Pacifico claims had been. A Swiss house of Jecker \& Company had lent the former Government of Mexico $\mathbf{7 5 0 , 0 0 0}$, and got bonds from that Government, which was on lits very last legs, for $\$ 15,000,000$. The Government was immedl ately afterwards upset, and Juarez came into power. M. Jecker modestly put in hls clalm for $\$ 15,000,000$. Juarez refused to comply with the demend. He offered to pay the $\$ 750,000$ lent and five per cent. Interest, hut he decllned to pay exactly twenty tlmes the amount of the sum advanced. M. Jeckcr had hy thls tlme become sonachow a suhject of France, and the French Government took up hls elalm. It was clear that the Emperor of the French had resolvell that there should be war. At last the designs of the French Goverament became evldent to the Eng. Ilsh and Spanlsh Plenlpotentiaries, and England and Spaln withdrew from the Convention.
The Emperor of the French 'walked his own wild road, whither that led hlm.' He overran a certaln portion of Mexico with hls troops. He captured Puehla after a long and dcsperate resistnnce [and after suffering a defeat on the 5 th of May, 1862. In the battle of Cinco de Mayo]; he occupled the caplat, and he set up the Mexican Emplre, wlth Maxlmillan as Emperor. Freach troops remalned to protect the new Emplre. Against all this the United States Goverument protested from tlme to tlme.

However, the Emperor Napoleon cared nothing just then about the Monroe doctrine, complacently satisfied that the Unlted States were golng to pleccs, and that the sonthern Confederacy would be hls friend and ally He recelved the protests of the American Government with unvelled ladifference. At last the tlde in American affalrs turned. The Confederacy crumblel awne; lichmond was taken; Lee surrendereil; Jefferson Davls was a prisoner. Then the United States returned to the Mexican Questlon, and the American Goverament Informed Louis Napoleon that it would be laconvenicnt, gravely lncon venient, if he were not to withdraw his solillers from Mexico. A slgnificant morement of American troops under a renowned General, then fushed with success, was made ln the dlrection of the Mexican frontler. There was nothing for Louls Napoleon hut to withdraw [Mareh, 1867]. . . . The Mexicnn Emplre lasted two months and a week after the last of the Freneh troops had been withdrawn. Maximilian enteavoured to raise an army of his own, and to defend himself against the dally lncreasing strength of Juarez. He showed all the courage which milght have been expeeted from lis race, and from his own prevlous history. But in an evil hour for himself, and yleldlag, it is stated, to the persuaslon of a French officer, he had lssied a decree that all who resisted his authority in arms should be shot. By virtue of thls monstrous ordinance, Mexlcan officers of the regular army, taken prisoners whlle reslstling, as they were bound to do, the lavaslon of a European prince, were shot like hrigands. The Mexlcan general, Ortega, was one of those thus shamefully done to death. When Juarez con ucred, and Maximillan, ln hls turn, was made a prisoner, he was tried hy court-martlal, condemned and shot.

But if we are to seiect nny speciai date $t \cdot m$ rt :hi. change, the year 476 is the best ior the purpose. .. When we turn to thic close of n:tedievai history we find no such general agreeuient as to the specific date which shall be selerted to stand for that fact. For one author it is 1453, the fail of the Easten Roman Empire through the capture of Constantiuople by the Turks; for another, 1492, the discovery of Imer. ica; for another, 1520 , the full opening of the Reformation. Tinis varicty of date is in itself very significant. It unconsciousiy marks the ef tremely important fact that the midille sges conic to an end at different dates in the different lines of advance-manlfestiy earifer in politics anil economics than upon the intelleetual side

It is a transition age. Lying, as it doks. between two agcs, in each of wheh there is sn especiaily rapld advance of civilization, it ls not itself primarily an age of progress, As compareni witb either anclent or modern history, the inlditions which werc made during the miludle anges to the common stock of clvilization are few and unimportant. Absoiutciy, perlaps, the are mut so. $\qquad$ But the most importaut of thens f:ill within the last part of the period, and they :re realiy indications that the age is tirawing to a cluse, and a ncw and different one coming oa frygress, however much there nuy have bee: i, not its distinctive charaeteristic There is a 1wimiar recognition of this fact in the general inginion that the medicvai is a very barren snd uninterestling period of history - the 'dsrb ages'-so confused and without evilent plan that its facts are a mere disorganlzed jumble. inpossibie to reduce to systen or to hoid in mind. This must be cmphaticaliy true for every one. nnicss there can be fonnd running through all its confusion some single ine of evolution which wiii give it meaning and organizatlon.
Most certainiy there must be some such general meaning of the age. The orderiy and regulas progreas of history makes it imposatble that it hould be otherwise. Whether that meaning an be correctly stated or not is mueh more un certain. It is the difficulty of doing this whieh makes medieval history seem so comparatively barren a perlod. Themost evident general mean. ing of the age is . assimilation. The great eat work which had to be done was to bring the German barbarinn, who had taken possession of the ancient world and become everywhere the ruilng race, up to sueh a level of attainment and understanding that he would be able to take up the work of civilization where antiquity had been forced to suapend lt and go on with it from that point.

Here, then, is the work of the middle ages. To the reauits of aneient history were to be added the ideas and institutions of the Germans; to the enfeehled Roman race was to be added the youthful energy and vigor of the German. Uncier the conditions which existed this union eould not be made-a harmonions and homogeneous Christendom could not be formed, except through centuries of time, through anarehy, and ignoranee, and supersti-Hon."-G. B. Adams, Civilization During the riddle Ages, introd, - "We speak, sometimes, of the 'Dark Ages,' and in matters of the exdet scleaces perhaps they were dark enough. Fet we muat deduet something from our youthful ideas of their obscurity when we find that our truest lovers of beauty fix the building age of the world between the gears 500 and 1500 of our era. Architecture, more than any other art, is an index to the happiness and freedom of the people: and during this peric 1 of 1,000 years, an rchitceture, pure in its prineiples, reasonable in its praetice, and beautiful to the eges of all men, ven the simplest,' covered Europe with beauti. ui buildings from Constantinople to the north of Britain. In presence of this manifestation of free and productite intel'i tence, unmatehed even in anelent Frace and Route, und utterly unmatchable to-day, vin may usefuily refiect upon the expressive and conatructive force of the spirit of Jhristendom, even in its darkeat hours. The more closely we examine the question, the less ground we shall find for the conception of the Middle Ages as a long aleep followed by a sudden awakening Rather we thouid consider that ancient Greeec was the root, and ancient Rome the stem and hranehes of our life; that the Dark Ages, as we cali them represent its flower, and the modern worli of acience and politieal freedom the slowly-matured fruit. If we consider earefully that the Chrlatian bumanistie apirit helditself as eharged from tho first with the destinies of the illiterate and haif heathen massea of the European peoples, where 4s, neither in Greece nor in the Roman Empir Fas cirilisation intended for moro than a thiril or s fourth part of the inhabitants of their terri tones, we shall not be surprised at an apparent fali of intelleetuai level, whieh really meant the beginning of a universal rise hitherto unknown in the history of the worid. Ideas of this kind may help us to understand what must remain after all a paradox, that we have been taught to apply the term 'Dark Ages' to the period of what were in some respects the greatest achieve. ments of the human mind, for example, the

. It is perfectly ohvious now to all who look carefully at these queations, that the instinet of our physical sclence and naturalistic art, of our evolutfonist philosophy and democratie politice. is not antagonistic to, but is essentially oue with the instinet which, in the Middle Ages, regarded all beauty and truth and power as the working of the Divine reason in the mind of mas and in nature. What a genuine though grotesque anticipation of Charles Darwin is there in Francis of Assisi preaching to the hirrls !"-B. Bosanquet, The Civilization of Chriatendom, eh. 8.-
'I know nothing of those ages which knew nothing.' I really forget to which of two eminent wits this saying belongs; but I have often thought that I should have liked to ask him how he came to know $s 0$ curlous and important : faet $\mathbf{r}$ speeting ages of whieli he knew nothing. Was it merely by hearsay? Everybody allows, however, that they were dark ages. Certainly but what do we mean by darkness? Is not the term, as it is generally used, compara tive? Suppose I were to say that I am writing ' in a little dark room,' would you understand me to mean that I could not see the paper before me ? Or If I should say that I was writing 'on a clark day, would your think I meant that the aun had not risen by noon? Well, then, let me beg gout to remember this, when you and I use the term, dark ages.

Many eauses . . have coneurred to renter those ages very dark to us; but, for the present, I feel it suffieient to remind the reader, that darkness is quite a different thing from shutting the eges; and that we have no right to eomplain that we can see hut little until we have used due diligence to see what we ean. As to the other point - that is, as to the degree of darkness in which those ages were really invoived, and as to the mode and degree in which it affeeteil those who lived in them, must express iny belief, that it las been a goot deal exaggerated. There is no doubt that those who lived in what are generally ealied the 'middle' or the 'dark' ages, knew nothing of many things wheh are familiar to us, and whieh we deeni essential to our comfort, and almost to our existence; but still I doubt whether, even in this point of view, they were so entirely dark as some would have us auppose."-S. R. Mastino had himself cherished the project of an Italian Kingtom: hu ${ }^{+}$he died before approaching its accomplishment. The degeneracy of his house began with his three sons. The two younger killed the eldest; of the survivors the stronger slew the weaker and then died $\ln 1374$, leaving his domalns to two of his bastards. One of these, named Antonio, kilied the other in 1381, and afterwnrds fell a prey to the Visconti in 1387. in his suhjagation of Verona Gian Galeazzo contrived to inake use of the Carram family, although these princes were allled by marric.ge to the Scaligery, and had everytining o lose by their downfall. He:zext proceeded to attack Padna, and gained the co-operation of Venice. In 1888 Francesco da Carrara had to cede his territory to Viscontl's generals, who in the same year possesed themselves for hlm of the Trevisan Marches. It was then thst the Venetians 4 w too late the crror they had commilted in suftering Verona and Pactus to be annexed hy the Vleconti.

Havlng now made hlmeelf master of the north of Italy with the ezceptlon of Mantua, Ferrara, and Boiogna, Glan Gaieszzo turned his attention to these cltes." By intrigues of devillsh suhtiety and mailgnity, he drew the Marqull of Ferrara and the Maryuls of Mantua lnto crimes which were thelr ruln, and made hif conquent of thoae citles casy. "The whole of Lombardy was now prostrate before the Mllanese vlper. IIls next move was to set foot in Tuscany. For thls purpose Pisa had to be acqulred; and here agaln he resorted to his devillsh polley of Inciting other men to crimes hy which he alone would profit in the long run. Hisa was ruled at that tlme hy the Gamhacorta famlly, with an old merchant named Pletro at thelr hcad." Glan Galcazzo caused Pletro to be assasslnated, and then bought the clty from the assaulns (1390). "In 1300 the Duke lald hands on Blena; and in the next two years the plague came to his asalatance by enfeebllng the rulling familles of Lucca and Bologna, the Gulnizzl and the Bentlvogli, so that he was now ahle to take possesslon of those citles. There remalned no power lo Itaiy, except the Rcpublle of Florence and the exiled but invincible Francesco da Carrara, to withstand his further progress. Florence [see Flohence: A. D. 1890-1402] delayed his conquests in Tuscany. Francesco managed to return to Padua. Sill the peril which threatened the whole of Italy was inminent.

At last, when all other hope of independence for Italy had falled, the plague broke out whth fl'y ln Lombardy, "and Glan Galeazzo dled of it $\ln 1402$, aged 35. "At hls death hls two sons were still mere boys. The gencrals refused to act with them, and each selzed upon such portions $c^{*}$ the Viscontl inheritance as he could most easlly acquire. ML. Frost, of the Missouri state militia, a graduate of West Point and a thorough soldier. Is sald to have called Governor Jackson's attentlon to the necessity of 'iooking after' it.

Jaekson, however, needed no prompting.
lie did not hesitate to give Frost authority to seize the arsenai, whenever in his judgment it might hecome necessary to do se. Meanwhile he was to assist in protecting it against mob violence of any kind or from any source.
Frost, however, was not the oniy person in St. Louis who had his eyes fixed upon the arsenal and ita contents. Frank Blair was looking long. ingly in the same direction, and was already busily engaged in organiziny the bands which, suppliel with guns from this very storehouse, enabled him, some four monthm later, to lay fuch a heapy hand upon Missouri. Just then, it is truc, he could not arm them, . . but he did not permit this to interfere with the work of reeruitlag and drilliag. That weat on ateadily, and as a consequence, wben the moment came for action, Blair was abie to appear at the deeisive polnt with a weil-srmed force, ten times as numerous as that whieh his opponents could hring against him. In the mean time, whist these two, or rather three, parties (for Frost can hardly be termed a secessionist, though as nn officer in the service of the State he was willing to olvy the orders of his commander) were watchlng pach cher, the federal government awoke from its lethargy, and began to concentrate tropps in st. Louls for the protection of its property.

By the 18th of February, the day of the election of delegates to the convention which prononacerl ©s decidedly against secession, there were between four and five hundred men behind the arsenal walls.

Generai Harney, who was In command of the department and presumably famlliar with its condition, under date of Fethruary 10, notified the authorities at Washington tbat there was no danger of an attack, and never had been. . . . Such was not the opinlon of Captain Nathanlel Lyon, who had arrived it the arsenal on the 6th of Fehruary, and who was destined, in the short space of the conilng sls months, to write his name indelihly in the history of the State. . . Under the stimulnting in fluence of two such spirits as Blair and fluence of two such spirits as Blair and. [Lyon] the work of preparation went brawly on. By the middle of April, four regiments had leen enllsted, and Lyon, who was now in command of the arsenal, though not of the department, proceeded to arm them in accordanee with an orler Which Blair had procured from Wushington. Baeked by thls force, Blair felt strong enough to set up an opposition to the state government. and accordingly, when Jackson refinsed to furnish the quota of troops assignedi to Missuri under Presldent Lincoln's call of A pril 15. Wefl [see United States of Am.: A. 1). 1Mil (Arril)], he telegraphed to Washington that if an order to muster the men into the service was sent to Captain Lyon the requlsition would le filled in two days.' The onder was duly forwarded, and five regiments having lee-n swurn in instead of four, as calied for, Blalr was of. fered the command. This he declineml. aml. on his recommendation, Lyon was elected it his place. On the 7th and 8tb of May nnother hrigade was organized.

This made ten recrl. ments of volunteens, besides severul (rminsinis of regulars and a battery of artlllery, that were now ready for service; and as Genernl llarney. whose relatives and assoclates were susprettel if disloyaity, had been ordened to Waslingten to explain his position, Lyon was virtually in command of the department. $\qquad$ Jackson.
though possessed of hut little actinal power, whs unwilling to give up the contest withoit an effort. Fle did not accept the decislon of the February election as final. . . . Repalring to sit. Louls, as soon as the adjournment of the fencral Assemhly had left him Yree, he began at once, in conjunction with certain leading secesslonists. to roncert measures for arming the militin of the State. . . . how thit could best be done, when the surrender of Fort Sumter and the President's consequent cali for troope hurried Jackson lato a position of satagonism to the federal government.

Ife ment mensengers to the Confederate authorities at Montgomery, Alabarma, asking them to supply him with the guns that were needed for the proposed attack on the arsenai; and he summoned the General Assemhiy to meet at Jeferson City on the 2 d of May, to deilberate upon such measures as might be deemed necessary for piacing the State in a position to defend herself. He slso ordered, as he was authorized to do under the law, the commanders of the several military districts to hoid the reguiar yearly encampments for the purpose of instructing their men in drill sad discipline.

Practicaliy lts effect was Ilmited to the first or Frost's hrigade, as that was the only one that had been organized under the isw. On the 3d of May, this little band, num. bering less than 700 men, pitched their tents in a wooded vailey in the outskirts of the city of St . Louis, and named it Camp Jackson, in honor of the governor, It is described as being surrounded on aif sides, at short range, hy commanding hilis; It was, moreover, open to a charge of eavalry in any and every direction, and the men were suppiled with but five rounis of ammunition each, hardly cuough for guard purposes. In a word, it was defenseless, and this fact is belleved to be conclusive in regarl to the pescefui character of the camp as it was organ. ized. . . Lyon . . . announced his intention of seizing the entire force at the camp, without any ceremony other than a demand for lts surrender.

Putting ins troops in motion early in the morning of the 10th of May, he surrounded Cainp Jackson and clemanded its surrender. As Frust couid make no defense against the overwhelming odds hrought against him, he was of course ohliged to comply; and his men, having been lisarmed, were marchet to the arsenal, where they were paroled. . . . After the surrealer, and whilst the prisoners were standing in ine, waiting for the order to march, a crowd of men, women and children coliected and began to abuse the home guaris, attacking them with stones and other misslles. It is even said that sevcrai shots were fired at them, but this lacks contirmation. According to Frost, Who was at the limad of the column of prisoners, the first intimation of firing was given by a single shot, followni almost immediately hy volley firing, which is said to have been executed with precision considering the rawncss of the troops. When the fusillale was checked, it was found that 28 persons had been killed or mortalif wounded, among whom were three of the prisoners, two women, and one child. Judgling this action by the reasons assigned for it, and by its cffect throughout the state, it misat be pronounced a biunder. So far from intimilating the secessionists, it served oniy to exasperate them; and it drove not sfuw Union men, among them General Steriing Price, into the ranks of the opposition and ultimately into the Confederate army."-L. Carr, Jineniri, ch. 14. - When news of the capture of Camp Jackson reached Jefferson City, where the legislature was in session, Governor Jackson at once ordered a hridge on the rallrosd from St. Louls to be destroyed, and the iegisiature made haste to puass scveral blis in the interest of tho rebellion, including one which placed the whoie military power of the State in the hands of the Governor. Armed with this authority, Jackson proceeded to organize the Militia of Sissourl as a seceaslon army. Meantime Captain Lyon had been superseded in command hy the arrival at 8t. Louis of General Harney, and the latter introduced a total change of policy at once. He was trapped into an agreement with Governor Jackson and Steriing Price, now general-in-chief of the Missouri forces, which tied his hands, whife the cunning rebei ieariers were rapidiy piaeing the State in active insurrection. But the eyes of the authorities at Washington were opened hy Blair; Harncy was soon displaced and Lyon restored to command. Thls occurred May 30th. On the 15 th of June Lyon took possession of the capital of the State. Jefferson City, the Governor and other State ofticers taking fight to Boonville, where their forces were being gathered. Lyon promptly foliowed, routing and dispersing them at Boonville on the 17th. The State Convention which had taken a recess In Mareh was now called together by a committec that had been cmpowered to do so before the convention separated, and a provisional State government was organized (Juiy 31) with a loyal governor, Homiton R. MITHRIDATIC WARS, The.-A somewhat vaguely defined part of eastern Asfa Minor, between Armenla, Phrygia, Cilleia and the Euxinc, was called Cappadocia in times anterior to 363 B. C. Like its neighbors, it had fallen under the rule of the Persians and formed a province of their empire, ruled hy hereditary satraps. In the year above named, the then reigning satrap, Ariobarzanes, rebelled and made himself Eing of the northern coast distriet of Cappadocia, while the southern and inland part was retained under Persian rule. The kingdom founded hy Ariobarzanes took the name of Pontus, from the sea on which it bordered. It was reduced to suhmission hy Alexander the Great, hut regained independence during the wars between Alexander's successors (see Macedonia: B. C. $310-801$; and SeledCIDE: B. C. 281-224), and extended its limits towards the west and south. The klngdom of Pontus, however, only rose to imporiance in hlstory under the powerful soverelgnty of Mithridates V. who took the title of Eupator and is of teu ealled Mithridates the Great. He ascendedi the throne while a ehild, B. C. 120, hut recelved, notwithstanding, a wonderful education and trainlng. At the age of twenty (B. C. 112) he entered upon a eareer of conquest, which was intended to strengthen his power for the strug. gle with Rome, which he saw to be inevitahie. Withln a period of about seven years he extended his dominions around the nearly complete elrcuit of the Euxine, through Armenfa, Colehis, and along the northern coasts westward to the Crimea and the Dnleater; while at the same tlme he formed aliiances with the harbarous tribes on the Danube, with whieh he hoped to threateu Itaiy.-G. Rawilnson, Manual of Ancient Hitt., bk. 4, perimi 3, pt. 4.-"He [Mithridates] rivalled Hannibal in hls unquenchable hatred to Rome. Tbls hatred had its origin $\ln$ the revocation of a distriet of Phrygia whleh the Senate had granted to his father. . . . Ife was alled, too, with the Armenlan king, Tigranes; and he now turned his thonghts to Numldia, Syria, and Egypt with the intention of forming a coalition against his foe on the Tiber. A coin has been found winch commemorated an aliance proposed between the Pontie kling and the Italian rebels. . . . The imperious folly of M'. Aquii. lius, the Roman envoy in the East, preclplated the intentions of the king; lnstead of contendlug for the princedom of Bithynia and Cappadocla, he suduleniy appealed to the disaffected in the Roman province. The fierce white fire of Asiatic hate shot out simultaneously through the iength and hreadth of the country [B. C. 88 ]; and the awful news came to distracted Rome that 80,000 Italians had fallen victims to the vengeance of the provinclals. Terrorstricken puhlicanl were chased from Adramyttium and Ephesus lnto the sea, their only refuge, and there cut down by their pursuers; the Nirsider was rolling along the corpses of the Italians of Trallea; In Caria the refined cruelty of the oppressed people was hutchering the chiidren before the eyes of father and mother, tiren the mother before the eyes of her husband, ani giv. ing to the man death as the crown and the relief of his torture. $\qquad$ Asia was lost to Rome; oniy Rhodes, which had retained her indep nuience. remained faithful to her great aliy. The Pontic fieet, under Archelaus, appeared at Deios, and carried thence 2,000 talents to Athens, offering to that Imperial clty the government of her snclent trihutary. This politic measure swaked hopes of independence in Greece. Aristion, an Epicurean philosopher, seized the reins of piwer in Athens, and Archelaus repaired the erumiliing hattlements of the Pireus. The wave of eastern conquest was rollng on towards Italy itseif. The proconsul 8ulla marched to Bruudisium, and, undeterred hy the ominous news that his eonsular colleague, $Q$. Rufus, hat been nurdered in Plcenum, or by the sinister attitudic of the new consul Clnna, he erossed over to Greece With five leglons to stem the advancing wave. He left Rome to his enemles, the flerce faction of Marius, who were prompt to seize the city and to fill it wlth "wailing for the deai, or with the more terrihle sllence whleh followel a complete massacre" [see Rome: B. C. 88-i8]. "The news of thls carnlval of democracy reached the eamp of sulla along with innumeratie moble fugitives who had escaped the Matin! terror The proconsul was unmoved; witil unver:mpied self-confidence he began to assume that he and his constituted Rome, while the Fornun and Curia were filled with lawless anarchists, who would soon have to be dealt witi. Archelaus, in lineus, offered the most heroic resistance. . . dimater aroused all the savagery of Mithradates the Greek vanished in the oriental despot. Suspicious and ruthless, he ordered his nearest triends to be assassinated; he transporteif all the population of Chios to the mainiand, and hy his violence and exaction stirred Ephesus, Sardes, Tralles, and many other cities, to renounce his control, and to return to the Roman government. Still. he did not suspect Archelaus, but appointed him, together with Dorilaus, to lead a new army into Greece. The new army appeared ln Beotia, and encamperi by the Copalc Lake. near Orchomenos. Before the raw levies could becone familiar with the sight of the legions, Sulla assaulted the camp [B. C. 85], and rallied bis wavering men by leading them in person With the cry, 'Go, tell them in Rome that you left your general in the trenches of Orchoine nos: the self.consclousness was sublime. for nothing would have plensed the people in Rome better; his victory was complete, ar I Archelaus escmped alone in a boat to Calchis. As the conqueror returned from the battle-ticld tu reorganize Greece, he learnt that the Senate had deposed him from command, declared him an outlaw, him from command, declared him an outlaw, and appointed as his successor the consul L. Valerius Flaccus. The disorganization of the republic seemed to have reached a climax. Flaccus conducted his army straight to the Esphorus without venturing to approach the rebel procon. sul Sulla; while Sithradates, who began to wish for peace, preferred to negotlate with his conqueror rather than with the consul of the re. public. To complete this complication of anarcly, Flaccus was murdered. aui superseticil In the command hy his own legate, C. MoABITES, The,-The Moabite Stone.As rclated in the Bible (Gen. xix. 37), Moab was people called Moabites were descended fromelent people called Moabites were descended from hlm. land or hlgllanals on the east side of the Dead Sa; but the Amorites drove thern out of the richer northern part of this territory into lta southern half, where they occupicd a very narrow domaln. but one easily defended. Thisoccurred slortly before the coming of the Israelites into Canaan. Between the Moabites and the Israelites, after the settlement of the latter, there was frequent war, but sometimes relations both peaceful and friendly. Davld finally aubjugated their nation, In a war of peculiar atrocity. After the divislon of the kingdoms, Moab wns subject to Israel, but revolted on the death of Ahab and was nenrly destroved in the horrihle war which followel. The Biblical account of this war is given in 2 Kings III. It is strangely supplemented nud tilled out by a Moahite record - the famous Moabitc Stone - found and declphered withln quite recent times, under the following cireumstance. Ir. Kleln, a Germinn misslonary, travelling in 1860 in what was formerly the "Land of Monbs," discovered a stone of black basalt bearing a lony inscrlption In Phernician characters. He ropied a small part of it and made his discovery known. The Prussian government opened nego tiations for the purchase of the atone, and M. Clermont-Ganneati, of the French consulate at Jerusillem. made efforts likewise to secure it for his wwn country. Meantimc, very fortunately, the latter seut men to take inpressions-squeezes, ns thry are called - of the inscription, which was lmperfectly done. But these Imperfect squeezers prover invaluable; for the Arabs, find. ing the stune to be a covetable thing, and fearing that it was to be taken from them, crumbled it into fragments with the aid of fire and water. Most of the pieces were subsequently recovered. and wcre put together by the help of M. Cler-mont-Ganneau's sylueezes, so that an important part of the inscription was deciphered in the end It wise frund to be a record by Miesha, king of Moab. of the war with Israei referred to above.-A. MOERIS, Lake.-' On the west of Egypt there is an oasis of cultivable land, the Fayim. buried in the midst of the desert, and attached by a sort of isthmus to the country watered by the Nile. In the centre of thls oasis ls a large platenu aiwut the same leval as the valley of the Nile; to the west, however, a considerable depression of the land produces a valley oceupied by a natural lake nore than ten leagues in length, the 'Blrket Kerun.' In the centre of this plateau Amenemhe [twelfth dyuasty] undertook tlot formatlon of an artitielal lake with an area of ten whence the term '解ncelitia, or sharer of the cell, came to exprem thb sort of comradeship; in the Thebaid, under Pach mnius of Tabenne, each cell contained three monics. At a iater perlod the monks arrogated to themseives by general consent the titie of 'the religious,' and admistion intu a monastery was termed 'convernion' to God.

The history of monasticism, ike the history of states and institutions in general, divides itcelf broadly into three great periods, of growth, of glory, and of decay.

From the beginning of the fourth century to the ciose of the Ifth, irom Antony the hermit ic Benedict of lionte Casino, is the age of undisciplined impulse of enthusianm not as yet reguiated by experience.

Everything if on a scate of iflogical exag. geration, is wanting in balance, in proportion, In symmetry. Because purity, unworluliness, charity, are virtues, therefore a woman is to be regarded as a venomous reptife, gold as a worthless pebble; the dendilest foe and the dearest frlend are to be esteemed just alike. Because it is right to be humhie, therefore the monk cuts nif hand, ear, or tongue, to avoid beling made olshop, and feigns idiocy, in order not to be accounted wise. Because lt is weli to teach people to be patlent, therefore a sick monk never speaks a kind word for years to the brother monk who nursed him. Because it is right to keep the lips from idle words, therefore a monk hoids a farge stone in his mouth for three years. Every precept is to be taken literaily, and obeyed unreaeoningly. Therefore monks who have been plundered by a rohber run after him to give him a something which has escaped his notice. Self. denial is enjolned in the gospel. Therefore the austerities of asceticiom are to be simply endiess. One ascetic makes his dwelling in a hollow tree, another in a cave, another in a tomh, another on the top of a pillar, another has so lost the very appearance of a man, that he is shot at by shepherds, who mistake him for a wolf. The natural instinets, instead of belag trained and cultivated. are to le killed outright, in this abhorrence of things material.

The perlod which follows. from the first Benediet to Charlemagne, exhibits monasticism in a more mature stage of activity. The social intercourse of the momastery, duly harmonized hy a traditional routine, with its subordination of rank and offices, its division of duties, its mutual dependence of all on each other, and on their head, civilized the monastic life; and, as the monk himself became subject to the refining infiuences of eivilization, he went forth into the world to civilize others.

Ilad it not been for monks and monasteries, the barbarian deluge might have swept away utterly the traces of Roman eirllization. The Benedie. tine monk was the ploneer of divilizatlon and Christianity in England, Germary, Poland, Bo. hemia, Sweden, Denmark. The schoc., attached to the Lerinensian monasterles were the precursors of the Benedictine seminaries in France and of the professional chairs filled by learned Benedictines in the universities of medireval Christendom. With the incessant din of arms around him, it was the monk in his cloister, even in regions leyond the immediate sphere of Benedict's legisfation, even in the remote fastnesses, for instance of Mount Athos, who, by preserving and transcribing ancient manuscripts, both Chris. tian and pagan, as well as hy recording his observations of contemporaneous events, was hand-

MONEY AND BANRING.

Nature and Origla of Money.-"When the division of labour has been once thoroughly established, It is but a rery small part of a man's wants which the produce of hls own labour can supply. He supplies the far greater part of them by exchanging that surplus part of the produce of hls own labour, whleh is over and above his own consumptlon, for sucis parts of the jroduce of other men's labour as he has occaslon for. Every man thus lives by exchang. ling, or becomes in some measure a merchant, and the society ltself growe to be what ls prop. erly a commerclal society. But when the division of labour first began to take place, thls power of exchangling must frequently have been very much ciogged and embarrassed ln lts opera. rlons. One man, we slaail suppose, has more of a certaln commodity than he himself has occaslon for, while auother has less. The former consequeatly would be glad to dispose of, and the latter to purchase, a part of thls superfulty. But if this latter should chance to have nothling thut the former stands ln need of, no exchange can be made between them. The butcher has more incat in his shop than he himseif can consume, aad the brewer and the baker would eacis of them he willing to purchase a part of it. But they have nothing to offer ln exchange, except tive differeat productions of their respectlve tralles, and the butcher is already provided with all the bread and beer which he has lmmedlate occasion for. No excinsige caa, In this case, be madie between them. . . . In order to avold the iucunvenlency of such situations, every prudent man in every period of soclety, after the first (stah)lishment of the divislon of labour, must naturaily have endcavoured to manage inls affalrs in such a manner, as to have at all times by him. hesides the pecuiiar produce of his own industry, a certala quantity of some one commodity or other, such as he imagined few people would be iikely to refuse in exchange for the produce of their industry. Many different commodities, it is probable, wcre successively both thought of and employed for thls purpose. In the rude ages of sefety, cattle are sadd to have been the common instrument of commerce; and, though they must have been a most Inconvenlent one, yet $\ln$ old thes we find thlags were frequently valued according to the number of cattle which had been glven In exehange for them. The armour of Dlomede, says Homer, coat onily nine oxcn; hut that of Glaucus cost an huminyloxen. Salt is sald to be the common lnetrument of manmerce and exehange in Abysslnla; a spuricy of sheells ln some parts of tie coasts of Indla; ified cod at Newfoundiand; tobacco ln Virgiala; sugar ln some of our West India colonles; lidies or dressed icather in some other countries: aml there ls at thls day [1775] a vlllage in scothan where it ls not uncommon, I am told, for a work. man to carry nalls instead of uouey to the baker's shop or the alehouse. In all countries, however, men seem at last to have lewen deter. mined by lrresistible reasons to glve the preference, for thls employment, to metais almeve ectry other commodity."-Adam Smlth, ilithlih of Antions, ch. 4, bk. 1 ( r .1 ).-" There is ... no machlne which has saved as much lulnir as money. . . . The Invention of moncy has heea rightly compared to the lnvention of writiag with letters. We may, however, call the lntroduction of money as the unlversai medium of exchange . one of the greatest and most bencficent of advances cver made by the mace.

Very different klnds of commolitits liave. according to circumatances, been used as nomer but uniformly oniy suci as possess a unlversally recognazed ecouomlc valne. Ou the winde, people ln a low stage of clvillzation are wont to employ, malnly, only ordlnary commonlities. such as are calculated to satlsfy a vulgar sad urgent want, as an lnstrument of exchange. As they adrance ln clvillzatlon, they, at each step. choose a more and more costly object, for this purpose, and one whlch minlsters to the more elevated wants. Races of hunters, at least la non-troplcal countries, usually use skins as money; that is the almost excluslve proluct of thelr labor, one which can be preserved for a long perfod of time, whlch constitutes their prin. clpal artlcle of clothing and thelr principal export in the more highly developell regions Fumadie races and the lower agricultural races. pass, hy a natural gradation, to the use of cattle as money; which supposes rich pasturages at the diaposeal of all If It were otherwise, there would be a great many to whom paymenta of this kind hed been made, who would not know What to do with the cattle given them, on account of the charges for thetr malntenance. Thut metale were used for the purpoes of money nuch later than the commadities above men. tloned, and the precious metals in turn later than the non-prectous metals, cannot hy any means be shown to be univernally true. father is gold in some countrics to be obtained by the exercise of so little skill, and both gold and silver matisfy a want solifro and general, and one so early feit, that they are to be met with as an instrument of exchange in very early times. In the case of Isolated races, much depends on the nature of the metals with which the geologic constitution of the country has furnished them. In general, however, the abovo law is found to prevail here. The higher the development of a people becomes, the more frequent is the occurrence of large pay. ments; and to effect these, the more contly a nutuil is, the better, of course, it is adapted to effect such paymenta. Beuides, only rich nations are able to poneses the contly metais in a quantity absolutely great. Among the Jews, gold as noney dates only from the time of David. King Pheifion, of Argos, it is sali, introluced silver noney into Greece, about the middle of the elgith century before Christ. Gold came into use ut a much later perlod. The Romans struck silver money, for the first time, in 209 before Clirist, and, in 207, the first gold coins. Among modern nations, Veuice (1285) and Florence seem whave been the first to have coined gold in any quantity."-W. Roscher, Prineiples of Pulitical Equamy, bk. 2, eh. 3, eect. $117-119$ (v. 1).
Ancient Egypt and Bahylonla.-" Money sems to us now so obvious a convenience, and 8.) much a necessity of commerce, that it apjuars almost Inconceivable that a people who createl the Sphinx and the Pyramids, the temples of Ipsamboul and Karnac, should have been entirely gnorant of coins. Yet it appears from the statements of Herolotus, and the evidence of the monumenta themselves, that this was really the case. Aa regards the commercinl and buaking systems of ancient Egypt, we are aimost entirely without information. Their standurd of value seems to have been the 'outen' or 'ten' of copper (94-98 grammes), which circulated like the res rude of the Romans by weight, and in the form of bricks, keing measured by the baiauce. It was obtained from the nines of Slount Sinni, which were worked as eariy as the fourth dy. nasty. Gold and silver appear to have been also usd, though less frequently. Like copper, they were sometimes in the form of briks, but generally in rings, resembling the ring money of the ancient Celts, which is said to have been em. ployed in Ireland down to the 12th century, and still holds its own in the interfor of Africa. This approximated very neariy to the possession of mouey, but it wanted what the Roman lawyers cailef ' the law' and 'the form.' Neither the wisht nor the pureness was guaranteed by any pullic authority. Such a state of things geems (1) us very Inconvenient, but after all it is $\mathrm{L} \boldsymbol{n t}$ very different from that which prevails in China evell at the present day. The fist moncy struck in Eigypt, and that for the use rather of the Gitel and Phoenician merchants than of the natives, was by the Satrap Aryandes. In anclent

Babyloala and Aseyria, as in Egypt, the precious metala, and especfally silver, circulated as uncoined lngota. They were rendily taken Imeleer'. but taken hy welghi wal verifed hy the balance like any other merchandise. The excaratlons in Assyria and Babylon, which have thrown so much light upon anclent history, have aftorded us nome intereating information as to the consmercial arrangements of thene countriea, and wo now poseess a considerahle number of receiptr, contracts, and other records relating to loans of silver on permonal mecurties at fized rates of interest; loans on landed or house property; males of land, in one case with a plan : sales of slaves, \&c. These were engraved on tahlets of clay. which were then hurnt. M. Lenormant divides these most intereating documents into tive prineipal types:-1. Bimple obligations. 2. Obliga. tions with a penal clausc in case of non-fultiment. One he gives which had 79 days to run. 3. Obligations with the guarantee of a thlrd party. 4. Obligations payable to a third per3on. 5. Draftsifrawn upon one place, payable in another. . These Assyrian drifts were negotiable, but from the nature of things could not pass by endorsement, because, when the elay was once baked, nothing new could be added, and under these circumsiances the name of the payee was frequently smitted. It geenis to follow that they must hare been regulariy advised. It is certainly remarkable that such instrumenta, and especially letters of credit, shoulel have precedied the use of coins. The earliest hanking tirm of which we have any account is said to lee that of Egibl and Company, for our knowledge of whom we are indebted to Mr. Bosca. wen, Mr. Pinches, and Mr. IIItton Prrice. Several dixuments and records lelonging to this fumily are in the British Museum. They are on ching tublits, and were discovered in au carthenware jar found in the nelghtourhood of Ilillah, a few miles from Ba rolon. The house is sald to have acted as a sort of nationai bank of Bubyion: the founder of the house, Egihi, probably ilvel in the reign of Sennacherlh, about $\mathbf{f 0 0}$ B. C. The following account of Bahrlonlan usages is derived from the text of M. Reviliout': work.

