Poetry. "Sometime" I said, as I looked abroad, From the narrow path I so long had trod.

"Sometime" I said to the oft request That I be found with the favored guest, "My place is now in a quiet room, But days are many, sometime I'll come."

"You have not. The laws of the body, its health and happiness, are as much God's laws as any other. For, if you ever had the right to injure and make yourself miserable, and you have turned my happy home into a house of mourning, and all for a man who is not worth a good woman's thought or care."

"I loved Roy. I love him now."

"Then you had better be praying for him than crying after him. I loved your mother. We lived twenty-two years together in peace and joy, but when it pleased God to take her from me, I did not make the house a valley of gloom and never end repining. I will have no more of it. Put the man out of your mind. It is ashamed to give such a scoundrel heart room."

"Father there are many that think Roy was pre-just, and the evidence against him was—"

"He was his own accuser to you."

"Aye, but having said so much, you to tell me all you know, father."

"Very well. Maybe it is right to do so. There is little good in saying smooth, gentle things when it is the surgeon's knife that is required. This, then, is the very truth, Helen. One day last autumn I met the widow Fyvie coming to the house for me. She had her little Andrew was dying and could not win away until he saw me. The poor lad was an 'innocent' in his father's hands, though he had little sense, everybody loved him. I went to his mother to his bedside. He said he had done a great sin, the poor fellow, and he wanted to go to the king's bed, and he wanted to be buried in the churchyard. He said that God would be angry with him. And when I asked him what the sin was, he confessed that he had watched the man who had taken a big silver penny from Roy not to tell any one about it. He said, too, that he was scared of Roy, who had threatened to have his own life if he said a word. He then told the big silver penny was laid and asked me to take it to the king's bed for him. It was his own fault, and he brought it to the king's bed, and he put it in my hand. And within a month his foot was sold to pay the obligations he had led. The buyer put the name of his sweetheart on him, and that was the end of the Bonnie Helen."

CHAPTER IV. Very sorrowfully to Helen Brodick the summer and autumn passed away. She hoped against hope for some word from her lover, but none came. At first she showed a wonder because she wished to be deceived. The next day it was known that Roy Anderson had gone away in the night. No one could find out where he had gone, and he had not written a word. The buyer put the name of his sweetheart on him, and that was the end of the Bonnie Helen.

letter or received one. He was evidently happy, and yet he had hardly a word to say to her. She understood when too late, that she had lost her influence over him. He came no longer to her with his little troubles and hopes and plans, and she asked herself sadly if Roy's love had been what she had thought for it.

"I loved Roy. I love him now."

"Then you had better be praying for him than crying after him. I loved your mother. CHAPTER V. In three weeks the new wife came home and vowed herself to be more than had been promised.

Helen did not find it hard to give her respect, then to love and make a confidant of her. She had all a good woman's sympathies, and she encouraged Helen to talk away her trouble about Roy to her very last thought. And in these conversations many a pleasant word was incidentally said by Roy Anderson—for his patient love his forbearance and the injuries done by those who still persisted in letting Roy badly used and convicted on the barest circumstantial evidence.

Woman to be obviously Will's champion. Mrs. Brodick however, was too wise. Her tactics were in a line far more natural and far less suspicious. Very pretty dress, and in one of them a dark blue merino with trimmings of the velvet—the girl looked so absolutely lovely that she would have been less than a woman if she had not desired to give others the joy of her beauty. So she was pleased to go with her stepmother to one of the musical reunions Brodick had declared to be "incredibly miserable" and wonderfully pleased to hear Will who was unconscious of her presence and therefore at his ease, sing in a voice clear and sweet as a silver bell. I learned to walk to the sound of the waves. The shingle beach along. The sea spray dashed against the pane.

That was my cradle song.

The sea lark's song was far before. The thrush's song to me and listens for the music of the sea!

To dragnets full of gleaming fish To watch ships on the far blue line Grow nearer in the noon;

To make friends with the storm in steel Of a city's din for me; My heart still longs and listens for The music of the sea!

These words, sung as Will could sing, came and went to Helen's heart, and it was worth something to see his wonder and delight when she stood in all her beauty and with sweet smiles praised his singing. It was just incredible joy to one heart, that musical reunion, and perhaps to more than one.

This happy experience was not difficult to renew, and so gradually the intimacy grew, for, as the elder preferred his almanac and his pipe to the high societies and readings and practices in the little village hall, Will had many opportunities of conveying his wife and daughter home and of lingering afterward for the exercise and a bit of supper. But he was far too shy to make the advances he longed to make, and Helen was not only shy, but proud and retiring. The humiliation of Roy's desertion was still unforgetting, and she surrounded herself with an atmosphere which repelled the jokes and the sympathy she feared and which the elderly race around her were always ready to express.

"Will is a good man," said Mrs. Brodick to her husband one night as they were having their confidential talk by the fire after Will had left and Helen had come to her room—"a good man, but he hasn't the spunk to ask Helen. Why, both of them—wonderfully shy! I can't, with all my planning and foreboding, bring them to question and answer. A pity! A pity! He is such a brave, true-hearted lad!"

"Good to the core," said Brodick. "He ought to have been a minister."

"Nothing of the kind," answered the elder's wife, with some warmth.

"He is far better in a boat. A pulpit would soon spoil the lad. You ken yourself, good man, for Roy Alex ander is just a miracle of vanity since he got to talking to people from above their heads. It is an unbelievable temptation to have the power of laying down the law to a crowd of men and women who cannot and dare not talk back to him. Ministers get beyond everybody and everything, and their mothers and wives and lairs should have prayers offered up for them. I am uncommon glad Will isn't a minister—one in a family is enough—and a good sailor or fisher makes the best of husbands. I ought to know." And she sent the words home with a smile that went like sunshine to the elder's heart. "I wish you could think of any way whatever, elder, to make the lad and lassie happy. The least little thing might do it."

