The Government has made some suggestions, but the problems created are almost devastating. When it comes to the fruit growing industry, another vital part of this riding, the cost of energy involved in transporting products to market is almost unbearable. There are a lot of cattle producers in my area and transportation is very costly. Again, that has been created by the Government, and the Government's programs have done nothing to recognize the needs of farmers in this area. I think it is a sad day when we in Canada cannot recognize that farming is one of our top priority areas. It is an area which could get many other sectors of a given riding rolling again and meeting the requirements, not only of this country but of many other countries as well.

I would also like to refer, Mr. Speaker, to another of the comments made by the Hon. Member for Kindersley-Lloydminster with regard to the west coast ports dispute. I know farmers across Canada were as concerned as everyone in this Party about that dispute, but I want to say that the farmers honestly want to treat those workers as fairly as they themselves want to be treated by this Government. It is because of the attitude of this Government toward working people, toward the farming community, toward regional areas, instead of working in a co-operative way, which has created the hardships that the average worker and the average farmer have to face here in Canada. The Hon. Member tried to point to this Party as not having any feelings for the farming community or for the workers in these areas. These workers did not create the problem. I must emphasize the fact that it was the employers who had those workers locked out. It was their decision to lock them out and create the problem that the farmers were faced with. So we in this Party have recognized both sides of the problem and I think we have dealt with it as responsibly as we could.

This Bill, Mr. Speaker, does not supply the kind of relief needed, and we feel that unless the Government recognizes the serious problems facing the farming community across Canada, we are going to be faced with some very, very serious bankruptcies. The Government has to recognize that in this industry they must have some long-term planning. There must be long-term financing available so that when the farmers are trying to regulate or plan the kinds of production they want to carry out and meet the needs of Canadians, they must be sure that the money will be available at stable interest rates so that they will not have to worry about a fluctuation in their costs of production. They also do not need the threat of a change in the Crow rate hanging over their heads.

Young farmers are not being encouraged to enter into the farming stream and to continue the tradition of earning their livelihoods in an orderly manner. I think the Government is treating problems in the farming community in the same manner as it has treated unemployment or any other problem. It has used a band-aid approach to a very serious problem. The Government should take its head out of the sand and recognize the needs of the farming community. It should bring forth a policy which helps not only the farming community but all other areas which feed into that system. If it does not do so, indeed there will be very serious problems within the community.

I have already singled out CP Rail. Ian Sinclair comes before the Government, and it dances to his tune. It danced to his tune when it brought in the six and five program, when the rail abandonments took place and when VIA Rail was discussed. The Government took it off its hands, at literally hundreds of millions of dollars of savings to the Company. In fact, the Company charged the Government an extra month's billing on the passenger operation. In other words, it charged its regular fee for the use of its tracks for 12 months, and added a thirteenth month for extra costs.

We sat in on Committee hearings and heard about this. We found that the company had not yet been audited and that some of the audits had not been done for two years. It seems that CP Rail can obtain the required moneys. Also it seems that we are coming into a rail expansion. Goodness knows it is needed to meet the needs of the farming community. It seems money is available while it is diverting funds, separating various groups away from the railway system and allowing the Government to carry the load in these areas. It is asking the Government to change the Crow agreement while the farming community has to pay the extra load.

There is little enough in the Bill without its creating an additional burden. The farming community cannot stand the changes the Government is anticipating. I believe the Conservative Party should also be putting pressure on the Government to ensure that the Crow rate is not changed and that it is protected in the interests of farming communities across Canada. This is true also in terms of the Atlantic Provinces. We have now discovered that any change in this regard could seriously affect eastern Canada, and that there are other areas which must be taken into consideration now. I say to Liberal Members who represent these areas that they should take a serious look at what is being put forward. There could be serious ramifications on top of what has already been put in place.

These are the types of problems faced by the farming community. We on this side of the House are not happy with this piece of legislation. We see it as a band-aid approach. We have no alternative but to support it, yet the fact remains, as a Member of the Conservative Party pointed out, that it is a Mickey Mouse piece of legislation which will not meet the needs or come anywhere close to helping the Canadian farming community. It will probably carry the load for a few who will qualify, but many will find, when they go to banks or credit unions to obtain money, that no money is available. I have talked with various farmers in my riding. They tell me that it is all very good that the legislation is there, but they ask how and when they can obtain money. They say, "I need it now. I have some planting to do, but there is no money available." What good is this piece of legislation? It is no better than the small business bond.

I had occasion to go into a bank with a small-businessman who was going out of business. I said to the banker, "Here is the legislation; you are supposed to help this man." He said, "I am sorry, but we do not have any money available." It is all very well to bring a piece of legislation before the House, to get it passed, and then to stand back and say that we have done our part. But, in the name of goodness, what is it doing to solve problems or to assist people when they need it? What is being done so that these people can survive, even possibly try to upgrade or keep up with the nurturing of their land? I would venture to say that across Canada today—and possibly many farmers could verify this—there are many hectares of farmland which are not being nurtured or have not received any type of fertilizer program. They are going an extra year without doing the fertilizing which they know should be done because they do not have the economics to carry it out. The country will suffer if the Government allows economics to interfere with the planning and development of our farming industry.

I urge the Government not to stop here. I urge Government Members to get out and visit farming areas across the land; they should meet with the farmers. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) and his group should be visiting them to see first-hand and to ensure that there are provisions to meet their needs. Then we could start in that sector to ensure that the economy begins to work a little better.

Canada has one of the greatest agricultural potentials of any country in the world. We have the expertise. Farmers are proud of what they are doing. All we require is a government willing to give the lead and the confidence for farmers to carry on in a constructive and orderly way. They should not be faced with the roadblocks the Government seems to throw in front of them at every turn as soon as they start to improve something or to produce. I urge the Government to rethink some of its policies. It should look toward developing, helping and assisting farming communities right across the country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since the Hon. Member referred to me in his speech and has some time remaining, I should like to ask him a question. Could he tell me why he and his Party voted against a doubling of the capital gains exemption on farmland from $100,000 to $200,000 in the Conservative budget of December 13? Why did they do that? I wonder if he would like to answer that question.

Mr. Parker: It was a regressive budget, and that is why we voted against it.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the debate on Bill C-134 which will provide some much-needed assistance to farmers. I would like to say much more at this time, but because of the hour may I call it ten o'clock and carry on the next day?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

THE ECONOMY—GOVERNMENT POLICY ON PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Bill Wright (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, on November 1 in this House, I asked the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) a question referring to a statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) who said, "We haven't been able to make it work—the free enterprise system. We've ended up with very high unemployment and very high inflation. We can't go back to what it was before. That means the Government is going to take a larger role in running institutions." But the Minister of Finance in his economic address, his non-budget, states in the third of his six principles that we must continue to rely primarily on the dynamism and creativity of the private sector as the engine of growth in Canada. I think it is well known in this House that the Minister of Finance had agreed with that statement of the Prime Minister. Suddenly he declares six principles that go directly against what the Prime Minister had been speaking about. I would like to review some of these principles.

First, the Minister of Finance said that we must continue to practice fiscal responsibility and that we must persist in restraining Government spending. But what do we have? We have a deficit that has risen from $10.5 billion as indicated in last November's budget, to $19.6 billion in the June budget and to $23.6 billion in the non-budget of October. The thinking is that the deficit will be $26 billion before we are through.

Why should we believe what the Minister of Finance is telling us? Spending is up 17 per cent this year. The deficit is up $4 billion in four months—not $4 billion in one year, but $4 billion in four months. The Government will not even tell us what the deficit will be next year because it is afraid to admit what it will amount to. One dollar out of every three dollars in tax money goes to service the interest on the deficit. The interest on the national debt is $16.7 billion alone. This is a ridiculous situation. Why should we believe that the Minister of Finance has suddenly done a complete turn around and is no longer espousing his socialist ways?

Second, the Minister of Finance said that we must not abandon the victims of the recession in the mistaken belief that such callous action might speed our recovery. What a bunch of bunk. We have 12.2 per cent unemployment, yet the Minister of Finance stands in this House and tells us that. We have 1.4 million people out of work. We have 500,000 more people out of work than last year. This represents a tax loss of $2 billion. Yet we hear the Minister of Finance standing up and saying that we are going to turn the economy around.

The Minister also stands up and says that we are going to provide $500 million to help 60,000 people. What the Minister does not tell us is that this does not mean 60,000 jobs for a year. They may be jobs for one day simply to put an individual back on unemployment insurance. The jobs could last longer, but we do not know that. There are not 60,000 jobs allocated. That was never intended, but that is what the Minister of Finance would like us to believe. I come now to the Minister's fifth principle. He said that must continue to develop effective mechanisms for consultation with the provinces. We all remember the Kirby Report which the Minister of Finance approved. We all have that report. It described how the Government would divide the provinces when the Constitution was to be discussed. And this is the Finance Minister who wants us to believe him? And how long ago did this Prime Minister say that co-operative federalism is dead because he did not trust the provinces. Yet the Minister of Finance stood up and said that he had the method of recovery in this country.

The sixth and most important point is that we must build on the spirit of the six and five program and implement an effective strategy for national recovery and economic development.

We all heard the Prime Minister a few weeks ago. In fact, one year ago we saw the geese flying across the television screen. A few weeks ago we had the lame duck flying across the television screen in the person of the Prime Minister. He said that Canadians should accept sacrifices. How many sacrifices is he accepting when every few weeks during the winter he flies down to the Caribbean to snorkle? He is not accepting any sacrifices.

Where was the Prime Minister in 1980 when we told him that the country was entering a recession? All he did was stand across the way and say that the Constitution is what we are interested in and what Canadians want. One million unemployed people later, he is still talking about it. We have seen no action from the Minister of Finance and no action from the Prime Minister.

The Minister of Finance tells us that we must adhere to the six and five program, but a few days before that program was announced he brought in a 10 per cent increase for the staff of all the Cabinet Ministers. They are not adhering to any program. The Government is giving us a high tax increase and a 40 per cent increase in UIC. About 500 CBC employees received an 11.5 per cent increase in wages. Where is the six and five program there? They are not adhering to the government program.

The real question is why we should believe anything the Minister of Finance says, or, for that matter, what his Parliamentary Secretary will say when he stands up.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, on occasion, we anticipate hearing from some speakers with some ideas, and that we will have to get out our hip waders just to survive. I have to say that the speech we have just heard is even worse than I had expected.

Today, we have a co-operative climate that exists between Government, business and labour; all working together to help rebuild the economy of this country. Let me give you some examples. The six and five program has been universally accepted by business, Government and ordinary people across this country. The $3,000 home mortgage grant has been universally accepted by the homebuilding industry. The 4 per cent interest reduction grants and the small business investment grants, along with the Small Business Bond have been widely accepted by Chambers of Commerce, the Canadian Federation of Independent Business and the Canadian Organization of Small Business. It is widely accepted that we should go out and put more money into the Farm Credit Corporation, and this was especially agreeable to the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. We have programs introduced by the June budget and the October statement which are productive sources of new jobs and new economic activity. The Hon. Member opposite has ignored all of these programs. In fact, the Hon. Member has followed a course of action that is currently typical of Tory tactics. He is creating fear and loathing and using personal attacks to substitute for logic and tough debate. An example of that kind of activity is the Tory Party's attack in the past year on FIRA. They have attacked FIRA with unrelenting hatred, so much so that when their leader and their finance critic realized what they were unleashing, they had to make a 180 degree turn and start supporting the agency again. They became too hypocritical.

I want to conclude by saying that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his speeches challenged us to attack our problems in the traditional Canadian way; through co-operation and working together. I would suggest to the Hon. Member that he lift his eyes and cease those negative attacks so that he may add some of his creative intelligence to solving the problems, instead of simply attacking personally and viciously.

GRAIN—LEVELS OF ADVANCE PAYMENTS. (B) POSSIBLE BENEFITS TO WESTERN COMMUNITIES

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Mr. Speaker, it was a very interesting exchange that we just witnessed. I will attempt to be reasonable in my submissions here this evening. I see the Parliamentary Secretary is leaving and I find that unfortunate because I had hoped he would stay and listen to some of my logic and tough debating skills with which I will make my case here this evening.

I had an opportunity in July, after having a discussion with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), and corresponding with him, to ask him a question in the House as to whether he would be prepared to raise the level of cash advances to prairie grain farmers. Cash advances are simply moneys advanced to prairie grain producers against their future sales. They are really advances against their own products—their own money.

The federal Government comes into play because it pays the interest on the money borrowed to pay the advances. The program was initiated for this back in 1957. It is a program which has worked very well. It has put money into farmers' pockets, enabling them to pay bills sooner than they would normally pay them if they had to wait for the sale of their products. This helped the whole community because it means that having cash in advance of their sales farmers are able to pay their taxes, repair bills, fuel bills, and those kinds of ordinary expenses incurred in the normal course of operating their farms.

We all know that the economic system is a circular one. What is an expense for one person then becomes income for someone else. As it goes through the system, that money is spent over and over again. If one wants to speak in economic terms, it is called the multiplier effect. If one looks at what goes on in the farming communities, and in other communities, one finds that farmers have a greater multiplying effect than those in most other industries. It simply means that when a dollar is put into a farmer's pocket, it is used more times. The program is essentially designed to put money into the hands of those in the farming community so that they can use it to pay their bills, and this in turn provides income to other sectors of the economy.

As I have said, this has worked very well in the past. There have been very few defaults and very few problems in collecting money once it is advanced. However, the program is now sadly outdated in terms of the amount of money available. I will just give a couple of figures to illustrate.

In 1980 the number of applicants amounted to a few more than 15,000. The number of dollars advanced was in the order of $61 million. If we look at the figures for 1981, we find that the number of applicants almost doubled, rising from 15,000 to 28,000. However, the amount of money advanced tripled, from $61 million to $205 million. This is an indicator, first of all, of not only how well received and well used the program is, but also an indicator that farmers were experiencing economic problems and needed some additional money to help pay some of their bills.

When the program was started in 1957, the cash advance limit was originally $5,000. It was increased once since then and is now set at $15,000. What we have suggested is that that limit be increased from $15,000 to $25,000, to $30,000 or to whatever figure is appropriate.

The cost to the federal treasury comes about because the Federal Government picks up the interest charges on the amount of money borrowed by the Canadian Wheat Board to make those cash advances. Admittedly, the federal Government will incur some additional costs, but let me point out to the Parliamentary Secretary that when that money is borrowed, it is borrowed by the Canadian Wheat Board on its behalf, and the Canadian Wheat Board, for the information of the Parliamentary Secretary and those who are interested, borrows money at the prime rate minus a quarter of one per cent. I know of no one else in this country who borrows money at the prime rate minus any figure. Therefore, because of the favourable financial position of the Wheat Board, it is able to borrow money more cheaply than the Government and more cheaply than producers. That is a good, healthy, sound reason why, by increasing those levels of cash advances, the extra interest will not hurt the federal Government as much as one might suppose.

Aside from that fact, I would submit that the additional cost is well worth it because in hard economic times that money is not hoarded by farmers but, rather, is spent and respent, creating additional economic activity, which is what we are attempting to do by Bill C-134, which we just finished discussing this evening. It is designed to help farmers meet some of their financial commitments. That is precisely what increasing the level of cash advances would do.

I have received letters from several farm organizations across the prairies, as I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary has, suggesting that the limit be raised from $10,000 to $50,000. I suspect that is probably too much to ask, but the Government could surely consider increasing the limit from $15,000 to $25,000. After all, in the same period of time, the Government has increased the levy against producers who are in the Western Grains Stabilization Fund. The amount has been doubled. It has gone from a maximum of $500 to $900 this year and it is about to go up to $1,200, so it has more than doubled in the period of time that the cash advance program has remained the same.

As spokesman on the Canadian Wheat Board for this Party I offered the Minister of Transport an arrangement whereby we would very quickly pass the amendment that would be required to the Act. We would not hold up debate and would not put up a lot of speakers so that it could go through very quickly. This matter was considered to be very urgent last year, on July 30, when I first posed the question. That was before the start of the new crop year. It is equally urgent now, because farmers are facing a very tough winter. Although the additional cash advances would not be totally utilized this year as a lot of farmers have already delivered grain, against which those cash advances would have to be deducted, the program would still be well received. As I have pointed out, the Program has been very well run in the past. Losses have been minimal.

I hope the Parliamentary Secretary will take these things into consideration and will make the positive announcement tonight that the Government has considered our offer. I hope he will be able to tell us when it is prepared to bring the legislation forward. We will not hold it up, Mr. Speaker. In that way we will be able to increase the level of cash advances and in this way not only the Canadian farmer but the whole Canadian economy will benefit.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member's interest in this subject is well-known in the House. I applaud him for making a reasonable case on behalf of the western farmer. As one who was born, raised and lived for 18 years on a farm in Saskatchewan, I know how tough it is to find the cash in advance for the purchase of new machinery, to put in crops and even to buy groceries. I appreciate the co-operative spirit in which the Hon. Member presented his argument—unlike the previous speaker. I thank him for that.

It is very clear that farmers are making good use of the opportunities available under the Prairie Grain Advance Payments Act. The number of producers who qualify for the maximum advance of $15,000 is increasing, as the Hon. Member pointed out tonight. Therefore, it is reasonable to suggest that the maximum be increased, especially at a time when farmers are experiencing higher cash requirements. As the Minister said in his answer on July 30, this question was considered by his colleagues and a decision was deferred until the question could be put in "the wider context of western grain initiatives".

One of the factors which must clearly be advanced in times of restraint, is the cost. In 1981-82, the cost was $12.7 million. The Hon. Member suggested that the advance payments should be increased to $25,000 or $30,000. My calculations show that the resulting cost would probably be over $25 million. I would have appreciated it if the Hon. Member had suggested where the Government would find this additional money in a time of high deficit. Raising the maximum would obviously add to the cost, although lower interest rates could make a positive contribution.

Until now there has been no further consideration of the matter, but the Hon. Member can be assured of the Government's active interest. In fact, I understand that the Hon. Member has a very positive letter from the Minister of State in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board, so he knows there is a positive disposition on the part of the Government toward his proposal.

INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION—DELAY IN APPOINTING CANADIAN COMMISSIONER

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak briefly about the International Joint Commission and the serious problems it is confronting. The studies of the Commission are crucial to the people of my riding in Erie which is located in the heart of the Great Lakes basin. Although much work has been done and much concern expressed, the health and well-being of my constituents and Canadians continues to be threatened by chemical pollution in Lake Erie, Lake Ontario and the Niagara and St. Clair Rivers.

The stated purpose of the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement of 1978 is "to restore and maintain the chemical, physical and biological integrity of the waters of the Great Lakes basin ecosystem." This is indeed an ambitious statement. To comprehend the vast extent of the problem confronting the commission, it is only necessary to look at the following statistics.

The Great Lakes Basin is a highly developed industrial and agricultural region. The present population of 37 million people should increase to 60 million by the year 2020. This increased urban growth will engender accompanying industrial development. Both of these phenomena mean that there will be vastly increased stresses on all the components of the ecosystem.

Not only are the Great Lakes presently being overloaded with garbage at a rate much more than they can handle right now, but the amount of effluent both from industrial and human sources is expected to greatly increase in the new few years. This in itself would be serious enough for the Government of one country to deal with. But here we have two countries, both of which have different priorities and different policies. The need for co-operation and compromise has never been greater, in order to come to agreement on protective and preventative measures which are satisfactory to both parties.

Currently in the Great Lakes Basin, approximately 800 major municipal and industrial facilities are dumping hazardous wastes into the Great Lakes. Smaller contributors number in the thousands. With input of toxic chemicals, phosphorous residues from detergents and fertilizers and superficially treated inflow from municipal sewage treatment plants, it is unlikely that the original state of the Great Lakes can ever be restored.

However, a continued degradation of Great Lakes water quality cannot be tolerated. Reasonable objectives are attainable nevertheless. These include reversal of the over-all long-term trend of water pollution, enabling inhabitants of the area to drink clean water, swim without danger of contamination and to enjoy the recreational resources of the lakes, including fishing and boating. The Boundary Waters Treaty states that those waters whose shoreline or banks are shared by the two countries shall not be polluted on either side to the injury of health or property on the other.

I am concerned, as a representative in Ottawa of a constituency bordering on one of the Great Lakes that little action is being taken to be sure that both parties adhere to the terms of the treaty. Certain areas have been, and continue to be identified by the commission as being environmental or human health concerns.

In looking at the August 1982 report of the International Joint Commission, I note that there are 24 different areas which have been identified as "problem areas". In many of these areas, especially the Niagara and St. Clair Rivers, much more work needs to be done. As stated in the report, "there is little value in continuing to identify such areas if effective remedial efforts are not put into place".

The environmental baseline report of the Niagara River of November 1981 states that the Niagara River has been identified as the major source of numerous trace metals and organic compounds to Lake Ontario. Less than 1 per cent of the loadings of these substances to the river can be accounted for from Canadian sources. The Niagara River is a primary source of the PCBs and the Mirex which have been found in fish and in herring gulls throughout Lake Ontario.

Obviously in this case we, the Canadians, are the ones being injured by pollution from American sources. This situation of course, can no longer be tolerated. Such sources of pollution as the Hooker Chemical Corporation and the municipal wastewater treatment plant in Niagara Falls, New York, pour volumes of pollutants into the river equal to or greater than the total amount coming from Canadian sources.

Given the inequity of this situation we, as concerned representatives of the people of this land, must do everything in our power to convince the Reagan administration that this issue must be dealth with in a firm and conclusive manner before it is too late. Only by co-operation with the United States can this problem be solved. Given the small percentage of the total load of chemicals emanating from Canada, unilateral action on our part seems almost ridiculous—not that our own industries are entirely innocent. I am sure there exists blatant examples of environmental misconduct among Canadian companies as well.

In summary, it is time to stop talking and begin acting. There are just too many 40-page descriptions of the callous destruction of our most valuable heritage, the Great Lakes. We need 40-page solutions outlining in detail the method of ameliorating this unfortunate situation in order that our descendants may enjoy the same fresh, clear, safe waters that our ancestors enjoyed.

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): I thank the Hon. Member for his support of the Government position on pollution, especially vis à vis our relations with the United States. I think on this subject there is a communion of ideas between the Hon. Member and Members of this side. I know the Hon. Member is very concerned about the appointment of a permanent president to the International Joint Commission, and I would like to tell him that we consider this important institution as one of our special priorities in the future to make sure we have a new Chairman appointed. I want to tell the Hon. Member the Canadian Government has traditionally approached the filling of IJC positions with seriousness and deliberation. That is the explanation for the delay. Distinguished Canadians such as Stuart Hodgson, Gerald McNaughton, Louis Robichaud and Maxwell Cohen have served as Canadian Chairmen of that Commission and we want the Commission to play a major role in our relations with the United States.

In the last few weeks we have had many discussions with the United States. The Secretary of State, George Shultz, came to Canada and had lengthy discussions with our Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). We have conveyed to him our willingness to co-operate in order to make sure we solve these environment problems. With the suggestions of the Hon. Member, and with the will, not only in Canada but in the Reagan administration, I am sure we can achieve the goals that he has set. I want to assure the Hon. Member we will need his support as this fight is going to be a very difficult one, because it involves a lot of money and goodwill. We will need his support and the support of all the Hon. Members from his side of the House. The Government is very well committed to combat pollution, to make sure the environment is safe in the long term, whether it involves acid rain or water pollution. You can be sure we will do everything in our power to make sure that happens.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 43

[English]

COMMISSIONS AND INQUIRIES

SUGGESTED COMPOSITION

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I note with approval that the Government is planning a Royal Commission to inquire into the prospects for the Canadian economy. Rumour has it that members of that commission will include the Hon. Donald Macdonald, one of the architects of the problem in the first place, and Ian Stewart, the right hand man and the fall-guy for the whole massive failure, the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso (Mr. MacEachen).

The precedent of "set a thief to catch a thief" is not a new one and has a long and varied history. The Government could perhaps do worse than follow such a policy. At least it should be spared the embarrassment of having its own policies called into question. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Government, following the same sort of reasoning as the foregoing, encourage municipalities across the country to appoint to their police commissions only practising criminals and to appoint only known polluters to probe environmental hazards.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

CALL FOR RECOGNITION OF SPANISH WAR VETERANS

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on an important matter of national honour. Considering recent events in Spain, and in view of the as yet officially unrecognized contribution and sacrifices of a number of Canadians to the cause of democracy in that land, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House express its long overdue appreciation and recognition of the historic contribution to the cause of democracy made by members of the MacKenzie-Papineau Battalion and other Canadian veterans of the Spanish War of 1936-39, and extend an invitation to representatives of their few surviving veterans to participate officially in and take an appropriate place of honour at our national Remembrance Day observance in Ottawa this year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CALL FOR INQUIRY INTO WEST COAST PORTS SITUATION

Mr. Chuck Cook (North Vancouver-Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a continuing matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Bill C-137 is not the answer to the festering labour and management problems of the Ports of British Columbia. What is desperately needed is an industrial inquiry commission to determine the facts of the waterfront that have caused 13 years of continual strife. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich (Mr. Munro):

That the Minister of Labour immediately appoint an industrial inquiry commission with very broad powers to study labour and management at the west coast ports and report its findings back to this House within one year.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

IDENTIFICATION OF MANIPULATIVE ELITE

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, in order that Canadians might know who really runs their country, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for North Vancouver-Burnaby (Mr. Cook):

WIFE-BEATING—GOVERNMENT BLAMED FOR INACTION IN SETTLING PROBLEM

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, it is now five months since the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs recommended that the federal government subsidize a federal-provincial conference designed to deal with and alleviate the problems of battered wives. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Member for Ontario (Mr. Fennell):

That the House censure the federal Cabinet for its failure to act on this very important recommendation.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—CONDEMNATION OF GOVERNMENT

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, this morning Canada woke to the sad news that it has the worst unemployment in 50 years. There are 1,400,000 out of work, 12.7 per cent of the work force. The young unemployed represent 21 per cent. It is a national disgrace. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer):

That this House condemn the Government for its callous neglect of the economy over the past 14 years and suggest that it stop listening to the Coutts, Davies and Pitfields of the world and start listening to and encouraging the business people, farmers, young people and the labourers of Canada who love this country and despise what the present administration is doing to it and their future.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE LEADER OF THE OPPOSITION

SPEECHES TO ANGLOPHONES AND FRANCOPHONES

Mr. Dennis Dawson (Louis-Hébert): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Since the Hon. Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), contrary to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) and the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent), has once again demonstrated his hypocrisy by making two different statements in his speech to the nation, one for English Canada and another for Quebec, and because he stated on one network that Quebec is receiving too much money and on the other, not enough, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Longueuil (Mr. Olivier):

That the House condemn once again the Leader of the Progressive Conservative Party for his intellectual dishonesty, urge him to show at least the courage of the hon. member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) who, although he is both anti-bilingualism and anti-French Canadian, never speaks from both sides of his mouth——and ask this House to condemn the Conservative Leader's new habit of speaking out of both sides of his mouth and wish that he would go back to his old habit of putting his foot in it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion? The Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, when there has been unparliamentary language used in this period—

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: —an objection must be raised immediately. In listening to the French translation channel, I heard the words "intentionally dishonest" attributed to the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition. If that translation was—

Madam Speaker: I thought the Hon. Member was debating the motion. I suppose that he is rising on a point of order. I will listen to his point of order later on because, as he knows, we must proceed with Motions under Standing Order 43 and then proceed to the Question Period. If the Hon. Member has a point of order to raise, I can hear him later.

Mr. Nielsen: Your Honour should hear it now.

Madam Speaker: No, the rule under the practice of this House is that the Speaker neither entertains points of order nor questions of privilege at these particular times. However, I can hear them later on.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, in the meantime, could I be provided with an accurate text of the motion just moved?

Some Hon. Members: Sure.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE ECONOMY

REPORTED COMPOSITION OF PROPOSED ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of very urgent and pressing necessity. Whereas Canadians from coast to coast would no doubt agree the key to economic recovery lies in appointing yet another Royal Commission to study the economy, and whereas the federal Liberals, ever attuned to meeting head on the problems facing Canada, are reported to be considering such a commission, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That this House commend the Government for hiring Liberal exhaustees, Donald Macdonald and Ian Stewart, to study the mess they have created over the past decade and urge the Government to hire the hundreds of thousands of remaining exhaustees as permanent staff of the commission.

HUMAN RIGHTS

DISCRIMINATORY LIST COMPILED BY QUEBEC PÉQUISTE GOVERNMENT

Mr. Marcel Roy (Laval): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43, I wish to draw the attention of my colleagues in this House to a serious injustice that has been perpetrated against a group of Canadians living in Quebec. I am referring to the discriminatory black list of ethnic groups prepared by the Parti Québécois government, which unfortunately reflects the kind of society that government wishes to establish, a society in which there is no salvation for people who do not fit into the PQ plan, whose goal is to separate Quebec from Canada. The effect of this action is divisive, it generates hate and it is against the objectives pursued by the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. I move, seconded by the Members for Rosedale and Hamilton Mountain (Messrs. Crombie and Deans):

That the act of preparing this blacklist is repugnant, unjust, provocative and worthy of censure, and goes against the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We wish to remind this group of citizens in Quebec that they are full-fledged Canadians.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

LABOUR CONDITIONS

INCREASE IN UNEMPLOYMENT—REQUEST FOR CHANGES IN GOVERNMENT POLICY

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. A year ago I asked the Government, when the unemployment rate was at 8.3 per cent, what it would do to stimulate employment. At that time I was advised by the Government that I should await the budget of the Minister of Finance in that November because it would contain initiatives to stimulate employment. History has shown us that, not only did it not create any employment initiatives, indeed the budget was instrumental in causing the historic high unemployment rates which we have this morning.

Last week the new Minister of Finance announced a job creation program which would create 60,000 jobs. In light of this morning's statistics on unemployment levels in the country, I would like to ask the Minister of Finance what changes he is considering to his statement of last week.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, indeed the figures released this morning are very distressing. However, I remind the Hon. Member that in my statement of last week I indicated that we should expect such high levels of unemployment over the next while, that unemployment will only gradually decline over next year, 1983, and that we should take all necessary steps to help those most in need during that particular period. Although the economy will know recovery during 1983, the impact on unemployment will only be slow and gradual.

I remind the Hon. Member that, contrary to his initial statement, a number of measures were contained in both the November and the June budgets to help create jobs. As a matter of fact, we allocated $1.2 billion in job creation programs during that period. On top of this I announced last week a $1.1 billion program of direct and indirect job creation which should contribute toward alleviating this particular problem. However, I also indicated that we were under no illusion that this would have a dramatic impact on the unemployment level. That will only take place with a general recovery and with a resurgence of activity both in Canada and internationally. I remind the Hon. Member that unemployment at the present time is high in all industrialized countries by historical standards, and that we will pursue very actively our program of economic recovery.

Mr. Crombie: I take it from the response that the Minister is saying that there will not be any change in the Government's program in light of the statistics this morning.

ASSISTANCE FOR YOUNG UNEMPLOYED

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister who speaks for the Minister of State for Social Development in the other place, I will direct my next question to the Minister of Finance. The major thrust of the program of the Minister of Finance as stated last week was the creation of 60,000 jobs primarily aimed for those coming off unemployment insurance.

I am sure the Minister of Finance is aware that the unemployment level this morning for people between the ages of 15 and 24, the majority of whom are not the so-called exhaustees of unemployment insurance, stands at 21 per cent. I would like to ask the Minister if he has any specific program to help these people.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that we do in fact have a number of programs that are directed to helping young people get first-time employment in the job market. The Canada Community Development Projects, as I have said in the House before, are now coming onstream and will provide, between now and Christmas, close to 60,000 new jobs. About 40 per cent of those jobs will go to people under the age of 24 in terms of direct employment.

We introduced a program last summer whereby we provide a subsidy of up to $2 an hour to employers under the Program for the Employment Disadvantaged in order to attract young people into the job market and give them first-time job experience.

We have those two programs in place, as well as a number of others related to student employment, and a new Outreach Program which provides proper counselling and guidance for young people so that they can go into the training programs which we are also introducing this year. We really have a three-pronged approach to try to address the problems of young people. We recognize it to be one of the very serious pressure points in the over-all employment picture.

Mr. Crombie: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Employment and Immigration has the same position as the Minister of Finance, and that is not to make any changes in light of the statistics this morning.

REGIONAL UNEMPLOYMENT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I have another supplementary question for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion. The Canadian people may find more hope from him than from the other two. The Minister is responsible for the old regional economic development programs. He might be interested to know this morning that Prince George-Peace River now has an unemployment rate of 18.9 per cent. It was 9.1 per cent a year ago. A year ago Sault Ste. Marie had an unemployment rate of 6 per cent. It now has an unemployment rate of 17 per cent. Hamilton—

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Crombie: The people in Hamilton want an answer to this question.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crombie: The unemployment rate in Hamilton has gone from 7.1 per cent to 14.3 per cent. The Gaspé has gone from 16.2 per cent to 22.4 per cent. The Annapolis Valley has gone from 7.9 per cent to 13.5 per cent. It has doubled in a year. Clearly—

Madam Speaker: Order. I am awfully sorry. The Hon. Member is on his second supplementary. That second supplementary is very long and he still has another preamble. His enumeration of statistics has nothing to do with asking the question.

Mr. Crombie: Thank you very much, Madam Speaker. In light of those statistics, it is clear that the Government's programs have not worked. I would like to ask the Minister what new intiatives he is going to take.

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First of all, Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is talking only about high unemployment figures. I notice that he has not mentioned the substantial trade surplus figures which were also announced in the last couple of days. In spite of a lot of objections from some of colleagues on his side of the House with regard to the Export Development Corporation, this Government made a decision two years ago to get into the export subsidy business to create jobs for Canadians right across the country. That is one of the reasons why we have a record trade surplus in Canada this year.

IMMIGRATION

RETENTION OF FOREIGN WORKERS BY ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I would like to get down to some specifics. Does the Minister know that Atomic Energy is laying off qualified Canadians while at the same time keeping foreigners on work permits on staff? May I ask the Minister if he will investigate this matter as it does not do much to encourage Canadians to trust this administration?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I am always prepared to investigate any matter that is brought forward by a Member of Parliament. The Hon. Member, being an immigration critic in this House, should know full well that we have established a very firm policy. As far as employment is concerned, the first choice and opportunity for any job goes to a Canadian. We do not authorize any employment or immigration visa until an employer has tested right across Canada to see if there is an available Canadian for the job. In fact, when the immigration levels were established just last week, we put a total restriction on workers from overseas to ensure that Canadian workers have the first chance. This demonstrates that we are giving encouragement to Canadians to get those jobs first.

Mr. McDermid: The Minister did not answer the question as to whether he will investigate that claim.

EMPLOYMENT OF NON-NATIONALS BY PETRO-CANADA

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I want to go on. I was interested in the Minister's comments. While he is at it, will the Minister investigate why his Department allowed workers to come from the southern United States into Montreal to do a clean-up job at PetroCan's refinery in Montreal, when equipment and trained Canadian manpower were available to do the job, in fact in Sarnia, Ontario? This Government asks for trust while these trained Canadians stand by waiting for employment. It allows foreigners to come in on work permits and do jobs Canadians are trained, willing and able to do. Will he investigate that particular situation? Both of these involve Crown corporations.

• (1125)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I think it would be a serious mistake for the Hon. Member to take one or two cases where he may have information and generalize a total policy. He knows full well, and we have examined the issue many times in committees of this House, that we have established a very firm policy concerning work permits which are not given to outside workers if there is a Canadian available for the job. If there have been transgressions against that policy, specific circumstances, I will look into them and correct them, but the general policy holds true that Canadians get the first opportunity.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

REPORTED BREAK-IN AT DEPARTMENT HEADQUARTERS

Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Will the Minister confirm that the RCMP are investigating, or have investigated, a break-in at his Department in Place Du Portage over the past weekend and, if so, will he tell this House if the confidential papers concerning the PetroCan takeover of BP retail outlets are held in the area where the break-in occurred and, if they are, will he assure us they were not tampered with in any way during that break-in?

REPORTED APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance. Unemployment today is up again at 1.4 million. This is the same level as for fully one-half of the years of the Great Depression. The response of the Government seems to be to appoint a commission of inquiry into economic matters. How can the Minister justify the appointment of the same people who got us into this economic mess, as a substitute for real economic strategy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, obviously, I have no comment to make on the speculation to which the Hon. Member refers, but I will refer him to the fact that, for 12 weeks in a row now, we have seen a decline in the bank rate. We have also seen a decline in the inflation rate. Which will lead, as it has led in the past, to lower interest rates. It will help stimulate business in this country, it will help the people with mortgages, and it will help the construction industry. I remind him that the housing industry association is now predicting some 150,000 housing starts next year, compared to much lower rates this year. So there are hopeful times on the horizon. The oil and gas industry has forecast a very good year in 1983. Some even predict it will be a better year in 1983 than the record year in 1980.

My consultations in the United States indicate that investment houses there, for instance, foresee a better year for Canadian oil and gas in 1983 than in the U.S.

The Hon. Member asks about unemployment. Indeed, this is going to create jobs for Canadians. If the oil and gas industry, and the housing industry keep on, as is being forecast by the industries themselves, that is going to create jobs. We are going to generate jobs by lower interest rates and more activity in the private sector. That is what we need, jobs of a permanent nature. We will do our best as a Government to help those who are in need, and to create temporary jobs to ease us over this extremely difficult period. But things are happening at the present time which are encouraging.

ECONOMIC STRATEGY

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, the Minister seems to describe as signs of recovery those which are indicators of the recession. An official of the Department of Employment has indicated that half the jobs lost over the last year are gone forever, yet the Government's response in the Minister's economic statement has been the NEED Program which will simply recycle people back into the unemployment insurance system after 20 weeks of work, while Unemployment Insurance Premiums go up, which is a drag on the economy. When is the Minister going to adopt an economic strategy which really works for people, rather than continuing to dampen the economy?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I covered that quite extensively in my statement of last week and I invite my hon. friend to read it if he did not listen to it at that time. I indicated at that time there were a number of measures the Government could take, and was taking, to help those most in need in this difficult time, but the thrust of my economic statement and the thrust of the economic policy of this Government is to create the environment whereby the private sector is going to be the engine of the recovery. This is what we have been working on ever since my predecessor introduced the six and five program on June 28 of this year.

I wish the Hon. Member's party would support that program because it has produced very good effects—

Mr. Deans: More unemployment.

Mr. Lalonde: —and it will produce even better effects. As far as the broad issue is concerned, I remind my hon. friend that, even in the United States, and in Europe at the present time they are also experiencing a recession. There are 30 million unemployed in the OECD countries at the present time. We are part of this very difficult world we are living in, and we will do everything we can to make sure that Canada is not going to suffer as much as it could otherwise.

JUSTIFICATION FOR GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, I wonder how the Minister can justify a Canada which has become a nation of part-time workers, a Canada in which we have lost 500,000 permanent jobs, a Canada in which job creation means 20 weeks of work to requalify for unemployment insurance—when people need permanent full-time work? How can Canadians trust a Government that acts like that?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, we are not trying to justify the situation but to correct it. That is the government's role, and that is what we are trying to do. We are trying to use all the resources at our disposal and those we can develop with the private sector, labour and management and the provincial governments, so that Canada will experience the economic recovery we all need. My hon. colleague should realize, however, that the present world situation is such that even the United States is experiencing the highest level of unemployment it has ever known. So that is the situation, and we will all have to make a joint effort to create an economic environment that will provide the necessary stimulation, instead of merely criticizing as the Hon. Member is doing.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

IMPACT OF BILL S-31 ON QUEBECAIR

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday, I think everyone in Quebec was able to watch the Quebec Minister of Transport make his statement on television, and my question to the minister is simple: Further to the introduction of Bill S-31 in the Senate, can the minister inform us whether or not this legislation will cause Quebecair to go bankrupt and whether the Quebec Minister of Transport has perhaps hit on this legislation as a way of extricating himself from a proposition in which the province of Quebec has invested tens of millions of dollars, and I am referring to Quebecair?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member is a very good investigator. It is public knowledge that well over a year ago, we were about to see the first stage of a merger between Nordair and Quebecair. At that time, the Quebec government intervened to prevent this, for political reasons, and invested $15 million in Quebecair which it considered a commercially viable operation, an investment which today does not have the same value as it did at the time. Now, the Quebec Minister of Transport is trying to blame us for the decision it made then, and the telegram he sent us today should be seen in that light. The fact is that there is no fundamental difference between Section 15(1) of the Aeronautics Act, which goes back to 1977 and prohibits transfer of control of an air carrier to a provincial government, and Bill S-31, which prohibits a provincial government from holding more than 10 per cent of the shares of an air or other carrier. There is no basic difference between the two sets of legislation.

LABOUR RELATIONS

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT END NORDAIR STRIKE

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, at this time last week the Minister of Transport said he would give us a status report on the Nordair strike. Given this morning's awful unemployment figures I think he will agree it is shameful that lack of action should keep out on the street those who want to work. Given the fact that the union has turned down the latest offer from Nordair by a majority of 83 per cent, when will the Government move to end this very lengthy and inconvenient work stoppage?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker I did indeed look into the matter and found out—and my hon. friend is aware of it as well, if not better than I am—that this is an intra-union debate. The same union represents both the white collar and the blue collar workers. Efforts have been made to decertify the union by an appeal to the Canada Labour Relations Board, which the Board refused. This is the imbroglio which has been created, and really the labour side should try to solve it because that is the key to the resolution of the problem itself.

APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR REQUESTED

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, perhaps I could put my supplementary to the Minister of Labour and ask him what is the holdup. Are the union leaders sacrificing the interests of the 550 clerical workers out there, or is Nordair deliberately prolonging the strike because it is not too profitable these days to fly these east-west routes? What is the holdup, and will the Minister appoint a mediator to clear it up?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, this is a situation we have been following with great interest and concern since the strike began on July 26. Three days ago a vote took place and the company's offer was rejected by the union. There are at the present time no indications that a mediator has been requested by both sides. But I can assure you, Madam Speaker, that mediator Waller stands available at any time, as soon as both sides request the services of a mediator.

PENITENTIARIES

AFTERMATH OF STONY MOUNTAIN HOSTAGE-TAKING INCIDENT

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Now that the hostage-taking incident in Stony Mountain Penitentiary is over, can the Minister bring the House up to date on what methods his officials will use in trying to get to the bottom of what is becoming a very, very serious problem in our prisons right across this country, that is, Madam Speaker, the whole question of over-crowding, and the question of safety, which you keep hearing more often than not from prison guards?

There seem to be two major concerns but, if there are others, can the Minister indicate them to the House, and what does his department intend to do about the matter?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I regard the hostage-taking incident at Stony Mountain as a serious one. A special inquiry is under way there now and I would not want to comment on the causes of this incident until I have that report. However, I think it would be reassuring for the Hon. Member opposite, and for all Members, to know that in spite of the tragic nature of so many of these hostage-taking incidents, and the number of them, there are fewer this year than there have been in any year since 1974. I do not accept the present situation as being desirable and I insist that we learn, and improve, on every occasion, our methods of dealing with hostage-taking incidents.

I do not think it is fair to say the problem is getting out of hand or that it is worse than it has been in the past. In fact we have learned a great deal from hostage-taking incidents, and I think we have done a lot to avoid some of the past causes of hostage-taking incidents.

• (1140)

Mr. Murta: Madam Speaker, the Minister has not really told us anything that we did not already know about what the Government is doing.

TERMS OF REFERENCE OF INVESTIGATION

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. What kind of investigative inquiry is taking place in Stony Mountain? What are some of the rules—what are the parameters of the investigators, whoever they may be? I assume that people within the Minister's Department are looking into this. When does the Minister expect a report to be made, either to him or to the House, so that the Canadian people can begin to try to understand what the investigators, the authorities and the inmates have to grapple with in a system that seems to be becoming very, very shaky indeed? What is causing these incidents to occur from time to time?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, two types of investigation are virtually automatic. In the first case the police are called in because crimes or offences have been committed. I would remind the House that a hostage taking is a violation of the Criminal Code. The police come in and they are completely independent from the Government, from the system and from the correctional service. They have full access to everyone, and they lay charges when charges are justified. They also make recommendations when those are justified.

The second string is the work of the Inspector General. The purpose of his investigation is not to find fault with anyone—that is left to the police—the purpose of his investigation is to make recommendations for dealing with the type of situation that gave rise to a particular hostage taking. In order to be effective, confidentiality applies to the work and the report of the Inspector General. I will be prepared to make a statement when I have the report of the Inspector General on the Stony Mountain incident. I can assure the Hon. Member that, where action is justified and can be taken to reassure the surrounding community, which is the most important thing, to reassure the members of the staff, even to reassure the inmates about their personal safety and security in the face of the violence that caused these incidents, then I will be prepared to make a statement about it.

RAILWAYS

REQUEST THAT WORK FORCE REDUCTIONS BE HALTED

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance concerning his plans for upgrading the railways of Canada and, according to him, for the creation of some 400,000 jobs by 1991. Since for years the railways have been eliminating an average of 5,500 jobs per year, and in view of the statement made yesterday by the Chairman of CN, Mr. Jack Horner, that there will be even more lay-offs on the railway, will the Minister secure a commitment from the railways that, in view of the public investment of $400 million for this year alone, there will be no further reduction in the size of the work force employed on Canada's railways?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker, this is not a promise that we can make. Speaking about CN, the Crown corportions of Canada were not created to achieve social objectives, but as business and commercial operations. Second, the principles under which Crown corporations would keep employees over a period of time when it is not needed, is not one that is accepted by the Government. There were instances, though, when this was done, particularly when the Government moved to create a fund to help a rationalization of a certain service. This is not the case here. The principle invoked by the question is not one that is generally acceptable, however.

Mr. Rose: With the conditions that exist in Canada at this time, perhaps it might be advisable to review that principle, Madam Speaker.

LACK OF GOVERNMENT EQUITY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): What concerns many of us is that the railways will take Government handouts and reduce their own investments by an amount equal to those handouts.

If the Minister cannot guarantee job security on the railways, will he at least take steps to prevent the Government from squandering millions more on the railways without a dime's worth of equity for the public investment?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): No, Madam Speaker. As I was saying, there have been a number of instances when the Government counted on the railways, the CN in particular, to rationalize a service, and such rationalization was substantially detrimental to the labour force. In these instances the Government has intervened and put an amount of money on the table to facilitate that rationalization. These were exceptional circumstances, however.

In the present circumstances, the principle invoked by the question is not accepted by the Government because Crown corporations were created to be part of the commercial operation of Canada; they were not created as extensions of the Department of National Health and Welfare.

APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Prime Minister. According to press reports, an announcement will be made of a special Royal Commission to deal with the economy. I should like to ask the Prime Minister if this is true and, if so, if he is at liberty to reveal its membership?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am happy that the Hon. Member has shown interest in this matter. I can assure the Opposition that, as far as I know, the interest is purely spontaneous. I am glad to have an occasion to answer this in the House because it is a matter of some embarrassment to me that this leak has occurred, and

I am sure it is of great embarrassment to Mr. Donald Macdonald who has been approached to be the Chairman of such a Royal Commission.

With your indulgence, Madam Speaker, I am happy to give what details I can of the Royal Commission. I want to assure the House that it had been my intention to make an announcement in a statement on motions, when the Opposition would have had a chance to answer questions. This is not possible now. I am happy—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I am glad they are so amused over there, Madam Speaker.

An Hon. Member: We are.

Mr. Trudeau: I am certainly glad that the Liberal Members are more interested in acquiring knowledge on the creation of a Royal Commission, the purpose of which would be to inquire into the economic prospects in Canada in the middle and longer term, and to look at the institutional arrangements which might be necessary for the strengthening of that economic union.

If the Hon. Member has a supplementary question I will be very happy to answer it, Madam Speaker.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

INQUIRY RESPECTING TERMS OF REFERENCE

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): With all due respect to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker, he did not answer my question in its totality, if I may borrow that phrase.

Since the Prime Minister has confirmed his plan to announce the appointment of this Royal Commission, could he tell the House some of the terms of reference for the membership of that Royal Commission?

Mr. Beatty: What about John Turner?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, as to the terms of reference, they are going to be submitted to the Governor General early this afternoon. Until the document has acquired his signature, obviously I am not free to make those terms of reference known. I would be happy to have them tabled in the House sometime this afternoon, if the House will give consent.

I can even say that, to add to my embarrassment, I have not even consulted my colleagues in Cabinet or caucus on this project, although the Deputy Prime Minister knows about it.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Beatty: Tell Lalonde.

Mr. Trudeau: Madam Speaker, I am sorry that this announcement and the answer to the questions are being greeted so lightly by the Opposition. I think this Royal Commission will be extremely important, in terms of the change in thinking regarding the future of the country. I hope it will play a role as important as that played by the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission in the years after that was produced.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I wish to tell the Hon. Member that no other member has been approached. The Chairman is the only one who has indicated acceptance, and he was in the process of consulting other participants. No doubt that is how—

• (1150)

Mr. Nielsen: That is a really short answer, isn't it?

Mr. Trudeau: I am sorry, the Opposition House Leader—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Prime Minister but I think he had a chance to answer that question adequately.

FAMILY VIOLENCE

INQUIRY RESPECTING RATE OF INCREASE IN VIOLENCE AGAINST WOMEN

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Rising unemployment tends to bring about an increase in crimes of violence, including wife battering. Could the Minister inform the House how much the incidence of wife beating has increased over the last six months?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, first of all, on behalf of many of my colleagues, I would like to congratulate my opposition colleague on his efforts to speak French, because it is certainly not easy. That being said, I would have preferred receiving notice of his question, because I would need statistics which unfortunately I do not have here before me. We have enclosed an insert with Family Allowance cheques which, I believe, has been fairly well received by Canadians and which tries to advise on how to cope with the issue of battered wives, that is, what people should do in cases where there is violence in the family. As for statistics covering the last six months, I will provide them as soon as possible.

RECOMMENDATION TO HOLD FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is addressed to the minister responsible for the status of women. She will know that some five months ago the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs recommended the holding of a federal-provincial conference for the express purpose of dealing with the issue of battered wives. Could the Minister report to the House the progress that has been made on the holding of that conference, what communications were made to the provinces, and hopefully the date on which that conference will occur?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Madam Speaker, if the Hon. Member had followed events carefully, he would be aware that the various Ministers within the federal government have already agreed to hold meetings with their provincial counterparts, because this covers a very wide spectrum. I have had the assurance of a number of Ministers, including the Solicitor General and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that those discussions will take place.

FISHERIES

INQUIRY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICIES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I wish to direct my question to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Also at this time I wish to congratulate him on his appointment to this new position. There have been reports in the press and on Newsradio that the Kirby Report recommends the setting up of yet another Crown Corporation called "Phoenix", for the purpose of taking over the management of four large fishing companies in Atlantic Canada. Since this type of action is really an indictment of his predecessor, whose licensing policies, quota restrictions on Canadians, and marketing policies were unjust and unworkable, when will the Minister be making a statement in the House outlining the Government's policies as they apply to this important primary industry?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I would like to say something to my hon. friend. I have met a lot of people in the last month, many of them from the industry sector. Not one of them has told me that the problems this sector is experiencing at the moment are due to any policy of my predecessor. On the contrary, he succeeded in obtaining the 200-mile zone which has been a tremendous boost to our fishery.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. De Bané: I will just remind the Hon. Member that, when the Minister took over the Department, our fishermen on the Atlantic coast had a catch of 400,000 tonnes—

Mr. Mayer: Order.

Mr. De Bané: This year it will be 800,000 tonnes.

Some Hon. Members: Order.

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. De Bané: As for any indictment—

Madam Speaker: Order, please.

Mr. De Bané: —of his policies, I would inform—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Even I realize that the Hon. Minister is not really answering the question but giving other information which might be extremely valuable but is not exactly relevant to the question. I would not want to express any opinion on that, except that I want to tell the Hon. Minister that he must be brief.

Mr. De Bané: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member was speaking about an indictment of my predecessor. Therefore, concerning the question put about Government intervention in the fishing sector, this summer when Fishery Products Limited decided to close the plant in St. Anthony, where 700 people were employed, because the company was losing money, my predecessor decided to take over that plant. I am happy to report to the House that the plant will be making a slight profit and the 700 people are working.

Mr. Crouse: Madam Speaker, we, in Atlantic Canada, recognize that the Government did establish a 200-mile limit. But what seems to be at issue here are the quotas and the people who have been permitted to fish within that limit while Canadians at times are required to stay ashore. That is the problem.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

REQUEST THAT JOINT PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE BE ESTABLISHED

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, it is obvious that the Government's fisheries policies, from what the minister has just said, have not been working in recent years, otherwise the Government would not have had to intervene. These policies have inhibited Canadian fishing activities, both offshore and inshore, through restrictive and confusing fishing quotas and licences. Therefore, will the minister give consideration to establishing a joint parliamentary committee composed of Members of Parliament who have some expertise in this field and who represent large fishing ridings for the purpose of discussing current problems in the hope that this parliamentary task force, which I would remind the Government and the Prime Minister will not cost the country anything, could come up with some positive recommendations for the resolution of the present difficulties?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, of course our Standing Committee on Fishery and Forestry is free to study whatever problem that Members would like to discuss.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. De Bané: But I think at the moment what our fishermen would like is not more discussion, but action. The Hon. Member will see in the next few months that the Government of Canada is giving leadership to that very important sector of our economy.

SOCIAL SECURITY

MINISTER'S SPEECH TO LIBERAL CONVENTION

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare who was in her seat two or three minutes ago. She seems to have gone out for a smoke.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Young: I do not know whether the Minister is in the lobby and is coming into the House, but I did give her notice of my question.

An Hon. Member: Here she is.

Mr. Young: I see her now.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Young: Madam Speaker, could the Minister confirm to this House that she told the Liberal convention meeting yesterday that the elderly in Canada need an increase of at least $25 a month to their pensions but that the Government will not give it to them? Will the Minister also confirm that she and the Government have now abandoned the elderly of Canada and, in effect, have hung them out to dry?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I may have sinned a bit while in China and smoked a little for three weeks, but I want to tell the Hon. Member that I have stopped once again.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Miss Bégin: I have to deny two aspects of the Hon. Member's question, which I find very detrimental. I repeated the Government commitment to seniors, in particular single pensioners, receiving the GIS, that as soon as we can we will find that money. Everybody knows what the situation is right now in this country. I reiterated that commitment, and I reiterated the commitment to pension reform. I said that the Green Paper will be released shortly. It will be a green paper with concrete peoposals for discussion by various groups in Canada in order that, as soon as the economy picks up sufficiently, we will be ready to move with pension reform that all Canadians want to have.

• (1200)

REQUEST THAT MINISTER RESIGN

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is to the same Minister. We have heard that same story before, at least for the last 12 months. It is obvious to me and this House that the Minister is quite good at making all kinds of pious statements about the needs of the elderly, yet she tolerated capping increases in pensions to 6 per cent and 5 per cent in the last budget. She is even reported as being in favour of ending universality of old age pensions. Will the Minister now put an end to this hypocrisy and offer her resignation to this House?

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): No, never, Madam Speaker.

LEVEL OF BEEF IMPORTS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for international trade. I am sure that the Minister will be aware of the beef export issue brought about by the anticipated closure of the American beef market to our Canadian beef. This is due to the filling of their global quota in the United States for beef. It is a situation which will occur in the very near future.

The Minister will also be aware of the voluntary arrangements agreed to by beef producers in Australia, New Zealand and Canada, with American producers. Would the Minister indicate if current beef imports into Canada are presently being monitored under the Export and Import Permits Act? Would he assure our Canadian beef producers that beef imports for this year will not exceed 142 million pounds, of which 118 million pounds is from offshore, that is, Australia and New Zealand?

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member brings a matter of some concern to the attention of the House, but I think I can give him good assurance that the Government has taken firm steps to deal with it. Due to the situation in the United States, an agreement was entered into by my predecessor, the present Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce, and the Minister of Agriculture, with their counterparts in the United States. That agreement would limit the amount of Canadian beef going to the American market this year to approximately 121 million pounds. We are now at about 116 million pounds, which makes it obvious that full utilization will be made of that quantity.

Since the American restrictions also apply to other countries such as Australia and New Zealand, there was the danger of some of that excess being diverted into the Canadian market. We have established a system of beef and veal imports, and we are very confident that the amounts that will therefore come into the country in the relevant time period will not be above the 120 million to 130 million pounds that is established under the Canadian Beef Act. The situation is being carefully monitored. We believe that the situation is well contained.

BALANCE REMAINING IN QUOTAS

Mr. Bert Hargrave (Medicine Hat): I am sure the Minister knows that the concern of Canadian beef producers is that for the balance of this year only, surplus beef may be redirected by the boat load—especially from Australia—into ports like Montreal and Vancouver. Could the Minister indicate what the balance of the quotas available might be for the rest of this calendar year, especially for Australia?

Point of Order—Mr. Nielsen

Hon. Gerald Regan (Minister of State (International Trade)): Madam Speaker, I want to point out to the Hon. Member that I have already said that we are monitoring the amount that is coming in, on a daily basis. If those imports from the areas that the Hon. Member mentions increase significantly, they can then be limited under the provisions of the Meat Import Act. We are prepared to take those actions in order to protect the Canadian beef industry.

Madam Speaker: I find the House very nervous today. I wonder if some historical events are not insidiously influencing the conduct of Members. Do any Members remember that today is Guy Fawkes Day?

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, certainly we have not forgotten that it is Guy Fawkes Day, but I think that he is over at the Chateau Laurier at the moment.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

PETITION

MR. ROSE—CALL FOR REINSTATEMENT OF CAPITAL PUNISHMENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the Table the three hundred and thirtieth report of the Clerk of Petitions, stating that he has examined the petition presented by the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) on Thursday, November 4, 1982, and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Order as to form.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. NIELSEN—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. DAWSON

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I rose during Motions under S.O. 43 with respect to a point of order concerning the words used by the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) on a motion proposed under Standing Order 43. You will recall that I asked to be given a copy of a transcript of those remarks. I have not received such a transcript. Since I may have heard the English translation wrongly or, indeed, if the words were used—the Hon. Member has the opportunity to look at Hansard between now and the printing of Hansard for today—I think it would be prudent for me to withhold raising the point of order until next Monday.

I have, however, also heard from another Member of Parliament who said that he thought he heard words during the presentation of that motion under Standing Order 43 that might have offended his privileges as a Member. It may give rise to questions by other Members once we have examined the record.

If it is indeed necessary for me to raise the question on Monday, I will also be raising the question of the proper time at which to raise questions or points of order dealing with unparliamentary language. I will be briefly presenting an argument to the Chair to be made under Citation 323, subparagraph (2), of the Fifth Edition of Beauchesne where it sets forth:

(2) The proper time to raise such a point of order—

That is, dealing with unparliamentary language.

—is when the words are used and not afterwards.

Madam Speaker: I think we have to wait until the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) raises a point of order on this particular motion. The Hon. Member for Yukon indicates that he is reserving the matter and that he will look at Hansard and may raise it on Monday. Therefore, before it is raised I do not think we should discuss it.

[Translation]

Mr. Dawson: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is a fact that I got carried away and may have used the expression "intellectual dishonesty". I do not know about the word "intellectual", Madam Speaker, but following consultations with my colleagues, I feel I must withdraw the word "dishonesty". As to the word "hypocrisy", I had looked it up in Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms this morning, but I am now advised that it is unparliamentary language; so, as a good Parliamentarian, I want to advise the House that I withdraw these two words, although I feel that for all practical purposes, the motion I have moved under Standing Order 43 adequately reflects what we feel, my colleagues and I.

Madam Speaker: I suggest, therefore, that the matter is closed, the Hon. Member having withdrawn words which he feels may have offended the House.

[English]

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, as I was mentioned in the motion of the Hon. Member for Louis-Hébert (Mr. Dawson) today, I would like to study his comments to see whether I have also been covered by his apology. If not, I will be raising the matter on Monday.

Madam Speaker: I simply want to remind the Hon. Member that unless some unparliamentary language was used, whatever was said about the Hon. Member has been dealt with by the House. Therefore, perhaps the Hon. Member might also want to consider what I am saying now, because then there would, of course, be no point in raising the matter in the House.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INTRODUCTION OF LEGISLATION IN SENATE

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I have a question with regard to the Business of the House which I would like to raise at this point, if I may. There is a practice which has manifested itself over the last few days and which appears to be growing. It is that legislation which has considerable public interest, over which Members of the House of Commons have expressed concern, is being introduced in the Senate for discussion first, rather than the House of Commons.

I want to ask the Hon. House Leader for the Government (Mr. Pinard) if he would not reconsider this practice now before we get carried away with the appointed Senate dealing with what is, in essence, public business prior to the House of Commons having an opportunity even to debate it.

• (1210)

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I do no think this question relates to the business of the House but it is entirely in order. When a bill is introduced in the Senate, it must subsequently be considered in the House before it has force of law and before it can be given royal assent. This is not new and we are not creating a precedent. Now, if my hon. colleague does not agree with the procedure, since he sits on a special committee on parliamentary reform, he could bring up the matter and try to convince his colleagues. However, I do not think the matter is relevant to the business of the House for the next few days nor that it should be raised at this time.

CHIP AND COSP PROGRAMS

Question No. 4,038—Mr. Rose:

1. For December, 1981, how many packages of Canadian Home Insulation Program (CHIP) and Canadian Oil Substitution Program (COSP) request forms were sent out to retailers of solid fuel-burning appliances, solar heating equipment and propane fueled heating equipment?

2. Were the packages individually distributed from Ottawa or shipped in bulk to regional distribution centres in each Province before final delivery?

3. (a) What was the distribution cost for each package of request forms (b) what was the total cost of the mailing program?

4. Was Loomis Courier Service used to distribute the material instead of the Canada Post Corporation and, if so (a) for what reason (b) which government official was responsible for the decision?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): The Department of Energy, Mines and Resources reports as follows:

1. For December, 1981, a total of 112,500 request forms were sent to 914 retailers of solid fuel-burning appliances, solar heating equipment and propane fueled heating equipment, all in the Province of British Columbia.

2. The packages were shipped in bulk to Vancouver where they were distributed individually.

3. (a) Distribution cost per package, $8.75. (b) Total distribution cost, $7,997.50.

4. Yes. (a) Loomis Courier Service was used to distribute these packages in order to meet a deadline. (b) The instructions for delivery were given by the Canada Oil Substitution Program Directorate.

RCMP POLICY REGARDING PAYMENT TO WITNESSES

Question No. 4,178—Mr. MacKay:

1. Is there a general RCMP policy concerning payments to witnesses in criminal trials and, if so (a) what are the details (b) does the policy involve payments beyond expenses incurred in connection with court appearances?

Order Paper Questions

2. Is there a general RCMP policy concerning payments to informers and, if so, what are the details?

3. Is it the policy of the RCMP to withhold from the criminal courts the fact that the accused persons are paid informers of the RCMP?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): 1. (a) Witnesses called by the Crown in criminal cases are entitled to fees and expenses in accordance with the tariffs set by provincial laws or regulations. See also payments to informers in part 2 below. RCMP policy provides for compliance with the schedules and tariffs including Section 772 of the Criminal Code to facilitate these payments.

(b) No, the general policy does not involve payments beyond expenses incurred in connection with court appearances. There is, however, additional policy which deals specifically with the Force's Witness Protection Program and is separate from those witness entitlements provided for by provincial laws or regulations. Payments made in this Program pertain only to relocation and cost of living expenses for a witness and family should the life of the witness or his/her family become endangered as a result of co-operation with the Crown or agreement to testify. The payment of moneys or benefits are not authorized to any person simply in return for their testimony.

2. Yes, there is RCMP policy concerning payments to informers. This policy deals with the following:

(a) the amount of payments: These payments are authorized at varying levels of authority within the RCMP in accordance with Treasury Board directives;

(b) the criteria for payments: In each case the criteria for payment is established by the levels of authority responsible for authorizing payment. They must be satisfied that the expenses are fair and just in relation to the assistance rendered or information received:

(c) the selection of recipients: Not all informants or witnesses receive payments. Payments occur only in those circumstances which dictate the need.

In the event of a paid informer being a witness, Force practice requires, without exception, full disclosure of all details to the Court.

In Security Service matters, it is not in the interests of maintaining internal security to make public policy concerning payments to informers.

3. No.

PETRO-CANADA—LOANS TO EMPLOYEES

Question No. 4,203—Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton):

Were loans made to any employee of Petro-Canada or its subsidiaries since March, 1980 and, if so, in each case (a) what is the name and title of the employee (b) on what date was the loan taken out and on what date is it due (c) what was the amount of the loan (d) what interest rate is being charged (e) what was the purpose of the loan?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Petro-Canada reports as follows: The requested information is considered to be of a managerial and administrative nature between Petro-Canada and the Corporation's employees and, therefore, cannot be released to the public.

DEPARTMENT OF FISHERIES AND OCEANS—CODE OF CONDUCT

Question No. 4,254—Mr. Crosby:

1. Does the Department of Fisheries and Oceans have written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for employees of the Department and, if so, are they embodied in a Code of Conduct or other specific document and is the Code or document available to the public?

2. In the five years preceding April 1, 1982, were any employees of the Department disciplined by way of suspension, dismissal or otherwise for violations of any rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behaviour for departmental employees and, if so, in each case, what was the name of the employee and the date of the disciplinary action?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): 1. The Department of Fisheries and Oceans has written rules or regulations governing the conduct or standards of behavior for employees of the Department. Standards of behavior for employees of the Department are outlined in the Conflict of Interest Guidelines and the Personnel Management Manual which are available to the public and in any other directive or policy issued by Treasury Board as the employer.

The Conflict of Interest Guideliens deal with the disclosure of matters such as business or other interests which might be in conflict with official business, and also deal with other related subjects. Directives or policies issued by Treasury Board as the employer pertain to subjects such as political partisanship, discrimination, sexual harassment, public money and property, disclosure of official information.

2. DFO does not keep records of this nature in such a way as to render the information easily accessible. The information requested would require an inordinate cost and length of time to prepare.

2. How many other employees of the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources will be involved in regulating the oil and gas industry over the fiscal year (a) 1982-83 (b) 1983-84?

3. What is the projected cost, including benefits and office expenses, of this regulation and how much of the cost is defrayed directly by user-fees or other charges?

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEM

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James) moved:

That this House condemns the government for their incompetent management of the unemployment insurance system and their mishandling and misdirection of employment programs:

(a) by creating and tolerating long and unconscionable delays in payment of earned benefits to claimants;

(b) by refusing to provide extended benefits or jobs to the growing thousands of unemployed whose benefits are expiring each month;

(c) by raising unemployment insurance premiums by 40 to 53% at a time when UIC services are declining and in disrepute; and finally, condemns the government for fumbling a growing myriad of uncoordinated hit and miss job creation programs and its consequent failure to begin to provide some meaningful employment and stable incomes for over 1.4 million jobless Canadians.

He said: Madam Speaker, it is very important that the House of Commons begin to deal with the whole question involving the unemployment insurance system and people who are in desperate need of employment. There has been a complete lack of economic policy by the Government of the day. Today the unemployment insurance statistics indicate a new record of unemployment since the great depression. I want to put some of those statistics on the record so that people will be aware of exactly what we mean when we say that unemployment is at the highest level since the depression.

This is the fourteenth consecutive month of decline in jobs. Over the last month we lost another 24,000 jobs and we have lost half a million jobs since October last year. Of the jobs which have disappeared over the last month, 48,000 were full-time jobs. Many people have been forced into part-time employment, which tends artificially to keep the numbers up.

The decline in jobs has been widespread. It has gone through the manufacturing sector, which experienced a loss of 25,000 jobs over the last month, and through the construction sector, with losses amounting to 17,000 jobs over the last month. In light of the comments of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) during question period today that somehow the drop in interest rates which is taking place is an indicator of future recovery, I would respond by saying the drop is the result of such a deep and long lasting recession. He claimed that the drop in interest rates would stimulate construction, but that clearly is not evident from the statistics which show that we have lost some 17,000 jobs in construction over the last month and another 15,000 jobs in trades. Unemployment continues at record levels without abatement.

It is very important to consider exactly what that means. While we might carry on some debate over whether to describe the situation as a recession or a depression, I think that all could agree that what we are living through and what we have been living through over the last year is clearly an economic crisis in the order of the last great depression. Therefore, I would call this recession "the great recession". It is long lasting, it is fundamental and it is hurting Canadian people like no other economic crisis has hurt the Canadian people since the great depression.

Today the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had the nerve to stand up in the House of Commons, in response to what appeared to be a set-up question from a backbencher, to announce the creation of a royal commission. We know that in 1949 and 1953 the Liberal Party went the route of a royal commission in order to try to save its political skin. We know that a former member of the Liberal Party became involved in one of these commissions and eventually became Minister of Finance. Therefore, a royal commission which is to study the economy over the next year, shall we say—but who knows—will obviously be an excuse for lack of action. More than that, I suspect it may be a mechanism for political succession. The gentleman who has been appointed to head this royal commission which, ostensibly, should be independent, one Mr. Macdonald, has been mentioned by some as an aspiring leadership candidate for the Liberal Party when the Prime Minister finally steps down. I just wonder whether this is not a platform enabling him to go across the country to hear people's opinions on the economy so that he can be in line, in first place in succession, when the time comes. I suspect the Government's response to unemployment and to the economic crisis is more political than economic. Indeed, that is shameful and regretful.

The great depression brought about some fundamental political, social and economic change. It moved the North American economy from a laissez-faire attitude to an economic approach to management of the economy which involved activism on the part of government. It involved direct intervention of government into the economy and established social welfare programs which are still with us today and are constantly under threat. The last economic crisis led to some fundamental social and economic change, to some innovation, and eventually to an economic recovery.

What is lacking in the present economic crisis, this great recession, is fundamental innovation in the economic area. This is really what must take place if we are to respond in a realistic manner to the shocking unemployment which exists in Canada today.

We must display courage and move beyond the simple use of fiscal and monetary policies to some measure of setting national economic goals. The only way that we in the country will be able to pull together in order to provide employment for all who need it and want it is by sitting down together as a nation and setting some national economic goals. The countries in the world which have done best, even in these troubled times, are those that have gone that route. It is time for the Canadian Government and the Canadian people to move beyond a simple reliance upon fiddling with fiscal and monetary policies.

After the innovations of the great depression, the economic solutions of those days were often associated with the name of the economist Keynes. After the recovery and some economic growth many people began to feel somewhat smug. We thought we really knew the answers to all economic problems and that a depression could never occur again. We thought we had the technical answers and the know-how to solve the problems.

Clearly the great depression will not repeat itself, but we have another real economic crisis. It did not just start yesterday or this morning; it has been around for some time. For example, we could date it with the oil embargo of 1974 and with the new economic problems which arose thereafter, problems of rising unemployment at the same time as rising inflation, problems which demonstrated that the economic remedies of the past were just not capable of coping with the economic problems of the country. It is only now that it is becoming clear how deep the economic crisis is and how inadequate the measures of the Canadian Government are to deal with the crisis. It is time for innovation in economic and social matters.

Rather than innovation Canadians are experiencing a reaction. It is a reaction to the difficult problems and to the inadequacy of governmental response to the problems. Now we have a Government which is totally discredited, which is not doing anything real about employment, which is calling a depressed economy a sign of recovery. In the community there is a reaction to the lack of effective intervention by the Government into the economy. There is a conservative reaction which is often called neo-conservatism.

In his latest economic statement the Minister of Finance adopted the same approach. The reaction to the ineptness of the Government's economic approach has discredited its role and led to the conclusion by many that the way to solve economic problems is to take government out of the economy and leave it to the private sector. We have begun to hear this line not only from the Conservatives but also from the Liberals in their latest economic statement. They are mirror images of one another. They want to leave economic recovery to the private sector and to the United States. They want to wait for the American economy to recover and hope that we can somehow hitch our wagon to theirs.

