Lord Dufferin's Defence.

The two despatches of which we publish a synopsis in another column, may be regarded as presenting the best defence that could possibly be made of the high-handed act of proroguing Parliament on August 13th They are an able piece of special pleading—a web of rgument woven with painstaking elaboration. Whether or not they justify the Governor General's action in following the advice of his Ministers, it is certain they do nothing towards justifying the action of the Ministers themselves.

Lord Dufferin takes up a position which is certainly a novel one in the history of this controversy. He states in effect that it would have been un just to allow the House to proceed to business, because of the absence of Ministerial supporters; that it could not be adjourned; that therefore he prorogued it for a sufficient time to allow the members to be called to gether; and that then the Royal Commission came up as a separate matter, to fill up the time and to allow John A. a chance of saying something on his side of the question Now we think this way of putting it will surprise most people. The plain inference to be drawn from the pro ceedings on the memorable thirteenth was that Parliament was prorogued with a distinct reference to the proceedings of the Royal Commissioners, and that as soon as their work was done, Parliament would be called together to consider it. Had Parliament been prorogued to a definite date, and for a few weeks, with an understanding that this was for the purpose of not taking the Ministry at a disadvantage, we v nture to think there would not have been such widespread dissatisfaction with Lord Dufferin's proceedings though many would have considered he was dealing very tenderly with the Ministry. And there would still have been ample opportunity for issuing a Royal Commission subsequently, if his Excellency found there was danger of the enquiry dropping through. It is noticeable that in speaking of the Commission Lord Dufferin does not meet the strong objection that it was the creation and the creature of the very men nal was to try. As the tribuexistence by him, of course he could not very well deal with this point Looking at the matter, as he does, from the Crown's point of view, it is natural that he could not see the force of this objection.

The despatches help to show very clearly the masterly cunning with which Sir John has carried out his policy of delay, which commenced with the obstructions in passing the Oaths Bill. Notice the significant statement in the first despatch: "My law advisers called my attention to the possibility of the Bill being illegal. Sir John A. was one of these, and knew well enough that when he did this, the Governor General had no option but to submit the matter to the home authorities; and the disall awance by cable just came in opportunely to help John A. s. p.ans. Strange coincidence, was it not? The Governor admits that the publication of McMullan's letters on July 18th made some immediate action necessary; and a Minister desirous of immediate Parliamentary enquiry could at once have made arrangements for a full attendance of represents tives, if not on the 13th, very soon afterwards. If even the full six weeks' notice of the assembling of Parliament had been given a few days after July 18th, only three weeks' delay would have occurred. The excuse of making the interval ten weeks for the purpose of rolling two sessions into near is a contemp. option but to submit the matter ten weeks for the purpose of rolling two sessions into one is a contemp tible one in view of the vitally im two sessions into one is a contemptible one in view of the vitally important matter at stake—and of poor John A's intense anxiety to have his character cleared! Lord Dufferin's ingenious special pleading cannot disguise the fact that the issuing of the Royal Commission was a dodge for the double purpose of delay and whitewashing; arranged at the instance of the accused Ministry; though we are quite ready to believe that the Earl persuaded himself, with the help of John A., that it was something quite different.

We see that the Ministerial papers are already trying to twist Earl Kimberley's despatch into an approval of the course of the Dominion Ministry as well as of the Governor.

The Mail says:

The opinion which sustains Earl Dufficie of the Course of the Co

The opinion which sustains Earl Dufferin and the Government on the Constitutional question is that of the foremost constitutionalist of the age.

Now it will be observed that Lord Kimberly expressly guards against anything like an approval of the Do-minion Ministry. He says, speaking for Her Majesty's Government:

It is not their duty to express any opinion up on the particular measures adopted on the advice of your responsible Ministers, but they fully approve your having acted in these matters in accordance with Constitutional usage.

dance with Constitutional usage.

Lord Dufferin's despatches only attempt to justify his own individual action. With the action of the Ministry Parliament alone has to deal, and Lord Dufferin knows what is due to his own position too well to attempt a defence of his incriminated Ministers, though he comes awkwardly near it sometimes. This attempt of the Tory journals to make capital out of the despatches for their own cause is natural, but will be unsuccessful.

The Rival Clansmen:

A Scottish Vendetta. CHAPTER IV.

CHAPTER IV.

HECTOR AND FLORA PRISONERS—THE WITCH

OF BEN LAIR—A DARK PROSPECT.

In the dim light it was distinctly outlined, and appeared to be an eld woman; but it was impossible to distinguish features. A long scarlet cloak hung from her shoulders; her hair fell in heavy white ringlets down her back; and her head was partly covered by a small white napkin fastened under the chin, from beneath which a pair of glittering black eyes shone out fiercely. A long staff was grasped in her right hand by the middle, held at arm's length, and with one end resting on the ground. Silently, strangely, and mysteriously did she appear before them, and so like a visitant from some other region did she seem, that the party involuntarily came to a standstill when she made her appearance.

rance.