"It will take the whole of an earthquake, I'm thinking," said the elder, "special if anyone interferes. I tell you this, Mattie; they who are to be man and wife get to be man and wife some way some day, and they who are not to be man and wife, are never man and wife—no, not even if the minister ties them together."

It was not an earthquake, but it was a great storm, that after many months of silent courtship finally broke down the wall of separation between Will and Helen. One cold, blowy night in January Will pushed open the door and said: "There is a boat on the reef outside. I can hear the men calling for help, and, oh, that is a fearful sound in the dark and the storm! I am going to them. Are you ready, elder?"

"Till you are married. Then you are some man's wife, first of all. I am not complaining. I am only looking forward a bit to the years that may come to me."

"Who are you going to marry?"

"The Rev. Mr. Sharp's mother—a donee, sensible woman, not very much younger than yourself. Her husband was my first captain. He made his living as a sailor. I have nothing to say. You be to do your own please."

"She is a good woman, and you will be the better of some one to talk with. I make no question but that she shall all of us be the happier for her in the house. It has been and will be the last year."

"Well, father, I have nothing to say. You be to do your own please."

COLONIAL CONFERENCE WILL BE HELD

London, June 26.—Despite the illness of the King, preparations for the Colonial Conference are being proceeded with it can be easily understood that a meeting of colonial statesmen in conjunction with the Imperial home advisers of his majesty, is not easily brought about.

It is stated that the Canadian contingent will return to the Dominion on July 3rd. They, of course, share in the general disappointment incident upon the postponement of the coronation.

Canada's share of coronation honors is favorably commented upon and the recipients of titles none the less are being warmly congratulated in Anglo-Saxon circles.

THE KING RECOVERS

London, June 26.—The following bulletin was issued at seven o'clock this evening: The King has had a fairly comfortable day, and the discomfort of the wound has been lessened.

It is stated that the progress of the King at a late hour last night continued to be satisfactory.

The Queen's anxiety in regard to His Majesty's condition has been materially allayed and she has determined to go to the Horse Guards parade today to attend a review by the Prince of Wales. It is now taken for granted that time is only necessary to assure the King's recovery and consequently there were but few persons outside the palace yesterday.

It is stated that the healing of the King's wound was allowed at first to take place at the surface, because in that case the opening would be closed and any matter that formed at the bottom of the wound would be imprisoned and would constitute a fresh attack.

The following is an authentic account of the origin of the attack. The King had been in fairly good health until the morning of the 11th, when he was seized with a severe attack of sciatica, and extremely nervous over the many weeks of the convalescence which had spoiled many of his plans.

Sir Francis Laking, who was consulted for several days, feared that this nervousness was the symptom of a possible collapse. He therefore warned the King, not to undertake the arduous tour at Aldershot on June 11th and 16th, but to rest in preparation for the great strain of his journey.

The King, however, persisted in sticking to the program, and moreover persisted in closely supervising all the details of the coronation. It was this interference, that was the cause of the attack.

That was on Saturday and the King was put to bed and remained there until Monday, when he was considerably better and was taken in a carriage to Windsor.

On Monday the King was taken to the hospital at Aldershot, where he was placed in a closed carriage. It became a serious problem how to control His Majesty's mental condition, for the conviction seized the King that he was fated to never wear the crown, in other words, that prophesy would be fulfilled that he would reign but would never be crowned.

He incessantly studied his own symptoms, and insisted that the doctors take his temperature frequently. Nevertheless he gained strength and the doctors hoped he would be able to undergo Thursday's engagements, providing all intercurrent engagements were cancelled. It was really against the physician's advice that the King returned to Aldershot yesterday.

It was the excitement of yesterday's great popular welcome that caused a revival of the serious abdominal trouble. The cholera morbus symptoms had well nigh disappeared, but there remained sufficient weakness to get up inflammation of the vermiform appendix and this morning there was a well developed case of appendicitis. A consultation was speedily held and it was quickly decided that the coronation ceremony could not take place at present and that a prompt operation was the only course available to save the King's life.

This decision was acted on with the utmost dispatch. The public were notified of the postponement, the announcement of which fell on the city like a bolt from the blue, and the necessary arrangements for the operation was quickly prepared.

THANKS TO BRIDGETOWN

It would only be fitting to express gratitude to the people of our central town, if their permission alone was granted to the farmers to hold their picnic without a pretence but when their people go to the trouble they have done to not only welcome the visitors, but to provide such a splendid program as was carried out yesterday in order to fill up every hour of the day and make it pleasant to all.

As a local representative of the Annapolis County F. A., the greatest courtesy and kindness have been shown in helping on with the arrangements.

Our security of funds would have seriously crippled our efforts had not the citizens of Bridgetown so generously provided the necessary amount for the public meeting in the afternoon. The kindness has been so general that it seems unnecessary to give any names, but we must mention particularly the indefatigable efforts of Mr. Arthur Marshall, Mayor of Bridgetown, in making the arrangements, and also thank Mr. Harvey who so well searched for the thickest tasks of collecting. I feel sure I echo the sentiments of all when I say "Thank you, citizens of Bridgetown, for your cordial reception."

Read what Mrs. Wile, of Lunenburg, has to say concerning Empire Liniment.

Dear Sir,—I have used your Empire Liniment and it has done wonders for me. I had catarrh of the worst kind and your liniment removed it. I also used your liniment for corns and pains of the soles of my feet, which were cured by using about a distance of two miles. You may see from the above that I have been benefited as I have been, and I can truthfully say that your liniment is the best on earth like the Empire Liniment.