It is conirmed In esentlals hy the later work of Melaner, who hys tranoisted over one hundred deeds of the sge of llammurahl and his auccesors, In Chuldrea every kind of commoilty, from land to money, circulaten with a freedom that is unknown to molern commerce: every vaiue wat negotlable, and there was no limit to the number and variety of the agree. ments that might he entered into. . . . ilriek tahlets did not lead themselves remdily to book. keeplag, as ao further entry could be made after baking. while the fret entry wan not seeure unleas baked at once. Each hrick reconied one transaction, and was kept by the party intereated tili the contract was completenl. sion the destric tion of the tabiet was equivaleut to a recelpt. Bahyionian taw allowed dehts to lee paid by asaigning another permon'u deht to the creditor a debt was property, and could be asslgned with out reference to the dehtor, so that any formai acknowiedgment of Indebtednese could be treat. ed ilke a negotiabie hlif - a fact which speaks volumes for tife commerclat honesty of the persple. A separate tablet was, of course, ruquired to record the originai debt, or rether to say that So-and-so's deht to Sueh-an-one has been liy hlm soid to a thlrd party. Sueh third party cuudid again elther assign his cialm to a bank for a cousideration, or If the last dehtor had a credit at the bank, the ereditor could be palif out of that, a cort of forecast of the motern elcaring-house bystem. The debtor who pays befure the term gerced on has to recelve a furmal surrenter of the creditor's ctalm, or a transfer of it to himseif. The Bahyionian regarded money and credit as syonymous, and the phrase. "Money of such-an-one upon go-and-so, is used as cequlvalent to A's eredit with B.

The very worl 'jecunia' is an erklence of this practice in Italy at a perfod which is probahiy recent in comparison with the time when raluen were estlunated In cattie in Greece and the East. 'Go far as we have any Inowielge,' says Herodotus, 'the Lydiane were the irat amtion to introduce the use of gold and Nrer coln.' This statement of the father of histor must not, however, be accepted so thally ritiling the rexed question is to who were the inventors of colned inoney, for Stralo, Aelian, and the Parian Chronlele, all agree in adopting the inore commoniy recelved tradition, that Pheilion, King of Argom, frst struck aflver coins in the isiand of Aeglaa. Thicse two apparently contrailictory assertions modern resea reh tends to reconcile with one another. The one embuhles the Aslatle, the other the European tradition; and the truth of the inatter is that gold was first colued liy the Lydinus in Asia Minor, In the weventh century before our ers; and that sifver was first struek In European Greece about the nume time. The earllest colns are simply bullets of metal, oval or bean-shaped, bearing on one side the aignet of the state or of the community resjonitble for the purity of the metal aud the exsctuess of the welght. Colns were at first stamped on one side only, the reverse show. log merefy the impress of the square healed pike or anvil on whil : , after being welghed, the bullet of hot inetal was placed with a palr of congs and there held whlle a second workman adjusted upon it the ongraved dle. This done, a thirl inan with a heavy hainmer would come down upon it with all his might, and the coln would be produced, bearing on lts face or ohverse the seal of the lssuer, and on the reverse oaly the inark of the anvil apike, an fincuse square. This sinple process was after a time lmpruved izon hy alding a second engraved die beneath the metal bullet, so that a single hiow of the siedge-hammer would orovile the coin with a type, as it is called, 1 . Fellef on both sides. The presence of the unens raved incuse square inay theref' re be accepted as an indicatlon of high antiquity, and neariy ali Greek colns which are later than the age of the Persian wars besr s type on both sides. ... Greek colntypes nay be divided into two distinet cineses: (a) Mythological or religious representations, and (b) portralts of historical persons. From the carlest times down to the age of Alexander the Great the types of Greè coins are almont exclu. aively rellglous. However strange this may meem it firet. It is not dificult to explain. It must be borne in mind that when the enterprislog and commercial Lydians first Hghted upon the happy Idea of atemplog metal for generai circuintlon, a guarantee of just welfht and parity of melas would be the one condifion requileed. Whi more hiadling guarantee remilil be tound thans the invocation of one or other of the be divinities moot hopoured and mout dreaded in the dibercet in which the coln was inteaded to cirrulate. There io even good reason to thlnk that the earilest colan were sctualiy struck within the preecinets of the cemples, and under the direct anspices of the pricutw; for in times of general insecurfity by sen and lapd, the temples slone remained mencrei and invlolute."- B. Moneta is therefore sub. stantially a verm of the Dark Ages.... The idea asscicieted with moneta is colns, whose value was derived malnly from tbat of the material of which they were composed; whllit the Idea ussoclated whith nummus is a system of symbols whoee vaiue was derived from legal limitation. From the fact that our langunge sprang from the Dark Ages, we have no generic word for money other than moneta, which oniy reiates to one kind of noney. For a similiar reason, the comparative newness of the Engilsh tongue, we have no word for a plece of money except coln, which, properly speaking, only refates to one kind of piece, namely, that which ls struck hy the cuneus."-A. Del Mar, Hise. of Noney in Ancient Countries. ch. 28.-The extent and energy of the Roman traffic, in the great age of the Repuhfic, during the thlrd and second centuries before Christ, " may be traced most distinctly hy means of colns and monetary relations. The Roman denarius kept pace with the IRoman legions. The Slcilian mints - last of all that of syracuse in 542 - were ciosed or at any rate restricted to smali money in consequence of the Roman conquest, and ... In Slcliy and Sardinia the denarius obtalned iegai circuiation at least side by side with the older siliver currency and prohably very soon became the exchisive legsl tender. With equal If not greater rapidity the Roman silver coinage penetrated into Spain, where the great sifiver-mlnes exlsted and there was virtually no earller national coinage; at a very cariy periol the Spanlsh towns even began to coln after the Roman standard. On the whoie, as Carthage colned only to a very ilmited extent, there exlsted not a single lmportant mint in additlon to that of Rome in the reglon of the western Mediterranean, with the exception of the mint of Nasslila and perhaps aiso of those of the Iilyrian Greeks at Apollonis and Epldamnus. Accorcl. ingly, when the Romans began to establish themselves in the reglon of the $\mathrm{P}_{\mathrm{O}}$, these mints were about 225 subjected to the Roman gtandard in such a way, that, while they retalned the rlght of coining siiver, they uniformly - and the Mas. sillots in partlcular - were led to adjust thelr drachms to the welght of the foman three-quarter denarius, whlch the lloman government on its part began to coln, primarily for the use of upper ltaly, under the name of the 'piece of Vletory ' (vlctoriatus). Thls new systein, hased on the Roman, prevalled throughout the Nasslllot, Upper Itaian, and Illyrian territories; and these coins even penetrated lnto the barburian lands on the north, those of Dassilia, for instance, Into the Alpine districts along thic whole hasin of the Rhone, and those of Illyria as far as the modern Transyivania. The eastern half of the Mediterranean was not yet reached by the IRoman money, as it had not yet failen under the direct soverelgnty of Rome; but lts place was flled? by goid, the true and natural medlum for international and transmarine commerce. It is true that the loman government, In conformity with its strictiy conservirive character, adhered - with the exceptlon of a temporary coinage of gold occasloned hy the financial emharrassment during the Hannibaltc war - steadfastly to the rule of colnling sllver only In addition to the national-italian copper; but commerce hal alrealy assumed such dimenslons, that lt was alle In the absence of money to conduct lts transscthons with gold by welght. Of the sum In cash, whlch lay in the foman treasury in 597, scarcely a sixth was colncl or nncolned sliver, five-slxths conslated of gold in bare, and beyond douht the preclous metals were found in ali the chests of the farger Roman capitalists in substantialiy similar proportions. Already therefore goid held the frat place in great transactions; and, as may be inferred from this fact, the preponderance of traftic was maintained wilh foreign lamls, sud particulariy with the East, which since the times of Philip and Aiexander the Great had alopted a goid currency. The whole galn from lurse immense transactions of the Roman capitahsta flowed in the long run to Rome. .. The moneyed superiority of Rome as compared with the rest of the civilized worid was, accordlogly, quite as decided as its political and milltary ascendancy. Rome in thif respect suod towards other countries somewhat as the England of the present day stands towards the contlnent."-T. Mommsen, Uist. of Rome, bl. 3, ch. 12 ( $\mathrm{r}_{2}^{2}$ ) In the later yeara of the Roman Republic the coinage became debased and uncertaln. "Casnr restored the puhllc credilt hy fssining good nomy, such us had not been seen in lome for a length of tlme, money of pure metal and exact weight; whith scarcely any admlxture of plated pieces, money whlch could circuiate for its reui vaiue, and this measure became one of the primcipal sourcea of his popularity. Augustus followent his exampie, but at the same time took away from the Benate the right of coining gold and silver, reserving this excluslvely to thr imperial authorlty, which was to exereise It ahsolutely without controi. From this time we find the theory that the vaiue of moucy is arhitrary, and depemls solely on the whil of the sovereign who istues it. more and more whely and tennciously leht.

The faith piaced in the ofllecinl limpress fostered the temptation to abuse it.
. In $k$ us th: a century the change of the moncy of the State Into Imperiai money, and the theory that Its vaiue a: $3 s e$ from lts bearing the eftigs of the soverelgn, produced a system of alultention of specie, whlch went on growing to the very clowe of the Empire, and whlch the successors of Augustus utilized largely for the ladulgence of their passions and their prodigality."-F. Ef colned money there existeit a perpiexlug variety, which mude it nlmost improsslale to ascertaln the relatle valuw, unt omly of different colns, but of the asme coin of different lssues. Thle resulted from the emprour of king conferring the right of coinage upon variohs lords spiritual and temporal. from whom It was ultimately acquired by ludivhlual towns. The management was in most cases entrustedi to a company, temporary or permuncont, inspeted by an officiai, the coin-tester, originally appointed by the sovereign, hut afterwarls by the conpany, and confirmed hy the king or bishop. The house where the process of coining wis prrformed was calied the mint, and the company who held the rights of coinage in fee was knowil as the Nint House Company, or sinuly the Ilouse Company. Very generally the uthice was held by the Corporation of Golismiths. The want of perfect supervision lex to rreat dichaut. ment of the currency, especiaily in Germany and France; but in England and Italy the standard was tolerably well malntalned. Payments In vilver were much more common than in gold. Before the Crusades the only gold coins known in Europe were the Byzantine molides, the I talian tarl, and Moorish maurabotlni. The solldl which were originally of 23 to $28+$ carat gold, hut subsequently very much deteriorated, were reckoned as equal to twelve sllver denars. They pasend current In Southern and Eastern Europe, Hungary, Germany, Poland, and Prussia. Bolde, sol, and sou are only repeated tranaformatlons of the name of the coln, whlch bave been accompanled by atlll greater changes in lis value. The tari or tarentinl derived its aame from the Itallan town where it was org. Inaily struek. It was less generally known than the solides, and was equal to onc-fourth the latter in value. The maurabotini or sarazens were only of 15 carats gold. The name survives in the Spanish risravedi, whlch, however, like the sou, is now made of copper Instead of gold. Iu the thirteenth century augustals, floreutines, and ducats, or zecclilns (sequins), were colred in Italy. The first-mentioned, the welght of whlch was half an ounce, were named ln honour of Frederick II. who was Roman Catar and Augustus in 1252. The florentlues, also known as gigliatl, or lilies, from the arms of Florence, which they bore on unc side, with the effigy of John the Baptlat on the reverse, were of fine gold and lighter than the solidi, about 64 being reckoned equal to the mark. The ducats or zecchlns were of Venetian origin, recelving thelr first name from the Duca or loge, and the other from the Zecca or Mint Hunse. They were somewhat less In value than the florentines, 68 or 67 belng counted to the fine mark. Nearly equivalent In value to these Italian coins were the gold guilders coined in the fourtewnth century in Hungary and the Rhine regions. The Rhenlsh guider was of $22 t$ or 23 carats fine, and in welght of of a mark of Cologae. The sllvit gullder was of later production, and the name is now used as equivnlent to foria. .. In sllver payments, the metal being usually nearly pure, it was common to compute hy welght, colns and uncoined bullion being alike put into the scale, as is stlll the case in some Eastern countries. Hence the origln of the pound, livre, or mark. The most wldely dif. fused silver coin was the denarius, whlch was, as in aarient Roman tlmes, the To of a pounil. The name pending or pennig, by which the denarius was known among the old Teutonic nations. seems to be connected with pendere, to weigh out or pay; as the other ancient Teutonic cin. the sceat, was wilh sceoton, to pay, a worl which is preserved In the modern phrases 'scot free.' 'pay your scot.' . . . Ifalf-pennles and farthings were not known ln the earifest times, hut the penny was dceply Indented by two cross lines, which enabled it to be broken intoquarters or farthlngs (feordings or fourthings). From the indented crose the denarius was known In Geratany as the kreutzer.

With such a dlversity of colnage, It was necessary to settie any mer. cantile transaction ln the currency of the piace. Not only wouki sellers have refused to accept mony whose value was unknown to them, but in many places they were forbldden to to soy by law. Merchants attendling forelgn markets thenfore hrought with them a furntity of fine biver and gold in bars, which they exchanged on the spot for the current coin of the place, to be used ln settling thelr transactions; the balance remalning on hand they re-exchanged for bullion before leaving. The buslness of moneychanging, which thus arose, was a very lucrative one, and was originally moatly in the hands of Italian merehants, chlefy Lombards and Florentines. In Italy the money-changers formed a guild, members of which settled in the Netherlands, Engiand, Cologne, and the Mediterranean ports. In these different towns and countries they kept up a close connectlon wlth each other and with Itaiy, and at an early period (before the thirteenth century) commenced the practlce of assignments, i. e., recelving money ln one pince, to be pald by an order upon their correspondents In another, thus saving the merchant who trayelled from country to country the expense and risk of transporing specie. In the thirteenth century this branch of husiness was $\ln$ extensive use at Barcelona, nnd in 1307 the trihute of 'Peter's pence' was sent from England to the Pope through the Lombard exchangera From 5 to 6 per cent., or more, was charged npon the tmasaction, and the profitahle nature of the business soon led many wealthy and even noble Italian families to employ their mouey ln this why. They establlshed a memher of their firm in each of the great centres of trade to receive nnd pay on their necount. In Florence alone (about 1350) there are sald to have been elghty such house's. Ainong these the Frescohaldi, 13arll, and Pernzzi are well-known names; but the chief place was taken by the famous Florentine house of the Medici, who had banking houses estahished in sixteen of the chifef cltles of Europe and the Levant. In the north of Europe, before loug, simliar arrangements were established by the merchants of the fiausentic Leagus: . . Assignments of this kind were dirawu out in the form of letters, requesting the person by whom the money was the to pay it over to another party, named in the bili, on ac couut of the writer, specifying also the time within which and the form in which the pay. ment was to be mule. They were thms known as lettera. billets, or biils of exchange, aud nppear fil faily us early as the thirtecontil and fourteenth econturies. Among the carliest examples in existence are a letter of exchange, ciated nt Milan in $13^{2} 5$, payable within five months at Lucca; oue dated nt Bruges, 1304, and payabie at Bar. celona: and another, dated at Bulogna, 1381, payable in Venice. . The first writers who treat of bllls are Italiaus: the Italian laugunge furnishes the tecinical terms for drafts, remit tances, currency, slght, usance, and discount, used in most of the languages of Europe.'
Of other branches of bauking the germs also appeared in the Mitiile Ages. Penlee seems to lave been the first city to possess something nuswering to a deposit bank. The merchants here united in forming a common treasury, where they deposited sums of money, upon Which thes gave assignments or orders for payment to their creditors, and to which sinilar as signments due to themscives were paid and arlded on to the amount at their credit. The tauiadi camhi (exchange coututer) of Barcelona was a simitar Institution, as also the hank of St. George, at Genon. "-J. money-lenders - from Florence, Venice, Genon, and elsewhere - who were engaged throughout Europe in banking and trade.

Florentine Baaking. - "The buainess of money-ehanging seemed thoroughly at home here, and it is not surprising that the invention of bilis of exchange, which we tirst meet with in 1189 in the reiatlons bet ween Engiand and Itaiy, shouid be ascribed to Florence. The money trade seems to have flourished as early as the tweifth century, towards the end of whleh a Marquis of Ferrara raised money on hls lands from the Fiorentines. In 1204 we find the money-changers as one of the corporations. In 1228, and probabiy from the beginning of the century, several Florentines were settied in London as changers to Klag Henry III. ; and here, as in France, they conducted the money transactions of the Papal chalr In conjunction with the Sienese. Their oidcst known statute, which estabifshed rules for the whole conduct of trade (Statuto dell' U'nlverslta della Mercatanzia) drawn up by a commlssion conslstling of five members of the great guilds, is dated 1280 . Thelr guildhail was in the Vla Calimnruzza, opposite that of the Cailmala, and was iater inciuded ln the bulidlngs of the post-office, on the slte of whlch, after the post-office had been removed to what was formerly thic mint, a builhlng was fateiy erected, shallar in archltecture to the Paiazzo of the Signoria, whleh stands opposite. Thelr coat of arms displayed gold colns laid one beslde another on a red ficid. At the end of the thlrteenth century thelr activity, especlally in France and England, was extraordlnarily great. But if wealth surpassing all previous conception was attained, it not seldiom invoived loss of repute, and those who pursued the califing ran the risk of lmmense iosses from fiscal measures to the carrying out of which they themselves contributed, as weli as those whieh were caused by $\ln$ soivency or dishonesty. . . . The names of Tuscans and Lombards, and that of Cahorslens in France, no longer Indicated the origin, but the tradc of the money changers, who drew down the anelcnt hatred upon themselves. . . . France possessed at this tinie the greatest attraction for the Florentinc money-makers, althougli they were sometlmes severely oppressed, which is sufficient proof that their winnings werc stlll greater than thelr occaslonai iosses. . . . The Florentinc money market suffered the severest biow from Engiand. At thic end of the twelfth century there were alrcady Florentinc honses of cxehange in London, and if I'isans, Genoese, and Venetians managed the trade by sea in the times of the Crusarles. it was the Florentlnes mostiy who looked after financiai affairs ln connection with the Papal ehalr, as we have seen. Numerous hanks appeared about the middle of the thlrteenth century, among which the Frescobaitl, a famlly of aneient nobility, and as such attainted by the prosecutions agalnst ft, took the icad, and werc referred to the custom house of the conntry for re-imhursement of the foans niade to the kings Edward 1. and II. Later, the two great trading companies of the Baril and Peruzai came into notlcc, and with thelr money Eiwand III. began the Freneh war against Phlllp of Vaiols. But even ln the first year of thls war, whlch began with an unsuccessful attaek upon Flanders, the king subpended the paymenta to the creditors of the State hy a decree of May 6, 1339 . The advances made by the Bardi amounted to 180,000 marks stering, those of the Peruzzi to above 185,000, according to Giovanni Vilianl, whoknew only too well about these things, since he was ruined by them himself to the extent of 'a sum of more than $1,855,000$ gold florins, equivalent to the value of a kingdom. Bonifazio Peruzzl, the head of the house, hastener to London, where be dled of grief in the following year. The hlow feif on the whoie city. Both houses began at once to liquidate, and the prevalling dlisturbance contributed not a fittle to the earfy success of the ambitious plans of the Duke of Athens. The real bankruptcy ensued, however, in January 1346, when new iosses had occurred in Sleliy. $\qquad$ The banks of the Acciaiuoll, Bon. accorsi, Cocchi, Anteilesi, Corslni, da Lzzano, I'erendoil, and many maller ones, as wedl as numerous private persons, were $\ln v o l v e d \ln$ the ruin. "The immense loans to foreign soverelgns,' adds Viliani, 'drew down ruin upon our city, the ilke of which it had never known." There was a complete lack of cash. Estates in the city found no purehasers at a thlrd of thelr former value. . The famine and pestllence of 1347 and 1341 , thr sppresslons of the mercenary hands and the heavy expenses caused hy them, the cost of the war against I'ope Gregory XI., and funlly the tumult of the Clompl, ieft Florence no pence for s long time.

At the beginning of the tiveenth century indinstry was again flourishling in ali ita branches in Florence, finamial operatlons were extended, and forelgn countrles filkd with Florentine banks and mercantlle houses

In Londion the most important firms had their representatives, Bruges was the chicf place for Flanders, and we shail see how these conner tions lasted to the tlme of the greatest splembum of the Medlei. France is frequently mentionetl The official representatives of the Flormine nation reslded in the capltai, while numerous houses established themseives $\ln$ Livons, in Avlgoon (since the removal of the i'apal chair to this town), In Nismes, Narbonne, ('uremssoune. "-1. von Reumont, Lorenzo de' Medici, ot. 1. ch. 4(r.1). - "The three principai branehes of intustry which enriched the Florentines were - hanking, the manufacture of cloth, and the dyeiag of it, and the mannfacture of silk. The three noost im portant gullis of the seveu 'arti maggiori were those which represented these thrue ladusties Perhaps the most lmportant in the amomint of its galns, as weli as that which flrst ruse to a ligh degrce of importance, was the 'Arte del Cumbin, or banking. The earllest banklug operations seem to have arisen from the need of the ifoman court to find some means of causlng the ducs to which it laid cialm ln distant parts of Eumpe to be collected and transmitted to Roma. When the Papai Court was removel to Avirnon, its resldence there occasioned a greatly incramil sending hackwards and forwards of munty $\mathrm{ln}^{\text {. }}$ tween Itaiy and that city. Genos.-The Bank of St. George.-"The Bank of St. George, its constltution, itt bullding, and its history, forms one of the most Interesting relics of medieval commercial activity. Those old grey walls, as seen still in Genoa, begrimed with dirt and fast falling into decay, are the cradle of modern commerce, modern banking chemes, and modern wealth. .. This Bank of St. George ts indeed a most singular polltical phenomenon. Elsewhere than in Genoa we aenrch in vain for a paraliel for the existence of buly of citizens distinct from the goverament - with their own laws, magistrates, and indepen. dent authority -a state within a state, a repuhlic within a repuhlic. All dealings with the government were voluntary on the part of the bank

But, far from working without harmony, we aiways find the greatest unanimity of feelling between these two forms of republics rithin the same city walls. The government of Genoa always respected the liberties of the bank, and the hank always did its best to assist the government when in pecuniary distress.

To defne an exact origin for the bank is diffecult; it owed its existence to the natural development of commerclal enterprise rather than to the genlus of any one man, or the shrewdncss of any particular period in Genoese "istory. The Crusaics, and the necessary prepar.oition of galleys, hrought into Genos the idea of advancling capitsl for $n$ terns of years as a loan to the government on the security of the taxes and puhlic revenues; hut In these cases the profta were quickly realized and the dehts soon cancelled hy the monnrchs who incurred them. Howcrer, the expeditions ggainst the Saracens nnd the Moors were other wise, nnd were undertaken at some risk to Geno: gerself. Now large sums of money were adsanced. the profits on which were not spontaneous; it was more an investment of eapital for a longer term of years, which was secured by the public revenues, hut the protits of which dependerl on the suecess of the expedition. In 1148 was the first formal deht incurred hy the gorernment, and to meet the occasion the same sytem was adopted which continual In vogue, subject only to regulatlons and improvements which were found necessary as the went on until the days of the Freneh lievolution. The cheditors nominated from amongst tbemselves a council of administration to wateh over the common interests, and to them the government com ceded a certaln number of the custom dutles for term of vears until the hilie should be extin. guishet. Thls council of administration electel heir uwn consuls, nfter the fashion of the lepublic governors. Every huudred francs wns ternet in shnre (luogo) and every ereditor a chareluhluer (luogatorle'

Each semarate lonn was terned a 'compera,' and these loans were collectively known as the compere of st. Grorge,' which in inter gears became the cetebratet bank. Each loan generally took the came of the object for whlch it was raisel, or the name of the saint on whose day the contract ris sigued; and when an advance of money was required, it was done hy publle auction iu the dreets, when the auctionecr sold tbe investment to the ever realy merchants, wha callectivi nut. wife the 'loggia,' or other promlncat position bosul for the salc. In a loud volce was proclaimed the name and ohject of the loan, and the tax which was to be handed over to the purchasers to secure lts repayment. So numerous did these loans become by 1252, that it was found necessary to unite them under one head, wlth a chancellor and other minor officials to watch over them. And as time went on, $s 0$ great was the credit of Genoa, and so easy was this syatem found for raising money, that the people began to grow alarmed at the extent of the liahillties. So, in 1302, commissioners were appolnted at a great assemhly, two hundred and seventy-one articles and regulations were drawn up to give additional security to investors, and henceforth no future loan could be effected without the anctlon of the consuls and the confirmation of the greater conncil of the shareholders.
During the days of the first doge, Slmone Boc canegra, great changes were to be effected In the working system of the 'compere of St. George.' To this date many have asaigned the origin of the Bank of St. Georgc, but it will be seen only to be a further consolidation of the same system which had already been at work two centuries, In 1839.
at the popular revolution, all the old books were hurnt, and a new comnilssion appointed to regulat? the 'compere.'. Instead of being the origin of the hank, it was only another step ln the growing whah for consolidatlon, whith the expanding tendency of the 'compere' rendered necessary; whlch consolldation took final effect in 1407, when the Bank was thoroughly organized on the same footing which lasted till the end. Every year and every event tended towards this system of hlcnding the loans together, to which fact Is due the extensive power whieh the directors of the hank ercntually wiclded, when all interests nnd all petty disputes were merged together in one. As time went on, and the French governor. Bouelcault, weighed on the treasury the burden of fresh fortiticatlons, and an expensive War; when Corslean trouhles, and the Turks in the Eust, eaused the adranec of noney to be frequent, an assembly of all the shareholders in all the loans declded that an entire reorganization of the publle dehts should take plnce. Nine men were elected to draw up a new scheme, In 1407, and by their instrumentality all the shares were unitel; the lnterest for all was to be seven per eent., and fresh officlals were appoivie, ${ }^{3}$ :o superintend the now thoroughly constituter) and re-named ' Bank of St. George.' And at length we belold thls celebrated hank. Its credit never failed, and no nnxiety was ever felt hy any shareholder nbout his annunl income, until the days of the French Revolution. ...Thia Bank of St. George was essentially one of the times, nnd uot one which could have existed on modern ideas of credit: for it was a hank whlch would only issue paper for the coln in its actual posseaslon, and would hardly sult the dietates of modern commerce. It was not a hank for borrowers hut for capitalist?, who required enormous seeurity for innense sums until they could employ them thenselves. . . . One of the most interesting features in connectlon with the deal ings of the bank with the Genoese goverament and a conelusive proof of the perfect accord which existed betwicen them, was the cession frum lime to time of rarlous colouies and provlnces to tbe directors of the hank when the gov ernment felt itself too weak and too poor to maintain them. In this manner were the colonles in the Black Sea made over to the hank when the Turkiah difficulties arose. Corsica and Cyprus, also towns on the Riviers, such as Sarzana, Ventimigifa, Levanto, found themselves at various times under the direct sovereignty of the bank. . . . It is melaneholy to have to draw a veil over the career of this lifustrious bank with the Revolution of 1798 . The new onder of things which Genos had learnt from France decmed it inconsistent with ilberty that the taxes, the property of the Republlc, shouid remain in the i ands of the directors of St . George: It was voted ityranny on a smail scaie, and the directors weir compelied to surrender them; and inasmuch is $t$ le taxes represented the wole source from whish their income was derived, they soon discovered that their bank notes were useleas, and the building was ciosed shortly afterwaids. In 1804 and 1814 attempts were made to reasecltate the failen fortunes of St . George, hut with. out avail; and so this bank, the origin of which was shrouded in the mysteries of bygone centuries, feli under the sweeping seythe of the French Revolution."-J. T. 16-17th Centuries.-Monetary effects of the Discovery of America. - From 1492, the year of the discovery of the New World, to 1500 , It is doubtful whether the mines of Mexico and Peru] . . yleided on an aversge a prey of more than $1,500,000$ francs ( $\mathbf{5 0 0} 0.000$ ) a year. From 1500 to $1 \$ 45$, if we add to the treasure produced from the milnes the anount of plunder found in the capital of the Montezumas, Ténoch. titian (now the city of Mexico), as weli us in the tempics and paiaces of the lingdom of the In. cas, the goid and siiver drawn from America dld not cxceed an average of sixteen miliion franes ( 6640,000 ) a year. From 1545 , the scene changes. In one of the gioomiest deserts on the face of the giobe" in the aidst of the ruggerl and lnhospitabie un: untaln scenery of Upper Peru, chance reveated to a poor ludian, who was guarding a tock if llamas, a mine of silver of incomparable ric ${ }^{\text {a }}$. A cowi of miners was instantly nttra ted hy the report of the rich deposits of ore spread over the sides of this monntaln of Potoc-chi-a naine which for euphony the European nations have alnce changed to Potosl. The exportation of the precious metais from America to Europe 'an rose rapidly to an amount whic' equaifed, welght for weigit, sixty miliions of francs ( $£ 2,400,100)$ of our day, and it afterwards rose even to upwards of elghty milions. At that time such a miass of gold and sliver represented a far greater amount of riches than at preseut. Under the influence of so extraordlnary a sup. piy, the value of these preclous metais deciined in Europe, in comparison wlth every other production of human industry, just as would be the case with iron or lead, if mites were dlscov. cred which yledied those metais in superabin. dance, as compared with thelr present. consumption, und at a much less cost of labour than previnusly, just in fact as occurs in the case of mauufactures of every klıd, whenever, by lmproved processes, or from natural causes of a novel kind, they cnn be produced in unusual quantlies, ani at a great reductlon of cost. Thls fail in the value of goid and sliver. in compurisum with ail other proxiuctions, revealed itself by the increased quantity of coinced metai

Which it was neceasary to glve in exchange for the generailty of other articles. And it was thus that the working of the mines of America bad necessarily for effect a general rise of prlces, in other words, it made aif other commodltles denrer. The fall in the value of the precious metals, or that which means the same thing, the geveral rise of prices, ilmes not appear to have been very great, out of Spalu, till after the middle of the 16th century. Shortiy after the commemement of the 17 ti century, the effects of the pronate. tiveness of the new mines and of the dininished cost of working them were reailsed in all parts of Europe. For the sllver, which lud Inen ex. tracted in greater proportion than the gold, and on more favourable terms, the fail in ralne had been in the proportion of 1 to 8 . In imasactlons witere previousiy one pound of sllver, or a min containing a given quantity of thls metal, hal sufiliced, henceforth three were reipuired. After having been arrested for awhile In this downward course, and cven after hatving wit. nessed for a time a tendency to an ujwarl move. ment, the fail in the value of the precious metuls, and the corresponding rise in prices, resmad their course, under the influence of the sume causes, until towarls the end of the isth cutb. tury, withont however manifesting their lutuence so widely or intensely as lud been wituterd after the first development of the groat American mines. We find, as the resinf, that during the Arst half of the 19 th century, the value of silver fell to about the sixtic of what it was hefore the dlscovery of Americn, winen comparel with the price of corn."-M. The holder of wampum always compelled trade to come to hlm. After the use of wampum was eatablished in coionlal llfe, contracts were made payable at will in wampum, beaver, or sllver.

Labor is a chlef factor in civillzed society and the labor of the Indlan wat made avallable through wampum. As Wlnthrop shows, 10,000 beaver sklns annually came to the Dutch from the Great Lake. The chase was the primltive form of Indian industry a d furs were the most conspleuous leature of foreign trade, as gold is to-day, but wampum piayed a mueh larger part in the vital trado of the tlme. Wampum, or the things lt represented, carried deer meat and Indian eorn to the jew England men. Corn and pork went for fish; fish went for West Indla rum, molasses, and the sil ver whleh Europe coveted. West Indla produets, or the direet exchange of fish with the Catholle countries of Europe, brought baek the goods aeeded to replenish and extend colonial finlus tries and trade.

As long as the natlves were actlve and furs were plenty, there appears to have been no rilffleulty in passlng any quantly

IR Snowden, Dewription of Ancient and Mod. ern Cinins, pp. 85-87.-See Pine Tree Money. 17-18th Centuries.-Banking in Great Brit-ain.-Origin and infuence of the Bank of Eng-land.-"In the relgn of Wliliam uld men were stiii living who could remember the daya when there was not a sligle banklng house ln the elty of London. Sn late as the time of the Restora tlon every trader had hls own strong box ln his own house, and, when an secuptance vis presented to hlm, told down the erowns and Caroluses on hls own counter. But the increase of wealth hed produced lis natural effect, the sub. divislon of labour. Before the end of the relgn of Charles II. a new mode of paylng aid recelv. lng money had come lnto fashlon among the mer. chants of the capltal. A elass of agents arome, whose office was to keep the cash of the eoln. merelal houses. Thls new braneh of husiness naturally fell lnto the hands of the goldsmiths, Who were accustomed to traffie largely in the preclous metals, and who had vaults in wrileh great masses of bullion eould lie seeure from fire and from robbers. It was at the shops of the goldsmiths of Lombard Serect that all the payments in coin were made. Other traders gare und recelved nothing but paper. Thls greai eliange did not take place without mueh opposltion and elamour.

No sooner had banking lecome a separate and limportant trade, than mers began to discuss with earuestness the questloa whether it would be experlient to ereet a national hank.

Two publie binks had long been renowned throughout Europe, the Bank of Saint George at Genoa, and the Bank of Amsterdam.

Why sloould not the Bank of London be as great and as duruble as the Banks of Genoa and Amsterdam? Before the end of the reign of Charles II. several plans were propused, exam. Inel, attacked and defendel. Some pamphle, teers maintalned that a natlonal baisk ought to be under the dlrectlon of the King. Others thonght that the management ought to be entrusted to the Lord Mayor, Alderman and Common Council of the eapital. After the Revolution the suhjert was dlscussed whith an auimation before min known.

A crowd of pitus, some of whiliti resembie the fancles of a eliidi or the dreans of a man in a fever, were pressed on the goverument. Pre-eminently conspicuous among the political mountebanks, whose busy faces were secul every day ln the lobhy of the House of Commous, were John Briscoe andl Ilugh Chamberlayne, two projectors worthy to lave leen inembers of that Academy whleh Guiliver found nt Lagado. These men affirmed that tite one eure for every disteluper of the State was a Land Bank. A Land Bank would work for Engiund miry ales such as had never beeu wronglit for Israel. These hlessed effeets the Land Bank was to produce simply by lssulng envrmous quautities of uotes on landed seeurity. The doctrine of the projectors was that everv wo who had real property ougitt to have juper money to the fuil that property, thut property. two thousaud Houndla, he ought to have 1 , tate and two thousand pounds in paper money. Both Briscoe and Chamberiayne punted wlth the greatest contempt the notlon that theae could be an over.issue of paper as long as there was, for every ten pound note, a plece of land in the eountry worth ten pounds. . . Ali the projeetors of this husy time, however, were not so absurd as Chamber-layne. One among them. Wlllam Paterson, was an logenlous, though not always a judlelous speculator. Of his early life little ts known ex cept that be was a native of Scotland, and that he had ber a ln the West Indles.

a natlonal bank; and sle plan wat farourahly recelved both hy statesmen and hy merehants. But years passed away; and nothlng was done, tllI, In the spring of 1694, It became abolutely neces. sary to find some new mode of defraylug the charges of the war. Then at length the scheme devised by the poor and obscure Scottlah adventurer was caken up In earnest hy Montague [Charles Montague, then one of the lords of the treasury and suhsequently Chancellor of the Exchequer]. Wlth Sontague was closely allled Michael Goulfrey.

Mlehael was one of the ahlest, most upright and most opulent of the merchant princes of Lomeion.

By these two dig. tlagulshed men Paterson's scheme was fathered. Montague undertook to manage the Ilouse of Commona, Gudirey to manage the Clty. An approving vote was ohtalned from the Committee of Ways and Means; and a hllh, the thte of which gave occaslon to many sarcasins, was lall on the table. It was Indeed not easy to guess that a hlll, whleh purported onty to linpose a new duty on tonnage for the benefit c! such persons as should alvance moncy towards carrylng on the war, was really a hll creatlig the greatest commercial Instltuiton that the world hal cver seen. The plan was that $£ 1,200,000$ should he loorrowed hy the government on what was then consldered as the moderuie lnterest of clght per cent. In order to lnduce capltallsts to advance the moncy promptly on terms so favourable to the publle, the subscribers were to be Incorporated by the naive of the Governor and Company of the lank of England. The corporatlon was to have uo exclusive privilege, and was to be restrictid from trading in any thing bat bllis of exchange. bullion and forfeltet! pledges. As soon as the plan became gencrity known, a paper war broke out.

