold to any other Government or to persons in other countries without the consent of the Canadian Government. It has also been our understanding that the United Kingdom authorities would inform us of any sales outside the sterling area of supplies obtained by the Government of the United Kingdom from Canada, whether as Mutual Aid or otherwise. We would also wish to be informed now of any transfers by the Government of the United Kingdom to another Government or to persons outside the United Kingdom, of supplies which, by reason of their nature and the time of their procurement, might possibly have been supplied by Canada as Mutual Aid, although their actual origin and means of financing cannot be identified.

The first and most substantial point of principle approved by the Board is one with which I believe your authorities are already familiar and which has in fact been applied in certain instances. It is that the United Kingdom should notify the Canadian Government of all sales to countries outside the sterling area of supplies received from Canada by the United Kingdom, whether those supplies were received as Mutual Aid or purchased, and that the Bank of England should sell to the Bank of Canada foreign exchange convertible into gold equivalent in value to the Canadian cost of the goods so sold. If the United Kingdom receives only part payment in foreign exchange convertible into gold, then the amount of such foreign exchange sold to Canada shall be a proportionate part of the Canadian cost of the goods so transferred. It will be understood that the United Kingdom will utilize the Canadian dollars obtained from the sale of this foreign exchange to Canada to meet the cost of her essential requirements in Canada, thereby reducing the amount remaining to be financed on Mutual Aid.

The United Kingdom has recently, I understand, adopted the policy of making some sales of Canadian supplies to European countries, notably France, against payment in Canadian dollars, at least to the extent of the Canadian content of the supplies in question. Where Canadian dollars are obtained in this way from countries (such as France, Belgium and The Netherlands) which have made arrangements with Canada to make payment in Canadian dollars from official accounts for goods purchased in Canada, the Canadian Government will not expect any sale of foreign exchange to Canada in accordance with the principle outlined above, but would expect the United Kingdom to use the Canadian dollars obtained from such countries to meet her current requirements in Canada. I may say that we would prefer the United Kingdom to obtain foreign exchange convertible into gold from countries outside the sterling area when selling them supplies received by the United Kingdom Government from Canada, if the United Kingdom is able to make such arrangements. We assume that sales by the United Kingdom to France under the recently concluded Anglo-French monetary agreement will result in the United Kingdom receiving exchange convertible into gold to the extent of one-third of the value involved, and we therefore assume that this fraction will be applicable in respect of further sales to France of supplies obtained by the United Kingdom Government from Canada.

The second main principle which the Mutual Aid Board has approved—or possibly I should say group of principles—relates to supplies which can be identified as having been provided as Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom. Transfers of such supplies should be notified to Canada as promptly as possible, and Canadian consent should be secured for them. It is proposed to make adjustments in respect of such transfers on the following basis:

(a) When such identified Mutual Aid supplies are transferred to another country receiving Mutual Aid from Canada and eligible to receive these particular supplies as Mutual Aid, the charge for the items will be changed from the United Kingdom to the other country concerned on the Canadian Mutual Aid Board records, and the country ultimately receiving the goods will be regarded as having received them from Canada on Mutual Aid. It is proposed to notify the recipient country of such a change in order that it may acknowledge receipt of the supplies as Mutual Aid and treat the transaction accordingly. In certain cases there may be supplies which had been intended for the United Kingdom as Mutual Aid but which have been diverted or transferred to another country which is receiving Mutual Aid from Canada but not receiving supplies of this particular type as Mutual Aid. This may arise because it is the policy of the Mutual Aid Board to restrict the provision of Mutual Aid in certain areas to items of direct military or naval use. In this case the Canadian Government will expect the country receiving the goods to pay Canada directly for the supplies so received.

(b) In cases where such identified Mutual Aid supplies are transferred by the United Kingdom free of charge to a country not receiving Mutual Aid from Canada, no settlement will be asked from the United Kingdom in respect of such items and no change will be made in the published records of the Mutual Aid Board as long as the Canadian Government is prepared to agree to the transfer. In this type of case, the United Kingdom will therefore be regarded as having received the supplies and used them in the prosecution of the war, in accordance with our Mutual Aid agreement. In this type of case particularly, however, the Canadian authorities would wish their consent to be obtained before such transfers are made. If the Mutual Aid Board is unable to consent to any such free transfers of Mutual Aid supplies in accordance with this paragraph and the transfers have already been effected, it will ask the United Kingdom to pay for such supplies in Canadian dollars. The Mutual Aid Board desires to reserve its position for the time being in respect of transfers of supplies by the United Kingdom to the United States under reverse Lend-Lease, and I shall be communicating with you later about this matter.

(c) When such identified Mutual Aid supplies are sold to another Government or to some authority or persons outside the United Kingdom, the U.K. Government will be asked to consent to have the cost of such supplies charged to the United Kingdom Cash Receipts Account and the charge to the Mutual Aid Appropriation will be reversed. This change in charge will not, of course, be a net cost to the United Kingdom Government in the event that other supplies are provided on Mutual Aid because the Canadian dollars of the United Kingdom are required for this purpose, but the transaction will serve to keep the records of actual Mutual Aid transfers correct. If the supplies have been sold outside the sterling area, the United Kingdom will in effect be paying the Mutual Aid Board for them in foreign exchange convertible into gold in the proportion that such foreign exchange is received by the United Kingdom itself. In this connection I might say that the Board also wishes to reserve its position for the time being in regard to sales of supplies by the United Kingdom to the Union of South Africa, and I would hope to discuss this matter with you at a later date.

There remain those transfers of supplies which cannot be definitely identified as having been received by the United Kingdom as Mutual Aid but which may have been purchased by the United Kingdom in Canada or elsewhere, in view of their nature and the time of their procurement. The Mutual Aid Board are prepared to regard these transfers as being made from supplies obtained by the United Kingdom from sources other than Mutual Aid, where this may have been the case. The United Kingdom Government is asked, however, to inform the Canadian Government of transfers to other countries of goods of the same type as those which have been obtained on Mutual Aid and where the presumption outlined in this paragraph will be taken to apply. If the amount transferred is so large that it could not all be attributed to sources other than Mutual Aid, the excess will be treated as having been received as Mutual Aid and dealt with in accordance with the paragraphs above.

The foregoing paragraphs are not intended to apply to transfers for Military Relief purposes or transfers to UNRRA. It has been agreed that Military Relief transfers will be handled on a somewhat different basis. It is desired to give further consideration to any transfers of Canadian supplies which the United Kingdom may make to UNRRA, and it is felt that the officials of UNRRA should be consulted before any agreement is reached in respect of such transfers. So far as we know, there have been no important transfers of Canadian supplies to UNRRA by the United Kingdom.

The Mutual Aid Board would like it to be understood that the United Kingdom will not request as Mutual Aid supplies which it intends to transfer to other countries except by agreement in advance with the Board. Consequently, it is expected that the only transfers in the future that would fail to be dealt with along the lines outlined above will be those to which Canadian consent is obtained in advance, or those which are necessitated by developments after the United Kingdom has placed its requisitions with the Canadian procurement agencies.

I would be glad to arrange discussions with yourself or other United Kingdom representatives in regard to the application of the principles outlined above, particularly in special circumstances. I shall also be writing you again regarding those transfers or diversions of which you have already informed us.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

TOP SECRET

MINUTES OF CONVERSATIONS HELD IN KING'S COLLEGE, CAMBRIDGE, FROM SATURDAY, MAY 19TH TO MONDAY, MAY 21ST, BETWEEN THE CANADIAN FINANCIAL DELEGATION AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED KINGDOM TREASURY<sup>296</sup>

1. Secrecy

Lord Keynes, opening the discussion, stressed that the proposals he would later put forward should be treated with the strictest secrecy. They had been fully considered by the Treasury and by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but they were only now being circulated to the Cabinet and had not yet been placed before other Ministers or Departments. As would become apparent, they involved an approach to the United States, and the Treasury was anxious that there should be no leakage, so that they could retain the initiative in choosing the proper time and method of broaching their suggestions to the United States Government.

2. Approach to the United States

The Treasury believed that the matter should first be taken up at the highest political level, probably between Mr. Churchill and the President. One difficulty was that it seemed likely that after San Francisco and after Congress had finally dealt with the Bretton Woods Agreement,<sup>297</sup> there would be changes in the administration. Reports from Washington led him to believe that both Mr. Stettinius and Mr. Morgenthau might be replaced. But there was no clear indication as to who would replace them or as to where the real centre of power would be. He thought it would be unwise to begin financial negotiations until these changes had been made. On the other hand, there was a possibility that the Japanese war might end more rapidly than had been expected so that the approach could not be put off indefinitely. September might possibly be about the proper time. The Treasury would be grateful for any advice the Canadian Delegation felt like giving them about either the timing or method of approach.

3. Alternative Policies for the United Kingdom

The members of the Canadian Delegation were Frederick Hudd, W. A. Mackintosh, Graham Towers and Hector McKinnon, Chairman, Tariff Board and member, Wartime Prices and Trade Board.

See Canada, Treaty Series, 1944, No. 37.

Lord Keynes said that there were three possible policies open to the United Kingdom, which he had dubbed Starvation Corner, Temptation and Justice.

(a) By Starvation Corner, he meant a policy which aimed at a maximum degree of self-sufficiency. Some extremists wanted this permanently as something good in itself, while others, more moderate, felt that the United Kingdom might easily be forced into a policy of this kind as a defensive measure, if it proved impossible to make satisfactory arrangements with the rest of the world, and particularly with the United States.

(b) Temptation was the policy of least resistance. At least at first, it might prove a very agreeable path since it would mean that the United Kingdom would live comparatively easily and could comply with the wishes of the United States. This policy would be based on borrowing on easy terms; and it seemed likely that the United States would be only too accommodating in this matter. However, the day of reckoning would come and when it did the upshot for the United Kingdom might easily be bankruptcy.

(c) The third course, which he called Justice, would demand more imagination and initiative. The United Kingdom would have to try, so far as possible, to liquidate the financial consequences of the war and to take her part in freeing trade throughout the world on conditions, however, that would allow her to exist and remain solvent.

4. Treasury Policy

The Treasury had made up its mind that it was in favour of the third course—of Justice. The Chancellor wanted to get over to a multi-lateral system as quickly as possible. Opinion in the Treasury had rather been shifting and now it was thought that so long a transitional period as that contemplated at Bretton Woods would be inadvisable. They now hoped that the period would not be longer than one year and they were pursuing policies aimed at making such a short transitional period possible. They wanted to reduce the length of twilight to a minimum. It should also be understood that the Treasury had turned its face against Starvation Corner and towards a multi-lateral system as a matter of principle and because they recognized the reality of the dangers that any other course of action would involve. It was not true to believe that the United Kingdom could be brought to support a multi-lateral system only by being bribed and cajoled. They knew that fundamentally it was in their own interests. Starvation would

(a) make impossible a policy of full employment, and

(b) destroy beyond repair the international position of the United Kingdom. (You cannot be an international banker if you keep too many strings on your customers' cheques, Lord Keynes admitted.) Although the Treasury had made up its mind as to the policy it wanted, there were, of course, other forces in the country which were capable at least of fighting delaying actions. However, they were not in authority in any of the political parties and Lord Keynes did not think that they could ultimately influence a decision. Most Ministers and all Departments, he thought, were in agreement with the policy the Treasury had adopted.

5. American Opinion

A comparatively small number of people in Washington could be relied on as their friends, and an equally small number as their inveterate enemies. In between, lay 95% of those with influence who had no dogmatic convictions one way or the other, and who would be influenced by the way in which the proposals were put up to them. In their experience, however, their friends tended to be rather timid and if substantial opposition developed these candid but timid friends would urge them along a line of least resistance. It was, therefore, unwise to appear in the United States not to have any strong convictions. A firm policy skillfully presented by the United Kingdom, he thought, would overcome any opposition that might arise.