Canadians are disillusioned with this failure to come to grips with the real problems facing them. We want a Government which is willing to deal with real problems and find real solutions. Also we want a Government which has the courage to implement, to experiment, to attempt in a humane manner, to meet the needs of all Canadians and to ensure that all Canadians have employment and decent incomes.

I want to examine more closely the economic statement of the Minister of Finance. It has been called an economic statement, but it was clearly a budget. There were enough items in it to indicate that it was a budget. The Minister simply took the opportunity to fly it under another flag. The centrepiece of the economic statement was called the NEED Program. It was a job creation Program. The Government claimed it would allocate some $500 million to create some 60,000 jobs over a period of 18 months. I think from experience we must examine more closely what the Government has had to say, what it claimed it was doing. We have been disillusioned in the past as it has made announcement after announcement and there were no changes in the unemployment statistics. The fact is that we now have close to two million Canadians looking for work.

The rule of thumb with regard to employment creation accepted by most labour analysts, including officials in the Department of Employment, is that $500 million will create some 25,000 full-time, one-year jobs. The Government is talking about creating 25,000 jobs at a time when there are 1.4 million people unemployed according to the statistics.

This is clearly inadequate tokenism. It is even worse than that because the Government does not really intend to create full-time jobs. It appears that what it intends to do is create a series of part-time jobs in co-operation with the Provinces which will provide a revolving door between unemployment insurance, short-term work of 20 weeks, for example, and then back to unemployment insurance. This is a very cruel and callous approach to unemployment. It is not a real solution, yet it is the centrepiece of the Government's job creation plan. The provincial Government of Quebec has already put in place a program which would employ people for a period of 20 weeks. The clear intention of such a program is to requalify people for unemployment insurance so that they can pass through the revolving door. The problem with the revolving door is that it is very difficult on the persons who have to live this way. We all know that they need full-time, permanent jobs.

The centrepiece of the Government's job creation Program in its economic statement is a part-time job creation plan which will create a revolving door between unemployment insurance and part-time or short-term work. That is not good enough, it is cruel, and it is insensitive.

I want to refer briefly to some of the other job creation items mentioned in the economic statement so as not to let them go without comment. In the statement $400 million is mentioned for railway investment and development. The statement also indicates that this investment is tied to the resolution of the Crowsnest Pass rate issue. That issue is not resolved, so that money is not moving. If that investment is tied to the resolution of the Crowsnest Pass rate, what the Government is doing is taking money out of the pockets of the farmers and putting it into the pocket of the railway companies. That will not create employment.

We know from past experience that when you invest in railways, you do not have more jobs but a loss of jobs. It has been a question of job loss rather than investment in railways resulting in job creation. We should be skeptical of investment in railways.

Another part of the economic statement as it relates to job creation is the question of where to find the money, from where they reallocate the funds. A good portion of the funds came from foreign aid. That needs to be questioned on at least two grounds. First, foreign aid as it is managed in this country generally leads to the employment of Canadians. When you take money out of foreign aid, you are taking jobs away from Canadians. We live in a world in which we are the affluent in spite of all our economic problems. There are those who need far more than we do. We make a small contribution to that need through foreign aid, yet we have the unmitigated gall to take money away from foreign aid, to rob money from the Third World in order to appear to create jobs. That is not acceptable. It is not the way we should be going.

Another reallocation item was taking money out of the CHIP Program, an energy program, which would be job-intensive. What jobs are created if you take jobs from a job-intensive Program and put them into a job-creation Program? That does not seem to make a great deal of sense. The New Democratic Party by contrast recommended that we take some of the incentives from the oil industry, which is very highly capitalized and creates few jobs, and redirect those resources to job intensive industries such as housing and forestry. That is a way to reallocate money and come up in the balance with more jobs rather than less.

The economic statement of the Minister of Finance has an underlying economic strategy. Not only has he adopted the line of authority, which is to placate the private sector in an attempt to appeal to the business community, but what he has done in real economic terms is that he has given a tax break to those in the very upper income brackets. When the former Minister of Finance brought in his budget in November, he had lower tax rates for those in the upper income brackets, but he closed some of the loopholes. When the present Minister of Finance brought in his statement, he retained the lesser tax rate for the upper income people but reopened the loopholes. Those in the upper income brackets get the tax break while ordinary average Canadians who are struggling to make a living have been given a whopping 40 to 53 per cent tax increase in unemployment insurance premiums.

This is clearly inequitable and does not make any economic sense. I will state why quite clearly. At this moment we have an economy with a high percentage of savings and very weak consumer spending. We have to mobilize those savings and bring them around to stimulate consumer spending in order to get the economy moving and people working. One way to do this would be for those in the highest income brackets, those earning over $40,000 or $50,000, or those 704 people who earn over $100,000 a year and do not pay any tax whatsoever, to pay a fair share, to pay a progressive tax. Those revenues could be used for direct, full-time job creation. That would put money in the pockets of ordinary Canadians. It would get people back to work. Consumer spending would be strengthened, which is what we need to get the economy moving in the direction of recovery.

The economic strategy and the economic statement of the Minister of Finance is wrongheaded. It is out of whack with reality. In effect, it is a drag on the economy.

Unemployment insurance premiums have been increased at a time when most businesses are having a difficult time. For those running a small business, this added tax will make it more difficult to keep employees. Retail trade is down to one-half or one-third of what it was last year. It will be a tough decision to decide whether to keep a sales clerk or put him on the unemployment insurance rolls. The economic strategy in the document does not make any sense in terms of the goal of full employment and the right of Canadians to have a job and a decent income.

I would like to say a little more about the unemployment insurance system. The system is under a great deal of pressure. It was set up to service a lower rate of unemployment. Over the last year, the unemployment insurance caseload has doubled. This has been the experience in the local office in Winnipeg that I visited. The result of this extremely high caseload has resulted in constant delays for the average person applying for unemployment insurance.

One could play the game of trying to find out who is to blame—whether the person returned the card at the right time, whether the commission sent out the card at the right time, how it got off the computer or how it got in to the computer. Once the process gets off the computer, the delays go on and on. It is a very long and slow process for a person to get unemployment insurance benefits.

I recommend that the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) hire an adequate number of people to keep these unemployment insurance claims moving at a decent pace. If he cannot re-program the computer to handle the situation in order to avoid delays, he should hire people to process the claims so that the unemployed do not have to wait for these much needed benefits.

It is not only the average person applying for unemployment insurance benefits who faces these delays but those who are involved with some of the specific job creation programs of which the Government is so proud. There is, for example, the work-sharing program which the Minister is quoted as calling a success. We have learned that it is somewhat less than a success. Many of those who became involved in the work-sharing program are now unemployed. The program was supposed to keep them working, yet they are now becoming unemployed. This is because work-sharing was designed as a short-term measure and the economic recession we are now in is long-term.

With regard to unemployment insurance, specifically, I have had complaints from various groups across the country who indicate that after they sign the work-sharing agreement it takes months before they can get their benefits. They have to wait an intolerable length of time. Even after the work sharing has run its course and they are back to being unemployed, there are further delays in order to get back on ordinary unemployment insurance. My colleague will be mentioning problems similar to this with regard to other employment programs, including the Employment Bridging Assistance Program.

I would like to focus now upon the question of those people who have been on unemployment insurance over the last year and are now exhausting their benefits. These are the people who are faced with the prospect of seeking welfare and having to exhaust all of their personal savings. These are the people who are suffering a great deal from the recession in which we are today.

The economic statement of the Minister of Finance indicated that the NEED Program, the job creation program, was going to meet the needs of those who had exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits. The statistics of the Department of Employment indicate some 50,000 to 55,000 people a month are now exhausting their unemployment insurance benefits and the predictions are that this figure will increase to 90,000 per month. The NEED job creation program, even by the Government's own standards, is going to create only some 60,000 jobs. That will cover one month, Mr. Speaker, whereas the NEED Program is supposed to last a period of some 18 months. The economic statement made reference to a previous job creation program of $300 million. That also, by using the appropriate rule of thumb, would create some 25,000 full-time jobs, which would in no way meet the needs of these people who have exhausted their UIC benefits.

I think it is time for the Government to consider seriously the extension of UIC benefits for another 26 weeks. I say this because, clearly, the Government has failed to meet the need by providing jobs for those people who are exhausting their UIC benefits. In order to be humane and leave people with their self-respect and human dignity, I recommend to the Government that it extend the benefits under the unemployment insurance system.

I say this because the unemployment insurance system was originally set up because the federal Government recognized that it was the prime mover in the national economy and had responsibility for the health of the economy and for employment. It had adopted the goal of full employment, a goal which is essential to Canada and to the roughly two million people today who are unemployed. By extending these benefits, the Government would once again reassert its responsibility in economic matters and show its concern about those people who have no other place to go now but welfare, or exhaust their personal savings.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I believe this is the second time this week that we have had the opportunity, through an Opposition motion, to discuss the very important question of unemployment in the country, and it happens on a day when we received the latest figures on unemployment. I wish these figures were otherwise than what they are, because they are serious and tragic, but they do create for the Members of this Chamber the requirement to deal with the matter in a straightforward, logical, consistent, and I hope constructive manner.

That is why I was looking forward with some anticipation, Mr. Speaker, to the opening remarks of the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) on behalf of the New Democratic Party, which claims, at least in its public utterances, that it is the Party which is concerned about the unemployed. I hope you will forgive me, Mr. Speaker, if I express my deep disappointment in what we have heard in the initial contribution in this House, because it was a massive contradiction wrapped up in a ball of misrepresentations, and has added nothing to the kind of debate which we need in this House in order to come to grips with the issues.

I think one of the difficulties we have is that we can very quickly manufacture pseudo events and pseudo truths. It seems the NDP feel that somehow if they say something long enough it will become reality even though it is not based upon fact but concocted somewhere in cuckoo land and makes absolutely no sense at all when it comes to the reality of what we are dealing with. And that is certainly the kind of position we heard from the Hon. Member today.

He began by condemning the NEED Program, saying it is a make-work program, which make no sense, and does not provide jobs that last long. None of this is true, of course, because the Program is designed for 12 months, not 20 weeks. We have said that consistently. It is designed to provide long-term jobs in a productive way. It is having the success of bringing a wide variety of Governments and other institutions together to co-operate in a major effort to deal with the problem of exhaustees. We are trying to put together a program which will provide the alternative to work. None of this was acknowledged by the Hon. Member. Instead, the Hon. Member did nothing but criticize the NEED program, throw scorn upon it and dismiss it, even though it will provide work opportunities for many of those people he talks about.

He takes the position that we must do something about the exhaustees. What did he offer us as a solution? The Hon. Member suggested we should extend unemployment insurance benefits for another 26 weeks. Making a quick calculation, Mr. Speaker, that would probably add something like $3 billion to $4 billion to the cost of the unemployment insurance fund. At the same time, the Hon. Member asked that we not raise unemployment insurance premiums to pay for it because they have already gone up too high. Does he have a secret formula or is there a tree out there, wherever the NDP make their policy, that they can shake to get money? Do they not realize that unemployment insurance is paid by the employees, the employers and the taxpayers? If you provide for an extension of benefits for 26 weeks at an additional cost of approximately $3 billion, somebody has to pay for it.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, to add one contradiction upon another, we also have the Leader of the NDP (Mr. Broadbent) saying the deficit should not be raised any higher, that the deficit should stay where it is. So we are faced with the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James saying we should put another $3 billion into the fund, but do not raise the premiums, do not raise the deficit.

So where is the money going to come from? The conventional knee-jerk answer of the NDP is "tax the rich". Yet we see in today's paper that profits are down in most major companies in this country by 44 per cent. We have other members of the NDP saying we should put more money into investment and research and development. But where does the money come from? It comes form the profits of the companies which the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James wants to tax further. When you add that all up, Mr. Speaker, it simply does not make sense. You cannot add more benefits, cut back taxes, not raise premiums, or put more money into investment, without getting the money from somewhere. The money has to come from taxpayers or by running up a deficit. It has to come from some source. It does not appear magically on a doorstep because the tooth fairy put it there. Yet that seems to be the source of inspiration for the economic policy of the NDP. They are not offering us anything that is consistent, logical or rational. They are simply trying to package together a whole round of mythologies and misrepresentations in the hope of gaining support. So, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to puncture holes in that particular bit of fantasy spun out by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James.

I feel badly because we had to raise premiums, but we have to make a choice. We have to say to the unemployed workers that if they want to continue to receive their benefits, then that cost must be shared by the broader base of workers and employers across Canada. That is a good philosophy which has stood us in good stead in times of crisis, times of recession. People are prepared to share. Those who have employment are prepared to offer some of their stipend to help those unemployed.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, contrary to the position taken by the Hon. Member who obviously has not done his homework, the premium level was established after very extensive discussion and consultation with labour unions and employers. We asked them what their point of view was. I know the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen) does not know what consultation is. He does not believe in it because he does not practise it. But we do, and we went out over the summer and fall and discussed with a wide variety—

Mr. Kristiansen: Don't give us that line.

Mr. Axworthy: It seems, Mr. Speaker, that we have pushed the Hon. Member's panic button again and all we are hearing is a loud wail.

The fact of the matter is that we did consult with employers and unions as to the appropriate level for the premiums. They all admitted that premiums would have to rise, and they said properly so in order that we can share the burden. They asked us not to take them up to the full rate required to exhaust the benefits, and we did not do that. We are contributing $1 billion to the unemployment insurance fund through Government financing in order to carry the burden for the unemployed through that system. But is the New Democratic Party prepared to recognize that? Are they prepared to recognize the best advice we got from the private sector and the unions? Oh no, they have their own little conjuring machine which sort of spins out these wild fantasies about how we are going to do all the different things we should do and somehow there will be the dollars necessary to pay for it. It just does not work that way, Mr. Speaker. That is not the way the system works. You have to have a balance sheet, and unfortunately they will never have to meet that balance sheet because they will never be in Government.

Let us spend a moment, Mr. Speaker, talking about the other parts of the unemployment insurance system because other Members of that caucus opposite have been rising to their feet in great condemnation of the unemployment insurance system. They do not seem to recognize that across the country in many cases the number of applications has almost doubled. I can give some figures which might be of interest to Hon. Members of the House. If you look at the figures for September, 1981 and September, 1982, the number of claims we received went from 1.8 milion to 2.7 million. In certain regions of the country, particularly in British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec, the claim load has gone up over 100 per cent.

Because of that we have put in place a number of corrective measures. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James said: "Why not add new people?" I would like to inform him that he is a little late with his advice, because three months ago we appropriated an additional 1,200 person-years, we have finished training these people and they are going into the offices right now to work on the additional unemployment claim load. You would think he might have spent a little time learning those facts. Instead, he simply condemns the hundreds of employees in the UIC who have been spending countless hours of overtime, working six or seven days a week, to try and meet the problems of people as well as the claim load. But oh no, they have no concern or sympathy for those working people who are going above and beyond the call of duty to try and meet the crisis. They simply criticize and condemn those workers.

Mr. Kristiansen: That is not true.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that we have put in a number of measures. In addition to the 1200 person-years, we have established separate adjudication centres to deal with the problem. We have relaxed certain criteria as far as the Auditor General will allow us to. We have worked with business and labour to try and get a better reporting system. We have established special regional task forces so that members of the Commission can move from one area where the demand is low to where it is high. We have been using those measures through the summer and fall and have reduced the backlog as a result.

We have not solved the problem, Mr. Speaker, I admit that. But we are working on it and we have a lot of very fine people in the Commission who are devoting their time to making it work.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Kristiansen: Agreed.

Mr. Axworthy: Then, Mr. Speaker, we get this kind of resolution which absolutely condemns the Commission and the people who work for it.

Mr. Kristiansen: Don't pass the buck.

Mr. Axworthy: That is the NDP for you. That is the Party which likes to say it is full of generosity and tolerance for the working people. They sure do not care about the people in our Commission who are working overtime, double time, to get the product out. They are making very major sacrifices to make sure that the system delivers.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is saying: "Well, part of the problem is the additional employment programs you have brought in. They are putting too much pressure on the system." After all, there are some snags in the system.

Mr. Kristiansen: They are not working.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact of the matter is that when you have 180,000 workers enrolled in a work sharing program, a program which has averted 75,000 lay-offs, it seems to me that is an initiative which should be applauded, not condemned, by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg, St.-James. We have saved the jobs of 75,000 workers in the country through that one program alone. Again, you would think the NDP might have some concern about that. They might take some interest in that program and help us to improve it. If there are problems, then we will respond to them and put the people to work. I invite Members of the NDP caucus, when they have a problem, to bring it to my attention and I will try to correct it. But let them not put up in this House this kind of resolution and make a blanket condemnation of initiatives which are providing basic security and job protection for over 180,000 workers in this country. I will not accept that kind of condemnation because, as we all know, it is based on a know nothing attitude, not on a realistic appraisal of how to correct the problem and come to grips with the issues we face.

I think, Mr. Speaker, this resolution does nothing for the honour, standing or stature of the NDP in this House. It is not constructive or positive, it offers no solutions; it is simply caustic and negative in its tone. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James continued that particular negative panegyric when he got to his feet to punch holes in the efforts we are making to help people bridge this very serious recession we are in. Those Programs, Mr. Speaker, are working. Not only the NEED Program, but the Training Program of $1 billion.

I was fascinated by the Leader of the NDP who again was only about a year late coming up with a proposal. He said "I have a brand new solution for the problems of the economy; let us have a new training program". Where has he been for the last year when this House passed the National Training Act? Where was be when this House appropriated $1 billion for new training across this country? Have they been asleep so long? Are they so far out of touch that they do not even know what is going on in this Parliament, in this House, and then they propose something already done as part of their great solution to the Canadian crisis?. I think Canadians expect far more from the Opposition critics at this point in time. They expect far more than borrowing ideas and concocting fantasy. They expect the Opposition to be working with the Programs we have initiated in order to help make them work.

Again, Mr. Speaker, we have the NEED Program, a $500 million program which can be added to with the co-operation of the Provinces and the private sector and which will provide over 60,000 jos. Not the short-term jobs the Hon. Member pretends it will provide, but jobs which will last up to a year; jobs which will build fishing wharves in Newfoundland and water systems in Nova Scotia; jobs in the forest industry in British Columbia and in the cities of Canada developing municipal services and renovating housing. That is the kind of work this Program is intended to do, and if we can get the co-operation of Members of this House as we are now getting it from the Provinces and the private sector of this country, we will have a Program which will provide major support and real hope for the unemployed in this country at a time when they need that support and hope the most.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) seeks consent to revert to Routine Proceedings. Is there unanimous consent to revert to the tabling of documents?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure unanimous consent will be forthcoming. I just want to know if this is for the purpose of tabling the document that sets up the Royal Commission to establish Mr. Donald Macdonald as the heir apparent to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau)?

Mr. Pepin: Mr. Speaker, there is no relationship between the purpose indicated by the Hon. Member and the purpose of the Royal Commission, but the document is the same.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE SYSTEM

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Keeper:

Supply

That this House condemns the government for their incompetent management of the unemployment insurance system and their mishandling and misdirection of employment programs:

(a) by creating and tolerating long and unconscionable delays in payment of earned benefits to claimants;

(b) by refusing to provide extended benefits or jobs to the growing thousands of unemployed whose benefits are expiring each month;

(c) by raising unemployment insurance premiums by 40 to 53% at a time when UIC services are declining and in disrepute; and

finally, condemns the government for fumbling a growing myriad of uncoordinated hit and miss job creation programs and its consequent failure to begin to provide some meaningful employment and stable incomes for over 1.4 million jobless Canadians.

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, seldom has a Royal Commission been announced and established with such a lack of conviction!

I want to make some remarks in this debate on the motion of the New Democratic Party, primarily with respect to the programs of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy). However, in light of the announcement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) last night and in question period today, perhaps I ought to offer some remarks with respect to the proposed Royal Commission first of all.

I have no difficulty in accepting the principle of a Royal Commission. Royal Commissions have been established in this country for over a century and on three or four occasions have dealt with employment matters and economic prospects. They are usually two or three years in the making and take about a year and a half for consideration of the subject. That is generally enough time for most of the recommendations not to be accepted.

When the Prime Minister spoke about a Royal Commission earlier today he mentioned the Rowell-Sirois Royal Commission which was established in 1937 and reported about 1940. It was hardly ever heard from again, except in the lecture halls of universities.

We do not have great difficulty with the idea of a Royal Commission but rather with the way it is being approached. We would like to have a Royal Commission. Indeed, in the past we have urged that one be appointed, but we have two difficulties with the way it is being done here. First, it is being presented as a smokescreen behind which the Government can hide the unemployment figures as the number of people unemployed in this country grows. Second, we have the feeling that it is more related to the Prime Minister's leadership difficulties at the convention this weekend than it has to do with any serious and sincere concern for the economic problems that affect the people of this country. We recognize that the appointment of Mr. Macdonald is absolutely necessary for the weekend, but I do not think this is the kind of approach to Canada's economic problems that will enhance any trust, if there is any left, in this Government.

If there is to be a Royal Commission, we have a couple of ideas for the Government to consider when it actually sets up this Commission. The Commission should deal with both long-term and short-term problems. It should deal with specific facts and figures in relation to the analysis of what has happened to us in the past ten years. It should make recommendations for the immediate future as well as for the long term in terms of technological change between now and the turn of the century.

I think the Commission should also deal with those aspects of Government policy which have caused such incredible difficulty for this country. I refer to policies with respect to interest rates and the National Energy Program—at least, those aspects of it that have destroyed investor confidence. The Commission should deal with research and development and with the establishment of national training centres across the country so that people can be trained for jobs in the future. This Commission should not be one of those that is drawn out for two and three years. We hope that a deadline will be established of something in the order of six months.

Mr. Deans: Only until the leadership convention.

Mr. Crombie: That is right. I fear that the idea of this Commission will not even last beyond the weekend or until the Liberals have dealt with their convention. It is really a shoddy trick.

A Royal Commission should be independent. It should not be a vehicle for the Liberal Party to politicize its problems with respect to its responsibilities to the Canadian people. I suggest that this Commission be made up of three people, one of whom should represent labour in the interests of the working people. The second member of this Commission should be a woman, because there are so many more women now adversely affected than before with respect to employment opportunities. This three-person independent Commission should be dealing with both short-range and long-range problems. That is desirable so long as it is impartial and independent. The difficulty with such a Royal Commission is that it is simply playing politics on the part of the Liberal Party and its setting up has not been motivated by any sincere concern to do something for the people of Canada facing current economic difficulties.

I now want to deal with some of the matters raised by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Every time people make suggestions either inside or outside of this House these days, the Minister of Employment and Immigration keeps saying "Let's co-operate; why keep attacking me?" He gets very concerned that somehow we do not believe what he has to say.

The only specific proposal that this House has seen dealing with unemployment since the House opened a week ago has been the proposal made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) to establish a Program called NEED. This Program is to create 60,000 short-term jobs to begin in January, at a cost of about half a billion dollars. Make no mistake about the purpose of that Program. It is not to create jobs but to create an opportunity to allow those whose unemployment insurance benefits are exhausted and would then go on to welfare to requalify for UIC. To that extent, the Program is worthwhile. There is not a Member in this House who is opposed to opportunities for employment so that people can requalify for unemployment insurance. But anybody who suggests in all honesty that this is a job creation Program that deals with 1.75 million unemployed by creating 60,000 short-term jobs, I will not go so far as to say is dishonest, but is certainly in total ignorance of what is happening on the streets of this country. People are hurting yet the Government fools around with that kind of Program and this nonsense about a Royal Commission.

The priority of the Government should be to provide long-term jobs for people. The unemployment rate among the young of this country, those between the ages of 15 and 24, is 21 per cent. These people will not be affected by the Program which the Minister offers. They are not on unemployment insurance because these are the ones applying for their first jobs. Our graduates from colleges and universities have an unemployment rate this year, according to the figures this morning, of close to 19 per cent. The Government has not even bothered to address their problems.

When the Minister seeks co-operation and wonders why we attack his policies, he has forgotten that when he took over the Ministry two years ago the unemployment rate was 7.4 per cent. The number of unemployed at that time was 854,000 people. The rate two years later is 12.7 per cent and there are 1,521,000 people officially unemployed in this country. This Minister has presided over the largest decline of employment in this country since the great depression. I can understand why he gets thin-skinned about people who, on behalf of their own constituents, are attacking his lack of action. He knows his record as Minister has been the worst since the depression.

When a person is responsible for the doubling of unemployment and the loss of 750,000 jobs, I suppose putting up a smokescreen is about the only thing he can do. It is a smokescreen of numbers. The Minister of Finance's Program costing about half a billion dollars and creating 60,000 jobs was not even planned. When that Program was announced the Government was not even aware what budget it would have. It talked airily about participation by the other Provinces to bring in $1.2 billion. The federal Government would put in $500 million, with additions from the Provinces. It is now clear from the Minister's flying around, because we have now had a public statement from the Provinces that he will not have anywhere close to that amount of money for his budget. He not only has no budget but he has no program.

Did anyone hear one program which the Minister was suggesting that was new? There was not one idea. There was not one new program. The Minister was not only looking for ideas from the Provinces or anybody else because he did not have any ideas of his own, but he just had a budget that was brought in for the occasion. Rumours tell us that the Minister got permission from the Cabinet to do this about 24 hours before the Minister of Finance made his speech. The program bears the marks of having given no thought to the actual on-street delivery of jobs.

The Minister's problem is that he has been unable to approach the House in a kind of honest fashion that says "Here are the problems. Here are the difficulties we see with certain solutions. Here is what we would like to do in the short run and here is what we would like to do in the long run." That is the way in which most people would approach their responsibilities. He does not do that. The Minister of Employment and Immigration just announces figures, reannounces them, scrambles them, multiplies them, permutates them and combines them.

People across the country are at a loss to understand what those figures mean, but what we do know for sure after two years is that every time the Minister announces a new program, unemployment goes up. For people on the streets that is reality. Unemployment simply gets worse as we hear more and more figures announced and reannounced.

The Minister finished his speech in relation to what the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) said today by saying that this Program will have people back to work in the mines, in the fishing industry, in the manufacturing sector in Ontario, and that we will have people back to work in British Columbia. That is what the Minister does every time. The difficulty is that people know the reality. People live the reality. Increasingly, the federal Government is being brought into disrepute by that kind of publicity seeking, with no reality in terms of actual jobs delivered.

If there is any doubt in anyone's mind that the program announced by the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Employment and Immigration is only to do with so-called exhaustees, I suggest they read the report that was issued. It said that the program is specifically designed to benefit those who exhaust unemployment insurance benefits and would otherwise fall back on welfare. We agree with that. That is what must be done, but there are two problems involved. One, the figures which are used by the Minister which set out 60,000 jobs—even if it is that many—are about 25,000 too short. The statistics the Government is using with respect to unemployment are far lower than the actual unemployment. Mark my words, Mr. Speaker, it will discover that it will have to return to the House or make an announcement that it will need to increase that fund, because the program offered will not cover all those people who are on unemployment and will fall on welfare.

The statistics this morning indicate that this is already happening, let alone what will happen next month and the following months. While there is a short-term problem, the Government's short-term program will not even cover those who are currently drawing unemployment insurance and about to fall into welfare.

Second, it is an absolutely cruel hoax by the Government to suggest that this type of program has anything to do with those who are not on unemployment insurance and going on to welfare. It does not affect the million other people who are simply unemployed. For that reason the Minister is in difficulty when he makes those statements because he promises far too much. People depend on his announcements because they accept what he says as a Minister of the Crown to be the truth. As someone said this morning about a provincial Minister whom he had already seen, "He came here looking for publicity, money and ideas. He got none of them."

There is an interesting column in this morning's Citizen which I believe makes the case. The title is: "Job Creation Plan Still a Mystery". Indeed it is, Mr. Speaker. It is still a mystery. The Minister flies, he announces, multiplies and combines, but no jobs of any significance are created for anyone.

Part of the NDP motion also deals with the way in which the unemployment insurance system works. I believe that the Minister made a good defence of the quality of those working in his Department, who try very hard to fill the orders. When the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James indicated that there were thousands of problems with the way unemployment insurance is administered, he was right. I suggest that it was unfair for the Minister to simply say we should not accuse the workers in that Department of not working hard. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James was not suggesting that. He is trying to impress upon the Minister that there are thousands of problems with how the Unemployment Insurance Program is administered.

The fact of the matter is that every Member in the House can produce a file such as I have—which is only last week's alone—of people who have legitimate concerns over the administration of unemployment insurance. I expect that the Minister would listen to those concerns and act upon them rather than simply attack someone who legitimately questions the administration of the program.

Let me select one letter from about 30 which I received last week. This is an appropriate letter because it points out the problems of UIC. This letter was written to "Change Canada". This person wrote:

> I watched your Television promotion on training Canadians for trades of the future. One thing that I am confused about is the fact that I am one of those Canadians given the chance to be retrained at Humber College (Canada Manpower Retraining) for which I had used all of my Unemployment Insurance Benefits only to find that after long hours of homework and sacrifice I am now in the position of having no employment.
> I have inquired for employment at over 140 companies dealing in this field. Being without employment I have taken a job at a temporary placement service which can be of no benefit to me and my career change.
> Now I find, that after graduating on December 4, 1981, no one is in the position to hire me due to economic conditions. I cannot even get a junior position in my field! (Numerical Control Machine Program) and no one will give me a position in labour because they feel I will leave when I find an opportunity to enter my field.
> So could you please answer this question? Is this new program you are offering designed to give false hopes in the future or is it sincere considering the Employment Departments are going to import 20,000 skilled workers? Where does this leave Canadians like myself?

All the letters that most Members receive either deal with the administration and the problem of getting service in terms of UI payouts or, even more importantly in the long run, with trying to get employment in the types of jobs that the Government, over the last number of years, has seen fit to train people for.

The all-Party committee in its estimation of the track record of the Government in producing training for jobs that are available, which is called "Work for Tomorrow", utterly condemned the Government's handling of Manpower programs primarily because they lead to dead-end jobs, if any job at all. This was the view of all parties in that committee.

This has been the problem throughout when trying ot deal with the Minister and the Government generally in terms of understanding what is actually happening to ordinary Canadians in towns, villages and cities all across Canada as they try to cope with the deepening recession. Canadians, and indeed our Party, do not want to blame the Government; it is just so difficult to convey to it that when it only gives us numbers and multiplies them and publicizes those figures, it creates that lack of trust and credibility which is so entrenched in the minds of Canadians that even when it brings out a program that may be helpful, people have difficulty believing it.

This afternoon a number of Members from the New Democratic Party will be making points and offering suggestions in support of their motion. We will support that motion because the Minister and his Government seem far more concerned either with its publicity or its internal politics than with seriously dealing with the recession which is deepening every day.

The unemployment figures which were released this morning are the highest since the depression. There is 12.7 per cent of the Canadian work force unemployed and 21 per cent of those are between the ages of 15 and 24. Those are the young Canadians who are just starting out in their work life. As well, many towns and villages are economically decimated by the deepening recession while the Government does so little to help those towns and villages which we in the House know so well are so adversely affected that they are unable to deal with their own economic base. Hamilton, for example, has unemployment at 15 per cent.

I see that my time is up, Mr. Speaker. I will conclude by saying that unless the Government begins to take the unemployment difficulties in this country seriously, it will reap social problems in this country which will take decades to rectify. It is time for the Government to stop worrying about publicity and politics and to start working hard to ensure that long-term, useful programs are developed for the people out on the street who are crying out for them.

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, it was with some dismay and deep regret, I must say, that I heard anything but positive remarks from the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) earlier this morning. There is an old saying with which I think we are all familiar. It is: "If at first you don't succeed, try and try again."

The Minister's feelings were obviously hurt. He said that we do not congratulate him when he tries. He does try, Mr. Speaker. He tries and tries and tries again. However, the first part of that equation is: "If at first you don't succeed—" I, and I think all Canadians, are only left with the very clear impression that the Minister has failed again and again and again and that is why he must keep on trying. That is a sorry situation.

There is such an absolute myriad of mismanagement, disorganization and unco-ordination in the conduct of one employment program after another that no one could believe it is only the fault of some hard working public employees. The Minister himself said that those employees have been working overtime for hours every day, coming in with fresh recruits, having to train at least hundreds to do a job for which the Department is so ill prepared. No one will blame those people. I thought it was a very cheap shot by the Minister to suggest that we were going after the hard working employees of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. No such thought was in our minds. In fact, I would pay a compliment. There have been fuddle-ups in the EBAP Program, within the Salmon Enhancement Program in the Lower Mainland of British Columbia and others. We have actually seen pictures on television of unemployed Canadians who were left with no cash at all because of the fumbling of the Minister, his Government and Department. One of them was lent money out of the pockets of an employee of the Unemployment Insurance Commission. With the restraints imposed upon those hard working employees by the Government, they can ill afford to pass out that money, especially to people who, if we go by the track record of UIC delays, really do not know when or whether their next benefit cheques will come. So it was a cheap shot by the Minister. The Minister has failed and failed again, not the employees of the UIC and not the hard working employees elsewhere in his Department.

Before I list the catalogue of horror stories, both specific and more general, I want to make a comment on a peculiar announcement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) of the establishment of yet another Royal Commission into Canada's economic prospects. It is fascinating to some of us who recall history to find that we should once again have a Prime Minister and Government Members who continually pile parliamentary committees upon Royal Commissions. That was the description in the well known poem of Frank Scott entitled "W.L.M.K." In reference to our late Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Mackenzie King, he wrote:

The height of his ambition

Was to pile a Parliamentary Committee on a

Royal Commission

My, my, things have not changed very much, have they? They have not changed at all. I wonder whether this is the resurrection of Walter Gordon, who headed a Royal Commission on Canada's economic prospects approximately 20 years ago. Will this one turn out to be such a failure? Will the person appointed to run it be the same kind of failure, according to that Government opposite as well as many Canadians, as was the author of that report? When will we receive a regurgitated Herb Gray report on foreign investment in Canada? Is that the next one? When will we get a regurgitated form of a Carter Royal Commission on Taxation? Will we get that, too? Will we have one regurgitated rehash and resurrection after another?

If that is all the Government has to offer, it ought to get out now because there is no sense in us being positive with its Members. All they want to do is hide behind one more commission, behind the hard working Public Service, to screen them from the attacks so legitimately deserved by the Government. What a sorry mess. What a sorry prospect for Canadians who, like many of my constituents who I visited this summer, are almost without hope because of the Government's constant inaction and delays.

I think the most heartrending experience I have ever had was in visiting the homes of some of my former workmates at B.C. Timber's Kootenay forest products sawmill in Nelson which has been shut down for almost a year. The first group was dropped from the seniority list, after being laid off for 18 months just a few days ago. I am not stereotyping here, but I think that almost all Hon. Members in this House and most Canadians would agree that, in spite of their Catholicism,Italian-Canadians are almost the very picture of the Protestant work ethic. No group is recognized as working harder and longer and using credit less until the advent of the larcenous interest policies of the last few years, both the Conservative and Liberal interest rate policies. Hardly any member of that community even went into debt to buy a house. To start with, they would buy a small house. They would build and improve. They would pool their labour together with their neighbours and families.

Now we see that after decades of hard and honest work, many of these people own not only their own homes, but also second homes and third homes. However, because the only industrial operations in their community have been shut down for either a year or a year and a half, they do not have any tenants left because anyone who does not have deep roots has moved away. These home owners are in a state of crisis. Some of the hardest cases that I know of, and I use that term in a complimentary way, involve guys who would give me the roughest time at any union meeting we ever attended. I have been seated at their kitchen tables when these men have openly cried in front of me and admitted to me that on alternate days—because they are still pretty strong—they think that perhaps the sawmill will open again, that they may survive and will be in a position to send their children to ice-skating classes again. They think that maybe they will be able to afford to put decent food on the table on a regular basis again and purchase a few building materials to make improvements to their houses so they can take advantage of some of the other Government programs. But then there are the other days when they look at the sorry morass around them across this country, the morass that this Government sits on top of, and they wonder if they will ever get out of that hole.

I have seen them break down and cry, and these are pretty tough people, these hard working guys, some of the toughest I have ever had the honour of working beside. When they work they work hard, and when they build they build well. They want a chance to build, a chance to contribute, because it hurts anyone's pride to be left out of the productive sector of our society. It is exactly these people and their neighbors who have never had to resort to going on UIC benefits before, and it tears their guts out to think they may have to go on welfare. I will not continue to talk about how these people, no matter how hard pressed they are, feel. It is a sad story and having once stated it, I do not believe we need to go over it again and again.

However, I do want to refer to some specific problems. In my own home town of Nelson and in the surrounding community, there are a number of programs under the Employment Bridging Assistance Program. However, one of the problems is that if one is approved and hired under such a Program, one is taken off the regular UIC computers and is entered on to a manual system of benefits payment. Quoting from a newspaper article in my own local paper, "If you work, you wait longer for your cheque than you would if you do not work". That is the dilemma being faced by unemployed Nelson area workers who have opted for make-work projects funded under the federal-provincial Employment Bridging Assistance Program. That is exactly what has happened because of the fumbling within the Minister's area of responsibility. If one goes to work for one's benefits, one does not receive any money for weeks. When I say weeks, I do not mean two or three. One can be cut off regular benefits which one has received for a long time and then can wait two to 12 weeks before one begins to receive any money out of the benefits one has paid for. That is inexcusable and intolerable and these delays have been going on for months.

Do Hon. Members want to know what happened to one of these UIC employees who led a group of his fellow EBAP employees down to the welfare office so they would have social assistance to provide food on their tables? He had the audacity, I suppose, according to the Government's views, to complain on CBC Radio about the maladministration of the Program, not only because of delays in payments, but also because administration costs going to the employers of record had risen from $50 a week to $100 to $200 per week per man. He was fired from the UIC Program the next day and his employer of record said that it had nothing to do with his work.

Those of us who know the history of Canada, especially that of working people, realize that not so long ago it was not uncommon for employees of Government and employees in private industry to be fired for exercising their God-given right to freedom of speech. But have we now reached the point where one can be fired from the unemployment rolls for it? How ridiculous can they get? I raised this matter the other day in the House. When that employee sought redress through his former union representative—of course he does not pay dues any more but he has a retirement card—he looked at the laws of the land and found out that his provincial Government, the partner in this mess with the federal Government had wiped out the Employment Standards Act of British Columbia as it applied to people who work under the Employment Bridging Assistance Program. I expect that has happened in other Provinces as well.

The Minister of Labour (Mr. Caccia) is present but the Minister of Employment and Immigration is not. I ask him whether the Government will assume some responsibility for the conditions and terms of work of people employed under a program which is essentially its program. If the Provinces, either by collusion with the federal Government or acting independently—British Columbia does some funny things some times—do not look after the basic and fundamental rights of employees, surely we must ask the federal Government and the Minister of Labour to confirm that this is a matter of federal jurisdiction. Then a case could be made and the basic rights, imperfect as they are outlined in our federal labour laws, will apply to these EBAP employees.

I should like to turn to a slightly less serious note but one that is very important. The Minister of Employment and Immigration wanted some cases. What about an unemployed construction worker in Vancouver who was denied his claim for benefits because he was pregnant? Perhaps this example is on the humorous side, but I would like to quote his language, it is not mine. He went down to the unemployment insurance office and said, "I know I am getting screwed but I ain't pregnant". The information I have is that he is still waiting, and he has been waiting weeks and weeks. Anyone can slip up. I am not suggesting that this sort of extreme example, which gives the worst impression, often goes on. There are more odd stories than we would like to ever admit or think about.

I would like to refer to another case of an unemployed logger who has waited 12 weeks for his benefits. For some weeks he has, along with other claimants, been launching a class action law suit, assisted by his union, the International Woodworkers, against the Minister and the Unemployment Insurance Commission. Why is it that people have to shell out their own money, whether it is money that they have put into union dues or out of their own pockets, to get some attention paid to foul-ups and unconscionable delays in payments of regular UIC benefits to which they are entitled and for which they have paid many times over? These are not lazy people. Many of them have not been on UIC before. They have paid into it, they want to work, and they have a right to expect their benefits. It is not enough to say that, "we are working all our employees overtime, hiring more people and training more people." My God, could they not see it coming?

Mr. Young: They planned it.

Mr. Kristiansen: As my colleague says, they planned it. Perhaps it was not planned consciously.

Mr. Young: It was consciously.

Mr. Heap: Trudeau threatened it.

Mr. Kristiansen: Many people suspected that it was planned. It got away on them. They went a little too far. It was not enough to kick just a few people back into their place or to lower the proportion of the national income which goes to the labour force. They got carried away. Now we are in the midst of what the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) admitted the other day was a depression, and let there be no doubt about it. The Minister of Employment took some issue with him, but even today in Question Period the Minister of Finance said that this is a time when the value of homes is going down. In response to a question by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper), the mover of this motion, earlier today, the Minister of Finance said that this is a time when the value of people's homes is going down and when prices on a wide range of commodities were falling. He did not say that the prices set and determined by the Government are going down; they continue to go up.

When prices are falling in this manner along with the value of homes, the rate of inflation and, of course, interest rates, it is not a recession, it is a depression. I am not trying to be an alarmist, but the other day the Minister of Finance said that we were in a state of depression. Those were his words, not mine. That is exactly the situation we are in.

Also a few moments ago the Minister of Employment made reference to consultation and that somehow my NDP colleagues and I do not want good consultation with anyone.

Mr. Young: Where is the Minister?

Mr. Kristiansen: He is probably at the convention. Politics before people, that is their way.

The Community Development Program has done many good things. We welcome it. I know, as I am sure many other Members of the House know, that we have excellent working relationships at the regional and local level with the officials of Employment Canada. We consult regularly. We had, after the Tories took them away and the Liberals brought them back, excellent institutions known as Local Advisory Boards, which built up some skills, so that there would be proper community consultation. A few months ago the Minister and the Government wiped out these Boards, and immediately some Liberal Senators in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and elsewhere ran around the country becoming involved in pork-barrel politics once again. We always welcome money. Now we have been told that there is a whole bunch of extra money for us. We want it, and my people can use it. It is good, and I congratulate them for it. But, it must be spent in a hurry, it must be spent quickly. There was not even time for a minimal consultative process similar to the ones which NDP Members and myself have paid for ourselves in the absence of any consultative process being carried on by the Government.

Do you want to know what the officials of Employment Canada had to say about it? One official said:

> The Prime Minister's office has been providing projects. They have to be approved by Lloyd Axworthy. There are no regional allocations. The only real concrete guidelines are that 50 per cent must be spent on labour.

Another employee said:

> The message came down that these guys are getting it. We've put in our objections that this by-passes the whole advisory board route. But they didn't heed any of our words. I believe it was the Minister's office. It's really annoying. It's going past any processes that have been established. It looks like patronage.

One final quotation by an official in Employment Canada was as follows:

> The Senators have been talking to various community groups. They're asking some people if they have a project that could use money. This whole thing is very political.

I think that is enough. The Minister is not speaking the truth. He talks about the fact that we do not believe in consultation. It is he who does not believe in it; they do not believe in it.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his allotted time has expired.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I rise to participate in this debate because the subject matter is of great concern to me and the constitutents I represent. It is fitting for me to congratulate the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) as well as the Hon. Member for Rosedale (Mr. Crombie) who earlier in the week had this very same subject matter placed before the House of Commons. I like to see issues of great importance not only to my constituency but to the national economy placed before the Parliament of Canada.

In reading through the motion put forward by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James, I note that the tone of that motion is a harsh one. I agree with some parts of the motion. The Hon. Member attacks the system of unemployment insurance and attacks a system whereby there are numerous delays, claims and appeals. Members of Parliament have files of people who are encountering these difficulties. It is fair to place before the Parliament of Canada, the Minister and his officials as well as Government members those specific instances so that they can be examined.

It is awfully unfair for the Conservative Party and the New Democratic Party to talk only of the problems and not the solutions. Anyone can list the number of people unemployed in his or her community. Anyone, particularly on the Opposition benches, can list the number of businesses that have gone into bankruptcy or receivership as a result of the world economic recession. Unfortunately, when mentioning the problem they forget some very pertinent elements, such as the world recession of which Canada is a part. They fail to mention that there are 30 million people unemployed in the OECD countries. If Canadians for one moment think or hope that somehow that world recession is going to pass us by and leave us alone, they are sadly mistaken.

When listening to the Opposition, particularly the New Democratic Party, one would think there is only one Government in this country. Yes, there is a national Government, but there are also provincial and municipal Governments and they have to play their part.

Not only the public sector but the private sector has a role to play in terms of changing and turning our economy around to provide the jobs we all want. I find it somewhat repugnant to have the Hon. Member for Rosedale, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James or the New Democratic Party try to have this corner of sympathy for the working man to themselves. All Members of Parliament regardless of their political ideology share that concern and want to do something about unemployment.

The Government has introduced the six and five program on wages and prices. It has to be accepted that a 6 per cent world or 6 per cent inflation rate is a lot better than the 12 or 14 per cent world we have had for the last number of months and will provide businesses with confidence and the incentive to reinvest. It is essential that that program work.

I find Members of Parliament, particularly those opposite, questioning the substance of that program, sneering at it as opposed to getting together with a collective will as a national parliament to support that program. It is in the best interest of every working man and woman in this country to have inflation reduced substantially and to have prices reduced as much possible in order to have our economy turn around.

There are certain facts that even the Opposition, although they talk about the problems, have forgotten to mention. I talked about provincial Governments. We ought not to forget our responsibilities as a national Government, but provincial Governments have a role to play as well. What has the provincial Government of my Province of Nova Scotia done? They are of a different political stripe than we. They have had taxes upon taxes, particularly on industries in my constituency. It is very difficult.

The Government of Canada has introduced a Program funded to the tune of $500 million called the NEED Program. I am somewhat concerned that the New Democratic Party would make jokes and laugh about such a Program. The Program not only requires money from other levels of Government, but requires a sense of co-operation by municipal and provincial Governments to make it work.

It is not the time for us in Canada, regardless of our political ideology, to play that game. The problem is too serious. We need to have jobs in this country and we need them now. To those individuals opposite who want to engage in political rhetoric and political gamesmanship, I say I do not want any part of it. As a member of the national Government, I want to co-operate with my provincial and municipal Governments to see that people get back to work, and do so right away.

The Hon. Member who spoke prior to me made some remarks about the Minister of Employment and Immigration

(Mr. Axworthy) not being in the House today. That is correct, he is away. He is attending a national convention at the present time. He is discussing issues and resolutions pertaining to jobs, job creation and the economic development of this country. That is important. The Hon. Member has on this occasion and indeed on many other occasions taken upon himself to resort to low and undignified tactics in this House.

The Department of Employment and Immigration is not the only arm of the Government of Canada. There are numerous other Departments that are actively involved in an attempt to create jobs in Canada and to create them right away.

I mention to the Hon. Member that in my own riding in the last number of weeks and months the Department of Fisheries has made moneys available for the creation of numerous jobs. I refer to the very small communities of South Bar, Lingan, Barrachois Cove, False Bay Beach and Little Harbour in Richmond County. Thousands of dollars have been poured into those small communities. They are not Vancouver, Toronto or Montreal but small communities. The Government has put this money into those communities to build facilities to assist the fisherman who, too, is a working person. This is very important, but we do not hear anything positive coming from those on that side. They never want to highlight the moneys which the Government of Canada spends in their areas. As I said at the outset, their sole purpose is to emphasize the problem and not talk about the solution. Part of the solution is making certain that the federal Government and its agencies expedite the moneys they have budgeted under this capital program to get jobs moving in this country.

I have had consultations with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc). I have emphasized that it is absolutely essential for him and his Department to expedite each and every proposal that is budgeted for in his Department so that jobs, construction and a variety of economic spin-offs will result from those initiatives. Housing, Mr. Speaker, is vital. As the House knows, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) put additional sums of money into those programs. That also is part of the solution. It is not the entire solution and I would be less than honest if I tried to suggest in this Chamber, the highest court in this country, that we have all the solutions and answers. As a national Government, we have to accept our responsibilities and put into place the best programs based on the amounts of money available. Even the New Democratic Party has broken away from its longstanding tradition of not increasing the federal deficit any longer.

I am somewhat saddened, however, by the NDP and the Conservative Party of Canada because there is a sense of hypocrisy when they talk about job creation and job security. In my own riding we are fighting tooth and nail to save two heavy water plants. The NDP laughed because at their national conference they said they were not in favour of the nuclear industry. They said in the House of Commons that the two heavy water plants should be closed. The Progressive Conservative Party said basically the same thing, in what the Chairman of the Public Accounts Committee said, in what the former minister of Finance said when he intimated in his questions to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) that they ought to be closed. Yet Hon. Members opposite have the gall to come before this Chamber and say they are concerned, they want to have job creation, have jobs maintained and have security. I find a great deal of hypocrisy coming from the other side of the House, which concerns me greatly. I sat in this Chamber when the Hon. Member for Rosedale brought in his motion earlier this week. I listened to the hon. member for Winnipeg-St. James. I tried to get one hint of some positive notion they might have in terms of job creation or of stimulating the Canadian economy, and absolutely nothing was forthcoming. It is intellectually dishonest to say, on the one hand, yes, I am concerned about the unemployed and, on the other hand, not to propose anything of assistance. I think that is shameful on the part of the Opposition in this Chamber.

The Conservative Party throughout this country has a responsibility. Every municipal government has a responsibility. We, the Government of Canada, also have a responsibility, and that is to put those programs into place so that we can assist in some real way in alleviating the unemployment problem in this country. The Minister has articulated today the number of programs which are in place and the additional moneys which will be forthcoming for those programs. It is not the panacea for all the ills of the unemployed. I think it would be dishonest on my part if I even suggested that. But it is equally dishonest for the Opposition Parties to stand in their place when there is a national concern like the unemployment issue and merely talk of the problem but provide no solution.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, the Parties opposite are not doing their job. I think it is high time we put political rhetoric aside and collectively supported the Government's policy of six and five, that we supported the principles of fairness and sharing so that those that have, will share with those who do not. That is key, Mr. Speaker, in terms of changing around the Canadian economy. I suggest today, as I have in previous discussions with various Ministers, that the national Government has to continue to examine, through debate and various discussions, the programs we have put into place. We have to expedite some of our capital projects as quickly as possible. We have to do this with a demonstrated spirit of co-operation with other levels of Government and, indeed, the private sector. When inflation prices come down and interest rates come down, I think the road to recovery is not far off, but we must work together as Members of Parliament, not just solely as members of a constituency. The problems are too serious to be shoved aside.

In concluding my remarks, I want to go on record now, as a Member who represents a constituency which has high unemployment, as expressing appreciation to the Minister, to his Parliamentary Secretary and, indeed, to all the members of the Public Service of that Department, for the sensitivity and co-operation they have bestowed on my constituency which is encountering some grave times. I assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the individuals in my constituency, who are hard pressed by unemployment, are aware of those who proposed the quick fix. It is just like the old medicine man when he came around with a bottle of medicine and tried to perpetrate a fraud on the people. The people knew this was not going to be a cure for the illness. I suggest to the Opposition, therefore, let us be honest, put the facts on the table and come to grips with our problems in a co-operative way. Let us have programs for Canadians and forget the political rhetoric which the Party opposite is so good at spreading in this country.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, it is, as usual, a pleasure to follow the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Dingwall). The Hon. Member and I have profoundly different views as to what is wrong in Canada and what needs to be done to make it right. The Parliamentary Secretary asks for solutions. He asks the Members of the Progressive Conservative Party of Canada for solutions. Well, Mr. Speaker, you cannot have a solution without first understanding the problem. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has admitted we are in a recession. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in his public television broadcast would have you believe that that recession is a consequence of the world-wide economic situation. You would have to be blind not to realize, that, of course, there is a world-wide problem. But other industrialized nations are not in recession. That is a unique Canadian condition caused by Canadians, and if the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Energy would like a solution to the current problem, can I make one very simple suggestion? There are 147 members of his Party elected to this House. There is a distance of 20 feet to be crossed over to this side of the House to cause a general federal election to be held in this country so that individual Canadians can have a choice as to the future economic direction of this country. That, Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the Hon. Members of this House, is the only solution that will work, because this is a recession brought on primarily, by fear of the federal Government of Canada and what it will do to individuals. It is a fear brought on by the track record of the present Government. It is fear brought to the hearts of Canadians by what the Members opposite have done to this country. It is fear brought to the hearts of Canadians by what the Members opposite have done to this country. It is fear brought on by both previous and current legislation. It is a well known fact, Mr. Speaker, that in the two years since the Liberal Government came back into office some $18 billion—$18 billion—of capital has left this country to be invested in homes, condominiums and factories in the U.S., and in oil wells and drilling platforms around the world. This money was chased out of this country—unwillingly, but chased—by federal Government policies, and with every dollar of that money there went jobs.

The fear has grown in Canadians, Mr. Speaker. Two days ago, on Tuesday of this week, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) introduced into the Senate of Canada a Bill which is a direct attack on property rights. There is a Bill before this Chamber, dealing with Public Works, which is a direct attack on the right of Canadians to own property. These are two current pieces of legislation, and they go together, Mr. Speaker, with the National Energy Program which took 25 per cent of property held by Canadians in the oil industry on Canada lands, confiscated it without compensation. It was that particular piece of legislation, coupled with the Constitution, which created the fear in those who had money, those who were willing to create businesses and jobs in this country. It created that fear, Mr. Speaker, so investors took their money and left the country. For the balance of their lives they will not trust the leadership of the party which sits opposite the Conservatives in this House. The leader of that party have been supported by the 146 Members on the backbenches, and they have brought fear to this land through that support. They cannot correct the problem, Mr. Speaker, until the Government changes, until we create a new face on economic conditions in this country.

The victims, Mr. Speaker, are the unemployed. Right at this moment, as we speak in this Chamber, in some communities in this country, individual hard-working employees will be getting a letter from the president of their employer. That letter will say that unfortunately economic conditions are such that we have to close this factory, we have to close this mine, lay off 20 per cent of the people, and you are on the list. How many of us in this chamber stop to think how we would feel if that letter arrived on our desk and we had to climb on the subway or on the bus and go home and break the news to our families? How would we feel if we had to tell our families that the income we have been counting on to pay the mortgage on our house, to pay the rent or make car payments has all of a sudden been cut off?

For the average Canadian, Mr. Speaker, there is a sense of betrayal, a sense of bewilderment, because they do not comprehend where and how all this began. Well, Mr. Speaker, it began in the years 1972 to 1974. You can see it in the public accounts of Canada. The Prime Minister was in office, the Hon. John Turner was the Minister of Finance, but the Liberal Party was in a minority position, forced to depend on the New Democratic Party for support. When they look at the financial records of the Government of Canada, people may remember that those were good times. My family taught me that in good times you save a little for a rainy day. That is a sensible way to think about your own future and your own life. In those good times when the Government could have been saving a little for a rainy day, the Liberal Party and the NDP put Canada on the path of borrowing money. We are in good times, so let us go deeper in debt. In those years, Mr. Speaker, federal Government expenditures went up 30 per cent a year. Inflation was around 4 per cent or 5 per cent. And our debt has continued to grow to this day.

When I was elected in 1979, Mr. Speaker, 17 cents out of every federal tax dollar went to pay interest on the national debt. As I stand here three years later, it is over 30 cents. Back in 1979 the Government had 83 cents to spend and 17 cents to pay the interest. Today it is 30 cents on interest and 70 cents left to provide unemployment insurance benefits, build an airport or try to stimulate the economy. What happens, Mr. Speaker, to individual Canadians if they borrow so much money that everything they earn goes to pay interest? They have nothing left for food. That is what the NDP Party and the Liberal Party did to this country.

As I stand here today, Mr. Speaker, I look with regret on the first seven days of the return of this Parliament. Last spring, one year ago, two years ago, three years ago, we were warning the Government that unemployment was bound to become a flood. We told the Government over and over again that when unemployment rises there are other social costs. Individuals and families are put under stress. And now unemployment has risen to the point where we can expect a 20 per cent increase in the number of Canadians suffering from the problems of alcoholism. We have about 20 per cent more suicides and heart attacks than we had a year ago, all of which are a direct result of the incease in unemployment we have experienced in the past year.

We stood in this House, Mr. Speaker, and asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin), if she was planning for that eventuality, what extra money she would provide for it. And we have been told with clarity: "No planning, no extra money. We cannot get it." Well, the reason they cannot get it is that they spent it when times were good. They did not save for a rainy day. Well, the rainy day is here and the Government does not have the money to help Canadians. But the Government bribed Canadians with borrowed money in order to be re-elected, and then the Members opposite have the gall to stand up and say: we do not have the money. But they never tell you why, Mr. Speaker. They do not remind you of the past decade and what they did and the bind they put Canadians in today.

We go to the Minister of Finance and review his public pronouncements in the last couple of weeks. We know there are 1.5 million unemployed Canadians out there and there are an awful lot more Canadians who make less money per hour today than they made a year ago. Incomes are dropping. The average adult person's income in this country has dropped enormously in the past 12 months. People are worried about buying food and about making their house payments. Then, because they are worried, we get the Minister of Finance standing up and going to news conferences and saying, "Now you can worry about your pension and about your family allowance payments. We do not think you are worried enough so we are going to make you worry some more. You do not have enough trouble putting food on your table, so we as a Cabinet are considering cutting out your family allowance payments and pensions". At a time when Canadians are worried enough, why do they do that? What positive value is served by the announcement that the Government is considering these moves, by the announcement: not today but maybe tomorrow? What does this uncertainty do to help this country? I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that it does nothing positive but it does a great deal that is negative to increase the distress level, the heart attacks, the suicides, the alcoholism and violence around us. That is what it does. Yet the 146 Hon. Members opposite continue to support a leadership that does that to the nation at the worst possible time and in the worst possible way. Where is the sanity in that?

In December, 1979 the Progressive Conservative Party, under the leadership of the Hon. Member for Yellowhead (Mr. Clark) had been in office for nine short months. I should like to remind Canadians that in those nine short months the number of employed Canadians increased by 350,000 people—in nine months 350,000 more jobs were created, Mr. Speaker. The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) who was the Minister of Finance of the day brought in a budget. All across the country learned people judged it to be the fairest budget in the world for the poor. It was the fairest budget for the poor in the decade of the seventies because it gave assistance to a broad range of Canadians and it gave a great deal of assistance to the really poor. At the same time, it encouraged Canadians to own their own home, it gave them the courage to start a small business. Young people dared to dream about owning a farm, or owning a piece of a large business through the stock system.

Built into that budget was the principle of encouraging Canadians to own, to invest and to produce. It encouraged Canadians from coast to coast to create jobs, and in nine months 350,000 jobs were created; that was 40,000 jobs per month, Mr. Speaker. In this last month we have lost 50,000 full-time jobs, Mr. Speaker. A loss of 50,000 jobs and a gain of 40,000 jobs means a difference of 90,000 jobs in a one-month period. That difference was brought about by a change in the attitude of one agency in society, that is, the federal Government.

For the New Democratic Party to put this motion and speak about their compassion for the unemployed is one thing—no one doubts their compassion—but their sanity is a different matter. When we had a government that was creating jobs for Canadians, they threw it out. I hope that the next time Canadians get a chance to vote in this country, they will remember that the New Democratic Party is culpable, is guilty, is a partner in responsibility for 1.5 million people being unemployed in this country today.

That situation exists as a direct consequence of the actions of the man who now leads that Party in the Province of Ontario. He moved the motion. He was the finance critic for that Party, but he did not have the brains to see the wisdom of the budget. He led people down the garden path, and now 1.5 million Canadians are suffering unnecessarily. He was supported in that exercise by the trickery of the leadership of the Party opposite, the Party that does not dare tell the Canadians the truth, the Party that says it does not have any money and tries to bamboozle people about why there is no money. The money is not available because that Party spent it when it should have been saving it. It has chased jobs out of the country through its policies, its attitudes and because of the insane support by backbench Members of that Party for the leadership.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, may I offer one solution. It will be slow and painful but it will be positive. The solution for the unemployed in this country lies in a federal general election. This recession is the consequence of fear—fear of the leadership of this country. Until the leadership is changed and people Canadians can trust are elected, they will not have a chance and jobs will not be created.

Every day that this Parliament sits, more Canadians will lose their lifetime careers, will be made to depend on the social support system and will risk losing the dignity of being a productive member of society. True patriotism asks simply that seven people walk that 20 feet and start to help this country back to economic health.

Mr. Douglas Fisher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to join in this debate today and make some comments about the unemployment insurance fund. I will offer statistics which I hope will help people understand the impact of the increase in premiums.

Before I do so, however, may I thank the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes) for his usual numbing insights into the performance of this Party. The more I listen to him the more I am able to repeat his speech by rote. I am surprised that he did not bring in Ghengis Khan or the Spanish Revolution today, two phenomena that he has managed to discuss in previous monologues. I look forward to hearing about them from that quarter the next time the Hon. Member speaks. I missed that part of his standard address today.

An Hon. Member: He had only 20 minutes.

Mr. Fisher: As my colleague points out, he had only 20 minutes so he had to leave something out.

I am pleased to be able to make some comments about the unemployment insurance fund in the presence of the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey). When he assumed the arduous task of changing and strengthening the unemployment insurance fund in the early 1970s, he could not have foreseen how valuable his contribution would be to the fabric of the country in tough times like these. So it is a great pleasure for me to point out that we have been able to draw on the strength of his ideas during this most difficult period.

The unemployment insurance fund is a vital safeguard. It is the first safety net for Canadians when they face the tragedy of unemployment. It was built with the funds of the workers, especially during periods of prosperity, and supported by Government funds, especially in tough times like these.

Every worker knows that the fund is there as a vital insurance plan. He contributes personally to that insurance and he expects responsible Government help and support when the contributions are not sufficient.

In this October statement, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) followed this principle. He strengthened the Government's assistance for the fund and asked those workers who have the strength, who have the jobs and the resources, to contribute to the fund as well.

An increase in premiums was brought in on October 27. I should like to put the details of that on the record so that we may understand the consequences of this.

The new rates for 1983 are $2.33 for $100 of insurable earnings for an employee, and $3.22 for $100 of insurable earnings for the employer. The maximum insurable weekly earnings are rising to $385 in 1983. Therefore, the maximum weekly contributions per employee will rise to $8.86 and to $12.40 for the employer. The maximum annual contribution for an employee will rise to $460.72. It will rise to $645.01 for the employer. This is what we are asking ordinary Canadians to contribute to their fund, to their safety net, their insurance policy. At the same time the Government of Canada is contributing $1 billion to pick up the shortfall. At the moment, according to our projections, the fund is running a cumulative deficit of $6.5 billion. It will reach that state by the end of 1983.

If we went only to the insurance aspect of the fund, if we went only to the workers and said, "You must pick up the shortfall", the workers' premium would not be $2.30, it would be $3.75 per $100 of insurable earnings. If we did not go the insurance route, if we simply said that we should subsidize the fund from Government general revenues, then we would have added $3 billion to our deficit in 1983. In both cases, we felt those were too extreme. We felt that the premium increase all the way up to cover the deficit would have been too tough a blow on both the worker and the employer. Equally, as all parties in this House have said, we did not believe that $3 billion could be added on to the federal deficit at this time. So we compromised.

We asked the worker to pay an extra 65 cents a week for every $100 of insurable earnings. We asked the Government to pay $1 billion to soften the total cumulative deficit. What is the impact on the private sector? That is a 39.4 per cent increase in premiums. What is the impact of that on the private sector. In gross terms, the gross revenue is $2,189 million. But we need to remember that for both the worker and the employer, these premiums are tax deductible. We also need to remember that a large portion of the employer related contributions are coming from governments acting as employers.

When we make these calculations, we find that the private sector, in after-tax dollars, is going through a $1,400 million increase, not a $2,100 million increase, roughly two-thirds the gross size. The impact is considerably diminished. Also we need to remember that over the past year some very significant changes have been made in our tax measures.

I listened with great interest when the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper) had some comments on the tax rate workers will pay over the coming year. I think he had some of his statistics somewhat wrong. I would like to point out to him that there have been significant drops in the marginal tax rates. Those drops were increased in the November budget a year ago and are in place now.

We also saw an increase of $50 in the child tax credit for lower- and middle-income families. That increase was introduced in the June budget and it is in effect now. In the October statement, the Minister of Finance continued the tax free status of employer-paid health and dental plans.

These increases in the unemployment insurance plan premiums are not coming in a vacuum, they are coming along with decreases in some of the other taxes that ordinary people are paying.

Most important, and I keep coming back to this, we are following the principle that those who have resources, those who have the funds, those who have the strength, are joining with the Government to extend assistance at this time to those who need help the most.

It is this sense of sharing and compromise, this moderate course, that is typical of the Government's action in the June budget and in the October financial statement. In June, we introduced the six and five program. In that program, by looking at our expenses, by putting them under a magnifying glass, we found $3 billion that we took away from original allocations.

As some of our critics demanded, we could have used that $3 billion simply to reduce the deficit. Had we done so, where would the help be for farmers, fishermen, small-businessmen and the unemployed? Instead, the Government reallocated that money into vital programs for each of those sectors in Canada. In October, we used the same approach. In the October statement we found $1.4 billion that we were able to reallocate into more needy areas, reallocate for jobs and economic stimulation. We should see the October statements as a continuation of the trend started in the June budget, a continuation of the strength that we were able to develop during the initial stages of the six and five program.

We have seen over $4.4 billion reallocated since June into areas that will stimulate jobs and stimulate new economic activity in Canada.

Let us take a look at housing. Housing is a source of quick job creation. Consumers react speedily to this. We found $400 million for housing projects in June, and an additional $165 million in October. New home buyers have been universally praising the Government's $3,000 grant. Existing home owners have been praising the home renovations programs. Not only do people get actual benefit from those programs but, in addition to that, these programs create jobs very quickly.

In small business we have seen the creation of the small business investment grant program in June, and then the extension of the small business bond in October. We saw hundreds of millions of dollars allocated to job creation in June, and then in October the development of the NEED program.

Today in this House we have Bills in front of us to start the special interest subsidy program for farmers and fishermen. That was a program first started in June. The Government cannot solve each and every one of our problems. We are trying to get that point across to Canadians as hard as we can. The time has come for co-operation in our economy. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stressed that point over and over again in his three addresses to the country a short while ago.

The Government cannot solve all our problems, but we can do it together. What the Government is doing during these times is providing some leadership for Canadians. We have done that through the six and five program. Furthermore, the Government can cushion those people who are most in need. I have spoken about how we have reallocated $3 billion in June and an additional $1.4 billion in October. That provides a cushion for those people most in need.

The Government can encourage the economy to begin building and preparing for the day when recovery comes both at home and abroad. We have seen the $500 million that has gone into the NEED program which will help those workers most in need of it. This will also help companies, municipalities and communities across Canada to start on badly needed programs.

The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) is in the House today. He is deeply involved in the rebuilding of the western rail system and the restructuring of the Crow rate so that the railroads can become major instruments for national prosperity over the next decade.

Finally, we have seen the Government stimulate the most sensitive sectors of our economy: housing, small business, forestry, fishing and agriculture. Many extra millions of dollars have been injected in those areas in order to help create jobs.

No one says that the premium increases for the unemployment insurance fund are desirable. We had to take a difficult situation and find a middle of the road course. We could have placed the entire burden on the worker and the employer. It would have been a crippling blow for them. We could have put the whole burden on the deficit, but that would have been an irresponsible move on our part. Instead, we shared and asked those of us who have jobs to contribute something, and then took the resources of the Government and contributed the remainder. That is the type of approach we have taken time and again for job creation and the development of an economic direction to prepare the country for economic recovery.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, I am also pleased to take part in this Opposition day debate this afternoon. Since we have had the co-operation of the Government and, I assume, the Official Opposition, as the third NDP speaker I will try not to take up too much time of the House and will keep to my 15 fifteen minutes.

I was particularly disturbed by the statement of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy)—sometimes called the Minister of unemployment—when he retaliated to the criticism by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper). The Minister's approach is to criticize the person who attacks him and to adopt a defence posture, a stance which is often indefensible. In that manner, he tries to shift the blame for his failures back to the person who criticizes him.

We can cite appalling examples of unemployment program mix-ups and mismanagements which have occurred during the last year, especially over the last six months. This does not suggest that the people who administer unemployment insurance at the local level are incompetent. They have had to carry a tremendous load. This mismanagement suggests that there must be something wrong with the administration of the program in which there are many delays for those wishing to receive premiums. Hence we blame the Minister responsible.

A classic example was provided to me by our research department. It involves the situation in the City of Sudbury where half of the 4,000 claims made by the company—presumably INCO—were in error. Some of the claimants were overpaid, others were underpaid, and many had to wait for five weeks or more. As well, some were cut off entirely from receiving benefits.

While there have been some recent improvements, I would describe the entire program as a bureaucratic nightmare. I hope that the Minister will consider that specific case of Sudbury with quick dispatch. When we criticize the administration or how the Minister handles his role, I think it would behoove him to listen to that criticism, instead of retaliating.

I was here when the Hon. Member for Lincoln (Mr. Mackasey) brought in the unemployment insurance scheme. At that time it was considered too generous. At that time we heard much criticism and satirical remarks about the UIC ski team at Banff. They had their own T-shirts, we are told. However, there is no question that in modern society—especially one directed by this Government—unemployment insurance is a necessity.

Yet, I repeat, unemployment insurance delays are awesome. As I said, in Sudbury the delay is six to eight weeks. In Windsor, it is six weeks. There is a six to eight-week delay in Fort McMurray. It is eight weeks in Belleville, eight to ten weeks in Port Alberni and four weeks in Nelson. There is a 12-week delay in Vancouver. I realize that the Minister may find it distasteful for me to cite these examples and that he may find it somewhat nettlesome. He therefore attacks the people who make those criticisms. But these criticisms are made because the people who are facing these delays are average Canadians and they need that money desperately. Many of them are forced to go on welfare. In at least two ridings represented by Members of this Party, the Hon. Members for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) and the Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis), food distribution centres have been set up in their riding offices. Apparently, they have not only been deluged with serious offers of food but with requests for food from those offices. If that is the state of the nation, it is a most serious situation.

Defensiveness on the part of the Minister is unacceptable. There are all kinds of horror stories which I could list. I would like to talk about one of those stories because it reflects the prevailing attitude in Canada. This constituent is trying to deal with impatient creditors. His business is one of about 8,000 to 10,000 that officially went bankrupt last year. We do not know how many more just quit. This constituent had to go on to social welfare, but because he had a suite which he was renting out in the basement he could not get full social welfare. He received $420 per month from the Human Resources Department and due to the interest rates he is obligated with a mortgage payment of $938. What will that man do? He is trapped. I am not suggesting that the Human Resources Department in the Province should either ignore his plight or pay the total amount because he is receiving income, but he is still trapped. He will lose his home in the same way he lost his business. This constituent said, "I hope to be back on my feet soon and become a regular part of the working community." I hope so too. He went on to say, "But for the time being I have to swallow my pride and beg for assistance." You see, Mr. Speaker, our culture assumes that if you need help you must be a failure in some way. I wrote back to the man and asked him whether he had paid into unemployment insurance or had paid taxes all his life. He apparently had. I told him, "Well, you have earned that. This is what these programs are all about. This is why they are provided". However, that is not the way people feel about them. People feel very degraded by after exhausting unemployment insurance benefits because they have to seek social assistance. I phoned my riding office today and it reports that the number of people coming into the office who have been forced to go to Human Resources has gone through the ceiling. Most of the people are trying to find other programs because they feel humiliated when they must go on welfare. It is the result of our attitude that somehow if one is poor or needs help, one is a bum. That is known as the lazy bastard theory of social welfare, the feeling that the only people who are obtaining assistance are the socially incompetent. I do not accept that theory and I did not think anyone else should, either.