Hector was exercising himself wondering who the strange being might be, when suddenly she made snother movement towards them, and the clansmen to whom the former was bound at once turned and rushed behind Cameron, dragging their prisoner with them, and with their teeth chattering between each word, and with their hair on end with superstitions fear, they shouted—

'The Witch of Ben Lair! The Witch of Ben Lair!"

"Ay," exclaimed the woman, again halting, and leaning her staff on the greund; "and who may they be who run at the sight of the Witch of Ben Lair?"

The words were in Gaelic, spoken in a sharp, broken voice, but with an unmistakable Lowiand accent.

"Come away," shouted Cameron, impatiently, to those who had fled behind him. "Why be afraid of an old hag like this?"

"Whose voice is that I hear?" ex-

"Whose voice is that I hear?" exclaimed the strange woman, excitedly and with great vehemence. "I should know that voice. Is it Donald Cameron, the Chief of Droghdairch, who calls me a hag? Ha! I thought so."

As she spoke she strode forward within a few feet of Cameron, who stood glaring at her in apparent amezement and quaking fear; then, halting, she raised her body to its full height, and extending the stick towards him in her left hand, and gesticulating wildly with her right, she continued—

"Ha! I thought I could not be mistaken. I have reason to know and remember that voice—the voice of a black-hearted villain—a robber of joy, of hope, of virtue, of innocence, and of life—a double dyed villain. And so we have met again. I feared that we were to meet no more, and least of all in this glado—on-this spot. Do you remember perjured villain? Do you remember perjured villain? Do you remember this date twenty years ago? Do you remember your solemn oath, broken and flung aside? You cannot have forgotten it, and you never will. Neither will I over forget it, but shall bring evidence of your perfidy to crush you to the dust. Strange that fate—say Providence—should have directed both of us to the spot at the same time, on this night above all others. I thank God for it, and accept it as an omen from Heaven deciaring that right shall yet triumph against you, Donald Cameron, and that I shall be an agent in bringing that result about."

"Cease your raving, you vile hag, or I will ran my weapon through you," yelled against you, Donaid Cameron, and that I shall be an agent in bringing that regult about."

"Cease your raving, you vile hag, or I will run my weapon through you," yelled Cameron, savagely, but tremulously, as if he quaked with fear.

"You dare not, and you know it," was the reply. "You would fear to touch me lest Heaven should revolt against the sight of such a deed and strike you to the earth dead. Already on this spot has your hand been dyed with blood, and once is surely enough. Vile bag, you say. He, ha, how tongues can change! Yours has changed, Donaid Cameron, but mine has since ever I knew you, and will so long as I know you, speak of your character as it has been and is—as a bick-hearted scoundrel, one whom neither man nor woman should trust."

"Ome away, for God's sake, and let us get to our journey's end, exclaimed Cameron, attempting to go forward, "else this she devil will turn our heads."

"And who is this with you?" exclaimed the old woman, peering into the face of Ian, who started back and sought to cover his face with his hands.

"Ye needna, my lad," she exclaimed, much less excitedly, and in the broad Doric. "Ye're a Red McKenzie—ane o' a race that's gann doon the hill, an' weel deserve tae gang. An 'ye're in company wi' Donald Cameron. He's suiting' society for ye' an' for yer race. Gang wi' him, deal wi' him. An' this is some foul errant ye're on the nicht, or why wad this bonny quean an' tris strappin' youth be, the ane lookin' sae demure, an' the ither a bun prisoner? Gang yer wa's a'

"Curse you, cease," exclaimed Cameron, in a fury, springing forward and rausing his claymore.
The old woman stood unmoved, and Cameron lowered his weapon.

STEAM COOKER

The most complete steam cooking apparatus for general use ever invested, and where introduced supercedes all others. Made all sizes, and can be used over any heat that will boil water, is easy understood and does away entirely with heavy iron pots and kettles, substituting in their place light tin or earthcowner. It cooks meats without their coming in contact with the Cookers in use. Will also cook meats by steam directly applied if desired, a combination possessed by no other article of the kind. With racat it will cook at the same time as many as four varieties of vegetatles in separate compartments and also supply mure hot water for Coffee and feeding. The principle upon which meats, poultry and share cooked in this apparatus, is said to be the best known. The process renders the vinuals more tender, and retains those nourishing junes witch escape in vapor when boiled in the ordinary way. Besides the actual saving in weight and that so or the contact of the article for steaming vegetables, puddings, scalding fruits, steaming opsters, between the bove is now on view at Patented June 25th, 1872.