6. Successes

In a comprehensive survey of United Kingdom finance during the war, Lord Keynes first considered those areas of financial policy where he thought the United Kingdom had had notable success.

(a) By a mixture of cunning and kindness, they had kept their debt to countries outside the sterling area down to almost negligible proportions. The only indebtedness they had incurred to the United States was the Jesse Jones Loan which was, however, almost self-liquidating. There was also the Canadian dollar loan; but this was covered by securities. From Portugal also they had had a small loan which was to be repaid in five years in gold; they were hopeful, however, of making some favourable adjustments in this agreement. On current account, there were balances standing in the favour of Sweden, Switzerland and Persia.

(b) They had been able substantially to replenish the liquid dollar reserve. In 1938, this had stood at £1,000,000,000, but owing to the fear of war, by September 1939, it had been reduced to £600,000,000 and by the time America adopted Lend-Lease it had been dissipated entirely. It was recognized that such a situation was unfortunate not only for the United Kingdom, but also for the United States and gradually the position had been somewhat recovered. This had been done by two methods:

(1) by repatriating South African securities held by United Kingdom residents against South African gold.

(2) by the personal expenditures of American troops in the United Kingdom and other countries inside the sterling area. The United States had sometimes been disposed to chip Lend-Lease against these expenditures, but it was now fairly well realized in Washington that such a policy would mean essentially that United Kingdom taxpayers would be paying for the frolics of American soldiers in Piccadilly.

At the present time, their liquid dollar reserves stand at $425,000,000 net. At one time, the United States had put a ceiling, beyond which these balances were not to be allowed to climb, but it had never been rigidly enforced and it was formally removed in the Fall of 1944. A report was made each month on these balances to the Treasury and now a request had come from Washington that they should also be communicated to Congress. It was highly difficult to make a report of this kind in such a way as to ensure that the relation of the dollar balance to other items in the financial position of the United Kingdom was apparent. The Treasury was now considering how this could best be done. They might not be able to continue their success in increasing their dollar reserve since many American soldiers would soon be returning to the United States. On the other hand, there was a possibility of obtaining $155,000,000 in gold from France.

(c) They had made a number of very useful financial agreements with European countries, particularly Belgium, Sweden, Luxembourg, and France.

(d) They had contrived to handle their dealings inside the sterling area in such a way that very little friction had resulted. The countries in the sterling area, by and large, were satisfied that they had been treated fairly; and this had been a very considerable achievement. It was realized, however, that it would be increasingly difficult to operate the sterling area with such success in the immediate future, since peacetime conditions would more and more make people impatient with controls generally.

(e) Lord Keynes thought that they could be well satisfied with their stabilization policy. There had been the following increases over September 1939:

Rate of wages .....	43%
Earnings .....	86%
Cost of living .....	35%
Prices .....	50%
Cost of imports .....	90%
Cost of exports .....	100%

In the United Kingdom, the average hourly wage in industry stood at 2/-, while in the United States it stood at 5/-. This difference was one of the most convincing arguments against devaluation. If United Kingdom manufacturers could not compete with American businesses with an hourly wage of 2/-, they would no more be able to if the hourly wage was 1/9.

7. Failures

Lord Keynes now turned to those areas of finance where the Treasury had not done so well.

(a) There had been vast cash expenditures by the Service Departments, particularly in the Middle East. Much of this expenditure had been made to half-disaffected Middle East countries at critical points in the war to ensure their support. For example, Ibn Saud<sup>298</sup> received £20,000,000 in gold sovereigns. Purchasing had often been done by Service Departments at very high prices. Although the exchange rate had remained constant in Syria, prices were now eight times as high as they were before the war, and generally throughout the whole Middle Eastern area prices were from three to four times as high as they were before the war. The Treasury was possibly a little to blame that the purchasing had not been done more advantageously and also that it had not been more ruthlessly cut back when the stringent necessity was over. However, much of the expenditure had been made under duress at a very critical time and it was only fair to consider it as part of the cost paid for the victory of El Alamein and the decisive turn in our fortunes that that produced. Sir Richard Hopkins<sup>299</sup> emphasized two points about these vast sterling balances.

(1) They had been incurred as the result of a strategic decision as to how the war should be fought, and

(2) They had built installations which would contribute to the prosecution of the Japanese war as well.

Although every effort was now being made to reduce expenditures in these areas, it must be recognized that they could not quickly be terminated. In the first place, many troops would have to remain for a considerable length of time on account of lack of transport to repatriate them. Secondly, bills would, in many cases, be as much as three months late in coming in.

(b) The second weak point had been at the stage of what Lord Keynes called pre-preparation for exports. There was no use trying to conceal that their export policy was not going well. The domestic market is hungry for goods and clamouring for them and no effective machinery has been set up for giving priorities for exports. Mr. Towers asked whether any machinery had been devised for channelling exports as between different countries. Would it be possible, for example, for India, where higher prices are ruling, to take all the United Kingdom exports and not leave any for the United States or Canada? Lord Keynes admitted that, under present arrangements, that would be possible. He thought that the target of a 50% increase in export trade over 1939 was, in fact, too low. That estimate had been made a considerable time ago and he did not believe it was sufficient to maintain equilibrium under present conditions. Another reason also led him to be pessimistic. If an analysis was made of possible United Kingdom exports, the result was discouraging. In the chief industries there seemed little possibility of making any increase. In fact, these industries, particularly coal and textiles, were some of the oldest in the country and were handicapped by out-of-date equipment and by dud directors. The grandsons or great-grandsons of the founders of the business were now in control, and they were showing singularly little imagination or intelligence. In fact, it could almost be stated as a general principle that in industries which the United Kingdom has never had before, they could lick the world, whereas in industries that have been developed over hundreds of years, they now were nowhere. Sir Wilfred Eady and Sir Richard Hopkins were rather concerned at the impression which Lord Keynes had given of the United Kingdom's export position and intervened to try to soften the rigour of his analysis. He was led to agree that the basic ingredients of equilibrium exist in the present situation, but he still insisted that he was pessimistic when he took into account the composition of United Kingdom exports.

Permanent Secretary to the Treasury.

(c) In the sphere of military relief, the Treasury had also accepted a very disadvantageous bargain. The United Kingdom was now paying 25% of the total cost, Canada 8% and the United States the balance. No other country was making any contributions whatsoever. He thought that the weight of this expenditure would likely fall in stage III rather than in stage II and, for that reason, it was even more important that the burden should be readjusted.

(d) The reconstruction of Burma and Malaya would impose a further strain on this country's economy. It would not fall on the Exchequer, but would be none the less serious for that. Companies with large reserves in this country would have to use up those reserves to re-establish their plantations and equipment in Burma and Malaya and this would impose a heavy strain on the balance of payments.

8. Comparison with other countries in the Sterling Area

Lord Keynes made a comparison between the financial position of the United Kingdom, which had so materially worsened during the war, and the improved position enjoyed by many other countries inside the sterling area. He emphasized the fact, in particular, that the war was costing South Africa literally nothing at the moment and that, in addition, she would come out of it with her capital plant much improved. She had not made any contribution whatsoever by way of Mutual Aid and every penny that was spent for the United Kingdom Forces in South Africa was provided by the Treasury here. South African ports, for example, had been deepened and improved, so that they could take the largest sea-going vessels afloat, and this had been done without any cost to South Africans. At the present time, South Africa was making an annual overseas expenditure for her forces of £11,000,000; but, on the other hand, partly by building up her gold reserves and partly by increasing her external short-term balances, she was improving her foreign position at the rate of £50,000,000 a year. Australia was making an overseas expenditure of £28,000,000 a year, but even when this was taken into account, she still was £58,000,000 to the good. The position of the United Kingdom looked black indeed when stood beside those figures. Lord Keynes estimated that currently the United Kingdom has an adverse balance of £1,400,000,000 per year. This total was made up in the following way:

Disinvestment	£750,000,000
Lend-Lease, (non-munitions)	750,000,000
Mutual Aid, (non-munitions)	200,000,000
	£1,700,000,000

From this might be deducted possibly £200,000,000 of Lend-Lease for non-munitions which would stop if the war in the Far East came to an end, and approximately £100,000,000 of Mutual Aid for non-munitions which would also stop. Deducting these two items, you arrive at the figure of £1,400,000,000.

9. Temptation

Lord Keynes estimated that if the policy of temptation were followed, loans of from $5,000,000,000 to $8,000,000,000 would be necessary particularly from the United States to tide the United Kingdom over the transition. These loans might be spread over a period of from three to five years. He thought that the United States would be very willing to lend this amount of money and at terms which might appear very favourable. They would probably be prepared to set an interest rate of from 2% to 2½% and to allow very flexible terms of repayment. In return, they would expect the United Kingdom to adopt as quickly as possible a policy of convertibility and, at the very least, to make the current earnings of the sterling area immediately convertible. Such an arrangement might be made to appear very attractive. The United Kingdom, however, had good reasons for hesitating about accepting it. It would mean that what was now a sterling debt would be converted into a dollar debt; and this would be very difficult to discharge since the prospect of substantially increasing exports to the United States was slight. At the same time, the United States would become the chief supplier of goods to the sterling area and would, in large measure, supplant the United Kingdom. These trends might not at first appear dangerous, but they would lead sooner or later to bankruptcy. The settlement would rest on the most precarious foundations, and, as these became apparent, public opinion in the United Kingdom would revolt against it. When its meaning became clear, it would seem an outrageous crown and conclusion to all that had happened during the war.

10. Justice

The policy of justice might seem to be separated from the policy of Temptation by no very strict dividing line. For example, it was quite possible that in negotiations in Washington, the United Kingdom representatives might put forward what they considered to be a policy of Justice and that it would then be countered from the American side by the policy of Temptation. Gradually, by the introduction of modifications on both sides, the two positions might approach each other. However, in Lord Keynes' view, that would be an entirely wrong way to go about the matter. Sir Wilfred Eady intervened to say that the United Kingdom must not give Washington the impression that it had come to try to get the best terms it could, but that, after making that attempt, it was bound to accept whatever terms the United States might offer. They would never obtain a proper settlement in that fashion. The proper procedure was to present clear-cut suggestions and to add that if these suggestions, without essential modifications, were not acceptable to the United States, the United Kingdom would have to embark on a much more restrictive and self-supporting policy. Their proposals were as follows:

(a) Sterling Balances. They proposed that these should be divided into three separate segments.

(1) In part, they should be made freely convertible in the Bretton Woods sense. The amount to be freed in this way should be £750,000,000.

(2) Another part of the balance should be entirely cancelled as a contribution from countries with sterling balances towards winning the war. The amount to be cancelled should be a similar figure, approximately £750,000,000, or rather more. The actual amount might be as high as £880,000,000.

(3) The remainder of the sterling balance should be funded at a low rate, perhaps 1%. Capital repayment would be spread over a long period and would take the form of special shipments of capital goods. This remainder would be a figure in the neighbourhood of £1,500,000,000.

In the view of the Treasury, the cancellation of sterling balances should not be a unilateral act on the part of the United Kingdom, but should come as the result of separate negotiations conducted with each of the countries concerned. However, the United Kingdom should make it clear that if any country did not agree to cancellation, it would not be entitled to any freely convertible balance at all. In other words, although in form the new arrangements would only be entered into with the consent of the creditor country, in fact each creditor would be confronted with a virtual ultimatum. The agreements proposed would not necessarily be in identical terms. In negotiating individual agreements, the following considerations would be taken into account:

- (1) The price level ruling when purchases were made.
- (2) The amount of pre-war sterling balances held by the country in question.
- (3) The benefits it received both from Lend-Lease and from Mutual Aid.
- (4) Special cases. (Hong Kong and Malaya, for example, might well receive more generous treatment on the grounds of the material damage and suffering they had endured).