Other people, notably the UGN, the United Way in my riding, have written to me. They want some money from the community development grants to provide unemployment support centres. Why do we need unemployment support centres? We have human resources offices, unemployment insurance offices and offices of Members of Parliament. We probably even have regional desks so that citizens can reach government. What for? For assistance in job searching, counselling, personal situations, referrals, other facilities, charities and other things. So it is very serious matter in many ridings. Mine is one of the least touched, in the lower mainland, amounting to 11 per cent, because there are a tremendous variety of occupations in my area and we are part of an agricultural and fishing area. We provide a transport corridor. It is a suburban area, and we also have some manufacturing. Many other areas of B.C. are far worse off than mine.

Let me turn from the litany of losses to something else. Today I raised a question concerning job creation on the railways. I directed it to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and it was answered by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin). I am glad the Minister of Transport is here because I simply do not understand the kind of answers I received from him when I asked him the question. Apparently the situation amounts to a shell game by the Government which has allotted, as a conerstone of its employment policies over the next year, some $400 million for the upgrading of the railways, to stimulate some employment. I do not know whether the Minister is using the figure of $25,000 per job or whatever. All I know is that it will supposedly produce about one-tenth of the employment we need. However, since the total rail program will supposedly run until 1991 and create 400,000 jobs and he will put in $400 million this year alone, to begin with, and I do not know how many more millions of dollars will be required, I asked the Minister whether he could guarantee that there would be no employment cuts to the railways. The railways have been losing 5,500 jobs a year on an average since 1976. He could not guarantee me that. What concerns me is that all we will do will be to pump more money into the railways for the purposes of upgrading and creating employment, yet we will continue to lose employment. I find that hard to understand. I frankly find that to be very confusing because the projections for investment in the railways over the next year have been exactly what they have been over the last two years, that is, $1.3 billion. We are losing employment on the railways at the rate of 5,000 or more jobs each year on the average, since 1976. If the railways do not increase their investment in their own rolling stock, upgrading, track enhancement and improvement, then it will be up to the Government. If the Government is to put in money just to let the railways off the hook, my Party and I think we should have equity. The Minister gets up. Yes, I am suggesting that perhaps we should even nationalize the CNR—

Mr. Pepin: Good!

Mr. Rose: —because the Minister says that it is a commercial venture and is not part of social welfare. I have the facts right here in my hand. However, if he looks at the charter of the CNR, and it decided to bail out a couple of bankrupt railway companies when it was first established, its objective is for enhancement and improvement—and I have forgotten the precise word, but in other words its objective is to assist and enhance Canada. I do not have the right quote in my hand at the moment. I have lost it in this pile of papers, but if I find it, I will read it.

Mr. Pepin: It must have something to do with transportation.

Mr. Rose: If it is not to the benefit of Canada, then why do we have a national railway? Why do we have a railway as a Crown corporation?

Mr. Pepin: For transportation purposes.

Mr. Rose: However, if it is just another business with no social purpose other than that, then I do not see much point in having it as a Crown corporation. We might as well sell it off.

Mr. Heap: That is what the Government will do.

Mr. Rose: Well, no, they did not want it in the first place.

Mr. Heap: When it starts making money.

Mr. Rose: Oh, I see. Bandeen has said it will be sold. Where is Bandeen now? He has gone on to some insurance company. Anyway, I object to that. We will pump more money into the railways, they will take that money and they will not create jobs. If they do not create jobs, how can that be a core of a job creating program? On Wednesday the Minister of Finance said that $400 million would be pumped into the railways for job creation—that is a third of the $1.2 billion he plans to use. The Minister is shaking his head.

Mr. Pepin: Four hundred million is in addition to the $3.2 billion over the next four years for the modernization of western rail transportation.

Mr. Rose: The bottom line is, will it be job-creative or not? If the railways continue to cut their work force, how on earth will that create jobs? The Minister is shaking his head. It is too difficult, too complex for this Member to understand. Therefore, I must be wrong. The money is to be used for tracks and will employ the steel plants, but in the meantime the railways will be nationalized and improved in such a way that they will not need as many people. That is probably what he is suggesting.

The problem with our economic policies and employment strategies is that, first, they have been short-term and, second, they have been wrongheaded. We have been spending all kinds of money to push megaprojects, such as drilling in the Beaufort Sea. What about provinding a few small social welfare bits for Dome Petroleum? That ought to be a good idea, and perhaps a few more, if they really need it. Ignore the guy who will lose his home. Consider Hibernia and the oilsands. The Government will steal from alternative energy sources, from conservation, from the CHIP program and give it to what? Nukes? Will it give money toward stockpiling more heavy water down in Canso or Cape Breton, where there are two plants and $800 million was written off last year? So we have all kinds of money for certain things and not for others. The Nova Scotia Federation of Labour says, "Do it now. Let us start some upgrading and expansion". However, we do not get that. We are asked to pull together. We are asked to do some vague thing called pulling together. We are experiencing business bankruptcies, people are out of work, taxes are rising, but what have we done? The Prime Minister says, "Pull together. We must have unity and co-operation". Who's fault is it? Who has been in the Government for these past 14 years? One cannot blame it all on the municipalities or on world conditions. Hon. Members opposite must bear some of the blame. Today the Prime Minister had the crushing gall to say that he will appoint a former Minister of Finance to tell us what is wrong with our economic policy. That is the height of ludicrousness, if that is a word. He called for us to help him through co-operation to get us out of this mess and said that the way to do it was through six and five.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came into office in 1968 we were second in the world in terms of standard of living. Now we are fourteenth. Some people say that all countries in the western world and in the OECD have problems, but they do not have the unemployment problems that we have. Certainly they do not have the rates of unemployment which we are experiencing. For example, Germany and Japan have half the rate of Canada.

I will tell the House what is wrong with Canada. We are a mega-based, resource-based economy. When a world recession comes along, we have nothing to back it up. We have lost manufacturing jobs by the thousands. I could refer to the list of statistics, but who would want to refer to a list anyway? As a matter of fact, I heard that the level of oratory in the United States Senate fell markedly when people stopped using their emotions and began to quote statistics. Statistics are not good for oratory because no one likes numbers. There are so many big numbers around that no one really listens to them, anyway.

At the present time $100 million is being spent each year on nuclear research and the stockpiling of lethal poisons. Would it not be better to spend it on solar or double-glazed windows? Would it not be better to spend it on things which would create employment at a lot less money per job? I think we should. People are going out of business because of cutbacks, but look at the money the Government has taken out of the pockets of people. Naturally businesses will go bankrupt if people are paying most of their money out in interest rates on mortgages. In that event they do not have much left to purchase cars or bicycles; some do not have enough to purchase food. It is not sensible.

We will have five and six on the people but they will not touch oil, which is the prime inflationary factor in Canada today. It will go up again on January 1. I know there is an agreement. I know it will make many people unhappy, but many more people will be unhappy when they have to put away their cars because they have no other option.

They are subsidizing nuclear sales abroad to Mexico. They have subsidized interest rates for Korea or for whatever tin pot dictator comes around wanting to buy one. They will break the contracts with retired public servants. They will allow the dollar to go way down and force many people into bankruptcy. They will scapegoat the Public Service. There will be 800,000 families on welfare by the end of the year; 10,000 more each month. They tell the young that they cannot have jobs. They tell them that they cannot obtain an education by raising the fees. They tell people that they cannot expect to own their own homes. They tell the elderly that they cannot have their indexed pensions because indexing is too expensive and that they must work until they drop.

Mr. Kristiansen: Even if they have paid for them.

Mr. Rose: Yes, even if they paid for them. We are accused of being negative. We are accused of carping and being compassionate at the same time, compassionate to the working and the poor and carping to the Liberal Government. There is no way that they can dutch and dodge and shell-game their way out of this one. They have done it to us.

What do we suggest? Re-forestation would be one suggestion. There should be vast expansion, not lay-offs, in the rail yards. There was some money in the budget speech of last Wednesday for co-op housing. We run out of it in my riding in March of every year. We need Government and industry co-operation in terms of investment. Perhaps we do not need any more McDonald stands with their imported buns. If the Government wants to cut money, it could cut a bunch of those F-18s. I know they make nice toys, but we might as well be using slingshots. There are many useful things we could do through the municipalities to put people to work.

I am glad we have the community development grant. It was increased in my riding from $100,000 last year to $400,000 this year. I am very pleased by the amount of money, but why is my riding getting it? It is because the labour force survey indicates that things are much more rotten in my riding. I say to the Government, as I thank it for allowing me to speak, even if its Members did not listen very much, that it probably has three options. They can either lead, which they have not been doing, or they can follow, which they do not like to do because they are Liberals, or they can step down and get the hell out of the way.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Bosley: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is a very important motion on an important subject, and everyone in the House knows it. But there is also a courtesy which occurs at the time of a national convention. As I understand the rules of the House, the normal speaking pattern at this time would be to go to the Government benches, then to our benches—and we have a speaker ready to go—and back to the Government benches. It being an NDP day I would suggest, as a matter of both courtesy to the Government Members who have an event which they would like to attend and as a courtesy to the mover of the motion, that we end the debate at this point, so that those on the other side who wish to attend their annual convention today could do so, so that the New Democratic Party would have had, through the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose), the closing speech.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, this subject was broached a little earlier. It is not usual that we would close debate on an Opposition day on an important subject earlier than normal. It is true that the New Democratic Party has had more than its share of time. From that point of view I am grateful, and I have said so in my previous remarks. I would propose an early adjournment provided it were generally known that we have had our time and that no further NDP speakers would have had the floor, anyway. This was a courtesy on the part of the Members of the Official Opposition who have given up their speaking time, which was accepted by the Government.

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I merely wish to add my comments to those concerning comments by the Member of the New Democratic Party, namely, that you should alternate between the official opposition and the government side. Since this is our second opposition day this week and we have had ample time to speak to the matter, although it is indeed very important, we should agree to call it five o'clock.

[English]

Mr. Bosley: I want to ensure that the record shows my Party is prepared to give up its time by reason of courtesy only and that we regard the subject just as important as Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party..

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I find that acceptable. I would also like to say that if the debate does not end we have other Members who are prepared to participate, as do the other Parties. We are unlikely to get the floor anyway, so it is under those conditions that we put forward our agreement.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The House seems to have reached an agreement, but I think it would be fair to mention to the Hon. Member from Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) that the Chair very often attempts on an Opposition day, with respect to either Opposition Party, to see to it that the Party has a representative to speak and to close the debate. If the debate were to continue, it would be my intention to attempt to provide further time for the New Democratic Party.

If the House is satisfied under the circumstances to close down a little early—and this is the impression I have from the representatives of the three Parties who have spoken—then it will do so. The easy way to find out is by simply putting it to Hon. Members. Is there unanimous consent to call it five o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Accordingly, by unanimous consent, it being five o'clock—and I might indicate that Opposition Parties have expressed a great courtesy to the Liberal Party which has its convention this week—the House stands adjourned until next Monday at 2 p.m.

At 4.10 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR RECONSTITUTION OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACID RAIN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts) and Hon. Members throughout the House share my concern with regard to the serious matter of acid rain. It is a concern felt throughout my riding of Parry Sound-Muskoka and, I know, the rest of the country. It is an ongoing problem and one which demands our ongoing attention. Among other considerations which spring to mind, I would mention that the Government, in its dealing with those beyond our border, should have the backing of an ongoing subcommittee devoted to the subject. I would also point out that all Members of the former committee are unanimous in their request that it should be reinstituted. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Northumberland (Mr. Hees):

That immediate steps be taken to reconstitute, on a continuing basis, the former Special Sub-Committee on Acid Rain.

There is a precedent for this action, involving the Subcommittee on the Disabled, which is still continuing.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

THE ADMINISTRATION

DEMAND FOR RESIGNATION OF MINISTERS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, in his speech to the Liberal convention this past weekend the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised delegates that the Government "will move in five strategic areas", these to be detailed in the coming Speech from the Throne. In a recent full-page newspaper ad The National Citizen's Coalition presented five truly strategic reasons why Canada is in such trouble: the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and his disastrous energy program; the new Secretary of State (Mr. Joyal) and his costly and divisive bilingual policies; the new Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien), who removed property rights from the Constitution; the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) who plans to do to the agricultural industry what was done in the energy field; and the Prime Minister himself, whose Government has created debt and despair.

I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That if the Government is really serious about taking five steps to restore our economy and our confidence, the aforementioned immediately resign, a move which would instantly improve prospects for at least five million of their fellow Canadians.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

NUCLEAR WASTE DISPOSAL—SUGGESTED TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, in a special report on the Canadian nuclear industry in yesterday's Toronto Star, Egon Frech, a spokesperson for the nuclear waste management division of Atomic Energy of Canada Limited, admitted that the nuclear industry was not really interested in dealing with the problems of permanent nuclear waste disposal and that, "if it were not for public pressure, we would not be engaged in . . . disposal research". In that same exposé, the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan (Mr. McRae) said this about the AECL: "I have never had experience with any group that I mistrust more. They operate in a semi-secret way and they use a big public relations operation to put people off." In view of these statements, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Government, in order to protect future generations of Canadians, transfer responsibility for nuclear waste disposal research, and responsibility for assessing the health hazards of nuclear waste, to a scientific body completely independent of AECL and one beyond the reach of the powerful nuclear lobby groups.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS AND NORTHERN DEVELOPMENT

CALL FOR ARTS AND CRAFTS SECTOR DEPARTMENTAL AUDIT

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that more than $15 million has been spent between 1977 and 1981 by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the sector of Indian arts and crafts, and in view of the history of chronic mismanagement and counter-effective use of public funds in this area, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

That an immediate investigation and complete audit of the funding and management of the Indian arts and crafts sector be initiated by the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, in conjunction with the Auditor General, in order to ensure that these public funds are used efficiently, effectively and in the best interests of the native people.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

FAMILY VIOLENCE

HOLDING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, five months ago the Standing Committee on Health, Welfare and Social Affairs recommended that a federal-provincial conference be held to deal with the pressing issue of battered wives. On Friday the Minister responsible for the Status of Women indicated that, contrary to the recommendations of that report, this important conference will not be held. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare bring this matter to the urgent attention of Cabinet and, hopefully before Christmas, report back to the House the dates, times and location of the recommended conference.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), speaking to the Liberal convention on the weekend, showed a surprising naivete on the nuclear arms race, stating that we need to deploy the Cruise missile in order to force the Soviets to the arms reduction bargaining table, and whereas, while the U.S. enjoyed an overwhelming superiority in nuclear arsenals during the fifties, sixties and early seventies, the Soviet Union felt compelled to do just the opposite and will now certainly match deployment of Cruise missiles with deployment of their own, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson):

That the Prime Minister fulfil his own wish that Canada not have to test the Cruise, a wish shared by most Canadians, by not allowing its testing in this country, thus making a positive, non-naive statement on the arms race.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent of this motion?

MEDICAL CARE

USER FEES AND EXTRA BILLING

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, the Liberal uncertainty over universality in social programs—

Mr. Smith: No uncertainty!

Mr. Nickerson: —with the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) telling the party convention one thing while telling Parliament something quite different, has led to confusion over whether the national health care system will be retained in its present form or not. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Calgary West (Mr. Hawkes):

• (1410)

That the proposed new Canada Health Act be tabled in draft form immediately so that Canadians might be aware of the Government's intentions respecting user fees, extra billing and changes in medical cost distribution between different levels of Government.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

THE PRESS

DEMAND THAT GOVERNMENT DROP PRESS COUNCIL PLAN

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of press coverage of the Liberal annual general meeting over the weekend, especially on the commendable Young Liberal movement for democracy and honesty in political affairs, when aides, schemers and manipulators of the Prime Minister's Office were criticized, but no mention made of the man elected 17 years ago this date, I move, seconded by another Member who was elected 17 years ago, the Hon. Member for Dartmouth-Halifax East (Mr. Forrestall):

That this House direct the Minister responsible for the Kent Commission to cease and desist in his efforts to establish a Press Council since the Government not only controls, but obviously already owns a press with a double-standard, which lets Liberals blame little folk as fall guys with nary a negative on a man who never carried his own luggage.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NICARAGUA—REPORTED UNITED STATES BACKED RAIDS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. This past week the public has learned of U.S.-orchestrated clandestine raids on the Central American country of Nicaragua, launched from neighbouring Honduras and designed to destabilize the Nicaraguan Government. We have also learned that the escalation of these operations has increased the possibility of war in the region, and that considerably larger-scale U.S.-Honduran military manoeuvres are planned against Nicaragua in December.

In view of Canada's growing bilateral relationships in Latin America and desire for the restoration of political stability to the region, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That this House call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to provide the House with full information on the magnitude of American arms supplies, military and intelligence activities in Central America, and the Canadian Government's view of the dangers caused by these activities to the political stability and independence of all countries in that region.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY

WINNIPEG LAY-OFFS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The CPR, by recently laying off 1,100 workers at its shops in Winnipeg when there is plenty of rolling stock to repair, is certainly not demonstrating any faith in Canada and can hardly be said to be preparing to take advantage of future economic recovery as the Prime Minister via television encouraged everyone to do. Indeed, it appears that the CPR does not really expect a recovery. Therefore, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That the Government order the CPR for once to act like a decent corporate citizen and, failing that, that the CPR be nationalized and the CNR be renationalized so that finally we might have a railway system in this country which serves the public interest.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CONFIDENCE AND TRUST OF PRIVATE SECTOR

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. He will likely be aware that many of the more than 1.5 million Canadians who are jobless are either previous or prospective employees of that group of Canadian entrepreneurs whom we often call the risk takers, whether they be small businessmen, farmers, fishermen et cetera. I think the Deputy Prime Minister is also aware that within this group are those who are deterred from fulfilling their traditional job creating role by high interest rates, inflation or unemployment. Simply because at this moment they do not have sufficient trust or confidence in either the country or the Government to invest the pool of capital they have in a more traditional job creating sense, they are sitting on it.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not agree that the necessary trust and confidence within that group cannot be restored by a Royal Commission which might report in three years from now, or in a Throne Speech that might be months away? If the Deputy Prime Minister does agree, first, with the problem and, second, with the solution, what immediate steps does the Government propose to take to restore that very necessary trust and confidence in this, the most dynamic segment of our society?

• (1415)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is speaking as if the investor were operating in some sort of an abstract world. He is operating in a world economy that is presently characterized by very high inflation which has resulted in high unemployment and high interest rates. It has been my belief, and it has not changed since I ceased being Minister of Finance, that the basic pre-condition for the restoration of confidence and trust in the future of the Canadian economy is to make progress in the reduction of inflation in the country. That is one of the pre-conditions. It is not the sole element.

The Minister of Finance in his economic statement underscored the importance of the six and five program, and added further elements in the process of building up that trust and confidence. The Hon. Member will realize that concrete evidence of recovery in other countries such as the United States would do as much to restore trust and confidence for the investor as any of the notions that he has put forward to the House.

PREPARATION OF SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, the concrete evidence is that over the last few days these people who normally create more jobs than any other segment of society, "the engine of recovery", to use the words of the Minister of Finance, instead of buying a pick-up truck, a piece of equipment, or embarking on imaginative projects or marketing programs, have been buying Canada Savings Bonds, not out of patriotism but simply because they do not have the confidence to do anything with that capital except to let it sit another year. That is to that issue and I wish and I plead with the Deputy Prime Minister that he direct himself. They are not deterred by international condition. They simply do not have enough confidence at the moment to fulfil their traditional role.

The House Leader indicated a week or two ago that the Throne Speech is ready. I am now a little concerned because the Prime Minister said on the weekend it was still being worked on in terms of some recovery program.

Madam Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member took a minute and a half on his first question. The second one should be very much shorter.

Mr. Jarvis: I apologize, Madam Speaker. Is the Throne Speech ready? If not, when does the Deputy Prime Minister expect it to be ready and when might this House hear it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, when it is the intention of the Government to present the Speech from the Throne, the House will be notified. That decision has not yet been taken. I believe the Government House Leader has had consultations with respect to the legislative program, with his opposite numbers. I believe the progress that is now being made on that important legislative program will justify its completion or, indeed, substantial progress in that direction, before bringing down a Speech from the Throne.

USE OF ENERGY TAX TO ENCOURAGE CANADIAN OWNERSHIP

Hon. Bill Jarvis (Perth): Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary. In terms of priority, will the Deputy Prime Minister agree that the Government, collecting over $700 million a year for its Canadian ownership program—four cents a gallon—and knowing the difficulty the Minister of Finance has with a lack of funds for job creation, could use that in excess of $700 million far more wisely and far more effectively on programs that would create jobs, whether it be research and development, capital equipment or whatever? In terms of priority, will he agree that would be a much more effective use of that $700 million in taxpayers' money, given the 1.5 million unemployed today?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member realizes that there are a number of objectives that have to be pursued simultaneously in the national interest. The Canadian ownership charge has been approved by Parliament for a specific purpose. It cannot be used for any other purpose except the purpose that was decided upon by the Parliament of Canada, namely, that it should be used to increase the ownership of Canadians in the energy sector.

The Hon. Member has talked about the necessity for job creation. The Minister of Finance, in his recent statement, has put forward very large sums, added to the large sums already available for job creation in the country. Both these objectives are therefore being pursued simultaneously by the Government.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER SPEND WEEK IN RIDING

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister also and it concerns the appointment of the Macdonald Royal Commission. We do not know how much that will cost. We do know that the reporting date is three years in the future, but it is Canadians today who are out of jobs, Canadians who are feeling the effects of stress illness. I would like to ask the Minister whether or not he thinks another ivory-tower exercise of this kind is better than the Minister himself going back to his riding for one solid week to talk to the people who are in trouble and the people who have creative ideas on how to get the economy going. Will the Deputy Prime Minister commit himself to going back to his riding for one week to talk to the people, instead of giving us another ivory-tower exercise?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I very much disagree with the Hon. Member's description of the proposed Royal Commission as an ivory-tower exercise. The Chairman of the Commission is not the kind of person who would conduct an ivory-tower exercise. It will be a down-to-earth and realistic appraisal of the long-term prospects of the Canadian economy and in what direction that economy ought to be encouraged to evolve in the medium term. There is nothing "ivory tower" about that exercise. I also would like to tell the Hon. Member that I do not need any advice from him about how often I should go to my riding. I will take advice from my constituents on that point.

Mr. Hawkes: I wish the Deputy Prime Minister had the courage to put that to an election test. Maybe his constituents have a message for him.

COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): The first item, Madam Speaker, on this list of tasks for the Royal Commission is "trends in labour market requirement and conditions". A committee of this House on which I served for 14 months prepared a massive report on labour market conditions and training. As Minister of Finance, he did not implement a single recommendation in that report after we spent hours and thousands of the taxpayers' dollars on it.

I wonder if the Deputy Prime Minister could at least change the terms of reference for this ivory-tower commission, pull that file off the shelf and get some action started today for Canadians, in the field of jobs, training, and things they need. Can the Minister do that?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member should admit that action has already been taken on major aspects of the report to which he referred in his question.

REQUEST FOR EARLY INTRODUCTION OF PROGRAM ANNOUNCED BY PRIME MINISTER

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister. On the weekend we learned that Canada has the highest level of unemployment since 1936. We also learned from the Prime Minister on Friday night, in his speech to the Liberal Party, that the Government has now a five-point national economic recovery program which it will not bring in until sometime in the new year. We have in real numbers over a million and a half unemployed now. We are going to lose many thousands in terms of jobs, in addition, before Christmas. If the Government has a program, why, in heaven's name does it not bring it in now instead of waiting for another two months?

• (1425)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, may I read a couple of paragraphs from that excellent speech—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —made by the Prime Minister at the outstanding convention held in Ottawa on the weekend.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. MacEachen: I wish the Hon. Member, and especially the Leader of the Opposition, had tuned in to the convention to see how political conventions are operated.

Mr. Broadbent: I went to another comedy instead.

Mr. MacEachen: The Hon. Member asked about the Prime Minister's program for economic recovery. This is what the Prime Minister said:

> We will build upon the success of six and five. We will build upon the new directions forecast by Marc Lalonde's economic statement. We will build upon this convention. And with that legacy, we will present to the Canadian people a new program for economic recovery.

REASONS FOR DELAY IN INTRODUCTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, that was almost as boring as when we heard the original from the Prime Minister. Is the Minister telling us there really is no new program, that what the Prime Minister and his wonderful staff hoked up was simply a regurgitation of what we already had presented to us in this Parliament and nothing new is forthcoming? Or, if there is something new, I ask my first question again: why does the Government not bring it in now?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think the next paragraph—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacEachen: —will provide the answer to the Hon. Member's question. Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister went on to say:

> The details of that program are being worked upon and the process of consultation is going forward. But our direction is clear. To restore economic growth without inflation, we will move in five strategic areas:
> First, we will put in place a national program to rebuild our communities, restore our infrastructure, and renew our industrial strenght. Right across Canada—in every region, in every city, in every village, there are roads to be built, sewers to be constructed, community projects to be advanced, ports to be deepened, or railway tracks to be laid.

That, Madam Speaker, is the first area of strategic advance planning which the Government is now undertaking.

Oral Questions

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT TAKE ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, the Deputy Prime Minister can read very well. We now know why he was appointed Secretary of State for External Affairs. The Minister smiles there at his own cleverness and his infinite intellectual capacity in being able to read one of the Prime Minister's speeches. But I say to him a lot of unemployed Canadians out there do not take this matter as a joke, not one little bit.

If the Minister says now that there are sewers to be constructed, and if there are roads to be built, I say to him that there are sewers to be constructed now, roads to be built now, and why can the Government not do something now instead of waiting until January?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member asks why is the Government not doing something now. The Minister of Employment and Immigration has put out $500 million in order to achieve employment objectives. Today he is consulting with one of the provincial governments in order to advance that program which is being put in place now, I tell the Hon. Member for Oshawa.

QUALIFICATIONS OF CHAIRMAN

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is also addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister in regard to the appointment of former Finance Minister Donald Macdonald as Chairman of the Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects for Canada. Considering the fact that, when Mr. Macdonald was Minister of Finance, his budget deficit nearly doubled from $5 billion to more than $8 billion and unemployment rose from 7 per cent to 8.2 per cent, what exactly were the economic qualifications for the chairmanship of this commission?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think anyone who knows the background of Mr. Donald Macdonald knows that he is uniquely qualified to head such a Royal Commission. He has had long and successful service in the House of Commons. He has acquired a knowledge of the economic situation both at home and abroad because of the responsibilities he has discharged in Canada. In recent years he has had considerable experience in the private sector.

Miss MacDonald: And as a Liberal!

Mr. MacEachen: I believe that this experience, combined with his acute intelligence and organizational ability, will provide the leadership that is required to make this an effective Royal Commission.

COMMENTS MADE BY FORMER AUDITOR GENERAL

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister, if I could have his attention. He spoke about the unique record of Mr. Macdonald. I should like to point out that during his term as Finance Minister the Auditor General's report said that "financial management and control in the Government of Canada is grossly inadequate". The Lambert Royal Commission on Financial Management and Accountability said that under Macdonald's rule there was a "grave weakening and in some cases an almost total breakdown in the chain of accountability," first, within government and, second, within Parliament. How can Canadians have trust and confidence in a Chairman with that kind of track record?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is going back to comments that were made several years ago by outside observers of the parliamentary scene.

Mr. Clark: The Auditor General.

Mr. MacEachen: I am sure if the Hon. Member had been in the House with Mr. Macdonald, he would have effectively answered any comments that were made.

Mr. Clark: No, he didn't; he quit and ran.

Mr. MacEachen: He told the House at that time that he had taken steps to correct these difficulties. Subsequent Ministers have done the same thing.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHERN CANADA POWER COMMISSION—SUBCOMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. The Report of the Parliamentary Subcommittee on the Northern Canada Power Commission was tabled in the House of Commons on April 7, 1982, seven months and one day ago, but so far there has been no response to this report from the Minister. When will he implement the recommendations contained in the Penner Report?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, since that time there has been an urgent request from northerners for the Government to forgo a good deal of expenditures through the tax system, and to extend northern benefits. At considerable cost, and to the entire satisfaction of all northerners, that is exactly what the Government did. That is a high expenditure item and, as you know, other items in the Penner Report also involve millions of dollars. They have to be considered in terms of their over-all cost, in view of our financial situation. This is especially so in view of the fact that the Official Opposition keeps talking about our horrendous deficit. Their position should be consistent, also.

More specifically, the Penner Report is being considered within the Department by the Energy Task Force in which territorial officials are involved. I hope to put that before my Cabinet colleagues for consideration some time prior to the end of the year.

Mr. Nickerson: Madam Speaker, you ask a question on the Northern Canada Power Commission and get an answer pertaining to the remission order on northern taxation. But I thank the Minister for that information anyway.

COMMISSION DEBT

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): The Minister will know that about one-third of the power cost in the Yukon and Northwest Territories is due to the amortization of about $200 million in debt that has built up over a period of years. Much of this debt is due to previous mismanagement. One of the recommendations of the Penner Report was to liquidate this debt. Will the Minister take to Cabinet the recommendation that that outstanding debt be liquidated so that power costs can be brought down by some 30 per cent?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Obviously, Madam Speaker, that is one of the key elements of the Penner recommendations, so we would have to give consideration to it. The Hon. Member should keep in mind that it is an additional expenditure at the time when, as Minister, I am trying to find money for many additional expenditures, whether it be for Cyprus-Anvil in the Yukon, or infrastructure throughout the Territories. It means a loss of $17 or $18 million in interest payments per year to the Government. That is what we have to look at, and certainly we will be looking at that very thing.

FINANCE

IMPACT OF MARINE FUEL TAX

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, and I am pleased that the Minister of Transport is also in his seat.

In light of the charges made yesterday and today by Admiral Timbrell, president of Dominion Marine Association, with respect to the economic impact of the discriminatory marine fuel tax, will the Minister take an early opportunity to meet with the President of DMA and his officials for the purpose of discussing in detail the economic impact and effect of this continuation of a discriminatory tax?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): First of all, Madam Speaker, I should like to challenge the assertion made by the Hon. Member that the tax is discriminatory; it is not discriminatory at all. It is the same tax that is applied to Canadians and American lake ships when they are engaged in international trade. Both are required to pay the international price for the oil they use for their transportation. This tax has no discriminatory element at all.

As far as the suggestion made by the Hon. Member I receive representations on the subject is concerned, I have indicated in the House before that I am open to representations on any particular subject having to do with taxation. If Dominion Marine Association has representations to make, it can make them to me. I will be happy to look at the representations.

Mr. Forrestall: Madam Speaker, the Minister invites comments. Of course he will be aware that this fuel tax with respect to international aviation flights has not only been removed but that rebates have been made to that industry, while they have not been made to the marine industry.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT REVIEW TAX

Mr. J. M. Forrestall (Dartmouth-Halifax East): Madam Speaker, I put the question to the Minister again and ask whether he is prepared even to entertain the possibility of a review of this matter. It has cost not only the Great Lakes Seaway, but the St. Lawrence system, a significant amount of money this year and, as well, has probably cost hundreds and hundreds of Canadian seamen their jobs.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): First of all, Madam Speaker, I should like to remind the Hon. Member that since February the tax on aviation fuel has been transformed to a new form of taxation. That tax applies to all aircraft flying on international flights.

Second, there is no competition for the transportation of wheat, iron ore, or coal between aircraft and ships. I have not heard from the airline industry that there was any problem of unfair competition in that regard.

Third, I fail to see how the tax could have caused the loss of jobs when, in effect, it applies in exactly the same way to American and Canadian carriers engaged in international transportation. As a matter of fact, because of the difference in the exchange rate between Canadian and U.S. dollars, Canadian operators already benefit and have a very significant advantage resulting from the lower value of the Canadian dollar versus the U.S. dollar. They are in a good position to compete if they run their businesses efficiently.

PENITENTIARIES

UNITED CHURCH MODERATOR'S REPORT ON AFTERMATH OF ARCHAMBAULT RIOT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Solicitor General. Late last week the respected Moderator of the United Church of Canada released a report containing very serious allegations of torture and brutality on the part of a small number of guards at Archambault Prison following the tragic deaths there in the July 25 riot.

In view of the fact that this report by the Right Rev. MacDonald repeats earlier allegations by Charles Kolb of the International Human Rights Law Group, which the Minister glibly dismissed as sensational, is the Minister now prepared to order a full, independent, public inquiry into these very serious charges of brutality and lawlessness at Archambault institution?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I do not agree at all with the characterization which the Hon. Member has given to the new MacDonald report. In fact the allegations of torture and brutality were not supported by the MacDonald report; they were referred to without indicating in any way whether the Moderator agreed or disagreed with them. I am looking forward to meeting him. I found the report a sincere one. I would very much like to have that meeting.

In the meanwhile, one additional step that I would like to take across the whole Correctional Service of Canada is to require that if and when an incident of the sort that took place at Archambault ever takes place again, the ombudsman of the inmates, that is, the correctional investigator, be called in at once and be present as much as possible during the incident and during its aftermath, not only as a curb on the possibility of such events actually occurring, but also as a curb on and confirmation of allegations which are made subsequently, from an independent source, of what actually did take place during the incident.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, once again we have the Minister trying to cover up responsibility for wrongdoing at Archambault, just as he did at Dorchester two years ago when there were allegations of beatings and gassings. Clearly the prison system in Canada is in a state of crisis today. We have seen it right across the country.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY OF LENGTHY SENTENCING PRACTICE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, in view of the obvious problems which have been identified by prisoners, prison guards and, indeed, a former Liberal Solicitor General, with the mandatory provision for a 25 year sentence without eligibility for parole, is the Minister prepared to recommend that the Justice Committee study fully and comprehensively in the near future the ramifications of the 25 year sentence before we see further outbreaks of violence in the Canadian prison system?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as to the suggestion that this hostage-taking incident proves a deterioration taking place in the Correctional Service of Canada, I think the statistics show quite the opposite. In fact the number of hostage takings which have occurred so far this year, as regrettable as each of them is, is below the number which has taken place in any year since 1974. As the Hon. Member very well knows, a very important measure of stability in the institutions, that is, the measure of major incidents, is down by 50 per cent from what it was prior to 1980. I think a serious look at the Correctional Service of Canada would show improvement, not deterioration.

As to his suggestion that the 25 year sentences should be reviewed, I admit that I am concerned about the implications of the 25 year sentence. I am having the Correctional Service and my secretariat look into them, but I think it is far too early to draw conclusions about the impact of the 25 year sentence. I have met, as perhaps my friend has, with 25-year inmates across the system, and I find despair is as much a consideration as extra hostility on the part of these individuals. I would like to know more about them, and I think that with only 171 or so individuals having had that sentence since 1976 it is too early for him to draw horrendous conclusions—

Madam Speaker: Order.

TRANSPORT

"HUDSON TRANSPORT" ACCIDENT—INQUIRY BY JUDGE HUGESSEN—CONSIDERATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Alexandre Cyr (Gaspé): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the inquiry conducted by Justice James Hugessen following the accident with a tanker, the Hudson Transport, on the St. Lawrence at Christmas 1981. In his report, Justice Hugessen made forty recommendations regarding operations on board ship, with special emphasis on the crew and on rescue operations in the Gulf. My question is as follows: Could the minister inform us how many recommendations have been accepted and more specifically, whether he approved the recommendation dealing with the availability of a search and rescue ship on an hour's notice along the Gaspé coast?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, Justice Hugessen did indeed make a number of recommendations. It is common practice for the Department of Transport to consider these recommendations and to consult with experts, which was done in this particular case, and subsequently, to publish a report indicating the recommendations the department is prepared to accept and those it cannot accept. That is the usual process. In this case, as far as Recommendation 16 is concerned which indicates that a ship must be ready to go to the rescue of a ship in distress on an hour's notice, it is already a Department of Transport regulation. In the case of the Hudson, the regulation was not followed as a result of some very unpleasant business which occurred in Quebec City. So, the regulation does exist. As far as safety on the St. Lawrence is concerned, at the present time we have the Ville-Marie, which is now in service, and this winter, the Simon Fraser will also be put into service, in order to be prepared for all eventualities on the St. Lawrence.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

DESIGNATION OF ONTARIO REGIONS

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. I might say that I have addressed this question to his predecessors, the President of the Treasury Board, and the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. I presume he is aware that the Department has been studying for some months now the proposal to extend the boundaries of regions eligible for DREE grants. The Province of Ontario has particular significance to me because part of my riding, the Regional Municipality of Muskoka, is not covered. Could the Minister bring us up to date on this situation and on what the decision will be?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, there is no decision forthcoming in the immediate future of which I am aware with respect to changing any boundaries in Ontario with respect to DREE.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT HELP PRIVATE INDUSTRY

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I wonder if the Minister could have a word with his predecessor twice removed, because I was informed categorically that there was a study being made and serious consideration being given to parts of central Ontario, to extend the boundaries. That is an area in which there is high unemployment. I am quite sure, if the Government is now doing everything possible to provide jobs, that it will help private industry with these grants to do the job itself, and they will not be only 20 week jobs, either.

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, I did not say that the study was not under way. I just said that I did not think there would be a decision forthcoming in the immediate future with respect to any changes in the boundaries of DREE-designated areas.

CRIMINAL CODE

APPLICATION OF BREATHALYZER TESTS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice. It is with respect to recent developments in the so-called breathalyzer provisions of the Criminal Code. In view of the solemn promises which were given around 1969 by the Liberal Government—and I believe John Turner, who was then Minister of Justice—that at the first opportunity accused persons given the breathalyzer test would be provided with an independent analysis facility, a container suitable for independent analysis of their breath, and in view of recent statements by Douglas Lucas, the Director of the Centre for Forensic Science in the Department of the Solicitor General, that this is now possible, will the Minister of Justice take steps to fulfil that commitment and alleviate the incriminatory and Draconian aspects of the legislation about which so many Members had reservations at the time it was brought into the House?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for bringing this matter to our attention. As he knows, the reason for the delay over these years has been the technical problem. I want to assure him that, in light of these developments, the matter is now under active study.

FISHERIES

REQUEST THAT PEARSE REPORT BE REFERRED TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. We are looking forward to meeting him in committee. Could he say yes or no right now as to whether he is prepared to refer the Pearse Commission report on the Pacific fisheries to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I intend to go and meet with as many groups in the West as possible within the next ten days. I would be very interested in having the views of the Hon. Member, but personally I do not think fishermen on the West Coast are awaiting more and more talk from us. Dr. Pearse has presided over that Royal Commission of Inquiry. I have met with him. At the moment I am studying his report and consulting with various sectors. I hope to be starting the implementation of some of his recommendations, in the very near future.

POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I gather from the answer that there is no intention to refer that particular report to the Standing Committee. Would the Minister then be prepared to comment on remarks made by Dr. Pearse in paragraphs 4 and 6 of that Report, since he has been studying it? Dr. Pearse said, "My Inquiry pointed inescapably to deficiencies of Government policy, uncertain objectives, weak and outdated legislation, bad organization, contradictory programs and confusion." In paragraph 6 he said, "The policies are neither coherent nor well suited to modern needs." Would the Minister be prepared to comment on that right now?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Well, Madam Speaker, it is precisely because of the need to take action that I would not think that the fishermen on the West Coast would like to see more talks take place but that we try to implement concrete steps. This is what I intend to do in the very near future.

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Will we ever see it referred to the Committee?

LABOUR RELATIONS

NORDAIR STRIKE—APPOINTMENT OF MEDIATOR

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. In view of the continuing strike at Nordair which has been going on for some four or five months, and which is having a very negative impact in many parts of eastern Canada, and had been a tremendous inconvenience to travellers in northern Ontario and northwestern Ontario especially, is he prepared to take any action now to see that this dispute is resolved?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the company has now indicated that it is willing to enter into mediation with the Aerospace International Union of Machinists in the dispute involving the clerical bargaining unit. As soon as I learned this, I appointed a mediator. He will be available as of today to assist in settling the dispute.

AVIATION SAFETY

ADVISORY COMMITTEE REPORT—REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Minister has had the report of the Minister's Advisory Committee on the Commission of Inquiry into aviation safety before him for some time now. Would he tell the House if he intends to refer that Report to the Standing Committee on Transportation for their comments?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I assume that my hon. friend is talking about the Dubin Report.

NATURE OF REPORT

Mr. J. R. Ellis (Prince Edward-Hastings): No, Madam Speaker, the Report that I am talking about is that of the Minister's Advisory Committee. I read it a moment ago. The Minister's Advisory Committee on the Commission of Inquiry into Aviation Safety, which was an outfall of the Dubin Report—that is the Report which I would like to see referred to the Standing Committee on Transportation.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, as I recall, this is an internal document. The advice of the committee that I have had on the subject will be brought forward in the Canadian Air Safety Board Bill which is now ready to be introduced in the House. I hope to send it for discussion to the Committee on Transportation before the New Year.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

NUCLEAR WASTE DISPOSAL—REQUEST FOR TRANSFER OF RESPONSIBILITY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, yesterday's Toronto Star carried a statement which I think is of interest to Canadians, and to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources in particular. There was a statement in yesterday's Toronto Star attributed to a Mr. Egon Frech which dealt with the permanent waste disposal of some 500,000 tonnes of atomic waste. That represents the size of a hockey rink filled three feet high. He said, "If it weren't for the public pressure we wouldn't be engaged in disposal research." Would the Minister tell us if the Government's attitude is the same as expressed by Egon Frech and, if not, why does the Government not remove the responsibility for waste disposal research for AECL and give it to an independent body?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think that AECL is working in that area but there is a review committee which supervises everything and which has issued some reports on research activities. I believe that the reports have been quite positive so far, and that the work is being done properly. It is independently supervised, and I think that the mechanisms which have been installed for this purpose are satisfactory.

Mr. Rose: Not according to the Liberal Member for Thunder Bay-Atikokan who says, "I have never had experience with any group that I mistrust more. They operate in a semi-secret way and they use a big public relations operation to put people off."

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF INDEPENDENT REGULATORY AGENCY

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, secretiveness and mistrust are not what Canadians expect from a regulatory agency. Will the Minister assure Canadians that he will give deep consideration to having an independent regulatory body deal with the research into atomic waste disposal, and have it set up in such a way that it is out of the reach of the nuclear lobbyists?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I have the names of all those on the advisory committee. There are some very independent Canadian groups, such as the Biological Council of Canada, the Chemical Institute of Canada, the Canadian Geoscience Council, the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, the Canadian Association of Physicists, and the Canadian Association of Biological Societies. I suggest that these people who are in the technical advisory role are quite independent in nature. I think that to say that just because they are working with AECL they cannot have an independent view of what is happening, is an exaggeration. If someone has a specific case for complaint of which they can advise me, I will certainly look into that, but no one has talked to me about it as yet. I have seen it in the paper.

TRANSPORT

PLIGHT OF QUEBECAIR EMPLOYEES

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. As you know, this week the Minister of Transport met with Quebecair employees who are suffering the consequences of a rather unusual situation. The owners of Quebecair are playing politics and the employees are bearing the brunt of the situation. I would like to ask the Minister of Transport what happened at his meeting with representatives of the flight attendants, pilots, maintenance crews and ground personnel, what the results of this meeting were and whether there is still hope for Quebecair employees?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I tried to explain to them the facts about the current situation, but obviously they are caught or at least they get the impression they are caught in a crossfire between the federal and the provincial government. I really do not know what Mr. Clair, the Quebec Minister of Transport, intends to do. He seems to have taken control of the destiny of Quebecair, which would seem to point to control of the company by the Quebec government, but the minister announced that the government was no longer interested because it could not invest any more in the company. In any event, I am willing, since I was supposed to see the minister on Friday about something else, to see him before then to try and find out what his intentions are and to discuss all aspects of the matter with him.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

JOB CREATION PROGRAM CRITERIA FOR EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Because of the great concern that has been expressed, and indeed the money that has been allocated for job creation programs, and because the Liberal Government has set up a number of job creation programs under Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act whereby people who have fallen off of unemployment insurance can not get one of those jobs and people presently collecting unemployment insurance can get those jobs, does the Government not feel that it is unfair to discriminate against those who are the worst off in this situation?

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member just pointed out in his question, under the provisions of Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, only individuals who are drawing unemployment insurance benefits are eligible. However, he forgot to mention, regarding those who have exhausted their unemployment insurance benefits or are about to do so, that the department has already taken action to deal with the situation. This summer, the department conducted a study which showed that the number of people in this situation would increase this fall and next spring. Therefore, we established in our own department a follow-up system for all Canada Employment Centres, and as announced by the Minister of Finance three weeks ago, a job creation program is directly aimed at these people, and the Department of Employment and Immigration is taking all the necessary measures to deal with the distressing problems now facing this particular group.

GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. Paul Dick (Lanark-Renfrew-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I know of two individual cases where people have used up their unemployment insurance funds and are the only qualified people in their area to get on one of the job creation programs under Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act, yet they cannot be employed because they do not fit the criteria set out by the Government. Is it a new tenet of policy, in spite of having the right of affirmative action enshrined in the Canadian Constitution, that the Government will not give affirmative action programs specifically to help those who are in the worst economic condition?

[Translation]

Mr. Rémi Bujold (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I believe I have partly answered the Hon. Member's first question. I agree that Section 38 of the Unemployment Insurance Act clearly specifies that workers who may work on these projects must be receiving unemployment insurance benefits. However, the government has already taken action to deal with the group to which the Hon. Member is referring, and the job creation program, whose criteria are to be announced shortly by the Minister of Employment and Immigration, will in fact be responding to the situation described by the Hon. Member.

MR. JOHN W. SANDFORD

Question No. 4,104—Mr. MacKay:

1. (a) Did Mr. John W. Sandford, President of de Havilland Aircraft, come to de Havilland from the Admiral Corporation (b) what experience, if any, did he have in aircraft, aeronautical or any other business pertaining to aviation?

2. Does Mr. Douglas Kendall hold the office of Chairman of the Board of de Havilland Aircraft and does he also hold the position of Chairman of the Enterprise Development Programme of Canada?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): In so far as the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce is concerned: 1. (a) Mr. Sandford was President of Canadian Admiral Corporation Ltd., from 1975 to 1978. (b) Mr. Sandford's appointment is an internal matter of de Havilland Aircraft of Canada Ltd. While the information requested is of a personal nature, the disclosure of which is governed by the Human Rights Act Part IV, a copy of Mr. Sandford's curriculum vitae is attached with his consent.

2. Yes.

Resume John Sandford

Mr. Sandford's background includes over 16 years with Rockwell International. During that period he has served in many capacities and in a number of divisions.

During the past three years he has been the President of Canadian Admiral Corporation, Ltd. Canadian Admiral manufactures and distributes consumer products throughout Canada. Their annual sales are approximately $120 million. They have plants in Mississauga and Ottawa for the manufacture of refrigerators, colour TV's, microwave ovens, radiation detection equipment, electric ranges and home heating furnaces.

Before joining Canadian Admiral Mr. Sandford spent a year as a member of the Rockwell headquarters staff. He was one of a small team responsible for the integration of Admiral into the Rockwell organization, following the 1974 acquisition. His prime areas of responsibility were engineering, product design and plant operations in the United States, Canada and overseas.

Mr. Sandford joined Rockwell International in 1962. Initially his career involved engineering assignments on the Appollo spacecraft and the Saturn V launch vehicle, used for the manned lunar mission. As a director of advance launch systems, his responsibilities included upgraded versions of the Saturn V, new rocket systems and nuclear rocket stages.

Starting in the second half of the 1960s he headed up the design investigation which led to the space shuttle. He was responsible for Rockwell's winning proposal to NASA for the design, development and production of the $5.2 billion shuttle vehicle system. He left the shuttle program early in 1973 to become a director of engineering and product development for the General Aviation Divisions of Rockwell.

Mr. Sandford's background in aeronautics started with Westland Aircraft, England, where he was an engineering apprentice working on various fixed and rotating wing aircraft designs. In 1957 he immigrated to Canada and joined Avro Aircraft in Malton. Following the cancellation of the Avro Arrow program he joined with five other engineers and formed Avian Industries of Georgetown, Ontario.

Mr. Sandford has a master's degree in aeronautical engineering and is a professional engineer of the Province of Ontario. He lives in Mississauga with his wife and two children.

Support was provided to trials of the Royal Air Force Buccaneer aircraft from September 28 to November 4, 1981. The trials involved delivery of inert laser guided bombs.

A joint Canadian, Netherlands and Norwegian torpedo test program was carried out at CFMETR, Nanoose, B.C. in the summer of 1980.

On behalf of the United Kingdom tests were conducted in 1977 at PETE, Nicolet, Que., to determine the effect on landmines of prolonged burial in frozen ground.

DIAND—OUTSIDE CONSULTANTS

Question No. 4,397—Mr. Shields:

1. Were outside consultants employed by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development in the fiscal year (a) 1980-81 (b) 1981-82 and, if so, how many and what was the total amount paid?

2. Were any consultants paid more than $10,000 and, if so, in each case (a) what was his/her name (b) what was the amount paid (c) what services were provided?

Return tabled.

[English]

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Late last week, on Friday, the Parliamentary Secretary filed an answer to question No. 4,203. The question related to loans to employees of Petro-Canada or its subsidiaries. It requested the usual answers and asked what was the name and title of the employee, what loan was made, what date it was made, what was the amount of the loan, what interest rate was being charged and what was the purpose of the loan. The answer I received to that question stated:

Petro-Canada reports as follows:

The requested information is considered to be of a managerial and administrative nature between Petro-Canada and the Corporation's employees and, therefore, cannot be released to the public.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): I know the Ministers can say anything they want in their answers, but I wanted to bring the fact to the Chair's attention that there have been many other answers given to similar questions with respect to similar organizations. This is the first in the number of answers I have received in which the answer has not been "No" to the question: "Have any loans been made?" The answers to former questions were very clear and indicated that information would be given even if it were managerial and administrative in nature.

Now, when we know that the answer is yes, there have been loans made, and we merely want details concerning public money, we receive the answer "No" from the Minister and this half-baked answer from his colleague. I would like to give the Parliamentary Secretary a chance. He and I have discussed the importance of clarity and openness with respect to answers. Would the Parliamentary Secretary undertake to go back to the responsible Minister and obtain an appropriate answer, one which is responsive to the question as all other answers have been responsive to similar questions?

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I will be happy to review that answer with the Minister concerned. I believe he is in the House and has heard this exchange, so it may not be that difficult to consult with him.

Madam Speaker, I ask that all remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

FARM LOANS INTEREST REBATE ACT (NO. 2)

MEASURE TO REDUCE INTEREST RATE

The House resumed, from Thursday, November 4, consideration of the motion of Mr. Whelan that Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans under the Farm Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, one can clip a sheep every year but one can only skin it once.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gurbin: The Liberal Government is down to the hide of Canadian agricultural producers and Canadian businessmen. Indeed, for 316 Canadian farmers this year, the Government has gone right to the bone.

Today we are debating the Farm Loans Interest Rebate Act, the provisions of which are in addition to the normal provisions of the Farm Credit Corporation and will provide some much-needed assistance to Canadian farmers. The tragedy is that this special assistance is required. In brief, this legislation provides $200 million in loans through the Farm Credit Corporation; $100 million of that is new funding. There is a $16 million Government donation, if you will, to agriculture to lower interest rates from the current 15.75 per cent to 11.75 per cent. That will assist between 500 and 1,500 Canadian farmers who are in serious financial distress.

There is no real debate on this Bill as such. No one is speaking in opposition to it. Indeed, I support this Bill strongly as a measure that will help that number of Canadian farmers. This Bill will be supported by my Party, as have all other additions to Farm Credit Corporation legislation through the years. But the tragedy is that we are required to pass legislation like this. It is really a band-aid measure which will only help a small percentage of Canadian farmers, those who are able to qualify. This legislation does not approach the basic problem or deal with the over-all number of Canadian farmers who need assistance. According to the calculations of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, at least 10 per cent of Canadian agriculture is in some degree of financial distress. According to the Minister's statements, 11 per cent of farmers involved in financial arrangements with the Farm Credit Corporation are in default. Out of 300,000 Canadian farmers, according to that ratio, 30,000 Canadian farmers are in financial distress.

I would like to comment on two points in the Minister's statement. First, he took exception to my description of the agri-bond concept that I mentioned in a question I asked in the House. It was described as a Conservative concept. By way of clarification, if the Conservative Party were in Government this concept would indeed have been implemented. I offer as proof of that the fact that the Small Business Development Bond, a similar type of mechanism, was introduced first in the Crosbie budget. We are committed to that type of principle, where it applies, in order to assist Canadian agriculture and businessmen. We all know that the Small Business Development Bond was supported later on by the Liberal Government, and it continues to be in place for those in distress. We all know, however, that it is not working well in providing the real relief that is required as a result of circumstances existing in the country today.

Second, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) mentioned that the number of people to be helped by the farm loans program was at least 2,000. According to the Minister's figures, 554 special assistance loans have been made which accounts for $80.1 million. On that basis, certainly the maximum to be helped would be in the neighbourhood of 1,500 Canadian farmers.

The Minister also mentioned that because of the importance of Canadian agriculture a number of things have been done over the years to assist agriculture. While the Minister looks to these mechanisms as donations to agriculture, for which he has been responsible to pilot through the House, I think it fair to mention that, at the same time as the Minister has been doing this, he has also stood in the House and supported a number of programs which have severely damaged agricultural producers in Canada. Specifically, I refer to the budget of November 12 and the National Energy Program. Everyone knows that income averaging annuities are gone and have been replaced by a provision that is more awkward and is probably not as effective for those farmers who are retiring. The Minister of Agriculture supported that by supporting the November 12 budget.

We also know that energy prices were significantly increased in the National Energy Program. While the Minister of Agriculture repeatedly claims that farmers are relieved from federal taxation on farm fuels, we also know that through the provisions of the National Energy Program farmers, like other Canadians, are paying significant increases for diesel fuel and gasoline. This amounts to 40 per cent in the cost of farm fuel. According to my rough calculations, assuming agriculture uses approximately 3 per cent of the liquid fuels, that is, diesel and gasoline, farmers are actually paying each year into the federal treasury approximately $144 million by way of direct and indirect federal levies. Farmers are not free from federal taxation. Indeed, farmers are making a significant contribution to the federal coffers.

By comparison, this whole Program that we are talking about now amounts to approximately $20 million. It is very similar to the program that was instituted in the November 12 budget of last year, to which $5 million had been allocated. All of this money is money that will have to be repaid. It is not really a gift in the true sense.

Certainly the Farm Credit Corporation as we have known it over the years has made a valuable contribution to agriculture. Even in my own area, I can attest well to the capable efforts that are being made. In particular I would like to mention the manager in the Walkerton office. He has a real feeling and understanding for the needs of agriculture. He does his best to help the local farm community within the limits and constraints that are provided by the Bill and the different revisions that have been made to the Farm Credit Corporation legislation.

Beyond that, we also know that farm credit has only provided a proportion, approximately one third, of the financial requirements of agriculture and that the regular lending rate of the Farm Credit Corporation now is 15.75 per cent. That 15.75 per cent is now well above what it cost the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow from the Government. The Bank of Canada prime rate is now approximately 11.25 per cent. One of the reasons that agricultural borrowers have to pay the high interest rate for at least the next six months is that the Farm Credit Corporation is required to set its rates for a six-month period. It does not have the flexibility in which to deal with the trends, whether up or down, in order to provide the lowest interest rates possible to agriculture borrowers.

Changes should be made to correct this. Whether on a three-month basis or a one or two-month basis, this would provide flexibility. This is particularly necessary now at a time when rates are coming down. Farm borrowers need to have the availability of that capital at the lowest possible interest rate.

The background to this whole situation that has made it necessary for this provision to be introduced really has to do with the state of the economy in Canada. Looking at interest rates and how they have fluctuated, both within Canada and internationally, over the last two years, we have seen the problem grow for agricultural producers.

It has been mentioned that we in Canada are experiencing the consequences of international situations over which we have no control. There is no question that Canadians are vulnerable to some of the fortunes and misfortunes of the international financial community, of interest rates going up and down, of international trade and so on. It is also true and fair to suggest that we have to compare ourselves and our relative performance with other countries.

In two recent cases we have seen the comparison of Canada's productivity and economic abilities with other countries. "Euromoney", a respected European financial document, has put us in fifty-fifth place, well behind other countries, most of which we would like to be ahead of, such as India, Pakistan and New Guinea. The OECD, in a statement by Sylvia Ostry, shows us at the very bottom in terms of economic performance compared to other western democracies.

Over the past ten years those things have created the crisis we have in our economic situation today. This crisis was experienced first in some sectors of the agricultural community, and the crisis will continue to be experienced as farmers face increasing bankruptcies. So far this year there have been 315 farm bankruptcies. By the end of the year it is expected there will be approximately 500.

That figure is not large. Five hundred people does not sound like a lot today. The important point is that it represents a 65 per cent increase in bankruptcies over last year. When talking about farm bankruptcies, we are talking about farmers who have openly declared bankruptcy and are identifiable. We are really only talking about the tip of the iceberg in terms of what is going on in the farm community.

In his statements on this bill, the Minister talked about the 50 per cent of farmers who are not vulnerable because they do not have significant borrowings. Since becoming Minister of Agriculture the Minister's constituency has decreased significantly. There are now approximately 300,000 farmers across Canada. Five hundred less may not make that big a difference, but the downward trend has been accelerated, particularly in the last several years, because of financial circumstances. It is one that promises to decrease his constituency to a size that may make it easier for him to handle, but it will create many long-term problems for Canada. One of the problems has been that the Government has not had a sense of what is happening at the basic farm unit level.

Efforts that have been made to try to express this to the Government have not been particularly well received. Recently in the area I represent, Bruce-Grey, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fisher) was invited to speak to a group of farm women. His major address was describing the Government's five and six program and the need for national unity. Both of those may have their place in Government policy and he certainly had a right to espouse them, but he missed the point completely. As they listened to him, they tried to communicate the fact that they were not being heard or being understood, that the Government had no sense of the frustration and difficulties they were experiencing.

When a farm goes out of business, all the related people downstream are also affected. Farmers will be the first to tell you that the reason Massey-Ferguson is in trouble is that the farmers cannot afford new machinery. That is a highly visible example. Beyond that highly visible example are more important examples in communities across Canada. The small-businessmen in the rural communities depend on the agricultural community for support in their recovery, ranging from hardware stores to co-ops and so on.

This impact ripples throughout the entire economy in such a way that unless we have recovery at the primary producer level, we will continue to experience difficulties in unemployment and general economic difficulty which we now see throughout the country. It is at the primary producer level that we must concentrate and ensure that we have recovery and then growth.

There are two aspects to the financial distress we are now seeing. One is the calculated financial aspect and how it relates to the economy. The other is the human aspect, the distress being experienced by both the direct farm families and the communities in which they live.

This psychological stress that has been experienced over such a period of time is, in my opinion, creating a significant long-term problem. They will not recover from this quickly. It will be very difficult to deal with. It is an additional problem for the Government as we progress through the eighties, but we must try to cope with it.

This is an unnecessary situation. We need to address the primary producer and primary production level, not just in agriculture but in all sectors. We see ripples through forestry, mining and so on. If we do not ensure that the primary producer level survives, we are not going to have a vehicle for recovery. We will not have the opportunity to recover from our current crisis.

There are two major parts of agricultural production costs over which the Government has some direct control. Those two major parts are interest rates and energy costs. Interest rates probably account for 20 per cent of farm input costs. Farm debt this year is approximately $17.6 billion and the interest on that debt is around $2.2 billion. That is 20 per cent of production costs.

The other single major factor in so far as input costs are concerned over which the Government has some control is energy costs. Depending on the type of farming done, energy costs can range from 8 per cent to 33 per cent, the 8 percent level being beef producers and the 33 percent level being cash croppers. What has happened in the last several years is that the primary producer has had to bear as much, and more in some cases, of the burden of increased interest rates and energy costs. They have not been able to recover those costs. Those opposite have many theories on how those costs can be recovered, but the primary producers do not have the opportunity to pass those costs on directly to consumers.

This Government, Mr. Speaker, has failed in the last several years to come up with some reasonable solutions, so that there is at least an insulation, if not a relief, from those burdens. If we do not provide some relief at that primary producer level, we are going to see not only a continual decrease in the number of farmers, but a potential collapse of the whole farming industry, certainly in some sectors. Many times there has been mentioned specific things that could be done. This Party, over the last six months, presented a ten-point program of specific things that could be instituted to allow the type of healthy agricultural economy this country needs in the short and the long term.

The first thing that must be done is that in some way the Minister of Agriculture must be given more influence in Cabinet. The Minister mentioned in the House that he did have some influence in Cabinet, but it has been very difficult for me, as a reasonably new Member, to see where that influence lies. Certainly it has not resulted in any meaningful improvement in the financial circumstances of farmers in my area and, as far as I know, has not resulted in any significant improvement in the financial circumstances of farmers across Canada.

The second thing that must be done is to stabilize farm prices. We must have co-operation and leadership for and within the Provinces. As recently as several days ago, the provincial Ministers of Agriculture met, without the federal Minister of Agriculture, not because they did not want to meet with him, but because he failed to follow through on a program he had committed himself to and they were forced to get together to try to come up with a national program. That clearly, Mr. Speaker, is a federal responsibility. We must have a national program so that each Province is not pitted one against the other, with different resources and opportunities, and there is some type of harmonization, some type of equalization of opportunities for farmers in the various Provinces.

I am not sure of the specifics of the meeting of the provincial Ministers of Agriculture, but clearly it is the time for the federal Minister of Agriculture to forward and enjoin the provincial ministers not only to co-operate, but to help in developing a plan which all Provinces can live with and which has some equity for all farmers in the country.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture and, particularly, the Ontario Federation of Agriculture, have been very active in looking at farm financial conditions of today and over the last several years. They have come up with several proposals which we have looked at and with which we are in agreement, if not on the figures, certainly on the concept.

There is no question in anyone's mind that the Farm Credit Corporation itself requires a very significant, if not massive, infusion of capital. The changes which occurred in the legislation last April allowed the Minister of Agriculture to seek funding from outside Government, whether it be from pension funds or international banking interests. It has the ability now to do that. This increase in capital is very necessary for the Farm Credit Corporation to have the strength that is needed to meet the financial requirements of farmers today.

I have already mentioned, as many others, the agri-bond concept. That principle is simple. It is one that can be easily understood and implemented and is also allowable under the changes already provided through legislation last April. The Ontario Federation of Agriculture has also suggested an income market assurance program, which we would like to support. We are all on-track in the agricultural community in realizing that something at least equal to the provisions of IAACs should be reinstituted in order to provide security for farmers who will retire, and to help in some way to reduce start-up costs for young farmers.

With respect to the energy tax credit, I would like to compare the farm situation to the petroleum situation. Some petroleum companies—Union Carbide is one that comes to mind—are in a situation right now where they have faced massive increases in pricing, particularly of natural gas, to a degree that they are not building plants. They are not investing their capital in Canada, not providing jobs, and they are not providing the value added, which in the case of their products can be as high as 21 times the value of the natural gas. They are not doing these things because they cannot be competitive at the prices which are being charged for the raw resources.

The same situation applies to agriculture, Mr. Speaker. It uses a very small percentage of our total energy requirements in Canada. If it is required, as a cost of input, to pay the full tariff—which it does, with the exception of some rebate on excise tax which is a small portion of the total cost—and it cannot get it back at the other end because it cannot pass those costs on, then agriculture is in a very poor position to face the future.

These are two specific examples where we have an opportunity in Canada, with our resources, to assure an industry, whether it is agricultural or a segment of the petrochemical industry, that we are in a position to provide them some relief so we can get that value added. Much has been mentioned of the export value that we gain from agriculture. We know the whole economy of Canada is perhaps 40 per cent dependent on agriculture, and as many as one-quarter of the population is directly or indirectly employed at some stage in the agribusiness. It is critically important that the primary producer remains competitive. Providing something like an energy tax credit or in some way reducing the input costs at the energy level can have a significant impact on how healthy that industry is. There is no question but that it can be done and should be done. The payoff could be tremendous.

In closing, I would like to say that over the last weekend particularly we in Canada have been treated to an example of, I suppose "reincarnation" might be the most appropriate word, of a leadership which has had some difficulty in coping with, if not in grasping, what are the problems facing Canadians today. If it was understood, there would be some action which would give myself and others a sense that the problems were going to be solved. We know the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made efforts in the last several months, in his trip out west and his presentation to the policy conference most recently, to get the pulse of the country and try to find out what his position should be. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether he in fact has accomplished his goal. What I have a clear sense of is that, if he was out there, either he was using the wrong finger or he got the wrong pulse. Or we have the wrong Prime Minister.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a pleasure to enter this debate on amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation legislation. It is not too often that members from rural parts of Canada have a chance to debate agricultural concerns and problems here in the House of Commons. From time to time we have a chance to ask questions in Question Period, but as to having a dialogue or debate, not only with Government Members but with each other, that opportunity has not presented itself too often over the past year or so.

I would like to start by saying that I, like other Members of my Party, indeed all Members of the House of Commons, support the legislation we are dealing with this afternoon concerning the Farm Credit Corporation. I think one thing which can be said is that the FCC, because of the tremendous volumes of money which agriculture needs now, is starting to move in the right direction by looking for outside sources of money; in other words, money which is not necessarily coming from the Canadian taxpayer. The Corporation has done that, of course, by looking to the United States bond market to raise funds.

From time to time, Mr. Speaker, Members of Parliament from all sides have suggested to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) other ways of raising money. Some of them were possibly far-fetched, but nevertheless all were based on the fact that agriculture has grown to the extent that it is probably one of the largest users of capital of any industry in the country. It is quite common now across this country to find farms valued in excess of $1 million with gross product sales of $500,000 to upwards of $1 million. If we are seeing that in the early part of the 1980s, Mr. Speaker, I predict that those Members of Parliament who stand here and debate agriculture in the latter part of the 1980s will see a totally different industry from the one we are looking at right now. This will be because of a whole series of changes, such as a drop in the average age of farmers, but mainly perhaps because of the computerized world we are moving into which will have possibly its greatest impact on the agricultural sector because of that sector's tremendous need for information.

It would be great, Mr. Speaker, if we could look into a crystal ball and into the future, but as politicians we have to look to the present, and agriculture is currently suffering probably one of the tightest cost-price squeezes it has ever experienced. This has been brought on primarily for two reasons. One, obviously, is from overproduction, basically in North America and principally because of overproduction of commodities in the U.S., commodities such as grain and oil seeds of which Canada is a major exporter.

Production has over time increased substantially in the United States, but it all started back at the time when President Carter decided to impose a grain embargo on Russia because of its invasion of Afghanistan. At the time it seemed that everyone, including farm organizations in Canada and the U.S., supported the President's move. However, since that time everyone in the agricultural sector, from Versatile Manufacturing, International Harvester and Massey-Ferguson right down to the smallest farmer and storekeeper, has lived to regret the decision to try and use food as a political weapon. This is because what really happened, Mr. Speaker, is that Russia decided not to buy directly from the United States but to buy from other countries such as Argentina and the European Common Market, and it would buy established quantities from Canada. In effect, what Russia did was to leave this huge quantity of American grain production sitting on the international market, hence depressing the price. They have done this very effectively and in effect created a reverse embargo situation an where they are now embargoing the American farmers and thereby keeping down the price of grain exported by all other countries.

At the present time there are only two countries which really export grain, Canada and the United States. The Europeans export some, the Australians are not exporting this year because of a drought, and Argentina, traditionally an exporter of grain, has had its production pretty well taken up both last year and this year, probably into next year, by direct purchases from the Soviet Union. So we have a unique situation which has developed where you really have two countries acting as the main suppliers of grain in the world.

At the same time many countries around the world are starting to find themselves short of grain, but with the price of grain very close to what it was in the 1930s in real terms. In southern Manitoba, for example, corn is now selling in the neighbourhood of $2.25 a bushel. It increased over the weekend by eight or nine cents a bushel because of a U.S. Government move to shore up their free stocks of grain. But the price of $2.25 a bushel is approximately 35 cents to 40 cents below the cost of production. This does not include a multitude of fixed costs. So you can see the kind of cost-price squeeze in just one commodity which is reflective of the situation generally throughout the agricultural sector. The same situation has developed for barley, wheat, rapeseed and soybean, in fact, most other exportable grain or oil seed crops.

All of this has been caused by a series of events, the reaction to which was thought to be in the best interests of freedom, but which in fact has turned out to be a literal disaster for agriculture. The problem, of course, is that I do not believe we are going to learn from past mistakes. It is very tempting for any government to use food as a political weapon, particularly so when we in North America can produce food better than anyone else in the world. From time to time we will probably be tempted to use food as a political weapon, and ultimately to our detriment but nevertheless in my opinion it will be used. That is unfortunate from the point of view of the farmer, the country affected and all the infrastructure that surrounds the producer. Unfortunately, I think we are going to see more of this reaction and food will be used as a weapon in settling politically motivated global disputes. I do not like to think of that but it may become the reality.

One of the problems that the farmer is facing is low grain prices—indeed, low agricultural prices generally, with the possible exception of the livestock sector although it is not in a healthy state at the present time. He certainly faces low grain and oil seed prices.

The other aspect of this gloomy scenario is one that we have developed ourselves, to some extent. Nothing could have insulated us from the effects of the world recession, but most observers of the political scene agree that we have made matters worse through a series of bumbling and stumbling government measures. These have contributed to disastrously high interest rates which have had a direct and immediate impact on agriculture. In most cases, the farmer cannot pass high interest rate costs on to anyone else and has to absorb them.

The cost price squeeze is the result of various inputs that have been built into Canadian society. Agriculture probably uses more energy than any other industrial sector in the country. The price of fertilizer has increased and so has the price of the propane used for drying grain and in some cases, for running tractors. Two years ago it cost five cents to dry a bushel of corn; now it costs 20 cents. That price increase works it way through the system, into such things as the plastic used in the manufacture or grain drills, parts for tractors and so on. The farmer is being whipsawed at the present time and agriculture does not look like an attractive occupation in the foreseeable future.

We must begin making plans to provide Canadian agriculture with a more positive future. As legislators, we must point the direction in which we would like to see the industry move. One area we should examine is the use of agriculture as one of the mainstays of an industrial strategy. We have better agriculturalists than any other country in the world, with the possible exception of the United States. We can produce food better and more cheaply than most countries and we should be using the agri-food sector as one of the mainstays of our society, with energy as another possible support.

I say that because when you are good at something you should try to maximize that skill. The Government should help agriculture if and when it needs it by providing research and development toward that end. It should maximize the use of our transportation system and it should also allow the marketplace to determine which agricultural products should be grown. As a country, we should be deciding to go ahead with a few winners. Agriculture is probably the largest employer in the country with about 25 per cent of the total work force being engaged in processing, shipping, packing, storing, labelling, or trades in some way connected with agriculture. When we are good at something that provides a lot of employment, such a agriculture, we should focus our attention on becoming a superpower in that area.

I do not think there is any doubt that in the eighties and nineties agriculture will be as important as oil was in the seventies and probably more so because we must have food. There are more people to eat it now.

The Government should formulate broad-range policies and guidelines for the direction it wants agriculture to take. I do not think we should have any more marketing boards than there are at the present time and certainly none in the livestock industry. Since his election, it has been a pet project of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) to move this country toward more supply management, a more tightly controlled agricultural industry. I do not think that fits into the scenario that I see for Canada as an agricultural superpower in the eighties.

Over the next two or three years we should put the best academic and political brains together with the farming and industrial sector in an effort to work toward the goal of becoming a superpower. Even though the United States is at present having trouble selling its grain and some other agricultural products to the Soviet Union, it is using its knowledge and expertise in agriculture to help with its balance of payments problem. Canada has the same opportunity. If we could ensure the flow of our products to our ports and that our infrastructure was geared to meet the challenges of the future, we would have no fear in terms of balancing our books, employing people, giving direction to a large and ever-growing segment of the population or providing opportunities in the entire agricultural sector.