All the goledsmiths and pawnbrukers set up a howl of rage. some dlscontented Torics predleted ruln to the nonarchy. . . . Sonie dlacomtented Whigs, on the other hand, prellited rnin to our llbertles. . . . The power of the purse. the one great security for all the rights of FingInshmen, will the transferred from the Hollw of Commons to the Governor and Dlrectors of the new Company. This last consideration was really of some weight, and was allowed to be so by the authors of the hill. A clause was therefore most properlf Inserti-l which lnhiblted the lank from alvancing morey to the Crown wlthout anthority from Parliament. Every Infraction of thls sahn. tary rule was to be punished by forfeiture of three times the sum advanced; and it was proviled that the King should not have power to remit any part of the penalty. The plan, thus mancicd, recclved the sanctlon of the Commons more easily than might have been expected from the violence of the adverse clamour. In truth, the Parliament was under duress. Noney must he had, and could in no other way be had so rasily. . .. The bill, however, was not safe when it had reached the Cpper House." hut It was passed, and recelved the royal assent. "In the Clty the success of Montague's plan was complete. It was then at least as difficult to ralse a million at elght per cent. as it would now be to raise forty milllons at four per cent. It laa I been supposed that contrihutlons would drop in very slo wly : and a considerahle time had therefore been allutred by the Act. This indulgence was not needed. So popular was the new lnvestment that on the day on wiulch the books were opened 8300,000 were subscribed: 300,001 intre were sulsseribed during the next 48 hours; is if In ten days, to the dellght of all the fricmh is government. It was announcel that the if was full. The whole sum whleh the Corpminthu was bound to lend to the State was paill lito the Ex. chequer before the first lastalment wis due. Somers gladly put the Great seal to a charter framed In conformity with the terms freacriled hy Parllament; and the Bank of Englatul com. mencel Its operatlons ln the house of the ('unfpany of Grocers. $\qquad$ It soon appeared that Montague had, by akllfully avalling himself of the financlal ditticultles of the conntry, rendered an inestlmable servlce to hls 1 . f. from the borrowing therent during the continuance of such ald privilege to the mald governor and company, who aro herehy declared to be and remain a corporation with the privilege of exelu. alvi banking, as before rected.' To our molern eare theee words seem to mean more than they dild. The term banking was then applled only to the twue of notes and the takling up of money on bllis on demand. Our present system of de posit banking, In whlch no bulls or promissory Dotes are lseued, was not then known on a great scake, and was not called banklng. But lts effeet was very lmportant. It in tlme gave the Bank of England the monopoly of the note lasue of the Metmolis. It had at that the no branelees, sul so it dhi not compete for the country clrenlation. But $\ln$ the Metropolis, where It difl compete, It was coinpletely vletorions. No company but the Bank of England could lesue notes, and unincorpomated ladivlduals gradually gave way, and ceased to do so. Up to 1844 Londion private bankers might have lssued notes if they pleasenl, but almoat a humlied yenra ago they were forced out of the tleld. The Bank of Enginnd had so long hal a pructicni monopoly of the eirculation, that it is commonly belleved alwnys to have hail a legal monopoly. And the practicul effeet of the clause went lurther: It was belleved to mnke the Bunk of England the only joint stock company that could recelve deposits, as well as the on!y company that conld lissue notes. The gift of 'exclusive banking' to the Bank of Englaud was ryul in lts mest nntural modern sense: it wus thought to prohlble any other banking eompany roum carrying on our present aystem of banking. After joiut stock Manklig was prermitted in the country, people began to Incuire why it shonld not exist in the Metropolis too? Aud then It was seta that the worls I bave quoted oniy forlhin the issue of negotlable lnstruments, and not the recelving of money when no such instrminent is given. Upon this constrietion, the Lomilon amd Trestuinster Bank and all our older joint stox-k lmuks were founded. But till they legion, the Bauk of England had anong companies not ouly the exclusive privhege of note issue, lout that of deposit lonkling tos. It was in every sense the only lawking company $\ln$ Lourlon. With son nany anduntages over all eompetiturs. It is quile nathral that the Bank of England should have far outsripied them all. $\qquad$ tll the other lamkers groupent themseives ronnd 1 t , and lomiged their reserve with lt. Thus our one rexerve system of banking was not delliverately fonnded npon dettulte reosons: It was the grailual conseguence of many singular eveuts, nnd of an accumuiation of (eg) privileges on a slngle bank which has now heell :ltered, and whlch no one would now deferml.

For more thnn a century ufter lis creatiou (netwithstandling oceaslonal errors) the Bunk of Eurhand, In the maln, acted with judgment snd with cautlon. Its busluess was but smail as we shomid now reekou, but for the most part it conducted that business with prudence nuil dis. cretion. In 1696, It lind been lavolved in the most serions dllticultles, and had been obligell to refuse to pay some of lits notes. For a long perioxl it was in wholesome dread of publie opinon, and the necesslty of retalning public contideuce male it cauthons Bitt the English Gov ernment removed that necessity. In 1707, Mr. Fitt frurel that he might not be abie to obtain sutflelent speele for foreIgn payments, in cousequence of the low state of the Bank reserve, : nd he therefore required the Bat $k$ not to pay ln cash. He a-moved the preservative apprehenslon which Is the best security of all Bank. For thils reason the period under whlch the Bank of England alld not pay gold for lte notes - the period from 1:97 to 1819 - Is always ralled the period of the Bank 'restriction.' As the Bank during that period did not perform, nnd was uot compelled by law to perform, its contract of paying Its notes In cush, It might apparently have been well eulled the perial of Bank lleense. But the word 'restrictlon ' was quite right, and was the only proper word as a descriptlon of the polley of 1797 . Sr. Pitt dld not say that the Bank of England need not pay its notes In specie; he 'reatrieted' them froni doling so: he sail that they nust not. In consequence, from 1207 to 1844 (when a new era begins), there never was a proper eaution on the part of the Bank dlreetors. At heart they conshlered that the Bank of England had a khed of charmed life, ned that it when nove the ordlnary bonking anxiety to puy lts way. And this feel. !ng was very biatural."-W. His plan "included anancial institution to develop the national resources, strengthen the public eredit, ald the Treasury Department in its adminnatration, and provile a seeure and mound circulating medium for the people. On December 18, 1790, he sent into Congress a report on the anbject of a nationai bank. The Repulifican party, then in the minority, opposed the pian as unconatitutlonal, on the ground tha: the power of creating banks or any corporate boxiy had not been expressly diciegated to Congrean, and was therefore not possessed by it. Wasinington's cabinet was divided; Jefferson opposing the meanure as not within the impiled powers, because it was an ex. pediency and not a paramount necessity. Later he used stronger language, and denounced the institution as cone of the most deadly hostifity exinting aguinst the principles and form of our Constitution, nor did he ever abandon these views. There is the anthority of Mr. Gailatin for saying that Jefferson 'diled a decilded enemy to our banking aystem generaliy, and spectailiy to a hank of the L'nited States.' But Hamilion's views prevalled. Washington, who in the weary years of war had seen the imperative necessity of some nntionni organization of the finances, after mature dellberation approved tie pian, andon Februmry $\mathbf{2 5}, 1701$, the Bank of tive Cinited Statea was incorporated.' The lssue depart. ment was placed under reg' latlons which de. pired the Bank of any discretion in tis management, and may almont be aid to have male it a thenertment of the State. The second Innovation Was to limit the lasue of paper by the Rank of England to an amount proportloned to the valuo of lis assets. The Bank was allowed to issue antes to the amount of $\mathrm{e} 14,000,000$ agninat Government mecuritles in lts pramemsion. The Govirnment owed tho Bank a deht of $\mathrm{E} 11,000,010$, Ixuides which the Bank held Exchequer Bills. But the amount over $\{14,0(0), 000$ whleh the Bank could lante was not, henceforwarla, to be moru than the cqulraicnt of the huilion in lis possession. By this means it was made certain that tho Bank would be alle to glve coin for any of its notes which might le presented to It. The thiril innovation was to linglt the lsaues of tite country bucks. The eirenlation of the bunks amounted to $\$ 30,000,000$, of which only about $850,000,060$ were lssucd ln the States whleh in April, 1861, umiertiook to set up an Indepenilent government. About $\$ 150,000,000$ were in circulation la the loyal States, lucluding West Virginla. When Congress met In extraordinary sesslon on the 4 th of Inly, the three-months volunteers, who had hantued to the defence of the capital, were confrouting the rebel army on the line of the Potomac, and the tirst great battle at lunii liun wis impending. President Llncoln cableti inpon (ingress to provide for the enlistment of $400,(140)$ allon, and Secretary Chase submitted estimates for probable expenditures amounting to $\$ 318$, 000,000 . The treasury was cmpty, and the ex penses of the goverament were raplilly upproach. ing a nillion dollars a day. The ordinary espenses of the government, duriag the year enling on the 30 th of June, 1861, lad been $8: 000,000$, and cven this sum had not been supplient by the revenue, whlel anounted to ouly $81,(000,000$. The rest had been borrowed. It was now necessary to provide for an expenditure incriand ilvefold, ami binounting to eight tlmes the income of the country, Secretary Chase ad.

Congress adjourned on the 6 th of August, ufter passing an aet to provide au lnereased revenne from lmports, and laylng a direet tax of $$ 20,000,000$ upon the States, and a tax of 3 per cent. upou the excess of all prirate lncomes above $$ 800$. The Secretary lmmediately invited the bauks of Phllmelphia, New lork, and Boston to assist in the negotiation of the proposed loans, and they lovalty responded. On the 19th of August they took Sin0,000,000 of three ycors $;-30$ bonds at par; on the 1st of October, $$ 30,000,000$ more of the same securitles at par; and on the 1 Bth of Noveniber, sio $0,000,000$ of tweutr years 6 per cents., at a rate making the interest equlvalent to 7 per eent. These ad-- ances relleved the temporary necessities of the treusury, and, whea Congress reassembled in beember. Seeretary Chase was prepared to recommend a jerninnent financlal poliey. The whit basis of thls poiley was to be tuxation It was estlmaterl, a revenne of $890.090 .(100)$ rould be needed; aud to seeure that sum, the Secretary advised that the duties on tea, eoffee. and sigat he iucreased; that a direet tax of $$ 20,000,000$ be assessed oa the States: that the lncome tux be moditied so as to produce $$ 10.000,000$, and that dinties be laid on lipnors, tubaceo, earriages, legacies, baak-notes, bills pmyabte, and convey unces. For the extrantiaary expense's of the war it wasnccessary todepend npon loans, and the nut hority to be grauted for this purpose the Secretary left 'to the better judginent of Coagress, oniy suggesting that the rate of interest should he regulated by low, and that the time had come when the government might projerly claim a part, at least, of the advantage of the paper elreubation, then constituthg a lonn without inter est fron the people to the bunks. To provide for the premsing wants of the treasury. Congress, on the 12tb of February, 1862, authorized the issue of $$ 10,000,000$ more of demand notes. Before the end of the session further issues were provided for, making the aggregate of United States notes $$ 300,000,000$. besides fractional currency. There was a long debate upon the propriety of making these notes a legal tender for privatc debts, and it seemed for a the that the measure would be defeated by this dispute. [The bill authorizing the issue of iegai tender notes known afterwards as 'Greenbacks' was prepared by the Hon. E. G. Spaulding, who subsequentiy wrote the history of the measure.] Secretary Chase finaiiy advised the concession of this point ; nevertbciess, 55 votes in the House of Representatives were recorded against the provision making the notes a tender for private debts. Congress also empowered tbe Secretary to borrow $$ 500,000,000$ on 5.20 year 6 per cent. bonds, besides a temporary loan of $$ 100,000,000$, and provided that the interest on the bonds should be pald in coin, and that the customs should be collected in coin for tbat purpose. Notbing was said about the principai, for it was taken for granted thnt specie payments wouli be resumed before the payment of the principal of the debt would be undertaken.

Congress had thus aciopted the plan whicb the Secretary of the Treasury did not reconmend, and neglected the proposition which he preferred. . . . Wben Congress met in December, 1862, the magnitule of the war hnd become fuily apparent. . . . The enormous demands upon the treasury . . . had exbausted the resources providedi by Congress. The disbursements in Novemiker amounteci to $$ 59,847,077$ - two millions a day. Unpalif requisitions hal accumulated amounting to $$ 46,000,000$. The totai receipts for the year then current, ending June 30,1863 , were estimated at $$ 511,000$, 000 , the erpenditures at $$ 88,000,000$; ieaving 8277,000 , 10 kl to be provided for. There were oniy' two ways to obtain this sum - by a fresh issue of Cinited States notes, or by new interest. bearing loans. But the gold premium bad ad. vanced in October to 34 ; the notes were already at a discount of 25 per rent. The consequences of an addition of $$ 277,000,000$ to the volume of currency, the Secretary saill, would be 'inflation of prices, increase of expenditures, augmentation of debt, and, nitimately, disastrous defeat of the very purposes sought to be obtained by it." He therefore recommenied an incrense in the amount authorized to be borrowed on the 520 lnndis. . . . In orier to create a market for the lronts, he again recommended the cration of lanking associations under a nationai inw requiring them to sceure their circuiation by a teposit of government bondis. The suggestion thus renewed was not received with favor by Congress. . . On the 7th of Jnauary Mr. llooper offerd again his blii to provide a national currency, serured by a pielge of United States bonils, but the next day Mr. Stevens, of Pennsylvania, submitted the hili with an adverse report from the commituee on ways and means. On tbe 14th of Ian:iary Mr. Stevens reportet a reaoiution authorizing the Secretary of the Treas. ury to isaue $$ 100,000,000$ more of United Siates notes for the immediate payment of the army and navy. The resolution pasmed the House at once, and the Benate the next day.

On the 10th of January Preaident Lincoln sent a speclal message to the House, announcing that he bad signed the joint resolution authorizing a new issue of United States notes, but adding that he considered it his duty to express his sincere re. gret that it had been found necessary to sdid such a sum to an already redundant curtency. wbile the suspended banks were still left free io increase tbeir circulation at will. Ihe warned Congress that such a policy must soon proluce disastrous consequences, and the warning was effective. On the 25th of January Senator Sherman offered a bili to provide a national currency. differing in some respects from Mr. Hooper's in the House. Tbe bili passed the senate on the 12th of February, 23 to 21, and the House on the 20th, 78 to 64. It was signed by the Presidient on the 25tb of February, 1868."-11. W. The substitution of gold instead of silver In a country llke Germany which had a slngle sllver medlum was carred out by a path which led first to temporary blmetallism and later to gold in mometailism. And for this purpose the preparatory measures were passed December $4,1871$.

This law of 1871 created new gold colns, current equaily with exlsting sllver colns, at rates of exchange which were based on a ratlo between the gold and sllver colns of $1: 15\}$. The sllver colns were not demonetlzed by this law; thelr colnage was for the present only dlscontinued; but there was nin doubt as to the intentlon of the Government in the future.

A. D. 1238-1398.-The Kipchak empire.The Goiden Horde. - "It was under Touahi [or Juchil, son of Tachingie, that the great nilgration of the Moguis effected an ahiding settiement in ilussia.

Toushi, with half a milion of Moguls, eutered Europe ciose by the Sea of Azof. On the banks of the river Kaika he encountered the united forcess of the Russian princes. The death of Toushi for awhile arrested the progress of the Tatar arms. Bit in 1238, Batu, the son of Toushi, took the commaud, and all the prineipaiitles and citice of Russia, with the exception of Novogorod, were desolated by fire and sword and occupied by the enemy. For two centuries Russia wus heid cabined, eribbed, confned by this eneampmeut or horde. The Goiden Horite of the Deshti Kipzak, or Steppe of the Hoilow Tree. Between the Voiga and the Don, and beyond the Voiga, spreads this timitless region the Deshti Kipzak. It was oceupied in the first instance, most problably, by HunTurks, who first attracted und then were abfarbed by fresh immigrants. From this region an empire took lits name. By the river Akhituha, a braneh of the lower Volga, at Great Serui. Batu erected his golden tent; and here it was he recelved the Russian princes whom he liad reduced to vassalage. Here he entertained a bing of Armenia; and here, too he received the ambassadiors of S . Louis.

With the exception of Novogorod, whieh had joineri the Itanseatic League in 1276, and rose rapidiy in eommerefai prosperty, aii Rnssia continued to endure, tili the extinetion of the house of Batu, a degrading and hopeless boniage. When the dircet race came to an end, the coiliteral branches beeame iuvoived in very serions conticts; and in 1380, Temalk-Mami was overthrown near the river Don by Demetrius IV., who, with the vietory, won a titie of honotr, Donski, whech outinsted the benefits of the victory; aithough it is from this conflict that Russian writers date the conmmencement of their freedom. .. Atter an existenec of more than 250 years the Golden Itorde was finally dissolvedi in 1480 . Aiready, in 1488, the khunate of Kusan [or Kazan] was conquered and absarbed by the Grand Dake Ivan; and, after the extinction of the horde, Europeans for the tirst time exacted tribnte of the Tatar, and ambassadors found their way unobstrueted to Moscow. the courne of afisim in other nations, secured to the Spanish clergy In the 17th century, more power than they had powecsed in the 16th. The consequences of this were immediately apparent. The clergy dild not think that the steps taken by Philip II. agalat the Moriscoes were nuff. elentily declaive. Under his succeacor, the ciergy . . . galned fresh strength, and they soon feit themselves sufficientiy powerful to begin saother and inal crusade against the miserahie mains of the Moorlsh nition. The Archbishop Valencis was the first to take the field. In 1003, this eminent prciate presented a memoriai to Philip III. against the Moriscoes; and finding that his views were cordialiy aupported by the elriry, and not discouraged by the crown, he ful? sed up the biow by anotiler memoriai having the same ohject. He deciared that the Armadn, whinh Philip II. sent agninst Eng. hand in 1588, had been destroyed, because Goxi would not aliow even that pious enter urise to succeed. White those who undertook it, left hereties undisturbed at home. For the same reason, the late expelition to Algicrs had falied; it being cvidentiy the wili of Ifeaven that nothing shonici prosper while spain was inbabited by apostates. ie, therefore, exhorted the king to cxile ali the Horkcoes, except some whom lie migitt condienun to work in the gailiegs, and others who couid be. cume siaves, and inbour in the nuines of Ameriea. This, Le added, would nalke the reign of Philip giurious to ali posterity, and would raise inis fane far above that of bis predecessors, who in this matter had negieeted their obvious duty.

That they should aii be sinin, instead of belng bsnished, was the desire of a powerful psity in the Church, who thought that such sig. nai punishment would work good hy strikiug terror into the heretics of every nation. Bledia, the ceiebrated Dominican, one of the most influentiai men of his time, wished this to be done, sad to be done thoroughig. Me satid, that, for the sake of example, every Morisco in Spain should have his throat cut, because it wns impos. sible to teil which of them were Christimns at hesst, and it was enough to leave the matter to Goll, who knew hils own, and who would reward in the next worid those who were realiy Catholics. . The rciligious scrupies of Pbilip III forhude him to struggie with the Church; and bis minister Lerma would not risk his own an thority by even tite show of opposition. In 1 tit! he auaminced to the kiug, that the expuision the Bioriscoes had beconie neeessary. 'The res. olution,' replied Puilip, 'is a great one; iet it be executed.' And executed it was, with unflincil ing barbarity. About $1,000,000$ of the most in dustrious inhabitants of $\mathrm{S}_{\mathrm{j}}$ ain were hunted out lilie wild beasta, becanse the sincerity of their religlous opinions was douhtfui. Many were slain, as the $y$ approached the coast ; others were beaten snil piundered; and the majority, in the most wretched plight, sailed for Africa. During the passage, the crew, in many of the ships, rose upon them, hutchered the men, ravished the *omen, and threw the children into, the sea. Thase who escaped this fate, landed on the const of Barbary, where they were attacked by the bedouins, and many of them put to the sword. mithers made their way into the desert, and per. shel from famine. Of the number of ilives coctuall: suacriticed, we have no authentic accoust; hut it is sadd, on very good authority, that in one expedition, In whleh 140,000 were carried to Africa, upwards of 100,000 autered death $\ln$ its most frightfui fornis withln a few monthe after thelr expuinlon from Spain. Now. for the first tlme, the Church was really trium pbant. For the int time there was not a herctic to be ceen between the Pyreaces and the Straits of Glhraitar. Ali were orthodex, and ail were ioyai. Every inhabitant of that great country obeyed the Church, and feared tho klag. And from this happy combination, it was believed that the prosperty and grandeur of Spaln were sure to follow.

The effects upon the materlai prosperlty of Spain may be stated in a few worils. From neariy every part of the country large bodies of industrious agricuituriets and expert artifleers were suddeniy withirawn. The best systems of husbandry then known, were practised by the Moriscoes, who tilied and irrigated with indefatigabie iabour. The cultivation of ree, cottou, and sugar, and the manufacture of silk and paper were aimost confled to tirem. By their expuislou all titis was destroyed at a biow, nad most of it was destroyed for ever. For the Spanish Christians considered such pur suits beneath their dignity. In tbeir judgment war and religlou were tile oniy two avocation worthy of leing foliowed. To fight for the king, or to enter the Church was honourahie but eyerything else was mean and sordid. When tierefore, the Morscones were tbrust out of Spain tikere was bo one to fll their place; arts antirely manactures elther degenerited, or were entirely iost, and immense regions of arable iand were left uncuitivatedi.

Wiroie districts were suddenly deserted, and down to the present day have never been repeopied. These solitudes gave refuge to smuggiers and brigands, who succeed ${ }^{-1}$ the indinstrious inhabitants formeriy occupying then: and it is saiditint from tie es. puistou of the Morlscoes is to be dated the ext tence of those organized bunds of robbers, whicd nfter titis period, became the scourge of Spain, nuti willh no sulisequent government has been able entincily to extirpate. To tirese disastrous consequences, others were addedi, of a different, and, if possibie, of a stili more serious kind. The victory gained hy the Cliurein increased both her powerand her reputation. . The grentest nen, with harily au exception, iccame ecciesimen, with harilly au exception, became ecclesiastle's, nud sil tenporal conslderations, ali views of earthiy poliey, were despised and set at nought. No one inquired; no one doubted; no one presunted to ask if all this was right. The minds of men succumbed and were prostrate. While every other country was advancing. Spain aione was receding. Every otber country was moking some addition to knowiedige, creating some art, or cniarging some science, Spain numbed into a deati- like torpor, spelibound and entranced by the accursed superstition which preyed on her strangti, presented to Europe a soiitary instance of constant decay. provements in the capabilities of music, but to estahilsh for the art a definite and scientifc hasis inteiligibie and nvailable for ail tinse. He was. indeed, the founder of theoreticai music ; for it was he who first traced out the inws whifh gor. erned the reiations of sounds to each other, and hy this means hrought music within the dounaln of natural philosophy. He estahisisied the principie that Intervals couid be appreciated intellectualiy hy the aid of numbers, instead of, as firmeriy, hy the ear aione.
. The way in which Pythagoras effectel this wns hy means of the stretched strings used for the iyre. He haif acuteness enough to perceive the fundamental fact ... that the iength of the string might be made to suppiy an exact definition of the pitch of the note it sounded. Hence he was enabied to attach to each sound a certain numer. ical vaiue, and thus to compare it with uther sounds, and to establish positire and ciefinite relations between them.
. The impurtance of this step, connecting for the first time nusio and mathematics, can hardiy be overrateri ; and as the method Pythagoras introiucedi ins become verified and estabished in use by ali subsequent experience and investigation, he is fairiy entitled to he criifed the Father of Musicai Science. $\qquad$ In etudying tite dirisions of his string, he perceived that the sinuplest of these divialons, namely, into two equal parts. gare a note which hls ear toid him iad obvious musical relations with the fundamental oue, anif this settied for ali time the predominance of tile ixtave over ali other musical interrais. . . . If fundi that two thirds the length of the origiasistring wouid give na interval that would cuntenients subdivide the nctave. This interval we min cail the fifth. Again foliowing the same principie, he next divided his string into frum eqult parts, and he found that tiree fourths the lengeth of the string gare another sulbordinate divising at an interval which we now caii the furtin Tbese three intervais, as settleif by Pythagiras. inave beeu ever since the most important intervals in music.

The determination of the fifth nnd the fourth gave a means of estahiishing with precision an intervai of unuch smailer dimen. sions, namely, the difference between them. This wan calied a tone: it furnisheri an apyro priate menns of completing the sulvivision of the octave, according to the cilatonic avath. which is a scaie characterized by intervals of tones. . . The principie of the ictare liaving been once estabilished, it was obvionsly case in extend the scmie, upwards or downwards, or luth. hy adding octaves of notes previousiy existing. This wna done, and tie scaie was nt iength enlarged to two octaves. . . The later Grevis dienoted the various sounds he arhitrary characters. The K . naus adopteri the seaie, but alos. ished aif the Greek deaignations, and named the fiftern notes by their own latin letters. from A to $P$ inclusive. Near the end of the 4 th rentury, Ambrnse introduced music into the service of the Church, alopting, with the Komans, the simpie Greek diatonic scale. Gregory to Conatantinople as papal legate to the Conrt of the Emperor. He, remainlig In Conatantinople for four years and more, became acquainted with all the musical sclence of the time, whlch was $\ln$ a manner locked up there from the rest of the world; and there he heard the Christlan musle declaimed $\ln$ a rare and, as it often seemed to hlm, a dellghtful way. Comiag from thence a learned a . जlalan, and skilled in the most refined style of Christlan musie, be afterwurds became Pope of Rome [Gregory 1., calied 'Balnt Gregory,' and 'Grego:y the Great']. . The ldca now came upon him of gathering the ancient Christian chants ani psalms from all parts of the world, and uniting thein lnto one mighty work, wifich shouid remaiu forever the meeting.groundi of Christian musle, as Rome was to he of Cbrlstian fsith. Having collected them, be sorted and arranged them in the form of the services, so that there might be different chants or tunes for every Suaday and holy-day In the year. Hore diffcult than sortlng and arranging the tunes was giving them a musical structure.
With the genulne pagan music tihey hayl nothing in common, for they had no rhythm. They were coll-hed in no scaies, for they had grown up aruong men ignorant of music, and, even at the time we find them, we re but fialf energed from speech. It was, therefore, difficult for St . Gregiry to convey a music ! structure to them without diminishing considerebly from their origiaal character. Ye: thls he coutrived so skilfuifr that. in spite of much that is new, we may still easily bear the roices of untrained singers and the utterances of simpie worsiifippers echoing throughout them all, and catch song springlng like a rose from speech. First, what were the misical portions of the service?. . The Kyrie Eicison and the Allehtia hut continned in use amoug Christians from the primitive tlmes. ani douhtiess wlth but iftife change of singing: ouif there was this difference, that they were not sung or chanted now ejaculatlons hy the congregation as often as the faney took tinem, hut at defnite piaces $\ln$ the service. Besiles these, there was the Amen, a kind of acroteleutic. that was sung at the close of every prayer. Of louger pleces, the Cheruhie Hymn, the Trisagion, hal heen hrought from Coastantinc,ple, nppearing in Latin form as Tersanetus or Sanctus; the Angric Hymn, 'Giory le to God on bigh,' Gioria in exceisis, which was sung immediately after the Kyrie Eielson; and new picees of similar kind: the Agnus Del; the Creed, which was now heginuing to he sung as it was arrangell at the Council of Niceas ; and short antlphons or responses of a line or two in different parts of the service. But partlcuiarly there were the introits and graduals, whlch were estahilshed by St. Celestlne, Pope of Rome, $\ln 422$ A. D., whis onlainal that the Psalms of David should be chsoted tirrongh la the course of the year, hy taking sometimes one, sometimes nnother, at tise heginning of the service; and this palm thut ushered in the servlce was casied the Introit, becouse while it was being sung the priest made his entry. . . The Gradual was sung between the Alieiula and the Eplstie-indeed, the Allewia should rather be consilifret as an appendage $\omega$ the Gradnal, and the note of juhilee that concluded it; for thls was the bupplest moment of the servlice, when, the Eplstic beligg finlshed, the choir stood ca the ateps of the chancel ('ln gradihus') and sang this Gradual, or 'Psaim of the Stepp ' which was followeri hy a prolonged note o: Alielula. Sit. Ambrose, In the north of Indy, before the are of Gregory, had attempted the same work, hit with neither sucb skiil nor with such ahiding effect. . . Thic Ambrosian song is always described as ' mensurahilis et harmonlcus,' 'rhythmitaiand tuneful.'

was In keeplog with this tendeuey that Amhrose should bave heen the father of the 'hymn.' The hymn had a very different history from the chant, belng traceabie in the clear, symmetric form of lts masic to the choruses of the Greek and Koman stage, and being ldenticai in lis measure and the coutour of lts melody with the ordinary homan songs, which were the deiectation of the masses in those days, as popular airs are at present.

Between the antiphonary of Ambrose and the antiphonary of Gregory for so were the books called, because they contalned the untiphons, or minslcal pieces, that were sung In the gerrices), there seems for a long ti-ae to have heen the greatest rivalry; and more eapecialif In the northern parts of Itaiy, where Am. brose's Intluence had ever been strong. . $\dot{\text { Gre }}$ Gregorian song began to spread over Europe.

Wherever he [Gregory] sent his missionaries, there also he sent copies of the Gregorian song, as be had arranged it lu his antiphonary. He hade them go singing anong the people. In this way St. Cyriaeus went to Spuin, St. Fuigentins to Africa, St. Virgiiius to Framee, and St. Augustlne to Britaln.

The ciepredations of the Lonhards, and tice estabiishment of a powerful Lombard kingdom la the uorth and northwest of Itaiy, were fostile to the poliey whleb Gregory had laid down; for with the Lombards came the musie of Amhrose agaln, and during the century that foitowel Gregory's deatit hali Italy owned the Lomharl sway. $\qquad$ . so dld things stand when that century was over, and Charicmagne ascended the throne of the Franks.

Chariemaguc, harlag conquered the Lom. burds, proceeded to Rome to neett the Pope and the curlinais, and to consider the arrangements that were to be made for the settlement of his new conquest. . . . The Pope called a great synod, . . and the synol passeri a decree comuissioning Chariemngue to proceed througit the leagth and hreadth of Itaiy, mol to utterly nproot everything which la shinging or in rltalal dif. fered from the practlee of the Rounan Chureh. so that there might he unity throughont the land." Armed witio this commlssiou, Charlemagne posted to Mlian, and seizing alit the chant and hyun hooks of the Ambrosian soug, he made houfires of them in the middir of the city.

Tiose of the ciergy wion refised to glve up their books were tu be pat to the sword, and many both of the ligiger and lower onlers of elergy perished ln thifs manner.

The same measires were taken tirroughont the rest of Lomharily. In a few weeks the flomrlshiag emple of the Amhrosian song was reduced to desolation." - I. F. Rowhotham, A History of Muric, $6 k$. 3 , ch. 2-4.-See, aiso, Ithan: A. D. 374-39\%
The Organ.-" The term 'organum' was used to express the first crude conceptions of the scicnce of harmony. It would alpear that in the rude instruments calied organs, in the 11th and 12th ceaturics, the plpes were disposel in such a manner that every key sounded, besides its fundamental note, the fift and the octave of that note. Sueh a snecession of fifths and octaves was calied Organum; no doubt, par excel lence. The blstory of the organ is wrapped In much uncertalnty. In the fourth chapter of Gonesis, we read that jubal was 'the father of ali such as handie the harp and the organ.' No one, however, will for a moment suppoee that Jubal attained to the constructlon of anything llke the modern organ. In Job (chap. xix. verse 31) we read, "And my organ unto the volce of them that weep.' The IIebrew word (gnubah), here rendered organ, slgnities an ear of co $a$ wlth the staik, or strs $\because ;$; hence a plpe made of such staik, or straw. The organ, therefore, of Jubal and Job, was doubtiess nothing more than a reed, or plpe; or, at most, a set of reeds of uncquai iength, joined together side by side, ilke the Pandean pipe of the Greeks. It consiated originally of seven pipes, afterwands increased to iwelve. We may, then, pronounce the Panpipe, or Syrinx, to have been the prototype of organ-bulding. The first step to improvement was to plant the pipes ln a chest, with hoies bored in the top, in whleh the pipes were made to stand. Wind, being foreed lato the chest, entered the pipes at the bottom, instead of being hlown from the mouth lnto the top of them as berctofore. Ali the pipes would then sound at once, and had to be stopped by the fingers. When the number of pijes was increased, this male of operation became impracticahle; and vaives were then contrived to cut oft the wind, one under each plpe, worked hy levers. A further increase in the numher of the pipes required a farger wind-chest ; and thls again necessitated some mechanical process to supply the Find, whleh was aecompiished hy the aid of water-power. IIence the instrument reeelved the title of the liydrauif Organ. Tertulian. who was Bishop of Carthage in the 2nd century, pronounces Ctesihius, a harher of Alexandria, to have been the $\ln v e n t o r ~ o f ~ t h e ~ i n g d r a u i l e ~ o r g a n, ~$ ahout B. C. 200. Atheneus aiso attrihutes its crigin to the same person. . . . The mechanicai c.peration of the hydraulic organ is uniatelligibie from the descriptions remainlng of it , chicily that of Vitruvius. We learn, however, that it consisted of pipea, a wind-chest, and registers, or stops. The bydraulie organ failing to produce a satisfactory result, a return was made to the nacleat method of blowing by manual labor; and the instrument took the name of the Pnenmatic Organ. . . Authors are by no means agreed as to the time when the organ was first Introdueed into tiec church-service. Platins. in his 'lives of the Popers.' asserts that it was first used for religious worship by Pope Vitalianus, who was raised to the pontifical chair, A. D. 66:3. Previous to this time, however, instru. ments were usal ln dlvine servlce, as appears from the united testimony of Justin Martyr and Eusebius. Ambrose, Blshop of Mian (cire. A. I3. 341), causex them to be used in hls catherirui. They were soon introluced into Fravee. Pejin (the father uf the great Chariemagne), King of the Franks, an ardent and devout Christlan, first iut rolnced singing and ceremonies of the Romish church Into France. Ifo iulickly porceived the neel of an organ to support the choir. He accordingiy (is the instrumcut was at that time unknown in Franer) appiisi to the Emperor Constantine Copronymus at Constantinopie, who sent him a prement of ' grest organ with leaden pipes,' whleh was placed in the Church of St. Cornelife, at Complegne. The French were not siow to equal thls and other specimens of foreign ingenuity; and so succeaful were their efforta that in the gth ceatury, it is sald, the best organs were made In France and Germany. Soon after we find them in common use in England. constructed hy English artists, with pipes of copper tixed in gift frames. The carliest specimens of church-organs were very amall, and were culied portatives (from the Latin portare, to carry : ivecause they could be moved about from one part of the chureh to another). Another term for them was regais (from the Italian rigabelio). Until nearly the end of the iast century, sn off cer of the Chapei Royal, in London, was st gied 'tuner of the regaiis.' In contradistinction to and succeeding the portative, we have the posjtive organ. Thls lnstrument wiss made with a key-board, and played wlith both hands.

By the end of the 10 th eentury, organs were becoming pretty common In Germany; and in Engiand there was one, of whieh particular mention is made, In Wlachester Cntherirai, har. ing 26 beliows and 400 pipes. The ciose of the 11th century saw agreat advance nude, when we learn that at Msgdelurg an organ was buift, the first in which a Eeg-boarl was introduced in place of the hars, or levers, by which the notes had intherto been played. The compass consisted of 16 keys. Eieven bad hitherto been the largest amount ; which was ali that was needel to accompany the plain song before the inseation of harmony.

In the 14 th century, $s$ most important improvement was mail in the structure of the organ : the key-boarls were increased ln compass from une octave to tirec, and at the same time made much less ciumsy. Ilitherto the keys had been made so large (some of them five or six inches wide), and their motion so stiff, that they had to be struck with the cilnched fist: lhence the organist was termed organorum puisator, strlker of the organ
Early ln the next century, a German invented reglsters, or different stops. Improvements aiso were made in tise plpes ; and stopped pipes were invented, and also the pedals. In the 16 th century the key-board wasextended to four octares though the hottom octave was sellom complete. At thls period also, Dr. Rimhsuit sags that redd plpes were invented to lmitate the come of other instruaients. $\qquad$ But the use of the recti, in the modern seceptation of the term, appenrs to have been known mueh farther fack. . . . The Revolution in Engiand, in the mididie of the 1ith century, was a diark perioui ln the history of the organ. On Jan. 4, 1R44, an ordinance was passed in the Houses of Parifament . . . for the speedy demolishing of all organs, imaces. and ali biatters of superstitlous monnments ${ }^{\circ}$ - 1 . D. Nicholson, The Orgisn Marral, pp. 5-11.