In cases where the exchange rate was out of line with the price level, the country concerned might recoup itself for the cancellation of sterling balances by an alteration in the exchange rate. If agreements such as these were successfully negotiated, there would still be left approximately £2,250,000,000 of sterling balances of which one third would be freely convertible and two thirds funded and repayable over a long period of time. Lord Keynes explained that the total United Kingdom scheme was to be considered as indivisible and, in particular, that the contribution to a general settlement which would be asked from the United States and from Canada would be dependent on the response made by countries holding sterling balances.

(b) United States. The United Kingdom would propose to the United States:

(1) An outright gift of $3,000,000,000 to be considered as retrospective Lend-Lease to cover the period before the time when Lend-Lease came into operation. This sum might seem considerable, especially since it would be an outright gift, but it became much diminished in importance if it was set beside the vast expenditures which the United States had made, and is continuing to make, for the prosecution of the war. The figure was approximately equal to:

(a) The amount spent by the United Kingdom in the United States in hard cash before Lend-Lease came into effect.

(b) The amount of Lend-Lease there would have been if Lend-Lease had been in operation from the beginning of the war.

(c) The amount of sterling balances to be cancelled by countries within the sterling area.

(d) The amount of sterling balances to be made freely convertible.

(2) A loan of $5,000,000,000. The United Kingdom would have the option to take up any or all of this amount at any time within ten years. The loan would bear interest at the rate of 1% and after ten years a Sinking Fund would be formed at 1% which might later rise to 2%. Lord Keynes said that they hoped they would not have to use the option on this loan to any considerable amount. However, it would provide a firm basis for confidence.

(c) South Africa. It was proposed to ask South Africa for a contribution of £50,000,000 out of her accumulated gold reserve. During the years 1942-1944 inclusive, if South Africa had been providing Mutual Aid on a scale comparable with that provided by Canada, her expenditures under this head would have been approximately £75,000,000. In the light of that fact, it was considered not unreasonable to ask her for this outright contribution.

(d) Canada. In the case of Canada, the Treasury intended to propose a settlement on the following lines:

(1) A final Mutual Aid appropriation to take care of the $600,000,000 of book debt which had arisen on account of the Air Schemes and the supply of Canadian tanks.

(2) An option on a loan of $500,000,000 (that is, one-tenth of the sum to be made available by the United States). The terms of this loan would be the same in all respects as those described above.

(3) The continuation of the present Canadian dollar loan, and its reduction as securities are sold. No reference was made to interest.

Lord Keynes explained that these proposals would still leave the United Kingdom with between £2,000,000,000 and £2,500,000,000 of overseas indebtedness, even after a free gift from the United States of £750,000,000 and an equal figure for cancellation of sterling balances. The burden to be shouldered by the United Kingdom would still be heavy and she would still be the only member of the Alliance who would end the war with substantial overseas obligations. On the other hand, he thought that these obligations, however onerous, were supportable. And more important, if this scheme were accepted, "the sweet breath of justice would be felt to be blowing" by the people of the United Kingdom.

11. Canadian Comments

When Lord Keynes asked for any comments which the Canadian delegation wished to make on these proposals, Dr. Mackintosh said that he was pleased to see that on the whole there was agreement between authoritative Canadian and United Kingdom opinion on final objectives. He had also been glad to note that, in the Treasury view, the transitional period should be as short as possible, since the Department of Finance in Ottawa had come to the same conclusion. Mr. Towers suggested that it might be easier to obtain the option on a loan of $8,000,000,000 from the United States with elastic terms of repayment, than to secure acceptance of the proposals Lord Keynes had described. Lord Keynes said that such an arrangement would not be acceptable to the United Kingdom and Sir Wilfred Eady supported him even more forcibly. He said that the affairs of the United States and the United Kingdom touched at many points all over the world. He was afraid that under such an arrangement, the United Kingdom would always be at the mercy of the United States financially; it would continually be in the position of coming cap in hand to Washington for concessions or modifications. Financial bickerings of this kind and the irritation which they would occasion would gravely imperil political collaboration between the two countries, which was absolutely essential for the maintenance of peace. If a settlement were not reached which would give the United Kingdom an independent position, he thought that there would only be trouble ahead. Without an outright contribution, the United Kingdom could not expect to reach a solvent position. As an indication of the sort of difficulty that might arise, he recalled that some time ago the United States even went so far as to suggest that it should have joint control with the United Kingdom over United Kingdom reserves. On the other hand, both he and Lord Keynes agreed with Mr. Towers that it would be wise to insert flexible terms for repayment of the $5,000,000,000 loan on which the United Kingdom would have an option. Reverting to the outright contribution of $3,000,000,000 both Dr. Mackintosh and Mr. Towers were in agreement that it would be wise to explore the possibility of linking the $3,000,000,000 contribution with the highest political and economic objectives and even with some minor territorial adjustments, which, though unimportant in themselves, might be highly gratifying to the United States. Dr. Mackintosh added that in the approach to officials the practical necessity of minimizing the transition period seemed to offer the best opening.

12. Canada's Future Policy

Mr. Towers emphasized that one of the dangers which would arise if the United Kingdom did not succeed in reaching a settlement which would allow her to participate in a multilateral system would be that Canada would be inevitably thrown more in the direction of the United States. At first blush, it might be thought that Canada would have very great difficulty in establishing trade relationships with the United States very much closer than those presently existing. Mr. Towers thought, however, that the difficulties could be exaggerated. If a multilateral system could not be arranged, American opinion might be receptive to proposals for closer relationships with Canada. Moreover, the circumstances might be such that strategic considerations would influence their attitude. Lord Keynes enquired what attitude Canada would take if proposals such as he had outlined were presented by the United Kingdom to the United States and rejected. In that case, would Canada be prepared to accumulate sterling balances in London? Mr. Towers said that if the United Kingdom proposals seemed reasonable to Canadian opinion—and in his personal view, they were—and were rejected by the United States, he thought it likely that Canada would be inclined to go a long way to make possible the continuance of trade on a large scale with the United Kingdom. He did not comment on the proposal that the credit arrangements should take the form of accumulation of sterling balances. He added that, in the absence of United States participation, special arrangements between Canada and the United Kingdom could hardly be regarded as a long term solution of the problem. Ultimately, the inherent difficulties of such a situation would almost inevitably cause a closer connection between Canada and the United States. If the initial approach to the United States were unsuccessful, it was to be hoped that matters would be handled in such a way that the door would be left open to the reopening of the subject with the United States at a later date in an effort to come to an acceptable arrangement.

CANADIAN EXPORTS TO THE STERLING AREA

1. The deficit in the balance of payments on current account between the Sterling Area and Canada during the fiscal year 1945/46 is provisionally estimated at Can. $1250 million. This estimate assumes the continuance of the principles of import and exchange control currently applied. The Canadian Government have however requested a modification of these principles so as to remove the discrimination which they entail against essential imports from Canada into the Sterling Area as compared with essential imports from one Sterling Area country to another.

2. In order to meet the wishes of the Government of Canada the U.K. Government are prepared, on the assumption of a Mutual Aid appropriation for 1945/46 sufficient to cover the deficit as estimated above, to modify their own import policy to the extent of adopting henceforward the principle that where Canada is a normal source of supply no distinction will be made on exchange grounds between Canada and the Sterling Area countries, subject to paragraph 5 below, as sources of supply for essential imports. That is to say, the existing criterion that the goods may be imported from Canada only if they are not available in the Sterling Area would no longer apply in such cases.

3. The U.K. Government would have to retain discretion to exclude imports of any category of goods, and to determine the quantity of imports of any particular category to be regarded as essential. Where a category of goods is excluded or limited quantitatively on the criterion of essentiality, the U.K. Government would retain freedom to admit, or accept increased imports of, such goods from particular sources; any such additional imports would be regarded as non-essential and the principle of non-discrimination would not apply in such cases. In particular, imports of non-essential goods from a European country whose economy had been disrupted by the war might have to be permitted as a measure of assistance in the reconstruction of its economy, or as the only means of collecting payment from such a country.

4. As regards the rest of the Sterling Area, the U.K. Government would be prepared to take the following action:

(a) The Colonies

Instructions would be given to Colonial Governments to apply the same principles in relation to imports from Canada as the U.K. would itself apply.

(b) Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, Southern Rhodesia and India

These Governments would be advised of the policy adopted by the U.K. Government, and invited to do likewise.

(c) Neutral and Non-British countries, members of the Sterling Area

The U.K. Government will not be asked to alter their present arrangements with these countries.

In the case of Egypt and Iraq, a defined sum is allocated in foreign currency out of the Sterling Area pool to cover all the expenditure of each country in the currencies of the U.S.A., Canada and certain other countries.

Where Sterling Area countries have large sterling balances, the United Kingdom Government feel that freest possible use of these balances in the Sterling Area must be allowed in order to give sterling a real value. It would be understood therefore that Sterling Area Governments would be free to admit from the U.K. additional quantities of goods of which a limited quantity only would be admitted as essential imports.

5. The U.K. Government recognize that the adoption of these principles would result in an increased import of Canadian goods into the Sterling Area over and above the amount budgeted for under the existing formula and that this amount would not be covered on the current estimate of Canadian dollar funds available to the Sterling Area (including the projected Mutual Aid appropriation). They would wish therefore to reserve the right to ask the Government of Canada to review the matter at any time during the course of the year, if it should appear that the resulting demands on their gold resources were more than in their judgment they could allocate to this purpose (say Can. $25 million).

Projet de télégramme

Draft Telegram

DRAFT CIRCULAR TELEGRAM TO THE COLONIES

Import Control. H.M.G. in the U.K. have been discussing with the Government of Canada the effect on exports from Canada to the Sterling Area of the existing policy of import and exchange control. The basic principle operating, as you are aware, has been that goods should not be imported from outside the Sterling Area unless

- (a) they are essential
- (b) they cannot be obtained within the Sterling Area.

The effect of this policy has been to impose a measure of discrimination against essential imports from Canada, as compared with essential imports from other British countries.

2. This policy has been dictated by the imperative necessity of conserving, during the war period, the foreign exchange resources of the Sterling Area to cover essential requirements. The need to conserve such resources will continue beyond the war period itself. But H.M.G. in the U.K. are anxious, in consultation with the Government of Canada, to ensure that the pattern of post-war trade is not dictated by the perpetuation of controls set up for purely war-time purposes, and they desire therefore to take such steps as they are able to minimize the discrimination between Canadian exports and those of the countries in the Sterling Area.

3. They have therefore indicated to the Government of Canada that they are prepared henceforward to adopt, in regard to their own import policy, the principle that, where Canada is a normal source of supply, no distinction will be made on exchange grounds between Canada and the Sterling Area countries as sources of supply for essential imports. That is to say, the existing criterion that essential goods may be imported from Canada only if they are not available in the Sterling Area would no longer apply in such cases.

4. This is to be regarded as an interim measure. The further development of trade between Canada and the Sterling Area must naturally depend on the settlement of wider questions. Moreover H.M.G. have reserved the right to reopen the matter with the Government of Canada, should the demands on their foreign exchange resources resulting from this change of policy prove too onerous.

5. Colonial Governments should henceforward apply the principle stated in para. 3 above in regard to essential imports into their territories from Canada.

6. Since this represents a substantial change of principle in the operation of Sterling Area controls, it is important that it should be fully understood by all those concerned with the administration of import controls and the programming of essential imports.

7. It is not proposed that any public announcement should be made at this date. But you should reply to enquiries from commercial interests affected in the terms of the principle as stated in para. 3 above.