I believe very sincerely that eventually this will come about, whether or not we as politicians pursue the issue. We should not as a country be faced with a situation where most products can be produced elsewhere in the world more cheaply than in Canada, particularly when our industry is an outstanding example. In my opinion, the industry has to come to the fore. I think we should help it along and give it Canadian attention. Our goal should be to become a superpower by the latter part of this decade, a superpower unquestioned in the world as far as producing, shipping, processing, packing and supplying to an ever-growing population are concerned. Agriculture is probably the most important product aside from water which our planet has to offer.

We will not accomplish this objective if we put our heads in the sand, as has the Minister of Agriculture. We cannot move in that direction with the idea that somehow everything must be controlled or that we have a market for a product and we produce only for that market, nothing else. We cannot move toward superpower status in terms of agriculture by building a Canagrex. Incidentally, we do not hear many people talking about Canada being a superpower in anything any longer. As I was saying, we cannot become a superpower in agriculture by building a Canagrex, a Government marketing system in which the Government participates with the private sector from time to time as it deems necessary, especially when we consider the various problems with such a marketing approach.

At the present time we should be moving in almost the opposite direction, but we are taking the wrong approach primarily because the Minister of Agriculture is not innovative. Certainly his thinking is not dynamic, and I think I am charitable when I say that. He no longer has the credibility which a Minister of Agriculture should have. It could be, if it is not, our single largest export earner, employing approximately a quarter of our population. The Minister does not have the stature or the clout in terms of political will which must be generated to move in this direction. We have inherent structural problems, but I hope the Minister will sit down with his officials and take a hard look at the direction in which they are pushing or prodding the agricultural community. If they do so, they will discover that they are headed down the wrong track and hopefully will make some changes.

In terms of the agricultural superpower strategy which I have outlined this afternoon, there is some light at the end of the tunnel. The light is that hopefully within one and a half to two years we will be into an election campaign. The political parties of the country have the chance between now and the upcoming election campaign to work toward an agri-food strategy or an industrial strategy which includes agriculture as it has never been included before. I can foresee such a strategy coming out of my particular Party. I think it is necessary, logical and, above all, correct, so it will not be very difficult to implement or sell to Canadians.

While Canadian agriculture is in a very serious situation at present, it will survive. But it needs hope and direction. It is not obtaining hope or direction from the Minister of Agriculture, who frankly likes to navel gaze. He likes to look, if not at his navel, at his feet in terms of the direction in which he wants the agricultural community to move. The direction is so clear in terms of where we should be going that farmers or primary producers would certainly be willing to move toward it. The 25 per cent of the population employed in agriculture would be ready to move in that direction because they would find security in jobs and expanded job opportunities. The country would benefit because of the volume of products shipped to various parts of the world. The Canadian infrastructure would benefit because we would use it more consistently in terms of moving agricultural products, not only around the country but offshore as well. The people of the world would benefit because we would be supplying more agricultural products, at presumably the best prices we could afford, to other lands.

It is a dynamic policy, a dynamic idea. It is something we could look back on in the future and say that for once as a country we made the correct decision in making agri-food the centre of a very dynamic, fast-growing and far-reaching industrial strategy which provided tremendous prosperity.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the subject we are discussing, the Farm Credit Corporation, has very much been in the minds of Hon. Members of Parliament for the last two years. I do not think it is any secret that in the spring of 1981 half a dozen Members on this side of the House made several proposals on how we could reduce interest rates for farmers under this legislation. They were put before the Government and seemingly obtained the support of the Minister who nodded approval. Here we are two years later and nothing has been forthcoming except this mouse of a bill which is currently before us.

I re-emphasize what the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) has just said very quietly. He was trying to say that one of the big opportunities for Canada to get back into forward growth is the use of the tremendous potential of the agricultural industry. The Minister has said this repeatedly, but where he is being condemned is that he does not follow through with positive and simple ideas to get it moving forward.

I do not believe I have heard the figures but I will give them anyway. The capital structure in the farm industry across Canada is $130 billion. Most of that investment in the industry has come about during the last two decades. Part of that investment was realized because of the Farm Credit Corporation. I acknowledge that the banks and the machinery companies have participated in that capital infusion, but the Farm Credit Corporation Act of 1959 is one of the best examples that Parliament can offer of constructive legislation which has not cost the taxpayer anything in the last three or four decades. It has enabled the industry to grow and not only make money for itself but to start the entire country on an upward spiral.

While I have said this before, I repeat that when this country was in a recession in 1961—not nearly as desperate as today's recession—it was the farmers of western Canada who started the country moving forward again. This fact was admitted publicly by the Governor of the Bank of Canada in 1964 and by the then Minister of Finance, the Hon. Walter Gordon. The recovery started because the farmer immediately spent the money he received from selling his goods abroad on farm machinery, trucks and the expansion of his operations. That marked the beginning of the upward spiral which we have been looking back on for the last 21 years.

This legislation which we are so slightly amending was the main reason for our recovery at that time. I suggest that today's recession will be resolved in the same manner. When I consider the growth in the export of various commodities such as grains, sulphur, the tremendous potential for potash and fibres in the forest industry in the next 20 years, I believe that we will not have too many rivals in Canada to the rate of growth in the agricultural industry. Therefore, the objective is for Governments in all Provinces to reinforce this positive aspect of our current situation.

This particular legislation is merely a type of small subsidy for a few hundred farmers. It will achieve very little in solving what I and the Hon. Member for Lisgar are discussing. The entire industry from one end of Canada to the other has great potential if it receives the proper attention and particularly if it does not cost the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) and his minions any money. Since this legislation is a charge on the Minister of Finance, one cannot expect him to contribute very much money to it. It is a handout in the form of a subsidy of 4 per cent for a few hundred farmers who are in dire straits.

I would like to discuss the ideas which originated from this side of the House two years ago but were supported by Members from all Parties in the debates which have taken place since then. I will not repeat all the speeches which I delivered on this subject but I will refer the House, if it is interested, to the short speech which I made on February 1, 1982 dealing with the Farm Credit Corporation. I invite Members to reread that speech, which dealt with the philosophies behind the Farm Credit Corporation.

On March 18, 1982 I spoke on an NDP motion about interest rates. I would highly recommend reading that speech with particular regard to this Bill which we are now debating. I suggest that interest rates are the key to implementing this forward motion of the investment of money into those things which produce more wealth for which there is a market. Finally, on March 29, 1982 I applied the same philosophy to housing in Canada, using the same principle for those who want to own their own homes as we are using for farmers.

I refer those speeches to Members who are interested in order to illustrate that there are ways of positively assisting this cutting edge industry of agriculture, which can not only make more money for itself and a million and a half people directly employed in that industry, but assist the 25 per cent of the economy which is affected by agriculture. This growth can begin right away without waiting three or four years for a projection on Canada's future.

This has been possible for approximately the last year, particularly with the amendments that all Parties recommended to the Farm Credit Corporation this spring. As a result of those amendments, the Minister was able to insert a Clause which allowed the Farm Credit Corporation to borrow money "by any means". Those words "by any means" are the open door to any manner of obtaining money for the Farm Credit Corporation without having to go to the Department. I hoped and prayed that the Minister would seize that opportunity to march through the open door, parade through it if he wished, and say: "Look, what I am doing".

When I had finished my speech on March 29, 1982 I think it is quite clear that the Minister had supported me. I will let Hon. Members be the judge of that. I will quote his words. I had just finished speaking when the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) replied:

> Mr. Speaker, later on I will touch on the presentation made by the Hon. Member concerning this bill. As Minister of Agriculture, I must admit that I agree with much of what he says.

He went on to say:

> I also have the legal advisers which we talked about, and Ministers who are not lawyers, but have to make decisions, still have to depend on them to some extent. I will touch on that point later.

I would take that as rather direct evidence that at the moment I finished speaking—I hope for Members on all sides—he realized that what I was proposing was not only beneficial for agriculture and all of Canada but would not cost the treasury anything. It was simply a question of getting around one or two small legal points which I had been trying to explain how to accomplish.

That was six months ago. I was naturally hoping that when this Bill came forward, the Minister of Agriculture would have seized on this all-Party support to introduce the necessary legal requirements to make my proposals the will of Parliament and therefore the will of the Government of Canada. This Bill will not accomplish that. Instead, it has the opposite effect of continuing the practice during the last number of years of giving hand-outs to farmers. If I have learned one thing from my fairly lengthy association with farmers, it is that the great majority of them do not want hand-outs. They just want the Government to get off their backs. They want a chance to have a fair grasp at the apple. They want the right to make their decisions, and if they make mistakes they will be glad to pay for them.

I look back with great enthusiasm to that period in 1958 and 1959 when, out of 256,000 who had permit books to sell grain in western Canada, 209,000 signed a petition calling for a hand-out. I did not blame one of them. The farm leader said that the answer to one's problem, when one cannot sell one's grain, is the handout.

As a Minister, I took the occasion to oppose that proposal. I was backed up by one of the other Ministers even before it got to Cabinet. A great uproar took place in the House and other places about the position I had taken. I believe there was only one person in the whole Conservative caucus of 250 in those days, Senators and Members together, who supported me. Yet a few years later, almost all the farmers who had asked for it supported that position. In the answer I gave to them as Minister of Agriculture, I said that I did not like subsidies for farmers when there was a hungry world abroad. However, I would go out and help to sell their bread and the price would come up by market forces. If I said 50 cents, and it came up 60 cents. So the income rose in a very short period by about three times. The farmers were glad that they had not taken a handout. They were glad that someone had stood up, had expressed their view and then done something about it.

The Minister is in the same position today. He must know, the same as I know, that the great majority of farmers would like to do it on their own, yet he comes along with another handout. It would only affect a few hundred farmers when more than that could use help. However, it misses the philosophy of the Farm Credit Corporation Act. The Act was designed to help all farmers, rich and poor. As long as they had an idea as to how they could expand and make more money, it was to the advantage of the Government to give them money at a reasonable rate, because who would collect all the revenue from all the money generated from that activity? The federal Government would be a big gainer.

We put a guarantee into the original Farm Credit Corporation Act that interest rates would never rise above 5 per cent. We honoured that guarantee for about six or seven years, but then the Department of Finance stepped in and changed it and we got a rate slightly below prime rate. When the interest rates rose, not only were farmers destroyed, but all segments of the economy were destroyed at the same time. I think that if the Minister were to take advantage of the fact that the great majority of farmers do not want handouts or policies that push one section of farmers down at the expense of lifting up another group, there would be a tremendous amount of enthusiasm among farmers to go out and take their chances on borrowed money to expand their operations and get involved in all the ways they know to make more money.

I thought the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) was in the House, but I see that he has left. I suggest that one of the techniques by which farmers could make more money would be to cut their costs. One of the big costs is energy. It was hardly noticed in the House, but under the Crosbie budget of 1979, for the first time in 60 years it became legal to have a still for making alcohol. There is hardly a farm in Canada which does not have enough waste to produce alcohol sufficient not only to run the farm but also to sell surplus to the city fellow who does not have access to a still or the waste to make the alcohol. This would cut costs tremendously. A large enterprise cannot compete with the farmer who is producing alcohol, and the reason is simple. The farmer takes his waste straw, or any other waste material, and uses it as his heat source. Not only does he distil the waste material, such as grain or vegetables, into alcohol, but he passes the heat into his house to heat it and then takes the great bulk of the stuff left over, the mash, which is worth $150 to $200 a tonne, and produces alcohol for 25 cents a gallon. Big business can only produce it for about $2 a gallon. There is a limited commercial market for alcohol, but it is big enough to take a great percentage of waste off the farm, which not only gives the farmer lower costs, but also gives him more income out of his waste. At the same time as a farmer does this, he takes the pressure off the oil industry to provide all the oil we need.

This proposal was brought in under the Crosbie budget and again under the succeeding budget, but so many restrictions were placed around it that no person went into it. This idea of producing alcohol out of waste was not only a Conservative idea. A farmer in western Ontario did exactly what I have just described. He used his waste material to make alcohol, took the heat that was still useful and heated his house and took the mash and sold it to the livestock industry. He was the man who quoted the figure of 25 cents for a gallon of alcohol.

This man was so enthused over his idea that he told his neighbours about it. The Mounted Police moved in, arrested him and charged him with having a still. He came before the judge, who had read the newspapers and had discovered that it would be legal under the Crosbie budget to have a still. He told the farmer, "I will not send you to jail for having broken the law. You are a free man and I will not put a man in prison for a law which will be changed". This man became even more excited. He ran as the Liberal candidate in the provincial election and almost beat a Tory in Ontario. He became so excited that he ran for the Liberal leadership and became the outstanding spokesman for the Liberal convention in Ontario. He found it was possible to become a leader with ideas. He was well applauded, I am sure, but the Liberals must come a long way before they start applauding a man for his ideas. They only look to see his potential on television and his potential for handling patronage. That is a grim judgment. That man still lives and he can bear out all the things I have said about him.

I think the Minister of Agriculture, as part of his policy of helping farmers under the Farm Credit Act, should persuade the new Minister of Finance, who has been slightly exposed to the need for energy in this country, to put this Crosbie clause back again and improve on it. It would not cause any great loss of face to the Government. It has requested ideas. We have tried to give it ideas, but the Government must learn to accept them. Just because ideas come from this side does not necessarily mean that they are bad. I know this is only a small thing in the great total of needs for energy in this country, but let us go on from that. We now have sufficient technical and economic information to know that in the future farmers will produce the bulk of all energy requirements in Canada. We can now produce energy in the form of natural gas and in the form of oil which is clear of sulphur and other pollutants, and we can do all this more cheaply than we can by taking oil from a well.

In Pittsburgh, people from the Department of Mines did large-scale research on this subject over 15 years ago. They could not hold hearings down in the United States, so they came to Winnipeg to tell the world about what they had done. Three different items were used to make natural gas and oil. They could make oil for less than a dollar a barrel and natural gas for 37 cents per thousand. We are now paying over $3 per Mcf for natural gas.

The University of Saskatchewan experimented with poplar trees and has proven that hydrocarbons comprised 50 per cent of their waste. It now has a grant from the federal Government to go ahead and demonstrate on a commercial scale what it can be produced for. Much better than the poplar tree is the jack pine tree. Ninety per cent of its weight is in hydrocarbons. That is the type of thing on which the department of mines of the U.S.A. worked.

I am sure everyone will laugh when I say you can do the same thing with cattle manure or with garbage from humans, but the fact is it is being done all over the world. Why not let the Farm Credit Corporation lend money to farmers for doing things that reduce costs? As for legal technicalities, all the Government has to do is to reintroduce the Crosbie budget proposal on renewable resource taxation. We should get away from this theory that a person who produces alcohol is doing something nasty. People are not going to drink this type of alcohol because it is not potable. Let us get away from these fears that go back to the 1920s and the days of the scandals over Beauharnois.

I could go on and talk at length about this whole concept of biomass. The University of Manitoba and the University of Kitchener have done tremendous work in this field. All we have to do is to let the individual, through the tax system, get access to this information, and with the money to go ahead he will get enough money to pay back his loan, reduce his costs and invest in other things to keep the thing rolling.

That is only one field. I would like to suggest that it is not only for biomass energy objectives that we can use the Farm Credit Act, but we can use agriculture as the cutting edge for getting into whole task of producing energy on a renewable basis without using any of our good land. We can use what we call waste land. We can open up all the boreal forests to multiple uses, not just cutting pulp. We should be using all of the waste trees that are now called weed trees. We can introduce a whole new industry now.

This idea is not new. At one time I was asked to prepare a plan on this for the Quebec Government. That Province knows what the plan is and in due course I imagine it will be brought to light.

I would like to see farmers in areas close to forests get access to the forests and farm the trees as they should be farmed, not by the wasteful method that nature has called silviculture. Europeans have farmed trees for 200 years, and if the Europeans can do it, we can do it here. Utilization of forest wealth in Canada will be made possible for many purposes instead of just pulpwood, paper and lumber. Most important will be the production of energy. At the same time, we will improve the quality of the forests because forest management will be in the hands of people who will benefit from their use. I am referring, of course, to the farmers. This cannot be done by mass operations in forest areas.

These ideas are not tossed out for the sake of hearing the sound of my voice. I have talked about this for a long time, but now that the country is on its back, now that the country is worried about how it can be so wealthy in potential, there are things we can do. We can do so much to restore the place of Parliament in the hearts of people if we do something positive and let this "baboon game" of politics go. We should not be showing our bare red behinds to each other. Let us get out and do practical things.

We are lucky that we have agencies like the Farm Credit Corporation, the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the Export Agency, the Small Business Development Bank and so on. We have the agencies in place. The key is to utilize those agencies by not taking money from the treasury, of which we do not have too much, but taking the money from the people who are willing to invest. We have more money in Canada than we know what to do with. The Economic Council has been worrying about this for years.

We put barriers against individuals who invest in risk enterprises because we would rather have things done by the Government. I suggest that we should set individuals free in this country to make money. All one has to do is to get rid of the bottlenecks, such as the legalities preventing people from producing alcohol. These fears should be removed. If a man makes a profit, tax him on that profit. That is legitimate. All I am saying is, let the individuals have a chance to make a profit.

With regard to the over-all market opportunities, the Hon. Member for Lisgar handled that quite adequately. Despite what economists have said for 20 years, the job of feeding this world will take all our efforts in every country for the next 20 years even to get close to meeting demands. Why Americans and Canadians should be battling each other on such things as cattle, fruit and now even the grain industry, I just cannot understand. All we have to do is to tell the farmers of the United States to unite with Canadian farmers. By doing that we can find new markets. We can find ways for people to sell their goods so as to get enough money to pay for ours. We do not want help from the Government in the form of handouts. What we want from Government is the machinery to see if we can collect money from individuals in Canada who will take risks through the Farm Credit Corporation. What we have to do is to get interest rates down to half what they are today. That can be done by using the principle of the Small Businessman Development Bond. The Minister keeps calling it an agribond, but that is what he means.

The precedent was set for this in the First World War. It exists in other cases in Canada. The precedents in the United States are legion. If you spend and invest your money in risk enterprises for good social purposes, you do not have to pay taxes to the Government. Therefore, you can give the individual money at half rate. That is not a new idea; it is a repetition of what we have been saying for several years.

We hope that the Minister will respond to this in the Bill we are now discussing by saying that he is quite willing to take the new Minister of Finance to the mat and ask him whether or not he believes in individuals risking money to make money. We have the agencies in place. We need to get the Department of Finance off the backs of the people of Canada. This particular Bill gives us a chance to go forward, to get the agricultural industry going full out in all of its sections.

With regard to all of its sections, I must say for the record, that as a westerner I am very pleased to know that the farmers of Quebec have rallied to the support of the western farmers on the Crow rate issue. That matter, we know, will be resolved in the caucus of the Liberal Party. But once the Government becomes aware of the extent to which the farmers of Quebec, a few even in Ontario and the Maritimes, are behind the fundamental principle that when you push one section of farmers down you never, in the final analysis, help any other section, the sooner we can get on with the job of developing the potential of the whole industry in all parts of Canada. It will come as a result of the fact that all farmers are in the same union. They simply want to get going. The Farm Credit Act will be very helpful.

In conclusion, this particular amendment of a handout is accepted by everybody as not meaning very much. We will support this amendment because even handouts indicate that the Minister has his eyes in the right direction. If he had gone forward with what he seemed to be in favour of six months ago and we had money out now at 6 per cent to the farmers across this country, all sorts of things would be happening that would push our transportation people to the limit to get exports out of the country. I am not talking just about grain. I would like to go on and discuss other subjects, but I think I have said enough.

If the Minister is not confident that he can get this by the Minister of Finance, there are two alternatives. One is to go to the cheap money markets of Europe. Eurodollars and petrodollars are available now at 6 per cent. You could pay the premium to protect against the ups and downs of the exchange rate. This can be done through a consortium of Swiss banks.

Money can be brought into this country at 6 per cent with no risk of a change in value in the exchange rate on the dollar, either on our side or the other side. We could then get reasonably priced money into the hands of the 320,000 farmers still in business. They will get this country moving forward very fast. The wealth that they earn will go immediately into the trucking industry, the machinery industry, the manufacturing industry and then to the mines and forests.

The farmers got this country going in 1961 and the other industries all followed. We can repeat that situation. We do not have to wait three years for an economic study of our prospects; our prospects are good and we know it.

MEASURE TO REDUCE INTEREST RATE

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Whelan that Bill C-134, respecting rates of interest on farm loans under the Farm Credit Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to have this opportunity to speak this afternoon on Bill C-134. I am happy too that the result of this bill will be to reduce some interest rates on farm loans by 4 per cent over the next two-year period. As a short-term solution, I am sure it will be welcome news to farmers struggling to keep their family farm who are aided by this program.

Last February when I spoke to amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act, I said there was a crisis in farm financing. There still is. Even though a reduction in interest rates on the fixed interest loans provided by the Farm Credit Corporation is to be lauded, the bottom line is that it is only a band-aid solution to a much larger problem in Canadian agriculture.

In 1979 there were 82 farm bankruptcies in Canada. One year later that figure had doubled to 164. A year later it had gone to 191. This year it is far worse. So far we only know how many farm bankruptcies have been reported in the first nine months of this year. Already 316 family farms have gone into bankruptcy. In nine months, 316 Canadian farmers could not make ends meet any longer and had to shut down their operations. That is outrageous.

In my province of Manitoba so far this year there are five times more farm bankruptcies than there were in all of 1981. There are a lot of people who think Canadian farmers have it made, that they all have new cars, take winter vacations and are getting rich off their operations. Well, they are very wrong. The average net farm income in Manitoba last year was only $1,809. That does not buy very much. This year things are going to be even worse for farmers. Manitoba farm income will drop by 34 per cent this year. Will their costs of production decrease with their income? You can bet that won't happen.

One of my constituents wrote me a note recently in which he summed it up very nicely. He said:

> Please speak on behalf of our grain—"wheat," et cetera. We need $8 to $12 a bushel and not $3.50. A combine costs $135,000.

Total farm incomes have change little from the 1974 level of $3.5 billion. In fact, this year total farm income will be less than the 1974 level. When we take inflation into account, it is fair to say incomes are only about half what they were in 1974.

The real problem with farm credit is not simply inadequate credit. It is a problem of a net income too low to pay the bills. To pay bills and upgrade their operation in order to maintain a viable farm, farmers have borrowed at an increasing rate. In 1970 accumulated farm debt in Canada was $4.2 billion. Last year it had risen to $16 billion. In Manitoba, farmers last year paid out $201 million in loan payments, an increase of 359 per cent since 1975.

Those are the facts and figures. For the people who deal in facts and figures, the statisticians, those figures do not lie. Farmers may not understand the over-all picture. They may not have all the numbers, charts and graphs handy which show that agriculture in Canada is in serious trouble, but in their hearts they know very well that agriculture in this country is in trouble.

Let me give an example which I think illustrates the way high interest rates are crippling our agricultural sector. I know of a farmer whose land near the southwest corner of my constituency has been tilled and seeded and harvested by two generations of the same family. Earlier this year this farmer negotiated an $80,000 loan with a local bank. The loan was an operating loan, something that was required to keep the farm going. Interest on this loan in the first year will amount to $17,000; $17,000 just in interest.

Now, this farmer is a hard worker. He takes his farm seriously. It is not just a hobby or an expensive pastime. With the current state of agriculture in this country the "gentleman farmer" has practically gone the way of the rumble seat and jitter-bugging. Farming is far too costly to be something one can dabble in.

This farmer in my riding, by working hard day after day, week after week, year after year, has managed to support his wife and family over the years. However, that farm has never given this farmer $17,000 a year. It is not likely to do so this year or next year. How does someone who is trying to keep his head above water in a family farm operation do that when the odds are so overhelmingly stacked against him?

The agricultural policies of this Government are at the root of the increasing number of bankruptcies in this country. Up until the late sixties, most of the long-term credit needed by Canadian farmers was supplied by the Farm Credit Corporation as well as much of the short-term and intermediate-term financing needs of those farmers. Then the Government began restraining the amount of credit the Farm Credit Corporation could provide. Banks were invited into the farm credit market.

In 1975, 72 per cent of all long-term credit taken out by farmers came from the Farm Credit Corporation. By 1979 only 35 per cent of farmers were able to meet their long-term credit needs with the fixed interest loans provided by the FCC. The Government, with its tight purse strings, has hamstrung the Farm Credit Corporation. It has prevented it from keeping up with the increasing demand for farm credit. In effect, it offered the banks with their floating interest rates a bigger piece of the farm credit action on a silver platter.

At the same time as it was knocking the props out from under the FCC, the Government introduced drastic changes in its grain policy. Prior to the so-called open market, most feed grains had been marketed outside the Prairies under the auspices of the Canadian Wheat Board. Prices were relatively stable and the competitive capabilities of different regions of the country were more or less equal. But the Government's decision to move to the open market and allow large grain merchants and feed mills back into the grain market on a nationwide basis upset the apple cart. The result was the transfer of some sectors of agriculture activity to different regions of the country. To aid that transfer, some provincial Governments got into the act with subsidized credit or even out-and-out subsidies. By the end of the decade much of the hog production had moved out of the Prairies into Ontario, Quebec and to a lesser extent the Maritimes. To a greater extent, cattle which originated in the Prairies were being fed in Eastern feedlots where the price of feed grains gave them the competitive advantage.

This must have looked very appealing to Government economists, because with all the activity, it looked as though agriculture was booming. But what was really happening was that production was shifting from one region of the country to the other, financed largely with borrowed money. It was fortunate that while this was happening there was a surge in grain prices which carried most farmers through to the end of the decade. But with accumulated farm debt of around $16 billion and farm income now falling, the results of the shift the Government's "agri-food" policy are becoming evident. Large investments were made in some parts of the country and abandoned in others. Farmers were borrowing in greater amounts just when interest rates were increasing at an unprecedented rate and banks were pulling in record profits, $1.7 billion last year. In the early seventies credit costs ranked about eighth or tenth in the farmer's cost of production, but now the cost of credit is the highest cost facing farmers in Canada. And while farmers were borrowing in greater amounts, the Farm Credit Corporation was prevented from keeping up with the demand for farm credit. Long-term credit at fixed rates was becoming less and less available.

Agriculture in Canada is in desperate straits. With the Government's record of destabilizing policy changes, the reduction of farm credit interest rates by 4 per cent is a feeble attempt indeed to deal with a very grave problem. In fact, the Government's plans to change the Crow rate promises to throw another left-handed monkey wrench into the works. The repercussions of this latest policy change will be drastic.

It is no secret to western farmers that agriculture and transportation are intrinsically meshed into the fabric of life in rural Prairie communities. Farmers have known for years that the two are interdependent. It is only Liberal Government bureaucrats here in Ottawa who would like to pretend that the two, agriculture and transportation, can somehow be pulled apart, dissected and analysed. These enlightened people then advise their political mouthpieces to close this branch line or that branch line to increase transportation efficiency, and the farmer who has to get his grain to market foots the bill for trucking to an elevator a lot more distant than the one he used to reach on a branch line.

The closing of various branch lines on our railway system in the Prairies and the erosion of the transportation system caused by these closings have dealt a death blow to many farmers whose operations were already teetering precariously on the verge of bankruptcy before their branch line died. If statutory grain rates—the Crow rates—come to an end, so will the life of many smaller communities. The closing of branch lines is the first threat to the prosperity of many small towns in my riding.

Here in Ottawa, when the policy makers at Transport Canada look at a map and see a branch line leading to a small community like Broad Valley or Fisher Branch in Manitoba, they feel no pangs if a decision is made to cut rail service to these communities. For them, it is an unemotional, supposedly pragmatic decision. But let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, it is not an unemotional issue for the farmers in those small communities. Just a few weeks ago, I attended a Canadian Transport Commission hearing at Fisher Branch in my riding. The hearing was to take evidence about the future of a branch line operated by the CNR. Fisher Branch and Broad Valley, the two communities most concerned about the possible loss of the rail line, have barely more than a couple of thousand people living in their areas. Still, well over 100 people crowded into a community hall to voice their opposition to this closing.

Perhaps the most moving submission was from a group of high school students who urged the three CTC commissioners to consider their future. It was interesting, Mr. Speaker, to see the cross-section of people who came to this meeting, farmers and their wives, along with their sons and daughters. Many farmers know their children will not follow them in their lives on the farms and they lament that development, as do their children. This was something that became clear to me as I listened to the high school representatives' plea for the continuation of service on the Inwood rail line.

To officials in Ottawa, there may not be much knowledge or concern about the way policies made here affect individuals out west, where there is nary a Liberal to be found after one leaves Winnipeg to travel north, south or farther west. Is it too callous to think that the Government does not care about westerners because westerners do not elect them? I would hope this Government is above such pettiness.

In the west, Mr. Speaker, things are done in traditional ways and people have come to depend on institutions that provide security for those traditions, like the Crow rate and more recently the Farm Credit Corporation. The Farm Credit Corporation is the only agency which offers long-term, fixed interest loans to farmers. FCC loans can now be obtained at 15.75 per cent interest. The floating rate available from banks or credit unions is for the time being somewhat lower than that. Unless the formula now used to set FCC interest rates is changed, permitting the Corporation to lend at less than 15.75 per cent, if funds can be had at a lower rate, much of the FCC fixed interest credit may go unused this year as farmers cash in on the temporary reduction in interest rates from commercial lending institutions. Already the Provinces are being pressured to move into the subsidization of farm credit. We could soon see a patchwork of subsidization programs which again stimulate production shifts from one region of the country to another.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture has recommended time and again the introduction of an agri-bond program similar to the small business bond. Under this proposal, the Government would give the FCC authority to borrow short term, three to five years, by the issues of financial instruments on which the interest is tax free. This money would then be loaned to farmers requiring money at lower interest rates, not only for debt consolidation but also for essential investment and working capital. This is a proposal which could and should be introduced quickly. It is, I would submit, a more rational and long-term solution to the farm credit crisis than the 4 per cent interest reduction which will be granted to not more than a few hundred Canadian farmers.

If we are going to have any stability in Canadian agriculture, the Farm Credit Corporation must be expanded to provide enough long-term credit to service the bulk of farm credit needs across the country. It needs to be expanded too to provide short and also medium-term credit in special cases. I am thinking here of cases where FCC credit could help a new farmer get started.

But expanding the Farm Credit Corporation is not enough to bring stability back to Canadian agriculture and stimulate increased production. If stabilization programs are provided on a federal basis, and if marketing systems are in place which provide some equity across the country, then farmers will be more confident that they will be able to cover their cost of production plus get a decent living standard off their farms.

Bill C-134 will provide only a short-term solution to the problem. It will help, perhaps, a few hundred farmers now in grave financial difficulty and crying out for relief from high interest rates. This proposal, Mr. Speaker, barely scratches the surface of the farm credit crisis in Canada.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Lethbridge-Foothills): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-134 is a totally inadequate response to the very serious situation existing in the Canadian agricultural sector. As a result of broad Government policies in several areas we are losing hundreds of men and women who want to devote their careers and talents to producing food for the world. But because of Government policies, often in areas not directly associated with agriculture, farmers are losing their farms and being forced to go on welfare, as are so many other millions of Canadian citizens.

In offering this subsidized interest rate which will reduce payments for approximately 2,000 farmers, the Government is offering peanuts to an agricultural sector of some 320,000 people, all of whom are suffering because of the policies the Government has followed over many years. Sir, it is a truism that the chickens ultimately come home to roost. We as a people are now paying for 15 years of Government policies which simply have not been in the best interests of ordinary Canadians. I will show you how the Government has been able to get away with it, but, sir, the chickens do come home to roost.

I was interested to hear the Minister point out in his speech that the planners have indicated to him that this program will "help" farmers across this country. Well, sir, that is a typical response of this Government along with a bureaucracy which no longer responds. It is like those great lies which are heard across the country. One is: "I am sorry, sir, the cheque is in the mail". Well, we all know it is not in the mail at all. The second one is: "I am here from Ottawa and I am really here to 'help' you". Is that not what we hear so often when the bureaucracy moves in? "We are hear to help you". We have a Government program which is going to "help". That is what was said, sir. The real problem in this country is Government policies, and indeed Government itself.

How did this problem in agriculture arise? Indeed, how did we get into this problem in manufacturing as well? It is the result of the Government deficit. You simply cannot get around the fact that the $140 billion national debt, with the annual deficit going up by over $20 billion, is the direct cause of our having to pass this bill to try and help a few farmers over a crisis. There is support in other areas, such as these silly little job creation programs to try and keep young people employed, to try and make them feel important when they know that some of the jobs created are just nonsense. They do not get a sense of value or creativity, or feel they are contributing to the country at all. If the Government thinks it is fooling people with these short-term, make-work projects, it has another think coming.

The interest on the national debt alone, Mr. Speaker, is taking over 30 per cent of the tax revenues which people are pouring in to this central government today. If we did not owe that money, we would not have $18 billion going to service the debt.

As I have said to you before, Mr. Speaker, you know better than anyone else that the interest on the debt is being concentrated in the hands of people who already have wealth. If you had $1 million last year, you certainly would not put it into a productive enterprise, you would lend it to your socialist Liberal Government for a 19.5 per cent return. If you put it into industry, you are bound to lose it. But if you lend it to your own Government you can get 19.5 per cent. Then, because that gives you such an enormous cash flow, you can take advantage of all the tax loopholes and incentives to reduce taxes. So what we are doing in this country by paying interest on the national debt is to create an incredibly wealthy upper class, with the result that we are also destroying our middle class. When a nation destroys its middle class, that great buffer against extremism in ideas and intolerance, then that nation will have much more intolerance, as we have in this society, and indeed I am sure we will have violence.

We need only think back to 1968 when we basically had balanced budgets in this country, Mr. Speaker. We had an extremely small national debt and we had all of the social programs. We had a tremendous health insurance program and a tremendous Canada Pension Plan. We had post-secondary education and Medicare because we had designed those Programs to redistribute wealth which we had first produced. We could have gone on under that system and continued to be the number one country in the entire world. Indeed, by now we should be calling the shots in the world, since we are less than one half of 1 per cent of the world's population yet are sitting on the resources of half a continent. We should not be out in the world capital markets on our knees borrowing money in competition with the Third World countries who need that capital. We are driving up interest rates by doing that. In fact, we are injuring Third World countries. We as a people should not be out in the world market competing for oil, because if we were not, it would mean more oil is available for the poor Third World countries and the price would drop. We should be self-sufficient, yet we are out there competing with them just like some sort of third rate under-developed country.

Well, Mr. Speaker, how did these deficits come about? An example is the area of agriculture where a Government decided by conscious and deliberate policy to have cheap food. I will speak more about that later, but this meant in effect that we were telling our people to buy food from other countries rather than go out and produce it ourselves. We have 24 million acres of land along the northern band of our presently cultivated acreage which could be developed. Surely that is the solution.

Approximately seven million Canadians were born between the years 1951 and 1966. That was the real baby boom. We have known for a long time that they have been coming, and surely the role of Government is to have policies in place where they can move in and lend their energy to the benefit of the nation as a whole rather than be on welfare as they are now.

That 24 million acres compares with the days of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier when we opened up the west. Indeed, the Government virtually gave a quarter section of land to a couple to get them to go out and develop it. We could give a section or two sections of land today to young families who could go out and develop that land. They would have moved into the land and we would have roads, schools, houses, along with the multiplier effect on the economy. It would have been like a brand-new west.

I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that Canadians should beware of their government when it offers something for nothing. As farm people know, I suppose better than most of us who were born in and essentially live our lives in the city, that you really cannot do things as a nation that you cannot do as an individual. The farmer knows that when you spend more money than you make, even though you may fool your neighbour for a year, two years or even five years, ultimately you are going down the tube. The nation is no different from the individual in that respect, Mr. Speaker.

That is how the Liberal Party got us into such trouble. It offered something for nothing. For years, as a result of rising inflation and deficit financing it was able to offer all sorts of attractive programs to Canadians. Of course, we all liked that. While we were getting those programs, we were able to keep the low capitalist tax. We had tremendous programs with low taxes. The trick was that the Government borrowed the difference. That was no problem in the first year; it only increased the national debt by about $1 billion. The interest to service that debt was around 5 per cent of tax revenue but it became 10 per cent, 15 per cent and even 20 per cent. Now it is over 30 per cent even the Liberal Government recognizes that it has to cut back.

While we had the programs and the low taxes, the Government borrowed the difference. People paid far too much for land and for businesses. They took on homes with huge mortgages. Now they cannot do that any more and taxes are increasing to match the programs. People are dropping like flies because they do not have the cash flow to handle their debts. This all goes back to a Government decision, Mr. Speaker, not to individual decisions, because Canadians responded to an economic climate set by the Government.

What was the second bad policy the Government used, Mr. Speaker? It was the energy policy, an incredibly important commodity to agriculture. As a result of the decisions made regarding energy in the 1970s, the Liberal Government destroyed the automotive industry in this country. It is now in the process of destroying the energy industry and, to a substantial degree, the agricultural industry. In the 50 years prior to 1970 the western industrial nations kept the price of oil at approximately $2.35 per barrel coming into Montreal. That was the result of a conspiracy between the western industrialized nations and the "seven sisters" in the oil industry who acted as our agents.

Any time a producing oil country anywhere in the world tried to get value for the oil—because they knew that a barrel of oil should be sold for more than $2.35—they were ruthlessly cut off by the western oil conspiracy. That went on for 50 years. During that period we converted from the horse and buggy to high energy consuming tractors, combines, cars and trucks. Trains switched from coal to diesel and the whole system became dependent on cheap fuel.

In the early seventies the OPEC nations got their act together and drove the price of energy up to its true worth in comparison to manufactured goods and other commodities. What did the Governments of the United States and Canada do? They were not going to be blackmailed by a bunch of Arabs; That is what they said. They said they would keep the price of oil down. They did, but what was the effect of that? It sent signals to the automotive industry to produce big cars and to individual Canadians to buy big cars. Meanwhile, Japan and Germany, which had to go immediately to the world price, turned their intellectual creativity to the production of cheaper cars that used less energy. Now, some eight years later, the Japanese, German, and other manufacturers are beating the Canadian manufacturers hands down. Tens of thousands of people are unemployed in the automotive industry as a result of a Liberal Government decision, consciously and deliberately taken in the early 70s when it was trying to help people.

In fact, other people were injured by that decision. When an automotive worker does not work, a steelworker does not work. When an employee in the oil industry in western Canada does not work, that means that someone in the automotive industry does not work either, because people in western Canada buy cars manufactured in central Canada. The pipe used in the oil industry is manufactured in Hamilton and the rail cars used in western Canada are made in Hamilton and in Nova Scotia. We are interdependent, Mr. Speaker, so we need to watch governments very carefully.

The Government said it would not go to world price for oil but would hold down the cost of energy. Canadians believed the Liberal campaign machine but things turned out to be the exact opposite of what it claimed. The Conservative Party told Canadians that we need to pay more for energy in this country because that would result in the production of cheaper and more efficient cars. It would also provide the money for new oil sands plants so that synthetic crude could come into production and money so that oil could be brought in by producers in the Arctic and off the east coast.

The Liberal Party did not want to leave the initiative with private industry but rather but with Government. Now we pay almost world price for oil, but most of the increase goes to the Government by way of taxes. For every gallon of gasoline used on the farm, some 60 cents goes to the Government as tax. The Government then decides how that money is to be spent.

In the oil industry in this country things are not as they were in the old days, when someone got hold of the seismic data and drilled where they thought there might be oil. Now they have to drill where the Government bureaucracy wants them to. Because it wants drilling to take place in the Arctic and off the east coast, it is prepared to offer rebates of 90 per cent plus. The decision is not based on where the oil is likely to be, but where the maximum grant is paid. That builds inefficiency into the system and results in less oil being found.

We should have a synthetic tar sands plant coming on stream every year in this country to offset the reduction in the light, conventional crude produced in western Canada. We started with 16 billion barrels of light, conventional crude along the Mackenzie Valley and through Alberta. We have been using that supply up and are down to less than four billion barrels. The rate of production of that light, sweet Alberta crude is going down to 100,000 barrels per year. Next year, 100,000 barrels less will be produced per day than is produced this year. The year after that, the reduction will be exactly the same. With a synthetic tar sands plant producing 100,000 barrels per day, we would need one more plant every year just to keep even. We are heading for deep trouble, Mr. Speaker.

The Government will soon release documents to show that less oil is being imported, and to an extent that is true. The reduction is caused solely by the recession, however. We would not need to import any oil at all if we were driven to bankruptcy, and indeed that may happen in another three or four years under this Government.

The third bad policy that affects farmers is the capital gains tax. For years and years in this country we permitted farmers to build a farm and to consolidate it into an efficient, economic operation. It could be passed on to the next generation with a minimum of Government interference. That is not the case now. Under the November, 1981 budget—and the capital gains tax provisions of that budget have not been changed—farmers cannot transfer a farm to the next generation by an agreement for sale and spread the capital gains tax over many, many years. It is now restricted to ten years if the farm is going to the immediate family. Farmers have lost the ability to sell, take the cash and put it into IAACs. They cannot do that any longer, so the taxes are payable on the sale.

Then there is a system of forward averaging where farmers can obtain a tax credit in future years. Immediately we see that if farmers become aged, want to sell and die within a couple of years after the sale, the Government keeps all the tax; there is no rebate then. The Government is taking an incredibly unfair advantage of senior farmers who sell. The effect is that almost invariably parts of the farms end up being sold off to pay taxes. This makes farms smaller and smaller, which makes farmers more inefficient. Therefore, we get less food from them and the national interest is injured. It is similar to the difference between land tenure in the United Kingdom and France. Periodically in France there is a great consolidation because farms have become so small that they cannot continue to be efficient.

The capital gains tax is not raising all that much money for our central coffers. Most of the gain is not in fact a real gain at all. It is simply an inflationary gain, which goes back to what I was talking about earlier—the deficit. Whenever there is inflation with too many dollars chasing too few goods, the inflationary value settles on things.

We are still a young nation. Most people came to Canada to get land; this is why people went west. They came from situations in Europe, whether it was the United Kingdom, Germany, Hungary or Poland, because they were locked into a class situation from which they could not escape and an economic situation where they could not obtain access to land. They were prepared to sell their meagre assets in those countries, get on a boat and go off to a strange country speaking strange languages, and to go to the great western plains where it did not matter from where they came. Racial intolerances did not matter when they were sitting out there during the cold winters. All differences disappeared because they were small human beings. This sort of explains the incredible multicultural nature of western Canada. It did not matter whether one was a Scotsman, a Pole or a Ukranian; each helped one another when faced with the incredible climatic problems of western Canada. As a result, three generations later western Canadian agriculture is strong and efficient, and the western Canadian people have a nationality which is much more cohesive than I think even they realize.

To give a few dollars of interest subsidy to a few farmers in western Canada and across the rest of the country is not really what they need. They really need relief from capital gains so that they can plan to pass their farms on to the next generation and still do justice and equity to children who are not on the farms. This is what needs to be done.

Clearly the solution is in the agricultural sector. There are 320,000 people committed to the land. One has to understand farmers and almost has to have lived on a farm to understand them truly. These people are efficient. There are 24 million hectares of land which could be brought onstream. We still have young people. Basically the progeny of the baby boom about which I talked are now between the ages of 18 and 33. If the Government came out with agricultural policies to turn them loose into that line, we could handle our unemployment problem. Think of all the tractors, trucks, and machinery which would be needed. Think of electrical wires and the whole business of settling people in a new part of the country. It would be fabulous. They are available. They are keen, well-educated and individualistic. They want to prove themselves in their own way. It would free up people from the continuing growth of government.

Another irony to which I cannot get accustomed is the fact that years ago when our parents and grandparents did not have the benefit of the education which we think we have had, they did not need government laws to control them. Now people have more and more education, intelligence and presumably tolerance, and we have more and more laws controlling them. When we bring people out of university and hire them in the Public Service, for example, they are put into small niches and are given so little discretion, responsibility and accountability that they are incredibly unhappy. Then the morale of the service goes down, down and down. Years ago we would give persons jobs, hold them accountable, and they were happy to take on responsibilities. Why is it that the more educated we are, the more government we need? I am sure the Government will not answer that one, but I would like to hear its Members talk about it.

I will vote for this bill, but I want farmers across the country to understand clearly that, in my judgment, it is not adequate. It is using a band-aid for a huge cut; it is the wrong perspective. We need to look at other policies rather than subsidies to farmers. Our farmers can compete against any farmer in any country in the entire world. They have been operating at the world cutting edge for years. They are used to it, they can handle it. When we start putting subsidies on them, it means that there will be a degree of inefficiency equal to the subsidy. As manufacturers have now learned, when a government gives a tariff protection or a subsidy of 15 per cent it becomes an inefficiency factor of exactly the same equivalent. Meanwhile producers of other countries which do not offer subsidies will be able to undercut us and whip us in the marketplace. Subsidies should not be considered other than in the very shortest of terms and only in order to permit an industry or a sector to adjust to the world market. Because we are a trading nation our starting point should always be: What is our international competition doing? Let us meet that so our producers can adjust.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I speak today as a representative of an agricultural constituency in order to discuss some of the ramifications of Bill C-134. Over the last few years there have been many changes in the farming community and in the technology of agriculture in Canada. As a result the needs of the agricultural industry have changed from what they were in the past. The main difference, as in many other industries but especially agriculture, is that a great deal of capital is required.

Approximately 100 years ago our ancestors were jumping on the railway to head out to the untouched lands of Saskatchewan and Manitoba where, perhaps without a dime to their names, they could forge a life for themselves from the land. For the young people on the farms today there is plenty of ambition, but unfortunately that alone is not enough. Today one must have in the order of at least $200,000 or $300,000, whether this capital is borrowed or inherited, just to begin a career in agriculture.

The critics on the sidelines can very easily say that the farmer can rent his property just as the businessman in the city rents his store and perhaps gets along very well without owning the building. However, it is evident to anyone who has lived any length of time in an agricultural community that there is pride when land is owned. When there is pride of ownership, the buildings are maintained and the land is not allowed to lose its fertility or be covered with weeds. The point I am trying to make is that in order for a farmer to obtain ownership of land, he must have access to large sums of money and at reasonable interest rates. This is not the case today.

The interest rates available for the young farmer starting out today are such that any profits which he obtains through hard work and sacrifice are eaten up in interest payments to some bank head office in a skyscraper on Bay Street. However good the intention of the Bill is, it is simply inadequate for reasons which I will outline presently. Bill C-134 is definitely a step in the right direction, but it is certainly not a giant leap for mankind. Unfortunately, the amount of money which has been set aside for this Bill is insufficient. At first, this was a $216 million program. Now we are told that $116 million of this amount is coming from the Farm Credit Corporation itself. This would be fine if all of this money came from outside lending institutions. However, that $116 million is coming directly from the Farm Credit Corporation itself. This sounds like a classic case of robbing Peter to pay Paul, or perhaps robbing Marc to pay Gene. The Farm Credit Corporation is an established body which is designed to finance the agricultural industry. When $116 million is taken out of this fund, obviously it leaves less in there to fulfill the job which it was intended to do. There we have the first flaw in Bill C-134.

There is not enough money in the fund, and it is coming from the wrong source. Therefore, my colleagues and I encourage this Government to put at least another $300 million into the Farm Credit Corporation budget to take care of this new interest rebate program.

My statistics tell me that 20,000 Canadian farmers desperately need the assistance of this program. Do you know how many people are going to be assisted by this program, Mr. Speaker? With the funding currently available, it would appear that approximately 500 farmers will be assisted by this program. Now, to me, that is a little less than the proverbial drop in the bucket.

I would like to address another problem which is affecting the farming community, which, if solved, would certainly result in fewer farmers requiring the assistance provided by such programs as set out in this Bill. The problem lies in the fact that every time one generation turns the land over to the next generation, a considerable amount of capital gain is involved. Once again, if a young farmer wishes to buy the land from his father or his neighbour, the cost of the capital gain will certainly be included in the price of the land to the purchaser. Obviously, this elevates prices unnecessarily, and following the domino effect, as the land moves from generation to generation, all the accumulated costs are passed on to the younger farmers who can afford it the very least. I feel that this kind of taxation is unwarranted and creates hardship among the workers in Canada's most important industry.

The current need for help with interest rates, then, is only the tip of the iceberg. Bill C-134 is rather like a bandage which covers the wound but does not heal the disorder. Just as you do not need bandages when you are not bleeding, we would not need Bill C-134 if overtaxation did not bleed the farming community to the bone. The Members of the Government will, no doubt, offer the argument that, like any other businessman, the farmer experiences periods of growth and periods of recession, periods of prosperity and periods of stagnation. He must weather the storms of financial distress, just like any other business person.

However, this is not just any industry. This is the food supply of our country. For this very reason I feel that the farmer should not have to face this kind of interest burden. I emphasize that these benefits should apply only to the career farmer. I am not talking about the speculator who is out to make a quick dollar, or the gentleman farmer who grazes a few race horses for his amusement. I am talking about the hardworking family farmer who has worked hard to maintain the equity in his farm and has done his best to run an efficient operation.

Another important difference between farming operations and other businesses is this: the farmer must maintain, in order to be efficient during the rush periods of the year, a fleet of equipment, which is often worth hundreds of thousands of dollars. This equipment often lays idle for ten months of the year, but if it is not there during the critical period, the owner stands to lose a great deal of money. In order to purchase and maintain such a fleet of equipment, the farmer must have a great deal of capital.

On Saturday night I attended a dinner in West Lincoln, in my riding of Erie. I sat beside a farmer who told me the story of a farmer who lives right next to him. He put in a crop of soybeans. He depends upon a custom harvester to harvest his crop. It was a wet fall, and when there was a couple of days of dry weather, the harvester was not available because it was working on other farms. The farmer lost that entire soybean crop. Unlike the manufacturer who can use his machinery 24 hours a day and seven days a week if he wishes, the farmer only uses his machinery profitably a very small percentage of the time. Therefore, a comparison between farming and industry in terms of eligibility for financial assistance is like comparing apples and oranges.

The last point I should like to make is that many Canadians are reaching retirement age. In the next ten to 15 years, many of these people will move into their little apartments in town. What will happen to the land which they are working now? Which would you rather see, a generation of young, ambitious farmers willing to toil to develop efficient and profitable enterprises, living in small, close-knit communities that are economically self-sustaining, or giant corporations complete with efficiency experts and an army of accountants promoting cost-saving policies at the expense of aesthetic and sociological considerations? Unless this Government recognizes the value of the family farm and plans its assistance programs accordingly, farm communities as we know them will disappear, and we will have acres and acres of fenceless, levelled land which can be efficiently farmed with huge machinery owned only by giant corporations. Instead of living on the land, workers will come from afar to drive equipment at an hourly wage. I am sure that the Members of this House would like to see the tradition of the family farm continued. Like home ownership, however, this dream is rapidly disappearing. The family farm cannot continue to exist without effective financial assistance being given to the young farmers.

To some degree I applaud Bill C-134 for its attempt to focus upon this genuine problem. However, as I have already stated, the program does not go far enough and does not help enough people. Perhaps the intentions are good, but we have to enlarge the scope of this Bill. Certainly, by doing this, we can help to ensure the continuation of a healthy, people-centered agricultural industry in this country in the years to come.

Mrs. Jennifer Cossitt (Leeds-Grenville): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pride and a deep sense of honour that I stand here today in the House of Commons as the newly elected representative for Leeds-Grenville to speak out on matters that are of great concern not only to my riding but also to Canada.

Hon. Members from all sides of the House are already familiar with the riding of Leeds-Grenville because of its close proximity to Ottawa. It is one of the most beautiful and picturesque ridings in this part of the country. The Rideau Canal system, of which we are all very proud, celebrated its one hundred and fiftieth anniversary this year, and all along its banks it provides many peaceful rest havens for retirees and weekend hideaways for many of the Ottawa area and local residents.

Brockville, the only city in my riding, borders on the St. Lawrence River and also celebrated its sesquicentennial this year, attracting many distinguished visitors. Leeds-Grenville is very much at home amid the lovely Thousand Islands, and Gananoque, a small town nestled in the southwest end of the riding, is in the midst of this scenic wonder. It is not very difficult to realize that there is tremendous tourism potential in that area that should be expanded to its fullest to promote much needed employment and bring in additional revenues through which the economy can grow and develop.

All along the St. Lawrence River there is a great industrial base, which unfortunately has been dealt some stiff blows in recent years because of the faltering economy with which the Government has not come to grips. Every week I am made aware of the fact that somewhere in the riding 20 or 30 people have been let go from their jobs, and while this may not sound too significant in itself, these numbers added together over months and months become increasingly significant, and we begin referring to hundreds of people who have lost their jobs.

Brockville alone has suffered major lay-offs in the last few months, and unemployment has increased 35 per cent since last year. Prescott, a small town east of Brockville, has been the hardest hit by unemployment and must resort to work-sharing programs to keep its people employed. Here, unemployment has increased more than 50 per cent over the same period last year. Gananoque, its major industry being tourism, suffers appreciably during the winter months and has also had to bear the brunt of unemployment increasing by 50 per cent over the same period.

I am speaking about a devastating attack on the economy of Leeds-Grenville. I have yet to hear anything from the other side of the House which will even come close to relieving the pressures created by the Government's irresponsibility. I am speaking about Canadians who have lost all sense of security and no longer trust their Government, and I am referring to hundreds of families who must now rely on unemployment insurance benefits with nothing to look forward to but the welfare lines for their bread and butter. It is very hard for the people of my riding to live on depreciating incomes when they have children to feed and clothe, but the people of Leeds-Grenville are determined to survive the worst recession they have had to face since the great depression. They survived then and they will survive now, and I am here to make sure they get all the help they need. I am here to make sure this Government hears about their concerns and hears about their problems. They elected me to tell the Government how tough it has become to meet their mortgage payments, how tough it has become to put good, wholesome food on the table, and how tough it has become to make sure their children have the warm clothing they need for the long, hard winter the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) promised us earlier this fall.

Leeds-Grenville has a rich agricultural community, strong in dairy and meat producers. Over 1,800 farmers are scattered throughout both of the counties and, as I visited many of them during my recent campaign travels, I was told countless times, "This farm is inoperative". I ask this House, when will we make these farms operative again?

Forty per cent of Canada's economy is made up of the agrifood industry, and we cannot afford to ignore such a large sector of this great country's potential. If we do, we will also be ignoring the merchant who will no longer have enough products to sell, and we will be ignoring the factory worker who will no longer have a job when his firm stops producing farm machinery because there is no longer a market for these items. The importance of stabilizing this industry cannot be emphasized enough when it affects so many people connected directly or indirectly with the production of life's essential commodity, food.

Because the agricultural industry is so important to my riding and to each and every person in this country, I was very pleased to see some positive action taken by this Government through Bill C-134, but I cannot say that I, or any of the farmers in Leeds-Grenville, believe that the Bill will provide them with the relief they so desperately need to survive at a time when their costs far exceed their incomes.

Farm bankruptcies are now 65 per cent higher than last year, and the numbers are still climbing, with farmers in Ontario being hardest hit. In the last 12 months, 261 farmers went bankrupt and were forced to watch helplessly as their livestock, their barns and their machinery were sold off at rock bottom prices because creditors could no longer wait to have their long outstanding debts paid. This Bill will be retroactive to June 28, but how many farmers have already lost everything for which they worked all their lives, farms that have been passed down from one generation to another, because that assistance was not there when they needed it? I ask this Government to explain what will happen now to those farmers.

Our farming community is made up of hardworking, proud people, battling against the toughest elements nature could hurl at them, and surviving. They are not looking for handouts. They are looking for a little assistance that will help them continue the fight against the onslaught of escalating costs of production, the constantly rising price of energy, fuel, herbicides, fertilizers and machinery.

Every aspect of the farming operation has faced increased costs. However, a farmer's net income is expected to be 17 per cent lower this year than last year. Just how does this Government expect our farmers to continue to operate when they are faced with such devastating losses? Our farmers need assistance now to buy new machinery to replace worn out harvesters and milking machines. They need assistance now to expand their operations so that they can keep up with the market demands of the future, not the market demands of the past. And they need the support of the Federal Government now, not six months or 12 months from now. All the Government is doing is to introduce a Bill from which, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture estimates, only 500 farmers will actually benefit. That is only 2.5 per cent of the 20,000 farmers who need assistance today. The generosity of the Government is overwhelming.

It is long past the time that this Government realized that Canada needs a stable, thriving agricultural industry and a stable, thriving economy. It is time the Government took the necessary steps to stop us from plummeting down the road to economic disaster, to stop the rising and unbearable level of unemployment, to stop the extravagant and wasteful overspending of the past 14 years.

We have lands, resources and the potential to be one of the leading producers in the worlds' agrifood industry supporting the growing population of the future, but if the present Government persists in ignoring the requirements of an industry that needs to be developed and expanded, we will eventually become a country totally dependent on the rest of the world for its food. The Government must immediately begin a recovery program which will not only benefit our farmers but will benefit all Canadians, and will restore economic growth and productivity.

Revitalizing the agrifood industry must be one of the Government's top priorities, and I suggest that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) starts today—not tomorrow, not next week or next year, as he has so often stated in the past—to introduce legislation that will give farmers the assistance they so desperately need.

The concerns of the farming community are shared by the average Canadian. They are concerned about a spiralling rate of unemployment that is at an all time high since the great Depression. This figure does not even take into account those persons who have given up hope of finding employment, those who have succumbed to the pressures, stresses and frustrations of being rejected and having no hope of getting back into the work force. The Government seems to be immune to their cries for action and their pleas for help at a time when it has become abundantly clear it is so desperately needed.

The unemployment situation is creating a wave of fear and terror among Canadians, creating more and more stress within the family unit, resulting in increased separations. Wife and child battering are becoming more acute, and every day more and more children are being abandoned to the Children's Aid Society, a devastating social reaction brought about by the hard times plaguing this nation.

The people of Leeds-Grenville elected me to speak out on their behalf. They want me to speak not only for the farmers but also for each and every one of the 80,000 people living in my constituency. They want me to send their message to the Prime Minister and to Hon. Members sitting on the other side of the House. They elected me to tell this Government that they are fed up and disgusted with the way this country is being run. They are disgusted with a bureaucracy that wastes $16 million of their hard-earned tax dollars through sheer mismanagement and extravagance. They are disgusted with a Government that has overspent so much in times of prosperity that it now cannot help those who need it in times of despair.

Canada is a country with a wealth of natural resources available to her. Therefore, how can she be motivated to utilize her vast resources to increase productivity which, in turn, would lead to greater wealth for our country? We were once looked upon by the rest of the world as a nation that was really going somewhere, a nation with vast potential, the Promised Land. But look at us today. Under the economic mismanagement of the present Government, our reputation as to our ability to produce wealth has sunk to its lowest ebb.

In closing I should like to say that I believe we have one of the greatest resources available to us, that is, human beings. Yet this Government is stifling the natural incentives and initiatives of individuals who want to be productive and responsible Canadians with a future to look forward to.

Canada needs direction, she needs leadership and she needs a goal. Under our present Government, Mr. Speaker, we have none of these.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): That was a first-class maiden speech.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Derek Blackburn (Brant): Mr. Speaker, before I begin my address on Bill C-134, on behalf of my party I would like to extend congratulations to the Hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville (Mrs. Cossitt) for her very fine victory last month in the byelection and for her very fine maiden speech in this House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blackburn: I know that I speak for all Members on both sides of the House when I say that we look forward to hearing from her on many occasions between now and the next election. However, beyond the next election I will not go at this moment.

Bill C-134 is a very crucial bill in some respects. In other respects, unfortunately, it falls far short of what I think is the main problem of the Canadian farm community today. On the one hand, this Bill will free more funds to help some farmers who presently find themselves in dire straits. To a limited degree, that is commendable. But when one considers that, at the most, this added funding through Bill C-134, at an average loan of $50,000, will assist perhaps a total of 500 farmers, and when in fact the Canadian Federation of Agriculture very accurately estimates that 10 per cent of our farming community is in dire straits, this means that 20,000 farmers, need immediate financial aid or assistance just to keep their heads above water, to say nothing of expanding or modernizing their already existing facilities.

Members on this side of the House, and some Members on the Liberal side, have for the past two years called for added financial assistance to the farming community. I am not a farmer myself, though my constituency comprises some of the finest farms and farmland in southwestern Ontario. I have spoken on many occasions on behalf of the farmers in my riding. While the cynics might say the reason I do this now and then is simply to try to get some votes in a rural area, I would like to think that the only reason I speak on farm problems is that agriculture, whether in Brant, in Saskatchewan, in eastern Ontario, in the Maritimes or in British Columbia, is fundamentally our most important industry. Perhaps we can say that forestry and farming are the two most important basic industries in the country.

If the farm community and the farm industry are in trouble anywhere in our country, and at the present time they are in trouble all over the country, then the entire economy is adversely affected and people from coast to coast are adversely affected. That is why bills such as Bill C-134 are very important. Bill C-134 does not go far enough, and for many hundreds of farmers it comes too late.

Let me quote from a letter which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture sent to the NDP farm critic just last week. It is dated October 26, and reads, in part:

> —the grains, oilseeds and beef industries are in deep distress, and hog producers, while currently receiving improved prices are struggling to survive the effects of depressed prices of the recent past and apprehensive about prices looking to 1983. There is little light on the horizon for these farm sectors.

Coming as it does from the Canadian Federation of Agriculture, one can draw only one conclusion from that letter. There is no rhetoric in it; it is stating facts. If anyone in this country should know the facts, it is the Canadian Federation of Agriculture because the real nub of the problem is right there in that short extract.

Farmers, like many other businessmen in this country, are caught in the cost-price squeeze. I can remember making speeches similar to this one using that expression ten years ago. I came here 12 years ago. The situation on the farm front, as far as the cost-price squeeze is concerned, has not changed very much except that it has grown worse. The reason is that traditionally operating costs were increasing at a higher or a faster rate than commodity prices. Added to the traditional operating costs, such as fuel, energy, fertilizers and feeds, we have seen in the last year and a half to two years a phenomenal increase in energy and fuel costs and a phenomenal increase in the rate of interest charged against loans. Farmers must have loans. If there is any traditional business group in our community that relies almost entirely upon seasonal or short-term loans, it is the farming community. Faced with interest rates of 18 per cent, 19 per cent and 20 per cent during the latter part of 1981 and into the first half of 1982 and faced with fuel and energy costs on an annual basis escalating at the rate of 17 per cent to 22 per cent and fertilizer and feed costs rising at the rate of between 12 per cent and 15 per cent, it is not very difficult for anyone to conclude that the cost-price squeeze as it affects the farm community in this country has become critical. It has reached the point where farm after farm after farm is going out of operation.

As I sat here and listened today to speeches made by other Hon. Members, I heard them talk about the tragedy of the disappearance of the family farm. Since its beginning my Party, the NDP, has supported the family farm. One of the main reasons why our predecessor, the CCF, became a political national party in the 1930s was the rural protest, not so much the urban, in the west in 1932, 1933 and 1934.

Perhaps one might blame our party for being too idealistic in the tough times of the thirties when it came into power in Saskatchewan, primarily for supporting rural Saskatchewan, the farming community. We in the New Democratic Party have a long tradition of supporting good farm policies and good legislation. Let there be no mistake about that. The Liberals and Conservatives do not have exclusive priority when it comes to supporting the rural community in Canada.

There are two other reasons. I alluded to high interest rates, which I will get back to in a moment. The other major cause of the problem, apart from general inflation not only in Canada but throughout the western world, is the drop in commodity prices. I quoted the Canadian Federation of Agriculture as saying that grain, oilseed and beef producers are in very deep trouble. Commodity prices are falling drastically all over.

I talked recently with a farmer who told me that in 1979 he was getting $4.60 a bushel for corn. The best price he could get as of two or three weeks ago when I talked with him was $3.90 a bushel. When you put together the drop in commodity prices and the rise in operating costs, energy fuel and interest rates on borrowing, you can see why the farm community is in trouble.

Another problem is that in the seventies the federal and provincial Governments and various farm organizations were encouraging young farmers to expand, modernize and purchase the latest world class technology, state of the art combines such as the axial flow rotary combine which was engineered, designed and produced in my riding by White Farm Equipment, Massey-Ferguson combine and so on.

As prices were going up, farmers needed more and more operating money to purchase this expensive machinery. In 1975, 1976 and 1977 the banks were throwing money at these farmers. Bank managers were not doing proper appraisals or intensively looking at the books. There was a lot of money and a tremendous demand for farm loans. I repeat, the banks were throwing money at the farmers. All of a sudden we hit a recession. The banks started getting scared. The banks were not gouging quite as successful as they have done historically in this country. Their profit began to decline slightly, so they became scared. They started to call in some of these short-term loans. Of course, this created fear throughout the entire farming community. We therefore have several combinations; an increase in operating costs, a phenomenal increase in interest rates, a decline in farm prices, particularly commodity prices, and the cost-price squeeze.

What does Bill C-134 promise to do? I am afraid not very much. In 1982 the Farm Credit Corporation will have an additional $200 million to assist farmers, and is promised an additional $100 million for 1983. I do not know what these amounts are based on because if you average the loans made by the FCC, you find that $50,000 will help about 500 farmers. I said at the outset of my speech that there are some 20,000 farmers who are financially strapped and in dire straits.

The average loan needed today by farmers who are in dire straits is not $50,000. That certainly would help, but would not solve the problems of those 20,000 farmers. We are talking more in terms of $100,000 loans. At 18 or 20 per cent on the open market, that is an additional carrying charge of $20,000 a year.

It is true that through Bill C-134 there will be a differential in favour of the farmer who is lucky enough to get a loan through FCC of four percentage points. If the rate on the date on which the loan deal is closed is 18 per cent, the farmer will get this loan at 14 per cent. There is one problem. We in the NDP think that this should be a floating rate so that the percentage rate would be adjusted downward from time to time. The borrower would not be hooked into the higher interest rate for six months or several years. It would float according to market forces.

I said at the outset that this bill is not only too little but it has come too late for many farmers in Canada. Let us look at some of the statistics, the amount of money that borrowers are in arrears to the Farm Credit Corporation. In 1982, they were in arrears to the Farm Credit Corporation, in other words not paid up, $71.9 million or 12.4 per cent of accounts. In 1981 it was $44.9 million or 9.9 per cent of accounts. The percentage increase in dollar arrears is 60 per cent.

These are alarming figures. Historically and traditionally they have been extremely good at paying their debts. Farmers had one of the highest credit ratings of any business group in the community at large, but here we have millions of dollars outstanding in arrears over the last two years. That is a good indicator of how serious the financial situation is today on the farm front.

Let us look at the number of bankruptcies. I know this topic has been dealt with by other speakers and the media in the past year, but I would be irresponsible in not including these figures in my address this afternoon, if only to remind Hon. Members that the situation has not improved over this past summer and fall. It has continued to deteriorate.

In the first six months of 1982, there were 316 recorded bankruptcies. That does not include forced sales or those who have given up and sold at bargain basement prices, if they could get anything at all for their machinery, cattle or buildings. We are talking about recorded bankruptcies in the first six months of 1982, Canada-wide, which totalled 316. That contrasts with 191 for all of 1981, an increase in 1982 over 1981 of 65 per cent.

In 1980 there were 164 bankruptcies recorded across Canada and 82 in 1979. The percentage increase in 1982 over 1979, three years, of bankruptcies in Canada in the farming community was a whopping 285 per cent. In Ontario alone in 1982 there were 132 bankruptcies as compared with 112 in 1981. I have been using figures and statistics here, but it goes beyond that. We are talking about human beings, families, a way of life. We are talking about rural Canada's hopes and dreams going down the tube, disillusionment and despair, shattered dreams and aspirations. I am not exaggerating. I am talking in terms of hundreds of farms, not a couple of dozen. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture estimates, and I emphasize again, that 20,000 farmers are in dire straits. So in addition to the bankruptcies, we are talking of at least another 20,000 farmers who are finding it difficult to sleep at night and to keep their emotions stable. These farmers are not planning expansion or extensions or modernization. They are not planning to borrow because their line of credit has run out, or their credit rating has virtually disappeared. They are just planning day by day, hoping and praying they can keep their farms, their livestock, their land; just to stay in business, just to remain farmers. That is a lot of people.

Third World countries and developing nations look at Canadians and think we are so well off, so rich, and indeed we are, comparatively speaking. No one would argue that point. But they cannot understand why we are not producing more food, why we have farm bankruptcies, and why thousands of farmers go to bed at night worring whether next month or in six months' time they are still going to have deed to their land. In a world of hunger they cannot understand why our farmers cannot or will not produce more food. We know they can. We have some of the best farmers in the world in our country, if not the best. All they want is a fair return on their investment and hard work. But for some reason our Government, and other governments in the western world, cannot seem to get their act together. They cannot seem to rationalize agriculture productivity to the point where we could specialize to an even greater degree so as to produce at a unit cost that would be competitive in world markets. This would bring us a reasonable return on the invested dollar and the invested work in the Canadian farm community. That is another major concern of my Party as well as the concern of farmers across Canada.

When I talk about the farm community, I am not limiting my perspective just to farmers. I represent the federal electoral district of Brant, which is in Southwestern Ontario. Its largest community is the city of Brantford where we have Massey-Ferguson's North American combine operation and White Farm Equipment, both of which are recipients of Government aid at this time and neither of which is operating. They are flat out. They do not even have half a shift. No one goes into work except a few maintenance people. When farm times are good, my city is booming. I do not want to sound selfish; it is true as well in other communities across Canada. But this city, with a population, of 75,000, with a work force of 48,000, now has 13,700 persons drawing unemployment insurance, nearly 5,000 of whom, two years ago, were working either for Massey-Ferguson or for White Farm Equipment.

Chatham is another city which is very badly hit, along with Hamilton. When you have 25 per cent unemployment, and almost half of that is from the farm implement sector, in one community of 75,000, then it is little wonder that the depression, the pall that hangs over my home town of Brantford, can almost be felt and tasted when I visit there on weekends. The two shopping malls are almost deserted. The main street is deserted at high noon on a Saturday. People who have money are not spending it, and the vast majority of those unemployed in my city have no money to spend, and I fear this winter a third of them will see their unemployment insurance run out and from there they will go to welfare.

An Hon. Member: Did you say a third?

Mr. Blackburn: Down about a third. I cannot get the figures. I tried to get them from the local unemployment insurance office, the regional office, and here in Ottawa, but no one will give me an estimate of how many will be running out of unemployment insurance benefits this winter. The estimate, at City Hall in Brantford, is approximately a third. So we are talking about 4,000 people who may indeed end up on welfare.

If Massey-Ferguson or White Farm were operating at full speed, which they would if the farm community were in a healthy, buoyant financial position, this would not be happening. The inter-relationship between rural Canada and urban Canada is graphically brought home to all of us when we visit a city such as Brantford. That is why, when I take a look at Bill C-134, Mr. Speaker, I wonder just what ripple or trickle down effect the $200 million will have on the 500 farmers coast to coast out of the 20,000 who need financial assistance. I wonder what effect that will have on communities such as Brantford, Chatham or Hamilton. It could be any of your prairie towns that are dependent on farm incomes, not necessarily towns that manufacture farm implements, except perhaps for Winnipeg and Regina, but the grocery stores, restaurants, clothing stores, dry goods shops, and so on, in the small communities.

I have driven through Western Canada, and I want my friends from the west to know there is one Ontarian who has a very deep and abiding love and appreciation for Western Canada and our prairies, for its tremendously rich history and for the people who developed that part of our great country. The only thing that keeps us from being great again is that bunch over there. Perhaps I should not say that it is the only thing. It is true there are 30 million unemployed workers in the western industrial world, but I do not know why the Liberal Government here in Ottawa has to blame the economic situation constantly on Germany, France, and Italy, for example, and it is not as bad there as it is here right now in terms of employment and inflation.