The iyre was of many different slapes, and the strings heing partiy earried, as in the pianoforte, over the sounding-board, were not free to he struek upon both sides throughout thelr entire length by the plertra or by the fin gers of the performer. Both inatrumeuts were piajed with the angers, and the lyre with the plectrum aiso, which was generaily a amali plece of ivory or bone, which the player pressel against the urings, anapping them as though they were puiled by the Iager. The plectra were sometimes, however, short sticks, . . . heid one in each hand, and were used for striking the strings of the inatrument piaged upon, to sei them in vilbration. The first kind of plectrum suggested the crow quili, that inapped the strings in the spinet and harpsichord: the second gave the Idea of the hammer for striking the strfags in the piano forte, as the plectrum of wood was after some time covered on nne side with leather, so that the performer could piay softily by striking the itrings with the part covered with ieather, or loudly by striking with the other side. Thls was mucceeded by the dulcimer hammers, from which those of the planoforte are evidently horrowed." The "development of the lyre and dulcimer into the planoforte, by the Introduction of Anger-keys, for ralslog many plectra at the same tlme, Is of quitc recent date. $\rightarrow$ The Arst keyed instrument was . . . the tamboura, hut the first with finger-kegs was the organ. . . The next linstrument with inger-keys was probably the clavicytherium, or clavitherium, as it was sometimes termei, which was introuluced abont the yenr 1300 by the Itrlians, and was soon Imitated by the Belgians and Germans. Another instru ment, deriving its name from cmploplog the key (ciapiy), was the clavichord, which was i.c use befire or at the same tlme as the clavicy therium. It differed, however, both in construction and msnner of producing the tone, the strings being of wire, and set ln motion by atriking and press. ing instead of the snapping of the l'ather plee. trum, The inatrument by which the plavi chont was gradually superseded In Engiand w

The English spinet wassilmiliar to the virglaal, except in its shape, which was nearly thst of a harp laid horizontaliy, supposinge tlie ciarier, or keyboard, to be placed on the outsite of the trunk, or soundlng board. . . . Llke the virginal, it had but one string to each note. whlch was ret in vibration by ancaus of the jack, with the ravenor crow-qullin ntacbed. When a second string was added to each note torendier the instrulment more powerful and capable of some alight degree of expression, it was numed the harpsichurdi, or horizontal harp. The harpsichoril was in effect a doubie splaet, as twc rows oi quilis were used. When the performer wished to play woftr, he was compreiled to take one hamb of the key board to move a stop to the rimht, when but a single string was twangeid hy the quifil, the sec: ond row of jacks and quills heeling noved hy the rial in which they werc fised, so that, when misel hy the key the quills pasved betwern the strings without setthig then la vibration. if the plaver then requirexi greater power he would more the stop to the left again. . . Aithough littie more than a century and a haif has elapsed nince the pianotorte was invented, the name of the ln. vencor is almoot lost amidet a crowd of claimants and appropriatora. In England the iorention is ciaimed for Father Wood, an English monk at Rome, who manufactured a planoforte $\ln 1711$.

Aithough Father Wood's claim to the ln. vention of the piano is often stoutly maintained, the best authentlcated is that of the Itailans, for In the same or previous year that it is said Father Wood made hite piano. Bartoliomeo Cristofali, of Padua, invented and made a plano. though Cristofali's claim to the Invention seems perfcelly clear, it is atill greatiy disputed. The Viotin- -" Bowed Instruments. were crude in structure, and cumbrous for perform ance untii the great change that was wrought in their fabrication ln the latter haif of the 10th century, and previous music for them was ilmit. ed accorilngly in chnracter and effect. The vlo! was an Instrument with many strings, sometimes five. sometimes seven, which had frets across its ingerboard ; behind these, the strings were stopped by the tinger of the were stopped by the finger of the player, and the vibrating length of the string was thus redured to the extent from the fret to the bridge, but the Intonation was filed by these frets for each note without possible variabillty from the higher or lower position of the finger. Vlols were of different sizes, and were named accord. ingly trelite, tenor, and bass; they were made In 'sets.' and musle for them was called a 'Consort of Viols,' as that for a set of hmithoys was called a 'Consurt of Ilautboys,' whlle that for a combinatlon of bowed with wind instruments wns calied 'broken muslc.' The viol held sgalast the arm was called 'VIol da Braccio.' and that held against the leg was called 'Vlol da Gamba.' It seems to bave heen Gasparo di Salo ( 1555$)^{-1600}$ ) of Brescla or Bologna and hla contemporary Magginal who were the first to cffect the Impor tant modifleations which on the subtest scientific princlples have brought the whole class of Instruments to thelr present hlgh atate of perfec tion. The word viola signifes the original instrument proluced br these makers; the vioiino, or diminutive of ilola, seems to bare been the next nuxifificntion ; the vioione (the double bass, or augneentative of viola, is supposed to have followed; and the vilooncello, or dimln. utive of violone, is helleved to have been the last ndiaptation of this class of instrumenta. The workl-renowned Cremona makers directly foilowed those of Brewcia, and raised the violln to a perfection of structure which is apparently imposible to reproduce. Andrea Amati, the earilest of these, is supposed to havc copled thic work of Siloo though he died 23 years before him. Opera. - "Choruses had been introduced in dramatlc performances as far back as 1850, bit they were aiways written in four parts, in the ecclealastical strie. In $159 i^{\text {A }}$ A. D., In a comic play by Orazzi Becchl, the tezt written for a single jersonnqe of the drama was sung in tive-part choruses written in the madrigal styie. Lovers of art began to see that such muslc was unsuited to drama.

The Fiormintine nohie, Count Bardl, together with hls friends, ail art enthusiasts - for it was in Fiorence that the renaissince flourished hest - resoived that there ought to be a better atyle of iramatic music. And at this point the exiled scholars from Constantinople ninde their influence feit in music. Ther taiked of the Greek drama and its intonation or recita. tion in music, and Bardl and jis frleuds at once set about reconstructing the true nusical decismation of the Greeks. . . . Glovanni Bard: was a moving spirit in the festivitles of the court. There he introduced his friends and they gave prlvate dramatic performances. Ottario Rinucelni, poet: lletro Stroz7i, poet and composer: Emilio del Cavaliere, dical superintendent of fine arts; Vincenzo Gailiel, composer, litterateur, intlst, mathematician, and father of the great astronomer Gailleo; GIrolamo Mei, musicai the oriat : Gluilo Caccinl, singer and composer, and Jacopo Peri, immortal as the composer of the first opera, were the 'cholce and master apirits' of the clish.

Galilei wrote a dramatic scene for one voice and one instrument on the ilnes about ' 'goilno' in Dante's ' Purgatorlo.' Ilis uvn was the voice: the vlola, the instrument. The work was appiauled by hls friends. He wrote more aud culied them monodies. And these were the tirst vocal soios on recont in the history of art-music. Previousiy when a solo was wanted some oue of the parts of a polyphonic chorus was picked out and sung by one volce. Galilei wrote the tirst ciramatic sin, without which opera is, of course, impos. sible. Caccini imltated Gailiel and produced sinnets and canzonets for one Folce. Then Emilio del Cavaliere wrote a pastoral play and set the entire text to music, which had never been done before. He made cxtensivense of the madiggsi, and his work hore ilttie resemblance to its suc. cessers. Next the poet IInuccini wrote 'Daphne,' Jacopo Peri composed nusic for it, and it was performed with great success at the honse of one Cirsil in 1594 . This stands upon the pages of muslcai history as the first opera. Peri Immediately began another, and In 1000 , at the marriage of Ilenry IV.. of France, with Maria de Medici In Florence, he produced his 'Eurydice,' singing (Irpheus himself. 'Dnphnc' made Peri known throushont Italy: 'Eurydice' made him celeirated throughout Europe.

The new form of conrt amuspment speedily took lts way to Venice, where It was somewhat moditied hy the influence of the emotional church styie of Wiilacrt, Cyprian di Fore, and Zarlino. Iudrea Gahrieil and his nephew Giovanni were their successors, but they did little toward the develop.

Oratorio.-" The development of the oratorlo progressed side by slie with that of the opera For ages it had been the cuetom on imporant ecclesiastical orcastons to perform nirucle. piayn,' or rude-we might as profaue-dramas on sacred subjects. About the middle of the 16th century, St. Philip de Neri, a priest of Flor. ence, devoted himself to the improvement of these performances, and introluced historical scenes or sacred aliegorles in the course of the services he heid in his oratory. MYSTICISM,-QUIETISM. - "The pecullar form of devotional religion known undes these names was not, as most readers are aware, the oflspring of the 17 lh contury. It reats, in fact, on a ubotratum of truth which is coeval with man's belng, and expremees one of the elementary principles of our morsl constitution.

The syatem of the Myatles aroee from the Instinctive yearnite of mans coul for communion with the Inflite and the Etermal. Holy Scripture abounds with such aspirations - the Old Testament at woll at the New; but that which untier the aw wat shadow of good thlage to come, 'has been transformed hy Christlanity into a llving and abiding reality. The Goapel re. sponds to these longings for intercommunion let ween earth and heaven hy that fundamental article of our faith, the perpetual preaence and operation of God the Holy Gisost in the Church, the collectire 'bohly of Christ,' and in the individual souls of the regenerate. But a sublime mystery ilke tinis is not Incapahle of misinterpretation. . . The Church inasever found it a difficult matter to distingulsh and adjudicate between What may ie called legitimate or ortinodox Mytticism and those corrupt, riegrading, or grotesque verslons of it which have exprsed rellgion to reproach and contempt. Some Mystics have been canouized as sainis; others, uo liess cieservedly, have beeu cons'; ied to obionuy as pestifential beretics. It was in the East - proverbinily the fatherland of idealism and mmance-that the carllest phase of crror in thls department of theology was more or less strongly rleveloped. We find that in the th century the Chnrci was tronhled by a sect calied Massallans or Eucibites, who placed the whole of reliston in who placerl the whole of religion in the fiable of mental prayer; allcging as their authority the Weripture precept 'That men ought always to pray, and not to falnt.' They were for the noost part monks of Mesopotamla and Syria: there were many of them at Autloch when St. Epiphanlus wrote ing Treatise ogainst beresles. A. D.
376 . They held that cvery man is from his hirth jussessed by an evll spirit or familliar demon, who can only be cast oilt by the practice of con tiunal prayer. Thcy elisjaraged the Sucraments, regnriling them us things indlferent: they rejected manual labor; ami, although professing to ine perpethaliy engaged in prayer. they siept, we are told, the greater part of the day, and pritended that in that state they recelved revelalions from above. . . The Massalians did not opren!y separate from the Chureh; tiscs were conlemned, bowever, hy two Councils - one at Antioch In 391, the other at Constantinople in 426. Delusions of the same kind were reprodinceri from time to time iu the Oricntai Chureh: and, as is commoniy the case, the originators of error were foilowed by a race of disciples who aivanced considicrahly beyond them. The Hesy. chasts, or Quietists of Mount Athos in the 14 Lh century, seem to isave been fanatics of an ex. treme type. They imagined that, by a proceas of profound contemplation. they could discern internally the light of the Divine Presence - the 'glory of God - the very same which was disclaw to the A pratles on the Hount of Transigurition. Hence they were also calied Thaborites. The soul to which this privilcge was vouchsafed hai no need to practise any of the externai acts or riten of religton. . . . The theory of abstract contemplation. with the extruondinary frulle supposed to be derived from it, travelled in due course into the Weat, and there gave birth to the far-famed school of the Mystics, of whleh there wore various ramiocations. The carilent exponent of the syatem in Prance was John Bcotus Erigena, the contempormy and friend of Chariet the Bald. $\qquad$ Erigena Incurred the centures of the IIoly gee; but the resuits of his teaching were permanent. . . . The Mratlcs, or Theomophists as mome atyle them, attalned a position of high renown and infuence at Paris towamis the cloce of the 12th century. Here two of the ahleat exponltor of the learaling of the middle age, Ilugh and Rlchard of Bt. Victor, Inltated crowds of ardent disclples into the mysteries of the 'vis interma,' and of 'pure love '- that mar. vellous quallty by which the soul, subllimated and etheriallzer, ascends futo the very prewencechamber of the King oi kings.

The path thus traced was trodden by many who were to take rank eventually as the most perfect mater of spiritual sclence: mons them are the venemited names of Thomas i Kemple, St. Bonaven. ture, John Tauler of Strasburg. Gerson, and St. Vlacent Ferrier. . . . But, on the other hand, It fs not lesa true that emotional rellgion has been found to degenerate. In modern as well an In ancient tlmes, Into manifold forms of moral aber. ratlon.

To exalt sbove measure the dignity and privileges of the spiritual element in man carries with it the danger of disparaglng the material part of our nature; and this results in the preposterous notion that, provided the soul the absorbet In the contemplation of thlngs Divine, the actlons of the body are unimportant and Indifferent. How often the Church has combated and denounced this moat inaldious heresy is well Inown to all who have a moderate acqualviance wlith its hatory. Under the various appellatlons of Begharria, Fratricelli, Cathari, Splrituals, Albgenses, Illumlnatl, Guerinets, and Quletists, the self-same delusion has been sedulously prop. agated In difterent parts of Christendom, and with the same ultmate consequences. the work of history, ratified by the will of man. The elementa componing lt may be very different In thelr origin. The polnt of departure is of Iittie importance; the oaly emential thing is the point reached. The Iwise nationality is the mont complete. It embracen three families of people, each of which speaks lti own language. Horeover, aince the Swis territory belongs to three geographlcal regions, eeparited by hlgh mountains, Spltzerland, which has vanquished the fatallty of nsture, from both the ethnographical and geographical point of vlew, is a unlque and wonderful phenomenon. But she is confederation, and for a long time has been a neutral country. Thus her conscitutlon has not been subjected to the great ordeal of tre and oword. Fravce, denpite her diverse races Celtic, German, Roman, and Basque-has formed a political entity that most resembles a moral person. The Bretons and Alsacians, who do not all unilerntand the language of her government, have not been the least deroted of her chidren In the hour of tribulation. Amung the great na tions Fravoe is the natlon par excellence. Elsewhere the nationallty blends, or tends to blend, with the race, a natural development and, hence, one devold of merif. All the countries that have mot been able to unite their races lnto a nation, have a more or less troubled existence. Prussia has not been able to nationsilize (that is the proper worl to use) her Polish subjects; hence the has a Pollsh question, not to mentlon at pres. ent any other. England has an Irish questlon. Both Turkey and Austria have a number of such questlows Groups of peopie in various parts of the Austrian Emplre demand from the Emperor that they may be allowel to live as Germans, IIungarlans. Trechs, Croutians, In fact, evezi as Italiaus. They do not revoit against hlm; on the contrary, each of them offers him a crown. The time is, however, past when a alngie head can wear several crowns; to-day every crown is heary. These race claims are not mereiy a cause of lnternal troubiea; the agitationa that they arouse may lead to great warm. Evidentiy no state will ever interpuse between Ireiand and England, but, while quarreis take place between Germans and Siave, there wiil intervene the two conflicting forcea of Pan-Germanism and PanSiavism, formidable resuits and finai consequencea of ethnographlcai patriotlsm. Pan-Germanism and Pan-Siavism are, lndeed, not forces ofticiaily acknowledged and organized. The Em peror of Germany can ionestiy deny that he is a Pan-Germanist, and the Tsar that he is a PanSlavist. Germans and Slavs of Austria, and Blave of the Baikans, may, for thelr part, deeire to remain Austrian or independent, as they are today. It is nune the iess true, however, that there is in Europe an old quirrel between two great races, that each of them is represented by a powerful empire, and that these empires cannot forever remain unconcerned about the quarreis of the two races. . . . The chief application of the principie of nationality has been the formatiou of the Itailan and German nations. In former tines the existence, in the ecntre of the Continent, of two objects of greed was a permanent cause of war. Wili the subatitution of two Important states for German anasiby and Italimu polyarchy prove a guaranty of filture peucey"-L. Origin of the kingdom.-" No historical suhject is wrapt in greater obecurty than the origin and eariy hiatory of the kinglom of Navarre. Whether, during a great portion of the eigritit and ulnth centuries, the coumtry was independeut or tributary: and, If dependent, whether it oheyel the Franks, the Asturians, or tise Arabs. or sucresoively ail three, are specuiations which bave long exerclsed the pens of the peninsuiar writers. . It aeems undouhted that, in just Ireali of the Mohammefian domination, the inhabltants of tivese reginus, as weil as those of Catalunia, appied for aid to the renownedi empuror of the Franks [Charlemagne]: and that hes, in consequence. in 7 FN. prured his legions inti) Navarre, and seized Pariplona. It sems no less certain that, from this perioi, he conniluered the country as a flef of his crown ; anil that his pretensiona, wietier fomaieti in vioience or fut the voiuntary submisaion of the natives, gave the inghest umbrage to the Asturian klogs: the fudiai supremacy thenceforth inecame an apple of discond between the two courts, each atrivigg wgain the homage of the locai governors. doctrines: and as their achool wes in its vigour at the very time in which Chrititianity made its moth rapld advances, and had struck Paganism wheh a mortal wound, they empioyed themselves capecially, and more earneatiy, than other phlionophers, to majntain their own teneta, and to destroy Chriatianity. They In nowiee, however, dealred to defend heathenism, or its worship, in their then degenerate and degrading state: their hdeal was a more pure, more noble, spirituallzed. polytheism, to entablish which was the object which they had proposed to themseives. Whlist, therefore, on the one hand, they preserveld the anclent and genuine truths which had sprung from primitive tradition, and purified them from recent errors and deformations; on the other, they adopted many of the doctrines of the hated Chriatlanity, and sought to reform paganism by the aid of light which had streamed upon them from the eanctuary of the Church. Tinis admisslon and employment of Christian truths are easily explained, if it be true, that two of their ehlefs, Ammonius and Porphyrius, had been Cliristians, It is well known that they recelved instructions from Christian masters. . . . This uniformity, or imitation, consiste not onily in the une of terms, but in essential dogrias. The Neopiatonic idea of tirec hypowtases in one Gorlhead would not have iceen hearl ci, If the Christian doctrine of the Trinits hal not preceded it.
Their doctrines respecting the minor Gois, their Influence and connexton with the supreme Being. approached near to the Christian dogma of the angels. Nor is the inffuence of Christianity less evident in the pure and grave morallty of the Neopiatonles: In their lessons which teach the purfifing of fallen sonis, the detachment from the senses, the erueifying . . . of the affections and passions, it is easy to distingulsh the Christlan, from the commingleal pagan, eiements. The Neopiatonics endenvoured to reform poly. theism by giving to men a doctrine more pure concerning the toils, by attributing an allegorical senne to the fahles, and a moral slignification to the forms and ceremonies of religion: they sought to raise the souls of men to piety, and rejected from their mythology many of the degrading narrations with which it had before abounded. It was their desire aleo to abolish the sacrifices, for the Gools could only ahhor the slaughter, the dismemberment and the burning of andmals. But at the same time they reduced to a theory the apparitions of the Goxls; they deelarent magie to be the most divine of aclences: they taught and defended theurgy, or the art of invoking the Gexls (thouse of an inferior order, who were united to matter), and of conpelling them to eompiy with the desires of men."-J. The whole aftair had been kept profoundly eecret by the goveramens. It was not till 1561 that Philip diaclosed his viows, in a letter to ame of the princlpal nohies in the councli of state. But, long before that time, the project had taken wind, and created a general sencation through the country. The people looked on it as an attempt to subject them to the same ecclesiantical syatem which existed in Spain. The binhope, hy virtue of their office, were powesed of certaln inquinitorial powers, and thewo were stlli further enlargel thy the providon of the royal edicte. . The present changes were re. garded as part of a great scheme for introducing the Spanish Inquisition tato the Netheriande.

The nobles had other reasons for oppoatng the measure. The hishope would mecupy in the leglalature the place formerly beld by the ahbote, who were indelited for their election to the relighous house over which they prealded. The new prelaten, on the contrary, would recelve their uomination from the crown; and the noblea saw with alarm their own lidependence menaced by the accesaton of an orier of men who would natiraily be subservient to the intereats of the m.march.

Bit the greatest oppoal. tion arome from the manner in whirh the new dlgoitarime were to be maintalned. This was to be done by suppreasing the offices of the alibots, aud by appropriating the revenues of the:lousea to the malatedance of the lishopa.

A. D. 1577-1581.-The administration of Don John.-Orange's well-founded distrust.Emancipation of Antwerp.-Battle of Gem-blours.-Death of Don Join and appointment of Parma.-Corruption of Flemigh nobles, Submission of the Walioon provinces.-Pretensions of the Duke of Anjou. - Constitution and declared independence of the Dutch Re-public.-"It now seemed that the Netherlands had galned all thcy asked for, and that every thing for whleh thcy had contended had been conceded. The Biood Council of Alva had almost extirpated the Reformers, and an overwieiming inajority of the lnhahitants of the Low Countrics, with the exception of the Hollanders and Zelanders, belonged to the old Church, pro. vlded the Inqulsition was done a way with, and a religious peace was aecorded. But Don John had to reckon wlth the Prince of Orange. In him Wiiliam had no contdence. He could not forget the past. He believed that the signatures and concessions of the governor and Phllip were only expedients to gain time, and that they would be revoked or set aslde as soon as it was convenient or possibie to do so. . . . Ye had interecpted letters from the leading $S$ ianlards in Don John's employmint. In whlch, when the treaty was $\ln$ course of signature, deslgns were disclosed of Leeping possesslon of all the strong piaces $\ln$ the country, with the ohject of redncing the patriots in iletall.

Above all, Wlll. iam distrusted the Flemlsh nobles. He knew them to be greedy, ficklc, treacherous, ready to betray thelr country for personal advantage, and to aliy themselves biindly with their natural nemles.

As events proved, Orange was ln the right. Hence he refused to recognize the treaty $\ln$ his own states of Holland and Zeland. As sion as it was published and sent to him, Wiiliam, after conference with these states, puh' lishedl a severe critlcism on its provislons. In ail seeming howevcr Don John was prepared to curry out his engagements. Ile got together with difthenlty the funds for paying the arrears due to the triops, and sent them off hy the end of $A_{j}$ min. He earessed the people and he hribed the nolles. He handed over the citadels to Flemish governors, and entered Brussels on May 1st. Everything pointed to succeas and mutual good will. Jut we have Don John's letters, in which he peaks most unreservedly and most untlatteringly of his new friends, and of his de. signs on the liberties of the Netheriands. And all the while that Philip was soothing and flat tering his hrother, he had determined on ruining him, and on murdering the man [Escovedo] whom that hrother loved and trusted. About this time, too, we find that Philip and his deputy were casting about for the means hy which they might assassinate the Prince of Orange, 'who haid bewltched the whole pcople i' An atiempt of Don John to get posscssion of the cltadel of Antwerp for hlmself failed, and the patriuts galned it. The merehants of Antwerp agreed to find the pay stlli owing to the soldiers, on coniition of their quitting the clty. But whlie they were discussing the terms, a fleet of Zeland ressels came sailing up the Scheldt. Immediately a cry was raised, 'The Beggars are coming.' and the soldiers fled in dismay [August 1, 15:7. Then the Antwerpers demollshed the citadel, and turned the statue of Aiva again lnto camnon. After these events, William of Orange put an end to negotiatlons with Don John. Prince Wlitiam was in the ascendant. But the Catholic nohies conspired agalnst hlm, andi induced the Arehduke Matthias, hrother of the German Emperor Rodolph, to accept the piaee of governor of the Nethcriands in lleu of Don John. He came, hut Orange was made the Ruwhard of Brabant, with full mllitary power. It was the highest otfice which could be bestowed on him. The 'Unlon of Brussels' followed and was a confederation of all the Netherlands. But the hattlc of Gemhlours was fought in February, 1578, and the patriots were defeated. Mainy small towns were captured, and it seemed that In course of time the governor would recover at least a part of his lost authority. But $\ln$ the month of September. Don John was seized with 4 burning fever, and died on October 1st. The new governor of the Netheriands, son of Ottavio Farnese, Prince of Parnua, and of Mar garet of Parma, sister of Phillp of Spain, was a very different person from any of the regents who had hitherto controlled the Netheriumis He was, or soon proved himself to be, the great. est general of the age, and he was equaliy, ar cording to the statesmanship of the age, the most accomplished and versatile statesnaan. 11 hal no designs beyond those of Philip, and lur$\operatorname{lng}$ his long carver ln the Netherlands, from October, 1578, to December, 1593, he streed the King of Spain as falthfuliy and witi ns fer scruples as Philip could have desired Parma was religious, hut he had no moraitity Fiatever. . He had no scruple in deceiving. lylng, assassinatlng, and even less serupie in saying or swearing that he had done noue of these things. .. He had an excelicnt juig. ment of men, and lndced he had experience of the two extremes, of the exceeding baseness of the Flemlsh nohles, and of the lofty and pure patriotism of the Dutch patriots. Nothiug in decd was more unfortunate for the Dutch than the belicf whieh they entertalned, that the Flom. ings who had been dragooned into uniformity, couid be possihiy stirred to patriotism. Aira had done his work thoroughly. It is possibie to extirpate a reformatlon. But the sucecss of the process is the morai ruln of those who are the suhjects of the experiment. Fortunateiy for Parma, there was a sultor for the Netherlsad soverelgaty, ln the person of the very worst prince of the very worst royal family that ever existed In Europe, i. e., the Duke of Anjou, of the house of Valois [bee France: A. D. 157\% 1578]. This person was favoured hy Orange, probahly because he had detected Philip's designs on France, and thought that national jealousy wouid induce the Freneh government, which was Catherine of Medicl, to favour the low countries. Besides, Parma had a faction in every Fiemish town, who were known as the Maleontents, who were the party of the greedy and unscrupuious nobies. And, iesides Anjou, there was the party of another pretender, John Casimir, of Poland. He, however, soon left them. Parma quickiy found in such dissensions pienty of men whom he couid usefuliy hribe. He made his first purehases in the Walloon distriet, and secured them. The provinces here wero Artols, Hainauit, Lilie, Douay, and Or chies. They were soon permanentiy reunited to Sjuin. On January 29, 1579 , the Union of Ltrecht, whieh was vistuaily the Constitution of the Dutch Repuhiic, was agreed to. It was greater in extent on the Flemish side than the Duteh Repuhlie finaliy remained, less on that of Friesiand [comprising Holland, Zeiand, Geideriand, Zutphen, Utreeht, and the Frisian provinces]. Orange stili had hopes of ineluding most of the Netheriand seaboard, and he stifl kept up the form of aijegiance to Phiiip. The principai event of the year was the siege and capture of Maestricht [with the slaughter of almost its entire population of 34,000].
Mechin aiso was betrayed hy its commander, ite Bours, who reconciled himseif to Romarism, and received the pay for his treason from Parma at tire same time. In March, 1580, a similar act of treason was eommitted hy Count Renneberg. the governor of Friesiand, who betrayed its ehief city, Croningen. . In the same year, 1580 , was puhiished tie han of Philip. This instruOrint, drawn up hy Cardinai Granvelie, deciared Orange to be a traitor and miscreunt, made him an outlaw, put a heavy price on his head ( 25,000 goid crowns), offered the assassin the pardon of any erime, however heinous. and nohility, whatever be his rank. ... Wiiiiam answered the ban hy a vigorous appeai to the civiized worid. . Renneberg, the traitor, laid siege to Stuenwyk, the prineipai fortress of Drenthe, at the beginning of 1581 . ... In Fehruary, John Norris, the Englisi generai, . . relieved the tuwn. Renneherg raised the siege, was defeated in July hy the same Norris, and died, fuli of remorse, a few days afterwards. But the most important event in 1581 was the declaration of Dutch Independence formaliy issued at the IIague on the 26th of Juiy, By this instrument, Orange. though most unwillingly, felt himself obliged to accept the sovereignty over Hoiland and Zehand, and whatever else of the seven provinces was iu the fands of the patriots. The Netierlands were now divited into three portions. The Waiioon provinces in the souti were reconciled to Phiijp and Parma. The middle provinces were under the aimost nomiuai sovereignty of Anjou, the northern were under Wiifiam.

Philip's name was now discarded from public documents ... ihis seai was broken, aud Wiliam was thereafter to conduct the govermment in his own name. The instrument was styled an 'Act of Ahjuration.'" J. E. T. Rog. ers, The Story of Howhand, ch. 11-12.

It stood, as it were, with its sovereignty in its hand, dividseparated, to two distinct indivering it, thus separated, to two distinct indivlduals. The sovereignty of Holland and Zeaiand had been reluetantiy aecepted hy Orange. The sovereignty of the United Provinces had been offered to Anjou, but the terms of agreement with that Duke had not jet been ratified. The movement was therefore tripic, consisting of an ahjuration and of two separate elections of hereditary einiefs; these tw c eleetions being accomplished in the same manner hy the representative bodies respectiveiy of the united provinces and of Holiand and Zeaiand. . Without a direct intention on the part of the peopie or fits ieaders to establish a repuhlic, the Repuhiic estahlished itseif. Providence did not permit the whoie country, so fuil of werith, inteifigence, healthy joilitical action-so stax zed witio powerfui eities und an energetic population, to be eomhined into one frce and prosperous commonweaith. The factious ambition of a few grandees, the eynical venality of many nohies, the frenzy of the Ghent democraey, the spirit of relikious intoierance, the consummate military and poilitical genius of Aiexander Farnese, tile exaggerated self-ahnegation and the tragic fate of Orange, all united to dissever this group of tlourishing and kindred provinces. The want of personal ambition on the part of Wiiliam the Sileut inflicted, perhaps, a serious damage upon his eountry. He beiieved a single chief requisite for the united states; he might have been, hut always refused to become that chief; and yet be inas been ifeid up for centuries hy mauy writers as a conspirator and a self-seeking intriguer.

- These provinces, said John of Nassau, 'are coming very unwiliingly into the arrangemeut with the Duke of Aiençon [soon afterwards made Duke of Injou]. Moreover, ite beiieves that the conuexion with France will lee of more henefit to the country and to Christianity.'. The unfortunate negotiations with Anjou, to which no man was more opposed than Count John, proceeded therefore. In the meantime, the sovereignty over the united provinces was provisionaily heid hy the nationai councli, and, at the urgent solicitation of the states-general, by the Prince. There was also a great disincllnation felt hy many in the other states to thls hazardous offer of thelr alleglanee, and It was the personal Infiuence of Orange that eventually carried the measure through. By midisimmer [1581] the Duke of Anjou made his appearance in the western part of the Netherlands. The Prince of Parma had recently come before Camhray with the intention of reducing that important clty. During the rcjoicings which followed this inaispiclous ceremony, Phllip's proscriptlon against the Prince of Orange put forth its first fruits. The latter gave a grand dinner ln the chateau of Antwerp, which he occupled, on the 18th of March, the hirth-day of the dukc of Anjou." As he quitted the dluing hall, he was shot in the cheek hy a young man who approached hin with the pretence of offering a petlition, and who proved to be the tool of a Spanlsh nierehant at Antwerp, with whom Philip of Spain had contracted for the procurement of the assassination. The wound lnfilcted was severe hut not fatal. "Whthin three months, Wlliam was ahle to accompany the duke of Anjou $\ln$ his visits to Ghent. With these llmitations, It may be assumed, for geacral purposes, that the territory of the United Stites was that of the modern Kingdon of the Nether. lands, whlle the obedien' Provinces occupied what is now the territory of Belglum.

What now was the political position of the United Provinces at this juncture? The sovereignty which had been heid by the Estates, ready to be conferred respectively upon Anjou and Orange, remained in the bands of the Estates There was no opposition to this theory. . . . The peopie, 34 such, ciaimed no sovereignty.
What were the Estates? . . . The great chamc. teristic of the Netheriand government was tho municipality, Each Province contained a largo number of clttes, which were governed by a board of magistrates, varying in number from 20 to 40. This college, cailed the Vroedschap (Aseemhly of Sages), consisted of tho most notabie citizens, and was a self-olecting body - a close corporation - the members being appointed for life, from the citizens at large. Whenever vacancles occurred from death or loss of citizenshlp, the college chose new members - sometimes immediatcly, sometimes hy ineans of a douhle or triple selection of names, the choice of onc from among which was offered to the stadt. holder [governor, or sovereign's deputy] of the province. This functionary was appointed by the Count, as he was called, whether Duke of Bavaris or of Burgundy, Emperor, or King. After the abjuration of Philip [1.581], the gover. nors were appointed by the Estates of each Province. The Sage. Men chose annually a board of senators, or schepens, whose functions were mainly judicial; and there were generaliy two and sometimes three, burgomasters, appointed in the same way. This was the popular branch of the Estates. But, besides this boily of representatives, were the nobies, men of ancient linesge and large possessions, who had exercised, according to the general feudai law of Europe, high, low, and intermediate jurisdiction upon their estates, and hal long been recognized as an integral part of tho body politic, having the right to appear, through delegates of theirg order, in tiee provinclai and in the general assemblies. Reigsrded as a machine for bringing the nost decided political cupacities into the adninistration of pubific affairs, and for orgunizing the most practical opposition to the system of religious tyranny, the Netherland constitution was a tyranny, the Netherland constitution was a

Thus constituted was the commonweaiti upon the death of Wilian the Sitent. The glom produced by that event was tragicai. Never in human history was a more poignaut and universal sorrow for the death of any individuai. The despair was, for a brief scason, absolute: but it was soon succeedel by more lofty sentiments. ... Even on the very day of the murder, the Estates of Holland, then sitting at Welft, passed a resolution to maintaiu the goond cause, with Godis help, to the uttermost, without sparing goid or hiood.'. . The next movement, after the last solcmn obsequies had been rendered to the Prince, was to provide for the lmmediate wants of his family. For the man who had gone into the revoit with almost royai revenues, left his estate so embarrassed that his carpits, tapestrics, househoid linen-nay, even his silver spoons, and he very clothes of his warl-rule- - were disposed of at auction for the benett of his creditors. At the hesd of this body was placed young Maurice, who accepted the resp onsibie position, after three days dellberation. .. The Councll consisted of three members from Brabant, two from Flanders, four from Holiand, tinree from Zeeland, two from Utrecht, one from Mechlin, and three from Friesiand - eighteen in all. They were empowered and enjoined to levy troops by land and sea, and to appoint naval and military offcers; to csts hifsh courts of admiralty, to expend the moneys voted by the States, to maintain the ancient privileges of the country, and to see that all troops in service of the Provinces made oath of Edelity to the Union. Alexander of Parma. Was swift to take advantage of the caliamity which had now befallen the rehellious Provinces...I In Holland and Zeeland the Prince's dandisliments were oi no avali. In Fianders and Brabant the jpirit was less noble. Those provinces were neariy iost already. Bruges [which had made terns with the King early in 1584] seconded Parma's efforts to induce its sister-city Ghent to imitate fits own basencess in surrendering without a struggle; and that powerfui, turhulent, but most anazchicai liftle commonweaith was but too ready to listen to the voice of the tempter. . . . Lpon the 17th August [1.584] Dendermonde surrendered.
lpon the ith September Viivoorie capituiated, by which event the water-communication between Brussels and Antwerp was cut off. Ghent now thoroughiy disheartened, treated with Parma likewise and upon the 1 ITh September made its reconciliation with the king. The surrender of so strong and important a place was as disastrous to the cause of the patriots as it was disgraceful to the citizens themseives. It was, however, the resuit of an intrigue which had been long spirning. The noble city of Ghent then as large es Paris, thoroughiy surrounded with mouts, and fortified with hulwarks, raveilins, and counterscarps, constructed of earti, during the previous two years, at grcat expense, and provided with hresd and meat, powder and shot, enough to last a year - was ignominiously surrendered. The population, already a very reduced and slender one for the great extent of the piace and its former importance, had becn estimated at 70,000 . The numher of houses was farther reduced to one-half, there remained hut one individual to each louse. On the other hand, the 25 monasteries and convents in the town were repeopled. The fall of Brussels was deferred till March, and that of Mechlin (19th July, 1585), and of Antwerp [see beiow] (18th August, 1585), till Midsummer of the following year; hut the surrender of Ghent foreshadowed the fate of Flanders and Brabant. Ustend and Sluys, however, were atill in the hands of the patriots, and with them the controi of the whole Flemish coast. The command of the sea was flesthed to remaln for centuries with the new repuhlic."-J. L. Motley, Hist. of the United Netherlands, ch. 1 (v. 1).
A. D. 1584-1585. -The Siege and surrender of Antwerp.-Decay of the city. "After the full of Ghent, Farnese applied hlmself earnest's to the sicge of Antwerp, one of the most me:orable recorded in history. The cltizens were anlmated in theil defence by the valour and taient of Ste Aldegonde. It would be impossible to detail with minuteness in thls general history the various contrivances resorted to on either side for the attack and the defence; and we must there. fore content ourselves with hrietly adverthg to that stopendous monument of Farnese's milltary genlins, the hridge which he carried across the Scheld, below Antwerp, in order to cut off the communleation of the city with the sea and the maritime provinces. From the depth and wideness of the river, the difficulty of finding the requisite materials, and of transporting them to the place selected in the face of an enemy that was superior on the water, the project was foudly denounced by Farnese's offeers as visionary and lmpracticahle. yet $\ln$ splte of all these discouragements and it:ffleultles, as the place scemed unapproachabie in the usual way, he steadily persevered, and at st suecerded in an undertaking whieh, had le falled, would have covered hlm with perpetial ridicule. The spot fixed upon for the bridge was between Ordam and Kalloo, where the river is both shallower and narrower than at other parts. The hridge consisted of piles driven into the water to sueh distance as its depth wonld allow; whleh was 201 feet on the Flanders slde and 900 feet on that of Brahaut. The lnterval between the piles, which was 12 feet broal, was covered with planklng; hut at the extremitles towards the centre of the river the hreadth was extended to 40 feet, thus forming two forts, or platforms, mounted with cannon. There was stlll, however, an interstlee in the middle of between 1,000 and 1,100 feet, through which the ships of the enemy, faroured by the wind and tide, or ty the uight, could manage to pass without any cansherahle loss, and which it therefore hecame necessary to fill up. Thls was aceomplished by nooring across it the hul's of 32 vessels, at in. tervals of about 20 feet apart, and conncetling then together with planks. Each vessel was plauted with artillery and garrisoned hy about 30 men: while the bridge was protected by a flota of ressels moored un each side, above and below, at a dlstance of about 200 feet. During the constructlon of the bridge, whleh lasted half a year, the eltizens of Antwerp vicwed with dismay the progress of a work that was not only to deprive them of thelr marltlme commerce, but also of the supplies necessary for thelr suhsistence and defence. At length they adopted a plan sug.
geated hy (ilanbelll, an Italian engineer, and resolved to destroy the hrilge hy means of tre. ships, which seem to have been frst used on this occasion. Several such vessels were sent down the river with a farourahle tide and Flnd, of which two were charged with 6,000 or 7,000 lbs. of gunpowder each, packed in solid masonry, with various destructive misalles. One of these vessels went ashore before =raching its dcatina. tlon; the nther arrived af che hrigge and ex. ploded with terribie effect. Curiosity to behoh] so novel a spectacle had attracted vast numbera of the Spanlards, who lined the shores as well as the hridge. Of these 800 were killed hy the expiosion, and by the implements of destruction discharged with the powder; a still greater nismber were maimed and wounded, and the bridge itself was conslderably damaged. Farnese himself was thrown to the earth and lay for a time insensible. The besieged, however, dhl not fol. fow up thelr plan with vignur. They allowed Farnese tlme to repalr the damage, and the Spaniards, being now on the aiert, either diverted the course of the fire-ships that were sulsequently sent against them, or suffered them to pass the hridge through openinge made for the purpose. In spite of the hridge, however, the beleaguered citizens might atill have secured a transit down the river hy hreakling through the dykes between Antwerp and Lillo, and sallng over the plains thus laid under water, for whlch purpose it wis necessary to ohtaln possession of the counter. dyke of Kowenstyn ; but after a partia! suecesi, too quickly ahandoned hy Hohenlohe and Ste Aldegonde, they were defeated $\ln$ a bioodr buttle which they fought upon the dykc. to the succour of the Cardinal Infant. The ulowness of all the operations of the Prince of Orange afforded sufficient tlme for these auxiliar. fes to cut ofl the Freach supplies of provisions, and advance to the relief of Louvain. On the intelligence of their approach, the haif-famished French abandoned the siege, and, after suffering severely in their retreat, retired to recruit at Ruremonde. The Dutch afforded them no assistance, and showed them but fittie sympathy in their disasters. Though the Dutch hated Spain, they were Jeaious of France, and dreaded an increase of its power in the Netherlanda. Mareschals Chatliion and Brezé, who were thus in a great measure the victims of the polley of thelr alifes, were under the necessity of leading bnck beyond the Meuse. to Nimeguen, the wretched remains of their army, now reduced to 0,000 men. After the departure of the French, the exertlons of the Prince of Orange were ilmited, during this season, to an attempt for the recovery of the strong fortress of Skink, which had recently been reduced by the Spaniards. The Cardinil Infant, availing himself of the opportunity thus presented to him, quickiy regalned, by aid of the Austrian reinforcements, his superiority in the fieid. He took several fortresses from the Dutch, and sent to the fronticrs of France detachments which ievied contrihutions over great part of Picardy and Champagnc.