8. You should note that the principle applies to essential repeat essential imports where Canada is a normal source of supply. It will remain within your discretion to determine, subject to consultation with me where necessary, what imports you regard as essential to the economy of the Colony, both as to category and as to amount. In the case of Canada you should accordingly continue to exclude all imports of any particular category which are judged inessential, and admit imports as essential only in limited quantities. Where no imports, or a limited quantity only, are admitted as essential, you have discretion to admit additional imports of the same category, subject to supply and shipping availabilities, from the U.K. without thereby being required to admit such additional imports from other sources on a non-discriminatory basis. H.M.G. in the U.K. have explained to the Government of Canada the necessity for this provision, in view of the importance for both the Colonies themselves and the U.K., of allowing the freest possible use of the substantial sterling balances which the former now hold.

9. Special cases may also arise where it may be desired to admit imports from particular sources which could not be justified on a strict basis of essentiality. For example, in order to maintain normal trade relations with contiguous territories. The admission of such imports would not necessarily conflict with H.M.G.'s understanding with the Canadian government, but before deciding on such cases you should refer to me.

You should also refer to me if any special cases of difficulty arise in relation to local Canadian interests, on the application of the principle stated above.

"COMMERCIAL POLICY": LONDON, MAY, 1945<sup>302</sup>(to accompany memos on Financial Proposals, Discrimination in Trading, Reparations, etc.)

1. Commercial Policy, as such, did not hold an important place on the agenda, being greatly overshadowed—both as regards emphasis and time—by the conversations regarding other aspects of proposed multilateral arrangements. Indeed, it came under discussion at only two of some thirteen or fourteen sessions and then chiefly from the standpoint of "The Timetable" (vide paragraphs 2 to 5 below) rather than its own unsolved problems.

At first, we were genuinely puzzled—and not a little disturbed—by what appeared to be an unreadiness or a reluctance on the part of the United Kingdom authorities to come to grips with the admittedly troublesome subject of Commercial Policy, not least because of the importance which, in arranging for the delegation, they had attached to this aspect of the general proposals. It became apparent, however, at our first meeting with Board of Trade officials that any hesitation on their part to proceed to discussion of Commercial Policy might be due in some degree at least to the fact that their Department was not to be represented at the week-end conversations at Cambridge. These, they explained to us, had been organized by the Treasury; they had not been asked to attend; and, save for taking us over Hawkins<sup>303</sup> proposals regarding a "Timetable," they had nothing in particular to bring up for discussion. We sensed obvious embarrassment and some disappointment on their part but in the circumstances we could do nothing but proceed with the program that had been prepared by Lord Keynes and his Treasury colleagues.

Returned from Cambridge, we were asked by the Board of Trade to devote a number of meetings to considering somewhat related matters which certain of their group (notably Helmore,<sup>304</sup> Stirling,<sup>305</sup> Lisle<sup>306</sup> and Wiseman<sup>307</sup>) desired to take advantage of our presence in England to discuss: problems arising out of the Canadian "price-ceiling," subsidy policy, means by which Canada might encourage imports from the United Kingdom, etc. etc. We agreed, and in the week of May 21st attended several meetings in Helmore's office, at the last of which Messrs. Geddes and Spence of the Wartime Prices and Trade Board were present and led the discussions.

2. Reference has been made above to "The Timetable," into the secrets of which we had been admitted by Liesching at the first (May 18th) of the two meetings on Commercial Policy. It was, he explained, a program of timing which had been submitted to the Board of Trade for their comments by Harry Hawkins, of the United States Embassy, and which the latter had submitted to Washington for approval. It was not, therefore, to be taken as official, Liesching continued; but, since Hawkins had seemed fairly confident of its approval in Washington, he (Liesching) was anxious that we be familiar with it and that we make such comments thereon as might appear desirable. (A copy of this first draft of a proposed Timetable is attached hereto, as supplied to us by the Board of Trade on May 31/45.)

Frankly stating that discussion of a timetable before agreement had been reached upon principles of policy was in our opinion very much Hamlet without The Prince, we did, nevertheless, at this first meeting on May 18th discuss the Hawkins program, devoting ourselves chiefly to eliciting from Liesching background information respecting the various steps in the proposed sequence. We had doubts as to the wisdom or advisability about certain of these, as had the British, but extended reference to the conversations of that date is perhaps unnecessary in view of the fact that at our second and final meeting on Commercial Policy (joint Treasury, Board of Trade and Dominions Office on May 31st) Liesching announced that the United Kingdom had suggested to Hawkins certain possible modifications in the timetable, respecting which he wished us to be informed—more particularly since, following our arrival in London, Hawkins had received from Washington approval of his original proposals. He added that Hawkins had been made aware of the British suggestions regarding changes in the program and had already intimated that he, personally, felt they were deserving of very serious and possibly favourable consideration.

British misgivings regarding the first proposed timetable related particularly to: the suggested "effort to ascertain the trend of thinking" in certain countries (numbered Para 2. of the draft); discussion of principles with "congressional leaders" (Para. 3 of the draft); publication of the proposals at the time of their submission to "all governments" (Para. 5 of the draft); the method of securing, sifting and collating the views of many governments (Para. 6 of the draft) and finally the proposal for a formal "trade conference" of all participating countries early in 1946 (Para. 6). The British feared further that Hawkins' plan might work inevitably toward presentation to the conference of what would be, in fact if not in name, a draft convention, and that failure at the conference level to agree upon its provisions might entail the "failure" of the conference. This, in their opinion, was unthinkable and the suggested amendments they had put to Hawkins had been aimed at averting possible break-down at the final high political level.

3. The changes which had been proposed by the British to Hawkins were outlined to us orally by Liesching. The most important was that the United States, instead of "ascertaining", (presumably by diplomatic exchanges) the "trend of opinion" in certain countries, (as suggested in Para. 2 of the original Hawkins proposals) might convene what he called a "preparatory meeting" of all participating countries. Such a meeting—which should not be held until broad general principles as well as certain vital points of detail had been agreed upon in advance by the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States, the British Dominions, and preferably France and Russia—might be possible, he thought, by January of 1946. It should be on the Ministerial level and frankly should be planned as a curtain-raiser to a full and formal conference, to be held some three or four months thereafter. He and Eady laid great emphasis upon the importance of this so-called preparatory meeting, as compared with an exchange of views through diplomatic channels, and both appeared to believe that the proposal had considerable appeal for Hawkins. The preparatory meeting, they said, should not be faced with something too much "fait accompli"; they were urging Hawkins, therefore, not to attempt to have ready for such meeting a draft convention but rather, a comprehensive, reasonably precise but not too-refined "statement of principles" (which must however include such vital points of detail as the value of 'x', 'y' etc. in various formulae regarding tariffs, preferences, foodstuff agreements, etc.). Their thinking was that, as the preparatory meeting approved principles, these would be referred to a committee or committees of experts (struck at the meeting) which would in the light of the general instructions of the meeting "hammer out" a draft convention for presentation in due course to the proposed formal trade conference.

This basic emendation of the original proposals, if approved by Washington, would necessitate consequential changes in certain of the intermediate dates named in the Hawkins draft, the nature of which need not be referred to here since the entire timetable (either the original or any amendment thereof) must necessarily be, for the present at least, highly elastic. Both Eady and Liesching felt that the Hawkins timetable was unwarrantably optimistic as regards the timing of its sequence of events; and while the changes they were suggesting might to some extent telescope the earlier phases, they had little hope that the preparatory meeting, much less the conference, could be held until fairly well on in the New Year. Although proposing changes in the timing, they still were obviously concerned as to a possible premature "leak" in Washington once the subject had been broached, even in secrecy, to congressional leaders. In this connection they expressed the view that up to the present the matter had been "admirably handled" by the United States authorities who naturally were anxious not to have publicity regarding multilateral conversations while the matter of the extension of the Trade Agreements Act was still before Congress.

4. The United Kingdom officials were anxious to have our opinion as to whether the full-fledged proposals, when ready for publication, should be put forward unilaterally by the United States or jointly by the United States and the United Kingdom (and possibly others). Having put the question, they immediately stated that in their opinion the former was the more desirable, in that proposals which appeared to originate in and emanate from the United States would have wider public appeal and greater public acceptance in that country than would a cut-and-dried scheme of joint parentage. With this view we expressed general agreement.

5. As to whether or not another Commonwealth round-table would precede all or most of the steps set down in the timetable, the British officials were uncertain. They saw possible advantages in such a meeting but felt that the holding of an "Empire conference" might entail very great delay. There would seem to be little doubt however that, if and when they reach agreement with the United States regarding even a tentative timetable, the United Kingdom authorities will in one way or another again sound out the views of the various Commonwealth governments regarding the basic proposals respecting Commercial Policy.

6. On the substance of the Commercial Policy discussions, as distinct from time-table and procedural matters, we had two meetings. At these, we sought to ascertain what, if any, new proposals had come up and how far the United Kingdom and the United States had been able to agree on the principles of a commercial convention. As already mentioned, there was evidence that the United Kingdom expected that, if suitable financial arrangements could be made, it would not be too difficult to reach agreement with the United States on a commercial policy agreement. On the other hand, they were quite unwilling to give any indication of the points at which they might be willing to compromise. Apparently, this attitude arose in part from the United Kingdom political situation and in part from a desire to keep all points fluid and under their own control for bargaining purposes.

Some of the points on which we obtained elucidation are as follows:

(a) The United Kingdom are thinking of the International Trade Organization as a very powerful and active body covering the field of trade, commodities and cartels and less definitely employment. They are thinking of the convention under which it would operate as a much less detailed and definitive document than came from Bretton Woods. Two of the functions of the I.T.O. would be to develop methods for implementing the principles of the document and pass on the adequacy of the compliance with it.

(b) On tariff reduction, discussion is still centred on a 50 per cent cut to a "floor" of 10% ad valorem or its equivalent. The United Kingdom definitely will argue for freedom to change any duties not higher than 10 per cent, but it may be taken for granted that the United States is opposed. The United Kingdom probably will not press for a tariff "ceiling", as at one time it seemed certain to do.

(c) On preferences, the general approach from both sides is the one suggested by us, viz., horizontal reduction of preferential margins by cutting m.f.n. rates. To this, the United States would add that residual preferences should be reduced to a specified percentage of 1939 margins and that no preference be permitted where preferential trade was less than 5% of the total. The United Kingdom wish to retain the right to a minimum preferential margin of 5 p.c. ad valorem. On these points, there is no agreement.

(d) As we had already been advised by cables,† the United Kingdom advanced a special provision for agriculture. In effect, this would relieve foodstuffs from the outlawing of quotas but place limitations on all protective devices affecting foodstuffs. These limitations would be that if the price to domestic consumers should over a period exceed the world price by more than 'x' per cent or if the domestic production over a period should exceed the production in an agreed base period (pre-war) by more than 'y' per cent, the country concerned would have to reduce the protection or financial assistance. Exceptions to 'x' and 'y' could be made by the I.T.O. in the interest of nutrition or a better balanced agriculture.

While it was admitted that the proposal was evolved to effect a political compromise in the United Kingdom, it was vigorously supported by Robbins,<sup>308</sup> Meade<sup>309</sup> and others as offering the best safeguard against excessive agricultural protection. They insisted that they should contend for low values of 'x' and 'y' both from the point of view of their own Treasury and from that of their overseas markets which would be affected by the revival of European protectionism. We pointed out that we would wish to scrutinize the proposal very carefully and that as far as cereals were concerned the second limitation would mean very little even though 'y' were zero.