Why do they say things are bad all over and then do nothing about it? We had what I can describe as sermonettes a couple of weeks ago, and we had the tremendous, flowery rhetoric of the local Liberal pow-wow at the Chateau over the weekend, and a host of promises about a tremendous economic turnaround. Well, a chap by the name of Herbert Hoover preached that for a couple of years in the early 1930s, and he was very quickly replaced by a man called Roosevelt. Nothing comes of rhetoric or promises; what we need is action, and today we are talking about action on the farm front, and the tremendous positive financial effect it will have in certain areas of the manufacturing and food processing sectors. We are not just talking about farms and farmers, we are talking about a major portion of the Canadian economy when we talk about Bill C-134 and its tremendous shortcomings.

The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, Mr. Speaker, at a meeting I attended early last spring, presented a brief on a proposal which I think merits tremendous consideration on the part of all Members of this House. It has already been mentioned by both my Conservative friends and other speakers from the NDP, that is the agribond. I do not profess to be an expert on the agribond and all the inner workings of that kind of approach, but it strikes me, as a lay person, as being an excellent idea. Retiring farmers would, let us say, sell their farm for $250,000 or $300,000, if they can get that much for it today. On the one hand they do not really need all that righta-way, and they do not need to pay the capital gains tax in one fell swoop either. Let us say they take two-thirds and put it into this general pool known as the agribond fund. While they may not get 12 per cent, 13 per cent or 14 per cent return on their investment, I think they would be prepared to take 7 per cent or 8 per cent if they knew that the money was going exclusively and specifically to farmers in need or to young farmers who want to buy their first farm or to other farmers who want to expand their operations or modernize, provided, of course, their farms are viable and potentially good.

It is a good investment, a safe investment and a helpful kind of investment because it is, in a way, self help. The retiring farmer is helping the young farmer either to get started or to expand. Money could then be lent within the farming community at much lower rates than the current market would demand. I do not know, it could be 10 per cent or even less, depending on how the agirbond was set up. So I highly commend, along, I think, with every other speaker today on ths side of the House anyway, the concept and application of the agribond. I commend the Canadian Federation of Agriculture and any others who are directly responsible for coming up with this idea.

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): First-class idea.

Mr. Blackburn: First-class idea, very true. I would like to hear somebody on the Liberal side challenge us on this side on the agribond. Maybe it is not the best way, though I have not heard from anyone over there all afternoon. Secondly, if there is a Liberal over there who is interested in farmers and their problems, I invite him or her to stand up this evening and challenge this side of the House on the matter of the agribond. Tell us what is wrong with it. Tell us where or how it will not work. Give us a reasonable argument and maybe we will oppose it. But we have not hear a thing from the Liberals on this very vital issue.

While we on this side of the House are often blamed for being negative, Mr. Speaker, I might say my speech has not been entirely negative. I have put forward some constructive suggestions concerning this Bill, such as lower interest rates to farmers who borrow money, and that the agribond should not only be considered but should be implemented just as quickly as possible. I have also mentioned how this, in turn, would have a positive effect on the agriculture implement industry, the parts industry, indeed, the economy as a whole. However, as I said, we on this side are often accused of being totally negative. Well, I am going to quote from the Globe and Mail of November 4, 1982. The article refers only to prairie farmers, but the picture is the same in Ontario, Quebec and the Maritimes. In fact, in some parts of Ontario it is even worse. It says:

> Prairie farm income in 1982 will drop to its lowest level in 10 years, farmers attending a conference sponsored by United Grain Growers Ltd. of Winnipeg in Banff, Alta., were told.
> UGG directors said in a year-end forecast that farm income will drop 28 per cent from 1981 mainly because of sliding grain prices and higher costs borne by farmers.

I mentioned those costs earlier in my speech. High interest rates, high energy costs, fertilizer costs and so on. The article goes on:

> Only good yields and high deliveries of grain will prevent an even steeper drop in income, the UGG report said.
> After an increase in costs, farmers' profits will drop $708-million from 1981, the report said. "Comparing the purchasing power of today's dollar to the deflated dollar, what a farmer could buy for 37 cents in 1971 cost him $1 in 1982."
> Farmers' incomes will drop 36 per cent in Saskatchewan and 34 per cent in Manitoba.

I have enough faith, Mr. Speaker, in rural Canada and our farming community to know that the majority of our farmers will hang in and weather this very severe financial crisis in which many of them find themselves. But I do not know how much longer we as Parliamentarians and legislators can expect the majority of farmers to continue to encourage their sons and daughters to go into farming if this is the kind of mess that we are leaving to them as a legacy. Something has to be done, not to guarantee them wealth and riches, not to talk constantly about handouts and aid, but something has to be done, and very soon, to put farming on a much more secure financial footing so that at least young farmers going onstream, while they will not be guaranteed great wealth, will be assured of a reasonable income for their investment and hard work and that some time half way through their lives they are not going to lose everything they have worked for. Hundreds of farmers in the last two years have lost everything they worked for, and unless this Bill is expanded, even though my Party is going to support it, I fear that several hundred more are going to be forced into bankruptcy and several thousand are going to be forced to sell.

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to join the other Members of the House in congratulating the Hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville (Mrs. Cossitt), who, a short time ago, delivered her maiden speech in this House. I am sure that she will be a credit not only to her constituents but an asset to this House of Commons.

I listened to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) last Thursday, Mr. Speaker, when he opened debate on this Bill.

At Page 20400 of Hansard the Minister said:

Madam Speaker, Bill C-134 is an Act respecting rebate of interest on farm loans made under the Farm Credit Act and is a piece of legislation which is extremely important to the farm community and to all Canadians.

A little later, as reported on the same page, he said:

This measure will help to assure the survival of many Canadian farmers who are presently facing serious financial difficulties.

Like the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn) who spoke before me, I, too, read the report in the November 4, 1982, issue of the Globe and Mail. The effect was rather shocking, Mr. Speaker, and I should like to put a portion of that report on the record. It refers to a conference called by the United Grain Growers in Banff. The conclusion the conference reached was this:

Only good yields and high deliveries of grain will prevent an even steeper drop in income—

The article went on to say:

Farmers' incomes will drop 36 per cent in Saskatchewan and 34 per cent in Manitoba. In Alberta, improved livestock prices will cushion the blow and income will drop 15 per cent.

In the country as a whole, they are predicting that there will be a drop in farm income of 28 per cent over 1981.

Farmers in Canada are facing more than serious financial difficulties, Mr. Speaker; many are facing bankruptcy. The bankruptcy rate in the farming population is up by some 65 per cent. If the trend continues, the result will be a tragic one for the whole farming community. Grain and livestock prices have fallen. If one examines the statistics, one finds that the total farm debt is between $18 billion and $20 billion. The interest that farmers pay on that debt is in the neighbourhood of $3 billion. We should put that $3 billion in perspective, Mr. Speaker.

If we go back to the estimates we will see that in 1968-69, the total budget for the whole of the Dominion of Canada—that is, the money it took to operate the Government of Canada—was $10.8 billion. This year, the farmers of Canada will spend almost one-third of that amount on interest payments to service their debt.

To put that in even better perspective, if we examine the records of Canada, we will find that the cost of servicing the country's debt in 1968 was $1.5 billion. That was for the entire debt of Canada in 1968. Today, farmers pay double that amount to service their debt. That is a catastrophe created by the Liberal Government opposite, Mr. Speaker.

The Minister of Agriculture—who, incidentally, is not in the House, Mr. Speaker—will undoubtedly recall that he was in Moose Jaw earlier this year to attend a meeting called by a group of livestock producers who found themselves in terrible financial difficulty. The market was low and interest rates high, and they were facing bankruptcy. The Minister arrived late, but I was there for eight hours. I listened to the livestock producers and to many grain producers who spoke at that meeting. They pointed out the disastrous effects the high interest rates were having on their industry. I am sure that farmers in other parts of the country have told the Minister the same thing.

In response, the Minister introduced this Bill, which the Canadian Federation of Agriculture says will only help 500 farmers. There are 320,000 farmers in Canada but this Bill will only help 500 of them. Yet the Minister of Agriculture pats himself on the back for that.

The Minister has allowed the Farm Credit Corporation to go to the American market to borrow $100 million in bonds. It is interesting to read the analysis of this borrowing which was given by the Hon. Member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway) when he spoke in the House on November 4. He used 12 per cent as a basic rate on this $100 million borrowed on the American market. This appears to be a fair rate. He pointed out that the Canadian dollar stands at 82.5 cents compared to the U.S. dollar, which would add another 2 per cent to the interest rate. Of course, because of the fluctuation in the foreign exchange market, the Farm Credit Corporation will have to hedge against changes in the currency market. He estimated this at another 2 per cent. Another 1 per cent must be added for the administrative charges incurred by the Farm Credit Corporation in making the loans. I do not complain about that 1 per cent, because I think the Farm Credit Corporation is to be commended for keeping the cost of servicing loans to the farmers down to 1 per cent.

When we add the 12 per cent, the 2 per cent because of the Canadian dollar being at 82.5 cents, the 2 per cent for hedging and the 1 per cent for administration, then the Farm Credit Corporation will have to charge an effective interest rate of 17 per cent. It would appear, then that when the farmer borrows this money he will be tied in for ten years to an interest rate of 17 per cent. That is a disgrace, Mr. Speaker.

On March 30, 1982 this House passed Bill C-88 which made changes in the Farm Credit Corporation. We were very pleased about that on this side. In Clause 8 of the Bill, Section 13 of the Farm Credit Act was changed, the new Section 13.(1) reads as follows:

The Corporation may, with the approval of the Minister of Finance, borrow money by any means,—

I emphasize that phrase "by any means", Mr. Speaker.

—including issuing and selling bonds, debentures, notes and other evidences of indebtedness of the Corporation.

• (1840)

We were pleased because it said, "Borrow money by any means". For quite a long time we on this side of the House were making proposals such as the agribond, a scheme to assit farmers who were called upon to pay large capital gains tax. We felt that the change brought in by the Bill back in March would allow the Government to bring in the innovative ideas which we had suggested. As I said, we had made these suggestions for some considerable time.

I read the Minister's speech of last Thursday, the Minister never gives credit where credit is due. As reported on page 20400 of Hansard, he said:

—using the agribond principle that was not originally thought up by those opposite, Mr. Speaker, but was brought up and talked about by people for many years—

If the principle has been around for many years, why has the Minister or the Governent not made use of it? Is it because the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) has no clout with his Cabinet colleagues? Can he not sell them on a good idea? Does he prefer to borrow money on the international market? Does he not really give a damn for the failing agricultural economy? Is he perhaps afraid of financial institutions? What kind of a Minister of Agriculture is he?

When I spoke in the House in February on the FCC Bill, the one which allowed the Corporation to borrow money by any means, I talked about borrowing money from the Farm Credit Corporation at the then rate of 16.75 per cent. I used the example of farm land selling at $1,000 an acre. It is not uncommon in western Canada to have farm land sell at $1,000 per acre and up. Generally speaking, farmers use a two-year crop rotation. They summer fallow one year and they crop the next; half and half. In other words, a farmer crops half his acreage each year. If we take $1,000 per acre land, with a two-year crop rotation and $6 wheat, the farmer has to produce 50 bushels per acre to pay the interest alone. On top of that, of course, he has to add his seed, municipal taxes, fertilizer, the price of gas and oil, his repairs and depreciation. He just cannot survive.

With the scheme at which the FCC is looking, as approved by the Minister, it will cost the borrower of American money 17 per cent. If we use the same figures of $1,000 an acre and a two-year crop rotation, with grain at $4.75 per bushel compared with $6—and the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board says that farmers this year will get the initial payment of only $4.75 per bushel—with interest at 17 per cent, it will require 71 bushels per acre to pay the interest alone. If one were fortunate enough to buy land at $500 per acre, it would require 36 bushels an acre to pay the interest. Farmers, grain producers and livestock producers just cannot survive. That is what the Government has been doing and what it is doing in borrowing $100 million from the United States. It will put farmers further and further in debt and possibly into bankruptcy.

For many years farmers in western Canada have been concerned about the capital gains tax. It is a substantial tax. Many farmers are afraid to retire because of the enormous amount of tax they would have to pay. People might say that since they are selling their land for substantial amounts they should be able to pay capital gains tax, but generally speaking the only money farmers have on which to retire is the proceeds from the sale of their farms.

In the last two or three elections Members of the Liberal Party in their campaign in western canada said that they would do something about capital gains tax. They did not say they would eliminate it, but I recall the Liberal candidate in Assiniboia saying at a press conference in Regina that if they were elected they would update valuation day. Hollow promises; nothing was ever done. There was no change in the capital gains tax. In fact, what did they do? In the June budget of about a year ago they eliminated the income averaging annuity, one means by which a retiring farmer was able to alleviate the burden of capital gains tax. This is what the Government thinks of farmers.

When I spoke in the House in February of this year on the amendments to the Farm Credit Corporation Act, I talked about a method of helping farmers with capital gains tax, helping the FCC with cheaper money and helping the borrowers with lower interest rates. It was not the first time I had spoken about it; I had spoken about it in public meetings before. I suggested that we should allow a farmer who was retiring or selling out and was faced with a substantial capital gains tax to invest the capital gains in the FCC and also allow him to invest the proceeds on the sale of his inventory. There is a heavy tax burden when a farmer sells out and has an inventory of grain. There is also a substantial tax burden when he sells his equipment because of capital gains.

I suggested that we could allow the retiring farmer to invest the money from these three sources in the FCC on the condition that, if he invested the money for a period of five years, the capital gains tax would be waived. The money that he invested would draw interest at 8 per cent, as I suggested in February. It may or may not be taxable because the farmer would be using this as his retirement income in the five-year period. I suggest that the 8 per cent that he receives for that five years should not be taxable. However, if it were to be taxed, it would be to the extent that the 8 per cent exceeded the average bank rate.

I am sure that if such a program was introduced coupled with the agribond concept, there would be a great deal of money available to the Farm Credit Corporation for lending purposes. If the Farm Credit Corporation could obtain that money at 8 per cent and take into account its administration charges of 1 per cent, it could lend the money to the borrower at 9 per cent instead of the 17 per cent it will have to charge for money that it will have borrowed on the American market. A program such as I have suggested would allow the young farmer to begin farming. It would allow the struggling farmer to survive and would prevent the appreciation in value of farm lands.

There is no question that the capital gains tax has effectively increased the value of farm lands because on many occasions farmers who are selling their farms have come into my constituency office inquiring what their capital gains tax will be. I have asked them, since they do have accountants, why they would want to know other than for income tax purposes. They have told me quite frankly that they will add the cost of the capital gains tax on to the sale price of the land. In effect, capital gains tax has caused an appreciation in farm land which makes it difficult for the young farmer, or any farmer, to purchase land.

If the Minister of Agriculture were to adopt a scheme such as I have suggested, he could be very popular. Apparently he is more interested in helping the foreign market and the large financial institutions than he is in helping agriculture. I believe the banks have proven that they are capable of looking after their own affairs. I believe the insurance and investment companies have proven that they can look after themselves. The Minister has indicated that the credit unions were concerned about the agribonds or the scheme which I have suggested to alleviate capital gains. I suggest that the effect of Canada Savings Bonds sales at high interest rates has a greater effect on credit unions than a proposal such as ours.

As said by the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn), this would be a self-help program because the farmers would be helping each other to survive. This is an important point, because if the agricultural sector does not prosper, the other sectors of our economy cannot prosper.

In closing, I urge the Minister to consider seriously our proposals. If he believes in the agricultural industry he will attempt to sell those suggestions to the cabinet.

Mr. Stan Schellenberger (Wetaskiwin): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to join other Hon. Members in congratulating the Hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville (Mrs. Cossitt) on making her first speech in the House. I know that we do not often speak to many Members in this institution when we rise, but there is something about the institution, as there should be, which makes that first speech a major undertaking. The Hon. Member did a masterful job and I look forward to hearing more speeches of that quality from her in this institution.

The Hon. Member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Neil) spoke eloquently about some proposals that should certainly be considered by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan). We have a more depressing outlook for agriculture today than we have had for many decades. I would like to discuss world trade and what it means to the income of the agricultural producers. Before doing so, I would also point out that many farmers in Canada today are looking at the future of agriculture with some reservation.

I have represented the riding of Wetaskiwin for ten years. In that time I cannot remember any farmer coming to me and wondering about their future. They have always indicated that while their year was not as productive as anticipated, the future was bright. However, they are now coming to me to ask whether they should continue to incur further debts to stay in agriculture or if they ought to sell. However, the prospect of selling their farm does not look very bright either because the price of land has decreased in value. The state of our economy has affected the price of land all across Canada. When farmers look to auction sales for removal of their equipment, they are finding that that picture does not look very bright either because the price of tractors, combines and cultivation equipment has also decreased greatly because farmers cannot afford to buy that inventory. If you have money at this time, particularly in western Canada, there are many bargains to be found at auction sales.

If the banks call their loans and farmers are forced to sell their land or equipment, they are then faced with capital gains tax. They cannot even take the revenue from that land and equipment to pay off their debts because they have to pay the Government a capital gains tax.

It is no wonder that we have heard many eloquent speeches during the last few days on this subject of credit. Credit is a very important instrument to the agricultural industry. We cannot exist today without it. When my father took the farm over from my grandfather, he lost his crops to nature three years in a row. He was able to survive, however, because the debts that he had incurred were not large. At that time fertilizer and chemical sprays were not necessary because the land was sufficiently productive. I know a very few farms today in my constituency that can survive one crop loss. Farmers today obtain loans simply to sow their crops. Farmers do not have enough money in their savings just to put their crops in the ground, and that is true of the farm I am running as well. Until about five years ago we had sufficient funds to put our crops in each year from what we were able to earn from our sales. However, this year, last year and the year before that, we had to borrow money to put the crop in. This year, myself and many other farmers in my constituency are wondering if we need to finance the operation alone, because we are not receiving enough return from revenue to pay that debt off. The future does not look too bright.

The Bill will help about 500 farmers. The budget offered a $50 million program involving special financial farm assistance loans, which helped 382 farmers. Our experts are telling us that 20,000 farmers in this country are in distress today. These two Bills are helping 880 of those. That is good, but what about the others?

Day after day we are told of the increasing numbers of bankruptcies. There has been a 65 per cent increase this year over last year. Unless we get the incomes of the farmers up or their costs down, it is sad to say but we will be facing more bankruptcies.

The current level of interest rates is one of the largest factors, but another is the cost of production which is also undergoing a dramatic increase. As we know, people who produce machinery, fertilizer and so forth must pay higher labour costs. They must pay higher input costs for the production of that equipment which they pass on to the farmer and he, in turn, must pay more. Costs of production are rising year after year. This year, we on the Prairies found that the price of grain decreased. The price of a bushel of barley delivered to the elevator is 31 cents less than last year. The price of wheat, as was just enunciated by the Hon. Member for Moose Jaw, has gone from $6 a bushel down to $4.75 a bushel. We are asking that our farmers be able to continue to operate as their incomes drop and their costs rise. I do not know how we expect them to go on for very long. Statistics show that they cannot go on for very long.

We have a desperate problem involving one industry in this nation which must be addressed. Excellent ideas have been put forward as to how we can address the problem. This Bill will help only a few. Our party is supporting it, but we must have policies to address the longer term problem. How can we do that? We must do more than bring Bills to the House, as the Minister constantly does. We debated one in February this year, we are debating one now and certain Bills have been brought forward from the budget, all dealing with credit and how we can give farmers more loans or rebates of interest on loans. There have been no initiatives which would assist farmers to bring down their costs or, conversely, to raise the price of their commodities. There are ways of doing that, even in these hard times.

I listened to the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain (Mr. Hamilton) refer to the area of energy. I join with him because I also feel there is an ability to lower costs, in the energy field. One of the most important ways, one which we could adopt tomorrow, would be to lower the tax taken on gasoline and diesel fuel by the federal Government, some 40 cents per gallon on diesel and 60 cents a gallon on gasoline. The Province of Alberta has led the way by removing its provincial sales tax on gasoline. We applaud that action because it has assisted farmers in my Province a great deal. We are big users of energy. Farmers are large users of energy. When tax is removed, it has an immediate beneficial effect on their bank account and on their ability to pay interest rates and input costs. The Government should follow that example. The removal of the tax would have immediate effects. It should not only be removed from a gallon or a litre of diesel fuel or gasoline, but it should also be extended, until we rise out of this difficult period of time, to those products derived from natural gas and oil, such as sprays and fertilizers, which constitute input costs.

I have some statistics. For every dollar per barrel increase in the Canadian price of oil, the price of nitrogen fertilizer increases by $5.88 per tonne. Hydrous ammonia increased by $10.54 per tonne and ammonium phosphate increased by $4.75 a tonne. All these are essential in the production of crops today. The price of pesticides and weed sprays per gallon is 87 cents. In the year to which I have been referring, the price of commodities has dropped, but the price of oil has risen by $2.75 a barrel and the federal take in tax on that oil is some 40 cents to 60 cents. Therefore, there would be some immediate effect in cutting farmers' costs if we lowered the federal tax on gasoline and diesel fuel and lowered input costs, such as those I have mentioned.

The other way would be to promote the use of renewable energy. The Government could do that if it put its mind to it. I will not repeat the speech of the Hon. Member for Qu'Appelle-Moose Mountain, but he referred to the use of alcohol. Farms have the capacity to produce alcohol from stills in a very efficient manner and the Government ought to be sending out information on how farmers can build such stills which would make it very simple to produce one's own fuel.

People in Nova Scotia, I believe, have invented an excellent straw-burning grain dryer which we have read about in our papers and magazines. Why should we not buy the patent and send it out to farmers across the nation so that they can cut their costs of drying grain by building or having this type of furnace built? These are the kind of ideas the federal Government could use. In my brother's house we have installed the first heat pump in Canada which uses the ground as its source of heat. It has been working excellently in the last two months, heating the house from the heat that is down in the ground, at a cost much less than natural gas or diesel fuel. We also have wind energy and biomass. Any livestock producer has the capacity to produce fuel from his livestock's own waste material. All these are available, but we are not getting the information out to the farmers who are hungry for it.

Another way of increasing the price of commodities is through the Canadian Wheat Board. Most of us were astonished when we heard that this crop year the Government and the Canadian Wheat Board would allow the initial price to the farmers to drop, given what I have just said about the rise in input costs. It is within the realm of the Canadian Wheat Board to keep the initial price at the level it was last year. It has the ability to borrow money from the federal Government to foot the bill. To my way of thinking, it would be much better for us to put public funds through that mechanism to keep the price at the level it should be, rather than to bring it in through the back door in the way this Bill is attempting, so that all farmers could have the benefit. The price should be kept the same. We should not allow it to drop and cause the loss of decades of work as farmers go bankrupt. No one can understand that unless he has experienced it or watches as his constituents come in and bare their souls as they look toward losing their farms this week, next week or a month from now, with no chance to stop it from happening.

I see some Hon. Members opposite, some Hon. Members in the NDP and some Hon. Members in the Conservative Party. In the last four years they have been talking with their American counterparts because farmers in the United States are having the same difficulties as farmers in Canada in so far as meeting their balance of payments is concerned. We asked them why we compete so well with one another that we actually sell our grain below the cost of production. What a ridiculous situation. The United States is the only country with a major surplus of food in the world today. That is the principal reason why the price of grain is as low as it is. Another reason is that many countries in the world simply cannot afford to pay for food. However, there are many other countries to whom we deliver grain that can afford to pay and should be paying more. Both U.S. and Canadian representatives agree that we should not be selling grain below the cost of production since we sell 75 per cent of the surplus grain in the world. We also agree that our costs of production are very similar. It would be simple to work out a formula.

Canadian Members of Parliament together with Senators and Congressmen in the United States can and must take a hold of this problem because our Ministers and officials are not. We must work out solutions and the formulae so that we will not compete with one another at a cost below that of production. Once world prices rise above the cost production, there is no problem; we should compete and we should compete well with one another. However, as it is now we are simply hurting our own farmers by doing what we are.

The last report was delivered to the Minister eight or nine months ago. It was well received by him. He said it contained good ideas. Departmental officials have been meeting for a number of years. Perhaps they are caught up in simple language in some kind of international agreement, but while they agree on the principle, they have been unable to put anything together that could be brought forward to our respective institutions.

A few months ago farmers in western Canada met with farmers from the United States. They agreed that the principle was sound and asked why it could not proceed. Yet nothing has yet been put together. I think it is time now for that to be done. We will be seeking from the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) and the Minister in charge of the Canadian Wheat Board a meeting with Senators and Congressmen so they can iron out these problems. We should put as much pressure as we can on the Minister here and the Secretary in the United States to get together and agree not to sell grain and oilseeds below the cost of production.

Countries like Japan, the Soviet Union, those in the European Community, China and many of the Arab countries who buy grain from us can afford to pay the cost of production, and they should be paying it. In fact, some of these countries add on so many dollars per bushel so as not to compete with their own farmers. In some countries the amount is as high as $6 a bushel. This is added on in the form of a tariff. This is money which our farmers could desperately use at the moment. If the income were ever to get so large that farmers were making an extraordinary profit it could perhaps be put into an account to assist those countries who cannot afford to pay and whose people are starving. In this way we could get their cost down. This is an excellent program. It has been talked about and legislators in both countries agree that it is time for action.

Let me point out that there are other ways of lowering costs. Canada has one of the best agricultural research capacities in the world. Excellent material is being produced month after month. Surely within that material there are ways that farmers can cut their costs. We should ask our very capable scientists to put these ways together. This material should be distributed to our farmers so they can use whatever part of it is pertinent. We should not do what was done in February when the Department issued a report. In it we found such things as "How can you get by in distressed times?" Some of the suggestions were absolutely unbelievable. They could only emanate from a Department. Other suggestions included: "Sell off some unproductive land". Most farmers are using every acre they have in the most productive way possible. How can they choose which corner to sell off? We also find these words: "You can always work off the farm". There are some farmers who have the time to do that. Most of them are working for every hour possible that they have off the farm. But that does not work all that well because the Government only allows $2,500 of income to be earned off the farm before it is taxed at the rate of 40 per cent or 50 per cent. Again, that solution is not a total solution, but it was not a bad suggestion.

Another suggestion was to raise livestock—hogs or cattle—in unused buildings. That was done years ago when provincial Governments encouraged farmers to get into the livestock business. They were even given loans. Most farmers were in bankruptcy the following year because they got into another area of production that did not raise the kinds of funds necessary to meet expenses, particularly when farmers were taking up loans to buy breeding stock and to fix up old buildings. Those kinds of suggestions are not adequate. We have to ask our experts, which we have in abundance, to search their records and come up with suggestions. The Department of Agriculture should then get the suggestions out to farmers so they can decide whether or not they fit into their operations.

Then there is the suggestion of improving our lending institutions and capabilities. The Hon. Member for Moose Jaw talked about that. His was an excellent suggestion on capital gains. I will not repeat it because he did such a good job of explanation.

What about the Small Business Development Bond? That concept was brought forward by us when we were in Government. This program is now being snowed under with red tape and a bureaucratic maze which results in its being of hardly any use to the farmer in need. In most cases the bank will not accept the individual as a credit risk. If the individual is accepted, he has to go through so many procedures that he is almost bankrupt before he can get the bond. Such questions as: "Can you sell off any land? Do you have any relatives from whom you can borrow money? Is there some other way by which you can rearrange your finances?" are asked. As my colleague says, they should buy a Loto Canada ticket. These questions are asked before one is accepted as an applicant for a Small Business Development Bond.

However, that is a concept on which you can build. It is an excellent concept. It has helped some farmers in Canada. We should eliminate many of the roadblocks that are put in the way of the Small Business Development Bond.

We have the agribond concept, about which much has been spoken in this debate. We have heard of examples in other countries. Members have talked particularly about those that are offered in the United States. We can get ideas from the Federal Land Bank Association, the Production Credit Association, the Farmers Home Administration and the Commodity Credit Association. All of these ideas could fit into the Canadian realm of agriculture and would be better than some of the situations that farmers face now.

Finally, there is transportation and shipping. We are making moves in that area. We are making sales. The Minister of Agriculture could be helping this country. We have had the Canagrex Bill before us for quite some time. The Minister is too bull-headed to recognize that if he removed the sections that are distasteful to farmers and left in the sections which promote and facilitate exports, that Bill could be passed and we could be using it to help farmers get more sales in livestock, grains and horticultural products. But no, he persists. As a result, the Bill is held up.

There is a need to facilitate the sale of agricultural commodities throughout the world. We have embassies and institutions around the world, but they have only limited expertise in agriculture. We should send people there who know how to sell our agricultural commodities. This would assist our farmers.

We have had, put many statistics on the record today and last Thursday that I am sure the farmers do not like to hear. I am not going to repeat very many of them. However, some of the statistics are astonishing to me and I am sure to people across this country, such as the amount of debt. In the United States, and the situation is not much different in Canada, net farm income in 1982 is estimated at $18 billion. Total farm debt is approximately $200 billion. At 10 per cent interest, that is $20 billion being paid in interest. That is right off the net farm income. That statistic is readily available.

I tried to find the comparable statistics for Canada. It is surprising how close they are. Total Canadian farm debt is $18 billion. Net farm income is $4.9 billion and the gross is $18 billion. One can see that the debt is equal to the amount of money we are capable of generating through agricultural production. How long can that be allowed to continue? As has been stated, we must get the prices of our commodities up to a reasonable level or the costs down.

The Farm Credit Corporation has been a major lending institution in Canada for the farmers. At one time it loaned about 70 per cent of the long-term capital in Canada. Any farmer will tell you it is not the long-term debt that will kill him but the short-term debt. In the last few years, many farmers have been incurring a lot of short-term debt in order to replace machinery. They must invest between $50,00 and $100,000 for a new combine and tractor. That is generally short-term debt. At today's interest rates, that debt is too cumbersome for them to handle. We need institutions that will provide farmers with the opportunity to turn their short-term debt into long-term debt at lower interest rates.

Today Farm Credit Corporation loans account for far less than the 70 per cent they once did. These are now down to 25 per cent. We should be looking to the Farm Credit Corporation for other ways to quickly provide long-term debt to farmers at lower interest rates to help them through these desperate times. That is not being done with this Bill. It has not been done through any of the bills which came before us in the last couple of years. We are not assisting in solving very difficult problem.

There is another problem being faced by the Farm Credit Corporation. The amount of capital available and the demand for capital is so great that not all the loans for which the farmers are asking can be made. Therefore, loans are being made to fewer and fewer farmers. In fact, during the first two and a half months of this year they distributed money to 16 per cent fewer farmers than last year, with a larger budget. That is one of the problems this institution is facing.

While this Bill is providing extra money, half of that money is really coming from a reorganization within the Department. As a result, fewer farmers are being helped than was anticipated. It is a bit of a deception and it is not helping the very desperate needs of farmers.

Farmers are facing input costs of unbelievable magnitude. Interest expenses are up by 39 per cent this year over last year, machinery repairs are up by 24 per cent and feed is up by 11 per cent. There is not one area in agriculture not facing these difficulties.

The subject of farm credit has been well covered in the last two days of debate on this Bill. We can only hope that some of the suggestions will be considered. We have asked why the farm fuel tax cannot be removed. We have asked about the agribond and the capital gains concept. Many other suggestions have been made. We want to hear the answers. We have also covered statistics which farmers do not like to hear. We have no other choice than to support this Bill as it has been brought forward. I am glad we have had this debate; it is long overdue. We ought to have many more like it. Perhaps we can get some positive answers, with some changes to the legislation so that we can help the farmers of this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Accordingly, the Bill stands referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

SMALL BUSINESS INVESTMENT GRANTS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE FOR REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. William Rompkey (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)) moved that Bill C-136, Small Business Investment Grants Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

He said: Mr. Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to inform the House about the Small Business Investment Grants Program, to explain its provisions and the way it is being applied.

I want to begin by saying that the Government of Canada is very much aware of the concerns of the small business community and has sought to promote good relations with this very important sector of Canadian society, and to develop practical solutions to the problems that small businessmen face. That is why we formed a task force to look into the financing of small business in Canada and published the report of that task force in May. The report, which does not contain policy recommendations as such, will nevertheless serve as input for discussion of future options for Government action.

We have also recently formed the Small Business Advisory Committee, which is made up of members of the small business community, lending institutions and academics. This committee will advise the Government on matters concerning small business and suggest policy options. One of the items they will be tackling is the report of the small business financial review.

I also want to inform Members of the House of the fact that in our discussions with the small business community, we have met with a very enthusiastic response to the Government's six and five per cent restraint guidelines. As Members are well aware, one of the problems facing Canada's many small businesses has been high interest rates, which have reduced the entrepreneur's ability to finance capital investment and research and development. Thus the small business community, which the federal Government recognizes is extremely important to the over-all Canadian economy, has been hampered in its ability to generate economic activity and create jobs in this crucial time of worldwide economic recession.

The federal Government has listened to the representations of the small business community, and has recognized this problem. That is why in the June 28 budget of the former Minister of Finance a program was announced which was designed specifically to alleviate the financing problems of small businesses in today's economy. That program is the Small Business Investments Grants Program. Under the provisions of the program an interest subsidy of up to four percentage points per year is granted to eligible small business borrowers to finance acquisition of new depreciable assets, or to finance research and development. An amount of $400 million was set aside in that budget to be devoted to this program. The interest subsidy will be paid for two years from the date of the loan.

One of the attractive features of the Small Business Investment Grants Program is its simplicity. It has been made available through the lending institutions. In other words, application for a grant is made to the lending institution as part of negotiating a loan in the regular manner. It is the lending institution which processes the application with the Government.

Loans qualifying under the program can be obtained from chartered banks, trust companies, insurance companies, credit unions, Caisses Populaires, the Federal Business Development Bank, the Farm Credit Corporation, any lending agency of the Government of Canada or of a Canadian Province or Territory, as well as any investment company as defined under the Investment Companies Act. This ensures that ready access to the benefits of the program is available to small business anywhere in Canada.

As far as the eligibility of the borrower is concerned, I want to explain that for the purposes of this program small businesses that qualify include corporations that are eligible for the low corporate tax rate for small business, partnerships whose members are all individuals, and proprietorships—and here I want to emphasize that this includes farmers and fishermen. Businesses engaged in a profession, however, do not qualify.

Loans from $10,000 to $500,000 can be subsidized by a small business investment grant. A small business may obtain more than one loan under the program, provided the total borrowings do not exceed the $500,000 upper limit. The interest rate subsidy under the program is up to four percentage points: with the effective interest floor being 12 per cent, so that the 4 per cent grant will be reduced when the grant and any other assistance available would lower the interest rate to less than 12 per cent.

The program was designed as a temporary measure to assist small businesses during this difficult economic period. It therefore applies to loans made between June 29, 1982 and March 31, 1983. And here I should emphasize one point that may possibly have been misunderstood by the business community. Since for obvious reasons it took sometime after the June 28 announcement before the necessary forms and information could be distributed to all the lending institutions, some business people did not become aware of the program until some weeks after June 29. They may have assumed that only future loans would qualify under the program. The fact is, however, that any loan on or after June 29 qualifies, if the criteria I have mentioned are otherwise met. In other words, a business person who arranged a loan in, say, July this year, and only afterwards learned of the Small Business Investment Grants Program, may still apply to his banker for the interest rate subsidy.

In order to ensure effective delivery of this program through the lending institutions, officials have worked very closely with associations such as the Canadian Bankers' Association. I must say that I am grateful to the financial community for the co-operation we have received. Hundreds of thousands of brochures on the program have been taken up by lenders for distribution to borrowers through their local branches, and several major lenders have been promoting the program quite enthusiastically.

In addition, I would like to thank the Hon. Members on both sides of the House for their efforts to promote the program to their constituents. More than 16,000 forms have been distributed so far. Applications are coming in at a rate of 30 or 40 per day. There is every reason to expect that with implementation of our own advertising campaign, along with continuing promotion of the program by the lending institutions, the rate of applications will increase over the coming weeks.

I will conclude, Mr. Speaker, by repeating that the Small Business Investment Grants Program is a temporary measure, designed to meet a specific need at a specific time. We do not pretend that in itself it meets all the needs of the small business community, and we are continuing to examine ways and means to assist small businesses which constitute such an important part of the Canadian economic scene.

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, before commencing my remarks, may I take this opportunity to formally convey my best wishes to the Minister on his new portfolio, and to tell him that in anything he does to further the small business community, certainly this Party and this particular critic, will assist.

With respect to the legislation that is before the House, may I say, as I did on June 30, two days after the former Minister of Finance brought down his budget, that this Party, and myself, as the critic for small business, will support anything which we believe is productive for the small business community, and we include this piece of legislation. There will be no obstruction whatsoever. This matter should go through. Unfortunately, though, I believe it is too little, too late, and I intend to expand on that in a few moments.

Let me say at the outset, that statistics in normal prosperous times for the small business person are really abominable. One out of every two businesses which have been in business two years fail. Four out of five business in business for five years fail. That is in normal times and with normal risks. Persons far more intelligent than myself who have done studies say the reason is under-capitalization, mismanagement, or a combination of both. But, in the last two years with interest rates, the magnitude of which I can only call sometimes extortionary, we have seen economic carnage among the small business community that words cannot properly emphasize.

Just to give some dimension to the problem, in the first nine months of this year, bankruptcies were up in the business community—and I am talking about businesses as opposed to personal bankruptcies—by 43 per cent over last year, and 66 per cent over two years ago. The frightening aspect of that, Mr. Speaker, is that the number of bankruptcies does not provide the true statistics.

What we are trying to analyze is how many people are going broke. We know since the mid-60s that the vehicle used by people who go broke is no longer bankruptcy. People declare bankruptcy in order to avoid always having to pay a creditor. In other words, they want to extinguish their debt. Bankruptcy legislation is good legislation because it is controlled through the courts of this country and we have the statistics. What people do not recognize, though, is that the normal person goes broke by way of receivership. What happens is that the bank, when it calls its note, moves in on the business under its floating charge debenture. And we do not have any statistics on that except that the insolvency Association of Canada says there are ten businesses that go insolvent for every one that goes bankrupt.

By using our eyes, our ears and all our senses we know the plight of small business in this country. This results not only because of mismanagement or undercapitalization, but because of the harsh reality of interest rates which, when I was going to law school, would have been unconscionable transactions.

These comments come from a riding in southwestern Ontario, the heartland of Canadian manufacturing, or at least we thought it was such. In my community we have gone to an unemployment level of over 20 per cent. A year ago it was approximately 7 per cent. There was one sure thing about Cambridge; people knew that you could always get a job in Cambridge as there were lots of textile mills and shoe factories. But the harsh reality of the last year, the fact that we have 22 per cent unemployment, has caused the citizens of my community to literally go through a nervous breakdown. It is not like ridings in Cape Breton which traditionally have had high unemployment. It is not like ridings in the province from which the Minister comes, which have had to endure unfortunately high unemployment over a period of time. This is something new and it is happening in the heartland of southwestern Ontario. You can believe me, Mr. Speaker, that the emotions in my community over the state of the economy are very difficult to exaggerate by words.

I would like to talk about the personal effect on small business people because I just received by today's mail a letter from a small-businessman who was making running shoes. He was holding back certain Canada Pension and Unemployment Insurance moneys in connection with his workers, and the Department of National Revenue effectively closed him down. The amount of his indebtedness for payroll deductions was $13,270, and he wanted to make a deal. He could not. Third party notices of garnishee were distributed. In order to do the man justice, I am going to read a letter he sent to the department. He said this:

> Our company has been going through some difficult times and it has not been our intention to withhold the payments, but we have not been able to generate enough funds to do more than meet the payroll monies due to our employees. We have survived on a month to month basis hoping that the footwear quotas would be reintroduced. We have fought "tooth and nail" to survive the depression and now that the quotas have been reintroduced the signs are positive as to our recovery. However, it appears the government, through its Kitchener collection office, has determined that their pound of flesh should come before our recovery and before the jobs of our employees.
> When the auditor left our business he informed me that we would be contacted by the persons incharged of collections in Kitchener so that an arrangement could be made to try to settle the outstanding amounts. We did not hear from the persons in Kitchener, but received in the mail demands on Third Parties sent to all our customers. I immediately phoned a Mr. Schnurr at Collections in Kitchener and asked him "Why he had not contacted us first?" and informed him that his actions would likely put us out of business.

The bottom line, Mr. Speaker, is that as a result, this company has just recently had to lay off 20 people because of the $13,000. They will be going on Unemployment Insurance. What this small-businessman asked for was time to settle the account. That time was not granted and we have another company that has gone under.

One more very vivid experience, came to my attention within the last few days when I was back in Cambridge. The bank loan of a small business had been called. The person involved is a very solid citizen, one who tried to endure, but could not because of the high interest rates which have affected all western economies, not just Canada's. I certainly acknowledge that. The bank in question called the guarantee of this man's mother and father. I will not mention his name because I know he would not want me to cause them embarrassment. His parents are 65 years of age and all they have is a house. His father has a very small pension and a veteran's allowance. Those people are going to have their house taken away.

I know all Members from all sides of the House are hearing similar stories. One almost breaks into tears when the reality of these situations comes across the desk; when you see the person who has to bear this kind of a burden.

High interest rates have really hurt the small-businessman. Unfortunately, the budget policies of the predecessor to the current Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) caused untold hardships in our country. I believe there is a crisis of faith and of trust in Government. I say that if this Government were to introduce the finest economic policies it could muster, I am not sure the business community would trust it.

When are the rules going to be changed? I hark back to the November budget. I give some credit to the current Minister of Finance because in his recent economic statement I think he clearly undid some of the harm his predecessor did. I think he should be given credit for that. But there are some matters which affect the small business community that have not been changed. I invoke the assistance of the Minister sitting in his place in the House tonight because the most important thing to assist the small business community is the capital cost allowance. I will refer to Liberal policy in 1972.

In May of 1972 the Hon. John Turner, the then Minister of Finance, brought down a budget. The issue before the country at that time was jobs. There are 33 forms of depreciable property, ranging all the way from 5 per cent to 100 per cent. Because one out of five people are employed in the manufacturing sector, it was determined at that time, that in order to create jobs a speedy write-off would be given under Class 28 of depreciable property. That would mean, for example, that if a businessman, when he had money in his coffers, wanted to purchase some equipment he could write it off in two years. That was an incentive for him to do so.

What has happened so far? Well, the budget of November, 1981 has not been amended. In the first year the businessman will only get one half the capital cost allowance. Over the next three years they are going to lose $3 billion. It will come from the private sector to the public sector. I asked the Minister of Finance a question on June 30, 1982, after the measures which are formally being introduced into legislation this evening were announced. My question to the Minister of Finance was:

> We on this side of the House welcome any measure that will assist small businesses in terms of development. But I point out to the Minister that on November 12 last year he brought in a provision with respect to capital cost allowance which has done more to prevent retooling and has dried up cash flow.

I asked the Minister of Finance whether or not he would adjust that. He said at that time:

> If accepted, that would be a further large addition to the deficit which Hon. Members opposite have been complaining about—

I say to the Minister that if the private sector really is the engine of the economy, these traditional write-offs, these things which we have never ever thought of as loopholes, have to be given back.

Let us talk about the measure which the Minister has brought in. Where is the target? The Canadian Federation of Independent Business did a survey just recently and asked its more than 60,000 members this question. What do you anticipate doing with respect to your business? Are you going to lay people off as the result of the recession? Do you anticipate that you are going to stand pat and lay nobody off, or on the other hand are you going to expand? Seven per cent of the people who answered that survey said, "We are going to expand; we are going to create jobs; we are going to try". The target of this $400 million is the 7 per cent of the small business population which answered this survey in that way. The fact is that in this very deep recession, when people are squirreling their money away and are afraid to invest it, no one is expanding. There is no market demand; people are not making purchases.

When we ask when this $400 million offer will expire, the Minister tells us, in his comments, that it will expire by March 31 next year. The difficulty is that what that means is that we will be going through this recession until then, and when recovery comes, as we hope it will, these moneys will not be available.

The people I am talking about in the small business community do not believe that the $400 million is going to be delivered for the purpose of expansion. I look forward to asking the Minister in Committee if everyone who meets the qualifications is going to be given the money. Will any discretion be exercised, or will anyone who meets the qualifications be given that money? I understand that certain offices within the portfolio of Industry, Trade and Commerce want a slice of that $400 million, so I should like to be assured that everyone who applies and who is qualified will receive the money.

I agree with the Minister that the small business community, which invests in the economy, should be given the money rather than it being given to consumers at a preferred rate. The 4 per cent rate is agreeable to me, but I want to make sure that the small business community gets the money.

There are a number of questions I should like to pose to the Minister with respect to this matter, but I gave him my word, Mr. Speaker, that we would not hold up the Bill. I shall comment again later in the proceedings, but I want this Bill to pass second reading this evening, so I restrict my comments to the foregoing.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I have to assume that the Bill before us is the Government's response to the two years and $2 million spent on the small business financing review. From this long and expensive study, undertaken at a time when thousands small-businessmen have been going bankrupt, we get a three page Bill, at an estimated cost of $700,000 per page. The Minister proposes to spend less money to help small business than his Government gives almost every day of the week to large corporations in the country.

Small business is suffering a major illness akin to pneumonia, which today is treated with antibiotics. The Minister proposes to treat the major illness of small business with a mustard plaster, a kind of treatment which was used 50 years ago.

I should like to look at what is happening to small business today. Since the fall of 1979, when interest rates began to rise, the increase in business bankruptcies has been phenomenal. They increased by 16.8 per cent in 1980, 22 per cent in 1981 and to date, in 1982, they have increased 40 per cent over last year. Businesses have been failing at the rate of about 200 each week. That is only the tip of the iceberg, Mr. Speaker. Some estimates show that as many as three to ten times as many businesses go into receivership, are liquidated by secured creditors or close their doors, as go into bankruptcy. The August figures for bankrupt businesses were 66 per cent higher than for August last year, with debtor liabilities reaching $133 million. The yearly total for debtor liabilities in 1982 is almost $1.5 billion, or more than all last year.

There are approximately 900,000 small business enterprises in Canada. This sector is vital to the Canadian economy because it employs four out of every ten Canadians and contributes 30 per cent of the total business gross national product. It is almost 100 per cent Canadian owned and pays a higher effective rate of tax than does large business; it pays a 33 per cent tax rate compared to 29 per cent for large business.

When the Government brought forward this Mickey Mouse proposal, this supposed solution to the problems of the small-businessman, it almost completely ignored the real facts of life. The Canadian Federation of Independent Business conducted a survey at the beginning of this year which showed that close to one-third of small businesses in the country would be forced to close down, sell part of their enterprise or be forced into bankruptcy if interest rates did not drop dramatically. At the time of that survey, interest rates had dropped about six points from the peak of August 1981. As the President of the CFIB, John Bulloch, pointed out, "It is precious little comfort to know that you are dying a little slower than you did last month". Yet this is how the Minister proposes to deal with this problem.

In the survey, the CFIB found, among other things, that 56 per cent of firms had cancelled expansion plans, due to high interest rates; 77 per cent saw profits shrink; over 10 per cent were already in the red, and 32 per cent had laid off workers in the last year. That was before the massive job losses we have seen this year.

Why is small business in such trouble? It is mainly due to two things, Mr. Speaker. First of all, it is because of the tremendous rate of unemployment; 12.7 per cent of the work force of this country, or almost 1,400,000 people, are unemployed. That is not counting the 250,000 to 400,000 people who have given up looking for work.

People who are unemployed have to cut back on the purchases they might have made if working. They do not take trips, which means the travel agent is in trouble; they cut back on buying clothes, which means the clothing store is in trouble; they buy cheaper grades of meat, which means the people in the food industry are in trouble, and I could go on and on, Mr. Speaker.

Many Canadians who have never been unemployed are cutting back because they do not know how long their present jobs will last. There is not a city in this country in which there are not some workers, ages 45 and under who have never been unemployed, but who are now unemployed, who see their friends and co-workers with less seniority than they, becoming unemployed. Even these people who are still working are holding on to their money because they are worried about what might happen to them next week or next month.

The 1,400,000 unemployed people drawing unemployment insurance benefits have enough to keep them alive, but substantially less than they were earning when they worked. Tens of thousands of the people drawing unemployment insurance benefits will be on welfare before they get back to work. It has been estimated that there are 800,000 people in this country receiving welfare, and that the number is increasing by about 10,000 each month. We are likely to have 14 per cent unemployment this winter, with the rate at which we are going and with the failure of the Government to do anything meaningful to deal with the problem. It is not surprising that small businesses are in trouble. Their former customers are simply not in the position to purchase goods and services as they did when they were working. That is the first reason small business is in trouble.

The second reason is the insane high interest rate policy which the Government has been following on the bad advice, as we on this side of the House have pointed out many times, of the Governor of the Bank of Canada. As a representative of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business pointed out to the House of Commons Finance Committee when it looked into the question of bank profits, nothing is more inhibiting to the health of small business or more destructive to the continued viability and existence of small business than the high interest rate policies with which we have lived for the last three or four years.

These policies are continuing. If we have interest rates at present which are lower than they were a few years ago, it is not because of conscious decisions by the Government or by the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Interest rates have come down because American interest rates have come down. They have come down there not because President Reagan realizes the importance of lower interest rates, but because the American economy is dead. No one wants to borrow money these days, even when interest rates are lower as they are in the United States.

This Bill proves what we already know, that Canadian small business is being strangled by the irresponsibility of the Government's high interest rate policies. As I have pointed out, the rate of bankruptcy has increased dramatically in the last couple of years. Bankruptcies are only a small illustration of what is happening in the country. Small business will not be bailed out by the federal Government, and this Bill demonstrates that small business is not very frequently aided at times of economic crisis, such as the current one.

The Government is cynical in offering this program in its present form to small business because it is limited in its reach and funding. At the same time as we debate this Bill, which will provide possibly $400 million to small business, the Government is imposing a $1.6 billion unemployment insurance premium increase on Canadians. This means that the very people who should be helping small business by increasing their purchases are having $1.6 billion taken out of their pockets.

The Bill will only aid small business after provincial programs with the same objectives have been utilized. Several Canadian provinces already have interest reduction grants; Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba have such programs. The Federal Government's exposure is therefore not very great, with all its hyperbole about a major boost for small-businessmen.

Also a representative of the Canadian Federation of Independent Business stated to the review team, which as I pointed out earlier spent two years and $2 million looking into the problems of small business, that "about 20 per cent of the small business community out there is solvent and capable of expanding." Where does that leave the other 80 per cent who are looking for working capital and refinancing? Obviously the chartered banks have neither the expertise to deal with small businesses financing problems nor the desire. A most important point raised by the small business review team concerned the discrimination small businesses experience when dealing with chartered banks and major financial institutions.

These banking institutions are tied to the major corporations. Major corporations have had no difficulty in obtaining assistance from the banks, yet small business has had real trouble in obtaining financial assistance, sound advice and understanding from them. Indeed, in recent months cases were brought to our attention by organizations such as the Canadian Federation of Independent Business where banks have been increasing the collateral required from small businesses for loans to 300, 400 or 500 per cent of the amount of the loan they were prepared to lend. We know the banks have been more than ready to lend hundreds of millions of dollars to the large corporations of the country. Much of that money was used in what turned out to be a very irresponsible manner. It was used to purchase and take over other companies, which added nothing to employment.

The Financial Times of October 18 reported that the amount of money owing to the big five banks in the country, most of which was borrowed for takeovers, amounted to $8.4 billion. This amount was in what were called non-productive loans, loans on which the companies were not meeting their payments on principal, the money which they borrowed, but in most cases, if not all, were not even meeting the interest payments. This is not the kind of treatment which banks are giving small business. Small businesses are being forced into bankruptcy, into receivership, to sell out or to close up.

We all know about the $1 billion loan payments which Dome Petroleum could not meet and the assistance which it received from the banks and the Government of Canada. Chrysler Canada received $200 million in federal loan guarantees from the Federal Government and $33 million from the Province of Ontario. Massey-Ferguson received $125 million in federal loan guarantees and $75 million from Ontario. These loans were made under the condition that these companies would continue to employ Canadian workers. These conditions have not been met; workers were laid off. Consolidated Computer Inc. received $125 million from the Federal Government before the Federal Government gave up and sold the firm; de Havilland Aircraft received $580 million; and Canadair received $1.3 billion. I could go on, but these are a few examples of the type of thing which has gone on continuously in the country recently. It is not surprising that these companies receive assistance and support from the Canadian Government and the banks, because the heads of the corporations which obtained the loans and the bail-outs were also directors of the banks, and the directors of the banks were also directors of the large corporations.

Let me read a few examples which I took from that book. Argus Corporation, which owned Massey-Ferguson at one time and Dominion Stores among others, had as its directors Conrad Black, who is director of Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce, and Montague Black who is a director of the Toronto Dominion Bank. It is not surprising that Massey-Ferguson was able to obtain large loans from the banks.

The former head of CP Limited was Ian Sinclair, who is a director of the Royal Bank. The present President of CP is Fred Burbridge, who is a director of the Bank of Montreal.

The Hudson Bay Company, which is now owned by the Thompson interests, took over a number of companies and corporations, including FP Publications and Zellers. Kenneth Thompson is a director of the Toronto-Dominion Bank. George Richardson, who is the head of Hudson Bay, is a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank.

Walter Light is a director of Inco, a company which is in such great financial difficulty and which invested hundreds of millions of dollars in attempting to establish nickel mines which would compete, if successful, with Canadian mines where thousands of Canadians are now unemployed. It is a company which bought a battery firm and then wrote it off to the extent of $250 million. Walter Light is a director of the Royal Bank of Canada, and G. Arnold Hart is a director and executive officer of the Bank of Montreal.

Massey-Ferguson has one of its directors Alexander Runciman, who is a director of the Royal Bank, and A. A. Thornbrough, who is a director of the Canadian Imperial Bank of Commerce.

I cited those examples for the record because they demonstrate very clearly what we have said so many times in this Party, that the large corporations in this country receive entirely different and much more sympathetic treatment than the small business people in this country.

The Minister tells us that under the provisions of this Bill the Government will be prepared to lend up to $400 million at financially attractive interest rates. First, it is unlikely that that money will be used because interest rates have come down since this Bill was prepared and many of those who would have qualified when the interest rates were higher will probably no longer qualify.

If one compares the $400 million to be made available to all of the small businesses in this country with the kind of treatment given to corporations such as Dome, Massey-Ferguson, Turbo and others, one can see where the interest, the support and the heart of this Liberal Government lies. It is not with the small business people who live and work in cities like Halifax, Montreal, Toronto, Winnipeg, Calgary and Vancouver. The Government's interests lie with the big business corporations which have always had the preference and attention which they believe they need.

As I indicated previously, this Bill will not come close to giving the small business community the help it needs. I would like to take a moment to explain our reason for this belief, aside from the fact that there is simply not enough money. If we understand this Bill correctly, it promises $400 million in assistance to small business. The program will provide an interest rate reduction of up to 4 per cent for loans between $10,000 and $500,000 taken out for the purchase of new capital equipment and buildings. The subsidy would be available for two years. Given the state of our economy and the fact that there are close to a million and a half unemployed, and given the fact that there are 400,000 less Canadians working in October of 1982 than were working in October of 1981, we must ask the Minister and the Government how many businessmen can or will invest in new capital equipment during these current economic conditions. For that reason we think that this Bill is insufficient. We believe that business must be aided in a serious manner, one which will give real thought to the problems of small business.

I would like to offer a few concrete proposals which we think should be undertaken. First, as we have said for a number of years now, a made-in-Canada interest rate policy must be established. We have been calling for an interest rate at one per cent above the rate of inflation. This change alone could assist many businesses now facing closure, to keep debt repayments current and stimulate consumer demand. Not only is small business suffering because of the high interest rates which we have had for the last couple of years, it has suffered inordinately because of the roller-coaster effect of those interest rates. No small-businessman can plan the operation of his business if he does not know whether the interest rates will be 14 per cent or 20 per cent, both of which he has seen in the last year.

We believe that the Bank Act must be revised. It should be changed to provide a proportion of bank lending to small business. This would prevent the situation which has plagued small businesses in the past number of years where, as I have already indicated, large corporate borrowers have tended to crowd out small businesses.

We believe that the Federal Business Development Bank needs to be restructured in order to provide real risk and venture capital to small firms and act as a clearing house for all Government programs for small business. The CASE program, counselling assistance for small enterprises, could also be strengthened and better integrated with the Federal Business Development Bank's granting of loans.

We need to provide assistance for small business in marketing. We believe that a more aggressive "buy Canadian" policy in both private and public sectors could assist small businesses to prosper. Promoting that message would be much more beneficial to Canadian business than the Government's current approach, which has been to sponsor an independent study with the banks showing that small-businessmen are not really being discriminated against by the banks, and then using the study in large scale advertisements in the major daily newspapers to tell small-businessmen that the banks are on their side.

You cannot kid the troops all the time, Mr. Speaker. The small-businessman who must deal with the banks' restrictive policies toward him knows that the bank is not his friend.

We believe that the Government should restore the small business bond. Small businesses in financial difficulty are the only ones eligible for these bonds now. These bonds will terminate on December 31 of this year. Small-businessmen need access to lower rate funds for both new investment and to finance inventory costs. We would continue to offer this vehicle to small-businessmen for development purposes and operating loans.

We do not intend to hold this Bill up. As I indicated earlier, we believe that it is a very small step toward helping the small business community in this country.

Having said that it is a very small step, we do not intend to prolong the debate unnecessarily. I want to say to the Minister that small business will not be very thankful to the Government when it sees the results of this Bill. They will not get much help from the Bill, not the kind of help they need and deserve if this country is to prosper.

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, for many reasons I am very pleased to have an opportunity to make a brief intervention on the Bill, particularly when the small business investment grant seems to be condemned before it has even had a chance to go anywhere. That is what I seem to be hearing in the House, although I must confess that the business community of northwestern Ontario, with which I have many dealings now, as I have had in the past, seems to look with favour on this particular Bill and anxiously awaits its passage.

I suppose the problem with an item which only amounts to $400 million is that the critics of the Government will immediately say that it is not enough to put one and a half million people suddenly back to work. I think that the Minister tried to make it very clear in his opening remarks that the intent of the Bill was not to put everyone back to work all at once because, Lord knows, we all wish we had that magic button, some miraculous item which would do all those things instantaneously. But the message, both in and out of the Government, is that it will take many things working in harmony to make things happen, to get people back to work, to restore confidence, and so on.

I believe that we are now beginning to see many signs across the country and around the world that we will stay within Canada, because Hon. Members opposite say, "Quit blaming it on the rest of the world". We somehow live in the little world of our own, and the rest of it does not count, so we will stay within our boundaries for the purpose of the exercise.

I would say that I am happy with the Bill because it is another sign which states that small business generates jobs and activity within Canada and makes work within Canada available to other Canadians. That is a very commendable idea. While Hon. Members opposite want to put down the small amount invested in this particular program, I know they are as anxious, as we are, to see it implemented as quickly as possible, to give small business, which has the ability to expand through research, development and generally to allow their business to grow, to do just that with some modicum of help.

Basically, the business community operates best on its own and sometimes only needs a little bit of encouragement to get going. The small business investment grant will give many an opportunity, through spending some money on research and providing money for new capital equipment, to begin to expand. That begs the question: are there businesses around which have the ability to invest and to expand? Daily we listen to a litany of statistics which spell out doom and gloom.

An Hon. Member: Reality.

Mr. Masters: The statistics and the reality are there, except that they stand alone. I think that if one has a problem or a series of problems, one must try to identify them. The trouble with these statistics, as true as they are, is that they leave the impression that all is wrong everywhere. We know that we have many sad problems in Sudbury. We know why. We know we have many sad problems in the automotive industry. Those of us who drive Canadian-made vehicles say, "Well, at least I did not contribute to that problem". Maybe those of us who have elected, for whatever good reason, to buy foreign-made vehicles might want to consider our action. However, the free enterprise system is such that we buy what we want, and so on.

I find that in the doom and gloom which is being spread, we are not getting a handle on matters as they are, because there are contradictions out there. Excuse me for going beyond our borders, but right now, primarily because of the American market situation, pulp and paper products and lumber products from northwestern Ontario are basically sold south of the border. Therefore, we have a decline. Yet for some strange reason, a gentleman who sells power chain saws only to the commercial sector, to the professional cutter, tells me that he is having the best year ever. I asked him, "Well, why is that?" He said, "It is because they are really thinking of the future. They are working hard, and I must tell you something. I am working harder than I have worked in the last 25 years, but I find that when I work harder the results are there". I also find that in my community, even with the doom and gloom, many businessmen are saying, "I am looking forward to the passage of Bill C-136 because my small business is capable of investment."

I know a jeweller. One does not have to buy watches, rings and china to know a jeweller. He said to me, "Mr. Masters, I have had to hire more staff." I asked, "How could you do that in these difficult times when there is no money around? How can you expand your business?" He said, "It is because I was running scared. I stayed home and I worked. I sat down with my staff and asked them how we could meet competition and make sure that we did well". That man is doing well. I know people in other sectors of the economy who are in fact expanding now. They are hardy souls, and I think most businessmen in Canada are hardy souls, and they are working at it.

Therefore, I say that the small business investment grant will help not only those in northwestern Ontario but all those across Canada who look for a silver lining as well, those who look forward to making their businesses better and more competitive and are anxious to take advantage of the help which is inherent in this sum of $400 million which will be put at their disposal. They are anxious to put it to work. I say, "Thank goodness for the small-businessman because he is our hope now and in the future". The amount small-businessmen spend of this money in order to add some modest extension to their businesses or to do some meaningful research to help them grow will have a tremendous spin-off effect. This is because one small-businessman who does something leads to another small-businessman having to do something else. It is just another small cog in the wheel which is starting to turn toward progress, but we will not make progress if we steadfastly cling to the idea that there is no hope. What I think, conclusively, is that there is hope. Bill C-136 offers more hope at least to one small segment of the business community which will take advantage of it. This, combined with many other initiatives is in fact what will turn things on more and more.

However, there is one other aspect upon which I would like to comment briefly before I sit down. This particular Bill is part of the ongoing consultative process between business and Government.

An Hon. Member: It is a band-aid.

Mr. Masters: Well, it may be a band-aid, but it may also be another brick in the construction of a new and better Canada as we go on to a better economy, and I do believe we are going that way. I would simply like to tell all Hon. Members in the House and to people across the country what is the difficulty with the consultative practice, because I sat down some time ago with eight businessmen. I might say that none of them were particularly of my political persuasion, so they were not friendly guys or nice guys. They said, "The trouble is that no one listens." So I listened to them and they suddenly began, in this consultative process, to say to me, "We now see the difficulty. We cannot agree among ourselves, but we have come to this common denominator or thought, and that is, we had better at least try harder to come to a consensus among ourselves and we had better try to work better, not only with government but with each other as well".

I think that is a message for the whole country, and the message is simple. We must begin to accentuate the positive. We must remember that the country will make progress if we work together, if we think together, if we become more conscious of one another as Canadians. I think the Government has the message well in mind when it introduces legislation such as the small business investment grant, which will indeed help small businesses across the country carry out meaningful research and expand. To me, it is another item of encouragement to the country. I think I will now sit down because I know all Hon. Members want to see the Bill put through the committee stage as quickly as possible.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

NATIONAL HOUSING ACT (NO. 2)

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. André Ouellet (for the Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2) be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, surely we are going to ear from the Minister responsible for this legislation. Surely he will explain it.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I would like to inform the Hon. Member that thanks to the exceptional level of co-operation shown by the parties in the House this evening, the bill just approved by the House was put through faster than we expected. We have been in touch with the office of the minister who is on his way to the House to speak on this bill. If the opposition has any members who wish to speak on the bill, they can start right away, and as soon as the minister arrives, he will of course take part in the debate.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure the Government would like us to bail it out again. But here we are confronted, astoundingly, with a situation where a Government has been calling for co-operation, calling for that kind of atmosphere in the House of Commons which will assist the Government to get its program through, and we have been delivering that co-operation. Yet here we have a Government in such disarray that its own Minister responsible for the Government's own legislation is not here to introduce it. Surely there must be some responsible minister of the Crown who has been in communication with the Minister Responsible for Housing who can explain this Bill. If not, I would suggest that perhaps the Government might consider the House rising until such time as the Minister responsible for Housing gets here to explain the Bill, which he is supposed to do himself.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member is taking advantage of a situation that has developed very quickly. The advantages of this bill are well known on both sides of the House, and we believe that this legislation can be considered without necessarily having speakers taking part in the debate in order to describe the advantages of the bill. If the Hon. Member wishes to take part in the debate and consider the substance of the bill, he is entirely free to do so. We shall listen to him, and as soon as the minister arrives, he will rise in the House to take part in the debate. Otherwise, if everyone is agreeable to passing the second reading stage of the bill, all we need is a vote, followed by referral of the bill to committee for consideration.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I have never heard of such an outlandish suggestion from any Minister of the Crown. The normal practice in this House, when legislation is introduced, is to have the Minister who is responsible for it introduce it. Indeed, ordinarily the motion putting it before the House is in his name. The Minister who has just resumed his seat had to stand in for that process.

Our critics on every piece of legislation that has gone through tonight have been here and ready to speak. Our critic, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), is here tonight ready to respond to the Government whose spokesperson should be the Minister responsible.

Mr. Chrétien: No.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister of Energy said no. He is quite wrong. He would certainly have his Parliamentary Secretary here at least to introduce legislation. We do not even have that. If the Government is not prepared to proceed with the business that it laid upon us last Thursday, given the co-operation from this side of the House, then the Government should consider the House rising until such time as the Government can get the appropriate Minister here.

[Translation]

Mr. René Cousineau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I could usefully add a few words at this stage. In preparing for the debate on Bill C-136, I negotiated with the opposition critics. I spoke to the member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow), and he mentioned that he and another member of the New Democratic Party would be speaking on the bill. I also met the hon. member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer), and the conclusion was that five or six members of the Progressive Conservative Party would be speaking. We are indeed thankful for their co-operation, but in fact, it worked too well, and as a result, the Minister responsible for Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) is not here in the House. If the leader of the opposition has another solution, I should be thankful to hear it, but the fact remains the minister is not here. I have tried to find out, and unfortunately I see there is no other speaker from the Progressive Conservative Party.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), on a point of order.

Mr. Blais: Bill C-135 is one of the bills on the Order Paper, as indicated just now by the parliamentary secretary. There has been a high level of co-operation, and the parties are aware of that, but as a result, the business of the House has progressed at a faster rate, and a bill has now been called that, for the time being, cannot be given second reading by the minister responsible. However, there are other items on the Order Paper which could be considered by the House and which are not directly related to Bill C-135. In fact, Mr. Speaker, one item is of particular interest to me, and I could give you some advice there. I am thinking of the Canagrex bill, which I feel is of vital importance, and if the opposition members were interested in proceeding with this bill, it is a piece of legislation on which there has already been some debate. We could therefore continue where we left off when debate on the bill was adjourned. Personally, I think this is extremely important legislation, because as you know, Mr. Speaker, and still on the same point of order, we were particularly keen on this bill and in fact, we were a little concerned that it might not get to third reading and be passed, when we adjourned for the summer, because—

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is obvious that the Minister, much to his discredit, is simply trying to waste time in the hope that the Minister will show up.

Mr. Blais: I know you do not like Canagrex.

Mr. Nielsen: The Minister said that we do not like Canagrex. We are waiting for it. We were told last Thursday that the business of the House would be as we have been dealing with it this evening. The Minister has not been ready. We have been ready. Parliamentary Secretaries get paid a handsome allowance to be here on behalf of their Ministers if their Ministers are absent. That Parliamentary Secretary is not even here. Either we get on with the business which the House Leader laid down, or the Government has one option, that is, to rise until the Minister responsible is here. We can then carry on with getting the business of the country dealt with.

• (2040)

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, our time is just as valuable as their time. We are here listening to a lot of idle chatter while a bunch of Liberals are chasing around like a bunch of lost sheep. Why don't you declare the House adjourned for half an hour?

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, you called Bill C-135. I informed the opposition that we were ready to proceed. We have no speaker. If the opposition does not have any speakers either, I suggest that we proceed immediately with a vote and that after the vote, we refer this legislation to committee. We have other bills that we can call and discuss afterwards.

[English]

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) rises on a point of order. I note, however, that the Parliamentary Secretary is in his place and is apparently seeking to be recognized.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, the Minister was talking about co-operation and all the rest of those things like trust and tradition that we have heard over and over for the past three, four or five days. I would like to say that the Minister responsible for Housing is not present. Through the good offices of the House, we have given second reading to Bill C-134 and Bill C-136. The Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) was up doing an excellent job of ragging the puck waiting for the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Malépart) to appear. My suggestion is that since the Minister responsible for Housing is not present, the presenter of the Bill is in no position, since he is not here, to present the Bill—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all due respect to the Hon. Member, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister responsible is in his place and seeks to be recognized. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the minister, it is with great pleasure that I invite all members of this House to expedite Bill C-135, whose purpose is to improve the Mortgage Renewal Plan. Mr. Speaker, more than 10,000 Canadians have applied under this program, upon renewing their mortgages, and the purpose of Bill C-135 is to provide two amendments that will improve the mortgage renewal process for thousands of Canadians, who are hoping that this legislation will be passed as soon as possible and that at last they will be able to take advantage of what this legislation has to offer.

You may recall that under the former program, the rule was that for people to be eligible for the special mortgage rate, their mortgage payments had to exceed one third of their gross income. The new amendment, in addition to extending the program for one year, will make these people eligible for a grant, even if interest rates have gone down, while the rule of spending more than 30 per cent of their income on mortgage payments is maintained.

Mr. Speaker, considering the importance of this bill, and the fact that thousands of Canadians are hoping to receive their cheques, I would urge all the members of this House to pass this legislation as quickly as possible. Members should also recall that in addition to its job creation programs, the Canadian government also has a number of other programs including the Canada Rental Supply Plan, the First-Time Buyer's Plan and also the Home Renovation Plan, which provides funds of up to $3,000 for people who wish to renovate their homes.

Mr. Speaker, I shall stop here, since this bill is so important that it should be passed as quickly as possible for the benefit of thousands of Canadians. According to the figures of the CMHC, over 10,000 Canadians have applied under the program, and I therefore invite hon. members to pass this legislation, which will be beneficial for all Canadians.

[English]

Mr. McGrath: Mr. Speaker, certainly the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Malépart) has just earned his salary for the year. That was a valiant attempt at explaining a bill. With all due respect, the Parliamentary Secretary obviously was not briefed. However, since the Minister is now in the Chamber, I am prepared to defer to him. Before doing so, I want him to know that I was fully prepared to on his behalf and explain the Bill to the House, which obviously the Parliamentary Secretary could not do.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I really apologize to the House. It is nobody's fault. Our telephone systems are being changed to reflect the move from place to place, and that is what happened.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. My colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath), has been gracious enough to defer to the Minister. It is only fitting and proper. However, it should be clearly understood that he will be entitled to respond after the Minister has concluded.

Mr. LeBlanc: Mr. Speaker, I hope to abbreviate my remarks. I am very pleased to have the opportunity of explaining this legislation to the House. The proposed legislation makes some modifications to the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan which was first introduced in the budget of November 12, 1981. It might be useful if I took a few moments to explain the details.

Hon. Members will remember that when it was first introduced, it offered assistance to home owners who are having difficulty renewing their mortgages at high rates of interest. The assistance was available to those people whose mortgage payments on renewal would amount to more than 30 per cent of their income. That is very much the principle involved here. It is of assistance to those having to pay more than 30 per cent of their income. At that time it was felt that for people who had substantial equity in their home, the original plan would offer a guarantee of up to $3,000 if the lenders would agree to defer interest payments. In the case of people who had no substantial equity and were paying out more than 30 per cent of their income in mortgage payments, there was an outright grant of up to $3,000.

In the intervening months if became evident that in the uncertain economic climate of the time, many Canadians felt that deferring interest payments on their mortgage was perhaps not the best solution to their personal financial problems. The demand for interest deferral guarantees was not as great as expected, even taking into account that interest rates had already begun to decline.