Encouraged by these successes, Olivarez [the Span:-h minister] redoubled his exertlons, and now boidiy pianned invaslons of France from three different quarters "- to enter Picardy on the north, Burgundy on the east, and Guienne at the south. "Of ail these expeditions, the most successful, at least for a time, was the invasion of Picardy, which, ladecti, had nearly proved fatal to the French monarchy. By orders of the Cnrdinai Infant, his generals, Princc Thomas of Savoy, Piccolominil, and John de Vert, or Wert, begnn their march at the head of ar army whlch exceeded 30,000 nen, and was partlculariy strong in cavalry. . . . No interrnption being. . . offered by the Dutch, the Spanish generais entered Picardy [1636], and seized almost without reslstance on La Capeile and Catelet, which the Freneh ministry expected would have occupied their anns for some months. The Count de Solssons, who was aiready thinking more of his piots against Riehelleu than the defence of his country, did nothing to arrest the progress of the Spaninris, till they arrived at the somme," and there but ilitle. They foreed the passage of the river with slight difficuity, and "occupled Roye, to the south of the Somme, on the river Olse; and havlng tinus ohtaiued nn entrance into France, spread themseives over the whole country lying between these rivers. The smoke of the villages to which they set fire was seen from the helghts ln the vleinity of Paris; nud such $\ln$ that capital was the consternatlon consequent on these events that lt seems prohahic, layd thic Spnnlsh generals marched straight ou Paris, the city wouid have fallen into thelr hands." But Prinec Thomas was not bold enough for the exploit, and prudently "receded with his army to form the siege of Corbie. Thls town presented no great resistance to his arms, but the time occupied by its capture aliowed the Parisians to recover from thcir cousteruation, and to prepare the means of defencc." They raised an army of $80,(94) \mathrm{imen}$, claefly Hyprentiees and artisans of the capital, before which Prince

Thomas was ohliged to retreat. "The French quickiy recovered ail thome fortited piaces in Plicardy which had been previousiy iost by the incapacity, or, as Richelieu alieged, hy the treachery of their governors. But they could not prevent the Spaniards from piundering and desolating the country as they retired. . . . The Cardinal Infant was ohliged to reniain on the defensive for some time after his retreat from Picardy to the Netherlands, whlch were anew invaded by a French force, under the Cardinal La Vaiette, a younger son of the Duke d'Epernon. But even while restricting his operatlons to defence, the Infant couid not prevent the capture hy the French of Ivry and Landreci in IIainault. While opposing the enemy in that quarter, he received inteiligence of an unexpected attempt on Breda hy the Dutch [1837]. He lmmediately hastened to its reiief; but the Prince of Orange having rapidly coliected 6,000 or 7,000 pensants, whom he had employed in forming intrenchments and drawing fines of cireumvaliatlon, was so well fortifted on the arrival of the Cardinai Infant, who had crossed the Scheidt at Antwerp, and approached with not fewcr than 25,000 men, that that Prince, in despair of forcing the enemy's camp, or in any way succouring Breda, marelied towards Guelderiand. In that province he towk Venio and Ruremonde; but Breda, as he lad anticipated, surrendered to the Dutch nfter a siege of nine weeks. Its capture grentiy relieved the Dutch in Brahant, who now, for many years, had becn checked hy an enemy in the heart of their territories. . . Eariy in the year 1638, the Infant resumed offensive operations, and again rendered himself formldabie to his enemles. He frustrated the attempts which the Dutch had concerted against Antwerp. . . . In person he beat off the army of the Prince of Orange, who had invested Gucilres; and. about the same time, his actlve generals, Prince Thomas of Savoy and Piccoiomini, compelied the French to raise the siege of St. Omer."-J. The Ilullanders were under arms unusualiy carly, hut they atoned for this by aecompilshing nothing. The French iald siege to Courtrai, which in due time surrendered, and they then sjent thro weeks in a vigorous siege of Mardyek. This place was inally captured for the second tlme in ourteen montha. It was now late in August, and Orleans was ready to rest from a campalgn which had lasted three montha. . By the departure of Gaston the Duke of Enghlen was left iree to attempt some lmportant movement, and hls thoughts turned upon the capture of the clty of Dunkirk. Dunklrk was sltuated on the ahore of the North Sea, in a position that made lt alike important and formiddable to commerce.
Its harbor leading to a canal in the city where a fleet might safely enter, and lits posiltlon near the shores of France and the British Channel, had rendered it a frequent retreat for plrates. The cruisers that captured the ships of the merchants of Havre and Dieppe, or made plundering expedltions along the shores of Pleardy and Normandy, found safe refuge in the harbor of Dunklrk. Its name was odlous through northern France, allke to the shlpper and the resldent of the towns along the coast. The ravages of tine pirates of Dunklrk are sald to have cost France as much as a million a year. . . . The positlon of Dunklris was such that it seemed to defy at tack, and the strangeness and wildness of lts approaches added terror to lis name. It was sur rounded by vast plains of sand, far over which often spread the waters of the North Sea, and lts name was said to signify the church of the dunes. U'pon them the fury of the storms often worked strange changes. What had seemed solid land would te swailowed up in some tempest. What had been part of the ocean wouid be left so that men and wagons couid pass over what the day before had been as lnaccesslhie as the Stralts of Dover. An army attemptling a siege would flad itwif on these wild dunes far renoved from any places for supplies, and exposed to the utmost severity of storm and wenther. Tents couid iarilly be pitched, and the chnnging sands would threaten the troops with destruction. The city wus, moreover, garrisoned hy 3,000 soldiers, and by 3,000 of the citlzens and 2,000 saiiors. The ardor of Enghien was increased hy these ditheuitics, and he believed that with akili and vigor the perils of a siege could be overeome. This plan met the warm approval of Mazarin.

Enghien adranced with his army of about 15,000 men, and on the 19th of September the siege began. It was necessary to prevent supplies being received by sca. Tromp, excited to hearty admiration of the genius of the young general, sailed with ten ships into the harbor and cut off commmnications. Enghicn, in the meantime, was pressing the clrcumvallation of the city with the utnost rigor. . . IIaif fed, wet, sicepiess, the men worked on, insplred hy the zcal of their ieader. Piccoiomini attempted to relieve the city, hut inc could not forec Enghien's cntrenchinents, except hy risking a pitched battle, and that he did not dare to venture. Mines were now curricd under the city hy the beslegers, and a great explosion made a breach 1 ln the waii. The French and Spanlsh met, but the smoke and confusion were so ter rible that both sldes at jast feii hack $\ln$ disorder. The French flnally discovered that the advantage was really thelrs, and held the positlon. Nothing now remained hut a final and hloody assault, hut Leyde did not thlink that honor required him to awalt this. He agreed that lf be did nut receive sincor lyy the 10 il2 of October, the city slould be surrendered. Piccolonnlni dared not rlsk the last army in Flanders in an assault on Enghlen's entrenchments, and, on October 11th, the Spanish troops evacuated the town. A slege of three weeks had conquered obstacles of man and nature, and destroyed the scourge of French commerce."-J. B. Perklns, Franco under [Rich. elieu and] Mazarin, ch. 8 (v. 1).

A. D. 1646-1648.-Final Negotiation of Inces.- "The late campalgn had been so unfortunate [to the Spaniards] that they felt thelr only posslhillty of ohtalning reasonable terms, or of contlnuing the war with the hope of a change in fortune, was to break the aliiance be$t$ ween Holland and France. A long deht of grattude, assistance rendered in the struggle with Spaln when assistance was valuahle, the treaty of 1635 renewed in 1644, forbade Hoiland making a peace, except jolntly wlth France. On the othcr hand, the States-General were weary of war, and jcalous of the power and amhitlon of the French. . Thls disposition was skilf uily fostered hy the Spanish envoys. Pau and Knuyt, plenipotentlaries from Holiand to the Congress at IIanster [where, In part, the ncgotlations of the Peace of Westphalla were in progress - see Germany: A. D. ${ }^{1648}$, were gained to the Spanlsh interest, as Hazarin claimed, hy the promise to ench of 100,000 crowns. But, npart from hribes, the Spanish mised Mazarin's owu jlans to nlarm the Hollanders. . . . It was lutimnted to the Ilollanders that France was ahout to make a separatc peace, that the Spanish Netherlands were to be given fer, and that perhaps with the hand of the infanta might be transferred what clatins Spain still made on the ailegiance of the United Provinces. The French protested $\ln$ vain they had never thonght of making any trenty uniess Hol iand joined, and that the proposed marringe of Louis with the lnfanta had becn ldle talk, sing. grested hy the Spanlsh for the purpose of aiarn. ing the States-General. The IIollanders were suspicious, and they became still more cager for peace. . . In the spring of 1646, seventy-one proposed articles had been suhnitted to the $S_{j}$ anish for their considcration. The French nude repeated protests agalnst these steps, hut the States-General inslsted that they were only acting witi such ceierity as should cnahle them to have the terms of their treaty adjusted as soon as those of the French. The successes of 1646 and the capture of Dunkirk quickened the desires of the Uulted Provinces for a treaty with their anclent enemy.

In December, 1646, artieles wres signed bet ween Spaiu and Hoiland, to be Inserted in the treaty of Manster, when that shouid be settled upon, though the States-General still declared that no peace silould be made uniess the terms were approved hy France. Active inostlifies were again commeuced $\ln 1647$, hut little progress was made in Flanders during this campaign. Though the IIoilanders had not actually made peace wlth Spaln, they gave the French no ald. . . On January 30 , 1948, the treaty was at last signed. 'One would tinink,' Wrote Mazarin, 'that for elghty years France had been warring with the provlnces, and Spaln had been protectlng them. Tincy have stalned their reputation with a shameful blemlsh.' lunds to take up arms 'to oppre the violent tyranny of the Spaniards." Urilke the truce of 1609, formal and thal peace was now made. The United Provinces were acknowledged as free and sovereign states. At the time of the truce the Spaniards had only treated with them " ln quality of, and as holding them for independent provinces.' By a provislon whlch had increased the eagerness for peace of the burghers and merchants of the United Provlnces, it was agreed that the Escaut [Scheldt] hould be closed. The wealth and commerce of Antwerp were thus sacrificed for the beneft of Amsterdam. The trade with the Indles was divided between the two countries. Numerous commercial advantages were secured and certain additional territory was ceded to the States-General."-J. B. Perkins, Franeo under [Riche. lien and] Mazarin, ch. 8 ( 0.1 ). "It had.
become a settled conviction of Holland that a barrler of Spanlsh territory between the Unlted Provlnces and France was necessary as a safeguard agalnst the latter. But the idea of fghting to maintaln that barrier had not yet arisen, though fightlng was the outeome of the doctrine, All that the Unlted Provlnces now dld, or conld do, was slmply to hack out of the war with Bpaln, slt still, and look passively upon the conflet between her and France for possesslon of the barrier, untll it should please the two belligerents to make peace."-J. (Spanish Provinces): A. D. 1647-1648.-The Spanish war with France,-Siege and Battle of Lens. - "While Condé was at the head of the army of the Netherlands, it at least suffered no disaster; hut, whlle he was affording the enemy a trinmph in Spain [by hls failure at Lerida see SPAIN: A. D. 1644-1646], the army whlch le left behind him was equally unfortunate. As he had taken some regiments with hlm to Spain, it did not exceed 16,000 men; and in 1647 was commauded hy the two marshals, Gassion and Rantzau," who exercised the command on alternate days. Both were hrave and skllful officers, but they werc bostlle to one another, and lantzan was. unfortnnately, a drunkard. "The Spanish army had been ralsed to 22,000 men, and besldes being superior in numbers to them, was now under the command of a singularly actlve leader, the Archduke Leopoid. He took town after town before thelr face; and towards the end of June lald slege to Landrecles. The danger of so important a place stimulated Mazarin to send some strong hattallons, including the royal guards, to reinforce the army : aud the two marshals mate skilful dispositions to surprise the Spanlsh camp. By a nlght march of great rapidity, they reached the aelghbourloond of the enemy wlthout thelr presence heing suspected; but the next mornlng, when the attack was to be made, it was Rantzau's turn to command; and he was too helplessly drunk to give the neeessary orders. Before he liad recoverel bls consclousness dayllght had revealed his danger to the arehduke, and he had taken up a positlon la which he could glve battle with advantage. Greatly mortificd, the French werc forced to draw off, and leave Landrecies to its fate. As some apparent set-off to thelr logsos. they succeeded lu taking Dixmude, and one or two other unimportant towns, and were besieglng

Lens, when Gasedon was kilied; and though, a few day afterwards, that town was taken, its capture made but small amends. . . Thongh the war was aimost at an end in Germany, Turenne was atlli in that country; and, therefore, the next year there was no one who could be sent to replace Gassion but Conde and Grammont, Who fortunately for the prince, was bis almost inseparable comrade and adviser. . . . Thoush 16,000 men had been thought enough for Gussion and Rantzau, 80,000 were now collected to enahie Condé to make a more successful campalgn. The archduke had received no reinforcements, and had now only 18,000 men to make head agalnst hlm; yet with this greatly lnferior force he, for a whlle, halanced Conde's successes: losing Y'pres, it is true, hut taklng Courtrai and Furnes, and defeating and almost annlhilating a dlvision with which the prince had detached Itantzau to make an attempt upon Ostend. At last, in the mildle of August, he lald slege to Lens, the capture of which had, as we have already mentioned, been the last explolt of the French army in the preceding campaign, and Whlch was now retaken without the garrison making the slightest effort at resistance. But, just as the first intelligence of hls having sat down before it reached Conde, he was Jolned by the Count d'Erlach wlth a reinforcement of 5,000 men from the German army; and he resolved to march against the archdur in solved to march against the archduke in the hope of saving" the place. "Ile arrived In sight of the town on the 20th of August, a few homrs after it had surrendered; and he found the arch duke's vlctorious army in a posllion whlch, entrer as he was for hattle, he could not venture to attack. For Leopold had 18,000 men under arms, and the force that Condé had been able to bring wlth hlm difl not exceed 14,000 , with 18 guns. For the first time in his life he declded on retreating " hut carly $\ln$ the retreat hls army wis thrown into disorder hy an attack from the arcliduke's cavalry, commanded by General Beck. "All was nearly lost, when Grammont turnevl the fortune of the day. He was in the var, hut the moment that he learnt what was taklar phuce behlnd him, he halted the advanced giami, aml leading lt back towarls the now triumphaut enemy, gave time for those reglments whieh hawl been driven in to rally behlnd the firm llne which lie presented. . . . It soon came to be a contist of latd fighting, unvaried hy manceuvres on either side; and ln hard flglitlig no troops could stand before those who night be lead by Coale:.

At last victory declared for hlm ln every part of hls llnc. IIe had sustained a heary loss himself, hut less than that of the cnemy. who left 3,000 of thelr number slain upon the fielil: whlle 5,000 prisoners, among whom was Beck hlmself, struck down by a mortal wounal, aml nearly all thelr artillery and haggage, attestel the really and greatness of his triumph."-(1.1). A. D. 1647-1650,-Suspenslon of the Stadtboldership. - Supremacy of the States of Hol-land.- The fourth stadtholder, Wllllam II., whi" suceeeded his father, Frederick Heary, $\ln 164 \%$, "was young and enterprislng, snd not at all linposed to follow the pacific example of hls futher.

His attempt at a coup d'ftat only prepared hrother.in lor an interregnum. $\dot{f} \cdot \mathrm{He}$ was hrother-in-law to the Elector of Brandenhurg and son-ln-law to Charles I. of England and Henrietta Maria, the sister of Louis XIII. Princese proud descenclnnt of the Stuarts, the Princess Mary, who had been married to him when hardly more thnn $n$ child, thonght it beencouraged her husband not to be savereign, and encouraged her husband not to be satisfied to remain merely 'the official of a republic.' Thus encotraged, the son of Frederick Henry cherlshed the secret purpose of transforming the elective stadtholdership into an hereditary monarchy. He needed supreme authority to enable him to render assistance to Charles I. Finding in the opposition of the States an insur. mountable obstacle to his wish of intervention, he sought the support of France, . . and was now ready to come to an linderstanding with Mazarin to break the treaty of Munster and wrest e Netherlands from Spain. Mazarin promised in return to help him to assert his authority over the States. . . . But if William desired war, the of Holland, could and in particular the provinee of Holland, could not dispense with peace. The States of Holland tixed the period for the disbanding of the twenty-nine companies Whnse dismissal had been promised to them. After trelve days of useless deliberations they issued defnite ordera to that effect. The step had been provoked, but it was precipitate aud might give rise to a legal eontest as to thelr competency. The Prince of Orange, therefore, eager to hasten a struggle from which he expectel an easy victory, chose to consider the resolution of the States of Holland ns a signal for the rupture of the Cnion, aud the very next day soleminly demanded reparation from the States-General, who in their turn issued $n$ counter onier. The Prinee made skilful use of the rivalry of power between the two assemblies to ohtain for himself extraordinary powers whleh were contrary to the laws of the Confederation. By the terms of the resolution, which was passed by only four provinees, of which two were represented by but one deputy each, he was authorised to take all measures necessary for the maintenance of order and penee, and particularly for the preservation of the Enion. The States General consequently commissioned him to visit the town councils of Holland, aecom. panied by six members of the States General and of the Councll of State, with all the pomp of a military escort, ficluding a iarge number of officers. He was charged to address then with remonst rances and threats intended to intimidate the provinefal States.' This was the first act of the coup d'etat that he had prepared, and his mistake was quiekly shown him." The Prinee galned nothing by his visitation of the towns. At Amsterdam he was not permitted to enter the place with his following, and he returned to the Hague especially enraged ngainst that bold and independent city. He planned an expedition to take it by surprise; hut the citizens got tinuely warning and his seheme was haftled. He had sueceeded, however, in arresting and imprisoning six of the most infiuential deputies of the As. semhly of Holland, and his attitude was formidable enough to extort some concessions from the pupuiar party, by way of compromise. A state of suspicious quiet was restored for the time, which William improved hy renewing negotia. tions for a secret treaty with France. "Arrogating to himself already the right to dispose as he pleased of the repuhlic, he signed a convention with Count d' Estrades, whom he had summoned to the Hague, By this the King of France and the Prince of Orange engaged themselves' to attaek conjointly the Netherlands on Miay 1, 1651, with an army of 20,000 foot and 10,000 horse, to break at the same time with Cromwell, to re-estahlish Charles II. as King of England, and to make no treaty with Spain excepting in concert with ench other.' The Prince of Orange guaranteed a fleet of 50 vessels besides the land con. tingent, and in return for his co-operation was promised the absolute possession of the city of Antwerp ard the Duchy of Brabant or Marquisilte of the Holy Roman Empire. Wiliam thus interested Franee in the suceess of his cause hy making ready to resume the war with Spain, and caleulated, as he told his confidants, on profting by her nssistance to disperse the callat opposed to him. . . . The internal nacification amounted then to no more than a truce, when over-fatigued nnd he Prince of Orange, having over-fatigued nnd heated himself in the chase, was selzed with small-pox, of which in a few days he died. He was thus carried off at the age of 24 , in the full force and dower of his age, leaving only one son, born a week after his father's death. . . His attempt nt n coup d'état fate of the posthumous son fate of the posthumous son. who hnd to wait 22 years before succeeding to his nncestral functions. It elosed the suecession to him for many years, hy making the stadtholdership a standing menace to the public freedom. ...The son of William II., au orphan before his birth, and named William like his father, seemed destined to sueceed to little more thin the paternal nanie.

Three days after the death of Willinm II. the former deputies, whom he had treated as state prisoners aud deprived of all their offices, were reealled to take their seats in the Assembly. At the same time the provincial Town Councils assumed the power of nominating their own magistrates, which had almost always been left to the pleasure of the Stadtholder, and thus obtained the full enjoynient of municipal freedom. The States of Hollaud, on theirside, grasped the anthority hitherto exereised in their province by the Prince of Orange, and claimed successively all the rights of soverelgnty. The States of Zealand. . exhibited the same eagerness to before declnring the stadtholdection. . . Thus, before declaring the stadtholdership vacant, the plete this transformintion of the government, the States of Holland took the initiative in summoning to the Hague a grent assembly of the Confederation, whieh met nt the beginning of the year 1651.

The congress was called upon to decide between two forins of constitution. The question was whether the United Provinces should be a republic governed by the StatesGeneral, or whether the government should belong to the States of eaeh province, with only a reservation in favour of the ohligations imposed by the Act of Union. Was each province to be sovereign in itself, or suhject to the federal porrer: practical abolition of the stadtholdership. "Freed from the counterhalancing power of the Stadtholder, Holland to a great extent absorbed the federal power, and was the gainer by all that that power iost. . . . The States of Hoiland, dentined henceforward to be the principai instrument of government of the republic, was composed partly of nobies and partly of deputles from the towns. . . The Grand Penalonary was the minister of the Statem of Holiand. He was appointed for five yeara, and represented them in the States-General. . . Calied upon by the vacancy in the atadthoiderahip to the government of the Unlted Provinces, without any iegai power of enforcing obedience, Hoiland required a stateaman who couid secure this politicai supremaey and use it for her beneft. The nomj. natlon of John de Witt as Grand Pensionary placed at her service one of the yonngeat mem. bers of the assembly."- A. L. Pontalis, John do Witt, ch. 1-2 (o. 1).

Prosperity and pre-eminence of the Dutch Re-public.- The causes.-"That thls little patch of carth, a bog rescued from the waters, warred on ever by man and by the elements, without naturai advantages except those of contact with the sea, shouid in the middle of the seventeenth century have become the commerciai centre of Europe, is onc of the phenomena of history. But in the explanation of this phenomenon history has ue of its most instructive fescons. Philip II. said of Holland, 'that it was the country nearest to heil.' Weif might he express such an oplnion. He had buried around the wails of its cities more than three hundred thousand Spanish soidiers, and had spent in the attempt at lis subjugation more than two hundred milifon ducats. This fact aione would aceount for his abhorrence, hut, In addition, the repubiic was $\ln$ its every fenture opposed to the ideai country of a bigot and a despot. The first element which contributed to its wealth, as well as to the vast increase of its population, was its reiigious tolerathon.

Thls, of course, was as incomprehenslble to a Spanish Cathoilc as it was to a HighChurchman or to a Presbyterian in England. That Lutherans, Caivlnlsts, Anabaptists, Jews, atd Cathoiics shouid all be permitted to live under the same government seemed to the rest of Europe llke flylng in the face of Providence. Critics at thls thme occaslonnliy said that the Hollunders cared nothing for religion; that with them theology was of iessaccount chan commerce. To taunts fike these no reply was needed by men who could point to their record of eighty years of war. This war had been fought for liberty of conscience, hut more than ali, as the greater includes the less, for civif ilberty. During its continuance, and at every crisis, Catholles had stood slde by slde with Protestants to defend their country, as they had done in Engiand when the Spanlsh Armada appeared upon her coast. It would have been a strange reward for their fidefity to subject them, as Elizabeth dld, to a relentless persecution, upon the pretext that they were dangerous to the State. In addition to the toieration, there were other causes leading to the marvellous prosperity of the republic, Which are of particular interest to Americans. In 1659, Samuel Lamb, a promlnent and far seelug London merehant, published a pauphifet, in the form of a letter to Cromwell, urging the es.
tabilshment of a bank in England similar to the one at Amateriam. In the pamphiet, which Lond Bomera thought worthy of preservatlon, the author gives the reanons, as they occurred to, him, which accounted for the vast superiority of Hoitiand over the rest of Europe as a commerciai nation. $\qquad$ As the foundation of a bank for England was the subject of the letter, the author naturally lays particular atress upon that factor, but the other causea which he enumerates as ex. piaining the great trade of the republie are the foliowing: First. The statesmen sitting at the heim in Holiand are many of them merchants, bred to trade from thelr youth, improved by foreign travei, and acquainted with all the neces. sittes of commerce. Hence, their laws and treaties are framed with wisdom. Second. In Holiaud when a merchant dies, his property is equally divided among his chlidren, and the husiness is continued and expanded, with all its traditions and inherited experience. In England, on the eontrary, the property goes to the ellest son, who often sets up for a country gentleman, squanders his patrimony, and negiects the business by whleh his father hrd wecome enriched. Third. The honesty of the Hollanders in their manufacturing and commercial deallngs. When goods are made up in Hoiiand, they sell everywhere without queation, for the purchaser knows that they are exactly as represented in quality. welght, and measure. Not so with England's goods. Our manufacturers are so given to fraud and adulteration as to bring their commodities into diagrace ahroad. 'And so the Dutch have the preeminence in the sale of their manafactures before us, by their true making, to their very fles and needles.' Fourth. The care and vigiance of the government in the laying of 1 m positions so as to encourage their own manufactures; the sklif and rapidlty with which they are changed to meet the shifing wants of trade; the encouragement given by ampie rewards from the puhlic treasury for useful inventious anid improvements; and the pronotion of men to offlee for services and not for favor or sinlster ends. Such were the causes of the commercial supremacy of the Dutch as they appeared to aa English merchant of the time, an? ali modern investigatlons support his view . . . ; war Joshaa [Josiah] Child, writing a few years later [ A New Dlscourse of Trade, p. 2, and after - 1665], gives a fuiler expianation of the great prosperity of the Nctherland Repuhlle. He evidently had Lamb's pamphlet before hlm, for he cnumerates ail the causes set forth by hls predecessor. In addition, he gives several others, as to some of which we shall see more hereafter. Among these are the general education of the peopic, incas. ing the women, reilgious toieration, carc of the poor, low eustom duties and high cxcise, regis. tration of tities to real estate, low interest, the iaws permitting the assignment of debts, and the judicial system under which controversies betwcen merchants can be declded at one forticth part of the expense in Engiand. . . . Probably, no body of men governing a state were ever more enlightened and better acqualnted whith the necessities of iegislation than were these burghers, merchants, and manufacturers who for two eenturies gave laws to Hoiland. It was iargely due to the inteiligence displayed by these men that the repubiic, during the coutinusnce of its war, was enahied to support a burden of taxa.
tha the world has rareiy seen before or face. The internal taxes seem appalling. Rents were tared twenty-Hive per cent. ; on all saies of real eatate two and a haif per cent. were levied, and on ail coliaterai inheritances five per cent On beer, wine, meat, salt, spirits, and all articies of luxury, the tax was one hundred per cent. and on some articies this was douhied. But this was only the Internai taxation, in the way of ex cise duties, which were levied on every one natives and foreigners aiike. In regard to forelgn commodities, which the repuhlic needed for its support, the system was very differeut Upon them there was imposed : Iy a nominai duty of one per cent., whife wiwi, the great stapic for the manufacturers, was ndinitteif free. Here the statesmen of the republic showed the wisdom which piaced them, as masters of poitit cal economy, at ieast two, centuries in alvance of their contemporaries, "-D. Hoiliand was overwheluningis preponderant in the federation. She possessed the richest, most populous, and most powerful town. She contributed more than one-half of the sole feleral taxation. She had the right of naming the amhassadors at Paris, Stockhoim, anci Vienna. The fact that the States Geverai met on her territory - at the Hague - necessarily gave her additlonal influeuce and prestige. With the stalt hoider's powe that of the States Generai aiso. as representing the iden of centratisation, hadi largely disappeared. The Provinciai Estates of Holland, the refore, under tie title of 'Their Higi Mightanesses,' became the principai power -to such an extent, indecd, that the term 'Holiand' had by the time of the Restoration [the Engiish Restoration, A. (Holland): A. D. 1665-1666.-War with Engiand renewed.-•A formai deciaration of war between Hoiland and Engiand took piace is March, 1665. The Engish nation, jeaious of the commerciai prosperity of Hoiland, eageriy seconded the vie ws of the king ngainst that country. indi in regard to the war a remarkable degree of uinn prevalied throughout Great Britain. Such, however, was not the case with the' itch, who were very much divided in opinion, and had many reasons to be doubtfut of the support of France. One of the grand ohjects $C$ : Charles II. Was undouhtedly to restore hir nephew the Prince of Orange to aii the power which had been haid by his ancestors in the United Provinces. But hetweer Holland and England there existed, besides numerous other most fertile causes of discord, unsettled claims upon distant territories, rival colonies in remote parts of the worid, maritime jeaiousy and constant comm-r. cini opposition These were national motives for hostility, and affected a iarge body of the Dutch peopie. But, on the other hand, considerations of generai interest were set aside hy the poiitleal factions which divided the United Provinces, and which may be ciassed under the names of the lRepuhlican and the Monarchical parties. The Monarchical party was, of nomurse, that which was attached to tine interests of vhe 110use of Orange. .. In the cad of 1664, 130 1) utch merchantmen had bee. captured hy Eng. land: ncts of hostiiity had occurred :a Guinea at the Cape de Vord, [in New Netherlanil], and in the West Indies: hut Louis [SIV. of France] had continued to avoid taking any active part against Great Britain, notwhihstanding ail the representations of De Witt, who on this occasion saw in Fralse the naturai ally of Hoiland. On the 13th of June [1685], however, : navai engagenent took piace betwe on the tlect, commanded by Opdam and Van and the Engiish fleet, commanded by the - ie of York and I'rince Rupert. Opdam was dcfeated and killed; Va. Tromp saved the remains of his flet; and on the very same day a tresty was conciuded between Arlington [the English minister) and an envoy of the Eishep of Musster by which it was agreed that the warlike and restless prelate should invade the United Provin. ces with an army of 20,000 men, in consideration of sums of money to be pi'd by England. This treaty st once called Louis into action, and he notlfed to the Blahop of Munster that lf he made any hoatlle movement agalnst the States of Holland he would find the trcops of Francc prepared to oppose hlm. This fact was mnounced to the States hy D'Eetrades on the 22nd of July, together with the lnformatlon that the French monarch was about to send to thelr asslatance a boly of troops hy the way of Manders. Stlll, however, Louls hung hack in the exccution of his purpowes, 'li the aspect of affalrs in the leglnnligg of 1066 forced hlm to declare war agalnst England, on the 26th of January in that year, aecordlng to the terms of hls treaty with Holland. . . . The part that France coole in the Far was altogether inslgnlficant, and served hut llttle to frec the Dutch from the danger $\ln$ whlch they wre placed. That nation ltself made 1 ast eflorts to obtaln a superiority at ses; and ln thbeglaning of June, 1666, the Dutei flect, com manded hy De Ruyter and Van Tromp, encoun. tered the English tleet, under Monk qnd Prince Rupert, and a hattle whlch lasted for four days. wilth scarcely any intermission, took piace. It would seem that some advantage was gained hy the Dutch: hut both fleets were tremendously shattered, and retlred to the ports of thelr own country to refit. Shortly after, however, they again encountered, and one of the most tremendous naval engagements in hlstory took place. in whlch the Dutch suffered a complete defeat; 20 of thelr first-rate nicn-of-war were eaptured or sunk; and three admlrals, with 4,000 men, were kllled on the part of the States. The Frencli ficet could not come up ln tlme to take part In the hattle, and all that Louls did was to furnlsh De Wltt with the means of repalring the losses of the States as raplitly as posslile. The energy of the grand pensionary hlmself, how. ever, effeeted nuch more than the slow and unwilling succour of the French klng. Wliti almost superhuman exertion new fleets were made ready and manned, while the grand penslonary amused the English ministers wlth the prospect of a speedy peace on thelr own terms; and at a moment when England was least prepared, Ie IRuyter and Cornelius de Wltt ap. peared upon the coast, salled up the Thames, attacked and took Shcerness, and destroyed u great number of slips of the line. A multltude of smaller vessels were hurnt; and the consternation was so great throughout England, that a large quantity of stores and many shlps were sunk and destroyed hy order of the British au. thoritles themselves, whlle De Ruyter ravaged the whole sea-coast from the routla of the Thames to the Land's End. The negotlations for peace. which lad commenced at Breda. were now eatited on upon terms much more alvantageous to IIveiand, and were speedily coucluded: Enyland, notwithstanding the naval glory she hatil gained, belog fully as mueh tired of the war as the States themeelves. A general treaty was slyned on the 25th of July. '-G. I'. R. (The Spanira Provinces): A. D. 166\%.The claims a conquests of Louis XIV.The War of the Queen's Rights.- In 1680 Louis XIV., king of France, was married to the Infants of 8paln. Maria Therema, dsuphtel of Phllip IV., who eolemaly renounced at ise tlnue, for herself and her noster $y$, all rights to the Spanish erown. Tho lnslncerity and hollowness of the renunciation was proved terrihly at a later tlme hy the long "war of the Spanish siceesslon." Meantlme Louls discovered other pretended rights in hls Spanish wife on which he might found clalms for the atiafacton of his territoriai greed. These rested on the fact that she was born of her father's first marriage, and that a customary right in certain pr, nces of the Epanish Netherlands gave dauglitrs of a firt marriage priority of Inheritance over sons of a second marriage. $A$ t the same time, in the laws of Luxembourg and Franche-Comté, which admitted a!l chlldren to the partition of an lnheritance, he found pretext for ciaiming, on behalf of hls wife, one fourth of the former and rne third of the princlpallty last named. Phillp IV. of Spaln died in September, 1665, leaving a slckly infant son under the regency of an incapable and priest-ruled mother, and Louis began qulckly to press his clalms. Having made his preparatlons on a frimildahle scale, he sent forth $\ln$ May, 1667. wall the courts of Europe, an elaborate "Treatlse on the Rights of the Most Christlan Queen over Ilvers States of the monarchy of Spain," announcing at the same tine hls intentlon to make a "journey" In the Cathollc Netherlands - the intended journey being s ruthless Invasion, in fact, with 50,000 men, under the command of the great marshai generui, Turenne. The army began lts march slmultaueously with the announcement of Its purpose crosslng the frontler on the 2tth of May. Tuwn after town was taken, some without reslstance and others after a short, sharp slege, dlrected by Vauban, the most famous among military engineers. Charlerol was occupled on the $2 d$ of Junc; Tournay surrendercd on the 2til; two weeks later Doual fcll; Courtral endurel oniy four days of slege and Oudenarde hut two; Lille was a more difticult prize and held Turenne aml the king befreve it for twenty days. But Glent was not assalled, the French army belng greatly fatigned and much rebloced hy the garrisoning of the conquered places. Louls, accordingly, returned to Saint-Germain, and Turenne, after taking Alost, weut Into winter quarters. Before the winter passed great changcs of circumstance had occurred. The Triple Allance of England, IIolland and Sweien liad been formed, Louis had made his secret treaty at Vlenna with the Emperor, for the partitioning of the Spanlsh dominlons, anit his further "jouruey " in the Netherhunds was postponed. -H. These traties were meant for the public eya: the third was seceet, and bound both England and the States. In case of the refusal of Louls, to unlte with Spain fu the war, and not to lay down their arms till the peace ot the Pyrenees were confrmed. On the same day the Swedlish ambassadors gave a provislonal, and afterwards a positive assent to the league, which from that circumstance obtained the name of the Triple Alllance. Louls receired the news of this transaction wlth an alr of haughty indiffercnce. ii. of Spaln, he had secretly concluded with the h. of Spaln, he had secretly concluded with the emperor Leopoid an 'eventual' trenty of partition of the Spanish monarclly on the espected death of that prince, and thus had already bound bimsei $I$ treaty to do the very thing which 1 t

There was not a Duteh town couth of the lnundation whleh was not in the hands of the Freneh; and nothing remuiaed for the latter but to lle fale until the lee of winter should enable them to cross the floods which eut them off from Amsterdam. Leaving Tureane in command, Louls therefore returned to St. Ger main on August 1." Before winter came, how ever, the alarm of Europe at Louis' aggressions had hrought about a coalitlon of the Emperor Leopold and the Elector of Brandenburg, to suecor the Dutch States. Louis was forced to call Tureane with 16,000 men to Westphalia and Coalé with 17,000 to Alsace. "On September 12 the Austrian general Moatecuculi, the Duke of Lorraine, and the Grand Elector effected thelr \{uaction, latendlag to cross the Rhiae and join William;" but Turenne, by a series of masterly movements, foreed them to retreat, utterly baflied, Into Franconia and Halberstadt. The Eicetor of Braadenburg, discournged, withdrew from the niliaace, aad made peace with Louls, Juae 6, 1673 . The spring of 1673 found the French king advantageously situated, and hls advantages were lmproved. Turning on the Spaniards in their Belgian Netheriands, he lald sliege to the important atronghoid of Maestricht and it wis taken for him by the skili of Vauban, on the 80th of June. But while this succem was belig scored, the Dutch, at ses, had frustrated another attempt of the Angio-French feet to land troops on the Zealand t wat. On the 7th of June, and agaln on the 14ia, De Ruyter and Van Tromp fought of the invaders, under Prince Rupert and D'Estreen, driving them back to the thames. Once more, and for the last timn, they made their attempt, on the 21 st of Auguse, and were brutea In a battie near the Zealand shore which lusted from daylight until dark. The end of August found a new coalitirn against Louls formed by treatien between Holland, Bpain, the Emperor and the Duke of Lorraine. A little later, tie Prince of Orange, after capturing Naardea, ef. fected a Junetlon near Bonn with Moatecucuil who had evaded Turenne. The Eiectors of Trèves and Mayence thereupon Jolned the conil tlon and Colozne and Munster made pence. By this time, publle opinion in England had hecome so angrily opposed to the war that Charles was forced to arrange terms of peace with IIoliani, notwithstanding his engagements with Louls. The attempt which the latter made to drive the alled army from the position it nad gained between themselves and Mons had lts outcome in the terribly bloody battle of Malpisquet-"tho bloodlest knnwn thll then in modern hlstory. $\qquad$ At slx o'clock the morning of the 11 th, the cannonade began. The Prince of Waldeek, and his Dutch, undertook to carry Antoln and Fontenoy hy assankt, whlle the Duke of Cumberland, at the head of the Britlsh and IIanoverians, was to advance agalnst the enemy's left. IIls Royal Highners, at the same time with his own attaek, sent General Ingoldshy, with a divislon, to plerce through the wool of Barré, and storm the redouht heyond it." Ingoldsby's division and the Dutch troops were both repuised, and the latter made no further effort. But the British and IIanoverlans, leaving thelr eavalry behind and dragging with them a few field pleces, "plunged down the ravine between Fontenoy and Burré, and marehed on against a position Which the best Marshals of France had deemed Impregnable, and whleh the best troops of that nation defencled. . . . The contimuedi inactivity of the Duteh, however, enabled the French commander to gather his last reserves it the one point of danger, while he bmught another battery to bear on the head of the alvuneing British column. "The Britlsh, exhausted by their own exertlons, mowed down by the artillery $\ln$ front, and assailed by the fresh tromps in thank, were overpowered. Thelr column waveral-broke-fell back. . . . Brusselis, Antwerp, Mons, Charlerol, Namur, and other places successlvely surrendered to Marshal saxe and the Prince of Contl After the capture of Namur in September, Marshal Saxe, reunlting all the French forces, attacked Prince Charles of Lorraine at Raucoux [or Roucoux], between Llége and Vlset, amul completely defeated hlm, Oetober 11; after Whleh both sldes went into winter quarters. All the eountry bet ween the Meuse and the sea was now in the power of Franee, Austrin retaining only luxamburg and Limburg.