(e) The United Kingdom officials confirmed that the United States had proposed that for the first 5 years of the Convention a country could, by quotas, protect itself against a "flood" of imports without approval of the I.T.O. After 5 years, any such action would require the approval of the I.T.O. The United States argued that such a provision would avoid political difficulties and that similar clauses had in the past been used sparingly. We expressed more concern over action which might be taken in other countries (than U.S.A.) as well as over the pressure to which our own government would be subjected.

(f) The United Kingdom is still prepared to press strongly for special provision for infant industries, and the officials reported the United States to be relatively unsympathetic. We agreed on the necessity of such a provision and suggested that it probably should involve (i) "registration" of an infant in advance with the I.T.O.; (ii) a maximum limitation on the tariff provision; and (iii) a reduction to a minimum within a specified period.

(g) On other trade matters, no new ground seemed to have been broken.

(h) The proposed convention would include something like the Australian proposal on employment policy and sections on commodity agreements and cartels. In respect of commodity agreements, the buffer stock proposal has slipped into the background. The United Kingdom proposal on cartels is merely that each country undertake to investigate and report at the request of a section of the I.T.O. which would receive complaints.

The main procedural steps for preparing for the Trade and Employment Conference, as developed in the Department of State and in the U.S. Embassy in London are as follows:

1. About July 1 the Executive Committee on Economic Foreign Policy in Washington would begin a series of meetings to develop the position the United States might take on full employment policy, commercial policy, cartels, commodity policy and the International Trade Organization.

2. Meanwhile between now and July 1 an effort should be made to ascertain the trend of thinking on these subjects in other countries, particularly the United Kingdom, the British Dominions, Russia and France, so that the probable attitude of other countries may be taken into account in formulating the U.S. position.

3. The U.S. position as thus developed should be approved at the highest levels in the United States as a basis for discussion with other countries. Our proposals should be discussed with congressional leaders.

4. The proposals should then be put before the British Government at the highest level. The purpose at this stage would be to insure that, before putting our ideas before the world, our proposals would not at the outset meet with British opposition of any serious sort. The British should not, however, at this stage be asked for any tight commitments as we will not be ready to make final commitments ourselves. What we seek is a presumption in favour of the proposals rather than a commitment regarding them. Since the aim is to get proposals before the world as soon as possible in order to put some restraint on a drift toward nationalistic policies, it is important that the next stage below (publication) be reached as soon as possible. For this reason, other countries probably should not be approached in this way at this time except perhaps in those cases in which we know that there has been enough thought given to these questions to insure a prompt reaction.

5. The U.S. proposals should then be sent to all governments with a statement that they represent our present thinking; that they do not represent unchangeable position and that their comments would be welcome. Our proposals should be made public at the time they are submitted to other governments. We might be able to take these steps by August 1. If we could do so, we might ask other countries to give us their comments by October 1.

6. The final stage would be consideration of the views presented under the above procedure and the revision of the U.S. position to the extent that it seemed necessary or desirable. The United States should then seek definite commitment on that position from the United Kingdom, the British Dominions, Russia and France; and when this has been done, the conference could be called. This stage obviously may involve intensive and possibly protracted negotiations. Three months might be a minimum for this purpose. The conference could not, therefore, be convened before early in 1946.

Dear Mr. Munro,

On my return from our discussions in the United Kingdom, I wrote to Lord Keynes explaining that, in view of the election and Dr. Clark's illness, there would necessarily be some delay in reporting to Mr. Ilsley.

We have now given a full oral report of our discussions, and directed the Minister's attention particularly to the action which it was proposed that the United Kingdom Government should take in response to our proposal of February 23, 1945 that a general policy of non-discrimination as between imports from Canada and from the sterling area should be followed during the war period in which Mutual Aid is in effect.

Mr. Ilsley tells me that he has discussed this matter with his colleagues, and that I may inform you that the United Kingdom proposals are satisfactory. I am, however, to ask you to call attention to two points. Our Government may wish at some future time to raise the question of the position of Eire under the proposed action, should circumstances develop which would give it importance. Further, since Newfoundland is in the Canadian dollar area, we would assume that Newfoundland exports also would be covered by the proposed action.

The Minister understands that these arrangements will be re-examined at the conclusion of hostilities against Japan as, of course, there has been no suggestion that Mutual Aid would continue beyond that time.

The Minister has asked me to say that he was greatly interested in the report of our discussions, and gratified by the course they had taken. He also asked me to assure you that he and his colleagues appreciate very much the genuine effort which the United Kingdom has made to meet our position on the matter of trade discrimination.

Yours very truly,

W. A. MACKINTOSH

Dear Dr. Mackintosh,

Thank you very much for your letter of the 25th June about the proposals for a policy of non-discrimination in regard to imports from Canada and from the sterling area. I forwarded it to the authorities in London and have now received a reply to the effect that they are very glad to learn of its terms.

So far as the two specific points you raised are concerned I have been asked to give you the following information:-

(a) The United Kingdom authorities would be perfectly ready to discuss with the Government of Canada the position of Eire under these arrangements at any time should you so desire. In this connection, however, you may be interested in the following figures for imports and exports between Eire and the United States and Canada in the last two years:

	Imports from U.S.A.	Exports to U.S.A.
1943	£3,550,614	£265,990
1944	£2,955,387	£288,493
	Import from Canada	Exports to Canada
1943	£2,544,563	£ 1,949
1944	£5,017,132	£ 2,120

I think it emerges from the above statistics that we are at present making a suitable dollar allocation to Eire.

(b) It is agreed that Newfoundland exports should be treated similarly to Canadian under these arrangements.

It is also agreed that these arrangements should in any case be re-examined at the conclusion of hostilities with Japan. This would not, of course, affect the right of the United Kingdom authorities to reopen the matter at an earlier date under paragraph 5 of the Statement of Principles.<sup>310</sup>

The United Kingdom authorities intend to take the necessary action both in the United Kingdom and to advise other sterling area controls forthwith on the lines proposed.

I am asked to convey the thanks and appreciation of the United Kingdom authorities for the message from Mr. Ilsley contained in the concluding paragraph of your letter. They for their part were also greatly pleased to find from the discussions with the Canadian representatives how much there is in

Dear Dr. Mackintosh,

I took the opportunity on my visit to London to discuss with the Treasury and other Departments concerned Dr. Clark's letter of 27th April, about Canadian supplies diverted or re-transferred by the United Kingdom to other countries. The general lines of your approach appeared acceptable to those concerned, but as you will expect, there were a certain number of points of detail and procedure which appear to require clarifying or working out.

The first principle mentioned is that the United Kingdom should notify the Canadian Government of all sales of supplies received from Canada to countries outside the sterling area, and that the Bank of England should sell to the Bank of Canada dollars or the equivalent of dollars thereby realized. In so far as such transactions take place through the direct or indirect agency of United Kingdom Government Departments, this seems practical to us; and I take it that this is what Dr. Clark's letter is concerned with. To attempt applying this principle to commercial transactions, however, would be impracticable. Under our interpretation, what we would suggest is that we get from the Departments concerned a statement of their sales (direct or indirect) outside the sterling area, and that at periodic intervals we make some rough calculations as to what amounts are likely to have been realized in terms of gold and dollars. In this way we should simplify the whole issue by working out on a statistical basis the order of magnitude of the sums involved, for which the Bank of England would sell to the Bank of Canada dollars or gold in lump sums at appropriate intervals. We shall be glad to hear your views on this proposal, so that we can then get the return of information from our Departments on to a satisfactory basis.

The second principle relates to supplies provided on Mutual Aid. Up to now our experience has been that it is seldom if ever possible in practice to distinguish at the time of delivery goods coming under Mutual Aid proper from those procured by the Mutual Aid Board but paid for out of U.K. Cash Receipts Account. As long as this is so, we suggest passing to you information about retransfers without attempting to distinguish which of the two sources was involved, and it would then be for the Mutual Aid Board to make such adjustments as it saw fit. Moreover, having dealt in the last paragraph with the foreign exchange aspect, it is hard to see what ultimate advantage is to be gained by trying to make this distinction; it would certainly mean additional work for all concerned. If this arrangement is to work, we shall have to proceed on the assumption that all goods passed on by us have in the first instance to be paid for to us by the recipient. Once the Mutual Aid Board has the information about the goods thus passed on, it would have to decide in which cases it wished the budgetary benefit to be passed on direct to the new recipient. When it has decided this point we in our turn would make the appropriate financial adjustment either by refund of monies paid to us by the ultimate recipient, or by an appropriate abatement of any outstanding claim. The essential feature here is that the decision as to whether a benefit should be based on the ultimate recipient or whether the transaction should be treated as in effect a re-sale by us of goods purchased out of the U.K. Cash Receipts Account should be given quickly.

The procedure outlined above will make it necessary for us to receive schedules of the adjustments to the U.K. Cash Receipts Account carried out by the Mutual Aid Board as a result of the information we furnish about retransfers. The reason for this is that we shall use the audited statements of the U.K. Cash Receipts Account as the basis of our sterling claims against Empire territories for direct shipments from Canada to them of stores charged to that Account. As stores passed on by us will have already been claimed in sterling they must be identified in the breakdown of the U.K. Cash Receipts Account in cases where the Board decides to transfer the charge to that Account on the basis of our retransfer reports, so that no further sterling claim is raised here when the audited account is received.

I think the above states the main points which emerged from our discussions in London. If you agree to the approach I have suggested I think the next step would be to discuss in more detail on the lines you mention in the last paragraph of your letter.

Yours sincerely,

R. GORDON MUNRO

Ottawa, August 15, 1945

IMPORTANT 1. The arrangements and agreements between the United Kingdom and Canada respecting Mutual Aid have always contemplated that such aid would be provided only until the end of hostilities. Our legislation on Mutual Aid and the general understanding of it by Parliament are based upon the expectation that it will terminate as soon as military victory has been achieved. Under these arrangements, the transfer of supplies to all countries under Mutual Aid agreements will be terminated today.

2. It is assumed that the United Kingdom will wish to continue to receive deliveries of foodstuffs and other civilian supplies without interruption and we are proposing to continue procurement and shipment of these supplies unless advised to the contrary. We are doing this on the assumption that financial arrangements for payment will shortly be worked out, and the Department of Finance is ready to discuss this matter immediately with your representatives in Ottawa.

3. The appropriate officials of the Department of Munitions and Supply are communicating direct with the Ministry of Supply or other United Kingdom procurement agencies, listing both the contracts which in their view should be cancelled forthwith and also those on which we would like information as to whether you wish deliveries to continue for your account.

4. Article VIII of the Mutual Aid Agreement between the U.K. and Canada comes into effect upon the cessation of hostilities, and it will be necessary to discuss a number of problems arising from its application. For this purpose we would ask you to take all feasible steps to obtain the necessary information for a consideration of the application of this article, including specifically the application of the provision under which supplies in ocean transit revert to Canadian ownership.

5. We realize that the practical application of the measures outlined above will require further consultation, and we are anxious to do our part in working out mutually satisfactory arrangements as soon as possible.

You will, I am sure, realize that the unexpectedly early end of the Japanese war raises many difficult problems for us. We require a little time to make the necessary adjustments. We were therefore concerned and embarrassed at receiving your telegram 187 telling us of the sudden termination of Mutual Aid immediately upon the end of the Japanese war. We understood from Article XI of the Mutual Aid agreement of 2nd [11] February, 1944, that termination of the agreement was to be on a date agreed between the two Governments and we should very much like to discuss this with you before any immediate action is taken.