This feeling was particularly strong in parts of the country where house prices have begun to drop and the home owners' equity was being reduced.

Responding to the changing circumstances, the former minister of Finance, in his budget statement of June 29, announced that the interest deferral aspect of the plan would be eliminated. In future, all those borrowers who qualified for assistance under the plan would receive an outright grant, regardless of how much equity they might have in their home. All those who until that time had qualified for an interest deferral guarantee would receive the grant instead. The Bill now before us gives effect to the changes that I have described.

The principle of this legislation has been debated at some length and approved by the House on previous occasions, that is, the idea of providing assistance to people who may be in danger of losing their homes, giving them some breathing space in which they can make some adjustment in their financial arrangements. There are no new principles involved in this Bill. The intention is the same, and I hope that members on all sides of the House will agree to deal with it expeditiously.

There is, in fact, some urgency to put this legislation into effect. Since June 29, CMHC has approved $3,000 grants for more than 6,000 families, but cheques cannot be sent to them until this amendment to the National Housing Act has been approved by Parliament and proclaimed. This number includes not only people who have applied for assistance since June 29, but some 2,000 persons who were qualified before that date for interest-deferral guarantees and are now to receive the grants instead.

I would like, at this stage, to express a word of appreciation to the financial institutions which are very much involved in the administration of this plan. Borrowers who wish to take part in it are asked to approach their mortgage lenders who will discuss their particular problem in detail and assist them in completing the application forms and forwarding them to CMHC. I am assured by my predecessor and the officials at CMHC that the lending institutions, banks, trust companies, credit unions, caisses populaires, and the like, have been most co-operative and have generally been very anxious to help borrowers to arrive at a solution which would help them to keep their homes.

I think we can all take some satisfaction that the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan has not been used as much as we had anticipated nearly a year ago when interest rates, as Hon. Members well know, were at an historic peak. The fact remains, however, that the plan, in its proposed improved form, is still there for people who are truly in need.

As the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has indicated, a realistic projection of the economy for the year ahead indicates that although the inflation rate will drop, the number of those in the work force who will be without jobs will remain high. These circumstances will inevitably create problems for some families in managing their mortgage payments. I hope that, in these circumstances, borrowers will discuss their situation with their mortgage lenders to discover whether the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan can be useful to them through the hard times or whether some other arrangements can be arrived at which will help them to keep their homes.

If I emphasize home ownership in these remarks, it is because that is the subject of the Bill before us, assistance for mortgage renewal. At the same time, I would like to make it clear that the Government's concern is for the housing of all Canadians, whether they occupy it as home owners, as tenants, or by some other form of tenure.

With these remarks, Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the Hon. Members opposite for their courtesy, and again apologize for my tardy arrival, which I hope will be corrected because the telephone assistants are hard at work at the moment.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): First of all, Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate my old friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) who is responsible for Housing on his first Bill in this House. I know he will bring to this portfolio the same degree of dedication which he had in his previous portfolio. Having said that, I know the Minister does not expect to get off without having addressed the real problems facing the housing industry in this country, namely, that of availability, affordability and the acute decline in housing starts. We supported this Bill, the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, when it was first introduced to the House, and at the time we raised very serious reservations about the limitations which where placed on it at that time. The Government has now come to recognize the validity of these criticisms and is in fact extending the application of the Bill. That is the least they could do, given the circumstances under which this Bill is introduced. I am sorry the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Cosgrove) is not in the House because he is largely responsible for the mess that the Minister of Public Works responsible for Housing has inherited. I would have liked to have heard the Minister make some reference to the recommendations of the Lortie Committee, the famous blue ribbon committee which was supposed to address the keystone of the Government's housing policy, namely, the provision whereby they would reduce mortgage interest rates anywhere from 4 per cent to 6 per cent.

That provision, as Hon. Members know, was turned down by the Lortie Commission. They recommended against it because of the distortions it would have on the marketplace. But it is well to put on the record what the former minister responsible for housing said with respect to that measure when he spoke on "The Nation's Business" on Sunday, July 11, 1982. With respect to the deliberations of the Lortie Committee, he said, "the Canadian Government will implement a system for providing loans at 3 to 6 per cent below the market rate to ensure your long-term security". There were no if's, and's or but's, no qualifications. There was a firm, unequivocal commitment to proceed with the implementation of that measure. Indeed, when the former minister of finance brought down his June budget and introduced this measure, he said at the time, and I believe I am paraphrasing him correctly, when he referred the measure to this committee, that he could not conceive of a situation whereby the committee would recommend against the implementation of that measure. In addition, the former minister said in an interview in The Toronto Star, again in July: "There's no question of chance. The plan will be implemented. The Government is committed to it."

We know of course now from the new Minister of Finance that they are not going to proceed. They are going to recommend that the recommendations of the Lortie Commission be accepted because of the disruptions the plan would have on the market place. And I say, rightly so, because, again, we cautioned the Government on the way they were proceeding in terms of restricting the application of the mortgage reduction scheme to new houses.

The reason I raise that at this particular time is because what the Government proposes today will not go very far in addressing the problem. Indeed, to use an old Parliamentary cliché, I would not even describe it as band-aid treatment. What is the situation the Minister has inherited? The bad news for August: housing starts during August were at a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 87,000 for all areas, when we should have for the year somewhere in the vicinity of 220,000. I refer the Minister to the actual housing starts for the end of the third quarter for all areas of Canada which stood at 88,950. At that rate we will be lucky if we get to 130,000 at the end of the year when we actually need, according to the figures provided to us by CMHC, somewhere in the vicinity of 220,000 starts just to keep abreast of demand.

What does the Government propose to do instead of the mortgage reduction scheme which was turned down by the Lortie Commission to provide some degree of security to those potential home buyers who are looking at the marketplace, looking at the fluctuations in interest rates? Take a look at what has happened over the past year. Canadians are in no way encouraged to enter into a mortgage agreement, because God only knows what is going to happen in the months ahead. There is no security against cyclical fluctuations in interest rates such as have plagued the industry for the past year. That is what the Government intended to address in that measure. It is interesting that the Minister said, in order to provide for your long-term security the Government will implement a scheme to reduce mortgage interest payments. I say to the Government it should have made that program universal in its application. If it had done so by way of a tax credit or tax deduction, it would have provided the real and immediate stimulation to the housing industry to get housing starts up to where they should be. That move, Sir, would be a matter of enlightened self-interest because when we talk about the unemployment situation in the country today, we should do so in the context of the housing crisis.

We have unemployment somewhere between 12 per cent and 13 per cent. Over 1.5 million Canadians are unemployed. Yet both the Minister and the Government know that one way of addressing the unemployment problem in a very meaningful way is to address the housing crisis. Housing is a very labour-intensive industry, an industry capable of providing 2.5 jobs for every housing unit started in the country, and capable of producing anywhere from $6,000 to $10,000 per unit in Government revenues. Why the Government has not proceeded to make this plan universal in its application just boggles the mind. I do not believe the Government can hide behind the excuse that interest rates are down right now. No one, certainly not the Government, can assure us of just how long that situation will last.

When we speak of the housing crisis, Mr. Speaker, we are talking in terms of not only housing starts and availability, but affordability. One of the concerns I have, and this certainly will be brought to the Government's attention in the committee stage of this Bill, is that of the Canada Rental Supply Plan. That plan was to produce 30,000 rental units by providing long-term interest free loans. We know, Sir, that up to October 26 there had been only 7,814 applications. I repeat, applications, and it is important to make that distinction because if this represented 7,814 starts, that would be significant. But these are merely applications. We do not know how many actual starts there are. I suspect the number is probably significantly lower than the 7,814 applications out of 30,000. That means, of course, that builders are just not taking advantage of this program. The reason for that, Sir, is the market place, rent controls, because of the wide disparity between market rent and economic rent. Given costs today, given the return a developer can realize on rental units, it is just not economically feasible for him to proceed, interest-free loans notwithstanding.

I suggest to the Minister seriously that he should give consideration to scrapping the Canada Rental Supply Plan and putting that money into co-op housing as there is a real need for low-income housing right across the country. That money would be taken up very quickly and it would provide a quick stimulation to the industry and badly needed low-cost housing to Canadians right across the country. Why the Government has not moved in this direction, Mr. Speaker, is very difficult to understand. I hope the Minister, when he speaks to the Bill in committee, will address himself to that problem. Certainly we are in a serious situation.

In addition to the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan, all the Government offers is the Canadian Home Ownership Stimulation Plan and the Canada Home Renovation Plan. That, Sir, is not going to come close to addressing the problems we are facing in the nation today. Indeed, let us take a look at the Canadian Home Ownership Stimulation Plan whereby the Government provides $3,000 grants to first-time home buyers. As of October 22, 1982, CMHC had approved 63,862 applications. This figure includes 22,495 applications for new housing and 41,367 applications for existing homes. In other words, less than half the grants were used for new housing. In other words, the program designed to stimulate new housing is not in fact having that effect. As far as the Canada Home Renovation Plan is concerned, the $3,000 grants under this program were to be directed to those individuals who wanted to convert some portion of their home into an apartment unit for a relative or an in-law or what have you, and that would go a long way to filling a need. In other words, it would provide affordable housing for young people just starting out or for elderly people, or what have you. However, it still remains restricted and the shortcomings of the program are not addressed by this Bill. Consequently, we will not have an opportunity to move on it by way of amendment. But certainly we will have a chance to ask the Minister to address these problems when it gets into committee.

I want to assure the Minister it is our intention to co-operate with him to get this Bill out of the House and out of committee as expeditiously as possible. I say that with some reservations because we do want to take the opportunity to hear from the Minister and CMHC officials and, hopefully, from people in the industry as to just exactly how they view the situation out there.

Mr. Doug Anguish (The Battlefords-Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be able to address a few remarks to Bill C-135, the amendments to the National Housing Act. This Bill is intended to implement the June budget changes to the housing measures originally announced in the November budget. The Bill does a couple of things. First, it changes the term of the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan so that homeowners with monthly mortgages and property tax payments in excess of 30 per cent of the gross family income will qualify for a $3,000 grant rather than interest deferral. Formerly, only homeowners with less than 5 per cent equity in their homes and with payments in excess of 30 per cent could qualify for these grants. Other homeowners would have had only the option of deferring interest, which would have been added on to their principal and the deferral would have to have been guaranteed by CMHC. Since it was almost impossible to qualify for the grant, the Government did in fact change the terms of the plan to allow some homeowners to in fact qualify for this program.

Secondly, the amendments to the National Housing Act will provide an extension to this plan for a second year. Originally, the plan was to terminate on November 12, 1982 but the June budget has extended it to December 31, 1983. In terms of the National Housing Act, I would acknowledge that these changes are an improvement, but still, they do not address the real problems of housing in Canada today. There are no changes in areas where they are so necessary such as rental housing, co-operative housing and low-cost housing which is so necessary at the present time.

In the City of Winnipeg there is a problem which I am sure exists in many other areas of the country as well. Through a program called Limited Dividend Housing, private investors have received large government subsidies to enable them to build lucrative rental units. One of the conditions of the subsidy was that any application for rental increases would have to be approved by CMHC. It bothers me that in the City of Winnipeg, as was pointed out by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James (Mr. Keeper), and I am sure this has happened in other areas of the country as well, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has allowed rental increases well beyond the six and five that we are supposed to be adhering to at the present time. I am bothered that the Government can make the plan apply to some people, but that others who do not wish to comply with its conditions do not have to do so. That is unfair and unjust. The Hon. Member for Winnipeg-St. James says that we should make them roll back the rent increases to comply with the six and five program, and I think he is right.

The rental housing that was supposed to have been supplied under the Canada Rental Supply Unit Plan provided in Bill C-89, and was supposed to come into effect earlier this year, promised 30,000 rental starts. In fact, by October this year less than 25 per cent of that number had been committed by CMHC. Out of the 30,000 rental units allocated in March 1982, only 7,341 had been approved by CMHC as of October 4. I am concerned about this because of the high cost of rental accommodation in the country and the low vacancy rates in many areas.

The Government's approach with Bill C-135, is symptomatic of its tendancy to apply band-aids when new systems are needed. I hope that the Minister responsible for CMHC will read the comments I make tonight and, as a result, will ask officials in his Department to look into the feasibility of the proposal I am about to make.

Canadians find themselves in an increasingly difficult position if they want to own their own home, Mr. Speaker. I see nothing wrong with people renting a home, living in co-op housing or low-cost housing all their lives. An expectation has been built up in our society, however, that people may own their home, but that ideal is rapidly becoming out of reach for most people. When my grandparents lived on the farm they built their house for very little. When I bought my house in The Battlefords, it cost a great deal. In fact, many people of my age will have to spend one-third of the income they would expect to earn in a lifetime, to provide shelter for their families. If things continue in this way, then in my children's time or in my grandchildren's time, housing may not be affordable at all.

Instead of applying different methods to the same system, I think we should consider different systems by which people could own their homes. I should like the Minister in charge of CMHC to ask his bureaucrats to consider developing a program through the high schools which would teach young people how to build their own homes. I have mentioned this before and some people think the suggestion of a course in building as a mandatory part of education, is rather far-fetched. But unless something like this happens, Mr. Speaker, in years to come only the elite in our society will be able to afford to own a home.

If such a program were developed by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation and the Provinces were encouraged to include it in their educational system, it would go a long way toward helping people to provide shelter for themselves. If we had a course called "How to Build a House"—and that is a simplistic way of putting it, I suppose—as part of our educational system, then when people graduated from school or university and entered the working world where they would have to shift for themselves without much help from the Government or from their families, they would have three options. First, those people who could not afford to buy housing would at least be able to put their "sweat equity" into it. All they would require would be the materials which they would acquire by the means available to them. Second, those people who quite often are taken advantage of by housing programs or fly-by-night contractors, could supervise the quality control of their homes as they are being built. Possibly, in their free time they could also put in some "sweat equity" toward the downpayment for the house. Third, another group of people who could afford to buy under the present system, could have the housing contractor build the house for them.

In the future, I think such a system could give us the best of all worlds or at least a better housing system than we have at present. The day is rapidly coming when the present system will not work, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works.

CANAGREX

MEASURE TO AMEND

On the order: Government Orders:

Resuming consideration of report stage of C-85, An Act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thought the Government would try something sneaky, just as it is trying now. First of all, I should like to say that the Government asked for co-operation to get the budget legislation through. Three Bills have been put through today, so that is co-operation in spades.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: That kind of co-operation does not deserve a sneaky end run to try to get around the business of the House that was established last Thursday by the Government House Leader. It would have liked to do that a few moments ago, when the Minister responsible for Housing was not here. Indeed, he was almost half an hour late. I would refer the Chair to Page 20114 of Hansard for last Thursday, October 28, where the Government House Leader had this to say:

• (2120)

Madam Speaker, until further notice, the business of the House remains unchanged as far as today, tomorrow, Monday and Tuesday are concerned. Yesterday, I asked the House to wait until today for further details about our business for next Wednesday and Thursday. So, today, we will start the debate on second reading of Bill C-128, a measure to provide the government with supplementary borrowing authority. Tomorrow will be the second day of this debate, which should end next Tuesday by 9.45 p.m. Both Monday and Friday next week—

I am referring to the wrong Hansard.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Don't get excited.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I would like to interrupt the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) because I am referring to the wrong Hansard as well. I do not know if the Hon. Member wants to raise a point of order with respect to the legitimacy of the presentation by the Clerk of Bill C-85, or whether it is some other point to which he wishes to address himself.

Mr. Nielsen: Perhaps you could listen to what I have to say.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Yes, I will certainly listen but there is a point which perhaps the Hon. Member might want explained. I wanted to advise the Hon. Member for Yukon and the House that there will be Royal Assent at 9.45 p.m., I am informed by the Table. I thought he would want to take that remark into consideration in his planning.

Mr. Nielsen: It is not the Opposition which has to get its act and its plan together. It is the Government which has to get organized with respect to its plan. It does not have its act together in the country, and it looks as if it did not have its act together in the House.

I was translating from the French edition of Hansard; that is why I got on to the wrong date.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Turning to page 20397 of Hansard for November 4, the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) said:

Madam Speaker, it is correct to say that today we will commence second reading of Bill C-134—

And so it went for that week. Concerning this week's business he said:

As far as the business of the House for next week is concerned, on Monday and Tuesday we shall continue debate on Bill C-134, respecting rebates of interest on farm loans—

He was referring to today and tomorrow. That Bill the Government now has. He continued:

—Bill C-136 which is aimed at assisting small businesses with interest payments—

That Bill the Government now has. He continued:

—and finally, Bill C-135, which provides assistance for home owners.

That Bill the Government now has. He went on to say:

Thus, next Monday and Tuesday, depending on this week's progress with consideration of these bills, we shall continue consideration of the bills in the order mentioned. Next Wednesday—

As far as the Government's order of business is concerned, that is where we are at right now. He continued:

—again depending on our progress with Bill C-134, Bill C-136 and Bill C-135, we may decide to consider two bills which, for technical reasons and also because of Canada's international commitments, are extremely urgent, and I am referring to Bill C-129 regarding the Bretton Woods Agreements and Bill C-130, which concerns continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

Nowhere in that outline of business was Bill C-85 mentioned.

As the Government House Leader said last Thursday, if these bills, Bill C-129 and Bill C-130, are so all-fired urgent, let it bring them on as it said it would. The planning of the House depends upon the Government laying out the business, and the Opposition being prepared to meet that business in the ordinary course of debate. For the Government to try to sneak in an entirely different bill at this stage, instead of going ahead with the order of business laid out by the Government House Leader, dealing as it does, to use its own terminology, with "extremely urgent" bills, is just not good enough.

If the Government does the proper thing, it will now call Bill C-129, and when we have finished with that, it will call Bill C-130. I might say that if the Government would get on with it, it might find the same degree of co-operation which it has had all day with respect to the passage of its legislation that it considers so almighty urgent. I request that Bill C-129 be called now.

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has used the word "sneaky" with regard to the position the Government has taken tonight. There is nothing sneaky going on here at all.

We have been trying to deal with Bill C-85 for many, many months. To suggest that somehow we are sneaking it through when we consider the amount of time that the House has spent on it is a preposterous suggestion. There is nothing incompatible in what the Government is doing tonight with the statements made by the Government House Leader last Thursday to which the Hon. Member for Yukon has referred. We have dealt with those three bills.

It is true that they have been dealt with in a more expeditious manner than we had anticipated. If the Hon. Member for Yukon wants to describe that as co-operation, fine.

Mr. Nielsen: Don't you?

Mr. Smith: I agree that it is very co-operative and I welcome it. I regret that he has chosen to inject a tone into this debate which would suggest that something sneaky is going on. We will not do that, we will live up to our responsibilities.

Mr. Nielsen: Where is Bill C-129?

Mr. Smith: As soon as it was clear that we were moving things along, I advised the Table that we would go to Bill C-85. We have to adjourn tonight for Royal Assent at 9.45 o'clock. The Government is prepared to put up a speaker on Bill C-85, so it will not mean pushing it through tonight. I think that is quite a reasonable thing to do.

In so far as tomorrow is concerned, we will be dealing with Bill C-90, and on Wednesday we will be dealing with Bill C-129. I wish to advise the Hon. Opposition House Leader of that so that he can see how co-operative we are by giving him advance notice as soon as we know that things are moving along in a co-operative spirit and a little more quickly than we had anticipated. We welcome this move and look forward to much more of it.

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Mr. Speaker, on the question of co-operation, I think the epitome of co-operation has been displayed this evening. I for one in the Opposition am very pleased about it. We have moved the Government legislation along a few yards this evening. When the Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader suggested it to the Table and no one else that he would move forward to Bill C-85, it came as a complete surprise to Members of the Opposition. While he has informed the Table, one very important thing he overlooked was the opportunity to inform the Opposition. If one looks at the last musings of the Government House Leader last Thursday, as reported on page 20397 of Hansard, there is no mention of Bill C-85 coming up today at all.

An Hon. Member: They do not have the legislation ready.

Mr. Rose: I do not know whether the Government is ready or not on this business, but obviously it was not ready for many things this evening, judging by the colour of the face of the Minister of Housing when he ran into the Chamber, all red-faced and like a flamingo, to make his speech on housing.

It seems to me that we must be guided entirely by the honourable words of the Hon. House Leader as he spoke them last Thursday. There was not one mention of Bill C-85 at that time. When his Parliamentary Secretary informs the Opposition that he is prepared to deal with these measures, this Party will be prepared to deal with them as well, but we cannot do this sort of thing out of the blue at this time of night.

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I shall recognize the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Dionne) in just a second, if I may, since there are two or three things I must do first.

• (2130)

Before we go too far, I want to deal with the matter of Royal Assent at 9:45 p.m.

CANAGREX

MEASURE TO AMEND

On the order: Government Orders:

Resuming consideration of report stage of C-85, An Act to establish a corporation called Canagrex to promote, facilitate and engage in the export of agricultural and food products from Canada, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Agriculture.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will recognize Hon. Members if they will allow me to get to that point. Hon. Members have been addressing themselves to a point of order raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). I interrupted the Hon. Member to advise him of Royal Assent at 9:45. I did make passing reference to a problem as to whether or not his point of order addressed itself to the right of the Government or the Clerk at the Table to read Government Orders of the day at this point. Perhaps that is the very point to which the Hon. Member wishes to address himself, I do not know.

I do know that the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose) raised the same point. I would refer Hon. Members to Standing Order 18(2) which reads:

Government Orders shall be called and considered in such sequence as the government determines.

The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture, on a point of order.

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order, because on the other side of the House they seem to be saying that the government does not know what kind of legislation to introduce this evening. I may remind the Chair that for hours this afternoon, they have been accusing the government of doing nothing for Canadian farmers, in referring to—

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order. That is obviously political discussion. I recognize that other Members may wish to bring forth some points which would normally be called debate. However, I must address the point of order, or I have to see Hon. Members address the point of order, raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) and the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose). I think that point refers to Standing Order 18(2).

If it is a different point, I have already asked the Hon. Member for Yukon to clarify it for me.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I will clarify it if it needs any clarification. I have already read the record where the Government set the order of business last Thursday as is the custom in this place, where the Government House Leader said that Bill C-129 was of such an urgent nature that it had to be dealt with then followed by Bill C-130. Obviously, the Government has not been ready earlier this evening to deal with the housing legislation—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please.

Mr. Nielsen: Might I be allowed to speak?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Hon. Member is allowed, although he has twice now made comments which I think certainly approach a reflection on the Chair. There is a point of order on the floor. I have asked the Hon. Member whether it is to Standing Order 18(2) that he refers. I think it is a reasonable courtesy to ask the Hon. Member, who has now had a second chance at the same argument, to make himself clear. I would appreciate that.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I cannot be clearer than I have been. The Government has set order of business obviously, the Government is not ready and interference is being run. It is now 9:34. I therefore move:

That the House do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I will now have to take consultation as to whether the Hon. Member can make a motion of adjournment in view of the fact that I have read the matters relating to Royal Assent.

I must say that my inclination is to believe that a motion to adjourn overrules any other proceeding whatsoever. However, with matters proceeding in this direction, I will have to take consultation on this as well.

The Chair is advised that procedurally we are faced with a command of the Crown, and no order of the House will supersede that order. I will listen to such other Members of Parliament who may wish to raise some further argument in that regard. I wanted to advise Hon. Members what the advice being given to the Chair is.

Mr. Rose: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to cast any reflections on the Chair whatsoever. It is a very excellent Chair which is before us. However, since the Chair has asked for consultation, advice and comment, I would suggest that we cannot argue with Standing Order 18(2):

Government Orders shall be called and considered in such sequence as the government determines.

I do not think that there can be any serious argument mounted against that, except the one given by the Parliamentary Secretary last Thursday. The Parliamentary Secretary, in his outline of House business, last Thursday, did not even mention Bill C-85.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. There should be some consistency in the procedure. I have already indicated that the motion to adjourn would supersede any other proceeding. Therefore, if there is to be any debate, it would have to address itself as to whether or not the motion to adjourn is in order, or whether that motion must at least be delayed until Royal Assent.

I think that is the only issue which the Chair can now face. It may be that other points of order could be raised, but I think I have to address the motion to adjourn raised by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen).

Mr. Rose: I was going to say that that was just my preamble, Mr. Speaker. I intended to agree with the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) that the motion to adjourn the House was definitely in order because of the commitments given by the Government House Leader (Mr. Pinard) last Thursday. Because of the commitment that was given, the Opposition was put in a very embarrassing position over the action of the Parliamentary Secretary to that Minister and his action this evening, that is, tabling Bill C-85 for debate with the Chair without letting the Opposition know. Therefore, I support the Hon. Member for Yukon.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair would like to hear argument concerning the motion to adjourn. Even then, I am not certain how far argument ought to proceed on that point. I want to make it clear that I have alerted Hon. Members that I was advised by the Table that this is a command of the Crown and, accordingly, it must take place before an actual adjournment can take place.

I do not mean, in any way, to diminish the advice of the Clerks of the Table when I say that I still have difficulty with the advice. I cannot understand the logic of where we would go from here. It sounds as though we might have Royal Assent, to be immediately followed by a motion to adjourn. I would like to hear Hon. Members' advice in that regard.

Mr. Nielsen: Since it is my point of order, and since it is 9:39, we still have six minutes before Black Rod is scheduled to appear here. With great respect for the erudition of the Table and its personnel, my submission to you, Sir, is that that Royal command does not occur until we hear the three raps on the door and see Black Rod and hear his words summoning us from this place to attend in the other place. I think that is the only reasonable course that the Chair should follow, to put the motion now.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, in an effort to accommodate the other side, if Hon. Members are anxious to deal with Bill C-129 rather than go on to Bill C-85, if the House is prepared to give its consent—

Mr. Nielsen: Your Honour should not be hearing this.

Mr. Smith: —I believe that we could now go to Bill C-129. This, of course, would require that the House give its unanimous consent, because I believe Bill C-85 has already been called.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have warned Hon. Members several times that I have some very severe concerns with regard to any point of order or any debate which is not addressed to the one factor facing the Chair, that is, the motion to adjourn.

Mr. Nielsen: That is right. No debate is allowed on that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) did the Chair the service of referring to great respect. I will do the same for the Table. I mention the great respect with which I hold its advice. I have some problems with the idea that there could be an indication to the House of Commons at some hour during the day, and it could be at four o'clock in the afternoon, and that that proceeding indicating that there would be Royal Assent at 9.45, many hours later, would prohibit Hon. Members from their time-honoured right to adjourn the House.

Mr. Nielsen: No way.

Mr. Blaker: I do not see it. Accordingly, the motion to adjourn is acceptable. Call in the Members.

Mr. Nielsen: Well, perhaps—you have to put the—

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, before you make—Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have invited Hon. Members to address the point of order.

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, there was a request by you for guidance—

Mr. Nielsen: He has made his ruling.

Mr. Blais: —as to whether the particular motion which was moved by the House leader for the Opposition was proper, and Your Honour had expressed doubts at that time.

Mr. Nielsen: He made his ruling.

Mr. Blais: The Parliamentary Secretary to the House Leader rose and, in my view, he was going to address that point of order specifically. However, the point of order that he introduced in support of that particular consideration was not accepted by you, and he sat down. I sought your attention, Mr. Speaker, in order to be able to address the exact point which had been addressed by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen). Unfortunately, Your Honour did not recognize me in order for me to make that particular point.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blais: I would like to make, at this time, Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. If there has been an error on the part of the Chair, and I did not recognize the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), I will do so, but I will not allow his intervention to so operate as to give rise to another point of order or allow any other Hon. Member to make another point of order so that at 9.45 p.m. we can no longer consider the motion to adjourn. That would be completely intolerable, considering the adjournment motion put by the Hon. Member for Yukon. I will therefore recognize the Minister of Supply and Services but, procedurally, I can only recognize him on the issue of the motion to adjourn which is before the House.

[Translation]

Mr. Blais: Mr. Speaker, the point I want to raise is very simple. I was in the House at 9.31, when you rose to announce that you were waiting for an order from the Senate for us to go to the other House for royal assent to be given to bills considered and passed in this House. That is a royal command. Mr. Speaker, considering the fact that we were going to receive a command of the Crown to attend royal assent after consideration of the bills in this House, and considering the fact that the opposition House leader could be assumed to be, I would not say in contempt of the Crown, since I would not want to be accused of using unparliamentary language, but nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, this is very excessive, and I am sure that after due reflexion, the opposition House leader, once he realizes that he was unnecessarily excessive, will withdraw his motion. Mr. Speaker, it is up to you to decide, and you are in fact obliged to do so, whether a member of the opposition has the right to ignore a royal command.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. I shall accept the obligation described by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais), namely, that it is the Chair's responsibility.

[English]

I must be fair concerning the motion to adjourn. I cannot go on. There is a clear issue. Hon. Members know well the argument expressed by the Minister of Supply and Services that a Royal command cannot be abrogated. That is the procedural issue. Hon. Members in the House and I, myself, are well aware that it is considered to be an absolute rule that a motion to adjourn cannot be debated. I must choose between the one and the other.

Mr. Blais: Well, if it is properly put—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I find the motion to adjourn to be in order.

Those in favour will please—

Mr. Nielsen: Question!

Mr. Ouellet: Order, order!

Mr. Blais: That motion must be in order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Nielsen: The question must be put.

Mr. Ouellet: I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Just put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I want no Black Rod at the door. I do not want that to happen, causing that to be an interferring factor. Can that be arranged?

Mr. Nielsen: Just put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I regret to advise the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) that we have heard every aspect of the issue.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Ouellet: Question of privilege!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Does the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs argue that he has a contribution to make, in which case—

Some Hon. Members: No, no.

The Acting Speaker: We have heard those contributions. In order that there be no complaint, we will hear a last Hon. Member from the Government side. That will be the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. I will not tolerate any further contributions concerning the subject of the adjournment motion. I will recognize the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, thank you for allowing me to speak in this debate. I realize that the Chair is faced with a difficult situation and that it has to rule on the matter now. I do not think the Chair could have checked all the precedents in this respect, and I believe that before making a decision in this respect, the Chair should have found out whether there were any precedents that could provide some clarification. I think that when Hon. Members are summoned to the other House to receive a message from the Crown, they obviously have no choice but to accept the invitation. In fact, the invitation had been announced earlier, and obviously it is up to Parliament to allow for it and to avoid doing anything that might conflict with this invitation from the Crown. I believe that Hon. Members on both sides of the House have a responsibility to the Crown and that they should show respect for the Crown's invitation. I feel that in the circumstances, there is no alternative but to ensure that the business of the House continues up to the time when we go to the other House to receive the royal message. I believe that the Chair should have inquired about cases where a similar situation occurred in the past. I would ask him to read to us any precedents that may exist before ruling on the question.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair appreciates the advice of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. During his remarks, further research in order to seek out precedents was carried out and further advice was made available to the Chair. Therefore, that part of his suggestion or comment has already been followed. The issue remains the same, that is to say, either there is a Royal command which shall take precedence over a motion to adjourn, or a motion to adjourn shall take precedence over any other activity of the House. I put to Hon. Members the reasoning of the Chair, for whatever it may be worth in future months, years or days, as long as I may last, and that is, if—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): —not very long, I sometimes think. If the very notification to the House by the Chair of a Royal Assent were to be given at 3.30 in the afternoon, it would mean that the House would be deprived of its traditional right to have a motion to adjourn put and dealt with at any time during the remainder of the parliamentary day. I cannot accept the logic of that. The motion on the floor is that this House do now adjourn.

• (2150)

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the nays have it.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Motion negatived on division.

Hon. Members will be aware that the proceeding in hand, that of Royal Assent, is five minutes delayed.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Accordingly, Mr. Deputy Speaker with the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

• (2200)

And being returned:

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Honour, the Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General in the Senate, His Honour was pleased to give in Her Majesty's name the Royal Assent to the following bill:

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

FINANCE—SMALL BUSINESS ACCESS TO CREDIT

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are afraid, small business is afraid, the banks are afraid. The banks are tightening up credit markets, calling in loans—

Mr. Blaikie: The Tories are afraid.

Mr. Wenman: You are right, the Tories are afraid. The NDP is afraid. Canadians generally are afraid. They are afraid because business and jobs are falling and being lost around them again and again. As these credit markets tighten up, more real jobs are being lost and jobs that could have been created are not being created.

Banks are tight for money because, in conjunction with the federal Government, they are bailing out huge corporations that have proven themselves unsuccessful. How can we condone again and again and again corporations borrowing from the banks to bail themselves out, the Government guaranteeing those bailouts and further subsidizing them with extensive taxpayers' money?

One billion dollars for Dome Petroleum, $34 million for Maislin, millions more for Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson and Canadair tightens the money markets for small companies, making it impossible for them to borrow in order to sustain themselves in a cash flow crisis which at any other time would in fact not occur.

The reality is that as the consumptive market declines, as it has declined, consumption drops and cash flow falls with it. In spite of heavy inventories that many companies have, long records of successful borrowing and repayment, without that consumptive demand, as the cash flow falls and high inventories, we see a series of bankruptcies, and the number in fact increases. The Government attempts that solution again and again. The Government borrows more money; the Government taxes more. It takes more and more of the credit that should be available to small businesses. In effect, they have borrowed $21.2 billion so far this year. With a $23 billion deficit, they stand before us and threaten to borrow more.

The perverse practice of encouraging mismanagement and failure to the detriment of a healthy atmosphere for successful enterprise has caused severe damage to our industrial structure and economic fabric. We have become a guaranteed society rather than the just society promised by our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). The Government will guarantee everything for unprofitable ventures.

Mr. Blaikie: If you are big enough.

Mr. Wenman: That's right, if you are big enough—the big ones, the big guys. The little guys; forget it!

This type of corporate cradle to the grave—the NDP understand about cradle to the grave—dependency breeds its own insecurity. Corporations are not living by the capitalist Darwinism of competition because they know that they will not be rewarded, but that they will be rewarded for incompetence by a Federal Government bailout.

How many jobs will be lost? How many jobs will not be created because of this Government's policy? We are facing the worst unemployment since 1936. Unemployment is rising, and even more jobs are disappearing. Last year, 1,900 jobs a day disappeared, largely because of the record number of small businesses that went into bankruptcy. Unemployment is running at 12.7 per cent nationally and 14.2 per cent in British Columbia. Small business would help to alleviate these grim statistics by creating new and permanent jobs. In the United States in the past six months the number of people with jobs has grown by 209,000. In Canada, the number of people with jobs in the same period dropped by 269,000. While the U.S. is growing, we are losing, and they were ahead in the race, to begin with.

If small businesses are not allowed access to credit, to expand, prosper and create jobs, how will Canadians find fulfilment in the work ethic that is inherent and vital to our culture? What is the Government doing to create real jobs? There is a great difference between real jobs and community development programs which create temporary jobs which may last 20 weeks or some small part of a year and then disappear.

As for the $1 million that is provided to my constituency in these programs, which may create from 60 to 80 jobs, I wonder what would happen if we divided that evenly, even in $10,000, $50,000 or $100,000 grants to a few individual, permanent businesses in our riding, businesses which would create real jobs. I have many examples of these businesses in my own riding.

One particular constituent had a proposal to computerize automobile repair facilities. That sounds like a good idea. He intended to capitalize on the high tech revolution. He proposed to create five real jobs. That may not be very many, but the needed capital was not forthcoming from the FDB, in spite of the inventory, and assets of this gentleman. The Bank asked about the cash flow. This in fact, would indicate that a guarantee is needed, with support for that small business.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time allotted to him has expired.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): I am pleased, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member is using Standing Order 40 to express his concerns this evening. I have read the Hon. Member's question of October 29 and I listened to his remarks tonight.

The Hon. Member for Fraser Valley West (Mr. Wenman) states a concern for jobs lost as a result of his assumption of reduced credit availability, but he completely ignores the negative employment consequences which would have arisen had the companies he mentioned, Dome, Maislin, Chrysler, Massey-Ferguson, and so on, not received financial support. Had there been no support for these companies, the Hon. Member would have been the first one to stand in his place tonight and complain that the Government was responsible for the resulting job losses.

Secondly, the Hon. Member makes no mention of the interest rate relief programs which were introduced over the last year to ease the burden for farmers, small-businessmen, first time home buyers and mortgage renewers. These programs have gone a good distance toward easing the pressures on these borrowers during very difficult times.

Most importantly, however, the Hon. Member appears to have a confused notion of the mechanics of credit availability. He argues that the directing of funds toward support of certain companies will reduce the credit available to other borrowers and put upward pressure on interest rates. What he has failed to mention, Mr. Speaker, is that during part of the period that this financial assistance occurred, the bank rate dropped some 500 basis points from its peak in June. Mortgage rates are also down 500 basis points and other interest rates are following suit. This decline in interest rates is obviously making it easier, not harder, to borrow.

Why has this happened? Obviously, interest rate developments in the United States have had an important impact on domestic interest rates. As well, an important determinant of interest rates, and therefore of credit availability, is the overall balance between the demand for and supply of funds in Canada. During the recession, private-sector borrowing in Canada weakened substantially and the personal-sector savings rose to historically high levels. The supply of loanable funds increased markedly relative to the demand, and this has helped put downward pressure on interest rates. Under these circumstances, the directing of financial support to the private sector, in amounts which are very small relative to the total supply of credit, has not influenced interest rates and has therefore no significant influence on the total amount of credit available to other borrowers, as the Hon. Member would like to lead Canadians to believe.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I find it very disturbing that the Hon. Member would try to instill this kind of fear and no confidence in our country rather than trying to build trust, co-operation and work together to build confidence in this country so that we can have a recovery.

PUBLIC WORKS—CONSTRUCTION OF MONTREAL POSTAL TERMINAL. (B) QUERY RESPECTING DIFFICULTIES DURING CONSTRUCTION

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Mr. Speaker, on June 29, this year, a minor official of Public Works in St. John's, Newfoundland, was sentenced to prison for one year for having taken à $800 kick-back. Clearly, Sir, our system of justice was quite efficient in this particular case. By coincidence, the next day, June 30, I raised questions in the House, with the then Minister of Public Works, concerning the multimillion dollar debacle at the Montreal postal facilities. The Minister promised an answer, while the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation said he had no indication that there was anything wrong. I later received a letter from the then Minister of Public Works who said, "problems have indeed occurred and have either been fully resolved or are in the process of resolution". That was a curious admission by the Minister.

On July 6 I asked more questions of the then Minister of Public Works. He changed his tune slightly and said he was looking into the matter, but he hoped that if the facts I brought out were incorrect I would apologize. Getting nowhere with the Minister, I wrote to the Auditor General on September 30, 1982 asking him to institute an audit of the construction of the Montreal postal facilities. On October 1 the Auditor General replied saying that he shared my concern about cost overruns on major projects. He also felt there was sufficient information on the problems associated with the project to enable appropriate action to be taken by those involved and those concerned. He recommended that the Standing Committee on Public Accounts of the House of Commons should proceed with an investigation.

Two days later, Mr. Speaker, I issued a press release again urging the Government to level with the public; if not, Members of Parliament should put additional information on the record. In the interim, Canada's daily newspapers had launched their own investigation and came to their own conclusions, calling the Montreal affair a "horror story" and claiming that millions were squandered. It appears that after four years of apparently intensive investigation by the Commercial Crime Branch of the RCMP, charges were laid against only three individuals who seem to be bit players. My concern, Sir, is with the main actors. Here are some major players and some questions to be answered.

How did a corporation named ABBDL and T. Pringle and Sons succeed, against the advice of the staff of Public Works, in securing a substantial contract—millions of dollars, Sir—as design consultants for the three postal terminal projects in Montreal? How were these design consultants able to claim up to 82 hours a week of work per employee performed on the project? How were the same design consultants able to claim $250,000 per month, each month, for the duration of the contract, over and above payroll costs?

How did a corporation named Techmont obtain a sizeable contract for soil studies at the sites, as it appears that this rather strange corporation had been created by the original directors of the design consultants who, of course, were ABBDL and so on?

Who bears the specific responsibility for making it possible to award work to a company named Claude Théberge and Associates who, on direct ministerial order, received a sizeable contract for interior design?

Who are the principles in the corporation named Signalis Inc., a corporation which was awarded a signage contract at the facility, in view of the fact that this corporation was a fully owned subsidiary of Claude Theberge and Associates and was created only three months before the contract was awarded?

• (2215)

I am not speaking about an $800 bribe, or a few thousand dollars, I am speaking of $50 million given—or paid—in the final analysis to these consultants—that is over $8 million more than the originally estimated total cost of the whole project.

Can the Department justify payments to Miron Construction of $162,000, Beaver Asphalt of $34,000 and Cegeco Construction of $343,000 for extra work done allegedly because of lack of knowledge of soil conditions when several contracts had been previously awarded to other companies to study these very soil conditions on the sites?

Who are the principals behind Shawinigan Engineering and La Société Dyname who were awarded, against the advice of the staff of Public Works, a sizeable contract, as project managers? There is also the question of the landscaping consultants, Schrieber-Williams with sizeable cost over-runs.

All of these are referred to, of course, in the report which was made available to The Globe and Mail in the spirit of the freedom of information legislation. That, at least, is a hopeful sign. The Public Works (Canada) follow-up audit of the map project in Montreal is where all these matters and others can be found.

I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but my time is passing so I shall close by asking what the political and legal responsibilities are of the consecutive Ministers of Public Works under whose direction and guidance these shenanigans took place. I refer to colleagues and former colleagues such as the Hon. Jean-Eudes Dubé, Hon. C. M. (Bud) Drury, Hon. Judd Buchanan and the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

Where is the element of accountability, where tens of millions of dollars are lost in the same way as over $100 million was lost in the Consolidated Computer debacle? Where is the element of accountability?

To paraphrase the infamous Dr. Joseph Goebbels, if you want to get away with a lie, it had better be a big lie. In the same way, if you want to get away with mismanagement and patronage, it had better be on a large scale. That appears to be exactly what happened here, to the detriment of the taxpayers of Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Claude Malépart (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to provide a more detailed answer to the question raised in the House of Commons by the member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay) on June 30, regarding a large postal establishment in Montreal. Before going any further, I may add that the Hon. Member received a reply from the Minister of Public Works at the time (Mr. Cosgrove), which reads as follows, and I shall quote the letter in English. I hope my hon. colleague will bear with my English which is less than fluent.

[English]

Dear Mr. MacKay:

Re: Metropolitan Area Postal Plant Montreal, P.Q.

I refer to your question in the House on June 30, 1982 concerning possible problems with the construction of the Metropolitan Area Postal Plant in Montreal, Quebec.

As you know, in the construction of any project of this magnitude it is inevitable that problems could occur in any of the multitude of activities inherent to such a complex project during its implementation. With regard to this specific project, problems have indeed occurred and have either been fully resolved or are in the process of resolution.

While it would be very time consuming and costly to gather the complex details of every problem, I would be happy to oblige you if you could be more precise as to the particular problem area of your concern.

Thank you very much for your interest.

Yours truly,

Paul Cosgrove.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in 1974 Treasury Board approved the appropriation of $161 million in 1974 dollars for the construction of postal establishments in the Montreal area. The entire project included a new mail-sorting centre in downtown Montreal, an annex to the Laval postal station and a new bulk-mail routing centre and mail-sorting centre in Ville St. Laurent. The Treasury Board authorization allowed for the inflation factor and called for an overall cost of $212 million, a figure that was to be used as the basis for all subsequent estimates connected with the project. As the project materialized, it was found on the basis of certain data that it would have to be expanded, which resulted in a certain amount of delay. As a result, a new authorization was obtained from the Treasury Board in 1977, establishing a new budget for $241.6 million, and this plus indexation raised the total estimated cost to $254.3 million.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I am sorry to interrupt the Parliamentary Secretary, but his time has expired.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS—TRANSFER OF REPAIR WORK FROM WINNIPEG TO MONTREAL

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Mr. Speaker, on September 24 Wilson Parasiuk, the MLA for Transcona and I wrote to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) to express our concern about CN's announcement the previous week that it was considering the consolidation of its passenger repair work at the Point St. Charles shops in Montreal at the expense of the Transcona shops in Winnipeg. We reacted strongly to this possibility because we had reason to believe that CN was not really considering the matter with an open mind, but had really already made up its mind and was just going through the motions.

On September 29 Mr. LeClair, the President of CNR, wrote a letter to the Minister of Transport, and shortly thereafter Mr. LeClair acknowledged our letter of September 24, saying that he had written to the Minister of Transport and that we would likely be hearing from him shortly with a more detailed response to our concern.

As of today, November 8, over six weeks later, we have yet to hear from the Minister of Transport directly. When I asked him about this on November 1, he seemed to indicate that he had no intention of ever answering our letter. Instead the Minister of Transport referred to a letter from Mr. LeClair which he said he sent out to all concerned about the issue, a statement which is completely untrue. He has never sent me anything on this issue at all. I can only assume that the letter from Mr. LeClair to the Minister of Transport, which the Minister falsely claimed he sent out, is Mr. LeClair's letter of September 29 that I did not receive from the Minister, but a copy of which I had the opportunity to study.

The letter tried to cover up what CN was really doing. It tried to explain the reduction of coach work in Transcona because of a general reduction in coach work across the system as a result of the VIA cutbacks. The truth is otherwise. What is happening and what is at issue is that the share of the passenger work which Transcona traditionally received is projected to be drastically altered in 1983 from 40 per cent to 5 per cent which as I see it is a transfer, not just an adjustment. Mr. LeClair and the Minister of Transport have never denied these figures. Instead they have hidden behind generalities about continued high levels of employment at Transcona and vague promises of expanded freight work.

In Mr. LeClair's letter of September 29 he talked about the expansion of the wheel shop and the program to build 300 woodchip cars at Transcona. What he did not say was that both these programs were near completion and that therefore neither of them would in any way compensate for the loss of coach work in 1983 or in subsequent years. Some 230 jobs will be directly affected and another 70 or so indirectly, for a total of 300 jobs. At least a hundred of these jobs—those of the sheetmetal workers, pipefitters, electricians and machinists—could not be replaced by expanded freight work. Even carmen would be affected because, contrary to the ignorant remark of the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) several weeks ago on this issue that there was no difference between upholstering a cushion and working on a boxcar, coach work is a source of preferred work for senior tradesmen. The Minister of Employment was invited to work under a boxcar for a while to clear his mind. In all likelihood he has never been inside a railway shop, never mind a boxcar.

There is a cover up going on. The Minister of Transport and the Minister of Employment are in cahoots with the new President of CNR who is determined to do to the rest of the railway what his predecessor did to CN Express and CN passenger service; that is destroy it, by forgetting that the railway is not like any other business and cannot be run just according to short-term profit margins. This is all the more reprehensible when it is being done by a Crown corporation.

What is even more reprehensible is the way the Minister of Employment is acting. He has deserted Winnipeg and is acting like a hypocrite, celebrating the new Air Canada facilities in Winnipeg while helping cover up this significant transfer of work out of Winnipeg; either that or he is a pathetic, ill-informed stooge of the CNR. In any case, it is about time he smartened up and got on side before we have a repeat of the Air Canada overhaul work transfer from Winnipeg to Montreal, a transfer for which this time he will shoulder most of the blame.

Does the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Flis) have anything to say in defence of his Minister? Does he have anything to say on this issue at all? We have not received any answers from anybody on this, and I am looking forward to seeing whether he will actually tell us something, or whether he will have a well-rehearsed statement designed to tell us absolutely nothing.

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in all fairness to the Chamber I should refuse to reply to the Hon. Member opposite. Any Member who stands and calls a Minister of this House a hypocrite and a stooge should be asked to withdraw those statements. I should refuse to answer the Hon. Member unless he learns some decorum in the House. However, for the sake of and in fairness to his constituents, I will give some response on behalf of the Minister.

The Hon. Member continues to express concern over the employment levels at Transcona, in spite of reassurances by the Minister and CN. CN has made it clear that Transcona is and will continue to be a vital facility for the railway. CN is investing to improve the facility. For example, a $10 million expansion to the wheel repair shop is under way, and CN expects employment and work levels to grow over the long term.

Mr. Blaikie: That is over this year already.

Mr. Flis: The recession has, of course, had an effect on the level of traffic, and hence on the amount of maintenance. Both railways have been put in a position to have temporary layoffs, but CN has and will continue to treat all its maintenance centres in the same way. It is not CN's intention to single out one of its facilities to bear the brunt of the effects of the recession.

The Hon. Member should know that the work done for VIA Rail at Transcona is only one of the many activities there. Some adjustments to the maintenance requirements for passenger cars may be necessary. However, any change must be seen in light of CN's assurance that it will have little impact on long-term employment levels at the Transcona shop.

Mr. Blaikie: You did not mention the coach work at all.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

SUGGESTED RE-EXAMINATION

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I bring to the attention of the House yet another example of misplaced priorities in Government spending. The Minister of National Health and Welfare is quoted as saying that thousands of impoverished elderly Canadians need at least another $25 a month to live on, but the federal Government just cannot afford to give it to them.

When the entertainment bill of this Government is $10 million per year, when $60 million is budgeted each year to translate documents, when Canadian Unity advertising is $3.5 million, I resent being told that we cannot afford to help out the people who built this country. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski):

That the Government re-examine its spending priorities with a view to eliminating waste and redirecting funds to areas where they are desperately needed.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

RETURN OF A LIBERAL

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, my motion relates to the Hon. Paul Hellyer and his latest deflection back from whence he came. After all, it is the Liberal's turn to have him and his wage and price controls. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis), that Canadians be made aware that:

Now he's back

As a Liberal hack,

Fingering his hat to throw in the ring

Whenever the Grits have their leadership thing,

Should he fall short in the delegates' sums

Watch out, Broadbent! Here he comes!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

ENERGY

REMOTE COMMUNITY DEMONSTRATION PROGRAM

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, in April, 1982, the then Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, with considerable fanfare and publicity, announced a new energy initiative called the Remote Community Demonstration Program with an allocation of $24 million. A few months later the same hon. gentleman, in his reincarnation as the Minister of Finance, drastically cuts back the program, this time without a single word said in public. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House condemns the Government for its sleazy Liberal trick of trying to bribe people with their own money and then secretly reneging on its commitments.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

DISARMAMENT

MUNICIPAL SUPPORT FOR "OPERATION DISMANTLE"

Mr. Lyle S. Kristiansen (Kootenay West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of importance. Over 75 per cent of the voters in 78 Ontario municipalities added their voices yesterday to earlier similar local expressions in four other Provinces and approved Operation Dismantle—promoted disarmament referenda, urging the federal Government to pursue actively new international initiatives designed to speed the pursuit of balanced general and nuclear disarmament. Their message is clear—now is the time for our politicians to act. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That this House, acting in response to the demands of the people as expressed by way of referendum vote, call on the Government of Canada to review its position immediately and press, in the United Nations and elsewhere, to urge the holding of a global referendum on general and nuclear disarmament as a first step in promoting a renewed and vigorous race for peace.

RECOMMENDATION THAT ABITIBI AIR CANADA SERVICE BE MAINTAINED

Mr. René Gingras (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the Quebec Minister of Transport has issued an ultimatum in which he indulges in a form of blackmail vis-à-vis the Government of Canada, when he says one of the reasons for Québecair's poor financial position is the presence of Air Canada in Abitibi-Témiscamingue; and whereas the people of the Abitibi area do not want to lose the Air Canada service, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Témiscamingue (Mr. Tousignant):

That the Minister of Transport of Canada (Mr. Pepin) refuse to authorize the phasing out of Air Canada's operations in the Abitibi area as suggested by the Quebec minister, Mr. Clair and by Mr. Gendron, the minister from Abitibi.

And second:

That the House give the Government of Quebec the assurance that clause 6 of Bill S-31, under which the Government of Quebec could be allowed to retain control of Quebecair, will be applied. Furthermore, that the reorganization of air services in Eastern Canada be dealt with immediately.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

LEBANON—PALESTINIAN REFUGEE CAMP MASSACRES

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy-Royal): Madam Speaker, September 15, 16 and 17 are infamous dates that will be etched forever in the black recent years of Lebanon's history because of the massacres in the Palestinian refugee camps of Sabra and Chatilla. As Canadians, we abhor the concept of man's inhumanity to man. That in today's world this sort of barbarism could take place is both reprehensible and repugnant. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That this House express its disgust for those forces that were responsible for this slaughter and urge upon them a policy of restraint so as to ensure that the innocent lives of men, women, children and babies will not again be taken in either revenge or malice.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this Motion?

MEDICAL CARE

INCREASED INSURANCE COSTS FOR CIVIL SERVICE PENSIONERS

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, in August the Department of Supply and Services increased, by more than 100 per cent, the non-hospital medical insurance costs to pensioners who have worked in the Public Service. For those wanting hospital benefits, the rates jumped by over 32 per cent. Given that the Government intends to restrict the increase in Civil Service pensions to 6 per cent as part of the six and five program, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Timiskaming (Mr. MacDougall):

That Cabinet immediately rescind this massive increase in supplementary medical insurance costs for Civil Service pensioners.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

SOCIAL SECURITY

SUGGESTED AMENDMENT OF FAMILY ALLOWANCE PROGRAM

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, extensive debate is now prevalent on the universality of the Family Allowance Program. Governments are reluctant—in fact they lack the courage—to tamper with the universality of social programs because of the political consequences. Nevertheless, it is single and widowed women in our society who suffer most because they represent by far the largest group of unemployed as well as those most in need of upgrading their skills. Therefore I move:

• (1410)

That the Government establish immediately a system whereby mothers now receiving family allowance cheques can voluntarily opt out from this social program provided that the moneys so saved are placed into a fund which is used exclusively for generating jobs and for upgrading the skills of single and widowed women.

I am sure the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) would like to second this motion, as would many Members of the Liberal Party, Tory Party and the N.D.P.

INCREASE IN CANADIAN FORCES BASE UTILITY BILLS

Mr. Doug Neil (Moose Jaw): Madam Speaker, whereas the Government has instituted a six and five restraint program and is encouraging the public to comply with these guidelines, and whereas utility bills at CFB Moose Jaw will increase 97 per cent effective December 1 next, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe South (Mr. Stewart):

That the Government cancel this exorbitant increase, practise what it preaches, and restrict increases in utility bills to comply with the five and six formula.

HUMAN RIGHTS

RELEASE SOUGHT OF IMPRISONED UKRAINIANS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise seeking the attention of all Members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the terms of Standing Order 43. Considering Canada's respect for human rights and fundamental freedoms, in view of the fact that the Conference on Security and Co-operation in Europe resumed in Madrid today, and in light of the fact that Ronald Reagan, President of the United States of America, designated November 9, 1982 as a day honouring the sixth anniversary of the establishment of the Ukrainian Public Group to promote the implementation of the Helsinki Accord, as Chairman of the Canadian Parliamentary Helsinki Group I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) and the Hon. Member for Edmonton East (Mr. Yurko):

That this House also designate today as a day honouring the sixth anniversary of the establishment of the Ukrainian Public Group to promote the implementation of the Helsinki Accord, and request that the Soviet Union release all the imprisoned members of this Group and cease the harassment and persecution of all those who are active in the defence of human rights, in compliance with the provisions of the Helsinki Accord.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

S.O. 43

PRIME MINISTERIAL APPOINTMENTS

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that just to pay the wages and pensions of Liberals now in the Senate will cost Canadian taxpayers over $70 million, more money in fact than will be spent by the federal Government on job creation in British Columbia in the coming year, in view of the fact that there are presently 15 vacancies in the Senate which would cost the Canadian public over $1 million more per year to fill, and in view of the fact that the Senate is a "Who's Who" of unelectable Liberal and Tory hacks and bag persons anyway, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant):

That this House unanimously agree that the Prime Minister should cease and desist from placing more hacks in the Senate, particularly unelected Ministers of the Crown, which is contrary to the spirit of democracy, and that those moneys that would go to senior Liberal hack welfare recipients at a rate of $1,000 per week be directed to those Canadians running out of unemployment insurance or in need of food.

THREATENED LAY-OFFS IN CAPE BRETON, N.S.

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, at Glace Bay and the Strait of Canso the threat of lay-offs hangs over the heads of a thousand pipefitters, welders, chemists and physicists, lay-offs that have been anticipated due to shrinking markets for at least a year now. The Government of Canada and AECL apparently have no plans to guarantee employment for these skilled, technical and scientific personnel in alternative industries, nor have any investment plans for alternative employment been announced. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Kootenay West (Mr. Kristiansen):

That this House demand that the Government meet with these people and make a serious financial commitment to filling the grave need for secure employment in Cape Breton and tell us why, with so many threatened with lay-offs, other people have been brought into Nova Scotia for the offshore oil and gas industries.

TRANSPORTATION

FUTURE OF QUÉBECAIR

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The minister is aware that unemployment in Quebec has now reached alarming levels, and that Québecair, a company that has been a transport carrier for thirty-five years, is represented here on Parliament Hill today, to ask the Minister of Transport whether he intends to make any proposals to save the company from bankruptcy. For a number of reasons, today, on behalf of the people from Quebec who are concerned about the unemployment rate in that province and who are afraid that 600 additional jobs will be lost, I wish to ask the minister whether he intends to bring this to the Cabinet's attention as soon as possible in order to try and find a way to safeguard the future of this carrier, a company that is very important to us in Quebec.

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Quebecair employees who were on the Hill today expressed their views and their concern, and they said clearly that they did not want this to become a political issue. I must say I agree with them on all counts. One of the Hon. Members on this side of the House presented a motion under Standing Order 43 which would have received the consent of the House if the official opposition had supported it, but in any case, Madam Speaker, I can inform the House that Cabinet met this morning and ruled that in accordance with Clause 6 of Bill S-31, Québecair would be exempted from the provisions of this bill as soon as they take effect.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER INTENDS TO MEET QUEBEC COUNTERPART TO DISCUSS QUÉBECAIR DIFFICULTIES

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, you will agree that my question is very relevant. Therefore, considering the answer given by the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, I would like to ask the Minister of Transport himself whether he intends to meet his Quebec counterpart with a view to finding ways of enabling Québecair to operate in a sufficiently wide area to ensure its viability.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, a decision just announced by my colleague proves that Bill S-31 was not aimed against Québecair and I think that should be quite clear now. The next step, as the member for Joliette said, is to sit down and see whether a merger cannot be arranged between Québecair and Nordair, something that has been discussed for a number of years. Now that the parties are aware of all the problems involved, there is a possibility that they will approach the matter more realistically than they have done in the past. I hope so, and I have invited my colleague at the Quebec Department of Transport to a meeting within the next few days in order to discuss the fundamentals of this case.

SUGGESTION THAT PROPOSED AMALGAMATION OF NORDAIR AND QUÉBECAIR BE RESTUDIED

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport has told us that he will be meeting with his Quebec counterpart, so perhaps the minister could inform the House whether he is also willing to reassess the proposal made on August 9 which mentioned Ontario and Quebec mergers with respect to Nordair. Could this proposal, which was rejected in August, be put on the agenda again for study and appropriate action?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have already answered that question, and I explained that the Snow-Clair proposal had not been received very enthusiastically by the various parties involved. First of all, Air Canada was to participate in the merger, but without voting rights, a condition that Air Canada did not find very attractive. On the other hand, Nordair employees were not very enthusiastic either, and furthermore, parties from the private sector in Quebec and Ontario were, it seemed to me, either not very willing or not able to make substantial investments in the company that would be created as a result of a merger. In other words, a great many people did not seem to find the Clair-Snow plan very attractive, and I therefore hope that we shall be able to take a more realistic approach, for instance, in discussing Air Canada's participation in the merger, as a voting participant and not as a participant who provides funds without having a say in how they are spent.

DOMESTIC AIR CARRIER POLICY

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, I was interested in the Minister's reply to my colleague. The Snow-Clair proposal involved private funds, and I do not understand the Minister saying that is was not received positively by private interests in Ontario and Quebec, since that was the whole basis of the proposal. If the minister has disregarded the Snow-Clair proposal to resolve this contentious issue, when is he going to make up his mind on domestic air carrier policy, on which a unanimous all-party report of the Standing Committee on Transport was tabled in this House last spring, which made recommendations which might resolve this issue?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there is no relationship between the Québecair problem and domestic air carrier policy. I have studied its recommendations on domestic air policy and I will be in a position in the next few weeks to react to the very important suggestions made by the Standing Committee on Transport.

An Hon. Member: We do not need a transport system anyway.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, a colleague behind me asks if we need a transportation system anyway. We certainly have a Minister of Transport who is almost utilizing his office against not just the committee but also against the CTC.

CANADIAN TRANSPORT COMMISSION

NOMINATION OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, now that the Liberal Convention is over, and the Minister must have talked to some good Liberals around Ottawa over the weekend, when is he going to nominate someone as chairman of the CTC so that at least the CTC can get back into transportation and not have the Minister running the whole show?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, my recommendations have already been sent to cabinet. If everything goes well, s'il n'y a pas de pépins, we should know the answer in about 15 days.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CF-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—U.S. CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence. We have just learned that Canada's new "Star Wars" fighter aircraft has flunked another performance test for the U.S. Navy. Not only that, but the U.S. House of Representatives Defence Appropriations Subcommittee reported that, in its opinion, the F-18 failed as a multi-mission aircraft because it is inadequate in its attack role.

In light of the F-18's poor report card and the fact that 70 per cent of Canada's planes are intended as attack planes, is the Minister still convinced that Canada's new $5.2 billion warplane is a good buy for the Canadian Armed Forces?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, it is not the first time that the F-18 has come under attack, and it has always won up until now. As for the Hon. Member's question, I think the article in the media today is like the articles we have seen on the CF-18 over the last three or four years. I think he knows very well that this report is related to the performance of the CF-18 during tests of landing on aircraft carriers. I can reassure the Hon. Member that we do not intend to buy an aircraft carrier. As far as the CF-18's that we have purchased are concerned, and the role that we bought them for, I can tell the Hon. Members that they are performing very well in tests at Cold Lake, much beyond the initial performance we expected from them on the last tests we had at Cold Lake.

Mr. Sargeant: Madam Speaker, one role of the F-18 is to serve as an attack fighter in Europe. The report of the United States Subcommittee has pointed out that it is inadequate as an attack plane. The minister has avoided that part of my question.

CHARGE THAT PERFORMANCE TEST WAS RIGGED

Mr. Terry Sargeant (Selkirk-Interlake): Madam Speaker, the Minister is, of course, also aware that the U.S. Defense Appropriations Subcommittee has charged that an important performance test was rigged by either McDonnell Douglas or the U.S. Navy, in order to cover up the F-18's limitations. Was the Minister aware of this rigged test, and will he now re-evaluate his decision to buy this high-tech lemon, before we sink any further into this quagmire?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member should be very cautious about stating that there might be rigging of a test report of McDonnell Douglas or a committee because, as far as I am concerned, I do not believe a word of it. I think the test results are faithfully reported, and I think McDonnell Douglas, and the program managers, and all the others that I have asked to give me full information about this subject, have been competent. When I receive the first test results, I can promise the Hon. Member that I will make it them public and he will then see that he is absolutely wrong about the CF-18.

EMPLOYMENT

ANNOUNCEMENT OF FIVE CONSTRUCTION PROJECTS IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister. Government Ministers have announced five badly needed, major construction projects for New Brunswick. They are a zinc smelter to be located in Belledune; a large correctional institution in Renous; a new divisional headquarters for the RCMP in Fredericton; a military training facility in Oromocto, and DND pay directorate for Chatham. Not one contract has been let for any of these projects.

May I ask the Acting Prime Minister if he will co-ordinate and expedite measures to bring forward these projects which his Ministers say are necessary and important, so that New Brunswickers can obtain badly needed work in the construction trades this winter? Is the Acting Prime Minister aware that, in some areas where these projects are to take place, 40 per cent of the labour force is unemployed, and does he care?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I could have named a couple of other projects in the same region, one of them being the Newcastle-Chatham port development, in my own Department. I know what I am doing with that particular project and I will inform my hon. friend about it, if he wants to know. All the other projects fall under other Departments. There will be a meeting of the Cabinet Committee on Economic Affairs in a few minutes. I will bring this matter to the attention of my colleagues and deliver a collective answer to my friend as soon as I can.

SCHEDULING OF PROJECTS

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I thank the Acting Prime Minsiter for his answers. I would draw to his attention the fact that the New Brunswick representative in the Cabinet has been removed from that Committee, and that is why I would ask him to pay particular attention to scheduling and co-ordinating these projects so that we can have work in New Brunswick that is desperately needed this winter, next winter, the winter after, and the winter after that. I am asking the Acting Prime Minister if he is going to give leadership to this country, or is he just going to pass the buck to another committee.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I presume that when my friend says "he" he refers to the Minister from New Brunswick. I can emphatically deny what the Hon. Member has just said. Only two or three days ago I had the Minister responsible for New Brunswick in my office at four o'clock in the afternoon. For a good period of time we discussed the particular issue I mentioned a moment ago, that is, the port facilities at Newcastle and Chatham. On the basis of his conduct toward me, on this and other matters, I can judge the Minister responsible for New Brunswick at the federal level to be quite aware of his responsibilities and to fulfil them in a very energetic fashion indeed.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

CF-18 FIGHTER AIRCRAFT—RANGE AND COST

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, my question to the Minister of National Defence is supplementary to the question put by the Hon. Member for Selkirk-Interlake.

The Minister spoke of the tests at Cold Lake from which he said they are finding more favourable results than had been anticipated. Have they, for instance, found that they underestimated the range, because the test in the United States shows it has a range of 450 miles? Have they found out that tests would indicate that it has a range greater than that at the present time?

Another of the findings of the U.S. committee has to do with the costs. Have they found at Cold Lake that the cost to Canada is now less than the $37 million in programmed costs per plane, compared to $23 million to the U.S. Navy?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as far as the first part of the question put by the Hon. Member for Victoria is concerned, the CF-18 has the proper and required range for the mission it has to fly in Canada and in Europe. We should not forget that the range which was questioned in the newspaper article referred to is the range that would be obligatory if the plane was to be deployed from an aircraft carrier. That is not the case with the Canadian CF-18.

• (1430)

As far as the second question about the cost of the plane is concerned, we know very well that the Secretary of the Navy in the United States, Mr. Lehman, stated that he had an agreement with McDonnell-Douglas that the plane should not cost more than $22.5 million. I remember that well. I assure the Hon. Member that our plane is not costing that much.

Mr. McKinnon: Madam Speaker, that is a ridiculous answer. The estimate for this plane is $5.2 billion. If that is divided in simple arithmetic by 138, it comes to approximately $37 million per plane; that is what it is costing us.

QUERY RESPECTING POSSIBLE CANCELLATION OF PROGRAM

Hon. Allan B. McKinnon (Victoria): Madam Speaker, the Minister boasted at Uplands Airport that 6,000 jobs would be created by this program. He knows that if the United States Navy cancels it, there will be no jobs and we will have the modern equivalent of the Bricklin motor car on our hands.

Mr. Beatty: The flying Bricklin.

Mr. McKinnon: Does the Minister know whether McDonnell-Douglas is now prepared to talk about a deal for the F-15 aircraft which would take into consideration the $750 million which has already been spent on this plane?

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, as far as the Hon. Member's reference to a ridiculous answer is concerned, I would say that his question was ridiculous; obviously he is not a flyer. When he asked the question as to the cost of the plane, I said that it was below $22.5 million as stated by the United States Secretary of the Navy. When we talk about the whole cost of the airplane, it includes weaponry, parts, and all that.

Mr. Epp: What about the wheels?

Mr. Lamontagne: He asked me what was the cost of the plane.

Mr. Clark: Did you include the cost of the wings?

Mr. Lamontagne: Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member should know—

Mr. Crosbie: What about the engine and spare Ministers?

Mr. Lamontagne: The Hon. Member should know as ex-Minister of Defence that, as far as the cost of the plane is concerned, it is what I said. Of course, one has to take into consideration spare parts, weaponry, and various kinds of maintenance that must be provided for the plane, which make the cost more than $22.5 million figure referred to.

As far as the cancellation of the program is concerned, we have heard a number of times over the last three years that the United States would imminently cancel it. It has not been cancelled yet, and I do not expect it to be cancelled.

MEDICAL CARE

MINISTER'S POSITION ON EXTRA BILLING

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. In one newspaper yesterday the Minister was quoted as having told the Liberal Policy Convention that she intended extra billing to be prohibited in the new Canada Health Care Act. In another newspaper she was quoted as saying that she wanted to control extra billing by physicians, in the new Act. Would the Minister clarify, once and for all, whether she actually intends to eliminate extra billing, whether or not that is her goal, or whether she intends only to control it and, if so, how?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I think the beginning of the Hon. Member's question demonstrates the confusion in the media in their coverage of what was, in fact, a workshop. However, it is all perfectly clear and simple. I did not make any statements to the press on the health insurance issue since negotiations are now taking place, and I am not in a position to add anything further today.

[English]

REQUEST THAT MINISTER TABLE GOVERNMENT PROPOSALS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. It seems to me that the problem is the fact that it is being negotiated and there is a lack of clarity about what the federal position is with regard to extra billing and with regard to other issues as well. Would the Minister consider tabling in the House, thus making available to Members of Parliament, and to other sectors within Canadian society concerned about medicare, the federal proposals which are being made to the Provinces so that the House is not faced down the line with a negotiated fait accompli, so that the medical and nursing communities, the trade unions involved and everyone concerned about the future of medicare might have an opportunity to participate in this crucial year of debate about the life of medicare? The future of medicare in the country should not be left up to 11 people.

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, as soon as negotiations are close to being finalized, Canadian medicare legislation will be introduced in the House, and as soon as a bill has been approved by Cabinet and presented to the provincial health ministers, I hope to be circulating the draft legislation among various interest groups which, in any case, are in touch with me on an on-going basis and are giving me their views on the aspects—and we are well aware of these—they want to see covered in the next health insurance bill.

CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

ALLEGED THEFT OF SUBSIDIES

Mr. Arthur Portelance (Gamelin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. On October 29 of this year, in reply to a question from my colleague, the Hon. Member for Gaspé, the minister promised to review the conditions of the Canadian Home Insulation Program in order to eliminate misuse of the program. I am therefore anxious to know whether the minister could inform the House today as to the measures he intends to take to deal with this problem.

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I intend to change the program in order to have more effective control over the way the program is used. To achieve this, I intend to reduce the subsidy for materials to 60 per cent and to increase the labour subsidy from 33⅓ per cent to 60 per cent, up to the maximum of $500 we were offering before, the purpose being to reduce misuse of the program, increase the labour component, enable yet more Canadians to benefit from the program and again, to prevent misuse of the program. I feel sure that with this new approach, we will be able to make substantial savings.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

DEFINITION OF LETTER—REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT CANCEL PROPOSAL

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Post. The definition of a letter now being arbitrarily imposed by the Government and Canada Post has deeply angered the business community in Canada which does not need another spike in its coffin. Representatives of the business community and of other groups have long been tired of paying first-class prices for third-world service. In the case of business, it will disrupt the traditional form of business which has been ongoing in Canada for years.

The Minister has received over 300 representations about the matter. In light of this strong opposition will the Minister tell the House whether the Government plans to cancel this definition of a letter or at least to explain what is going on to the Canadian business community, so that it can get on with making some money for a change?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member used the terms "arbitrarily imposed" by the Canada Post Corporation. I may remind him that what the Corporation published in the Canada Gazette was a draft regulation. As such it was not imposed arbitrarily, but brought to the attention of the public for the purpose of inviting comments, which were received from various Canada Post users. At the present time, Cabinet is considering these representations and will decide on the issue within the next few days.

[English]

Mr. Stewart: I am sure Canadians will not put their stamp of approval on that answer.