Ever since the year 1745 some negochutlons had been goiug on between France and the Dutch for the reestabllshment of peace. The States.Generul had proposed the assembling of a Congress to the Cabinet of Vlenna, whieh, however, had bern rejected. In septemher 17\%6, couferenees had been opened at Br lia, between France, Great Britain, and the states.General; but as Grent Britaln had gained some advantages at sea, the negoclations were protraeted, and the Cabinets of London und Vlenna hasl endeavoured to lnduce the Dutch to take a more direet and active part In the war. In thls state of things the Court of Versalles tomk a sudden resolution to eocrece the States. Gencrial. A manlfest was published by Louls XV. Aprii 17th 1547, thled with those pretexts which it is easy to flad on such orcaslons: not, Indeed, exactly deelaring war against the Duteh Republle, but that he should enter her territories 'without hreaking with her'; that he should hold in deposit the places he might cunquer, and restore them as soon as the Statis ceased to succour his enenifes. At the same time Count Lowendahl entered Dutch Flandies by Bruges, and selzeel in less than a month sluys, Isendiek, Sas de Gand, Hulst, Axel, and other plaees. Ilolland had now very mueh dectimed from the position she had held a century before. There were indeed many large eapltaists in the United Provinces, whose wealth had been amassed daring the periol of the Republic's commerelal prosperlty, but the state as a whole was Impoverished and steepell in debt. ... In... beeoming the eapitallsts and moner. leniers of Europe, they [the Dutch] had ceased to be her hrokers aul carriers. . . . Holland was no louger the entrepott of nations. The English. the Swedes, the Danes, and the Ilamburghers had appropriated the greater part of her trale. Surh was the result of the long wars in whleh she hal bren engaged. . . Her politieal consideration had dwindled equaily with ber eominerce. 1asteal of pretending as formerly to be the arthiter of nations, she had become litile more than the satellite of Great Britaln; a nosition forced upon her hy fear of France, and her anxiety to main taln her barriers against that eneroaching Power. Sinee the death of William Ill., the republican or aristocratie party had agaln selzed the ascundency. Willam III.'s eollateral heir, John William Friso, had not been reeognised us Stalt hoider, and the Republle was agaln governed, as In the tlme of De Whtt, ly a Grand Pensionary and grettler. The dominant party hal, howevef, become highiy unpopular. It had sacrificed the army to maintain the fleet, and the Republic meemed to lie at the merey of France. At the approach of the French, consternation reigned in the provinces. The Orange party raised ita head and demanded the re-establishment of the Stadt. hoiderahip. The town of Veere in Zeaiand gave the exampie of insurrection, and Wiiliam IV. of Nassau. Dletz, who was aiready Stadthoider of Fricsiand, Groningen and Geideriand, was ultl. mately prociaimed heredltary Stadthoider, Cap-tain-General and Admiral of the United Prov. Inces. Wiilian IV. was the son of John Wiifiam Frlso, and son-in-iaw of George II., whose daughter, Anne, ite had married. The French threatening to attack Maestricht, the alifes under the Duke of Cuinheriand marclied to Lawfeli in order to protect it. Here they were attacked by Inrshal Saxe, July 2nd 1747, and after a hlooriy bittle compelied to recross the Meuse. The Dukc of Cunberiandi, however, took up a position which prevented the French from investing Mnestricht. On the other hand, Lowiondnhl [a Swedish general in the French service] carried Bergen-op. Zoom hy assault, Juiy 16th." The followiug spring (1\%48), the French succeeded in layiug siege to Maestricit, notwithstanding the presence of the allles, and it was surrendered to them on the 7th of Mny. "Negcciations had been going on throughont tic winter, and a Con. gress inad been appointed to meet at Aix-la. Chapelie, whose first conference took pince Aprii 24th 1748." The taking of Maestricht was intended to stimulnte these negotiatious for peace, and it undoubtedly had that effect. The treaties which concluded the war were signed the follow. ing October. -T. II. (Holiand): A. D, 1746-1787.-The restored Stadthoidership.-Forty years of peace.-War with England and trouble with Austria. - The razing of the Barriers. - Premature revolutions. - In their extrenity, when the provinces of the Dutch Republic were threatened with in. vasion by the French, a cry for the House of Orange was raised once more. "The jealousies of Provincial magistratures were overborne, and in obedience to the volce of the people a Stadholder again nrose. Wiiliam of Nussan Dietz, the heir to Willinm III., and the successor to a line of Stadioidiers who had ruled continuously in Friesiand slnce the days of Philip II., was summoned to power. . Willinm IV. had married, as Williann II. and William III. ind done, the daughter of a King of Engiand. As the husband of Anne, the child of Georece Il., he houl added to the considieratlon of his House; and he was now able to sccure for his descen. dants the dignities to which he had hinself been elected. Tie States General in 1647 declared that both maie and female heirs should succeed to his honours. The constitution was thus in a measure changed, and the appolntment of $n$ hereditary chief magistrate nppeared to many to be a departure from the pure ifieai of a Repuhile. The ciectlon of the new Stadholder bronght iess adrantage to his peoplc than to his family. He couid not recail the glorious days of the great ancestors who had preceded hins. Without ahilities for war hlmseif, and jenlous of those with whom he was brought in contact, he caused disunion to arise among the forces of the aliies. . . When the terms at Aix La Chapelle restored their losses to the Dutch and confirmed the stipulations of previous treaties in their favour, it was feit that the Republie was indebted to the erertions of Its ailles, and not to any strength or successes of its own. It was Weli for the Repubic that she could rest. The days of her greatness had gone hy, and the recent struggle had manifested her deciine to Europe. . . T The next forty years were years of peace. . . When war ngain arrived it was again externai circumstances [connected with the wor between Engiand and her revoited colonies in Americn] that compelied the Repuhlic to take up arms. . . She . . . contemplated, as it was discovered, nn ailiance with the American insurgents. The exposure of her designs drew on ber a declaration of war from Engiand, which wns followed by the temporary ioss of many of her colonies both in the East nad West Indies. But in Europe the struggle was more equaily sustalned. The hostile fleets engaged in 1781 of the Dogger Bank; and the Dutch sailors fought with a success that made them ciaim a victory, and that at least secured them from the consequences of a defeat. The war indeed caused far less injury to the Republic than might have been supposedi. . . When she concluded prace in 1783, the whole of her lost colonies, with the one exception of Negapatam, were restored to her. But the occasion of the wir had been made use of hy Austrin, andi a blow had been meanwhike inticted umon the Cuited Provinces the fatal effect of which was snon to be npparent. The Emperor Joseph II. hail iong protested against the existence of the Barrier: and he inad scized upon the opportunity to lindo hy an arbltrary net all that the bleod and treasure of Europe had been lavished to secure. The Emjeror will hear no nore of Barriers, wrote his minister; 'our connection with France has made them neediless ': aud the fortresses for whlch William III. had schemed und Marlborongh had fought, were razed to the ground [1782]. Hoiland, unnhle at the moment to resist, withdrew her garrisons in silence; and Joseph, emboidiened br bis success, proceeded to nsk for more [1784]. The rectitication of the Dutch frontiers, the opening of the Sclueldt, and the release for his suhiects from the long-enforced restrictions upon ti. 'r irade did not appear too much to him. Lint the spirit of the Dutch lad not yet left them. They fired at the vessils which dared to ntternpt to uavigate the Schellt, anti war again appenred imminent. The support of Frnnce, however, upon which the Emperor had relied, was now given to the Repubilc, and Joseph recognized that he iad gone too far. The Barrier, once destrored, was not to be restored; hut the claims which hni been put forward were abandoned upon the pnynient of money compen. sation by the States. The feverous age of revolution was now at hand, andi party spirit, which had ever divided the C'nited Provinces, and had been quickencd by the intereourse and ailiance with America during the war, broke out in an insurrection ngalnst the Stadhoider [Wliliam V.], whlch drove hilm from his country, and com. pelled him to nppeal to Prussian troops for his restoration. Almost at the same time, in the Austrlau proviuces, a Beigic Republle was proclalmed [1787], the result in a great degree of imprudent changes which Joseph II. had enforced. The Dutch returned to their obedience under Prusslan threats [and Invailon of Holland by an army of 30,000 men-September, 1787], and Belglum under the concessions of Leopola III. But after the coronation all the republica, which were grouped like satellites round the grand repuhlic, were con. verted Into kingdoms, suhject to the empire, if not avowedly, at least $\ln$ fact. In this respect there was no difference between the Batavlan and Cisalpine republlc. The latter having been metamorphosed into the kingdom of Italy, it Was necessary to find some pretext for transformlng the former into the kingdom of Ilolland. The Emperor kept up such an extenslve agency in IHolland that he casily got up a deputathin, soliciting him to choose a king for the Batavian repuhlic. This submisalve deputation came to Paris In 1806, to solicit the Emperor, as a favour. to place Prince Lo s [Napol on's brother] oa the throne of Hollana. Louis became King of Holland much against his Inelination, for he opposed the proposition as much as he darect, alleging as an objection the state of his health, to whlch certalnly the climate of IIfllanel was not favourable; but Bonaparte sternly replied to his remonstrance - 'It is better to die a king than live a prince.' Ile was then obllged to accept the ernwn. He went to Holiand accompanled hy Hortense, who, however, ild not stay long there. The new king wantel to ninke him. self beloved by his subjects, and as they were an cntircly commercial peonle, the best wity to win thelr affections was $t$ to adopu Na. poleon's rigid laws agains* conimercial inter course with England. Hence the first coolaess between the two brothers, which ended In the abdleation of Louls. I know not whether lia polcon recollected the motlve assigned by Louis for at first refusing the crown of Holland, namely, the climate of the country, or whether he calculated upon greater submission $\ln$ another of his brothers; but this ls certain, that Juseph was not called from the throne of Naples to the throne of Spain, until after the refusal of Louis.

Before finally seizing Holland, Napoleon formed the pr ject of separating from it lbrabant and Zewand, In exchange for other provInces, the possession of which was douhtinl: but Louls successfully resisted this first act of nsurpatlon. Bonaparte was too intent on 11 great buslness $\ln$ Spaln, to risk any commotion in the north, where the declaration of Russin against Sweden already sufficiently occupied him. 11 e therefore did not insist upon, and even affected Indifference to the proposed augmentation of the territory of the empire. . But when he got his brother Joseph recognized, nad when he had himself struck an lnportant blow in the Peninsula, he began to change his tone to Louis. On the 20th of lecember [1808] he wrote to him a very remarkable letter, which exhibits the uareservel expression of that tyranny which the wished to exerclse over nil his family in order to make them the instruments of his despotism. Ile reproncheil honls for not following his sys tem of policy, telling him that he had forgotien he was a Frenchanan, and that he wished to become a Dutehman. Among other things he sidid

I have been obliged a second the to prohiblt trade with Holiand. In this state of :lines we may consider ourselves really at war. In my speech to the kegislative body I manifested my diapleasnre: for I will not conceal frori you, that my intention is to unite Holland with France This will be the most severe blow I can alm agalnst England, and will deliver me from the perpetual insults whleh the plotters of your cahInet are constantl/ directing against me. The mouths of the Rhine, and of the Meuse, ought indeed, to belong to me.

The following ar my condltions:- First, the interdiction of all trade and communlcation with Englaad. Second. The supply of a fleet of fourteen sail of the line seven frigates and seven brigs or corvettes, armed and manned. Third, an army of 25,000 men. Fourth. The suppresslon of the rank of Mar shals. Flifth. The abolition of all the privileges of nobillty, which is contrary to the constitutlon. Your Majcsty may negotiate on these bases with the Duke de Cadore, through the medlum of your minister; but be assured. that on the entrance of the first packet-boat into Holland, I will restore my prohibltions, and that the first putch officer who may presume to lnsult my Hinc, shall be seized and hanged at the main-yard. Your Majesty will find ln me a brother if you prove yourself a Frenchman ; but If you forget the sentiments which attach you to our common country, you cannot thisk it extraordinary that I should lose sight of those whieh nature lias ralsed between us. In short, the union of Holland and France will be, of all thlngs, most useful to France, Holland and the Continent, because it will be most Injurious to England. This union must be effected wlllingly, or by force.'

Here the correspondence between the two brothers was suspended for a tlme; but Lonls stlll continued exposed te new vexations on the part of Napoleon. About the end of 1809, the Emperor summoned to Paris the soverelgns who might be called hls vassals. Among the number was Louis, who, however, did not, shew himself very wllling to quit his states. Ife called a council of his minlsters, who were of oplnion that for the Interest of Ilolland he ought to make thls new sacritice. Ile did so with resignation. indeed, every day passed on the throne was a sacrifice to Louis. . . . Amidst the general silence of the servants of the emplre, anil even of the kings and princes assenbled in the capital, he ventured to say:- I have been decrived by promises whlch were never intended to be kept. Holland is tired of belng the sport of France. The Emperor, who was unusell to such hangange as this, was highly lnceused nt lt. Lours had now no alternative, but to yield to the incessant exactions of Napoleon, or to ip llollami united to France. Ile chose the 1 - thoush not before he had exerted all his bethalf of the subjects whom N : signed to him; but he woald now , wer int al con. plice of him who had resolved t. atcont subjects the vietims of his hatred aguiust Eng. lind. . . Louis was, bor:over. permitted to return to his states, to conte:uplate the stergnating effect of the continental blockade ou every lipauch of trade and indistry, formerly 80 active in llolland. Distressed at whnessing evils to which he could apply no remedy, he endeavoured by some prudent remomstrances to avert the utter ruin with whlch Ilolland was threatened. On the 23 rl of March, $1 $ 10$, he wrote [ai letter to Napoleon. W: ithen remonstrances were not more to Napolron's taste than rerhal ones at a time when, as I was informed by my friends, Whom forture chained to his destiny, no one presumed to address a word to him, except to answer his questi.jns. . . . His brother's letter highly roused his dlapleasure. Two months after he received it, beling on a journey ln the north, he addressed to Louis from Ostend a letter," followed in a few dass by another in which latter he said: '"'I want no more phrases and protestatlons. It is thae I should know whether you Intend, by your foll!es, to ruln Holland. I do not choose that you shc uld raina send a Minister to Austria, or that you should dismiss the French who are in your service. I have recalled my Ambassador, pis I litend only to have a CHargéd'affalres ir. Hol'and. The Sleur Serrureer, who remains there in that, capacity, wlll communicate to you my intentlons. My Ambassador shail no longer be exposed to your insults. Write to me no more those set phrases whlch you have beet, repeating for the last three years, and the falseloorl of which lis proved every day. Thls la the last letter I will ever write to you as long us I live.' . . Thus reduced to the cruel altennative of crushing Holland with hils own hands, or leaving that task to the Einperor, Louis did not hesitate to lay down hls sceptre. Having formed thls resolutlon, he addressed a message to the leglisistlve body of the klagdom of Holland, explaining the motives of his abdl. cation.

The Freuch roops entered Holland under the command of the Duke de Reggio: and thst Marshal, who was more Klng than the Klng hlmself, threatened to occupy Amsterdam. Loula then descended from his throne [July 1, 1810].

Louls bade farewell to the people of Hol. iand ln a proclamation. after the puhlication of which he repaired to the waters of Toeplitz. There he was living in tranquil $r^{*}$ irement, when he learnt that his brother had united Holland to the Empire [December 10, 1810]. He then published a protect.

Thus there seemed to be an end of all intercourse between these two hrothers, who were so oppositce in character and dispusition. But Napoleon, who was enraged that Louls should lave pr, umed to protest, and that in energetie terms, against the union of his kingdom with the cmplre, ordered him to return to France, whither lie was summoned in hls charaeter of Coastahle aud French Prince. Louls, however, did not think proper to ohey thls sumons, ana Napoleon, fulthful to his promise of ever writing to him again, orlerell . . . [a] letter to be aldressed to himlis M. Otto. . . . Ambassudtor from France to Vienna, '" saying: "'The Emperor requires that Prince Lonls shaill return, at the latest. by the 1st of Decemher next, under pain of beiug considered as disobeylng the constitution of the empire and the head of his family, aud being treated aceorlingly.' The yoke of Napoleon, unlversally grievous from the enornous pecuniary exactions whith which it was attended, and the wastlog milltary conseriptiuns to which it lmmediately led, had been ln a peculiar manner felt as oppressive in Holland, from the maritime and commercial hablts of the peopie, and the total stoppage of all thelr sources of industry, whieh thic naval war and long.contlnued hlockade of thelr coasts had occassoned. They had tasted for nearly twenty years of the last drop of humiliation in the cup of the vanquished - that of being compreiied themselves to ald in upholding the system which was cxterml nating their resources, and to purchase with the nating their resources, and to purchasc Fith the These feelings, which had for years existed in such intensity, as to hnve rendered revelt lnevitahie hut for the evident hopelessness at all former times of the attempt, could no longer he -estralned after the battle of Lelpsic had thrown down the colonsus of French extcrnal power, and the approsch of the Allied standards to their frontiers had opened to the people the means of salvation [see Germany: A. D. 1813 (October) and (October-Decemner)]. From the Hansa Towns the fiame of independence spread to the nearest cities of the old United Provinces; and the small number of Freuch tronps in the country at once encouraged revoit and paved the way for external aid. At thls period, the whole troops which Napoleon had in Holland did not exceed 6,000 Frencin, and two regiments of Ger. mans, upon wiose fldelity to their colonrs little reliance conld he placed. Upon the approach of the Allied troops under rulow, who advanced by the road of Muuster, and Winzingerode, who suon followed from the snme quarter, the douaniers ali withdrew from the coast, the garrison of Amsterdain retired, and the whole disposable foree of the country was concentrated at $\mathbf{L}$ trecht, to form a corp* of observation, and aet according to eircumstances. This was the signal for a generai revolt. At Amsterdam [Nov. 15], the troops were no sooner gone than the inhabltants rose in insurrection, deposed the imperiai authorities, holsted the orange tlag, and established a provisional government with a view to the restoration of the ancient order of things; yet not violentiy or with cruelty, hut with the calinuess and composure which attest tite exercise of social rigits by a people iong hahituated to their cojoyment. The same change took place, nt the same time and in the same orderly rannuer, at Rotterdam, Dordrecit, Delft, Leyden, Haarlem, and the other chice towns; the people, everywhere, amidst cries of 'Orange Boven' and aniversal rapture, mounted the orange cockade and relnstated the ancient anthorities.

Military and political consequences of tic ilgiest importance immediately followed this uncontroilable outhreakepublie euthnsiasm. A deputation from Holiand waiteri on the Prince Regeut of England aud the Prince of Orange, in London: the latter shortiy nfter embarbed uu board an English line-of. battic ship, the Wa rior, and on the 27 th landed at Bcheveling. from whence he proceeded to the Hague. Yeantime the French troups and coastguarls, who hadiconcentrated at Ctrecht, seeing that the general effervescence was not as yet supported hy any eolid milltary force, and that the peopie, though they had all holsted the orange tag re not alded by sny corps of the Alles, reco red from their cousternation, and made a gene, uil forward movenient agalnst And sterdam. Before they got there, liowever, an body of 800 Cossacks had renched that capitai, where they were recelved with enthusiastic joy: and thls advanced guard was soon after followed by Generai Benkendorf's brigade, whlch, after travelling hy post from Zwoll to Harderwys, emharkedat the latter place, and, by the ald of a favourable wind, reached Amsterdam on the 1 st December. The Russlan general Immeiliateiy "'vanced agalnst the forts of Mayder and Hall.

5 of which he made himself master, taking twenty pleces of cannon aud 800 prisoncrs; while on the eastern frontler. Generai Oppen, with Bulow's ad vanced guards, carried Dornlourry by assault on the 23d, and, advanclog against Arn helm, tirew the garrison, 8,000 strong, which strove to prevent the place belug invested, with great loss back Into the town. Next day, Buinw hinself came up with the nialn strength of iuls corps, nud, as the ditches were stlli dry, hazarderi an escalade, whll proved entirely successfui: the greater part of the garrison retiring to Nimeguen, by the bridge of the Ihine. Tie French troops, finding themselves thus threatened on all sides, wlthdrew aitogether from Hollanil: the fleet at the Tcxel holsted the orange tag, whit the cxception of Admiral Verinuel, who, with a boly of marines that still proved faltifful to Sia poleon, threw himself with homourahle fild lity futo the fort of the Texel. Ansterdain, aunilst transports of enthusiasm, received the leloved representative of the Honse of Orange. Holiand enjoyed more real fredom than auy other Cuntinental monarchy; aud the Belgians had a volce in the government of the united territory. But, in another scnse, the unlon was singularly unhappy. The phlegmatie Dutch Protestant was as indisposed to unite with the light-hearted Roman Cathollc Beigian as the languid waters of the Saone with the impetuous torrent of the Rhone. Different as wire tho rivers, they met at last; aud dipiomatists probably hoped that Dutch and Belglaus would similary combine. Theac hopes were dlsappointed, and the two people, incapable of unlon, e.deav. oured to find independent courses for themseives in separate channels. The grounds of Beiglan dislike to the union were Inteiiiglble. Belglum had a population of $8,400,000$ souis; Holland of oniy $2,000,000$ persons. Fet both countries had an equal representation In the States-General. Beiglum was taxed more heaviiy than Holland, and the produce of taxation went almost entlreiy luto Dutch pockets. The Court, which was Dutch, resided in Holiand. Tine pubiic offices were in Holland. Four persons out of every five in the pubilc service at home were Dutchmen. The army was almost exciuslvely commanded hy Dutcimen. Dutch professors were appolnted to eiucate the Beigian youths in Beigian schoois, and a Dutch director was piaced over the Bank of Brussels. The Court even endeavoured to change the language of the Beiglan race, and to substitute Dutch for French lif uil judicial proceedings. The Beigians were naturally irritated.

On the gnd of June, the States-Geuerai were dissoived; the clectlons were peacefuily conciuded; and thes closeat observers faiied to detect any symptoms of the coming storm on the poittlcal borizon. The storm which was to overwheim the union was, in fact, gathering in another country, The events of July [at Inris] were to shake Europe to the centre. On ali sidics crowns were failing into the gutter,' and the shock of revolution in Paris was felt perceptihiy in Brussels. Nine years before the States Gen. erai had imposed a mouture, or tax upou tlour. The tax had been carried by a very small majurity; and tine majority had been aimust entireiy composed of Dutci memlers. Ou the $$ 5 t h$ of August, 1830, the iower orilers in Brussels engaged in a serions riot, osteusibly directeri against this tax. The othces of n newspaper, conducted in the interests of the Dutch, were attacked; the honse of the Miuister of Justice was set on tire; the wine and spirit shops were forced open; and the mob, madilemed by iiquor, pricecded to other acts of pllage. On the morning of the 26th of August the troops were called out and instrueted to restore order. Various conflicts took place bet ween the solulers and the prople; lint the former gained no advantage over the rioters, and were withdrawn into the Place Hoyaie, the central square of the town. lelieved from the interference of the military, the moh continued the work of destruction. Respeetable clitizens, dreading the destruction of their property, organised $n$ guard for the preserration of order. Order was preserval; hut the task of preserving it bad converted Brusscls into an armed camp. It bad placed the entire con. trul of the town in the hands of the Inlabitants. Heu who had unexpectedly obtained a mastery over the situation could hariliy be expected toresign the power which events had given to them. They had taken up their arms to repress a noh; victors over the populace, they turned their arms against the Government, and boldly des. patebed a deputation to the king ursing the eoncession of reforms and the Immediate convocation of the States-Geueral. The king had recived the news of the events at Brussels wadt ertisiterabie aiarm. Troops bal beren at once oricred to march on the city; and, on the 28th of August, an army of 6.000 unen had encamped under its walls. The citizens, bowever, repre. sented that the sutrance of the tronpe would be a signal for the renewal of the disturbances; and the officer in command in consequence agreed to remain pasolvely outalde tbe walis. The king sent the Prince of Oringe to make terms with his insurgent subjects. The citlzens deciined to adimit the prince lnto the elty unless he came without his soldlers. The prince, unahie to ohtain any moilfacation of thls atlpuiatlon, was obliged to trust himseif to the penple alone. It was already evident that the chief town of Belgium had shaken of the controi of the Dutch Government. The klng, compeilied to submit to the demands of the deputation, summoned the States. Gencrui for the 13 th of September. But this concession only induced the Beigians to ralse their demands. They had hltherto only asked for reforma: they now demunded indepen. dence, the dissoiutlon of the unlon, and the in. dependent aininistration of Beigium. The revoiution had origlnally been contined to Brussels: It soon extended to other towns. Civic guaris were organlsed in Liege, Tournay, Mons, Verviers. Bruges, and other piaees, limltating the exampie of Brussels, they demanded the dissolutiou of tite union between Holland and Beigium. Tise troops, consisting of a mixed force of Duteh and Belglans, could wot be depended on; ani the restoration of the ryai authority was olviously innpossible. On the 13 th of Sep. tember the States General met. The question of sepmation was referred to them by the king; and the Deputles icisurely applied themselves to its consilieration, herouformity with the tedious rules by which thelr proceedings were regulated. Long before they had eompleteci the prefiminary discussious which they thought necessary the march of crents hal take.n the question out of their hands. On the 19th of September fresh disturhanees broke out in Brussels. The civic guard, attempting to quell the riot was over. powered; and the rloters, elated with thelr success, announeci their Intention of attacking the tronps, who were encnmped outsilie the eity walls. Prisec Freterick of Orauge, eoncluding that action was inevitabie, at last mate uphls mind to attack the town. Divhling the forces under his command into six columins, he directed them, on the $$ 3 \mathrm{rd}$ of September, agninst the six gates of the eity. . . Three of tbe coiumins succeeded, nfter n serious struggle, in ohtaining possession of the higher parts of the eity; but they were unable to accomplish ayy decisive victory. For four days the contest was rencwed. On the 2Fith of September, the troops, unable to nivauce, were withdrawn from the positions which they had won. Ou the following day the Jower Chamber of the Status-General dicchied iu fuvour of a dissolution of the unlon. The erown of Belgium was evidently dropping into the gutter ; but the king decifed on making one more effort to preserve it in his family. On the 4th of Oetober he sent the Prince of Orange to Autwerp, authorising him to form a separate Adminlstration for the southern provinces of the kingdom, aud to piace himself at the head of it.

Arrangements of this character had, however, already becouse impossibie. La Mennals's frat book, 'L'Easal sur lindiference en Matière de Rellgion,' lowerell ail human reaman. lag, and deiivered up soclety to the omnipotent guidance of the Pope. This work, enthuslastl cally perused by blshope, semlnarist,, and priests, eatablished the autior as an unprecedented authority. When, after the year 1828, he pretended that the Church would regaln her former power by separating herself from the State, re. Lalning oniy her llberty, mont of hils admirers pro. fesseci themselves of his opinion.

Nearly ail Belglan prieste were at that time La Mennalslens. They accepted the separation of Church and State, and, In thelr enthushastle Intoxication, craved but litherty to reconquer the world. It wins thus that Cathoiles and Liberals unlted to vote for Belglum the constitutlon still in existence after a inalf.century. In 1832, Pope Gregory XVI., as Veullot telis us, burled a thunderimolt ut the Belglan constitution In its cradle.' Iu a famous Encycilcal, slace Incessantly quoted, the Pope deciared, ex cathedri, tiat moklern lihertles were a plague, 'a dellifun,' from whence Inealculahle evils would Inevitahly thow. Shortly after. Wards, the true author of the Belgian constitutlon, La Mennals, having beca to Rome in the vain hope of converting the Pope to hils views, was repulsed, and, a little later, cast out from the bosom of the Church. The separitlon was effected. There was an end to that 'unlon' of ('sthoiles and Liberals whleh had overthrion King William and founded a new polltical orier lu leiglum. It was not, however, till after 1883 that the two partles dlistlactly annumeri their antagonlsm. . . The Liberal party is compesieyl of all who, having fulth in human reason and lu llberty, fear a return to the past, and desire reforms of all sorts.. . When Citholles are mentloned as opposed to Liberais, It is as regards thelr pollticai, not their religious opinlons. The L.lberals are all, or nearly ull. Catholles nisw; at all eventa hy baptlsn., The Catholie party Is gulded offtclally by the lishoplis. It is coniposell, In the first place, of all the clergy, of the convents and mona steries, and of these who froma sentiment of rellgious obetlence do as they are Ilrected hy the hishop of the diocese anil the Pope, and also of genuine Conservatives, otherwise called reactionists - that is to sty. of those who consider that llberty leads to anarchy. and progress to communism. This sectlon comiprises the great mass of the proprietors and cultlvators of the soll and the country populations. . . We see that $\ln$ Belgium partirs are divided. and tight seriously for an ideut they are separated by no material, hut by spiritual interests. The Liberals defend ilberty, which they consider menaced by the alms of the Church. The Cintholics defenid reilgion, which they look upon as threatesed by thefr advermaries' doctrines. Both deafre to fortify themselver againat a danger, non.exietent yet, but which they foresee. . . The e. scational quention, which has been the centre if the poltical life of the country during the last two years, deserves expounding in detall. Impor. tant in lteelf, and more important atill in its consequences, it is every where diacussed whth patsalon. Primary uducation was organized here in 1842, by a law of comprominc adopted by the two partles, thanks to M. J. B. Nothomb, one of the lounders of the Belgian Coastitutlon, who died recentiy in Beriln, where he had been Helglan Mindster for a space of upwards of forty years. This faw enacted that cyery parish shonld possess schools sufficlent for the number of chill. dren neveling Instruction; but it allowed the 'commune' to adope private schools. The Inspectlon of the publie schools and i!. control of the rellglous teaching glven by the masters and mistreases, wus rescrved to the clergy. Advanced Luberais begau to ciamour for the suppresslon of this latter clause as ano as they percelved the preponicratlng lnflucnce it gave the priests over the lay teuchers. The reform of the law of 1842 became the watchword of the Liberal party, and thls was ultmately effected in July, I\&iv; now each parlsh or village tnust providie the schools necessary for the ehildren of its lnhabltants, and must not glve support to any private school. Eccleslastical Inspectlon is suppresseci. Reilglous lustructlon may be glven hy the mlulsters of the various denonilnatlons, In the school buildings, but out of the regular huurs. Thls system has been in force in Ilolland slace the commence. ment of the present century. Lay lastructlon only ls glven hy the communif masters und mis. tresses: no logimas are taught, but the sehool is open to the clergy of all denominatlons who chonse to enter, asit is evideutly the lr duty to do. This system, now Introfluced ln Belglum, has been accepted, without giving rise to any dithculties. hy both Protestants and Jews, but it is most veinemently condenned by the cathollc priesthexml. $\qquad$ In less than a year they have succeeded in openling a private schaol ln every combune nad village not formerly possersllg one. In this lastance the Catholle party has shown a devotelness really remarkahk.. . . At the same time in all the Churches, and nearly every Sunday, the Government schools bave bern attacked.stigmatizel as 'écoles sams Die ou' (schowils without Goxd), to be nvoided as the plague, and where parente were forbidden to place their chllIren, uuder puin of committing the greatest sin. Thuse who diselvered, and allowed their children still to frequent the communal schools, were deprivel of the sacraments of the church. They were refused absolution at confession, and the Eucharist, even at Easter. Ali the schoolnasters and mistressiss werc placed under the bau of the Church. and the priests often even refused to prononuce a blessing on their marriage. It ls only lately :hat, contrary instructions having been received from Rome, this extreme step is now very rurely resorted to. The Liberal majority lu the llouse has ordered a Parliamentary infuity - thith is still in progreso, aud the results of whllh in this last six months, fill the columins of our newspapers - In order to ascertuin by what means the clergy succeed In filling thelr schools.
is a natural consequence of the excesoive beat of the conflict, the two partiea end by justifying tite areumations of their miver. marles. The Liberals become anti-religionista, because reilgoon in-and is daliy becoming more and more-anti.jiberal; and the Catholice are afraid of liberty, brecause it is uned againat theje faith, which is, in their opialon, the onily truc and the necpmary fonndation of civilization.