I know that you appreciate our position vis à vis the United States. We have no doubt that we shall reach a satisfactory settlement with you. But a premature announcement of the cessation of Mutual Aid on your part would have ill effects on our present negotiations with the U.S. In their case we have been pressing on the administration through Mr. Clayton, who is now in London, that there should be no sudden termination of Lend-Lease before there had been an opportunity to consider the manner of winding it up and what is to follow after. We do not yet know exactly what line might be taken by the President, but we have reason to expect that most of those existing arrangements which are still essential particularly as regards food will continue for the time being. Any other decision would indeed be a disastrous one for us. But if Canada should now announce the sudden end of Mutual Aid, how can we expect the United States administration to hold to what we hope are their present intentions?

We are of course ready to begin discussions of what the new arrangements should be as soon as it is useful to do so. But so many essential elements in our general post-war financial arrangements will remain uncertain until we have made some progress in Washington that there is no definite proposal which we can advance or accept on the spur of the moment. The essential point for us is that having regard to the reaction on Lend-Lease there should be no sudden termination of the principle of Mutual Aid. In view of our many heavy pressing anxieties and difficult decisions to be made, I very much hope therefore that the decision which you have notified in your telegram can be suspended.

I also ask you as a matter of the greatest urgency to make no public announcement on your proposed policy and to enjoin on everybody the need for the utmost reticence at this stage. Meanwhile we agree with the procedure in paragraph three of your telegram relating to military supplies and we will also inform you as soon as possible about any items in the civilian program which will no longer be required in the changed circumstances. Apart from any such cancellations we hope that the rest of the civilian program can continue as arranged.

1. The steps which we might take to assist the United Kingdom in financing payment of civilian supplies have not yet been considered by Cabinet. The present situation is that the British have reacted strongly to our telegram No. 187 to Dominions Office. To our surprise, they have been taken aback by what they consider an abrupt termination of Mutual Aid. We have explained that our telegram did not represent a new decision but that we intended it as a reminder that, according to the terms of the existing arrangements, Mutual Aid transfers would cease on the cessation of hostilities and we wished to give them an immediate opportunity of stopping the shipment of non-essentials and

H. F. Angus was then in London to attend the Third Session of the UNRRA Council.

of ensuring an uninterrupted flow of necessities. The cessation of hostilities came so abruptly that this reminder that the provisions for existing arrangements would come into effect was despatched only on August 15, the termination date.

2. We have not yet received any concrete proposals from the United Kingdom authorities. Mackintosh and I had a talk with Munro this morning and we explained the reasons back of our telegram as I have above. We assured him that we did not intend to use the United Kingdom cash receipts to meet cancellation charges. Munro welcomed this assurance. We hope that Parliament will be asked to vote funds to pay all cancellation charges including Mutual Aid contracts, which in the case of the United Kingdom are estimated at some $300,000,000.

3. With regard to financing in the interim before final arrangements are made, it is too early to say what means will be used, though clearly we are most anxious to find a mutually satisfactory solution and are hopeful that one will be found. The Government may agree to accumulate sterling for a time, provided that such accumulation would not be treated as comparable to the sterling balances accumulated in the sterling area during the war, say by India.

4. We are in the meantime exploring means whereby we can provide Canadian Government funds to cover purchase of necessities for United Kingdom account.

5. The Government might perhaps agree to change the cut-off date from August 15th to the date of the signing of surrender but we are reserving judgment until we see what supplies have moved since August 15th. Extension of the date would simplify the application of Article 8 of the Mutual Aid Agreement, under which title to goods in transit reverts to Canada.

6. Mr. MacDonald delivered to the Prime Minister a somewhat plaintive message from Mr. Attlee on August 18th and also saw Mr. Ilsley yesterday. Eady will have reports of these meetings and probably a request from Munro for instructions.

7. I may add that we have not had a similar reaction as yet from other countries with whom we have Mutual Aid Agreements. The U.S.S.R. has not questioned the coming into effect of the provisions of the Mutual Aid Agreement on the cessation of hostilities, although they were not prepared to recognize that hostilities had ceased on August 15th and they have asked that exceptions be made on individual items. Australia has acknowledged our notification and thanked us for our sympathetic consideration. We appreciate, however, that in the case of the United Kingdom, their reaction was influenced by their concern over their discussions with the United States, where, because of reverse Lend-Lease, and the complexities of the Article VII discussions, the situation is not comparable.

8. We have, at the United Kingdom request, managed to withhold publicity, but we have pointed out to the United Kingdom that a reading of the Mutual Aid Act and Agreements could only lead to the conclusion that Mutual Aid transfers were to cease with the end of hostilities. Ends.

I am sorry about the impression of abruptness which our message has evidently left and am prepared to concede that its despatch was a shade precipitate. At the same time I think it should be understood in London that we were quite as much taken aback by their reaction to our message as they obviously were by our message itself. We assumed that it was common ground that Stage II ended automatically with the ending of hostilities in the Japanese war. It is true that Stage II has come to an end and Stage III has begun much earlier than any of us expected but I am surprised and rather nonplussed by the suggestion that our message was "unexpected" in these circumstances. Ottawa, August 18, 1945

I think that some reply should be sent to the message from Mr. Attlee which Malcolm MacDonal delivered to you last Saturday. It is true that one of the reasons for the special urgency attached to that message has now passed since an announcement of the termination of lend-lease has been issued in Washington.<sup>312</sup> On the other hand, this announcement is much more drastic in its terms than they expected in London and you will see from a telegram from Canada House† reporting a discussion between Angus and Sir Wilfrid Eady that the Treasury is so deeply disturbed that they have informed other departments that foreign exchange will have to be conserved on the lines adopted in 1940.

There are two important points on which our decision respecting Mutual Aid differs from the U.S. decision to cut off lend-lease. The first is that certain lend-lease supplies of a military nature can continue to go forward if approved by the U.S. Chiefs of Staff. The second is that the operative date of termination is to be the official V.J. Day which President Truman is expected to proclaim when the terms of surrender are signed, probably on August 31st.

I think that we could reasonably postpone the date of our own termination of Mutual Aid to correspond with the formal acceptance of surrender<sup>313</sup> and that if we are to do so it would be well to take action at once and to include this change in your reply to Mr. Attlee.<sup>314</sup> There is quite a strong case for saying that the "cessation of hostilities" referred to in our Mutual Aid agreements only takes place when military surrender is actually effected.<sup>315</sup> So far as I can gather the postponement of the effective date of our decision for just over a fortnight would not cause any practical difficulties at this end and might even assist in the solution of a number of technical problems relating to such matters as the treatment of cargoes at sea containing some civilian supplies and some munitions which would revert to our ownership under the original decision and for which we would have no use.

If you agree with this, a meeting of the Mutual Aid Board could be called to approve the change and perhaps you might mention the matter to Mr. Ilsley and Mr. Howe.

TERMINATION OF MUTUAL AID

All Governments in receipt of Mutual Aid supplies from Canada were notified on August 15th that, in accordance with the general Mutual Aid arrangements, Mutual Aid transfers would cease from the date of the cessation of hostilities, which was taken to be August 15th. The notification stated that we should be glad to make the necessary arrangements to ensure the continued delivery of essential supplies on a payment basis. The United Kingdom Government on August 18th addressed urgent representations to the Prime Minister expressing the hope that the operation of the decision would be suspended and emphasizing the grave embarrassment to them if any publicity were given while they were in the course of negotiations with the United States Government from which they hoped to continue to receive lend-lease supplies for the time being. The Soviet Government has sought concessions on certain points and both it and the Australian Government have intimated that the effective date for the termination of Mutual Aid might properly be extended to the actual signature of surrender by Japan.

In the interval the United States Government have announced their policy which is much more drastic than had been expected in London. In consequence a Treasury Mission is being despatched to Washington for urgent discussions. Lord Keynes who will head this mission is expected to arrive in Ottawa on September 3rd or 4th in order to give information on the United Kingdom position and to discuss interim financial arrangements with us.

One of the differences between the United States decisions respecting the termination of Lend-Lease and our decisions on Mutual Aid is that the effective date in Washington will be midnight on the day to be proclaimed by President Truman as V.J. Day which will probably be either the day of or the day after the signature of the formal surrender terms. It can be argued that legally there has been no "cessation of hostilities" within the meaning of Article VII of our Mutual Aid agreements until the announcement of readiness to surrender made on August 15th has been implemented by the signature of surrender terms now expected on September 2nd. When we notified the recipient governments that August 15th would be the date for ending Mutual Aid, it was thought that there would be only a very short interval before the signature of the terms. In fact this interval will run to more than a fortnight.

It is suggested that a reply should be sent to the representations received from the United Kingdom stating that we shall be prepared to discuss with Lord Keynes the extension of the effective date for the cessation of Mutual Aid from August 15th to a time not later than midnight on the day of the signature of surrender. It is not suggested that any other modification of the arrangements be contemplated. Similar treatment would presumably have to be accorded to other Governments receiving Mutual Aid.

It is further suggested, in accordance with the views of the Mutual Aid Board expressed at their meeting of August 27th, that provision should be made to enable the Government to act as the agent for the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and, possibly, the other countries receiving Mutual Aid, in procuring essential supplies which they will continue to need after the termination of Mutual Aid transfers. For this purpose it is intended to submit within the next few days recommendations to Council requesting specific authority for the Government of Canada to act as agent and to meet costs so incurred, on a temporary basis under the powers provided in Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act. These powers enable the Government of Canada to act as an agent of the Government of an allied country "for any purpose which, in the opinion of the Governor in Council, will aid directly or indirectly in the prosecution of the war." The Department of Justice has advised the Department of Finance that these powers may be exercised following the actual cessation of hostilities and can be justified in that period because of the need for continuing various operations connected with the conclusion of the war, such as, for example, the occupation of enemy territory and the disarming of enemy forces.

MUTUAL AID; EXTENSION OF TERMINATION
DATE; INTERIM FINANCING

1. THE SECRETARY reported that, at the last meeting of the Mutual Aid Board held on August 27th, it had been agreed to refer to the Cabinet the question of a possible extension of the date for termination of Mutual Aid. It would be recalled that the United Kingdom and other governments had been notified that transfers of supplies under Mutual Aid would cease from the date of the cessation of hostilities, then taken as August 15th.

Subsequently representations had been received through the U.K. High Commissioner expressing the hope that the operation of this decision would be suspended pending discussions in Ottawa at the beginning of September with Lord Keynes and U.K. representatives. The United States government had also announced that Lease-Lend would terminate on V-J Day, and it now appeared that this would be a fortnight or more after August 15th.

The Mutual Aid Board, as a measure of interim financing pending more permanent arrangements, had agreed that U.K. wheat and orders for civilian goods should be provided for by Mutual Aid up to the agreed termination date, and that new orders should be financed under Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act.

An explanatory note prepared by the Departments of Finance and External Affairs had been circulated suggesting:

(a) that the U.K. government be informed that Canadian representatives would be prepared to discuss with Lord Keynes the extension of the effective date for the cessation of Mutual Aid; and,

(b) that provision be made to enable the government to act as agent for the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand, and possibly other governments in receipt of Mutual Aid in procuring essential supplies after the termination of Mutual Aid, and to meet costs so incurred on a temporary basis under the powers provided in Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act.

(Memorandum, August 28, 1945, Cabinet Document No. 42).

2. MR. HEENEY read a draft telegram to Mr. Attlee, approved by the Prime Minister, in reply to the representations received through Mr. MacDonald. The telegram stated that Canadian representatives would be glad to discuss with Lord Keynes methods of interim financing and the possibility of extending the effective date for the termination of Mutual Aid. It went on to say, however, that it was not possible for the government to seek a new Mutual Aid vote from Parliament.