APPLICATION OF REGULATION VIS-A-VIS GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. If the Government decides to continue with this ridiculous definition, will the Minister now acknowledge the fact that there is a large volume of mailable matter, letters and copies of electronic transmissions, transmitted by staff messengers to different Government agencies, as well as by our own messenger service? Will the Minister tell the House whether the Government will try to enforce the regulation in these areas as well? In other words, will the Government have one set of standards for the Government and another set for the people of Canada, particularly the business community?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I take exception to what the Hon. Member is saying. I think he is accusing the Canada Post Corporation of malicious intent. I would ask him to read the explanations that were given when the amendment to the regulation published in The Canada Gazette was presented by the Canada Post Corporation. I think the Hon. Member's statements are the exact opposite of those made by the Progressive Conservative Party critic in the House when the Canada Post Corporation Act was passed in the House. I do not know anymore who is speaking as the critic for what in that party, but in any case, aside from the views held by the Progressive Conservatives, I repeat what I said earlier, namely, the Government is considering this matter and Cabinet will make a decision within a few days.

MINES AND MINING

MAP DISTRIBUTION COSTS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Mines. It concerns an answer from her department in response to Order Paper Question No. 4,400. During the last few days of June the Minister sent out a package to 576 Members of the Canadian Community Newspaper Association. Each kit contained a press release, a photograph of the Minister with the Governor General, and several maps. According to the department, the material cost $1,783.08 but the shipping charges amounted to $5,935 because courier services were used, even though it was too late for the material to reach newspapers in time for July 1. The material was to be used for Dominion Day. Can the Minister justify this expense to the House, and would she feel comfortable justifying this expense to the Auditor General and to the taxpayers of Canada?

Hon. Judy Erola (Minister of State (Mines)): Yes, Madam Speaker, I do, indeed. The maps to which the Hon. Member refers were maps of Canada then and now. They are of great historical value, not just to the newspapers but to all Canadians. The cost of distribution is completely justified in the national interest.

Mr. Taylor: Madam Speaker, the maps in question cost $5.95 from the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources. The photo of the Minister was included in the package. I admit that the Minister has a nice body, but it is too bad it is connected to her mouth.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

COURIER SERVICE EXPENSE

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, my question is for the President of the Treasury Board. I can understand why the Government does not want to use Canada Post, but spending $6,000 on couriers—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Does the Hon. Member have a question?

Mr. Taylor: Is this the Government's idea of restraint? That is a question.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Herb Gray (President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, we are striving to use public money as effectively as possible.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gray: In that context, I will be happy to look into the reasons for the expenditure alleged by my hon. friend, and report back to him.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INTERNATIONAL INSTITUTE OF APPLIED SYSTEMS ANALYSIS

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Prime Minister in his capacity as Secretary of State for External Affairs. It concerns the International Institute of Applied Systems Analysis, which is meeting today near Vienna, Austria. Is Canada a member of this organization? If so, does the Canadian Government contribute financially to its operations, and what is its basic purpose?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, unfortunately, the Hon. Member did not give me advance notice of his question, so I do not have the facts before me. As soon as I have the information, I should be glad to send it to the Hon. Member.

[English]

Mr. MacKay: The Minister should know that the United States recently withdrew its financial support for the Institute because it appeared to be serving more the Soviet hunger for western high technology than the need for genuine international co-operation.

ATTENDANCE OF CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS VICE-PRESIDENT

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, is Mr. Michael Kirby, the neophyte vice-president of CN, attending the Vienna meeting of the Institute and, if so, in what capacity? Is he attending as a representative of the Canadian Government, of the Prime Minister's Office, or of the CNR?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, my answer to the previous question also applies to this one.

TRANSPORTATION

SURVIVAL OF QUÉBECAIR

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport and concerns the fate of Québecair and its 1,000 employees. The minister's colleague has now given us the assurance that an exception will be made for Québecair if the bill is passed, and we shall of course try to block passage of this disastrous piece of legislation. However, can the minister now give Québecair's 1,000 employees the assurance that the federal government is going to work together with the Government of Quebec to ensure the survival of this company, the only French-speaking Canadian carrier?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, obviously, my hon. friend is new to the subject, otherwise he would have known that in July 1981, we already had the basis for the first phase of a merger between the two air carriers. At that time, the proposal was put before the Government of Quebec, which decided to oppose the merger. It is now up to the Government of Quebec to show that this time, it is willing to go along with the conditions of a merger and will not object on political grounds.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the employees of Québecair do not want to become a political football or the victims of a propaganda war and political wrangling between the federal and provincial governments.

EXCEPTIONS TO PROVISIONS OF BILL S-31

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Transport. Bill S-31 was introduced without any consultation with the provinces. Now we are told, even before the Bill is passed, that an exception will be created for Québecair. Will the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs clearly state to the House what the criteria are for creating such exceptions under Clause 6 of the Bill so that other carriers and other provincial governments will know exactly what this Government's intentions are if and when the Bill becomes law?

[Translation]

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, the purpose of this legislation is to prevent a situation where the interests of a province would be adversely affected by action taken by a provincial government in one of the transport sectors. Here, we had to know whether the Government of Ontario, for instance, might take umbrage at the Government of Quebec acting as owner of Québecair. We had to know whether Ontario would object. I therefore consulted my counterpart in the Government of Ontario who said: No, we have no objection to the Government of Quebec holding shares in Québecair. So, a conflict that might have arisen did not, in fact, arise, and that is why an exemption was proposed.

AIR TRANSPORT

SERVICE IN NEW BRUNSWICK

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. It relates to air passenger service in New Brunswick and from northern New Brunswick to the four Atlantic Provinces. Can the Minister give some indication what his Department's position is with respect to Air Maritime Limited, a proposed subsidiary company of Eastern Provincial Airways? Is there any planning in place? Are there any funds being allocated to provide this long-awaited service? We have been attempting to achieve this air passenger service for many more years than I would care to refer to today.

Could the Minister give any assurances to the House on the kind of leadership the officials in his Department might lend to bring about this service through Air Maritime Limited, EPA, or any other firm, to provide Canadians in that part of Canada with a much needed air passenger service in New Brunswick and connecting the four Atlantic provinces?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there are two aspects to the question. The first one has to do with the creation of Air Maritime which is an intra-regional transporter. As far as I can remember, this question is still before the CTC.

Another aspect of the matter is the connection between Fredericton, St. Léonard, and Quebec City. In this particular instance, Quebec Aviation has been selected by the CTC, and the Government of Canada has provided a subsidy of $1 million to help realize that service, which was in compensation for the fact that the Government of Canada had accepted the elimination of the Moncton to Edmundston rail transportation service.

PORTS

REMOVAL OF GRAIN ELEVATOR FROM PORT OF MONTREAL

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. It has to do with a question asked by the Hon. Member for Beauharnois-Salaberry the other day regarding Terminal One in the Port of Montreal. In reply to that question the Minister stated that the terminal was being removed to make way for new facilities. Could the Minister tell the House what those new facilities are, and what benefit the farmers and the people who need to store grain in Canada will have from those facilities?

• (1450)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): The reasons Elevator 1 at the Port of Montreal is being abandoned are twofold. First, the elevator has reached the point of no return, service-wise and, consequently, may be a danger in the near future. The second reason is the development of what is referred to as—le projet du vieux port de Montréal—

—an organization which is very anxious to take hold of that land. I said at the time, and I repeat now, that there are other facilities available to Quebec farmers who want to deliver their grain by truck. They can go to Sorel, to Quebec City, and also to Trois-Rivières.

OFFER TO PURCHASE ELEVATOR

Mr. Bill McKnight (Kindersley-Lloydminster): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister why he did not say what new facilities would be given in place of Terminal 1. The Minister must be aware that on May 28, 1982, Allstate Grain Company made an offer to purchase that terminal and continue to operate it as a grain terminal, and that his Government refused it. The new facilities he is proposing will be a promenade on the Montreal waterfront. Could he explain what benefit that would be to the grain producers in Quebec?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, Montrealers are interested in the beauty of their city. That is why they look favourably on the development of the Vieux Port de Montreal. On the subject of elevator facilities, my hon. friend should know that an elevator has been built, Elevator 4. The problem is that Elevator 4 is not equipped to receive deliveries by truck. The reason is that the total export of grains in the Province of Quebec is 100,000 tonnes compared to the transfer capacity at the Port of Montreal of 8.1 million tonnes. It is therefore not judged to be necessary to spend $3 million in order to build that facility at Elevator 4.

TERMS OF APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance in the absence of the Prime Minister. Prior to accepting his appointment as a Royal Commissioner on the Economy, did Donald Macdonald ask for and receive a commitment that he would be released from his duties, in order to participate in the Liberal leadership contest during the currency of such an inquiry, if that eventuality should take place? We know that the Government has no class. The question is, does Mr. Macdonald?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): One sure thing is that the Hon. Member has no class.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I can tell him that there has been no such conversation to my knowledge—none at all.

QUESTIONS RESPECTING CHAIRMAN AND FORMER DEPUTY MINISTER OF FINANCE

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Acting Prime Minister a question, if I could get his attention. Has he any information or belief concerning whether or not Mr. Macdonald has received any commitment whatsoever that he would be released as a commissioner of inquiry if a leadership convention should occur in the Liberal Party? I also ask whether or not Mr. Ian Stewart would in any way participate in such an inquiry.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): I have the Prime Minister's files with me today and there are a number of suggested answers to questions relevant to the Macdonald Royal Commission—

Mr. Epp: Read them.

Mr. Pepin: —but the two being asked are not covered by them.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

CYPRUS ANVIL MINES, Y.T.—STATUS OF PLAN FOR REOPENING

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Cyprus Anvil Mines was supposedly to have produced a mining plan by yesterday which might meet with the approval of the steel workers and the Minister's department, acting on behalf of the federal Government, and the approval of the Yukon Government. Can the Minister say whether that plan has been forthcoming and whether management is yet back with the union to work out their collective agreement in order to see some solution brought about which would put that mine back into production?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, unfortunately the talks broke down over the weekend over issues which I do not consider to be very substantive, on the basis of the information I have received. Yesterday I sent a telegram to both management and the union which stated that it would be in their best interests and in the interests of all Yukoners and Canadians to get back to the table immediately. It would be impossible to form any sort of action plan upon which some type of recovery program could be based in order to get a reopening without having a labour contract in place, because we still do not know whether it will ever open until the contract is completed. We do not even know what the costs of reopening would be because we cannot assess labour costs. Therefore, that is totally fundamental, almost as fundamental as receiving some commitment that the Japanese will buy lead and zinc once it does reopen.

I think that labour and management clearly perceive these facts and I am hoping, because it makes such generally good sense, that they will be back at the table as soon as possible. I have no doubt that representations by the Hon. Member concerning the matter would also be of assistance.

FUTURE OF WHITEHORSE COPPER MINES LIMITED

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same Minister. He will no doubt have been informed by Whitehorse Copper Mines Limited, if not by his colleague, the Minister of State for Mines, that that mine, which was scheduled to close for good next month, has now discovered further ore bodies, but is having problems as a result of the labour dispute between the railroad union and the White Pass and Yukon Railroad, preventing the shipment of the product. What steps are being taken by the Government in order to end that dispute, as it did with respect to the west coast dispute, so that ore can find a market and the mine can be kept open with the several jobs attached thereto?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I hope that the Hon. Member might agree that it is pivotal to the whole situation that we get the Cyprus Anvil situation straightened out. That will have an impact upon White Pass. Therefore, in a sense, it is a type of domino situation. If we can constructively get Cyprus opened—

Mr. Nielsen: Copper is being trucked.

Mr. Munro (Hamilton East): Okay. It may improve the situation with White Pass and the entire economy and would afford us a more ample economic base which would provide further assistance, if required, to other mines which are having difficulties. However, I do not see much point in intervening in some way in any other endeavour until we get the Cyprus Anvil situation ironed out which, as I think the Hon. Member will agree, accounts for a vast percentage of the entire private sector in the Yukon.

Mr. Epp: Forty per cent.

Mr. Nielsen: You are not up on that one, John.

ABORIGINAL RIGHTS

POSSIBLE EFFECT OF GULF OIL DEVELOPMENT IN NORTHERN YUKON

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. I am confident that the Minister is aware that some four years ago a very large area in the Yukon was set aside so that it could be evaluated concerning a national park proposal, and so that there could be an aboriginal rights settlement in that area before any industrial intrusion. However, in the last couple of days it has been brought to my attention that senior Government officials have approached Gulf Oil and are in the process of encouraging it to obtain sites in the northern Yukon for a marine base for its offshore marine drilling activities.

Mr. Nielsen: Good!

Mr. Fulton: I would like to ask the Minister two questions. I hear the Hon. Member for Yukon yelling, "Good!"

Mr. Nielsen: Right!

Mr. Fulton: However, I would like to hear from the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development whether or not, first, the officials who have gone from his Department and others are operating under the instructions of the Minister or any of his Cabinet colleagues to do so with regard to Gulf Oil. Second, does the Minister intend to make changes to that Order in Council to allow an industrial intrusion before the settlement of aboriginal claims and before the Beaufort Sea environmental assessment is completed?

Mr. Nielsen: Why not?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, the current situation involves an obligation we are under to consult with the native people in the area. We will do so prior to arriving at a decision with Gulf. I hope that the Hon. Member will agree that permitting some exploration to take place, provided it has no deleterious effect on future land claims, would be the optimum result, and that is the one we are trying to attain.

EMPLOYMENT

EXPENDITURE OF JOB CREATION FUNDS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It refers to employment-related programs within Newfoundland. The Minister, through his Department, supplied the Department of Fisheries and Oceans with $5 million this summer to spend on employment-creating projects for the Department in Newfoundland. Why was the Department instructed to spend those moneys only on projects which were represented by Liberal Members of Parliament from Newfoundland, and not to spend any of those moneys in the districts of St. John's West and St. John's East? Why has the Minister not replied to my letters to him over the last two months which asked him questions about the misuse of employment funds in this way?

• (1500)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as is the common habit of the Hon. Member of St. John's West, he not only exaggerates what is taking place, he also misrepresents what is taking place.

He knows full well that the budget for the Province of Newfoundland this year was close to $20 million, divided between all of the constituencies. When it came time to allocate money under the Special response Fund, both his constituency and that of the Hon. Member for St. John's East were given an allocation under that fund. He should check the facts.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: If the Minister would listen to the question, these were funds provided to the Department of Fisheries—not Canada Community Development Projects—for the Department of Fisheries to use in small craft and harbours projects in Newfoundland to create employment. Forty of those projects were approved in Ottawa, not by the Department in Newfoundland. All forty projects took place in the five Liberal districts in Newfoundland.

OFFICIALS' ACTION

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, why is the Minister interfering or having his officials interfere politically on the backs of the unemployed across Canada, with this kind of political discrimination? Why does he not do his homework and answer questions truthfully in this House?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as we discovered in the House last year when we had a similar exchange, if the Hon. Member would look at his own riding more and pay more attention to it, he would find that, in fact, a fair amount of investment is going there to help the unemployed in his riding.

Mr. Crosbie: Answer the question.

Mr. Axworthy: The fact is that, under the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program, those are projects which were designed by individual Departments, projects which were on the shelf or waiting completion but had not been funded. We were able, therefore, to put money into regions across Canada regardless of political or partisan affiliation in order to employ people. I simply say to the Hon. Member that I think he should pay more attention to what is going on.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CROSBIE—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. AXWORTHY

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): A question of privilege, Madam Speaker.

Madam Speaker: The Question Period is over. The Hon. Member has put a question and a supplementary question.

Mr. Nielsen: It is a question of privilege.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, I did not hear that. The Hon. Member for St. John's West on a question of privilege.

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I refer to the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) stating in the House that I misrepresented the facts, or attempted to misrepresent the facts, in my question to the Minister. That is an unparliamentary expression, in addition to which, of course, it is contrary to the truth.

The Minister is using employment funds for political purposes. There is no misrepresentation. He is not referring to the Canada Community Development Projects.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I have the Hon. Member's point. His question or privilege is that some unparliamentary language has been used. First of all, that is a point of order. I did not hear any unparliamentary language. We will wait until Hansard comes out to see whether my understanding of the situation is correct. I did not hear any unparliamentary language on the part of the Hon. Minister.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order with respect to House business. The Government House Leader will have noticed that yesterday, during his absence which I am sure was on pressing business, we got along quite famously in the House and disposed of three of those pieces of legislation that he considered of some urgency to the Government. Therefore, that takes us out of his schedule which he laid upon us last week with respect to House business.

He has now through his assistant, informed me, I am told through my assistant, that the order of business today shall be Bill C-90, the Customs Tariff legislation, and when that is finished we will debate Bill C-129, the Bretton Woods Agreement Act. Then when that is finished, Bill C-130, financial assistance to certain international financial institutions, will follow. When that is concluded, we will move to Bill C-85, Canagrex, and when that is finished, to Bill C-95, the sports lotteries.

In any event, the business for tomorrow will be Bill C-85, Canagrex for the entire day. For the sake of the record, would the Government House Leader mind confirming that order of business for us in order to enable the Opposition adequately to plan to meet the Government's timetable?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, about two weeks ago, I gave the member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) a list of, I believe, seventeen bills, and asked him to look at a reasonable schedule for disposing of all these bills. I have yet to receive a reply, and I think he is not going to give me one for some time yet, because according to him, there are a number of hon. members who wish to speak to the bills in question. It is true that yesterday evening, although one of his colleagues had told our side that there were going to be eight speakers, a number of Progressive Conservative members did not show up and we were able to pass a number of bills very quickly. As a result, my Parliamentary Secretary (Mr. Smith) subsequently rose to confirm, as reported at page 20530 of Hansard, and I quote:

[English]

—we will be dealing with Bill C-90 and on Wednesday we will be dealing with Bill C-129.

[Translation]

Thus it is true that today we are considering Bill C-90, and if we finish consideration of Bill C-90 before the normal adjournment time, we shall go on to consideration of Bill C-129 and Bill C-130, which were to be debated tomorrow according to last week's statement. However, should the Hon. Member for Yukon, in a sudden burst of co-operation, help us to expedite these bills, we shall then go on today to consideration of Bill C-85. Should this burst of co-operation on the part of my colleague from Yukon be such that we would finish consideration of Bill C-85 today, we would then go on to Bill C-95. And if this spirit of co-operation is particularly pervasive, we would then go to the Order Paper, and after prior consultation with the member for Yukon, we would then identify any bills that could usefully be passed before the end of the day.

If we do not pass Bill C-129 today, we shall proceed tomorrow with consideration of Bills C-129 and C-130, as announced last week. If this burst of co-operation comes tomorrow rather than today, after consideration of Bill C-130, we shall proceed with Bills C-85, C-95, and so forth.

Since the question was asked, I wish to announce at this point that Monday is designated as an opposition day. As far as the business of the House for Tuesday and the rest of next week is concerned, I intend to discuss this matter later today, before the usual adjournment time, with my fellow House leaders or, if they prefer, with their assistants.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I would have expected a little more pleasure to have been expressed from the Government House Leader with respect to the manner in which we disposed of Government business yesterday. Perhaps that is too much to expect.

Is he saying that there will be a House Leaders' meeting this afternoon to discuss next week's business? I am not always sure if the complete translation gets across to me. Second, would he inform those of us on this side, in view of our eagerness to make progress on these urgent Government measures, whether he is also going to be absent today?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: I wonder what my hon. colleague is so anxious about. After all, I want to co-operate as well. In fact, I will be in the House today to make sure that he behaves himself. As far as his first question is concerned, I did mention, and I am sorry if it suffered in the translation if that was indeed the case, that before today's normal adjournment time, we would be having a meeting to discuss the business of the House for next week, that is starting Tuesday, since Monday will be an opposition day.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, I also have a matter which I wish to raise with the Government House Leader and, I believe, the House Leader for the Official Opposition.

Although Bill C-90, the Customs Tariff Bill, is a budget Bill, it is very complex. Is any consideration being given to sending it to one of the standing committees for consideration as opposed to dealing with it in Committee of the Whole, since it requires some fair explanation and consideration in Committee of the Whole is not always as reasonable as that in standing committee.

● (1510)

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on the same point regarding the business of the House. In order to assist the Government House Leader in replying to that, the normal practice is to have discussion in Committee of the Whole. Our own view is we should not depart from that practice. Our critic is ready, willing and able to proceed with the measure quickly.

POINT OF ORDER

MR. FLIS—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. BLAIKIE

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Paliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order pertaining to the words used by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) during the adjournment debate. Because the words were used in the adjournment debate, this is the first opportunity I have had to draw them to your attention. The Hon. Member used the word "hypocrite" in addressing a Minister of this House. Beauchesne at page 107, the Debates of July 8, 1961 and the Debates of February 22, 1961 rule that the word "hypocrite" is unparliamentary language. I know the Hon. Member will want to withdraw that unparliamentary term.

Madam Speaker: I am in no position to rule on this matter before looking at Hansard. If the Hon. Member was offended by something which occurred in the House last evening, that was the time to raise it. Unparliamentary language is one thing, but something else has to be added to the use of that unparliamentary language. If it creates some kind of commotion in the House, the Speaker, of course, should intervene.

There are two elements concerning the use of unparliamentary language. The Hon. Member should have raised them yesterday. I am in no position to rule on this because I do not know at this time whether that language was used.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

MR. MAYER—WORK STOPPAGES AFFECTING EXPORT GRAIN MOVEMENT

Mr. Charles Mayer (Portage-Marquette): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition on behalf of many of the citizens and taxpayers in the constituency of Portage-Marquette. The purpose of the petition is two-fold. First, the petition asks the House to legislate an end to the work stoppage on the west coast which, I am happy to say, was addressed by the House last Wednesday. The second part of the petition asks that the federal Government take steps to prevent work stoppages that affect the movement of grain for export.

The petitioners hope that in your examination of the petition you will find the petition in order, and that you will exercise the powers vested in the office of the Speaker of the House to refer the matter to the appropriate body for consideration at the earliest possible time in order that this serious problem of work stoppages which affect grain movement for export be adequately addressed.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INCREASE ON LIMIT OF INSURED DEPOSITS

Question No. 3,959—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Since the date of the last occasion when the Government answered a question by the Hon. Member for Leeds-Grenville as to whether it would increase the $20,000 limit on bank or trust company deposits above $20,000 under the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation, did the Government give further consideration to raising the limit and (a) if so, what are all the details (b) if not, for what reason?

2. Will the Government be raising the figure to $100,000, similar to the amount of coverage provided in the United States?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of State (Finance)): In so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, I have been informed by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation as follows: 1. and 2. The adequacy of the deposit insurance limit is presently under consideration and government policy in that regard will be announced in due course.

CANADA DEPOSIT INSURANCE CORPORATION

Question No. 3,966—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What is the total amount of money now on deposit with the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation?

2. In each of the past five years, what amount of funds were received and what were the names of contributors and the amount contributed in each case?

3. On what basis are the amounts to be contributed by various banks and trust companies arrived at?

4. What percentage increase would be required in contributions in order to raise the limit to $100,000?

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of State (Finance)): In so far as the Minister of Finance is concerned, I have been advised by the Canada Deposit Insurance Corporation as follows:

1. As at December 31, 1981 the premiums received from member institutions totalled $167.3 million.

2. 1977—$15.0 million

POINT OF ORDER

MR. PAPROSKI—S.O. 43 MOTION OF MR. FLIS

Hon. Steven E. Paproski (Edmonton North): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would like to know whether on the Standing Order 43 motion moved by the hon. member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) there was a "no" from the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Smith). Did he say no to the fact that this is the sixth anniversary of the establishment of the Ukrainian Public Group to promote—

Madam Speaker: Order. The Hon. Member has to take my word that an Hon. Member of the House or some Hon. Members of the House said no. Therefore, the motion has to be considered as having been dealt with by the House.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed, from Wednesday, February 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Bussières that Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel): Madam Speaker, we must not let this Bill pass without bringing to the attention of Hon. Members certain provisions in the Bill that I am sure, if they knew their true import, they would be more than anxious to debate and have discussed on the floor of the House of Commons. I refer, of course, to Clause 5 of the Bill, which sets out certain provisions which would permit the Government by Order in Council to make changes from Imperial measurement to metric. This provision I suggest has in effect been snuck into this Bill without too much comment. It has far-reaching consequences and could have far-reaching, disastrous consequences for many businesses, industries and manufacturers in this country.

When you read the provisions set out, you see how underhanded the Government is in its approach to metrication in this country. Instead of approaching that question in a wholesome, above-board way, it has always tended to hide behind some type of Cabinet or Order in Council process to force metrication on Canadian business, industry and other Canadian activities.

I will have a second point a little later concerning Bill C-90, but I rise at this point with respect to Clause 5 because I believe the House of Commons must call a halt to the Government's propensity to rule by Order in Council. We in Canada are in a near depression, if not a depression, aggravated by faulty policies on the part of this Government. We must not allow the Government intentionally or inadvertently further to complicate the already unsatisfactory economic conditions in which we in Canada find ourselves.

The world is clamouring for international business and activity. The United States of America, the wealthiest and most powerful nation in the world, is finding it difficult to tear itself from the depths of the recession in which they find themselves. We, on the other hand, are having a Bill introduced into this House that will have the effect of extending metrication even further than its present implementation in this country.

I refer to this in the context of the United States because, as we know, the metrication process has virtually been brought to a halt. Weighing the consequences of metrication, they decided they had trouble enough extracting themselves from the present recession without loading on to business a further complication and cost—destruction, if you like—by forcing business to accept metrication. As we know, President Reagan has commented that the metric commission in the United States has walked its last kilometer.

Is it not strange, then, that Clause 5 of Bill C-90 intends to take all of those items referred to in the Customs Tariff legislation and give the Cabinet of the day the power to change all Imperial measurements, the traditional British system which we have, unilaterally and without further reference to this House, with the obvious costs and difficulties for Canadian businesses and all who will use metrication in this country. I say that, Mr. Speaker, because I believe that if Hon. Members on both sides of the House read that provision, and thought of the consequences of it, they would, if not join in the debate, at least ensure that there will be careful consideration of the legislation in Committee of the Whole stage before it is passed by this House.

I know there are other Hon. Members who may want to speak on the impact of metrication in Canada. They may want to warn the Government in a more specific way what the fallout may well be if this clause is allowed to pass as part of Bill C-90. If the Hon. Members of this House believe that metrication in Canada has gone too far, has already aggravated in many ways the recession that we find ourselves in, and has in short brought on economic disturbance, annoyance, and in some cases even hardship at the retail levels, I suggest that they should not become a party to this Bill and allow it to be lightly passed.

I feel a second aspect of this Bill should be commented on, Mr. Speaker, which is the reference in many parts of Bill C-90 to an agreement with respect to trade between New Zealand and Canada. I draw Hon. Members' attention to these references because I feel this is somewhat of a precedent. If you read the notice of the Ways and Means motion which was brought in on November 12, 1981 it in no way indicates that the Bill has anything to do with any agreement with respect to trade or any other particular arrangement with New Zealand. In fact, the explanatory note on page 1a of Bill C-90 simply says, and I quote:

> This Bill would implement the Ways and Means Motion relating to the Customs Tariff that was tabled by the Minister of Finance on November 12, 1981.

There is no indication or notice that somehow or other, couched in that Bill, is an agreement, and references to an agreement, with respect to trade between New Zealand and Canada.

I am referring partly to a question of form. I believe that we, as Members, must always be very much on the alert for a Government that tends to smuggle pieces of legislation, references to agreements, in a Bill that you would never normally expect such agreements to be found in. When we are considering the question of what kind of ongoing arrangement we should have with New Zealand, country to country, if parliamentary approval is required there should at least be fair notice to all Members of this House concerning what they are being asked to approve. Above all, it should not be something that merely gets tucked into another Bill without due notice of the implications, and how far-reaching an effect it may have.

I say this in particular with respect to New Zealand because Hon. Members will remember that this Government was totally lax in its attention to detail a few years ago and allowed a wrinkle to be pulled wherein the Canadian public put up $50 million in the form of preferred shares which went into a Canadian entity, which then had a capital of $100,000. The $50 million was, if you like, the subscribed cost of preferred shares in the New Zealand Shipping Corporation (Canada) Limited. The point I would like to make, Mr. Speaker, is that until attention was drawn to this deal, the Government was unaware of the fact that what had transpired was that the New Zealand government, through a Crown corporation called the New Zealand Shipping Corporation, had set up a subsidiary in Canada known as New Zealand Shipping Corporation (Canada) Limited, which in turn had a subsidiary in tax-free Singapore. This "round robin" meant that $50 million of Canadian money went into a Canadian company. From the Canadian company it went into a Singapore company, where no tax was involved. In turn the money was used in the Singapore company to repay bank loans which had been raised in Singapore, and money eventually ended up in the New Zealand Shipping Corporation.

Let us go around the other way: the net effect of this was that the New Zealand—I was going to say "schemer", but let us call him a very talented lawyer, had worked out a deal whereby he was able to raise $50 million of Canadian money to finance New Zealand's ships in order to carry out trade not only with Canada but throughout the world. This was done on the basis that there was no tax paid on any revenue coming to Canadians with respect to the $50 million. Passing this money through Singapore meant that they could convert what left Canada in the form of capital funds to debt funds. Therefore, in Singapore it then became a loan going to New Zealand and was a deductible item by those who borrowed the money in New Zealand. In short, the little wrinkle ended up being a 9 per cent or 10 per cent charge in New Zealand, deductible from income tax there, went through Singapore, came into Canada, was then paid out in the form of a dividend to Canadians who had bought those preferred shares, and, as Hon. Members know, there is no tax on dividends in Canada if they are paid from Canadian dividend-paying corporations.

This is the type of thing we should be looking into, the type of thing that the Government, until drawn to its attention, was totally unaware of. In fact, the Government, through Revenue Canada, had given what is called a "comfort letter"; a ruling in more positive terms, stating that the wrinkle was fine, go ahead and pickup the $50 million in Canada, finance your shipping fleet, they do not have to pay any taxes in Canada, and if they want to make it a deductible item as far as the interest is concerned down in New Zealand, more power to them. That, in effect, was the National Revenue ruling on that little wrinkle. When this matter was brought to the attention of the Minister, he, of course, professed to be quite annoyed, and I understand there was quite a bit of commotion between Finance and Revenue over the whole affair.

I raise this, Mr. Speaker, because here we go again. The Government, rightly or wrongly, has entered into an arrangement or an agreement with New Zealand, and rather than coming openly to this Parliament and saying this is what they have done, they need our approval and this is why they feel we should give our approval, and have it all open and above board, we find it is up to its old tricks, trying to sneak it in. It is put into a Bill in the hope that no one would be alerted and realize what the Government has in mind.

I suggest it is time for this House to be alert, to ask the Government, as I hope to myself, some pertinent questions concerning this agreement touching on trade between New Zealand and ourselves. Above all, I urge other Members of this House to do likewise, because surely the time has come that this Government, and especially the emperor, who is away on another trip, I understand, should not be allowed to take the House of Commons for granted any longer.

On two points I urge all Members to at least consider this legislation and possibly speak on the Bill. If they are concerned about metrication in this country and its consequences, speak to clause 5 in Bill C-90. If they are concerned about these rather secret arrangements which are tucked into legislation to get parliamentary approval, then speak on the Bill generally because they will find many references to the New Zealand trade agreement in this Bill.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the matters raised by the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) are a concern. The continued acceleration, if you will, in the imposition of the metric system is a concern. I think a lot of people in the country are expressing some concern about the difficulties confronting them as they try to deal day by day with the changeover. I think this goes back to its inception, and

I am sure every Member of the House, with the benefit of hindsight, now realizes that there are problems.

At the time metrication was brought in, it was with the general support of Members of this House, including the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling), whose comment at the time of the debate was that they should accelerate the bringing forth of the metric system. It was not being done quickly enough. That is not intended to be a criticism of the Hon. Member; I say it only because I think it shows that we all learn with the passage of time and from the experiences which affect the people in the country.

I think, Mr. Speaker, the Government learned, along with the rest of us, that there are people who are genuinely concerned about this continued imposition. That the changeover is difficult, there is no question. For the adult population the changeover from our existing weights and measures to the metric system has been a particularly difficult changeover. It has been costly, for small businesses in particular but for all business in general. It has not generated the industrial growth in Canada which one might have hoped for in providing the alternative measuring devices, whether they be weigh scales or other equipment which is necessary for the changeover. There has been very little in the way of a Canadian industry emerging as a result of this change. Must of the money being spent in the changeover is being spent outside of Canada.

I think that, as with many things, this House of Commons could well take a look at where we go from here. In fact, as I look at this from what I hope is a practical point of view, the changeover has in many ways reached a point where it would be more costly perhaps to go back than it would be to leave it in place. I do not think anyone is suggesting that we should make an attempt to revert back. I think the cost of doing that would probably be as great as or greater than the cost of leaving things as they are. I say this from a practical and non-political viewpoint. However, I do think that the changes which are continually being introduced are made without careful enough consideration and the Hon. Member for York-Peel raises that as a legitimate point. I think the Government ought to consider that.

However, Mr. Speaker, I want to deal with the general thrust of the legislation for a few moments. I think I speak for most if not all of my colleagues in this party, and I suspect for a number of my colleagues outside of my party, when I say that the continued move towards a tariff-free world is, in the hypothetical or academic sense, a laudible goal. If it ever happens, it will probably in the end prove to be beneficial. But at the moment my worry about it is that we are inching towards it little by little without giving careful thought to the implications of the changes. It is all well and good for us to negotiate with others to reduce tariffs in the hope that we will open up new markets and assist other countries in their development. However, my experience has been that we have not benefited a great deal from the already negotiated reduction in tariffs. My experience has been that even in those countries where we were able to arrive at an understanding with regard to a reduction in general tariffs, there are other barriers which are either being put in place or were already in place prior to the reductions coming into effect.

As an example of that, Mr. Speaker, I think those who have been to Japan or worked with the Japanese would appreciate that, although we might enter into any number of agreements with that country as to a reduction in tariffs, it is very difficult to imagine how this would benefit us. It might, in a global sense, appear to be a move toward something which will ultimately be worthwhile. But in the immediate sense of the effect it has on Canada and Canadian industry, it is extremely difficult to put any kind of accurate measurement on any benefit which flows to Canadian industry as the result of a reduction in tariffs between this country and Japan. If anything, when we do reduce tariffs all we do is make it easier for them to sell in our country, but because of the nature of Japan, because of non-tariff barriers—not always governmental non-tariff barriers but barriers nonetheless—we have not really opened up any markets for ourselves.

I noted with interest when I was visiting Japan that to a great extent, even if you were to have no tariffs of any kind, it would be very difficult for us to penetrate the Japanese market simply because the single largest barrier to the sale of Canadian-made products in Japan is the sense among the Japanese that they ought to buy products made in Japan, not products made outside of their country. Because of this very strong sense of loyalty to their own economy and development, indeed to their own products, even without any tariffs at all—we would find that we have not benefited one iota in terms of increasing our ability to manufacture and therefore to sell. On the other hand, because we in Canada do not have that same sense of loyalty, if you will, to Canadian manufactured products, we would be opening up our market to the Japanese.

I think we really have to have a discussion on that at some point in this House. We have to do this with an eye to understanding what it is we are hoping to achieve as a result of the tariff reduction negotiations which go on. I think we clearly have to understand the benefits, whatever they may be, and the possible problems that may develop from this continued reduction, little by little, in the tariff wall that was in place, presumably for the purpose of allowing our industry to grow.

For some reason that discussion does not take place in the House of Commons. I am not too sure that it will take place as a result of what I say today, but I hope my comments will generate in the minds of Hon. Members questions about why we have tariffs at all, why we have them in certains areas, what the over-all benefit or disadvantage would be as a result of the reduction of certain tariffs, how we propose to protect our growing industry base from massive intrusions from outside, and what we would use as an alternative to developing the industry base. Then we could make a decision about the level of tariffs and the variety of areas of commerce.

We are going to be faced with very serious problems in the not too distant future in this country. We are already facing problems now, although they are minor compared to the problems we will ultimately face unless we restructure our economy.

It has proven to be of great advantage to this country that we were resource rich. Those resources have been the backbone of the development of this country and the means of providing the kind of substantial wealth that was so necessary to ensure the standard of living that most Canadians have enjoyed over the last few years. I do not think anyone denies that to continue to rely on that resource wealth alone would be very foolish. It would not enable us to provide for the next generation, and perhaps the one following that, the same opportunities that were provided for us by those in positions of power in the generation that preceded us.

I am concerned that we in this House should find a way to give some focus to what I think is a growing concern among Canadians. I believe that Canadians expect us to have some clear picture of where we would like Canada to be 25, 30 or 40 years from now, what kind of economy we will have then and what its base will be. If it is to be a manufacturing economy, which areas of manufacturing are we likely to excel in? Which areas are likely to grow and which areas are less likely to grow? Which areas are vital to the maintenance of the communities which lie so far apart in the country and are therefore not as interdependent as such communities are in many other countries? What would we do to protect the economic base of the many communities from coast to coast?

We must make these fundamental decisions before we enter another round of tariff reductions. It could well be that even in the 1980s and the 1990s it will be necessary for us to maintain some degree of tariff protection in certain areas of our industrial development in order that those areas will be able to grow, based on the domestic market capability of Canada and Canadians.

I sometimes suspect that the changes the Government makes are made in isolation from reality. The Government decides to make a reduction in certain areas because someone thinks that would be to their advantage, without considering whether that reduction might be very damaging to a fledgling industry. It might have the capacity to fill more of Canada's needs but suddenly finds itself made vulnerable by the reduction and in the period of early growth is not able to compete with larger industry from outside the country and then, to all intents and purposes, is rendered of little value and becomes redundant.

There are areas where the tariffs are being reduced as a result of this legislation or where they are non-existent. I think we should consider what this will do to industry. We should do an analysis of this in the House of Commons, and I hope the new rules will allow that kind of thing to occur through a committee, for example. In an industry where there is no tariff protection or where it is extremely small, perhaps before the legislation is passed we could do an analysis to determine what effect the changes would have.

I am not interested in whether the Government, through its advisers and experts, has done some analyses superficially or in depth. I have no way of knowing that, but I am interested in knowing, as someone representing a manufacturing community, what impact tariff changes, reductions or eliminations will have on the industries located in the area that I represent or that some of my colleagues represent. I should like to know this in advance of the changes being put into effect.

For example, Mr. Speaker, the imposition of metric was not thought out clearly enough, and because of that we ran into difficulties. It was done with the best intentions in the world but it turned out to be not as useful as we had thought it would be. I suggest that that is true of many of the tariff changes recommended in this Bill.

What I am really saying is that I do not think we are told nearly enough about what is intended. I do not think the analysis is really complete enough. It would not be appropriate for us to continue along the lines we have been following in granting reductions year after year, in advance of making a decision about where our strength will lie. We should know the kind of manufacturing we anticipate for the next one or two decades and the kind of assistance that will be necessary to make sure that growth industries are given a fair shot before they are opened up to the tough world of competition against others who may be well established and capable of undercutting them in their formative years.

I have a great deal of reluctance to deal with the legislation as it stands, Mr. Speaker. I would ask, for example, without knowing but by reading the Bill, why we should open up our borders, eliminate all tariffs and have no protection in areas such as 47605-1 of Schedule III which deals with items related to hospitals, operating and other devices necessary for the maintenance of an adequate health care delivery system. I would ask myself, in addition to other things, why we would eliminate the tariff there rather than look around to see whether or not there is in Canada an industry base capable of producing these items and then make a decision as to what assistance it requires in order to strengthen it in world terms. Also I would ask myself what we could do to develop that industry, if it is deemed to be of value, or whether it is necessarily good that there be no tariff at all during the period when the industry is being encouraged to develop. That could be said of a number of things. I will not go through them one by one but I may do so in Committee.

I have a feeling that we may be going about this backwards. We are going about the opening up of trade in a wrong-headed way. I feel that we are making the final decision before making the early ones, or that we have not made decisions in an orderly manner to enable us to come to proper conclusions. We have not made decisions about who is to be assisted and in what way before we decide to eliminate tariffs. Of course, we realize that once the tariffs are eliminated it is virtually impossible to put them back in place again. Once gone, they are generally gone forever. Therefore, to make the decision in isolation from the over-all economic decisions which must be made about where the country is going does not make much sense.

In any event, I raise these matters because I have a feeling there will come a day in the House of Commons when, as the Hon. Member for York-Peel indicated, Liberal Members and others might have second, third and fourth thoughts about the matter, such as some have about metric. I have the feeling there will be people in the House of Commons who will have second, third and fourth thoughts about what we did with tariff protection, how we lost an industry base as a result of negotiating away protection and what it will cost in terms of subsidy of one kind or another to try to maintain the industry base if, as and when the protection of tariffs is no longer there.

I predict that there will be a raging debate some day in the House of Commons centred around how we protect the industries we are attempting to encourage to develop. One question raised will be whether we should put in place some kind of tariff. I am sure that question will be asked. Then those who will be making that decision will look at us and ask why we gave it away in the first place without giving enough thought to what would happen down the road.

I suppose my comments are really a caution. I hope that some time over the course of next year one or other of the Standing Committees of the House of Commons will be charged with the responsibility of taking a look at the impact of reductions and eliminations of tariff protection which have taken place over the course of the last decade. Hopefully it will look at the industries most affected, analyse the impact of the changes and try to decide or come up with some definitive answers about whether or not any benefits flowed to Canada and, if so, what they were and what they were worth both in terms of the development of the economy and in terms of the safeguarding of the industry base which appears to be fleeing every day.

Finally, in looking back over the years the only reason many of our industries located here was because their parent companies, whether in Great Britain, France or more recently in the United States, decided that in order to penetrate the Canadian market and to compete with existing Canadian companies they should locate some of their manufacturing capacity in Canada. We are not necessarily over the hump, so to speak, in terms of economic growth. I do not think we have reached the point of going it alone.

I cannot help looking back over the course of the last three years and thinking of what has happened to the automotive industry. We have the auto pact. It was an agreement between Canada and the United States intended to benefit Canada. It created a tariff-free zone in automotive trade. Presumably the end result when it was first established was to establish in Canada manufacturing, research and development capabilities which would enable industry to grow. That did not come to pass. I think most people would agree that the free trade arrangement has been manipulated over its lifetime. The parts manufacturing, which we all anticipated would come to Canada as a result of the arrangement, really did not come here. We ended up with many years of favourable balance in terms of dollar for dollar trade, but we did not end up with a manufacturing capability because the favourable balance was generally on assembled vehicles rather than on the manufacture, and therefore on the development, of the parts.

Recently that hit us very hard. Many of us analysed it in an attempt to see what were the possible solutions. It became even more complicated with the growth of the Japanese industry, which was able to penetrate not only the Canadian but the North American market. It was able to work out arrangements between its manufacturers, as did some European manufacturers, and the manufacturers of so-called North American vehicles. The best example would be Renault and AMC, two of the companies which came together. This presumably allowed Renault to bring vehicles into the United States, and because it was part of AMC, to transfer them through the United States and into Canada without normal tariff restrictions. Whether it actually occurred in that way is questionable, but certainly it was in their minds.

I asked myself at the time whether that was what we intended or what benefit we would obtain from it. To put it crudely, it seems that all we got out of it was being shafted. I am not referring to making drive shafts; I am referring to another kind of shafting.

I wonder if that is where we are going, if that is what this is all about, and if that is where we will end up. If it is, we must stop it soon or we will be in serious trouble. That would be a good industry sector for the House of Commons to concentrate on for a while because it employs or at least employed substantial numbers of people in central Canada, particularly in Ontario and Quebec. Without making a case for the Province which I represent, there is grave concern about where the industry is going, what the impact of the auto pact will be, and whether or not they will be able to bring in engines from Japan and other parts of the world, through the United States, across the border and into Canada under the auto pact, even though the engines were not manufactured in those countries. There is serious question as to whether or not that will happen or indeed is happening.

One cannot have a discussion of the Customs Tariff and the repeal of or reductions in the Customs Tariff without taking a look at the implications. I use the automobile industry as an example, but it is not the only example of what can and does occur.

What are we going to do now to get benefit to Canada? How are we going to reclaim, if there is to be any reclaiming done, any benefit for ourselves? Who is going to gain any employment from it, other than those who sell and perhaps service vehicles? Are we going to try now to negotiate back, if you will, to a point where we will insist on a value added component of one kind or another, and what will it be? What will we use as the lever to get this benefit in the event we want to get it to pry loose some of the manufacturing that we ought to have in this country from its home base and bring it into Canada so that Canadians will get benefit?

Those are difficult questions. I am not pretending for a moment that they are necessarily answerable in one afternoon. Nor do I pretend that everyone in the House of Commons automatically will agree that that is a goal. I just put it forward as my opinion, and my opinion is as valid, I guess, as anybody else's. I raise the matter from that point of view.

It reminds me of an instance many years ago that caused a chuckle or two. When I was in the Ontario legislature I recall having difficulties over the importation of glazed cherries from France. People who manufacture glazed cherries in Canada were finding it extremely difficult to compete with the cherries imported from France even though there was tariff protection. We could not find out what was happening. After much investigation it was discovered that the French government was subsidizing sugar, which is the main component of glazed cherries. Because the French government was subsidizing sugar, it was, in effect, reducing the price which enabled manufacturers in France, to undercut those in Canada. I think this situation continues to happen in a number of interesting and devious ways.

I feel that legislation such as this should be the last step in the long process of analysing, developing and putting into place a strategy for Canadian development, manufacturing and other kinds of development. After you have done that and once you have it in place, you begin the process of making it easier for others to compete with us. But before that, we want to make sure that competition will be both fair and, to the extent that we can, of advantage and beneficial to Canada.

I suggest that it might be advisable, before we ever deal with another piece of legislation like this, that the House of Commons give careful thought to the comments and the intent of the comments I have made this afternoon. I do not expect the comments themselves to be bedtime reading for everybody, but I do think the intent is clear. I want to be sure that we are not making another mistake and digging ourselves more deeply into a hole than we dug ourselves into some time ago, a hole which we are having a great deal of difficulty getting out of.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

The Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof.

On Clause 1—Rates of Customs duties for New Zealand.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, my first question to the Minister is a very simple one. Can he inform the House what is the basis of the agreement between New Zealand and Canada that leads to the various references to the tariff adjustments in this bill?

Mr. Cosgrove: I thank the Hon. Member for his question. I notice in the proceedings on the Bill when it was debated on the first occasion in this House on February 10, 1982 that the issue of the agreement was raised by other Hon. Members. The style or the form, as the Hon. Member has characterized it, was a question discussed at that time. I know that my predecessor in response to the question indicated that the agreement between Canada and New Zealand, which is referenced in the Bill, has been available since both parties executed the same under the responsibility of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce. In response to the questions raised, the Minister said that the Bill was available to any Member of this House or to any member of the public, and it has been available. It has been available to the Hon. Member asking the question since that time.

There is no question that the Bill, as one of its major components, repeals a number of existing tariff measures which were part of a trade agreement earlier signed between Canada and New Zealand in 1932. The agreement has now ended. Its provisions have been replaced by the new tariff measures. They take into account the provisions of that agreement, which is an agreement for trade and economic co-operation between Canada and New Zealand. I would have expected the Hon. Member to have had available to him the terms of that agreement for his perusal. Certainly I would have been pleased to answer detailed questions on the agreement, and I am sure staff would have been available to him to answer those detailed comments. The provisions of the agreement are referenced in different sections of the bill before us.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, for those who are accustomed to replies from Ministers, we know that this Minister is completely at sea concerning the agreement that he has so often told us is available to various Members. We know agreements are available. I asked him what the basis is of the agreement. However, let me be more specific. If we both agree that there is this agreement between New Zealand and Canada, could the Minister indicate specifically what was the understanding reached by the Government of Canada when the Government's officials met with the sheep raisers association of Canada to discuss the impact of these tariffs?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I do not have the specifics of the answer concerning the date nor, indeed, do I know whether there was such a meeting as indicated by the Hon. Member. However, I have been advised by the official from the Department that there is nothing in the Bill before us or in the new agreement which bears on a relationship between that industry as it existed prior to the Bill under the old agreement, exists under the new agreement or exists under the new Bill. My advice is that although I am not aware of the meeting to which he has referred, there is nothing pertinent in the Bill which would change that arrangement.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I want to be very specific. Is the Minister saying, as the Minister offering the Bill for our approval—

Mr. Nielsen: He is saying he does not know.

Mr. Stevens: —that there was no meeting between the Government and representatives of the sheep raisers of Canada, or is he saying that he just does not know?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I am indicating and I will repeat to the Hon. Member that, first, I am unaware that such a meeting had occurred. But indeed, with regard to any reciprocal arrangement between Canada and New Zealand or, indeed, between Canada and any other country, I have no doubt that there are meetings continuously through a wide variety of interests of trade between various countries. The point that I was making, and I do not apologize, is that I am unaware of the specifics of such a meeting. It would be virtually impossible for one person to be aware of all the meetings of all the trade associations of all the countries of the world, and of all the bilateral and multilateral agreements with Canada.

Furthermore, at the outset I would indicate to the Hon. Member as well that although I have been diligent since undertaking new responsibilities in this new ministry, I have only had the responsibility for just one month approximately.

Mr. Stevens: You are asking us to approve it.

Mr. Cosgrove: I am sure that as time goes on further details will be made available to me. The point I am making in response to the question is that the question is not pertinent. I am asking for approval of a Bill.

Mr. Nielsen: That you know nothing about.

Mr. Cosgrove: The Hon. Member has asked a question which has nothing to do with the Bill.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, let me then follow up and ask the Minister whether he could tell us when this arrangement was discussed, and with which Provinces, prior to its being signed with New Zealand?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I am assured that the provincial governments, major governments, that is, governments interested, were consulted through the Ministry of Industry, Trade and Commerce and that there is no Province which has registered objection or non-support for the Bill which is before the House.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, could the Minister specifically indicate to us what Provinces were consulted and when they were consulted, prior to the Government entering into this arrangement?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, if indeed the dates of consultation are an essential ingredient to the Hon. Member deciding, in his own mind, the force or relevance or necessity of a particular provision of the legislation before us in assessing whether he can support the Bill or not, I will ask for those specific dates and provide them to him.

Mr. Nielsen: Were the Provinces consulted?

Mr. Stevens: Again through you, Mr. Chairman, perhaps I could draw the Minister's attention to a press release issued by the then Canadian Minister for Trade, the Hon. Ed Lumley, on September 25, 1981. As stated in the press release, Mr. Lumley said:

> —the Federal Government had consulted closely with Canadian industry and provinces prior to the renegotiation of the agreement and that there was widespread support for the continuation of preferential trade arrangements with New Zealand.

I will give the Minister one further chance, Mr. Chairman. Specifically, what was the nature of the consultation to which the Minister's predecessor referred with respect to Canadian industry? Specifically, what were the Provinces to which he referred, or did he mislead at that time? Second, what evidence can the Minister give us to back up the statement "that there was widespread support for the continuation of preferential trade arrangements with New Zealand"? You will recall, Mr. Chairman, that all the Minister said was that there was no objection. However, the Minister's predecessor said that there was widespread support, both from industry and from the Provinces. To what was he referring?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I indicated that I would provide the dates of the consultations between the Provinces affected and the former minister, Mr. Lumley. I would be happy to provide that information. As I understood the press release, which I do not have in front of me, it was plural. I think it stated "industries" and "Provinces". The only point I am making to the Hon. Member is that there is no doubt but that there were many industries affected.

Mr. Nielsen: And many Provinces.

Mr. Cosgrove: If his question now relating to that statement bears on his first question, which I think related to agricultural products or products arising from the raising of sheep, I would be happy to provide him with those specific dates.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, all I am asking the present Minister of Trade to do is simply to give us the evidence which his predecessor felt warranted the issuing of the press release stating that he had widespread support for the continuation of preferential trade arrangements with New Zealand, having specifically referred not to Canadian industries but rather to Canadian industry and the Provinces. All I am asking is: Where is that widespread support to which he referred? Where have the sheep farmers of this country indicated their widespread support for the preferential arrangements that the Minister is now proposing be carried out with New Zealand?

Mr. Nielsen: Which Provinces supported it?

Mr. Stevens: Which Provinces gave widespread support to that preferential treatment with respect to New Zealand mutton and lamb? I ask this, Mr. Chairman, because you will recall that not long ago, a few months ago, the situation got out of hand. The situation got so out of hand that the Minister of Agriculture had to try first persuasion and then bring in quotas to slow down the entry of lamb and mutton and other sheep products into this country from New Zealand. If the Minister is seeking the approval of this House, I think it is a very simple question to ask where the widespread support is that his predecessor claimed he had for this type of arrangement.

• (1620)

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I indicated that I would indeed inquire and get the dates of specific meetings if, indeed, they were held. The Hon. Member is reading from a press release that does not come from my predecessor but from the former Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. It was not that statement which I was relying upon in response to his first question as to whether there were consultations and what evidence prompted me to answer his question that indeed there had been meetings. I was relying upon advice which officials had given to my predecessor, the Hon. Mr. Bussières, when he introduced this legislation to the House in February of this year.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, you can see how easily this Government tucks things into various Bills. It can be most confusing. The Minister to whom I was referring was not the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce when I referred to the predecessor of this Minister. It was the Minister of Trade.

I realize that we are now concerned with finance, but it is, however, a trade matter that the Minister is being asked to present to the House at the present time. I will ask the Minister once again this very simple question, and he does not have to worry about dates for the time being. What Provinces have indicated support, of to use the words of the then Minister Trade, "widespread support for the continuation of preferential trade arrangements with New Zealand"?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, my hon. friend began by saying that he is not relying on the statement of the Hon. Mr. Lumley—

The Chairman: With respect to the Hon. Minister, there has been a reference to Members of this House by name. The practice is to refer to Members by their functions or constituencies.

Mr. Cosgrove: I am not referring to the press release which my hon. friend had in his hand. He concluded his remarks by making reference to that press release.

I must repeat my earlier response that when the Hon. Member reads the words "widespread provincial support for provisions of the Bill and support from various industries" in the press release that he is relying upon, those words are plural. The author of the press release, because he used the plural, may not have been referring specifically to the issue of mutton or lamb, I do not know. My answer was that I am prepared to provide the actual dates of discussions between Provinces and the Department that negotiated the agreement which was the subject of the questions by the Hon. Member. I hope to have those specifics within a short period of time, with the indulgence of the Hon. Member.

Mr. Nielsen: What Provinces were consulted?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Chairman, I am not trying to be difficult. When Bills of this nature were brought before the House for approval previously, the questions I have asked were taken as almost elementary. If the Government is asking us to approve some type of preferential trade arrangements with a foreign country, surely it is natural to ask if the Canadian industry concerned has indicated support and, if so, when and who? Did one or more Provinces indicate support?

In this case we happen to have an indication from the previous Minister of Trade in his press release that he had secured on behalf of the federal Government, after consulting closely with Canadian industry and Provinces, "widespread support for the continuation of preferential trade arrangements with New Zealand." As a preliminary matter, we are simply asking the Minister if he can tell us by name which Provinces gave that widespread support and how did the sheep raisers of Canada indicate their widespread support?

Mr. Cosgrove: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman. I thought I had indicated in my original answer that all Provinces had been consulted and that it was the dates which I said I would obtain for the Hon. Member. In fact, all Provinces were consulted.

In terms of the industry, I am advised that the maritime transportation industry, which is not necessarily the industry that the Hon. Member refers to but one that is affected and coincidental to the movement and exchange of these products, did express some reservations about the proposal dealing with the issue raised by the Hon. Member.

Mr. Stevens: When referring to the Provinces of Canada, I take it that all that happened was some type of consultation. The Minister is unable to offer any evidence that they actually gave widespread support and, as far as Canadian industry is concerned, the only reference he can make is to the maritime transportation industry. Do I understand that he can offer no evidence of widespread support from the Canadian sheep raisers who do make up a reasonably large industry? There are a million sheep in Canada.

Although this Government apparently enjoys damaging the industry and various sectors of our economy so haphazardly, surely the farmers who have that much at stake should be consulted. If they were consulted there apparently never was any evidence of widespread support.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, using the example raised by the Hon. Member for York-Peel, I would like to pursue this question for a few moments. The Minister has not advised us which Canadian producers were consulted and which ones agreed that we should make these tariff concessions to New Zealand? If they did agree, would the Minister tell us what we received in return for reducing our tariffs on these products to New Zealand? What advantages will New Zealand give to us?

I would like to use this opportunity to elaborate on what I think is a fundamental error which is being made in this country. It concerns the notion that we can gradually lower our tariff barriers because other countries are supposedly doing the same thing without giving too much real consideration to the problems which have been created, which we are facing now and which will be created in the future by this very piecemeal process we are engaged in.

Canadians are living through a major recession. Indeed, Don McGillivray, the national economics editor for Southam, described our current situation as no longer a recession but a depression. I remind the Minister that there are now 1.5 million Canadians unemployed. Our manufacturing industries are not just suffering temporarily. Tens of thousands of workers in our Canadian industries have been laid off. Many of them have not just been laid off because of a temporary recession and things will get better next month, next year or the year after; they have been permanently laid off because the plants in which they worked for many years are now closed.

We accepted, I think much too easily, the myth that if all the industrialized countries were to reduce their tariffs, we would all benefit. I suppose Canada is the only country which took that idea seriously. We have been reducing our tariffs. While some other countries have reduced their tariffs, they have found a host of non-tariff ways to keep products of other countries out of their country.

My colleague, the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain referred to Japan as an example. He suggested the reason foreign products are not sold in Japan to any great extent is that the Japanese people are loyal, patriotic and insist on buying Japanese products almost exclusively. That may be part of the reason but it is the smallest part. The real reason is that the Japanese have found a host of non-tariff ways to keep foreign goods out of their country. If a Canadian manufacturer or a manufacturer in some other country wants to sell in Japan, it can take up to three years of testing by the Japanese to see whether the product meets their standards.

A few years ago the electrical and electronic manufacturers met with Members of Parliament from this Party, and I am sure from other Parties. They discussed the possibility of the Japanese buying our generators. They said that Canadian manufacturers are efficient and competitive with other countries in the production of electrical generators. We were told that the Japanese electrical companies could not even look at a Canadian bid unless the electrical generator industry in Japan was at 100 per cent capacity. Only then could it look at a bid from Canada or some other country. Countries belonging to the European Common Market, by the use of various techniques, are keeping out goods or reducing the sale of manufactured goods and agricultural products—

The Chairman: With all due respect to the Hon. Member, I must point out that this is Committee of the Whole. The rule of relevance has to be applied strictly. We are discussing Clause 1. The Chair has adopted a certain tolerance to the Hon. Member but requests him to direct his remarks more explicitly to the Bill before us.

Mr. Orlikow: Mr. Chairman, I take heed of the point you have made. I recognize that this is not the time for full scale discussion on the question of tariffs. However, we are dealing with a specific tariff item. This is the first opportunity I have had in a couple of years to urge the Government not to bring in proposals for tariff changes item by item or piece by piece. Rather, the Government should come forward with a policy which includes all tariffs, including New Zealand mutton, Japanese steel and cars, and Hong Kong electronics. That would give us a picture of how they see the tariff policy of Canada working as part of a whole industrial strategy.

I am not going to be long. We have no industrial strategy. We know which industries in this country have been virtually eliminated.

The Chairman: Order. Again I must call the attention of the Hon. Member to the fact that his remarks at Committee of the Whole must be relevant. Committee of the Whole is not repeating a general debate such as takes place at second reading.

Mr. Orlikow: I will conclude by asking the Minister to give some consideration to my suggestion of a Government statement outlining its views on the whole question of tariffs, which tariffs we ought to have in Canada, what areas should be given protection and what areas to let go. There was a study which suggested that the automobile industry, which is centred mainly in the Minister's own Province, Ontario, takes one job in ten.

Mr. Nielsen: I guess he didn't hear you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Orlikow: Maybe the Minister could deal with that at some point.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the Hon. Member began by relating his question to the question asked by the previous questioner dealing specifically with the agreement between Canada and New Zealand. He said, and I will try to paraphrase him correctly, that we are offering some change to New Zealand, offering a preference, a lower price or something like that. He then asked: "What did you get in return?" The point I tried to make in answer to the first question was that in that area of the Bill before us, under Clause 1 there is no change. The purpose of the agreement is to bring the agreement and relationship between the two countries up to date, but we did not change the tariff amount or schedules.

We did address the point of the Hon. Member who just asked the question that we should be concerned in all our relationships with our trading partners that they be efficient and beneficial to both Canada and New Zealand. The new agreement that is referred to in Clause 1 addresses the issues specifically on these points. The agreement maintains the tariff treatment. Moreover, it establishes provisions for consultation and compensation. These are provisions which were not in the original agreement and which will streamline the relationship and be beneficial as well as achieving the objectives mentioned by the Hon. Member.

The new Agreement contains a provision to promote commercial and industrial co-operation between companies in both countries. It establishes a link and a provision for that kind of exchange between countries so that we can address some of the problems the Hon. Member now raises. I know he talked about it in a general way. Specifically in Clause 1, dealing with that agreement, we were concerned about these features. We believe we have come a long way in updating this agreement, providing for a freer exchange and assistance to industry to overcome some of the problems raised by the Hon. Member.

On Clause 20—1932. c. 34.

Mr. Lambert: Without going to any great lengths, I would like to reiterate what I said in my opening remarks on second reading. I find it passing strange that the New Zealand-Canada Trade Agreement should be brought in by the back door as some Clause in a Customs Tariff Bill. We did quite a few things in this Customs Tariff Bill and Hon. Members have been agreeing and agreeing when, frankly, they did not know what the hallelujah they were talking about.

In any event, I agree with the Trade Agreement. If you would like to look it up in the Customs Tariff, Mr. Chairman, you will see the Australia-Canada Trade Agreement of 1960. That was passed as a separate Bill within the terms of ratification of that Trade Agreement. This Bill brings in a new Trade Agreement. Incidentally, I wish to correct the Minister. That Agreement was not available when the debate started. It was made available by the Minister after pulling teeth and threatening him with all sorts of verbal mayhem. Finally the Minister did table it under Section 41(2) of the rules, but it was not available when we started the debate.

I would like to reiterate what my colleague from York-Simcoe said regarding these types of agreements, which Parliament is called upon to ratify. We are merely agreeing to it. We cannot modify it in any way. I think the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance will agree that any agreement between Canada and a second nation with regard to income tax has to be ratified in this House and in the other place. There is not one Clause which is amendable unless the Government wishes to go back on its agreement. Therefore, it is frankly a nullity in this House and we are rubber stamping.

This is the point I would like to make. I suggest with all due deference, Mr. Chairman, that we find something better than this procedure of rubber stamping international agreements. Even if we are all agreed it should be changed, we will told by the Minister responsible that, unfortunately, it has been concluded by External Affairs, or by some other Ministry empowered to engage in the negotiations, and change cannot be made without the consent of the other country. That is logical. But why, then, should we rubber stamp it and therefore give this Agreement the approval of Parliament? Approval my eye. There are many income tax agreements which my colleague from York-Simcoe showed were absolutely wrong. Some have actually been held up and renegotiated as a result. One is expected to rubber stamp them here in the House.

At this point I want to say that I deprecate this kind of practice. This Bill is almost an omnibus Bill. My colleague made some mention of a system of measurement. Well, that is all being changed. And there are other matters. However, in so far as the general preference tariff concerned regarding, shall we say, the developing countries, to my thinking, this is a step forward. The Hon. Member should encourage as much possible practical development under this type of tariff arrangement. It is not always easy for industrialized nations such as Canada to trade in volume with developing countries because these countries are trying to develop industry as well. They want to sell us all sorts of things even to the point that we should shut down some of our industries in order to accommodate them. It is give and take. The fact that Canada has lowered its tariff rates in this particular area is, I think, commendable and a step forward, and I recommend it to the House.

Mr. Cosgrove: I would like to thank the Hon. Member for his comments on another provision of the Bill. Anyone listening to the debate this afternoon might have concluded that it dealt with the New Zealand-Canada Trade Agreement by itself. I am glad he made reference to other areas and is in agreement with them. Obviously I know, and the Hon. Member knows as well, that the Bill, for example, provides preference for items that pertain to disabled persons and which are not manufactured in Canada, and thus they will be supported by this legislation.

I would like to say that the first point he raised is well taken. We have before us an Agreement signed under the leadership of another Ministry. I would hope, though, that there would be opportunity for Hon. Members to discuss in another forum those various Ministries which incorporate agreements with other countries. For example, there was discussion between the Provinces and the Ministry of External Affairs. That negotiation obviously was not closed. There would have been, I hope, some form of discussion of that Agreement with a minister in another forum.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 21 and 22 agreed to.

Schedule I agreed to.

On Schedule II—

Mr. Fulton: I wonder, Mr. Chairman, if the Minister could respond briefly, with respect to Schedule II, on some of the tariff items listed, such as fish packed in preserved oil, caviar, vegetable oils, industrial shop towels and so on. Would he comment on just how the tariffs are arrived at? I recognize that External Affairs and other negotiating departments have been involved, but it seems passing strange to me, particularly in relation to these fisheries products, that the general preferential tariff, particularly on fish, vegetable oils and paper products, is free when those particular industries are having such a tough time at the moment.

• (1650)

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I think the question was covered by a question from a member dealing with a specific industry concerning clause 2 of the Bill this afternoon. The general method of operation in reviewing changes in a Bill is to consult with the Provinces and the industries affected. Perhaps I should not have begun by saying that, because in fact the provisions raised by the Hon. Member are not changed, they are merely a repetition of existing legislation. So those provisions are a repeat of what was in the previous legislation.

Mr. Fulton: If I could get the Minister to address it a little more directly, Mr. Chairman, times have certainly changed since this matter was previously before the House, certainly in the fishing industry, particularly the groundfish fishery, many commodities of which are touched on in this Trade Agreement.

I know the Hon. Member for York-Peel made the point, but I doubt that there is a single lamb or mutton producer in this country who would support the continued dumping of frozen New Zealand lamb into this country. Tuna fishermen or sardine fishermen would never support this kind of general preferential tariff. I am sure Hon. Members of this House would not want to support the passage of these particular things in the Schedules if in fact there is going to be unfair competition from offshore for Canadian industries which are already in serious trouble.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the changed provisions will be Schedule I. Those changes in fact were recommended to the Government by the Tariff Board after holding hearings and having consultations with the public and industries affected. So the way in which a review is done continuously is through the Board. Obviously the Board would be motivated to enter upon those reviews at the request of affected industries, the public and Members of the House. Again, all I can say is that Schedule II items were not changed. Schedule I items were changed, and almost entirely all of the changes were on the advice, accepted by the Government, of the Tariff Board after holding hearings.

Mr. Fulton: To deal briefly with what the Minister has just said, Mr. Chairman, I do not know how a single member of this House can possibly pass Schedule I since it just contains numbers. We have absolutely no idea what the commodities are or what the position of the various producers in Canada is. I just feel somewhat hamstrung as a Member of this House to be, even on division, dealing with such things.

In Schedule II, for example, there is the item "fish packed or preserved in oil". I cannot imagine a single Member from the Maritimes representing fishermen who would support the continued introduction of New Zealand sardines with no tariff whatsoever. Certainly in the mutton and lamb industry we have known for some time there has been dumping of offshore meat products into this country without tariffs.

Mr. Cosgrove: With respect, Mr. Chairman, the Member might be assisted by reference to the notice of Ways and Means motion which was tabled in conjunction with the Bill and which has to be read alongside the Bill. Reference from the Bill to the Ways and Means motion would then provide the link, the description of the product and other particulars. That, of course, was part of its introduction, first of all in the budget, and secondly when it was tabled in the House for study and consideration—on the last occasion when this matter was discussed, which was in February of this year.

I would think a Member who has had representations from a particular industry would have had the opportunity of identifying those items. I have had no request from any Members since February or since the tabling of this legislation that the Bill be changed or that they have objection in this specific area.

Bill reported.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): When shall the Bill be read a third time? Now?

Some Hon. Members: Now.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Or at the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Now.

An Hon. Member: Now, by leave.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): By leave, now.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, what stage are you reading now?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair is at third reading, apparently.

Mr. Nielsen: The next sitting of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Well, Hon. Members realize that we were proceeding more or less by an informal process and I have to take instructions from the House. Am I to understand that third reading will be at the next sitting of the House?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Chairman, with great respect, you take your instructions from the Standing Orders, and unless there is consent third reading will come at the next sitting of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): With great respect, that is precisely what I meant.

Mr. Nielsen: That is not precisely what you said.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I would dearly love a calm day after last night!

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, the rules are very clear on that point. Standing Order 75(14) states that when a bill has been reported by a Committee of the Whole, the motion "That the bill be now read a third time" can be moved. If hon. Members opposite are against such a motion, they can vote accordingly. However, the motion can be moved today. The Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) has said that this cannot be done. Moreover, you said yourself, Mr. Chairman, no doubt inadvertently, when you interrupted him that this was precisely the point you wanted to raise yourself. However, I respectfully submit that, if you look in our Standing Orders, you will realize that when a bill has been reported by a Committee of the Whole, the motion for third reading can be moved the same day. If my colleagues opposite are not willing to proceed in this manner, we are quite prepared to wait if necessary. We are not obliged to do so under the rules; we do it simply as a matter of courtesy towards Hon. Members opposite, and I really wonder why we show them such courtesy. However, if you want to put the motion, we are ready to vote, and if you want to defer the vote, we are also prepared to agree that motion for third reading be deferred to a later date.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: The Chair has made its ruling and we are happy.

An Hon. Member: What ruling?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair will seek the assistance of the House. I indicated to Hon. Members that the Chair had been proceeding informally, as is often the case, listening to Hon. Members, particularly House Leaders, advising me which way things may proceed. Now, I undid myself, if I might put it that way, and I asked again for the views of Hon. Members as to how the House may wish to proceed.

I note the reference of the Hon. President of the Privy Council to Standing Order 75(14). The last phrase of that Order reads that a motion "may be made in the same sitting". I see no difficulty with it being made, but whether the motion will be accepted by the House is another question. The motion would be "That the Bill be now read a third time and passed".

• (1700)

Standing Order 72 reads as follows:

> Every bill shall receive three several readings, on different days, previously to being passed.

The Standing Order provides the following exception:

> On urgent or extraordinary occasions, a bill may be read twice or thrice, or advanced two or more stages in one day.

We could agree that we had completed second reading, if that is agreeable to all Members. Now, I need direction from Hon. Members on which way we will proceed.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Chairman, I was referring to Standing Order 75(14), which states:

> When a bill has been reported from a standing or special committee, and no amendment has been proposed thereto at the report stage, and in the case of a bill reported from a Committee of the Whole, with or without amendment, a motion, "That the bill be now read a third time and passed", may be made in the same sitting.

Which means that the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) is totally mistaken when he suggests that such a motion cannot be introduced until the next day.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Do I hear a motion that the Bill be read a third time? May I put that motion to the House?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you heard the Government House Leader say that we will be prepared to have the Bill—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I put the question "When shall the Bill be read the third time?", and I understood that the response to that was "At the next sitting of the House".

Mr. Pinard: I said "now".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have a disagreement from the floor, so I shall put the question. The Hon. Member for Yukon is rising on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the Opposition showed its co-operation yesterday and it is showing it today in getting Government legislation through. Even if the Government House Leader's interpretation of the rules is correct, I am asking for his consent to put third reading over to the next sitting and to carry on with Bill C-129 now.

If that spirit of co-operation, that he has requested us to display, and which we have displayed, exists across the aisle, he will agree to providing that consent, even if he is correct, that we go to third reading of this measure at the next sitting or whenever he chooses. I make that request in the spirit of continuing co-operation.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, at the beginning I was most reluctant to impose third reading on another day because originally that is what was required by the Standing Orders. That is not the case now, when the Hon. Member for Yukon very politely makes the request that we agree to vote on third reading at the next sitting of the House. We are willing to agree to his request. We will vote at another sitting of the House, not necessarily tomorrow but at a sitting of the House when the Government sees fit to call the Bill back for third reading.