The existence in Belgium of two parties an diatinetly and cleariy meparated, offers, however, bonne compensation: It favourt the good working of P'arliamentary government." - 2 . in Laveleye, The Alditienl 'badition of Belgiun (Contempurary Rer., April, 1882), pp. ils-iet, with fwot. mote.

At. tempts to make the suffrage unlversul, and to effect a separitios of ehurch and state, were defeated. The suffrage qualificntion by tax-pay. ment was redincet to ton gulders, and certuln classen of lolgers were alwo admitted to the frunchise, more than dombling the total number of voters, which is now estimated to be about 2M1,000. Ali private moldions and non-commissioued officers of the regular army are exchndei from the frunchise. The upper chamber of the States Generai is elected as before by the Provinchia statee, but its nembershify is ruised to tifty. The meconil chamber, eonsisting of one hundred members, is clumell directly by the voters. In the new constitition, the succession to the throne is detinitely prescriluch, in the cevent of a fnilure of direct heirs. Three colinteral lines of descent are designated, to be areepted in their order as follows: 1. Prinecse sophia of Auxomy and her Issme; : s. the thescendnats of the late Princess Marinu of Prossia: 3. the desceedants of the late IPrincess Mary of Wied. (Belgium): A. D. 1892-1893,-The revised Belgian Conatitution.-Introduction of plural Suffage.-A grent agitation among the Belgian workingmen, eudiug in a formidable strike, in 1s90, was oniy quleted by the promise from the government of a revision of the constitution and the introduction of universal suffrage. The Constituent Chambers, elected to perform the task of revislon, were opencl on the 11th of dulv, 1492. The aniended coustitution was promingated on the ith of September, 1803. It confers the suffrage on every elfize: twenty five yars of aze or over, domililed in the same conbubur for tot less than one yenr, and not under haval disqualifeation. The new eonstitation is made capecially luteresting hy its introdnction of 4 systrum of elimulative or plural voting. One shipplementary vote is confersed on every married cltizen (or widower), thirty-five years or more of abec, having legitimate instie, and paying at least five franes per aunum house tax ; also on every citizen not less than twenty-tive years old

Who owns real property to the value of $2, \mathrm{~mm}$ france, or who dertres an ficou te of not lementian 100 fruncs a year from an inventment fa the pulbic debt, or from the aarlags bank. Two suppic mentary volet are given to each citizen twenty five yenrm of age wio has recelved certaln dipiomas or discharged certain functions which imply the poscemion of a superfor educution. The same eftizen may aceumulate votes on mure than one of these qualitications, but none is aifowed to east more than three. On the aloptina of the new constitution, the Brusels correspon. dent of the "London Timen" wrote to that journai; "This a.ticie, which adde to manhimex suffrage as It ciist', in France, Spain, Gurmany, Switzerland, the L'nited Statem, and the Aiss tralian colonles, the safeguard of a doulde mul triple suffrage accorded to age, marrlager, mai paternity, as well as to the posacssion of mun'y maved or inherited, or of a professlon, wiii cunt. atitute one of the distingulshing marks of tho new Ifelgian Conatitution. Gorges nrrived here the muldele of september. 10\&3, having been precedied mome months by Capt. Weat, who was Vice-Admiral of New England as weli as Connclitor. Capt. Levett came as late as November. . . . The next vear, 1624. War between England and Spala broke out, and drew off for a whille Gorges and Masin from their interests in colonization. Gorges wins Captaln of the Castle and Island of St. Nicholas, nt liymonth, a post that he had lyelfi for thirty yenrs; and he was now wholly taken up with the intles of his oftice. Masin's services were renuired as a naval offleer of experience.
In teden England pharged Into a war with France, "ihhout having ented the war with Spain. Capt. Mason was alvaneed to be Treasurer and Par. master of the Engllsh armles eruplogeti in the wans. There was no time now to think of American colonization. His dutles were arifin. ons. . . . In 1629 pence whs made with Fruuer. and the w. - with Spaln was coming to nu enul. No sonner vere Gorges and Masen a flitie relie red from thelr pubile dutless than they aprang at once to thelr old New England eniterprise. They resoived to punh forwarl thelr finterests. They came to some understandilng ahout a dirls. jun of their Provinec of Maine. On the ith of Sovember, 1829, a day memoralle In the history: of New Hampsilire, the Conncil granted to Masun a patent of alf that part of the Provlace of Maine lying betwen the Merrimac and Iascata. quarivers; and Mason called it New Llampshire. gut of regard to the favor in which le held llampshlre in England, where he had ristled many years. . . This grant had hardily been male when Champlaln was brought to Joind a priwner, from Canada, by Kirke. The French hand been driven from that region. Gorges and Hasou procured immedlately a grati from the Cousefl of a vact tract of land in the region of Lake Champiain, supponed to be not ouly a fine country for peltry, but to contain rast minend wealth. The Province wa califd Laconla on account of the numerous lakes suppomed or known to be there, and was the mont northera grunt hitherto made by the Councll. The patent leam date Nor. 17. $10: 9$, ouiy ten days fater than Mason's New Ilampaihise gront. . For the purpowe of ail vanclag the interente of Gorgen and Mawon in Laconia as weli as on the Patce. taqua, they Jolned whth them six merchants in London, ani, received from the Connell a grant dated Nuv. 8, 1631, of a tract of land lying on both diles of the pancutaqua frer, on the seacimat and within territory niready owned by Gorges and Mamon in meveraity. This patent, callefi the Pascataqna I'ment, covercd, on the west side of the river, the prement towns of Portamouth, New Caste, 1 yec and part of CreenTand; on the east side, Kittery, Ellot, the Berwickn, and the western part of Lelanon."-C. A. D. 1637. - The Pequot War.-' The re. gion extending from the bounds of Thode Isinnd to the banks of the lIudson was at the time of the colonization leld in strlps of territory mininly hy three tribes of the natives, who lead long hat feurls nnong themselves and with other tribers. They were the Narragansetts, the Mohegans, nai the Prguots. The Mohegais were then tribu. taries of the Pequots, and were restlve under subjection to their theree and wurlike empuerors, whon were estmated to number at the time 1,000 fighting men.

The policy of the whites was to aggravnte the dissensions of the tribes, and to make alllance with one or more of then. Wiathrop recorls in March, 1631, the vistt to Boston of a (imuectleut Inclian, probably a Mohegan. whulnvlted the English to come and plant near lue river, and who offered presents, with the promulac of a proftabie trale. Ilis object proved to be to engage the interest of the whites agalnst the l'epluts. IIlserrand was for the time unsucerssful. Further alvanees of a slmilar ehnracter wrre made nfterwards, the result being to persmude the Engllsh that, sooner or later, they would need to interfere as umplres, and must use sixeretton in a whae regard to what would prove to be for thelr own intcrest. In 1633 the Pequots had savagely mutilated and murdered a party of Engllsh traders, who, under Captatn Stone, of VIrginia, had gone up the Connectlent. The Boston magistrates had Instltuted measures to cali the Pequots to account, but nothlag effectual was done. The Duteh had a fort on the river near Hartford, and the English had bultt one at its mouth. In 1636 several settlements had been made In Connectlcut by the Englisla from Cambridge, Dorchester, and other places. John Oldham, of Watertown, had in thnt ycar been murdered, whlle on a trading voyage. If some Indlans belonging on Block 1sland. To nvenge thls net our maglstrates sent Endloott, as general, with a body of 90 men, with orders to kIll ali the male Indians on that Island, spariug only the women and little ehlldren. IIe accomplished his biooly work only ln part, but after destroylng ali the corn-fields and wigwnms, he turned to hunt the Pequots on the main. Ifter this expedition, which slmply exasperated the l'equots, they made a desperate effort to huluce the Nirragansetts to come Into a lcaguc with them agalnst the English. It secmed for a whlle as if they would suceerd in this, and the consequences wonld douhtless have beeu most disnstrous to the whites. The seleme was thwarterl largely through the wise and friendly interven. tion of IRoger WIllinins, whose diplomary wis made effective liy the confidenee whilin his rod neighbors had li hilut. The Narragunsett mes. sengers then ent ral lito a friendly lengue with the Erglish in Boston. All through the wituter of $1633^{\circ}$ the I'equots continued to pick off the whites in thelr territory, und they mutilated, tortured, roasted, and murclered at least thirty vic. tims, beconing more and more vindictive and ernel In their doings. There were theu in (ont nectieut some sou Einglishmen, and, us has beren sainl. about $1,0 \mathrm{~N}$ ) Pequot 'braves.' Inndreds of the savages, in their maddened frenzy of fear and dismay, were shat or run througli ns they were lupaled on their own pallsalles in their efforts to rush from their blazing wlgwams, crowden whthin their frail enclosures. The Engllsh showed no ineros, fir they felt none. A very few of the writched savages escaped to another fort, to whllel the victorious Engllsin followed them. Thls, hoss. ever, they sosill abondoned, taking refigge, with their oid people and chikiren, in the protection of swamps and thlekets. IIcre, too, the Englinh, who had lost but two men kliled, though they ilad many wounderl, and who were now rrinforced, pursued and surronnded them, sllowing the aged and the cliklreu, by a parley, to conu out. The meu, howcver, were mostly slain, and the feehle remnant of them which sought proteethon among the so-calied river Indians, higher up the Connectlcut, and among the Mohawks, were but scornfuliy receivel, - the Pequot sachem Bassacus, belng beheaded by the latter. A few of the prisoners were sold 'n the West Indies as siaves, others were reducel to the same humilla. tlon among the Mohegans, or as farm and house servants to the Engllsh. West of Worcester, the ouly town incorporated within the preseut limits of the state was Springfieid, for which an act was passed in 1636. These iittle municipalltles were, In a measure, pecuilar to New England; each was sovereign within ltself; each sustalned a relation to the whole, analogous to that whleh tite states of our Einlon hold respectively to the central power, or the constitution of the Enited States; and the idea of the formation of such commuaitles was probably derived from the parishes of England, for each town was a parish, and each, as ft was incorporated, was required to contribute to the malntenance of the minisiry as the basis of its graat of municipal rights. A. D. 1643.- The confederation of the coionies. - In His. $1643_{2}$ "a conferlemery, to be known as the Cnited Cobonies of New England, was entred into at Boston, between delegates from l'ymouth, Counceticut, and New Ifaven on the one hand, and the Genernl Court of Missachusetts on the other. Suppocsed dangers from the Indiaas, and their quarrels with the Dinteh of Manhattan. had lnduced the people of Connecticut to withdraw their formal ohjections to this neasure. Two eommissioners from cuch colony were to meet anumully, or oftener, If necessary: the sesslons to be held aiternately at Boston, llartford, New Inaveu, and Plymouth; but Buston was to hive two sessions for one at eacli of the other places. The commissioners, ail of whom must be church nembers, were to chonse a president from anong themselves, and everything wis to be decided hy six voices out of the cight. No war was to be declared by either colouy without the consent of the commissioners, to whose provinte Indian affairs and fureign relatlons were especially assigned. The sustentation of the 'truth and liberties of the Gospel' was declared to be one great object of this aiiiance. All war expenses were to be a eommon charge, to be apportioned according to the number of male Inhabitants In each eolony. Jinnaway servants and fuglitive eriminais were to be delivered up, a provision afterward introduced luto the Constitution of the United States; and the eommissioners soon recommended, what remained ever after the prnetlce of New Engiand, and ultimately beeame, also, a provision of the Coutcd States Constitution, hut judgments of courts of iaw and probstes of willis in each colony should have full fatth and credit in ali the others.

The commisoloners from Massachusetts, as repre. enting by far the most powerful colony of the alllance, clafmed an honorary precedence, which the others readlly conceded. Plymouth, though far outgrown by Massachusetts, and even by Connectlcut, hai made, however, some progress. It now contained seven towns, and had lately adopted a representatlve syatem. But the old town of Plymouth was In decay, the people belng drawn off to the new settlements. Brad. ford had remalned governor, except for four Years, during two of which he had been relleved by Edward Winslow, and the other two by Thomas Prince. New Haven was, perhaps, the weakest member of the alllance. Besides that town, the lnhabltants of which were princlpally given to commerce, there were two others, Sil. ford and Gullford, agricultural settlements; Southold, at the castern extremity of Long Island, also acknowledged the furisdletion of New Haven, and a new settlement had recently been established at Stuniford. The colony of Connectlcut, not llmlted to the towns on the river, to whleli several new ones had already been added, lueluded also Stratford and Falr. feld, on the const of the Sound, west of New Haven. . The town of Southampton, on Long Island. acknow ledged also the jurisdiction of Conuecticut. Fort Saybrook, at the mouth of the rlver, was still an independent settlement, and Fenwlek, as the head of it, became a party to the urticles of confederation. But the next year he sold out hls Interest to Conneetieut, and into that colony Sarbrook was absorbed. Gorges's province of llaine was not received lnto the New England alliance, 'Ine:口use the people there run a different eourse loth in their ministry and eivil admlnistration.' The same objection applied whth still greater foree to Aquiday and I'rovidenee."-lR. Hildreth. Hist. of the U. S., ch. 10 (c. 1).

A. D. 1674-1675. - Klag Phillp's War: Its cances and beginalag. - The Pokanokets had always rejectei the Christian faith and Christlan manners, and thelr chief had deslred to lnsert ln a treaty, what the Puritans always rejectel, that the Engllsh should never attempt to convert the warriors of hls tribe from the rellglon of their race. The aged Slassassolt the who had wricomed the pligrims to the soll of New Englanil, and had oprened hls cabla to shelter the founder of Rlode Island-now slept wlth hls fathers, and Phlilp, hls son, had sueceeded him as hend of the allled tribes. Repeated sales of lnnil hat narrowed thelr domains, and the Engiish hum artfully crowded them Into the tongues of laml as 'most suitable and convenlent for them,' nnd as more easily watched. The principal seats of the Pokanokets were the peninsulas whleh we now cail Bristol and Tiverton. As the English vlllages drew nearer and nearer to them, thelr hunting-grounds were put under culture, thelr natural parks were turned Into pastures, their best ficlds for plantling corn were grailually ailenated, thelr fisherles were Impulred loy more skliful methods, thli they found themselves de. prived of their brond aeres, and, by their own legal contracts, driven, us lt were, lnto the s'a. Colllslons and mutual dlstrast were the neces. sary eonsequence. There exlsts no evldence of a dellberate consplracy on the part of all the tribes. The commeneement of war was neeldental; many of the Inclians were lua naze, not knowlig what to do, and disposed to stand for the Engllsh; sure proof of no ripened cous. splraey. But they hand the same eomplaints, recollectlons, and fears; and. when they inct, they could not but grieve together at the nlinmuthon of the domaing of their fathers. They spurned the English clalm of jurisuliction over them, and were lndignant that Inliau chiefs or warriors should be arraigned before a jury. And, when the language of tlecir nuger nud sur. row was reported to the men of Ilymouth colony by an Indian tale-benrer, fear professed to discover in their ungunriled words the evidence of un orgnized consplracy, The haughty I'hilip. Who had once hefore been compelled to surreniler his 'Engllsh arms' and piyy un oncrous tribute, was, in $167 t$, smmnoned to submit to an examlatlon, and could not eseape suspicion. The wrath of his tribe was ronsed, ami the informer was murdered. The murilerers, ha their turn, were hlentilecl, seized, tried by a jury, of whieh one half were Imlians, anml. in Jime, i6\%5, ou convirtion, were langed. The roung men of the tribe panted for revenge: without elelay, eight or nine of the Eaglishin were shan la or nhout Swansey, nul the blirin of war sprand through the eolonies. Thes was Philip hurried Into 'his reluellon;' and he ls rejorteal to have wept as he heard that a whlte man's hornd has been sheri. $\qquad$ What ehmuces haml he of suceess? The Engilsh werc united; the luthans had no aillance, and lmef of them jolned the Englinh, or were qubet spectators of the tight: thi Eng. lish hat guns roough; few of the ludhans were well armed, and they could get no new supllies: the English had towns for their sleelter and salo retrent; the miserabie wigwams of the natlyes werc defenecless: the English had sure suplp!'s of fool; the Indians might easlly lose thelr jrecarious stores. They rose whout home, un: carlous ateres. They rose wlumet hope, ani they fought without merey. For them as a nation there was no to-morrow. . . . At the first alarm, volunteers from Massachusetts jolned the troops of Plymouth; on the twenty-nlnth of June, within a week from the beginning of hostillties, the Pokanokets were driven from Mount Hope; and in less than a month Phllip was a fugltive among the Nlpmucks, the interior tribes of Massachusetts. The ilttie army of the coinnists then entered the territory of the Narragansetts, and from the reluctant tribe ex. torted a treaty of nentrailty, with a promlee to dellver up every hostlle Indlan. Vletory seemed promptiy assured. But it was only the commencement of horrors. Canonchet, the chief sachem of the Narragansetts, was the son of Mantonomoh; and could he forget hls father's wrongs: Desoiation extended along the whole frontler. Banlshed from his patrimony where the pligrims found a frlend, and from his cahln whlch had sheltered exlles, Plillp and hls warriors spread through the conntry, awakening thelr race to a warfare of exterminatlon."G. Bancroft, Hist. of the U. S. (author's lant rev.), pt. 2, ch. 5 (c. 1). -'At this tlme, according to loose estlmates, there may have been some 36,000 Indlans and 60.000 whltes in New England; 10,000 of the former fit for war, and 15,000 of the latter capabie of bearing arms.

At the oatset, the Narragansetts, numbering 2,000 warriors, dld not act ually second Philipis reslstance. But Canonchet, their sachem, might well re. member the death of hls father Mantonomo [who, taken prisoner in a war with the Johegans, and surrendered hy them to the English, In 1643 , with a request for permission to pat hlm to death, was deliberately returned to hls savage captors, on advice taken from the mlnisters at Boston-doomed to death without his knowledge]. . . . No efforts at conciliation seem to have lueen made by either party; for the whltes felt thelr superiority (were they not 'the Lord's chosen people?'); and Philip knew the desperate nature of the struggie between united and well-armed whltes, and diviled uncont rolled savages; yet when the emergency came he met it. and never faltered or plead from that day (i. A. D. ${ }^{1675}$ (July-September). - King Philip's War: Savage successes of the Indian enemy.-Increasing rage and terror among the colonists. -The Nlpnucks, Into whose country Philip retreated, "had already conmenced hostilties hy attacking Mendon. They waylaid and kllled Captain Hutchlnson, a son of the famous DIrs. Hatchinson, and 16 out of a party of 20 sent from Boston to Brookfield to pirley with them. Attacking Brookteld Itself, they burned lt, exeept one fortitied hoase. The linhahitants were saved hy Major Willard, who, on information of their danger, came with a troop of horse from Lancaster, thilty miles through the woods, to thelr rescue. A boly of troops presentiy arrived from the eastwand, and were statloned for some thine at Brookfleld. The colonists now found that hy drivlng Phlllp to extremity they had roused a host of unexpected enemles. The River Indlans, antlelpatlng an Intended uttack upon them, joined the assailants. Deerfeid and Northfield, the northernmost towns on the Connecticut River, settied within a few years past, were attacked and several of the in. hahitants klifed and wounded. Captain Beers, sent from Hadley to thelr reilef wlth a convoy of provisions, was surprised near Northfield and slain, with 20 of hls men. Northfeid was ahandoned and hurned by the Indlans. . . . Driven to the necessity of defensive warfare, those in command on the rlver determined to establish a magazine and garrison at Hadiey. Captain Lathrop, who had been dispatched from the eastward to the assistance of the river towns, was sent with 80 men, the flower of the $y$ th of Essex connty, to guard the ragons intellided to convey to Hadley 3,000 hushels of unthreshed wheat, the produce of the fertile Deerfield meadows. Just before arriving at Deerfied, near a small stream stlif known as Bloody Brook, under the shadow of the abrupt conical Sngar Loaf, the sonthern terminatlon of the Deerfiefd monntain, Lathrop fell lnto an ambush, and. after a hrave reslstance, perished there with ail hils company. Captain Hoseley, stationed at Deerfleld, marched to lis assistance, hat arrived too late to help him. That town, also, was abandoned, and burned hy the Indians. Springfield, abont the same the, was set on fire, hit was partiaily saved by the arrlval of Major Treat, with aid from Counectleat. Ilatfield, nor the frontler town on the north, was flgoronsly attacked, hat the garrison saceeeded in repelling the assailants. Nleanwhile, lustlities were spreading; the Indians on the Merrimac began to uttack the towns iu thelr vielinity; and the whole of Massachusetts was soon in the utmost alarm. Exerpt la the lmmediate neighborhood of Boston, the eonntry still remainet an lmmense forest, dotted by a few openings. The frontier settlements $\qquad$ Were mostly broken up, and the lnhabitants, rethring towards Boston. spread everywhere dread and Intense hatred of the bloody heathen." Even the prayiag Indiaas, aad the small dependent and trimatary tribes, lecame oljjects of suspicioa and terror.

Not eonteat with reulities sutficiently frlghtful, superstition, as usual, alled bugbears of her own. Indian bows were secen in the sky, and scalps in the moon. The northern lights became an objeet of terror. Phuntom horsemen careered anmog the elonds, or were heard to gallop invisible throagh the air. The howling of wolves was turned into a terrible onen. The war was regarled as a special judgmeat in punishment of prevailing sins. $\qquad$ About the time of the tirst collision with Philip, the Tareateens, or Eastern Iudians, liad atiocked the settlements in Maine and New Hampshive, plandering and buming the houses, and nassacring sueh of the inhabl. tants as fell into thelr hands. Thls surlden diffusion of hostilities and vigor of attack from opposite quarters, made the colonlsts believe that Philip had long been plotting and hid gradually matured an extensive conspiraey, into whlch most of the tribes lad deliberately entered, for the cxtermination of the whites. This belief infuriated the colonlsts, and suggested some rery quest lonable pruceedlngs. . . But there is uo evidence of any dellberate concert; nor, in fact, were the Indlans united. Had they been so, the war would have been far more serious. The Connectlent tribes prored faithfisl, and that colony remained untouched. Even the Narragansetts, the most powerfui confederacy in New England, in splte of so many former proveca tlons, had not yet taken up arms. But they were strongly suspected of intention to do so, and were aceused, notwithstanding their recent asaurances, of giving ald and shelter to the howthe tribes."-R. Hildreth, Ifiot. of the EV. S., $r$. 1, ch. 14.

A. D. 1675 (October - December). --King Philip's War: The crushing of the Narragan-setts.-"The attltude of the powerful Narragansett tribe was regurded with anxlety. It was known that, so far from keeplng their esupact to surrender such enemles of the Engilsh as shonid fail into their hands, they had harbored numbera of Pillip'a dlspersed retalners and alles. Whlle the Federat Commissioners were In sesslon si Boston [October], Canonehet, sachem of the Narragansetts, eame thither uitio other chlefs, and promised that the hostile Indians whom they acknowledged to be then under thelr protection should be surrendered within ten days. But prohahly the eourse of events on Connectient River emboldened tiem. At alt events, they dhl oot keep tielr engagement. The day for the surrender enme and went, and no Indians appeared. If tiat falthless tribe, the most powerfui in New England, should nssume aetive hos. tiiities, a terribie desolation would ensue. The Commissioners moved promptly. The fifth day after the hreach of the treaty found them reas. semhled after a siort recess. They immerlately determineci to ralse an additional force of 1,020 men for service in the Narmgansett country. Ther apponteni Governor Winsiow.of Plymouth, to be commander-tn-ehicf, and desired the coiony of Conncetieut to mame his iifutenant. The (3. ant was to place hmmelf at the head of inis L. Lups witinin six weeks, 'a sciemn day of prayer and humiiiation' belag kept througiath the eoio. nies meanwhile.

Time was tilus given to the Narragansetts to make their peace' by aetual performance of ticir covenants made with the Commissioners: as also making reparation for all damages sustalnel hy tiecir negiect hitherto. together whth security for their further fideiity.

It is not known wiether Philip was among the Narraganselts at this time. Under whatever influenre it wh., whetiter from stupldity or from confidanee, they made no firtherattempt at paif. cati.n.

The Massuchusetts troops marehed from Dedham to Attheterough on the day before that which had bech appointei by the Commis. sioners for them to meet the Piymonth ievy at the northeastern corner of the Narragansett country. The following day they rearicyl seekonk. A week earlier, tie few English ionses at Quinsigamond (Worcester) had leen barned by a party of natlves; and a few days later, the house of Jeremiah Buli, at Pettyquanscott, which hai been designated as tie place of general rendezvous for the Engllsh. was firet, and ten men ant five women and cinldren, who had taken refuge in it. were put to deatil. The place where the :. . rragansetts were to be sought was in what is now tile town of South Kingston, 18 miies distant, in n northwesterly direction, from Pettyquamscott, and a litte further from that Pegunt fort to the southwest, whieh had been destruyed by the force under Captaln Mason forty years before. According to informstion afterwards received from a captive, the Indian warriont here collected were no fewer than 3,500. They were on their guard, and had forti bed their hold to the best of their skill. It was on a solld plece of uptand of five or six acres. wholly surrounded by a swamp. On the mner slde of this natural defence they had driven rows of pallsades, making a barrier nearly a rod ln thiekness; and the only entrance to the eaclosure was over a rude bridge consls.ing of a feiferl tree, four or five feet from the ground, the hridge being protected by a block-house. Tho Engllish [whose forces, ifter a consilderable delay of the Connectleut troops, had been ail sssembieyi at Pettyquamscott on Saturday, December 18] breaking up their camp [on the morning of thi 19th] while it was yet dark, arrivert before tho place at one ocelock after noon. Having passei. Whthout shelter, a very cold night, they hal made a march of 18 mlles througe Trep snow, searceiy haiting to refresh themseive th food. In this condlition they immediately arizanced to the at tack. The Massachusetts troops were in the ran of the storming eolumn; next came the two Plymouth companies; and then the foree from Connectleut. The foremost of the assailants were recelved with a well-directed fire," and seven of thelr captains were killed or mortaity wounded. "Xothing dlscouraged by the fall of their lenters, the men pressed on, and a sharp eonflet followea, wheh, wh fuetuating success. lasted for iwo or three hours. Onee the assaliants were benten cut of the fort; but they presentij raliled and regalned tieir grommi. There was nothing for either party but to conquer or die, enclosed togetiner as they were. At length vletory declared for the Englisi, who tinished their work by setting fire to tie wirwams whitn the fort. They lost 70 men killeri and 150 wounded. Of the Connecticut contin. gent nlone, out of 300 men 40 were kilied num as many wounded. The number of the enemy that prerished ls uneertain.

A. D. 1676-1678.-King Philip's War: The end of the conflict.-" Whie the overthrow ", the Narrugansetts changed tie face of thinge, it was far from putting an end to the war. it showed that when the white man corld fiud his enemy he couid deri crushing hit ws, but the Indian was not. 3 ways so easy to find. Befor, the end of January Winslow's little army wit par.aliy disbanded for want of fooxl, auni ittiiree contingents feli back upon Stoniugtom. Boston, and Plymonth. Eariy In Fehruary the Federal Commisaioners cailed for a new lew uf 600 men to assemble at Brookfeld, for tire Nip mucks were beginning to renew their ineursions and after an interval of six months the figure of Philip again appears for a moment upon the scene. What he had been doing or where he had been, since the Brooktieid fight in Auguat. was never knowa. Wien in Fenruary, 16i6, he reappeared. It was stiil In company with inis alites the Nipmueks, in their blooly assault ulun Laucaster. On the luth of that month at sumrise the Indlans came swarining into the lovely vilisge. Danger had already been apprehenided, the pastor, Joseph Rowlandson, the only Har. vard graduate of 1652, had gone to Boston to solictt ald, and Captaln Wadsworth's company was slowly maklog lts way nver the dlfieult roads from Marlborough, but the Indians were beforchand. Several houses were at onee surrounded and set on fire, and men, women, and chlldren began falling under the tomaliawk. The minister's house was large and strongly bullt, and more than forty people found shelter there until at length lt took fre and they were drive. 1 out by the flames. Only one eseaped, a dozen or more were slaln, and the rest, ehlefly women and chlidren, taken eaptlve. . . . Among the eaptlves was Mary Rowlandson, the minis. ter's wife, who afterward wrote the story of he: sad experiencea. . It was a bnsy wliter and spring for these Nipmueks. Before February was over, thelr explott at Laneaster was followell hy a shocklng massacre at Medtell. They saeked and destroyed the towns of Worcester, Marlborongl., Mendon, and Groton, and even burned some houses in Weymouth, within a dozen miles of Boston. Murderous attaris were male upon sudhury, Chelmsforl, Springtield, Hatfich, Iladley, Vorthampton, Wrentham, Amlover, Bridgewater, Scltuate, and Middle lorough. On the 18th of April Captaln Warls. worth, with 70 men, was trawn into an ambush near suthory, surroundet hy 500 Nipmueks, and kilted with 50 of his men: six unfortnate captives sere horned alive over slow flres. But Wadsworth's party made the enemy pay dearly fur his vetory: that afternoon 130 . Xipmucks bit the clast. In such whe, by killing two or three for one, dial the English wenr ont and annlhilate thelr adversaries. Jnst one month from that day, Captain Turner surprised and slinghtered 300 of these warriors near the fulls of the Connectient river whleh have since borne his name, and this how at last broke the strength of the Nipmacks. Meanwhile the Narragnasetts and Wampanoags had burned the towns of War. wiek nul Providence. After the wholesate ruin of the great swamp fight, renonchet had still some 600 or $\mathbf{z 0 l}$ warriors left, and with these, ou the 26 th of March, in the neighbourhood of Paw. tuxet, he surprised a company of Si) Plymouth men, under Captain Pierce, and slew them all. ont not until he had lost 140 of his best warriors. Tew days later, Captain Denison, with his Connecticat company, defeated aml cmptured Canonchet, and the prond sou of Miantonomo met the sime fate as his father. He was handen over to the Bohegans aud tomahawked. . . . The fall of Canonchet marked the begiming of the ehd. In four sharp fights In the last week of June. Major Tuleott of Ilartford slew from 300 to tof warriors, being nearly all that were left of the Sirragausetts; and during the month of July Captain Church patrolled the conntry about Tannton, making prisoners of the Wampanoags. Once more Klig Philhp, shorn of his prestige, comes upon the scene.

determined In the Privs Comncil that Connectient, New Plymonth, and lihote Island should be united with Jasachusetis, New Ilampshire, Maine, and the Narragansett eountry, and be made 'onc entire government, the better to defend themselses agninst invaslou.' This was good policy for England. It was the despotic itea of eonsolidation. It wes opposed to the repullican system of confelerition. . . . Consolldation was indeed the best mode of establishing In lis colonies the direct government whick Charles had adopted in Noveminer, 1684, and which James way now to enforce. . . . For m^re thm tweuty years James had been trying his "prentice hand' upon New York. The thme had now come when he was to use hls master hand on New England. $\qquad$ By the alvice of sunderland, James commissioned (colonel Sir Elmund Andros to he eaptnin general and gov. "rnor-in-chief over his "Territory and Dominion of New England in Anerica, which meant Massachusetts Bay, New Plymouth, New Hampshire Maine, and the Narragmsett country, or the Kiug's Irovince. Andros's commission was trawu in the tratitional form, settled by the Plantatlon Board for those of other royal gover. mors in Virglnin, Jamaica, aul New Llampshire. Its substance, however, was much more despotic. Aulros was authoizel, with the eonsent of a council appointed by the crowu, to make laws aud levy taxes, and to govern the territory of Ni.w England ln obedience to its soverelgn's Instructions, and according to the laws then in furce, or afterward to be establlshed. . . . "This recognition was, of course, a cliatlenge to England and prepara tions were made for war, Willam III. died in March, 1702, andi was succeeded by Anne, the slster of his wife, and daughter of James II. War was declared hy Engind agalnst France, May 15th, 1703. The contest that followed is known in European history as the War of tive Spanish Suecession: in Ameriean history it is usually called Queen Anne's War; or the Second intercoloniai War. On one slde were France, Spahn, and Bavaria; on the other, Engiand, Hoiiand, Savoy, Austria, Prussia, Portugai, and Inenmark. It was in this war that the Duke of Marlhorougit won his fanie. To the peopie of New England, war betwecn France and England meant the hideous mlinight war-whoop, the tomahawk and scapping.knife, burning bamlets, and horrible captivity. To provlde agalnst it, a conforence was called to meet at Faimouth, on Casco Buy, In June, 1 \%u3, when Governor IDudley, of Miassachusetts, inet many of the chiefs of the Alven upuls. It was . . . resolved to flt out an cxpectition for retaliatlon, and as usual the people of Acadia were selected to explate the sina of the Indians and Cavadians. Colonel Benjamin Church was put in command of 550 men, 14 transports, and 86 Whaie-bosts, convoyed by three ships of war. Sailing from Botton In Msy, 1704," Church ravaged the lesser French settie. ments on the Acadian coast, hut ventured no attack on Port Royai. "In 1705, 450 men under Subercase - Eoidlers, Caradian peasants, aniversturers, and Indians, we 1 armed, and with ra. tions for twenty days, hisnkets and tents - set out to destroy the English settiements in New. foundiand, marchlng on snow-shoes. They took Pett Havre and St. John's, and devastated all the iittle settiements along the eastern coast, and the Engilsh trade was for the time completely broken up. Subercase was made Governor of Acadia in 1706. The following spring New England sent Colonel March to Port Royai with two regiments, hut he returaed without assauitlag the fort. Governor Dudiey forbade the tronps to land when they came back to Boston, andi ordered them to go again. Coionel March was ili, and Coionei Wainwright took commandi : but after a pretence of besieging the 1 at for eieven days he retired with smail loss, the experition having cost Maseachusetts $£ 2,200$. A. D. 1744--King George's War (the Third Intercoionial War): Hostiiities in Nova Scotia.-"The war that had prevailed for ©: eral years het ween Britaln and spaln [see insLasD: A. D. 1739-1741], inflicted upon the greater number of the British provinces of Americia mo farther share of lte evlin twan the burden of contrihuting to the expedlitons of Admlral Vernon, and the wate of life hy which his disastrous asval campalgns were algnallzed. Only Bouth Carolina and Georgia had been exposed to actual attack and danger. But this year [1744], by an enlargement of the hostlle relations of the parent atate, the acene of war was extended to the more northern provinces. The French, though professlng peace with Britaln, had repel: dily given asaistance to Spaln; whlle the British king, as Elector of Hanover, had eapoused the quarrel of the emperor of Germany with the Frencis monarch: and after varlous mutual threats and demoustrat lons of hoatlity that consequently ensued between Britaln and France, war [the War of the Austrir Successlon] was now formally de. clared by t. se states agalnst each other [see Augtria: A. D. 1718-1739, and after]. The French colonists in America, having been apprized of this event before lt wan known in New England were tempted to lmprove the advan. tage of their profor intclligence hy an lustant and unexpected commencement of hostllitles, whleh accordingly broke forth wlthout notice or delay in the quarter of Nova Scotln. ... On the lsinnd of Canso, adjolnlng the coast of Nova Scotla, the Britlsh had formed a settlement, whlch was resorted to by the tishermen of New England. and defended by a smali fortlicatlon garrisoued by a detachment of troons from Annapolis.
Duquesnel, the governor of Cape Breton, on recelving lnteliigence of the declaration of war le. tween the two parent states, concelred the hope of destroylng the fishlng establlshments of the Engllsh by the suddenness and vlgor of an unex. pected attack. His first blow, which was nimed at Canso, proved successfil (May 13, 1744). Duvivler, whom he despntched from his heaiquarters at Louisburg, with a few armed reswels and a force of 900 men, took unresisted posses. slon of thls island, burned the fort and houses, and made prisoners of the garrison and inhabitants. Thls suecess Duquesnel endeavoured to foilow up by the conquest of Pincentia in Newfoundiand, and of Annapolis In Nova Scotia: but at both these places inis forces were repulsed. In the attack of Annapolis, the French were jolned by the Indians of Nova Scotia; but the prudent forecast of Shirley, the governor of Nassachusetts, had induced tie assembly of this provlnce, some time lefore, to contribute a rein. forcement of 200 men for the greater security of the garrison of Annapoils; and to the opportune arrival of the succour thus affordel the preacrva. tion of the place was ascribed.