(Draft telegram from External Affairs to Dominions Office, August 28, 1945).<sup>316</sup>

3. THE CABINET after discussion, agreed:

(i) that Canadian representatives be authorized to discuss with U.K. representatives (Lord Keynes's mission) the possibility of extending the effective date for the termination of Mutual Aid from August 15th until the date of the formal signature of the surrender of Japan;

(ii) that interim financing of essential supplies to the United Kingdom, Australia, New Zealand and possibly other countries in receipt of Mutual Aid (including the U.S.S.R.) after the termination of Mutual Aid be provided on a temporary basis under the powers conferred by Section 3 of the War Appropriation Act and that appropriate Orders in Council be passed to that effect to enable the government of Canada to act as agent for such countries;<sup>317</sup> and

(iii) that the terms of the draft telegram from the Prime Minister to Mr. Attlee be noted with approval.

IMPORTANT. SECRET. Following for the Prime Minister from the Prime Minister, Begins: Lord Keynes will have reported to you on the results of our discussions with him on the termination of Mutual Aid. The Minister of Finance made a statement yesterday to the House of Commons on the subject, advising the House that the date of termination of the transfer of supplies as Mutual Aid has been taken as midnight September 1st and that the Canadian Government has waived any rights to take title or ask an accounting for Mutual Aid supplies loaded or in ocean transit up to midnight September 1st.

As part of these arrangements, the Canadian Government is assuming liability for cancellation charges on all contracts cancelled up to September 1st and upon certain contracts in respect of which the United Kingdom had before that time asked that final decision be deferred, cancellation instructions having been subsequently received.

I am gratified that it has been found possible thus to modify the interpretation of the arrangements between us of which I advised the Secretary of State for Dominion Affairs on August 15th. I am pleased too that we were able to withhold any official announcement until today after the matter had been discussed with Lord Keynes.

As he has no doubt told you, we have deferred discussion of arrangements for financing the period of transition. When these discussions begin I need hardly assure you that our disposition will be to do everything within our power to arrive at mutually satisfactory arrangements. Ends.

FINANCING OF LOCOMOTIVE PURCHASES BY INDIA

1. The United Kingdom Government have been informed by the Indian Government of the proposals put forward by the Canadian Government for the financing of locomotives to be purchased in Canada by India. It is understood that whereas it is agreed that the purchase of these locomotives is an essential and approved war requirement and that Canada is able to supply them, owing to the nature of the goods themselves (i.e. the long life of a locomotive) they are not suitable to be provided under Mutual Aid. Accordingly Canada is proposing arrangements that would involve the opening of a credit through Canadian banks which the Indian Government would be enabled to repay over a period of three to six years.

2. The United Kingdom Government feel that for the reasons set out below they have an equal interest with India in these arrangements and indeed that in a case such as this where essential goods to be supplied by Canada to India are not eligible for Mutual Aid, the consequential financial arrangements become primarily a Canada-United Kingdom question. They would be less than candid if they did not let the Canadian Government know at once that they entertain serious misgivings in regard to the present Canadian proposals.

3. In the first place the United Kingdom authorities have regarded the financial machinery set up to facilitate the provision of Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom as implying (a) recognition by Canada of the special position of the United Kingdom as repository of the pooled dollar resources of the sterling area and (b) acceptance of the principle that any individual member of the sterling area should remain free to draw upon that pool to meet its essential and approved requirements (where Mutual Aid is not involved) without any other obligation than that of surrendering its dollar receipts to the pool when not immediately required. The United Kingdom Government feel that the Canadian proposal to extend a direct credit to India as a condition of supplying locomotives disrupts this vital principle. While the United Kingdom Government fully recognize the right of the Canadian Government to enter into direct negotiations with India in regard to the ordering of war supplies in Canada and to require direct payment by India at the time of settlement, they hope that the Canadian authorities will recognize that the arrangements which they have made with the United Kingdom in regard to the machinery of Mutual Aid must cover all legitimate sterling area requirements (among which the locomotives in question are surely to be included) and that it is contrary to the whole spirit of these arrangements that special ad hoc methods of finance should have to be found in special cases.

4. In the second place the United Kingdom authorities cannot overlook the fact that post-war foreign exchange commitments assumed by any member of the sterling area involve a direct liability against the United Kingdom Canadian dollar reserves. For this reason alone they would feel entitled to claim a vital interest in the conclusion of arrangements between Canada and individual members of the sterling area involving the assumption of such commitments. In the view of the United Kingdom Government the growing burden of the actual and contingent liabilities which are even now being assumed by the United Kingdom in respect of the current dollar requirements of the sterling area, is such that they are very reluctant to enter into new commitments relating to the post-war period.

5. For the reasons set out above the United Kingdom Government would wish to discuss alternative methods of payment for the locomotives with the Canadian authorities, as they find themselves unable to agree that financial arrangements along the lines at present contemplated by the Canadian authorities are mutually satisfactory. They earnestly hope that the Canadian Government will recognize their interest in this matter and will not allow the discussion of alternative methods of finance to delay the early placing and execution of the orders for these locomotives, which are needed in India as a matter of the utmost urgency.

6. As regards the alternatives, it would appear that if the direct use of Mutual Aid funds is held to be inappropriate there remain three possibilities:

(a) that the Indian Government should make payment in Canadian dollars through existing banking channels;

(b) that the Indian Government should make payment in sterling to Canadian account which the Canadian authorities would agree to hold as an increase in their sterling balances;

(c) that the Indian Government should make payment to Canada in U.S. dollars.

Ottawa, February 17, 1944

I am attaching hereto, for your information, copy of the Aide-Mémoire left with me yesterday by Mr. Gordon Munro, expressing the objection of the United Kingdom Government to our proposal to give a credit to India for the purchase of locomotives in Canada.

I need not say that we have never accepted the principle that any individual member of the sterling area should remain free to draw upon that pool to meet its essential and approved requirements (where Mutual Aid is not involved) without any other obligation than that of surrendering its dollar receipts to the pool when not immediately required. It is true that when dealing with the Mutual Aid arrangements for Australia<sup>318</sup> we went as far as we could to avoid disrupting the sterling area set-up but this related purely to "mechanics" and did not imply that we were always bound to avoid dislocations to the sterling area set-up, however serious the effect might be on Canada. I immediately expressed to Mr. Munro my own unfavourable reactions to the British proposals (although pointing out that payment by India in U.S. dollars might be satisfactory to us but probably unacceptable to the United States) and I went on to raise the more general issue of South Africa and New Zealand continuing to make purchases in Canada almost certainly in excess, and perhaps substantially in excess, of their current receipts of Canadian dollars but apparently without any or much desire to make formal application for Mutual Aid assistance. Personally, I do not think we can allow this to continue and that it will be necessary to get a decision from the Board as quickly as possible. If the Board is willing to grant Mutual Aid assistance to South Africa as well as to India and New Zealand and agrees that the sound principle is to follow the general principle of our Act and give Mutual Aid assistance to cover the Canadian dollar deficit of each country, then I think we should immediately call in representatives of each of these countries, explain the situation fully to them and get under way at once a program which can be defended.

<sup>318</sup>Ces arrangements sont résumés dans le télégramme 166 du 9 septembre 1943 au haut commissaire en Australie qui se trouve dans DEA/4929-D-40.

These arrangements are summarized in telegram 166 of September 9, 1943, to the High Commissioner in Australia which is in DEA/4929-D-40.

While I stated my personal opinion to Mr. Munro immediately, I promised to give further consideration to his representations and to have them discussed on a higher level.

Ottawa, February 18, 1944

Dear Mr. Munro,

You will recall our recent conversations concerning the manner of dealing under the Mutual Aid arrangements with motor vehicles which have been ordered by the United Kingdom War Office for shipment to India. Our understanding is that some of these vehicles have been for the use of British forces serving in or near India, while others have been for the use of Indian forces. I also understand, from what you said the other day and from the memorandum which you left,† that the United Kingdom authorities would now prefer that all of those vehicles to be shipped to India should be provided by Mutual Aid to the Indian Government, without distinction as to whether they are for the use of the Indian forces or the British forces. I am not clear as to whether it was the desire of your authorities that this should apply also in respect of the vehicles which have already been shipped, or merely those to be shipped henceforth.

At its last meeting the Mutual Aid Board discussed the very important questions raised by the representations made by you on behalf of your Government. The transactions have apparently been going on for some time and the sums involved are very large. Furthermore, while we appreciate the difficulty faced by your Government arising out of earlier adjustments made with the Government of India, there is the very difficult question of whether it is possible to give Mutual Aid assistance on a substantial scale to India. We were aware that India had not signed the Lend-Lease Agreement with the United States and some days ago we were informed by Mr. Mahindra<sup>319</sup> that it was doubtful whether his Government would be willing to sign our Master Agreement because of the inclusion of Article X. After considering the matter from all angles and with a desire to be as helpful as possible, the Board finally decided that if the Indian Government were prepared to sign the Master Agreement (with Article X revised as in the Agreement recently signed with your Government)<sup>320</sup> that it would be prepared to provide to India under Mutual Aid the trucks shipped to India for the use of the Indian forces. This decision in principle was made without knowledge of the proportion of trucks that were for the use of the Indian forces, on the one hand, and those which were for the use of British forces operating in or based on India. The Board felt that it could not appropriately provide to India under Mutual Aid trucks for the use of the United Kingdom forces and saw no reason why if such trucks were given under Mutual Aid to the United Kingdom and were for the use of British forces they should be charged to India. It was assumed that the trucks, which under the principle laid down above would be mutual aided to India, would represent the smaller portion of the total, but the Board wished to obtain the necessary information concerning the amounts involved in each category.

Head, Indian Supply Mission, Washington.

I am writing, therefore, to inform you of this decision in principle and to ask you if you would be good enough to obtain from your Government the facts as to the allocation of these motor vehicles between the Indian forces and the United Kingdom forces in order that we may be able to deal with an application for Mutual Aid if the Indian Government is willing to sign the Master Agreement. I would also like to inquire as to the date from which you feel it is desirable to make this segregation. I would suggest that the most appropriate date would be September 1, 1943, as it was at that time that the major transfer of motor vehicles under Mutual Aid commenced.

I realize that there may be some difficulties in determining in advance precisely how many trucks from an order for future delivery will be used by Indian forces and how many will be used by the United Kingdom and other forces. If it is not possible to make a firm forecast, I think we might consider having a preliminary division made and then this could be adjusted later on the books of the Mutual Aid Board when the trucks were finally allocated, by means of the procedure that is being arranged for taking into account diversions made from other United Kingdom orders.

It is understood that this method of payment is acceptable to you as an alternative to the credit guarantee proposals which have previously been put forward by the Canadian authorities.

As a matter of procedure it is assumed that under this arrangement the Indian Government will complete the contract arrangements on the ordinary basis of payment in Canadian dollars or sterling as appropriate. These payments will be made by India through London in the usual way and the subsequent adjustment of United States dollars against sterling would be arranged between the Bank of England and the Bank of Canada.

*Deputy Minister of Finance to Financial Adviser,

Ottawa, March 20, 1944

Dear Mr. Munro,

I am writing to confirm the verbal reply, which I gave you some time ago, to the aide-mémoire on our financing of locomotive purchases by India which you left with me.

As I told you, the questions raised in this aide-mémoire were considered by the Mutual Aid Board at the next meeting following its receipt, and I was instructed to give you the views of the Board on it.

In regard to the specific proposals suggested in lieu of the credit arrangements we had proposed to the Government of India, the Board has asked me to say that we would be prepared to receive payment for these locomotives in gold or United States dollars, but we would not wish to have payment made either in Canadian dollars, from the common pool available to the sterling area for essential purchases in Canada, or in the form of sterling to be held by Canada until after the war.