The people of New England were stimulated to a pitcis of resentment, apprehension, and martial cnergr. that very shortly protuced an effort of which neither their friends nor their cnemies had sup. posed them to be capable, and which excitel the admiration of butis Europe and America.
War was declared against the Indians of Nova Scotla, who had asslsted lu the attack upon Annapolls; all the frontier garrisons were relnforced; new forts were erected; and the mate. rlals of defence were enlarged by a seasonabie glft of artillery from the king. Meanwhile, though the Freach were not preparcd to prosecute the extersive phan of conquest which their first operatlons announced, thelr privateers actlvely waged a harassing naval warfare that greatly endamaged the commerre of New Eng.
land. The British Aeherlen on the coast of Nova Scotla were Interrupted; the ishermen deciared thelr lntentlon of returalng no more to their wonted atatlons on that coast ; and so mauy merchant vessels were captured and carried lnto Loulsburg in the course of thls summer, that it Was expecterl that in the foilowlag year no branch of maritlme trade would be pursued by the New Engiand merchants, except under the protectlon of convoy."-J. A. D. 1745. - King George's ${ }^{\text {Whar. - The }}$ taklng of Loulsburg.-"Iouisburg, on whlch the French bud spent mueh money [see Cape Breton Island: A. D. 1720-1745], was hy far the strongest fort north of the Gulf of Mexlco. But the prisoners of Canso, carried thlther, and afterwari dilsnissed on paroie, reported the garrison to be weak and the works out of repalr. So long as the French heid this fortress, It was sure to lue a source of annoyance to New Eng land, hut to wait for British aid to capture it woudi be tedious and uncertaln, public attention In Great Britain leing much congrossed hy a threatened Invasion. Cnder these circumstances, Shiriey proposed to the General Court of Massa: chusetts the bold enterprise of a colonial exped]tion, of whlch Loulsiurg shonid be the object. After six days' deliberation and two addltional Inesages froin the governor, this proposal was sdopted by a ninjority of one vote. A clrcular letter, nsking aid and co-operition, was sent to ail the colonles as far south as Pennsylvania. In answer to this appicatlon, urged loy a special messenger from Daswiehusetts, the Pennsylvania Assembly . . . voted \&t.000 of their currency to purchase provisions. The New Jersey Assembiy . . . furnisheti . . . fondo toward the Louisburg expedition, hut dicdiued to raise nny men. The New York Assembly, after a long ilebiate, voted $£ 3.0 \mathrm{~m}$ ) of their cilrency; but this seemid to Clinton a uiggarily grant, and le sent, Iresides, a quantity of provisions purchased by private sulseription, und ten elghteen-pounders from the kIny's magazine. Connecticut voted 500 men, led ly lRoger Wuicott, afterward governor, and appointed, by stipulation of the Connecticut Assembly, second in commantl of the expedition. IRichie Island and Sew liamishire ench raised a revine ut of 300 men: lut the Rhode Island troops didi not arrive till after Lonisburg was taken. The chief burden of the enterprise, as was to low expected, foli on Sassachusetts. In seven weeks an irmy of 3,250 men was enlisted, transports were pressed, and lills of credit were profnsely issued to pay the expense. Ten armed vesseis were provided by Missachusetts, and one by each of the other New England coionles. The command in chief was given to William leppereli, a native of Maine, a wealthy merehant, who had inherited and angmented a large fortune acquired by his father in the fisheries; a popuiar, enterprising, sagacions man, noted for his universai good fortune, but unacquainted with milltary affairs, except as a militla officer.

The enterprise assumed something of the character of an antl. Catholic crusade. One of the chapiains, a disciple of Whitfield, carried a hatchet, speciaily provided to hew down the Images in the French churclies. Eleven days after emharklag at Boston [Apri], 1745], the Massachusetts armameut assemhled at Casco to walt there the arrival of the Connecticut anil Rhode Island quotas, and the melting of the ice by which Cape Breton was environed. The New Ifampshure troops were aiready there ; thowe from Connecticut came a few daya after. Notice har. log been sent to England and the West Indles of the intended expedilion, Captain Warren pres. entiy arrived with four ships of war, and, crule. ing before Louishurg, captured severai vesseis bound thither with suppliea. Aiready, before his arrivai, the New England ernisers had prerented the entry of a French thirty-gun whip. As soon as the ice permitted, the troops landed and commenced the siege, hut not with much skiii, for they had no engineers. . . Five unsuccessfui attacks were made, one after another, upon an Isiand hattery winich protected the hartoor. In that cold, foggy climate, the troops, very imperfectiy provided with tents, suffered se. verely from sickness, and more titan a third were untit for duty. But the French garrison was feeibie and mutinons, and when the conmmnder found that his supplies had heen captured, he relieved the emharrassment of tire beslegers i)y offering to capitulate. Tiue capitulation [Jnne $18]$ included 6.50 regular soldiers, and near 1,310 effective ininubitants of the town, ali of wiom were to be sinippeef to France. The isiand of St. Join's presentiy suhmitted on the same terms. The luss daring tine siege was less than 150, inut among those refuctantily detained to garrison the eonijuered fortress teu times as many perished afterward by sickness. In the expedition of Vemon and tins against Loulsburg perished a jarge number of the remaining Indians of New Eagrinad, persuaded to enifst as sofdiers in the coionial rogiments. Some dispute arose as to the relative merits of the land and naval forces, witioin had been joined during tire siege by additionai sijps from Engiand. Pepperefi, how ever, was made a imronet, and both he and Shirlty were commissioned as coloneiss in the Britivi arny. Warren was promoted to the rank of rear admirai. Tiie capture of titis strong fortress, effected in the facc of many obstacies, sheti, indieed, a momentary iuster over one of the most unsuccessfui wars in whirit Britain was cver engaged."-R. 1 iliilreth, Hist. of the U. s., ch. 2i (r. 2) - "As fur us Enginad was concerned, it [tiac taking of Louisburg] was the great event of the war of the Austrian suc ression. whom Goveruor Shirley's pian had been sul. mitted, dimapproved of it, is exhihiting to the colontats too piainiy their own etrength. He therefore ndvised to place the ehief dependence on the ficet and army to be ment from Eng. land, and to look on the Americans as unefui only when joined with others. Flnally, the Whigs determined to send a powerful fleet to Quebec, at the same time tint an army shoukl attack Montreal, hy the route of Lake Champlain; and so late as Aprif, 1746, onders were issued to the everal governors to ievy tr -pe without limita. tion, which. when assembied in the f:'utiers, the king would pay. From sone unknown cause. the pian was abandoned as soon as formed. Tive generai appointed to the chief command was ordered not to embark, hut tire ?amtructions to en. list troops had iseen transmitie. to America, and were acted on witi aiacrity. Massacirusetts raised 3,500 men to coopernte with the arot, which, however, they were dioomed never to see. After being kept a long tine in suspense, they were disjersed, in several places, to streng then garrisons which were supposed to be too weak for the defensow assigned thein. Upward of 3, U(M) men, beionging to other colonies, were assembinil at Aihany, undilscipilned, without a commissariat and under no control. After the season for ac tive operations was aliowed to pass away, they disbanded themseives, some with arms in thielr lands demanding imy of their governors, and otirers suing tieir cuptains. In addition to this disgracefulaffar, the Provinciais fad tive mortification to inave a iarge iotachment of their mell cut of in Lower Horton, then known as llinas. situated nearly in the centre of Nova Scotin. The Canadian forces, which had troveied tibither to co-operate with an immense fleet expected from France, determining to wiuter in that prov. fuce, rendered it a suljeet of continued anxicty aud expense to Massachusetts. Governor Sinir. ley resolved, after again reinforcing the garriwin at Anmpolis, to drive titem from tite shoores of at Anmpois, to drive tirem from tite shores of Minas Basin, where they were sented; and in the winter of tite year 1746, a bxiy of troops was embarked at Boston for the former piace. After the joss of a transjort, and the grentest part of the soidiers on boari, the troops arrived, and re. emharked for Grami Pré in the district of Ninas, In tire latt"r end of December . . . The issue wis, that being cantoned at to great distnnces from euch other, La Corne, a communder of tie Frenci, having intelligence of tireir situntion, furced a marcir from schiegnieto, tirough a mosi tompestuous snow-storm, and surprised them at midnigit. After losing 160 of their me'u, in kiliond, wounded and prisoners, the party were obiiged to capituiate, not, bowever, on dishonor abie terms, and the French, in their turn, abma doned their post. On the 8th of May, 174H, phace was prociaimed at Boston [acconding to the terms of the Treaty of Aix-la.Chapeife, conciuded October 7,1748 ], much to the nortification of the Provincials; Cape Breton was restorcd to France; and Louishurg, whicis had created so much dread, and intlictelis such injuri's on tincir commerce, was handed over to their inveterate enemies, to be rendered stili stronger by additional fontifications. benn made hy the Britieh Goverument. On the occasion of the organization of FIJi [1874], stron representations as to the denirablity of taklog a similar course witb regarl to eastern New Quinea were made to the Secretary of State (Lord Car. narron); but the Minister, after consulting the various Australnslau governments, and thding them by no means unanimous, refused to take the atep unless the coionles desiring it would undertake to contrlbute towaris the expense ilkely to be lncurreyi. The colonies were not prepared to asaume this respouslblitity. . . Tbus the matter rested, until, at the elose of the year 1877, the reported discovery of gold la Nev Guinem again brougbt the question prominently forward. The news immedifately attracted numbers of AustraHian gold dlege s, and, following in their wake, crowds of less reputabie ebaracters, who not oniy attempted to settie, or ratber to ionge, In New Guinea itself, lut took irregular possession of more tban one of the numerous Isiands iylng betwreu Australla and New Guinea in Turree Strait, within the coast line of Queensland. Here ther cansel conshlerable trouble : and the Queens. land Government, after acting as jwlice autbority In tbe ishands lit questlon for some iittle time without legal warrant, endeavoured to make It position constitutionai with regarli to them, In this it was succeesful. The British Acimiralty on tbe report of Conimander Heath, certitiel that there was no known claim to the islands in guestion ly uny forvign power, and that there 4, pearen no serions objection to the alteration of the Qucenslund coast boundarles for the purpose of incluiling them. Also at the request of ihe Qucensland Government, the Admiralty atationed a war-whlp at Port Moreshy in New Guinea. Hut the Imperial Government, thought pressed by representative bodies of parious kinds anceted with the colonies, still timly declined
"etend the prinelple of ahsorption by annex-any part of New Guinea fiself to the Empire. a ue pressure, however, became very great. Com. panies were formed la Australia for the development of New Guinea. The Queensland Goverument's arent at Port Monesby began to assume nore and more the churacter of an aid ninistrator of the conntry near the Port. . . In February of the fear 188S the mutter assumed in new phase by the detinite off r of the Queemanand Goverument. - to bear the expense of the uiministrathon of New (inlnea, if the Imperial autborities would sanction its nume xation. The reasons urged by Queensland were, the Increasing tratio through Torres Struit, the raplid developinent of coust h. dustries, such as beche de-mer and pearl fishing, the danger of the escupe of convicts from New Calerionia, and the iaadequacy of tite IIgh Commisslonership. The proposal of Queenslaul was being disconssed by the Culonial thftre in somewhat leisurely fashion, when the news reached Australia thit a German ussociation bad been formed for the setthment of New Guinen. Lorl timnville (Foneign secretary) deeclined to believe in the existence of the plan, at least so far as the Gerinan Government was coneerned. The colonists tinok a differeat view; and, on the 4th April, 1N8:3, the Queensland Government formally tork plossession of New Guinea la the mame of Her Majesty, Still... Apgar, Hiol. of New Jervey, eh. 1.-In July, 16i6, the province was divided, Phlllp Carteret taking Enat Jersey, and the successors of Berkeley ratlng Weat Jersey. "Thereupon, Carteret, by will, devised his plantatlon of New Jersey to trustees to be sold for certain purposes, by him stated, in 1681-2. .. He had not a peaceabie time. Indeel, anythlng like constant peace was the lot of very few of New Jersey's early Govcrnors. Governor Andros, of New York, disputed Carturet's autbority; nay, falling by peaceabie means to gnin hls point, he sent a party of soldiers hy night [1678], who dragged Carteret from his bed, curried lim to New York, and there kept hlm close untll a dny was set on whleh he was tried before lis opponent himseif In tise New York Courts, and three times acquitted by the jury, who were sent baek with direc. tions to couvict, but firmly each time refused. The suthority of Carteret was confirmed by the Duke of York, nad Andros was recalied. The trustces of sir George Carteret could not make sale of East Jersey. After Ineffectunl attempts at prlvate sale they offered It at puilic auction, and William Penn and eieven associutes, most if not ali Quakers, bought it for $5^{4} 3,40$. . it was too heavy a purcitase, apparently, for their mamgement. Hshed, John Fenwlek's interest in West Jerwey Wan conveyed to John Eldridge and Elmund Warner In fee, and they were admitted lnto the number of proprietors. In onder to entahlish a goverament for the Province of Weat Jemey, provialonal authority was given to Richard Hartshore and Richand Guy, reildents of East Jersey, and to James Wasse, who was eent especially from England to act on behalf of the proprietors. These persons were commlasloned on the 18th of Auguse, 1676, by Byllinge and hls trustees, in conjunctlon with Eitridge and Warner, and full power was given them to conduct the affairs of the goverament In accorlance with Instructlons from the proprietors. Fenwlek, who had founded a settlement at Salem, refused to recognize the tranuier of his portion of the Province to Eldridge and Warner, and declared himself to be Independent of this new government. It therefore became the tirst duty of the commlssloners to settle this difticulty. All efforts, however, for thut purpose falied. The origina. plan of the government was derlsed by William Penn and his immediate associntes. It was afterwarll approved ly all the proprietors interested In the Province, and was tirst pulliabed on the 3 i of Mareh, 1876, as 'The Concessions and Agreements of the proprietors, frechoiders and inhabItants of the Province of West Jersey ln Anieri. ca.' This constitution decinred that no man or mumber of men on eartis had power or authority to rule over men's consclences in reilgious mitit ters; and tl ; no perssin or persons withln the Irroviace shoutd be In any wise calied lu quesstion or punished, In person, estnte or privilege, on aceount of oplulina, juigment, falth or wor: ship townerl Goul in matters of religion.
That all the lnhubitants of the Province shomiti linve the right to attend court and be present at all proceedings, 'to the end that fistice may not be done in a corner, nor in nny covert manner.

The exceutive authority of the government was ioiged in the lands of commissioners, to le appointed at first by the proprietors or a mill jority of them; but after the further setthement of the Province they were to be chosen by the residient proprictors iund lulabitants, on the 25th of Marein of caeh year. In October of the same year, the councll of the proprietaries of Weat New Jerney voted to the eccretary general for the dominion of New England the custody of 'all secords reiating to government.' Thus the whole province feil, with New York and New England, under the government of Androm At the revolution, therefore [the English Revolution of 1688-89], the zovereignty over New Jersey had reverted to the crown; and the legal maxim, woon promuigated by the board of trude, that the domains of the proprietaries might be bought and soid, hut not their executive power, weakened their attempts at the recovery of authority, and consigned the eolony to a temporary anarehy. A communlty of hushandmen may be safe for a short scason with little government For tweive years, the province was not in a settied condition. From June, 1689, to August, 1682, East New Jerscy had apparentiy no superintendling admlaistration, being, In time of wur, destltute of military offlcers as well as of magistrates with royal or proprietary commissions. They were proteeted by their neighbors from externai attacks; and there is no reason to $\ln$ fer that the severni towns failed to exercise regulatlr.g powers within their respective linits. $\qquad$ The proprietaries, tireatened with the ultimate interference of parllament in provinces 'where,' it was sald, 'ho regular government had ever been established,' resolved to resign their pretensions. In their negotiatlons with the crown, tiney wished to inslst that there sinouid be a triennlaj assembly; lut King Wllliam, though he had agninst his luclination approvel triennial pariinments for Engiaal, would never consent to them in the piantations. In 1702, the first year of Queen Anue, the surrender took piace before the prisy councii. The doraain, cerasing to be conneeted with proprieliry powers, was, under the ruies of private right, eonflimed to its possessors, and the deelsion has never been disturbel. The surrender of 'the pretended' rights to government belng completed, the two Jerseys were unltel in oue province: and the government was conferred on Edward Ilyde, Lord Cornbury, who, like Queen Anne, was the grandehlld of Clarendon. Jietaining its separnte leglslature, the province haml for tie next thirty. six years the same governors as New York. A. D. 1774-1776. - End of royal govern:nent. - Adoption of a State Constltution. - In the person of Wliilam Franklin, unworthy sin of Benjamin Franklin, New Jersey was afflieted, at the outbreak of the lievolutlonary struggle, whth an arbltrary and obstinateiy royalist governor. Finding the assemhly of the colony refractory and independent, he refused to convene it in 1784, when tire people deslred to send deiegate to the Continental Congress. Thereupon a convention was heid at New Brunswlek, and thls body not only commlssioned delegates to the general Congress, hut appointed a "gencral committee of eorrespondience" for the Province. The committee, in May of the foliowing year, called together, at Trenton, a second Provincial Convention, whicis took to itself the titie of the "Provincial Congress of New Jersey," and assumed the full authority of all the liranches of the government, proviling for the defense of the Province and taking neeasures to carry out the plans of the Coatiaental Congress. "Governor Franklin convened the Legislature on the 16 til of Novemler, $17 i 5$. No important business whs transucted, and on the 6th of Deecmuler the Asscmily was proroguel by the governor to meet on the 3d of January, 1788, but it never reassembicil, and tinis was the end of Provincial legisiation la New Jersey under myal authority. . . Thougit the Provincial Congress of New Jersey had to a great extent assumed the control of pubie affairs in the Province, it had not reaouneed the royal authority. . . . On the 2tti of Juue, a connititee was appointed to draft a constitution. $\qquad$ New Jersey was, howe ver, not y.t disposed to alandon ail hopes of reconcilintion with the Crown, and therefore provided in the last article of this constitution that the instrument shoulid hecome void whenever the king should grant a full redress of gricvanees, and agree to aduinitter tike covermacat of New alersey In accordanee with the constitution of Eugiand and the rigits of British snljectets. Before this creurrel, however, Governor Franklin had been piaced nuder arrest, by order of Congress, und seat to Connecticut, where he was released Int parole. A. D. 1846. - The American conquest and occupation by Kearney's expedition.-"While the heavlest Hghting [of the Mexican War] was going on in Old Mexico [see Mexico: A. D. 1446-1847], the Government [of the United States] Masily took possession of New Mexico and Call. furufa, hy means of experitions organized on the remote frontiers. New Mexico was wanted for the emigrat's.n to the Pactic. If we were to have Califonna we must also have the right of way to it. In the hands of the Spaniards, New Mexico barred ace pas to the Pacifie so conpletely that the oidest travelled route was scarcely known to Americansat all, and hut littie used hy the Spaniards themselves. If now we consult a map of the United States it is seen that the thirty fourth parallel crosse's the Misslasippi at the mouth of the Arkansas, cuts Niew Mexico in the milddle, and reaches the Pacific near Los Angeles. It was long the belief of statesmen that the great tide of emigration must set along this line, because it had the most temperate climate, was shorter, and would he found freer from hardshlp than the route by way of the Sonth Pass. Tils view had set on foot the exploration of the Arkansas and Red Rivers. But if we except the little that Pike and Long had gatherei, alnosit nothing was known about it. fet the prevailing belicf gave New Mexico, as relitel th Caiffornls, an exceptional importance. These cousilerations welghed for more than acquisithon of territors, thougin the notion that Sew Mexico contained very rich sliver-mines unduabtedly hal force in determining its conquest.

Wiih thls object Generai Kearucy marehed from Fort lan wenworth in J ine, 1846, for Sunta Fie, at the hemi of a foree of which a battalion of Hormony formed part. After subinlng New Moxkeo, Kearney was to go on to Cahfornla, and with the help of naval forces already sent there, for the purpose, conquer that couutry also.

General Kearney marched by the Upper Arkansas, to Bent's Fort, and from Bent's Fort over the old trali through Ei Moro and Las Vegas, Srn Miguel and Old Pecos, without meeting the opposition he expected, or at any time seelng any considerable body of the enemy. On the 18 th of August, as the sun was setting, the stars and stripes were unfurled over the pslace of Santa Fe, snd New Mexico was deelared annexed ul the United States. Either the home government thought New Mexico quite safe from attack, or, having decided to reserve all its strength for the main confict, had left this province to its fitte. After organizing a eivil government, and ap. polnting Charles Bent of Beat's Fort, governir, General Kearney hroke up hls camp at Santa Fé, Sept. 25 . Itrs fore was now divided. One part, Under Colonel Doniphan, was ordered to join General Wool In Chihuahua. A second detach. ment was left to garrison santa Fé, while Kearney went on to California with the rest of tils troops. The people cvery where seemetidispmest to submit quietly, and as most of the puobles soon proffered their allegiance to the C'uited States Government, little fear of an outhreak was felt. Before leaving the valler, a courier was met bearing the news that California also had suhmitted to us without striking a biow. This information deeided General Kearney to send back most of his remalning force, while With a few soldiers oniy he continued his nairch through what is now Arizona for the Pacitic."8. A. A. D 1821-1831.-Governora Brisbane and Darling. - First stage of a constitutlonal self-goverament. -" The end of Governor Macquarie's term of offlice marks the conclusion of the colony's Infancy. . . . The next Governorshin, that of sir Thomas Brisbane, marks a definite stage in the history of New South Wales. The discovery of the Bathurst Plalns [see Acs. tralia: A. D. 1800-1840] had put an end to all doubts of the uitimate ability of the coiony to sustaln an lncreasing population; and now; for the finst time, the tide of free immlgration began to flow. . . The great achlevement of Goverinor Brishane's adminlstratlon was the introluction of instltutlons which ultimately served ns the basis of self-government In Australla. .. . We are now entering upon a period in whlch instlturtions will graduaily take the place of men. Tinis period begins definitely in the year 1823 , wlth
the passing of the first Constitutlonal Statute which operated In Austruiia.... By it the former millitary admlinistration of justice, by a Judge-Adrocate and military assessors, was superseded by a Supreanc Court ou an Eaplish model, whith a Chicf Justice, and the right to a trial by fury ln clvil cases, If both the parties agreed upon It. But in criminal cases the jury was stlll to conslst of milltary oftcers, seven in number, although the priwner was to be eatitled to challenge them on any grounds for which an orllnary juror could be objected to lu Englanil. IIIs Majesty In Councll was, however, suthor lzed to cxtend the jury aystem $\ln$ any way deemed desirahle; and, as a matter of fact, it was not very long before the jury aystem was lutrodnced lnto criminai trials in Australia. Moreover, convlets were no longer to be exelud ed from glving evidence in Courts of Justice.

The political innovations made by the statute were also important. They provided for the appointment of a Council with legislative and finanelal powers, albelt under ccrtain vcry substantial limitations. . . This Councll at first consisted entirely of Government oftcials, and was of course subject to no process of propular elcction. But, as Lord Bnthurst explained in hls letter which covered the warrant of appointment. It was Intended by the 11 me Government that the new Council should at least to some degree represent the slews of non-offichal colonists; and this plelge was redermerl In the year 1825 by the nomlnatlon of three ludependent members. . . . The other great political object of the statute was the separation of Tasmania (then known as Van Diemen's Land) from the mother colone.

The llome Government, at the time of ilic passing of the Aet, apparentiy hesitated between complefe and partial separation, and took powers for hoth. Inrl Bathurst nitimately decided in favour of partlal separatiou only; and Van Diemen's Land had to wait many years before becoming completely Indepeudent of the Government av Sydncy. . . . The inother molony of Austraiia now started upon a career of progress and drvelopement which, in spite of stormy luterludies. It maintalned until the crisis of 1543. The marks of frecelom and indepeudence manifested themselves one by one. Freedon of the press was formally prorlalmed $\ln 1824$, and aithough (as might liave been ex. pectel) the liherty was at first abused, and eaused much troubl during the governorship of Sir ladph Darling (182,i-1831), get, under the more judicious rule of Sir Richard Bourke (183118:5), the diffleuities were removed. . . . In the year $182 \%$ the colony was rich enough to support lisown cirll government : $\qquad$ midi, a few years later, the Government of the colony began eren to vote funds to assist the immigration of desirable colonists. . . $13 y$ a statite of the Inperlal Purliament passel la the year 1828 , the maxlinum number of the council was raisel to fifteen, and its legislative powers considerably lncreased. This important change virtuaily placed tie officlal members of the Council in a minority in questlons upon which the Government and the settlers as a whoie werc dlvided $\ln$ opinion. . In the almiuistration of justice still further steps towarls a free molel werctaken; and the some. A. D. 183i-2855. - Convict transportation abollshed. - Immigration stimulated.- Selfgovernment secured.-Governor Darilng was sueceuled hy "Major-Generai Sir Richard Bourke, K. C. B., [whol arrived in Sydneg on the 2nd of December, 1 sill. $\qquad$ The six years during which Bourke alininistered the affairs of the colony were not oniy free from ciass warfnre. but were distinguished by the rapild growth of industry and commerce, and the stealy deveiopment of nationnl life under new forms. In fact. the history of the coiony as a free State, so to speak. may be saill to date from Bourke's time.

Triai by jury in the Soperior Courts - that is, hy civilian instraul of by military jurors - was granted in un optioual form in 18:33: and although representative goverument was stili withheld by the IIome authorities, the administration of public aftairs was condueted by Bourke on constitutional principles, with very littie resort to the arhitrary power whiel had made his predecessor's rule distasteful to the whoie community.
The listory of the coliony during the Administra: tion of Sir Chorge (Iipls, a Captain in the Royal Engineers, who arrived in Febriary, 1838, assumes proportions altogeth ir unknown to it under the rule of his preiceessors. It is no longer oceupied with the melaneholy recorls of the convict ciass, or the bitter feuds bet ween the Emancipists and the Exclusives. The state of society had chaugerl; free immigration had hegun to flow in ; capital was introlaced by settlers from ahroad avd investeit in sheerp and enttie stations; the system of assigucel servants ceasel in 18:3s, and transportation itacif, which hal been vearly growing more unpopular. was abolished by un Orier in Conueil two years inter, nithough it whs not finaily extinguisherl until 1851. The most remarkahie event of this period wis the establislment of a new Constitution, under an Aet passel by the Irpperial l'ariament in 1s42. IRopreseatative institutions trere at length conceded to the colony, nithourl responsible governinent was still withhelid. The new Legislative Conncll was romprsed of 36 members, of whom o4 were electeyl and 12 appointerl by the Crown.

Fronn 1840 to 1846 , the colony was plunget in a state of depression which bronght the shatiow of ruin to every man's dome. This was to some extent the resilit of a reaction from the iaflatel state of prowerity which linul existed a few years before, when priees of lanil and stork rose to a fetitious saine, and spreculation in innd abworbal all the thating capitai in the conntry. Amosig the imneriate canses of denression were the ressution of Imperiai expe.; 'ture on trans. jortation. sud the withirawni of Government di-pmeits from the banks; the coasequent pressure hroustht to hear by thase institutions on their customurs: the substitution of free labour for that of the assignel servnnts, necessitnting ensh payment of witers: the iocking up of capital in mrge purehisis of Innd. whici up to that time hai bern sold at fire noll subsequently twelve shilliugq uI acre ; nnd indinigence in excesslve speculation, by which the onilinary industries of the pountry ware tleprived of capital. The resuit wats that esery branch of trade and industry feil into a stute of utter collapse. . . . Politifs at this time gave rise to a blter struggic. Cer. tain Crown Lands Regulations which ©ir Geurge Gipps had frauned and lssued In 1844, provokeri determined opposition on the part of the squat ters. His proposal to taz the boldera of Crown iande was denounced as tyranny.
The ultimate result was that the Councll refised to renew the Land Act finmed by Gipps, winich had been passed for onc year only, and the Gor. ernor's land policy was at an end. Sir George Gippe closed his career in New Soluth Wales in July, 1846, and died in England the following February. $\qquad$ Sir Charles Fitzroy arrivel in Sydney at a time when the colony had entered on an era of prosperity hitherto unknown In its history. $\rightarrow$ In the first speech he addressed to the Legislative Council on its meeting In September. 1846, a montb after hie arrival, he congratulated ita members on the general prosperity of the country - a prosperity the more remarkable, in asmuch as the colony was only just emerging from those diffleutities which were expericncted under that monetary depression which affecterl all ciasses of the community.' Among the many striking eviderces of the new life which hail been Infused into the coiony at this time, maimly as a resuit of free immigration and the ripipi extension of settlement in the interior, She munt conspienons were the movements set on fowt for the construction of railways and the establish. mient of steam communication with Englami. The gradinal increase in the tide of immigration had greatly contrihutel to promote the prosperity of the peopic. $\qquad$ Fiocks nnd herds were driven further and further iniand as pach new discovery makle the resourees of the Interior known ; bit stock-owners and settlers were met with the ever-inereasing dificulty of finding a sutficicut supply of iabour. Convict labour was nominully cheap, but reall y dear at any price. . . It grad. ually becanse recognlzed as a principle of state policy, mainly owning to Wakefeid's teachinar, that the revenue arising from the iand should the appropriated to the purpose of promoting inmi. gration. Linder that system money was renilted] by the Colonial Goveriment every year to be expended by a Bnard of Fmigration Commis sionera nppointed in London, who seiceted and diespateherl the best emigrants they conld get. But American competition was kecriy feit in the labour market, and the Government had to tempt peopie to emigrate to Anstralia by paying luif the passage money and offering smail leasns to mechanics, who conld he induced to ieare Eng. innt on no other terms. .. . The conduet if public affairs by the Comneii, in which [William (Chnries] Wentivorth was the principal figure, had been so distinguished for statesmaniike abivi. ity that the capacity of the coionists for sclf. government conid no longer be denieci. Ilut a stili more potent influence lad been ut wrork. The great gedl discoveries, which took place in 1840, hald, in Wentworth's plisnse, precipitatei the colony luto a nation. and the diemuad for free institutions rame nomen the IIome Gosernnecut With a degree of force it was impossibie to resist. Ilam Denlson, who had succeeded Sir Charles Fitzroy in the beginnling of the year. The estehlishment of responsible government hrought about so great a change in the poiltical aystem of the colony that from that date the current of lis history may be said to run in a totally different channei. A. D. 1855-1893. - The Coionial Constitn-tlon.-Llberalized Land Pollcy. - Public Education. -" The principles of the Constitution, as origlnally laid down, have never heen altered. hut there bave heen some changes in minor de. tails. In New Nouth Wales, as in the other Australian colonies, tic democratle element was Inereasing. and before long the Electoral Aet was amended and the franchise reduced to practicaliy manhood suffrage. At the same time, the old system of votlug was abolished, and ail clectlons have since heen conducted by means of the bailot-box. Various other amendments of the Eiectoral Aet have taken place from time to time, and the few restrictions of political privilege whlch remalned have been removed. The Leglsiative Council now [1893] contains 67 members-though there is no fixed limit of num-bers-and there are 141 members of the Assembly. The tenure of a seat in the Council is for life, and the oniy quailfeation required of mem. bers is that the shali be 21 years of age. and nsturallzed or "natural born subjeets of the Queen, while the qualification of the Lower llouse le practically the same. $\qquad$ The duration of the Assemhly is iimited to three years, and the only condition at present necessary to ohtain elective rights is six months' residence hefore the rolls are complied. Within the first five years of responsible government, under the guldance of Sir John Robertson elaborate regulations were framed for the alienation and occupation of Crown lands. The circumstances of the colony hi:ul been greatiy altered hy the discovery of gohi [see Austililia: A. D. 1839-1835: and Monet and Bayking: A. D. 1848-1898], hud the question of land settlement had to be deait with in an entirely new spirit to meet the wants of a class of a different type to that contem. whited by the framers of former cuactments.

The Government were beaten hy a large majorty on the question of 'free auiection before surrey.' The Governor was urged to dlsolve Parliament, hut this he decilned to do, and before long puhlic sentiment underwent a compiete change: the cry of 'free selectlon before survey' was made the watchword of the democratle party; and the measure on Its re-Introducthon consequently hecame law. The Aet of 1881 was intended to facilitate the settiement of an industrial agricuitural populatios, side by slde with the pastorai tenants, hy means of free selcction $\ln$ limited areas. . . . The new Par. ilament did not confne its ilberailsm to the administration of the Crown lands. Before it had been many years in existenec an Act was prased abolishing all grants from the Ntate Treasury in aid of reilgious denominations, whlle a further ievelling measure found lis place on the statute book in an Act providing for the abolition of the law of primogeniture. . . . The whole country was terrorised for meny years followling 1860 by the expiolts of husirangera, and for a time the executive appeared to be incapable of dealing wlth these offenders. . . Eventually the law prevailed, and hushranging and lts accompanying evils were completely stamped out.

The Puhlic Schools Act of $1866 \ldots$ provided for two dlstinct ciasses of schools, though all schools recelving ald from the State were placed hy it nominally under a Council of Education. The public schools were entirely under the control of thls board, but the denominational schools were still managed to some extent by the various religious hodies to which they had hithcrto helonged. ... In 1880, statc ald to denominational education was finally abollshed. By the new Act, which is stili in force the entire educational system of the colony was remodelied: the Councll of Eilucation was dissolverl, and a Minister of Pubilic instruction created $\ln$ lts place. Puhlie schools to affori primary instruction to all elfldren withoit secturian or class distinctlon were estahisishel, as well as superior publie schools, In whleh a more advanced course might be followed. . . . Pastoral lnlustries are still the mainstay of the country. "-G. Trogarthen. The Story of Australasin, ch. 11-12.

ment allies, through the means of a commisaton, in an effort to ind a way of settiling trade disputen by the peacefui methode of arbitration. These eftorts succeeded and left the Labour organizations free to devote their energies to the carrying out of a programme of Parliamentary ection. Labour made up its mind to mend men from its own ranks to the Legialature. It rosoived to be represented by its own and not by another clase. Constituencien were amall, and the mining, shearing, and maritime Labour elements were so comparativeiy large in the population of the colony that it only needed stemdy exertions in the constituencies to secure the ref. turn of a falr number of Labour membera. lssues upon which diferences existed in the Labour rank: were wiseiy subordinated to the one task of electing direct Labour men, and free traders, protectioniste, and aingle taxera united in securing that object. They succeeded to an extent which astounded the whole public of Australia. In fact, a peaceful revolution had been created in the [ra:liamentary poiltice of New South Wales. The success at frat seemed to be too great, and became, on that account, intoxicating and nomewhat embarrassing afterwards. They won uo ieas than 18 seats in Sydney alone, and emerged from the general election of June, 1891, 35 atrong, while 5 more neinbers were elected who called themselves Independents: with government having oniy 49 supporters, and an opposition numbering 60. ."M. A. D. 1891.-An ex-Governor's View of the Colony and its attitnde toward the "Mother Conntry."-" So far, with one solltary exception, I have heard no public utterance in Engiand that showed anything llke an adequate apprehenslon of the point of view of these Colonles with regsind to their own and imperial matters. That solitary exception is Lond Carrington. .. . Not long after his return from his tive years' governorship of New South Wales. he read before a general meeting of the Imperiai Institute a thoughtful and interesting summary of hls impressions of Australia - 'Austraila as he saw it.' 'Five years ago,' he said, 'I landed in Australia with my wifc and my chilidren. hardly knowing a slagle soul by sight in the whole country; my great deslre was to he free from prejudice and open to impressions.' Very quickly these impressions led him to see the magnitude of the differences between the soclai conditions of the two countries. 'A scattered popuiation, accordlng to European notions, in a vast country : a smafl proportion of that popula. tion settied upon the soli; freedom of mind and fiablts nurtured by more air, more sun, more space; Influence centred in Sydney and in other of the larger towns, but not in the thinlypoopied country districts-all are striking fealures of New South Wales. The most salicnt feature of ail was the power of growing and consclous stringth.' The actuai shape taken by this power didi not encape him. 'Men,' lie saw In titls new land. But within the last ten years public opinion has been ad. vancing, like overything else, by leape and bounda, add is mpinity becoming a very utrong "Juvenile" indeed, with a wifi of its own, and the Auatralian wili is a quention which has to be faced. . The most important part was his critleism of the Naval Defence Biil. This BIII . . . was passed promptly through ali the Austrailan Assemblies with the exception of Queensland, where it was defeated and oniy ultimately accepted under protest. .
Lori Carrington's treatment of tire subject, considering that the Bill was passed in New South Waies almost $x$ ithout comment, and that it was not till some time later that public opinion in that colony ripened in the mutter, shows a quickness at apprehending the reai drift of things which is indeed remarkahie. 'We all remember that troops were suddenly withdrawn from Australis some years ago. The Colonles asked for these troops to be allowed to rcmain on the condition that they were to pay for their maintenance, at any rate for a time. The Co lonial Office pointed out that the principle was ali wrong, and the late Lord Lython, Tory Sec retary of State for the Coionlen, mald: "A Colons which is once accustomed to depend on Imperit soidiers never grows up to vigorons manhomal.' What is wrong in the army is right in the nary and this coloniai maintenance problem is beling tried in Australia at the present time. This ar rangement is as foliows : - Seven ships bullt at the coat to the Engiish taxpayer of nearly a million sterling have arrived at sydney. Five of them are to be maintained at the cost of the Australians for ten years. Englani commisslons the other two in case of war. It somuds ail rigit. but will thls experiment succeed? Silps should have oniy one commander, i. e., the admirai, uni no ficet can exist under dual controi. But how can you have taxation, even voluntary taxation, without representation ? . . . And, to increase the difficuitles, the Coionial Office has acknowledged a ciaim of Admiral Fairfax to precedence over cverybody except the Crovernor of the colony in which he happens to be. . . . This claim. which shocked coioniai sentiment, was received with a shout of iaughter ali orer Australia, and is a dead letter and imposslble to be enforced.' "-F. Adams, The Australians, pp. 208-71.