The reason that we would not wish payment to be made from the sterling area pool of Canadian dollars is, essentially, that such action, under our present arrangements, would simply lead to an increase in the value of other supplies which would need to be provided as Mutual Aid, and would thus be equivalent, from the Canadian point of view, to providing the locomotives themselves as Mutual Aid. The Board is not now prepared to supply, as Mutual Aid, or on terms that would be equivalent to Mutual Aid from the Canadian point of view, locomotives which, while although urgently needed now for essential wartime purposes, will nevertheless have a post-war value almost equal to their original cost, and which will contribute directly and fully to India's post-war economic strength. It is felt that it would hardly be reasonable to expect the Canadian Parliament to provide, at Canada's cost under Mutual Aid, goods which will have a substantial and enduring peacetime economic value to the country receiving them. It was for this reason that we proposed to have the locomotives supplied on normal commercial credit terms, which would make it possible to avoid completely the indirect effects of present payment on Mutual Aid.

In your paragraph 3 it is said that your authorities have regarded the financial machinery set up to facilitate Mutual Aid as implying our acceptance of the principle that any member of the sterling area would remain free to draw upon the United Kingdom pool of Canadian dollars to meet its "essential and approved requirements (where Mutual Aid is not involved)," subject only to the obligation of depositing its dollar receipts in that pool if they are not immediately required. We are not prepared to accept this as a general principle. We have, of course, endeavoured so far as possible to set up our financial machinery in such a way as not to interfere with the normal operations of the sterling area machinery, and we are, of course, anxious to avoid any unnecessary disturbance to the sterling area arrangement, but we cannot be expected to carry the principle of cooperation to a point where it would lead to unsound or completely unjustifiable developments from Canada's point of view. In other words, we feel that under certain circumstances we may find it necessary to require, as part of the Mutual Aid arrangements, that some part of the sterling area should deal directly with us, at least for certain types of transactions, instead of purchasing dollars from the United Kingdom pool. This may, we feel, be necessary under certain circumstances, if the policy of the Government and the intention of Parliament that we deal directly with other nations needing Canadian supplies are not to be frustrated. In this connection we have felt for some time that we must define more clearly the relation of South Africa and New Zealand to the Mutual Aid program.

In regard to the acceptance of sterling to be held until after the war, I think you are familiar with the historical evolution of our Mutual Aid program and will realize that it would be scarcely consistent with the explanations and commitments given to Parliament to resume the old practice of accumulating sterling balances in addition to using the Mutual Aid Appropriation in order to cover the Canadian dollar requirements of the sterling area.

I think it is desirable that we should have a clear understanding on the several matters of principle raised in your aide-mémoire, and I trust this letter will contribute to that end. However, I understand that in regard to the specific matter of the locomotives for India, your Government has a strong preference for payment in gold or U.S. dollars and, as this raises no difficulties from our point of view, we are proceeding with the contract on that basis.

Yours very truly,

W. C. CLARK

Dear Dr. Clark,

You wrote to me on 18th February concerning the provision of automotive equipment to the Government of India under the Mutual Aid Act and asked whether an indication could be given of the probable allocation of motor vehicles ordered in Canada between the Indian Armed Forces on the one hand, and the British Forces operating in or based on India, on the other. I am sorry that the answer to your enquiry has been delayed for so long. I have now received a message from the United Kingdom Treasury stating that the Indian Government have agreed to a provisional allocation (at the time of supply) of 50 percent of the vehicles to the Indian forces and 50 percent to the British. This will apply, not only to automotive equipment, but to other warlike stores.

2. The Indian Government have asked that they may be informed, for accounting purposes, of the numbers and values of the chassis sent to India during the period commencing 1st September, 1943 and ending 31st March, 1944, and also during each full fiscal year thereafter. It is proposed that there should be a financial adjustment between India and the United Kingdom after the end of each fiscal year, when the Canadian Government will also be notified of the final allocations so that they may adjust their Mutual Aid records accordingly.

3. I should be grateful if you would inform me whether the foregoing proposals are satisfactory to the Canadian authorities concerned and would let me know in due course as from what date the suggested accounting arrangements will begin to operate.<sup>321</sup>

MUTUAL AID AGREEMENT WITH INDIA

One of the questions which was down for consideration by the War Committee yesterday and ought to be decided without waiting for the next meeting was the conclusion of a Mutual Aid Agreement with India. The Mutual Aid Board at its last meeting decided, subject to your approval, that it was desirable that such an agreement should be entered into. While it may appear to be rather late in the day for making a new Mutual Aid Agreement, there are special considerations in the case of India. We shall in any case be sending to India for military use during the current fiscal year trucks to a value of close on $200,000,000, half for the account of the Government of India, half for the account of the United Kingdom. Up to the present (with the exception of the gift of wheat to India for famine relief)<sup>322</sup> Canadian supplies sent to India for war use on Indian account have been furnished through the United Kingdom and our understanding is that India has paid the United Kingdom in sterling for such supplies. Both the Indian and United Kingdom Governments, however, would welcome a decision on our part to furnish trucks direct to India as Mutual Aid.

The conclusion of an agreement will make no difference in the actual volume of shipments to India from Canada and the cost of the trucks will in any event fall on the Canadian Treasury. The Mutual Aid Board considered the situation in the light of the fact that India is accumulating a very large sterling balance as a result of her sales to the United Kingdom during the war. The British estimate that this balance may reach $4,000,000,000 by the end of this fiscal year. The British on political grounds are in no position to put pressure on India to reduce or eliminate this war debt through gifts in cash or kind. As Keynes explained when here they hope that they will arrange for its funding on very easy terms, possibly without interest.

The decision of the Board was that it was nevertheless desirable to extend Mutual Aid to India to a limited degree and the limit was tentatively set at one-sixth of the value of the trucks going to India or approximately $33,000,000. It was felt that this would have a beneficial effect both politically and in the promotion of post-war trade with India.

Sir Girja Bajpai<sup>323</sup> has been authorized to sign the Agreement in terms identical with our other Agreements. He wishes to sign it at Washington and to have it completed in Ottawa by our signatures. This is probably desirable since the absence of the ceremony of signature avoids publicity and the feeling of the Board was that we should not play up the conclusion of an agreement at this stage. Bajpai is prepared to sign immediately and the Embassy in Washington now has the final text and is holding it awaiting instructions to secure his signature.

Your WA-5175 of September 4th.† Mutual Aid Agreement with India. The War Committee has now approved the signature of this Agreement and you may so inform the Indian Agency General. If Sir Girja Bajpai signs in Washington the texts enclosed with my despatch No. 1215 of August 23rd,† he should leave the date blank. You might suggest to him that he forward the two originals to you under cover of a communication stating that he has been authorized by the Government of India to sign the Agreement on their behalf.

2. We feel, however, that before the Agreement is concluded you should communicate the following information to Sir Girja Bajpai or Mr. Mahindra as we do not wish them to be under any misapprehension about the probable extent of the supplies to be furnished to India under the Agreement. The main item of war supplies going to India from Canada consists of army trucks and it is expected that deliveries during the current fiscal year will reach a value of $198,000,000. Our understanding is that the provisional arrangement between the Governments of the United Kingdom and India is that each Government should be responsible for the cost of half these trucks. In view of the heavy demand against the Mutual Aid funds which have been appropriated by Parliament, we do not anticipate that we can make available to India under the Mutual Aid Agreement more than about one-third of their share of the trucks, which would amount in value approximately to $33,000,000. We wish them to know this before signature; and we hope that they will agree that the provision of trucks in this amount constitutes substantial evidence of our desire to assist them materially in the prosecution of the war.

Washington, November 4, 1944

Sir,

I have the honour to refer to your despatch no. 1215 of August 23rd† and subsequent teletypes EX-3711 of Sept. 5th and EX-4144 of October 12th† concerning the signature of the Mutual Aid Agreement with India.

2. I am now enclosing the two originals (part and counterpart) of the Mutual Aid Agreement with India signed by Sir Girja Bajpai, the Agent General, who has been authorized by the Government of India to sign the Agreement on their behalf.

3. With reference to the limitations on the extent of supplies to be furnished to India under the Agreement, as indicated in your teletype EX-3711, the First Secretary of the Indian Agency General, in transmitting these documents to us, remarked that "They (the Government of India) are most grateful to the Canadian Government for the substantial evidence provided by this Agreement of Canada's desire to assist India materially in the prosecution of the war. They hope however that the extent of Canada's mutual aid to India will in the event prove greater than is now anticipated." I enclose copies of the letter of transmittal which accompanied the signed documents.†

4. I assume that you will be making the necessary arrangements with the Wartime Information Board for appropriate publicity. The India Government Information Service in Washington have indicated their desire to cooperate in ensuring that adequate publicity accompanies the final signature of this Mutual Aid Agreement.

I have etc.

TELETYPE EX-4586

Ottawa, November 14, 1944

Your message WA-6354 of November 8th† and despatch No. 2531 of November 4th. Mutual Aid Agreement with India.

1. The Agreement has been signed by the Prime Minister but its completion must await the return of Mr. Howe from Chicago, the date of which is uncertain. You may inform the Indian Agency General of the position.<sup>324</sup>

2. With regard to publicity, we do not in present circumstances wish the signature of the Agreement to be played up. A press despatch from Delhi yesterday reported that the Finance Member of Viceroy's Council had referred to approaching completion of the Agreement and had indicated that India expected to receive locomotives and other war supplies from Canada under its terms. If he in fact said this he was misinformed on the question of locomotives since these are being purchased in Canada and not furnished under Mutual Aid. If questioned, we shall make it clear that Mutual Aid supplies to India will be limited to military supplies for the Indian forces and particularly mechanical transport.

3. The Prime Minister has approved the following statement to be issued on the conclusion of the Agreement. This has not yet been seen by Mr. Howe and, therefore, may be altered. You may however, give it as a draft to the Indian Agency General. Please inform Washington representative of the Wartime Information Board of contents of this message.

“The Prime Minister Mr. Mackenzie King announced today that a Mutual Aid Agreement had been concluded between Canada and India. The Agreement was signed by Sir Girja Bajpai, Agent General for India in the United States, on behalf of the Government of India and by the Prime Minister and the Hon. C. D. Howe on behalf of the Government of Canada. The Agreement is identical in contents with the previous Mutual Aid Agreements. Mutual Aid Agreements have been concluded with the Governments of the United Kingdom, Australia and New Zealand, the Provisional Government of the French Republic and the Soviet and Chinese Governments.

A large part of the supplies of motor transport required for the Indian Army is being furnished by Canada and it is expected that the war supplies to be furnished to the Government of India in accordance with the Mutual Aid Agreement will consist entirely of automotive equipment for the military forces in India.”<sup>325</sup>

Dear Dr. Clark,

May I refer to our previous correspondence about the provision of military trucks produced in Canada for shipment to India and the manner in which this programme should be financed. As you will recall, this correspondence took place before the signature by India of a Mutual Aid Agreement with Canada. It is my understanding that the arrangements now contemplated by the Canadian authorities provide that part of India's share in the total cost of this programme, should be financed out of Mutual Aid Appropriation and that this proportion works out at about $33 million or approximately one-third of India's share. That share, in its turn, was, as you know, estimated by the United Kingdom authorities at approximately 50% of the total cost of the programme as a whole, and it is, I believe, on the basis of this percentage that subsequent discussions between the Indians and yourselves were conducted.

Mr. A. C. B. Symon of the India Supply Mission in Washington has now called my attention to a letter dated the 6th September last from Mr. L. B. Pearson to the Agent General for India in Washington† in which the formal decision of the Canadian Government is set forth. A copy of this letter is no doubt available on your files. Mr. Symon tells me that he duly communicated the substance of this letter to the Government of India and that he has now received in reply a message which raises certain questions of interpretation on which he feels it is desirable that the Canadian authorities should be consulted. He suggests that since we, in this Office, were fairly intimately concerned at an earlier stage, it might be more convenient for me to take the matter up with you rather than that he should refer it to the Canadian Embassy in Washington.