For the record, I should like it to be known that we had all our Members here today to vote on third reading, if need be. If third reading is deferred, it is not because the Government is not prepared, with all its Members in Ottawa, to vote on third reading.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I do not know what inference is intended, but we are in the same position with respect to Members being here and prepared to vote. That was not the reason for asking for the Government's co-operation in consenting to defer third reading until the next sitting.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, what is going on? I rise to seek clarification. Quite obviously there is an inconsistency here. I am curious to know how one can interpret Standing Order 72 in light of Standing Order 75(14). Standing Order 72 reads:

> Every bill shall receive three several readings, on different days, previously to being passed.

There is no ambivalence about that; it is quite clear that a Bill shall receive three several readings on separate days. Standing Order 75(14) provides that a motion may be made "That the bill be now read a third time". It says "may be made", Mr. Speaker. It does not say how the motion is to be disposed of, however.

The question that arises in my mind is, which of the two sections takes precedence? I should like to refer that matter to the Chair.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: The discussion is academic since we have agreed that third reading be given at a later sitting.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think the Chair would be even more unwise than usual to give hypothetical rulings on questions. If I do not need to get near a ruling I would rather not. I have enough trouble with the rulings that I have to get near.

Mr. Deans: As long as you make no ruling, I do not care.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There appears to be an agreement, which has not reached the stage of a procedural agreement, that we do not have third reading right now. I do not need to say anything more about the subject than that. We will proceed to the next order.

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-129, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion? There are some Members standing but I cannot determine whether they are doing so because they want to be recognized or because they are in motion, or whatever.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Speaker, I thought the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) or the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) would speak on second reading of this Bill, as happened on other occasions. If there is someone present who is going to speak, of course I shall sit down.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, what instructions did you ask of the House? I am sorry. You asked for instructions from the House as you introduced the Bill. Could you repeat them?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I am not sure what is happening today but nothing is working very well so far. The Chair read the usual form introducing second reading of this Bill. Following that, I would ordinarily recognize the Minister whose name is attached to the Bill. If the Minister wishes to speak, perhaps the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) would permit him to do so. I have been waiting for a Minister or anybody else on my right to stand, as is the usual practice. Shall I recognize the Hon. Minister of State (Finance) (Mr. Cosgrove)?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, on behalf of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), to move second reading of Bill C-129, an Act to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act, referred to as the IDA Act.

• (1710)

The International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, or the World Bank, was established near the end of the Second World War, first to assist in the rebuilding of war-torn Europe, and then subsequently to help in fostering economic development in developing countries.

In 1960, in order to accelerate the work of the World Bank in the very poorest countries of the world, member countries of the World Bank established the International Development Association, or IDA. Canada was a founding member of both institutions to which I have referred, and through the years support of the World Bank and IDA has remained and will remain an important and secure part of Canada's aid program.

In 1980, the Government of Canada committed itself to reversing the trend of the last years of the 1970s and to expanding Canada's Official Development Assistance Program to 0.5 per cent of GNP by the middle of the decade and to use its best efforts to achieve 0.7 per cent of GNP by the end of the decade. In the economic statement of last week, the Minister of Finance reaffirmed this commitment. While planned ODA expenditures will be somewhat less than were planned a year ago, they will still be growing nonetheless at a strong pace and will absorb a growing portion of our national product. This growth will allow Canada to meet its international commitments both through bilateral and multilateral aid.

The World Bank and IDA are the single most important multilateral institutions in the world dedicated to fostering economic health and well-being. Working on the base of a small amount of cash provided by governments, recently just 7.5 per cent of the Bank's capital, the World Bank went out and used the remaining callable capital guaranteed by governments to borrow in the international capital market. These resources were then lent to developing countries on commercially related terms for economic development projects.

These projects are carefully chosen and evaluated by World Bank staff in co-operation with local authorities in user countries to ensure that the projects are well designed and have a high rate of return. For example, in 1982 the World Bank approved some 150 loans valued at over $10.3 billion to more than 43 developing countries.

On the other hand, IDA depends almost totally on government contributions to fund its program of long-term loans on very concessional terms to developing countries with annual per capita incomes below $730. However, IDA projects must also maintain the same high quality characteristics of World Bank-financed projects to which I have referred and, where necessary, technical assistance is provided to ensure that the objectives of the projects are achieved.

In 1982, IDA approved 97 loans to 42 borrowing countries valued at some $2.7 billion. However, the contribution of the World Bank and IDA to the improvement in the quality of life in poorer countries far outweighs the reference to dollar value which I have just indicated. These projects are leaders in the assistance of building essential social infrastructures of user countries.

In the difficult world economic and financial situation, the needs of developing countries or poorer countries are particularly acute. At a time when they are faced with growing demands for a better quality of life for their people, lower demand and prices for their exports and higher debt loads have resulted in a reduced capacity for their governments to meet the needs of their citizens.

The World Bank and IDA are playing an important role in helping to sustain development programs in developing countries. In providing valuable foreign exchange, the Bank and IDA also help to stabilize the international financial system and to maintain demand in developing countries for the exports of industrialized countries. I should like to emphasize this by repeating it. I think the point is obvious, that in providing valuable exchange the Bank and IDA also help to stabilize the international financial system and to maintain demand in developing countries for the exports of industrialized countries which contribute to the funds.

A lessening of aid at this time would further weaken the prospects for economic development in these countries both now and in the future. The related Bill C-130, being introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), to provide funding for a number of regional development banks of which Canada is a member will also assist in maintaining essential aid flows. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Pinard) referred to that Bill and indicated that it will be before the House shortly.

Bill C-129 will permit Canada to continue to help the World Bank and IDA carry out their present function in this important work. The first part of the Bill amends the Bretton Woods Agreements Act which governs Canada's participation in the World Bank. The amendment raises the value of the shares of the World Bank that can be purchased by Canada from the $1,112,200,000 currently in the Act to a new amount of $2,178,200,000. These obligations are measured in 1944 U.S. dollars which are currently equal to about $1.47 Canadian. In layman's language, the amendment will permit Canada to subscribe to some 10,410 World Bank shares valued at approximately $1,600 million in current Canadian dollars. This is equal to 3.19 per cent of the U.S. $40 billion general capital increase. However, only 7.5 per cent of the face value of the shares, or some $120 million Canadian, must actually be paid in over a four to five-year period. As I indicated, the remainder of our subscription is callable and represents a contingent liability for the Canadian Government.

Subclause 4(a) of the Bill amends the IDA Act in order to permit Canada to honour its commitments to the sixth in a series of resource replenishments of IDA since its founding in 1960. This sixth replenishment of IDA was negotiated in 1979 as a three-year $12 billion replenishment for the period 1981-83. Canada agreed to contribute 4.3 per cent, or $601.8 million Canadian.

Subclause 4(b) amends the Act to provide a supplemental contribution to IDA in order to provide some $200.6 million Canadian for IDA. This is a bridging year between its current or sixth replenishment and its next replenishment which will proceed in due course.

The bridging arrangement is required because what had been intended to be a three-year replenishment of IDA has extended into the fourth year due to delays in U.S.A. contributions. In order to avoid a drastic decline in IDA resources during the fourth year, other major donor countries, expect the U.S.A. and including Canada, agreed in Toronto during the World Bank's last annual meeting to make additional contributions to IDA of some $2 billion. I am sure it is apparent that the Canadian delegation played a very prominent role in achieving this agreement.

The payments to the World Bank and IDA will be made in the form of non-interest bearing notes issued by the Minister of Finance over the next four years. Actual encashments of the notes will take place, however, over a number of years as the World Bank and IDA make disbursements on projects and programs in the developing countries. The budgetary implications of these amendments in any one year are, therefore, not large and have been taken into account in the budgetary forecasts of the Government.

In conclusion, I have some comments as to the importance and significance of the issues raised in the Bill before the House. I have made reference, of course, to large amounts of money and a number of figures.

As all Hon. Members probably know, developing nations have been hard hit by the one-two punches of higher oil prices followed by the international recession and high interest rates to which I have referred. Their finances and their borrowing capabilities are at present sorely strained.

In addition, the developed nations have been equally hit by the international recession, and in many cases have found themselves under pressure to curb assistance to the World Bank. Many of these uncertainties arose at the 1982 annual meetings of the Board of Governors of the International Bank held this September in Toronto. There was frankly, Mr. Speaker, deep concern that strains created by the delay in the U.S. contribution to the IDA could cause the crumbling of the current system of multilateral burden sharing. Notwithstanding that bridging agreement, the challenge to the supporter countries, to the Bank and to IDA remain and continue to exist. There will be challenges to all contributor countries.

This Bill before us today represents a confirmation that Canada will not desert the developing nations when they need help the most. This Bill is a confirmation not only to Third World nations themselves, but to developed nations, who under pressure at home—like Canada—might be considering cutbacks in support to Third World lending programs.

It is in that context that I call upon and urge all Members of the House to join the Government in making apparent the extent of support of Canadians in the commitment to these programs and to speed the support and consideration of this Bill, which is so badly needed by developing countries.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Mr. Speaker, today we are considering Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act. I am pleased to put before the House the position of the Progressive Conservative Party on this legislation. In doing so, I want to recognize the importance which these two very vital institutions have played over the past number of years, particularly in recent years, in the international financial markets of the country. They have maintained the stability of these markets by fostering economic growth in some of the underdeveloped countries of the world. Through the complementary role they have played with the International Monetary Fund, they have helped countries to adjust and find ways out of their economic problems.

The purpose of the legislation is to increase funding available both to the World Bank—the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development—and to the International Development Association which will allow them to continue to play the very important role they have played over the years.

The first basic part of this legislation is to authorize an increase in the Canadian contribution to the World Bank as part of an over-all doubling of its capitalization. This will assist the World Bank to continue the lending programs it has undertaken over the years in its practice of lending development funds basically on a commercial basis.

The second part of the legislation is to provide funding to the International Development Association, which is the agency that provides loans on soft terms to the less developed countries of the world—the poorest countries—in order to help them develop and grow. These two agencies have played a vital role and have been critically important in the past 20 or 30 years to the workings of the world economy.

In considering this legislation, we should stand back and look at the position in the international economy today. I have to say that this position is not encouraging. There is inflation as a result of oil price shocks, basically negative growth in so many countries in the world today, high unemployment and balance of payments problems, all of which have eroded the stability of the international economy. There has been an increase in protectionism as pressures on many countries develop. This threat of increased protectionism causes even greater pressure on the system than has been the case.

Another problem has been the deflationary pressures on some of the major commodity prices. The extreme pressure which this puts on those less developed countries in the world who rely to such a great extent on the export of natural resources obviously has created problems for those countries.

Finally, the current slowdown in the industrialized countries of the world, the United States, Europe, Japan and Canada, in itself adds to the pressures that are being placed on the less developed countries of the world. The outlook for the immediate future obviously is very grim. It is important for the industrialized countries of the world to understand the impact of this grim outlook on their own economies. More than one-third of the exports of the United States, Japan and the European Community are to the less developed countries of the world. The situation for Canada is not quite the same, but exports are still a significant part of our economy. They are a growing portion and Third World countries are potentially a good source for our markets in the years ahead.

Canada can look at this request for increased funding in two ways. We are a developed country and we are an industrialized country. I think we have an important role to play in the growth of the international economy by getting our own house in order, by getting our own inflation under control, by maintaining the monetary discipline that will lead to lower rates of inflation, and by controlling our deficits and government spending. Government spending has played such an important factor in the growth of inflationary pressures.

We must also look at the role we have played in improving our own productivity. We were reminded only two weeks ago of the fact that Canada's productivity record is the worst of the industrialized nations of the world. That is hurting our competitive position and causing more weakness in the over-all world economy because Canada is not pulling its weight. Canada is not doing the job it can do. People in this country have been urging the Government to perform. We can also consider the problems faced by the less developed countries in the world with a certain degree of empathy because, like them, we have a very extensive resource base which is a very important element in our balance of payments and economic position as a result of the jobs they create, the economic activity emanating from the mines, forests and so on in our country today.

We have suffered from the weakness in the metals markets. We see that only too clearly with the announcements out of Schefferville or Sudbury and in the Yukon and British Columbia. We also see the tremendous weakness in the forest products industry in British Columbia and in Ontario and the impact of energy prices on our energy industry today. These are all areas where we have suffered in the past year because of weakness in the over-all world economy, and those pressures which are felt in our country in those industries are very similar to the pressures felt in the less developed countries in the world. They have led to increased unemployment, particularly in those communities which are very reliant on the resource industries. There we have a very clear illustration of what is going on in some of the less developed countries which are totally reliant, for their export market, on the export of natural resources. Fortunately we have a stronger economic base. We have a manufacturing base and we export manufactured goods so that the impact of the world slowdown and deflationary pressures on mineral prices is, relatively speaking, less important to Canada as a whole but, obviously, is very important to those parts of the country which are directly affected.

I think we understand the position in which the less developed, poorer countries in the world find themselves today. However, we must also stand back and ask whether we are doing our part as important members of the world economic community, whether we are doing enough to bring back economic growth, or whether we could do better in addressing the needs of the world economy in the adjustment out of the very slow growth period we are in now, and in moving into an area of growth. We in the Conservative Party say that we must do better if we are to pull our weight in the world today. We must do better in productivity. We have not made any progress in productivity over the last three years. We have seen some progress in dealing with inflation over recent months, but it is a very slow recovery and it is much more related to the tremendous weakness in the economy today than to any actions taken by the Government to reduce these inflationary pressures.

Job creating investment activity in the country today is very weak. It is one of the key elements in the slowdown of our economy. Control of deficits is the key element and has caused great concern to members in the world financial community. Our record in controlling deficits has been absolutely atrocious. I do not need remind Hon. Members that estimates of our deficit going from $10 billion to $20 billion, and now approaching $25 billion, give no sense of confidence that we have our own economic affairs under control. Finally, in economic growth, we are still very much at the bottom end of the list of industrialized countries. So, we are not doing our job. We are not doing as well as we could to help the world itself get out of the economic morass it is in today.

Because of bad decisions and inaction on the part of past Liberal governments, the effort of pulling ourselves out of the recession has been particularly painful. The recession is causing tremendous problems in unemployment as well as tremendous social and political problems. The transition to recovery has been very slow and leaves us just that much more exposed to continuing economic problems in the international economy. However, as our recovery continues to be slow, we are unable to help in world economic recovery as we could if we were a healthier country. We must remind ourselves today of the fact that we are a part of the international economic community, and the more we can do to help ourselves, the more we could do to help other countries in the world.

Developed countries are the key to the health of the world economy. If there is continued stagnation in the United States, Europe, Japan and in other countries, there will be greater and greater economic problems for the less developed countries. The most vivid example concerns the problems being experienced by Mexico, but we should not simply look at Mexico, because other countries, like Argentina, Brazil, Zaire and some of the other African nations, are undergoing excruciating domestic pressures.

The debate today is a reminder that although the Government continues to blame the world economy, we are part of that world economy and must do our utmost to help it by working to bring about a healthier and stronger Canadian economy. The November budget had a very negative impact on job creating investment. The National Energy Program did tremendous damage to the oil and gas industry in the country, the one industry which was performing very well. The performance of the Foreign Investment Review Agency has slowed down economic activity in the country, as a result of obstacles it placed in front of that process. All these were wrong policies, policies which inhibited economic recovery in Canada.

I think we need only remind ourselves of the report in the paper this morning wich illustrated that the performance of the Foreign Investment Review Agency in the past few months has been turned around quite considerably from its performance in the previous two years. You must ask yourself, Mr. Speaker, why did the Government take over two years to implement these changes in the Foreign Investment Review Agency process? They are fundamentally the same changes to which we had agreed in 1979, in a Conservative Cabinet, which asked the Provinces for their comment before implementation. Once the comments came back from the Provinces, nothing was done by the present Government for two years. Therefore, we suffered during that two-year period, and the statistics in the paper demonstrate how easy it was for the Government to change that direction. However, the blockheaded nature of the former minister of industry, trade and commerce in following his own extreme nationalist thinking in stopping investment in the country has caused some of the problems we are facing today and has certainly exacerbated our unemployment problem.

Therefore, we should play our role in getting our own house in order so that we can alleviate the strains of people here in Canada, the pressures about which we read in the newspapers and in letters from our constituents, concerning the break-up of families, the increase in the divorce rate, suicides, increased crime rate and increased alcoholism. These are the social pressures that we see in Canada. However, when one considers the much more severe social and economic problems in the less developed countries in the world, we see the impact on our country in a microcosm.

The economic stresses also lead, in a very real way, to the protectionist pressures to which I referred a minute ago. We see this directly in the United States because there is such a direct impact upon our own country as a result of the number of bills before Congress today, the action taken by Congress in the trucking industry, the threat to our forest products industry and the "Buy American" legislation. These affect us directly. However, because some of those bills have a very broad effect in the world today, they will also affect the rest of the world, particularly the less developed countries which do not have the strength in their economies to resist the pressures such as Canada is able to do.

At the same time that we see these problems developing, we should consider the aggregate balance of payments deficit in the less developed countries which will have approached $90 billion in this current year. In aggregate, it will amount to some $500 billion. We look at the twin problems against that background of the high interest rates—and let us not forget that 10 per cent and 15 per cent interest rates today are still extremely high considering the huge $500 billion debt of those less developed countries—and the current practices of the commercial banks. They are pulling back somewhat from the role they have played because of the extent of the risk that they are exposed to, the extensive nature of the problems in the less developed countries, as well as the potential losses they are facing, particularly in view of the very real problem of the Mexican situation today.

This is the background to the legislation before us today on which we consider the request by the World Bank and IDA to replenish their capacity to lend money to the rest of the world today and particularly to those Third World countries.

I would remind the House that the World Bank lends money to the faster developing countries on harder terms, comparable to commercial terms, while the IDA is lending money on soft terms which are basically grants. Their terms are 50 years with no interest.

Let us review some specific numbers in relation to what is happening in the commercial banking community today. These figures illustrate a problem being faced by the poorer nations and the consequent relative increase in the importance of the World Bank and the International Development Association. Despite an increase of $16 billion in the aggregate current account deficit of the non-oil developing countries last year, bank lending to those countries increased only marginally, from about $49 billion in 1980 to $50 billion in 1981. The financing by this bank lending rose from approximately 39 per cent during the 1974-75 period to almost 60 per cent in 1979 to 1980. In 1981, the borrowing from banks fell back to approximately 50 per cent of the financial requirement. Obviously, there is a greater role for these international lending agencies to play.

Commercial bank lending to the low income countries and other net oil importers has obviously declined. Bank lending to the low income countries also fell during this same period, from a peak of almost $3 billion in 1979 to less than a billion dollars in 1981. This occurred during a period when the aggregate deficit of these countries rose by almost 40 per cent. The most marked deceleration in bank lending has been experienced by a group of the less developed countries known as the net oil importers. That is the background that we are looking at today. It clearly points out the important role that must be played by the multilateral lending agencies.

Clearly, the role of the commercial banks has declined due to the fragile nature of today's financial system, and the importance of the World Bank and IDA has increased, particularly in the case of the International Development Association. I am not suggesting that the role of the great international banks as key interveners will substantially be transferred to these international agencies, but there is a bigger job to be done and there is clearly an important need for the multilateral lending agencies today.

Canada must take its role seriously in fostering the stability of the international financial system. In a time of international financial stress, multilateral co-operation is a key factor in economic development, as is aiding the International Monetary Fund, the IMF, in its role of helping those countries through the adjustment process needed because of that economic stress I have mentioned.

As I have said, we must get our own economic house in order in particular to participate in the economic recovery that we so clearly need today. However, we also have a responsibility to our partners. Canada is one of the seven members of the Summit nations. Being a member of the Organization for Economic Co-operation and Development, we are also one of the leading industrial countries in the world. We are not making use of our country's untold natural benefits which include natural resources, mineral resources and energy resources. We are not making use of our ability to produce such vast quantities of food to the extent that we should.

Two weeks ago I reminded the House of the position of Canada in the world today. Of 81 countries in the world, measured by Euromoney in a composite measurement of economic growth, control of inflation, the competitive position of the country and its performance on the exchange rate, we are number 40. This is evidence that we are not doing nearly as well as we should be doing. For this reason we must get our economic house in order. Not enough is being done to assist this recovery and to reduce the volatility and instability in the international financial community. We must do more to restore confidence in our economy. Through that, we can do our part in aiding the rest of the world.

Against that background, let us consider Bill C-129 which is a Bill to increase financing, for the World Bank and the International Developing Association. We must ensure adequate funding for these agencies because of the magnitude of the international problem. I am not suggesting for a minute that problems can be solved by simply handing out money. We must also recognize that there is a limited amount of capital in a country such as Canada and the other industrialized countries of the world.

We must recognize, however, that aid is only part of the solution. The key to recovery of the less developed countries is to fight protectionism and keep the world trading system open. This is far more important than aid. Canada must do everything it can to resist protectionist pressures both within our borders and that of the other countries which are so important to us such as the United States, Japan and the European countries. We must fight protectionism in order to allow the less developed countries in the world continued access to world trading markets. If they do not have that access to the markets or to the technology transfer that can take place in the developed countries of the world, the world community will face serious problems in ten or 15 years.

That, too, is only a small part of the problem. Today we are focusing on the purpose of this Bill which is to provide more money for the over-all development process. Money is a very important element in the supportive role which developed countries can play in the recovery of the less developed countries of the world. Under the provisions of this Bill, the International Development Association is requesting approximately $600 million. We should understand that this will be drawn down over a ten year period. It is called the Sixth Replenishment. As the Minister pointed out, it is expected that that replenishment will look after the needs of the IDA for approximately the next three to four years.

Canadians must participate in this program because the International Development Association is the most important agency in the world today to assist the less developed countries. Confidence in the international financial system depends on the willingness of developed countries to play a role through multilateral agencies like the World Bank and the International Development Association.

If Canada and other countries do not play that role, the commercial banks will start to withdraw as well. If they see the confidence of governments of developing countries slipping in their ability to survive in the present state of the world, they too will slip. There is more need today for co-operative work between the commercial banking sector and the multilateral international financial agencies. The lack of such co-operation will result in a severe recession, and a depression will possibly follow.

Canada has an option. The Minister did not refer to it directly in his comments. Under the International Development Association rules, there is an agreement whereby if the United States does not take its full share of the requirements of IDA, other countries do not have to pick up their share. They can cut back on a pro rata basis comparable to the United States.

The United States has cut back significantly. It has cut back its participation at this time to less than 50 per cent of that which it would have to do if it were to play its full role. Other countries, including Canada, could also cut back. Others have not. I do not believe that Canada should cut back.

We believe Canada should continue to play the role it has played in the international financing community because of the importance of this lending and the effect which withdrawal of this lending could have if the tendency initiated by the United States spread to other countries. The overwhelming consensus at the World Bank meetings in Toronto in September was that the amount the IDA is asking for is an appropriate amount. The United States did not agree. It said that the extra money would make the fund act too quickly to save countries from the consequences of their own improvidence. There is a belt tightening that is going on and is necessary in the world today.

The United States is uncomfortably aware that doubling the national contributions can have a very important impact on their internal financial problems, because the United States is a 20 per cent participant. That is an extremely large role for the United States to play relative to its size in the world community. That would amount to a $13 billion contribution, a very large amount of money.

Even though the United States has cut back almost all its contributions, if not all, countries have decided to pick up their pro rata share and have supported the International Development Association in this way. Having said that, I believe the Government of Canada should assess its position very carefully on an ongoing basis. Can we continue to play as large a role as we have in supporting these multilateral institutions? If our economic performance continues the same, if we continue to have a weak economy, particularly when we come out of the recession on a world-wide basis, we in Canada may have to cut back. This places a greater emphasis on doing what we can in Canada to get our house in order.

I also mentioned the problem of procurement for the World Bank and IDA for the goods and services needed to complete the projects. Canadian companies are not getting their pro rata share. This has been a matter of continuing concern to those in the Conservative Party.

Over the years we have seen an increased role the Canadian companies have been able to play, going from about 1.3 per cent about ten years ago to the current level of about 2.7 per cent. That amounted to about $730 million in 1981, but it was not enough. It does not give us our pro rata share which is something just short of 4 per cent. Therefore we have further to go on the question of procurement and the importance of providing jobs in this country, not in the United States, Germany or Japan which are competing with us to supply these projects.

Finally, the Government must consider whether our aid and development money is being spent as carefully, with as little waste as possible and in the best interests of the receiving countries. There is on ongoing debate in Canada on this subject. As we are in a recession, spending of this magnitude is a very important consideration on the part of Canadians in seeing how the Government spends the taxpayers' money. Can we afford this kind of money?

When the Conservative Party was in Government in 1979, we authorized a full review of the role that multilateral agencies play in our aid programs, as well as the role which CIDA plays. This review was to commence in the early part of 1980. It has not yet taken place. We in the Conservative Party feel this review must take place so that people in this country who are concerned over the role and the performance of our aid program will have the opportunity to state their case and have it aired in a public forum so that there can be a full, hard-nosed debate on the merits of our aid program and what Canada should be doing. We want to have that open debate. I urge the Government to have this debate. It will be held shortly after the Conservative Party forms the next government. However, I urge this Government to move ahead with it soon because of the interests Canadians are showing in all these areas such as the role of the multilateral agencies, the non-government organizations, CIDA, the program projection I referred to, waste, the impact on receiving countries and so on.

Mr. Cosgrove: You mean you do not want the answer until the year 2000?

Mr. Wilson: The Minister says we will have to wait a long time. We will not have to do that. Call the election today and we will have that review of aid programs started by the middle of next year. We in the Conservative Party are still committed to that review and it will be carried out as soon as the election is completed.

In conclusion, it is my view that the World Bank and the International Development Association have an important role to play in the international financial community. It should continue to receive the support of Canadians. Some feel that more support should be given, others that considerably less should be given. The consensus reached by Canada and other industrialized countries of the world is that the amount requested in this legislation is about the right amount. Some feel that Canada's record of foreign aid performance can be improved upon. We agree. That is why we asked for that committee. We feel that if we are to control waste and all these other things I mentioned, there should be that open debate by a committee in order that the performance of Canada's foreign aid program can be improved considerably.

We must also keep under constant review the over-all level of aid and the balance between the multilateral agencies and the bilateral aid we make directly available to countries of our choice. All of these are important considerations. Taking all these factors into account, I want to say that the official position of the Progressive Conservative Party is that we support this Bill.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

BRETTON WOODS AGREEMENTS ACT

MEASURE PROVIDING FOR REDUCTION OF INTEREST RATES

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove, that Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Finance, Trade and Economic Affairs.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, we in this Party of course do support Bill C-129. In fact, we would say, thank heavens for the World Bank, and above all for the "soft window" as it is called, the International Development Association. We do not have the same faith as the previous speaker in the operations of the commercial banks when it comes to the understanding of and assistance—

Mr. Wilson: Where would we be if we did not have the commercial banks?

Miss Jewett: I will tell you in a moment if you will stay.

The commercial banks do not have the understanding of, nor have they really provided any assistance to, the developing countries. In fact, they have undermined them through their almost totally irresponsible behaviour throughout the 1970s in the expenditure of their petro-dollars. If the Hon. Member who has just spoken had been on the External Affairs Subcommittee on Canada's relations with Latin America, and had visited and talked to the people with whom the members of the Subcommittee did, he would not be quite so flattering and complimentary about the role of the commercial private institutions and, above all, the private banks, as far as the developing countries of this world are concerned, and indeed, as far as some of the developed countries are concerned.

It was the former Minister of Finance of Colombia, who was the only Minister of Finance of a vast number of developing countries, who refused the attempts of the private banking sector to give easy loans in the 1970s. He said, they were on their knees before us to try to get us to take out very, very large loans. The Minister of Finance at that time said he felt that going into such indebtedness would be a mistake. He was unpopular at the time, of course, but he proved to be right. All the Governments in that part of the world which we talked to agreed that the enormous overextension into loans at the instigation of the private banking sector, had been a very great mistake.

When the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) says that his main reason for supporting institutions like the World Bank or IDA is that if we do not, then maybe the commercial banks will not be as concerned about the developing world, I can only say to him that is absolutely the worst reason to argue for the support of international financial institutions.

The Hon. Member talks about the problems of the seventies and eighties in the international economic order. He talks primarily about the fact the banks may not be making quite as big profits as they made all during the seventies. He just seems to assume that, and perhaps the Government does as well, because we cannot persuade the Government that we should have at least a declaratory statute informing us where the major outflows of this private capital go. The Hon. Member never mentions the kind of profits the banks took out of the developing world. That is where they got most of their profits in the seventies. He never mentions that. Maybe the Hon. Member and the Government also feel that the banks and the multinationals as well, somehow are going to save the countries of the less developed part of the world. I say, thank heavens for the IDA, which is what we are discussing in the second part of this Bill, and indeed for the World Bank as well, which is the first part of the Bill and is pretty routine.

The most important part in relation to the IDA, which was touched on by the Minister and the previous speaker, but I think not fully enough, is that Canada and, indeed, all other members of the IDA are going to commit supplementary resources, to the IDA, Canada, in the amount of $200,600,000. This is being done for one simple reason, not that the United States has simply, as the Minister said, delayed its contribution, but that it has quite deliberately decided to spread its $3.2 billion commitment over four years instead of three. No word of criticism was heard about why the United States was doing this, but according to its own word it is doing this because the Reagan administration has been extremely suspicious of the countries receiving development assistance through the IDA, arguing that they are sloppy in managing their economies and that the reason for that is that they know they can fall back on aid. This is a sort of chastisement to the recipients. I wonder if the Reagan administration or the Minister, or the Tory speaker have ever looked at the results of that aid, particularly in the poorest countries. Eighty per cent of the loans from IDA go to countries with per capita annual incomes of less than $410. The economic returns on the loans average 18 per cent plus and that is just the quantifiable returns. Non-quantifiable returns, of course, would include the development of institutions within the country's policy reforms, and so on. Furthermore, several former IDA recipients are now IDA donors. Finally, IDA loans have never exceeded 2 per cent of total investment in recipient countries over-all. I think if we were a bit more open in our criticism of this cutback by the Reagan administration to IDA, if we did not allow them to get away with the crazy argument that the countries are sloppy in managing their economies, when economic returns have averaged 18 per cent plus, it would be more desirable than simply not saying anything.

IDA is absolutely fundamental. No commercial banks are going to get into IDA No other organizations except in the bilateral areas are going to get into something like IDA Even in bilateral assistance, it probably will become less rather than more in the future.

I was interested when the Minister talked about the commitment of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) not to go back on the 0.5 per cent of GNP for Canadian aid by the middle of the decade and 0.7 by the end of the decade. Of course, because of the drop in GNP there will have to be extremely substantial reductions in Canada's aid program over the next several years, reductions which were already begun by the Minister of Finance in his economic statement the other day. It is not, therefore, too hopeful a scene, as far as Canadian development assistance is concerned. All the more reason, therefore, to be grateful for our contribution to IDA The idea, somehow, that Canada can only provide assistance to the less developed parts of the world after we have looked after ourselves, forgets completely that our interests and the development of the developing world are mutual. They are interrelated. There are markets there for them and for us in the future. It seems to me that we do a disservice to the whole concept of development assistance, whether it is bilateral or through an agency like the World Bank, particularly the IDA. We do a disservice to that organization when we constantly say, as Liberals and Tories are saying, that we may have to reexamine our development assistance programs and the amount of money we are actually providing. It may be too much. We may not be able to afford it. That, to me, is just cutting off our nose to spite our face.

When you look at that part of the world we generally call the south and its enormous potential—I can speak immediately of South America, having visited there for some days, but for other parts of the world as well—it is so very shortsighted to think that there is any logic at all inthat kind of argument. The two go hand in hand; our development, world development, particularly developing world development. It is in both our selfish interest and in their interest, our mutual interest, that we not only support this Bill and the supplement I made particular note of in Clause 4(b), but it is also important to keep in mind Canada's individual financial developmental assistance programs with particular countries.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I believe some discussions have taken place between the Parties, and I understand that if we seek the consent of the House to go into Committee of the Whole and complete this Bill today, that that might be forthcoming.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Corbin in the chair.

The Assistant Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-129, to amend the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and the International Development Association Act.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 1 carry?

Some Hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

Some Hon. Members: Carried.

The Deputy Chairman: On Clause 2, the Hon. Member for York North.

On Clause 2—

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, we heard from the Minister as he introduced this Bill that the requirement for these funds totalling an additional $1.066 billion arose as a consequence of our obligation to acquire shares in accordance with the provisions of the Bretton Woods Agreement. It is significant Mr. Chairman, if we examine the terms of that agreement, and in particular the Second Schedule thereof, that, with respect to the issue of the acquisition of shares and additional shares that you will find under the provisions of the general operative Clauses relative to additional subscriptions there is no obligation imposed upon any member country to acquire additional stock in the Bank. We were also told that the quantum of acquisition in terms of dollar value really represented an obligation to take down 7.5 per cent in actual cash, with the balance of 92.5 per cent to be allocated and taken down contingently with the issuing of notes of the Government of Canada.

If we examine the Clause specifically we find that:

> The Minister of Finance may provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in the manner and at the times provided for by the Agreement therefor set out in the Second Schedule, of a sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole an amount equivalent to the subscriptions required or permitted from Canada, that is to say, two billion, one hundred and seventy-eight million, two hundred thousand United States dollars—

It is this additional requirement for funds, Mr. Chairman, to which I draw the attention of the House. This requirement increases by a total of $1.066 billion the funds to which Canada had originally subscribed. While it is true that of the additional subscribed shares referred to by the Minister only 7.5 per cent need be paid for in cash, there is nevertheless an outstanding obligation to pay for the balance.

We have heard from all Members of this House who have spoken, that they favour the provisions of this anticipated piece of legislation. We have been told that despite the fact we have severe economic circumstances facing us today, our obligation to the Third World over-ride the considerations which we as Members of Parliament have for our constituents and our country. We are dealing, Mr. Chairman, not with an inconsequential amount of money, but with an amount in excess of $1 billion. It was not long ago in this House when the Minister of Finance came before us and claimed, among other things, that we had severe economic problems. He said on page 5 of his prepared text that the recession has been deeper and longer lasting in Canada than the Government anticipated when the June budget was presented. We are going through the most severe economic turmoil since the 1930s. Yet tonight in this House we are presented with a Bill which calls on the taxpayers of this severe economically depressed nation to cough up an additional $1.066 billion, and I hear not a word of complaint from anyone speaking with respect to this issue. If any additional evidence was needed to prove that Members in this House are either silent by obligation or have lost contact with reality, it is surely this Bill and the way in which it has been received.

We are not dealing with ordinary financial circumstances in Canada; we are dealing with circumstances which are dire, and which, according to the Minister of Finance, are as severe as any since the 1930s. He went on to indicate that the thrust of Government policy should include, among other things, as referred to on page 12 of the printed text of his speech, the reduction in official development assistance of some $245 million. He also referred to the reduction in defence spending of $230 million. No papers accompanied the text of the speech of the Minister of Finance to disclose where the funds have come from and where we will look for the additional funds necessary for the project outlined by the Minister for the creation of additional jobs in Canada. The paragraphs of his speech which referred to that matter appear on pages 11 and 12 of the text where he speaks of creating 60,000 new jobs over a period of 18 months and 13,000 additional jobs in the housing field. According to page 11, the total would appear to be 400,000 jobs.

Let us analyse the effect of the obligation upon the Government of Canada to lay out $1,066,000. The effect is that we will have subscribed for stock in an international financial institution which is referred to as the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development. That bank will allocate the expenditure of those funds. The Government will have no control over whether one dime of those funds is spent in Canada to acquire products or services that will be used in the developing world. It will have no control, Mr. Chairman.

This is a further illustration of the remoteness with which funds contributed by the taxpayers of Canada can be dealt with, not by this Parliament, not by the Government of Canada, but by a foreign controlled financial institution.

I submit that we have an absolute obligation to deal with this Bill as an intrusion into the control mechanism that should be in place whereby the Government and this House should direct funds that are available for the creation of jobs in this economic climate. This has not been done, however.

I submit to the House that this Bill, including the Clause to which reference has been made and others to which reference will be made in this Committee, creates an opportunity for a genuine analysis of our foreign-aid programs, including those administered by CIDA and those administered in this fashion by the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development.

It also bothers me to hear that the 92.5 per cent of the obligations undertaken by the Minister of Finance in the event of the Bill being passed, will be disclosed in the accounts of this country as a conditional liability. That will amount to 92.5 per cent of an additional $1,066,000,000. Recognizing the practice of the Government in the past, an issue which has been dealt with in this House, I seriously doubt that there will be any amount on the national accounts with respect to this quantum of money, other than a contingent liability for $1. That process in itself deserves examination. Having regard to the comments made by the Minister, I am concerned that this method of issuing debentures, and of issuing demand notes for part of the liability undertaken by the Government of Canada, is out of step with reality when we examine our national accounts.

What we must look for when we deal with this substantial sum, is not the 7.5 per cent thereon, but the entire amount of the obligation. Accordingly, I point out to my colleagues that the comments made by the Minister might have been made for the purpose of placating Hon. Members who might otherwise have been concerned about such a gigantic expenditure. This reliance upon a deferred liability which is contingent, is not sufficient to remove the obligation upon the Government of Canada, once these securities have been issued, to honour them. Accordingly, we are dealing not with the apparent inconsequential sum of 7.5 per cent of the total amount, but rather, the entire amount of $1,066,000.

It is important to note that when Canada originally undertook its obligations with respect to Schedule Second payments, as of 1970 the aggregate amount of that obligation, if we examine Schedule A of the Second Schedule, was $325 million. Today, the total amount is $2,178,000,000, an increase over the last call of $1,066,000,000, as I have already said. This call is being made at a time when, without a doubt, the Canadian public could stand an injection of that kind of money into the various projects it has in mind.

It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, not only to speak against this Bill but, given an opportunity and the support of enough Members who will call for a recorded vote, to vote against this Bill.

I think it is time that the eloquence that accompanies the statement of the need, apparently, of other people in the world, is supported by action on the part of those who believe that the obligations of the individual Member to the Third World are paramount. I also believe that it is incumbent upon Members of this House who genuinely believe that their responsibility, in these times particularly, is to their constituents, to see that they have an opportunity to express those views clearly by putting their constituents and Canada first.

I hope that before this matter is concluded enough Members of the House will be sufficiently concerned about the nation and about our economic plight to ask that the matter be put to a vote. If it is, let Members stand and disclose the position they would take with respect to an issue which calls upon Parliament to expend an additional $1,066,000,000.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I should like to respond briefly to the comments of the Hon. Member who just spoke. I think the thrust of his remarks could be capsulized as "charity begins at home". Even if that were the case, and it is not, charity must begin at home, but it should not end at home. In prudence, I think any householder looking at a budget not only has to consider his obligations to that household, but also those of that household to its neighbours. It is not a question of charity. It is a question of interdependence. This has been touched upon by all Hon. Members who have spoken today. I reiterate that developing countries in their development engage Canadians and Canadian products in interchange and interdependence. Without this, the one-third of our GNP attributable to our trade efforts abroad stands in jeopardy. I simply make that point.

• (1830)

The questioner referred to the $1,600 million. He said that we should address that amount, not 7.2 per cent of it. The Government has to stand behind that guarantee. There is no question about it. I will put it another way: if he prefers to use that in a way in which Canadians might think it is a charge and a drain in terms of money actually being spent, let me say with respect, that it is not. It is approximately $30 million for the next five or six years. That $30 million annually goes to support actual dollars out. For the $1,600 million, it is approximately $1.25 per Canadian per year to support, as I said in self-interest, economic interchange and to provide funds desperately needed by people, in some cases to stay alive.

Mr. Gamble: The Hon. Minister just indicated that Clause 2 does not in fact provide what the words indicate. As I read the Clause, and I recommend it to the Minister, it reads:

> The Minister of Finance may provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development in the manner and at the times provided for by the Agreement therefor set out in the Second Schedule, of a sum or sums of money, not exceeding in the whole and amount equivalent to the subscriptions required or permitted from Canada, that is to say, two billion, one hundred and seventy-eight million, two hundred thousand—

If indeed the suggestion is that a simple sum of about $30 million be subscribed for, why does the Clause not say it?

Mr. Cosgrove: I answered that question in my introductory remarks, and I thought the Hon. Member referred to it in his remarks. He just explained that only 7.2 per cent of the actual money authorized is being called for. The balance remains as a guarantee, a contingent liability nonetheless, and an obligation. I do not argue that point. All I am saying is that in terms of dollars to be expended as a result of that take-down, it is roughly $30 million a year over the five year period.

Mr. Gamble: Having regard to the words in the Clause, "in the manner and at the times provided for by the Agreement therefor set out in the Second Schedule", where does there exist any obligation upon Canada to take down these shares?

Mr. Cosgrove: On the question of rights and obligations, I am advised that that issue has been one on which solicitors for the Government of Canada and other governments supporting the Bank and Bank officials have differed.

Clause 1 really bears in on that very point. Subsection 2(2) of the Agreement is changed to read, "exercising any rights" to carry out obligations. In the final analysis it is a bilateral agreement, supported by many bilateral arrangements through the Bank. If indeed the Government or Parliament decided that it did not want to exercise its commitment or a commitment, of course it would not be done. The Bill is here. The Government's intention has been expressed. The purpose of this whole exercise is to seek the support of the majority of Members of the House and to recognize the undertaking, if at no higher level, at a moral level.

Mr. Gamble: I point out to the Minister that pursuant to the provisions of the Second Schedule under which these payments are apparently to be made, and in particular Article 2(3)(c) thereof, there is a complete statement which deals with obligations. That Clause ends with the words dealing with additional subscriptions, that "no Member shall be obliged to subscribe any part of the increased capital". According to the Minister, this Clause is designed to accomplish the intention of the Government to subscribe for additional capital in the Bank. He has said repeatedly that the actual cash requirement was 7.5 per cent of the total amount and that the balance of the subscription was to be evidenced by notes which could be called upon by the Bank. Then he went on to say what happened with the notes, that the notes were then used for the purpose of raising money from commercial banks to advance to developing nations.

If the Minister is speaking today of an obligation only to take down 7.5 per cent in pay-in cash, why does Clause 2 not specifically refer to the cash requirement needed, rather than provide that the Minister may provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of the entire amount spelled out in Clause 2?

Mr. Cosgrove: The authority requested is for the total amount. The obligation of the Government, whether it is by way of cash, by way of callable subscription or contingent liability financing, is set out not in the Bill but in the Agreement signed between Canada and the Bank. The authority is for the top amount. The amount which is requested and for which authority is sought is contained in the Bill before the House this evening.

Mr. Gamble: Could the Minister then indicate clearly to the House that in the event the Clause is passed in its present form the entire liability of the Government of Canada to the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development will be $2,178,200,000?

Mr. Cosgrove: Yes.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Chairman, I want to make sure that until now, or prior to the doubling of our commitment, we have not ever been called upon to pay any of the callable capital. Have we ever been called upon to pay any of this 92.5 per cent which is callable?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I am advised by my officials that it has never occurred.

• (1840)

Miss Jewett: Mr. Chairman, the Minister will understand my concern. This is used as collateral for the private banks negotiating loans. As the Minister knows, I have pretty well lost faith in the private banks and their international lending policies. Perhaps the Minister can say something to reassure me that continuing with this practice of having this very large amount of callable capital will not, in fact, put the very funds we are talking about in some jeopardy, given the experience we have had with the private banks in the 1970s in their lending policies.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the last guarantor under the provisions we are dealing with now in this part of the discussion is the member subscribers under bilateral agreements with the banks. In effect, what the Hon. Member is asking me to do is to guarantee that the banks will act in a certain way together with a guarantee that certain countries will act in a certain way. All I can point to is the experience that we have had under this Agreement, not only during the 1970s, which is a period the Hon. Member uses as an example, but as well during the three preceding decades. No call has been made either on the banks or on a government.

Miss Jewett: Mr. Chairman, I would share the previous speaker's view but not for the same reasons at all. I would be concerned if I thought this amount of money were likely to be called upon. I know the Minister perhaps cannot give any positive assurance that it will not, but I want to register the fact that the first moment any of it should be, I think then we would very seriously have to look at the reopening of that particular arrangement.

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Chairman, I have one or two comments and also some questions. I understood the Hon. Minister to say that $30 million will be paid now but that the total amount will be $2,178 million. If that is not correct, would the Minister so indicate when he is dealing with my comments?

We are talking about a lot of money. There is a growing feeling across the country that the priorities of the Government are open to question. At the present time we have many people in need. We have more than one million people unemployed. Many of those people have now exhausted their unemployment insurance and are either living on welfare or with the assistance of relatives. If they are living on welfare, it is a burden that has now been shifted on to the Provinces' shoulders with the federal Government paying some part.

Also in this country many of our native people are living in utter poverty. Sometimes 27 people are living in a house that should hold five. This is not a pipe dream, this is the truth. We have Indian children and Indian women who are not getting enough to eat. We have many white people having a difficult time making ends meet. They are existing on welfare or some other type of meagre pension.

It is time for the Canadian Government to start checking its priorities. I do not think anyone in Canada objects to helping those in need in other countries, but, Mr. Chairman, charity begins at home. If we close our eyes to the poverty and the misery of people living in this country, that is pretty sad indeed. If we cannot find sufficient money to help the Indian people, the white people, those unemployed, those without enough to eat—and let us not think that everyone in Canada does have enough to eat—then we should be thinking twice about sending $30 million somewhere else.

If I understood the comments so far, we are doubling our commitment in this program. Instead, we should be doubling our commitment to the people who provide this money before we start doubling an amount and sending it to places where we do not know what will be done with it. That bothers me and I am sure it bothers others in Canada. There is no indication who is going to get this money and where it is going to go. There are no checks and balances on this money and $2 billion is a lot of money. Surely if we are going to start giving away such a sizeable amount of money, we should have an agreement that provides checks and balances so that we know where that money is going and who is going to get it.

People from some Third World countries have told me that they would not give a dime to help Third World countries because the wrong people get it. Many of the people living in poverty do not get help. How much of this money is going to those who are doing the work or heading up the organizations? Maybe everyone is completely honest and sincere, I hope they are, but the Canadian people should be given details when we are providing this much money in aid.

Unlike the Hon. Member from the NDP who just spoke, I have a lot of faith in the banks. I find the banks to be pretty honest and above board. Sometimes I object to some of the things they do, but by and large the banks provide a service to the people of this nation. However, I would like to know what is being charged by the banks that give this service. What is the interest rate being charged? How does it compare with the banks in our own country, and what are they doing? In other words, it is not simply okay to say that we are going to give $30 million this year to this organization when hardly 1 per cent of the Canadian people knows where it is going, what it is for and what the checks and balances are on that amount. Again, how much overlapping is there?

The majority of churches in this country ask their congregations for contributions for other countries. Congregations provide a lot of money for this purpose. Some provincial governments match dollar for dollar. I know a gentleman in Calgary, an ex-minister of a church, who spends his entire time securing funds for which he can get matching amounts for medical supplies to help doctors and nurses in other countries aid the sick.

I want to say that helping other people is part of the Canadian way. Canadians want to have some assurance that this money is going where it will do the most good. If we have people hungry in our own country, then let us look after them. If there is not always enough to go around, then the logical thing to do would be to cut down the amount going outside the country. Again, are these amounts simply welfare payments to other countries? The Government should have an answer to this question. If they are, the Government is simply helping people to become parasites, waiting for someone else to look after them.

Some of these countries have resources which they are not developing. One country was high up on the agriculture list at one time but received so many contributions that it is now way down the list and is depending on other countries more and more. The Government should be checking this type of situation. I object to following the thought that we will somehow help these people through their governments irrespective of their government's belief. I am not anxious to build up a communist state anywhere; I do not think it is any good for the people. However, when a country with a communist government gets this support and has control of it, and in some case it does, that government says: "This is our gift to you; keep us in office". It is not fair at all. We are building up a regime which might some day use its power to kill Canadians. Most Canadians do not want a communist state.

I want to raise another point. I was amazed when I heard a suggestion that the United Nations should be given the authority to tax Canadians. That would be a type of world government. If we ever get to that point, the smaller countries of the world would be submerged by international police forces. They would either have to pay or else. That is not the type of world I want.

I was a delegate to the European Parliament this last summer and I was amazed to hear one of the elected members start to talk about their parliament having authority to levy taxes on the 11 countries which belonged to that organization for defence purposes. They do not have that authority yet, but if they ever do, pity the poor countries like The Netherlands and Belgium which could be forced to do almost anything that the majority wanted, without any sovereignty. Sovereignty would go out the window. Our Government should be carefully watching to see that we are not playing into the hands of a world government, because I am satisfied that 95 per cent of the people of Canada are opposed to that type of philosophy.

I want to finish my remarks by saying that I am not satisfied with the information the Government has given. I do not know where this money is going or who is getting it. I think there is a responsibility on the part of the Government to give that information to the people. I could go to the Salvation Army and say, "You have spent so much money, where did it go?", and the Salvation Army could give me a dollar by dollar account of it. They could tell me which of the world's countries it went into, what is being done with it and how their organization is helping people to help themselves. I could go to some of the Catholic organizations and they would give me the same information. Why can this Government not do the same thing? Why does the Government not ensure that it get the information and then give it to the people? Then we would find a swelling interest in helping more, particularly in helping people to help themselves. In the future we should help other people in the developing countries and other countries to help themselves. The main point today is that we should help people in Canada who are hungry, our native people and other Canadians who are not getting enough to eat. Let us make sure that we look after them first, because charity begins at home.

Mr. Smith: As long as it does not end at home.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the Hon. Member for Bow River began by asking for confirmation of figures. The Bill seeks authorization for a further take-down of shares worth $1.6 billion over the next four to five years. In terms of the actual money which will be put into the acquisition or take-down of those shares by Canada, I would confirm $120 million over the four-year period. The rest is the area referred to by the previous questioner.

I was making the point that, in terms of per person commitment by the taxpayers of Canada over that period, something over $1 per person per year would go toward the actual dollar commitment in the Bill. However, the Hon. Member for Bow River is right when he identifies that decision of striking a budget, whether in one's family, in one's city or in one's country, as an extremely difficult one. It is a painful one. His criteria are ones to which I subscribe. Yes, charity begins at home, but it does not stop at home. Yes, if one is assisting people, whether at home, in one's city or wherever, the help should be of benefit to people so that they can help themselves.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that I did not come prepared to speak at length about the reputation of the World Bank. I would have thought Hon. Members would agree that its reputation is a good one. I did hit upon it obliquely in my comments, the point being that the World Bank has such a good reputation in administering funds in this way under these two projects that its participation is sought by the private sector banks which feel that, by joining with the World Bank, because of its administrative reputation they will be guaranteed a good project. The funds do go to infrastructure, into energy projects, into water and sewage systems and, in large part, into development of agricultural systems. As I say, I am not prepared to speak at length about the reputation of the Bank, but I would assure the Hon. Member that it meets all the criteria that he has hit upon.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Minister would confirm to the House that, in the event Canada should decide at any future time, before the obligation on the deferred liabilities was discharged, to withdraw its membership in the Bank, it would be obliged to discharge its liabilities under those deferred obligations.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, that is a very difficult question to answer on the spur of the moment. I begin by saying that the Government indicated its firm commitment to the worth-while objectives of the Bank and IDA. Our commitment, rather than being decreased in the Bill, we have sought to increase. I am encouraged that Hon. Members from all parties have indicated support for the Government's confirmation that this is a worth-while endeavour at this time, particularly because of the downturn in domestic economies, the world economy reflecting that. I would say it is unlikely, from any opinion I have heard expressed today, that there is any thought that there would be a withdrawal. Therefore, I believe the question is somewhat hypothetical.

However, in dealing with it as a hypothetical question, if one is withdrawing from the support of a bank, the person who is withdrawing is a depositor, and that person, rather than being faced with contingent liabilities, may in turn be able to call for the government's deposit, for the share amount that it has contributed. However, I think it is a very hypothetical question, Mr. Chairman.

● (1900)

Mr. Gamble: Just so that the general public may have some cognizance of what this deferred liability is, would the Minister agree that Canada's position with respect to the 92.5 per cent contingent liability is much like that of an individual who guaranteed a friend's loan at the bank and might be called upon to honour that obligation at some point in the future? Is that the kind of debt that we are talking about today?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes. We are supported in our undertaking that obligation by the fact that the majority of the industrialized world does the same thing under a formula that we all share in common and in which we all have confidence. We have confidence that the help which is sought is worthwhile in terms of humanitarian requests. Second, without this type of activity—the operation of the World Bank and IDA—both by Governments in co-operation with private sector banks and the total economy, if everyone accepted the hypothetical possibility of a call, there would be very difficult problems.

Mr. Gamble: I take it that the Minister appreciates he is tying the hands, or at least increasing the obligations, of future generations of Canadians. I submit to him that in the event that Canada decides in the future that it wishes to withdraw from the Bank for Reconstruction and Development, it has an obligation under these contingent deferred liabilities to meet every dollar which is outstanding under those obligations in the event that the Bank lends money to a foreign country as a consequence of Canada pledging the securities.

I want the Minister to recognize that this type of deferred liability for other Parliaments and other Canadians concerns some Members of this House. I realize that he suggested there is support in all parties for this Bill, but I hope he recognizes by now that there is not unanimous support for this Bill from all Members of the House and for the very best of reasons. We are not living in ordinary times. Some Members have come to recognize that these unordinary times are very difficult ones for Canadians. I would like to point to the Minister that I spent a great deal of time last week dealing with the problems of a single family whose business had become bankrupt. The husband in that family is recovering in a hospital from a mental collapse. By the twelfth of this month the family will lose their personal residence.

I am standing here and watching this expenditure of an additional $1.66 billion. I am told not to worry because only 7.5 per cent of that billion extra dollars will be laid out now and the rest is taking the form of a guarantee of deferred liability. I say to the Minister that in the event there is that kind of money available, either in cash or in guarantees, I would like some of it for the hard-pressed constituents of my riding. That is why I am standing here. That is why I am drawing this matter to the attention of the House. I hope there are other Members who recognize that they have the same kind of problems at home and would want to do something about them. Perhaps it would be beneficial to mention what is referred to in the non-budget speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), who said on page 3 of his written text:

> We must persist in restraining Government spending. We must strive to contain the rise of the deficit—

He went on to say that we must, at the same time, reallocate our priorities. There is nothing in this country that demands the greater attention of this House than the individual concerns of our constituents and the people of Canada generally.

In light of the comments made by the Minister of Finance, I wonder how this Bill, to use the words of the Minister of Finance, restrains Government spending.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, the example used by the Hon. Member in his question concerned a person in hospital. He also talked about a person losing a home. I know, in my brief experience in this ministry in association with the Bank, that it operates in Third World countries where the moneys are spent to provide the most fundamental and elementary living amenities for people. In other words, the people who are being served by these moneys possibly would not have any hospital services whatsoever.

As I have indicated, much of the money is spent in the infrastructure to make it possible for people living in primitive conditions to have a base upon which to build homes. It also addresses some very primitive living conditions in attempting to assist communities to achieve a minimum standard of health and living conditions for which these funds would be intended.

As I said in my opening comments, there is no question that Canadians are hurting. There is no Member in the House who would deny that.

To answer the Hon. Member's question, I believe he asked us to let Canadians know what the Government is doing. Technically, if Canada were to withdraw from the Bank, it would ask that its shares in the Bank be redeemed. The funds would be refunded to Canada. Technically, the Hon. Member's question means that Canadians would be reimbursed. I do not want to argue the question on technicalities. That is not how I, as a Member, would promote and encourage the support of the Hon. Member for this expenditure. The purpose of this expenditure is to serve and assist people who live in conditions that are even worse than those the Hon. Member has cited to us. That is why I would ask him to consider his support for this legislation.

Mr. Gamble: I am glad that the Minister has reverted to one of the questions which I had asked him earlier concerning our legal position with respect to liabilities upon our withdrawal. The Minister has just conjured up an image of our being paid for shares we have surrendered. I draw his attention to Article VI of the Agreement giving rise to our participation in this type of project which, in effect, deals directly with the issue of our subscription for shares in the Bank for Reconstruction and Development. I would draw his attention, in particular, to Section 4(a) which provides:

> When a Government ceases to be a member, it shall remain liable for its direct obligations to the Bank and for its contingent liabilities to the Bank so long as any part of the loans or guarantees contracted before it ceased to be a member are outstanding;—

The liability will remain for so long as any of those loans to which I made reference, made by the Bank on condition that those loans be guaranteed, with some of the deferred liabilities which we have pledged to the Bank, have been used for the purpose of raising money from commercial banks. That is, in fact, the conclusion to which one would come. It is the same conclusion one would come to with respect to the very simple illustration I gave a moment ago of an individual having guaranteed the liability of a friend to a bank. As soon as that liability is paid off, the individual is discharged. Until that liability is paid off there is no discharge of the guarantee. The guarantor is fully liable until the payment has been made. I am suggesting to the Minister that this is the conclusion to be drawn from a reasonable interpretation of the Section to which I made reference.

The Minister has, however, gone into the whole issue of poverty in Canada compared with poverty in the Third World. That raises a very interesting subject for discussion. As a matter of fact, it was with respect to a desire to deal with this issue that I asked this House, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance whether it would be appropriate to refer the entire matter of our foreign aid, both bilateral foreign aid of the kind referred to here or direct foreign aid of the kind administered by CIDA, to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, on which I serve, for a complete analysis and examination.

Of course, we had no such reference. It is very important, now that we begin to deal with the crucial difference between Canadians who are impoverished and those in the rest of the world who are impoverished, to ask ourselves whether it is not in part the responsibility of the wealthy in the poor nations who have gobbled up the national wealth of their own country and come looking to Canadians to bail them out and support them in the style to which they have become accustomed.

At the recent meeting of the World Bank and International Monetary Fund officials in Toronto, there was a congregation of representatives not only from the western industrialized world but from the Third World as well. As a result of that meeting, columnist Barbara Amiel wrote an article in Maclean's magazine making reference to the definition of the new International Economic Order, which was defined by some as a system whereby poor people in the rich countries give assistance to the rich people of the poor countries. She went on to say:

> Nothing could bring home the accuracy of the joke better than watching the joint meeting of the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank held in Toronto earlier this month, where senior diplomats from some of the poorest countries in the world seemed intent on setting new records for personal and national ostentation. Observers noted wryly that those countries with the largest delegations, longest stretch limousines and most elegant clothing also scored high on the closest-to-bankrupt index.

It is interesting that Miss Amiel should have noted, as she did, observations which I had made as a consequence of attending, with colleagues from all sides of this House, a meeting in Havana, Cuba in September, 1981 of the IPU. The Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council was in attendance with me. He can testify as to the accuracy of the comments I am about to make. It appeared to me and those of us who discussed it that, while we boarded a warm and crowded bus for transportation to and from the convention centre, the representatives of the Third World nations who sat behind us and around us in the conference chamber were picked up in Mercedes limousines, without exception. They were also the best attired and, if I may say so, having regard to the physical condition of some of them, appeared to be the best fed.

I find it ironic that the diplomats representing the poorer nations of the world should come to us and ask for handouts while they treat themselves to the best that money can buy. I would be very impressed indeed to find a representative from the impoverished Third World coming to Canada and saying to us: "As you can see from my attire, we are in need of your help".

All I can say, as matters presently stand, is that I would be more inclined to favour the representations if they had stripped themselves of but a half of their own personal wealth and maybe emptied out some of the Swiss bank accounts they have managed to establish. It is outrageous that we not open our eyes to what is happening around us.

Miss Amiel wrote an article about this. I personally experienced the same feeling of revulsion. I see that the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council is back in the chamber. He might want to comment on that having regard to his experience. That was indeed the situation that existed in Havana, Cuba at that meeting.

Although I was not at the meeting of the World Bank or the IMF in Toronto in September, that was the observation made by a reporter watching the comings and goings of those persons who have come to us with outstretched hands. My answer to them is to first of all make some changes at home.

The Minister raised the issue, saying that it is unfortunate that there are in those countries people who are suffering? I say yes, but it is the responsibility initially of their own governments to do something which will rectify the poverty that exists at home. In the vast majority of cases those countries are governed by presidents for life, one-party, socialist-state type governments with no real democratic system, no opportunity for the free enterprise system that exists—or what remains of it that exists—in Canada to produce the wealth that is necessary to look after the needs of people in those nations.

It is contrary to good sense and good judgment for this Parliament to be propping up dictators and socialist governments which are using the funds that we pay first to look after their own self-interests as individuals and, second, to maintain their hold on power and see that no opposition party, subject of course to a revolution, ever obtains the right that we expect and enjoy in Canada.

This whole issue of foreign aid and who should be the recipients thereof is a matter to which we should direct our attention. It is not sufficient simply to look to the results and say they are unfortunate and we have to prop them up by pouring in more money. The answer is that we must rectify the basic problems that exist. Those problems are gluttony and selfishness by the principal controllers of those nations and an unwillingness to permit free enterprise in their own country so that they can produce their own national wealth.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 3 agreed to.

On Clause 4—

Miss Jewett: Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the Minister in connection with Clause 4(a), the $601,810,000 commitment under the sixth replenishment in 1979, to tell us how much of that amount has been paid out under the procedures we used to operate on before the Speaker made the newer procedures.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, of that total amount of $601,810,000, the first payment approved through main estimates under the procedure referred to by the Hon. Member was $177.1 million. The second payment, approved through Bill C-71 which flowed as a result of the Speaker's comments on that procedure, was $164.6 million. So the outstanding balance is approximately $260.1 million.

Mr. Gamble: With respect to the provisions of Clause 4(a), what is the commitment of Canada that is allegedly being honoured, to use the words of the Clause, by the payment of an additional $437,210,000?

Mr. Cosgrove: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I do not follow the Hon. Member's question.

• (1920)

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, Clause 4(a) provides:

> "4. The Minister of Finance may issue to the International Development Association, in such form as he may determine, non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes
> (a) in an amount not exceeding in the aggregate six hundred and one million, eight hundred and ten thousand dollars for the purpose of honouring Canada's commitments in respect of the Sixth Replenishment of the resources of the International Development Association;

I point out that that is a commitment which is in addition to the existing commitment to the extent of $437,210,000. What is the nature of the commitment?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, perhaps the Hon. Member could assist and tell us the basis for the last figure, the four hundred million dollars?

Mr. Gamble: Yes, it is possible I may have made a mathematical error. I deducted $164,600,000, which is the existing obligation, from the amount of $601,810,000, which is the amount referred to in Clause 4(a). I assume, if my mathematics are correct, that that is an increased obligation of $437,210,000. If I am incorrect, then perhaps we could clear up the mathematics before we go on to the substance of my question, which is, what is the nature of Canada's commitment referred to in the Clause itself?

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Chairman, I have answered that question for the preceding Hon. Member. The total commitment, being the substance of the question, is $601.8 million, and that is towards the Sixth Replenishment. Of that figure, the first payments were approved through Main Estimates, prior to the Speakers's ruling about that procedure, of $177.1 million. A second payment was approved through Bill C-71 of $164.6 million, leaving a balance outstanding of $260.1 million.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Chairman, the words of the Clause are, "—honouring Canada's commitments in respect of the Sixth Replenishment of the resources of the International Development Association". I am asking the Minister, what our obligation is, or specifically, what is our commitment in respect of the Sixth Replenishment? How does that commitment arise? Surely it must arise under the terms of the International Development Association. And if so, where is it in that Association agreement?

Mr. Cosgrove: The Section really is the answer, Mr. Chairman. The answer to the question, where is the commitment, is not in the agreement. It is in the sum that is in the Section; that is, the Government is now asking for authorization of Parliament to carry out the terms of the agreement in the Sixth Replenishment in the sum of the amount set out in paragraph 4(a), and that is $601,810,000 which is the stipulated amount of shares which the Government has agreed to take down. That is the amount, and that amount is the amount in the Bill for which we are seeking authorization.

Mr. Gamble: I draw to the attention of the Minister the fact that Canada became a signatory to an agreement which is referred to as the Agreement of the International Development Association. Under the provisions of that agreement, in particular, Article 3(1)(c) thereof, there is no obligation imposed on any of the states signing that agreement to subscribe for any additional amounts. Yet, when you read the Clause it appears that there is such an obligation. It is not under the agreement, Mr. Chairman, and I asked the Minister to indicate to me where it was. He now explains that the obligation, or the commitment, to use the word of the clause, is one that is created within the framework of the clause itself. If that, indeed, is the fact, then let me, if I may, direct some comments to the way in which this clause is drafted.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that it misrepresents the facts—innocently misrepresents the facts—to this House, that there is an existing commitment which this clause endeavours to meet. Yet the Minister has just told us that the only commitment is within the clause itself, and Parliament, accordingly, is freshly looking at the entire issue as to whether or not this not insignificant sum of $601 million should be approved by this House, in addition to another not insignificant sum of $200,600,000, in this case under Clause 4(b), which is referred to as an amount designed to honour: " . . . Canada's commitment for supplementing the resources available to the International Development Association."

We heard from the Minister, and from others, who discussed this Bill on second reading, that the reason Clause 4(b) is inserted is that the United States has withdrawn from a commitment, that might have been imposed upon that Government, to additionally subscribe through the offering of demand notes, or otherwise, for stock to be administered by the International Development Association. We were told that in our magnanimous gesture we have taken up the challenge and, accordingly, have agreed not to follow the course of the United States in withdrawing approval for additional funds, but we are offering to take up what the United States in part, of course, has not taken up in terms of additional subscriptions. Those subscriptions under this clause are for non-interest-bearing, non-negotiable demand notes. I am sure every Hon. Member of this House knows what a demand note is. It is not a deferred note payable over four years, ten years, or even 100 years. It is a note which is payable on the date it is issued and can be used for the purpose of demanding payment forthwith.

What are we then talking about in total in this Clause? We are talking about nothing short of an additional $637,810,000 at a time of restraint and at a time when the Minister of Finance proclaims we must look at ways to pare the cost of Government. In a very short Bill, consisting of no more than four clauses, and indeed within a single clause of that short Bill, we have a provision for an additional requirement of federal funds totalling $637,810,000, and no one, with the possible exception of one other Member of this House who has spoken in opposition to this issue, seems to be in the least concerned. I find it astounding that these amounts of money are being handled by the House in this fashion when everyone of us sitting here knows how desperate some of our constituents are and how welcome would be an injection of but a small portion of the $637,810,000 which we are dealing with tonight.

I want to caution the Minister, Mr. Chairman, that what we are talking about here are demand moneys, not moneys to be paid in the future, but moneys with respect to which a demand can be made the day the notes are issued. This House is asked to vote on a provision which will grant to the Minister of Finance the right to issue to the International Development Association, in such form as he may determine—whatever he likes, this House is not going to be part of that determination—non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes. Clearly these are notes payable the day they are issued.

In light of this substantial requirement for additional moneys which are paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund and contributed by the taxpayers of Canada generally, who we all know are hard-pressed to look after their own financial well-being, I would like to know why there is not some general concern shown about this issue by other Members of the House. I would hope that there would be some participation by those Members who are generally concerned about this kind of a payment.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 4 carry?

Some Hon. Members: Carried.

Clause 4 agreed to.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) CONTINUING ASSISTANCE ACT

AUTHORIZATION OF CONTINUING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (for the Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved that Bill C-130, to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I assume that this bill is going to be introduced by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen). It is a very important matter involving international development financial assistance, particularly at this time of tremendous burdens and strains here in Canada. I am assuming that the Minister himself is going to be here to explain the philosophy which lies behind this Bill, what the Government plans are respecting international development assistance, and what the Government is asking the House to approve.

If he is not going to appear here to introduce this Bill, then I say it is an outrage, and an outrageous example of carelessness and lack of care as to what the Government is doing and what it is asking this House to approve. Is the Minister going to be here tonight? He is a fugitive now from finance; is he a fugitive from international development assistance as well? Where is the fugitive tonight?

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, I regret the tone that the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) has injected into this point of order. The Parliamentary Secretary will be representing the Minister. He is ably qualified to do so. He is fully familiar with this legislation and I look forward to his speech, as I am sure do all reasonable Members of this House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jean Lapierre (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), I would like to speak to the House this evening about Bill C-130, an Act to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions. This legislation will enable the Secretary of State for External Affairs to secure, through parliamentary appropriations, the public funds earmarked for development assistance which Canada contributes through various international financial institutions. Mr. Speaker, this piece of legislation is the result of the ruling made by Madam Speaker on June 12, 1981 on a historic point of order raised about the orderly procedure with respect to certain budget items in the 1981-82 estimates.

Naturally, international financial institutions are a very significant and effective element of Canada's multilateral development assistance program. As far as this legislation is concerned, they include the four regional development banks, namely the Asian Development Bank, the African Development Bank, the InterAmerican Development Bank, the Carribean Development Bank, as well as the concessional funds pertaining to each one, and also the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Common Fund for Commodities. Canada gives a financial contribution to each of those institutions by underwriting their share capital and/or contributing to their concessional funds. Our payments are made directly or through non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes. The main reason why Canada participates in international financial institutions is that their Third World programs are effective and profitable. Those regional institutions are indeed a particularly appropriate way of promoting regional co-operation and enhancing the self-sufficiency of developing countries. The framework of capital sharing and the nature of financial co-operation among international financial institutions is an excellent example of successful co-operation in the area of development. One of the significant characteristics of our participation in those institutions is the multiplier effect of our dollars thanks to the borrowings of banks on international money markets.

In addition, this complements the other Canadian assistance programs and allows us to diversify our assistance, both geographically and sectorially, and to support the multilateral institutional framework created by these financial institutions. Canada also benefits from the standpoint of its foreign policy and especially of its trade. Our participation is one of the key elements of our relations with less developed countries and reflects the approach of the government to multilateralism and North-South relations. Moreover, Canada's membership in these institutions enables Canadian businesses to bid for certain components of projects financed by these international financial institutions in developing countries, which very often result in major economic benefits for Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that this bill is relatively clear and does not call for a lengthy debate. Under clauses 2 and 4, the Governor in Council may amend the schedule, thereby adding thereto or deleting therefrom the names of the financial institutions concerned. Moreover, clause 3 provides financial assistance to these institutions by way of direct payments, demand notes and the purchase of shares. Section 5 states that the sums required for the purposes of the Act must be approved by Parliament and limited to amounts appropriated. Section 6 provides for an interim appropriation valid until presentation of the Main Estimates, next Spring. These sums cover the following investments: the fourth and last payment in respect of the fourth general increase in the capital of the InterAmerican Development Bank, or an amount of $7,290,000, and the fourth payment in respect of the third general increase in the capital of the Caribbean Development Bank, which represents $883,000, as well as the following payments: the first, fourth and last payment in respect of the third reconstitution of the Asian Development Fund for an amount of $56,722,000; the fourth and last payment in respect of the fifth reconstitution by the InterAmerican Development Bank of its Fund for Special Operations for an amount of $18,156,000; a contribution to the Special Development Fund of the Caribbean Development Bank in the amount of $531,000, and finally, the first payment in respect of the third reconstitution of the African Development Fund for an amount of $33,900,000. Except for the payments to the Caribbean Development Bank, all these appropriations will be in the form of notes.

To conclude, Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the House that some of these allocations are necessary to meet the immediate commitments of Canada to the institutions concerned. This is why I invite my colleagues to act urgently in this regard because if Parliament delays too much or if we are victims of a filibuster by the Opposition so that this bill is not passed before December 31, Canada will not be able to meet its commitment to increase its Development Aid Program to .5 per cent of the GNP by 1985. I know that the Hon. Member for New Westminster-Coquitlam (Miss Jewett) is very anxious for Canada not only to reach this figure of .5 per cent, but also to exceed it, and I ask for her co-operation and for the co-operation of the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) so that we may meet our international obligations. With this in mind, Mr. Chairman, I hope that the debate will be enlightening, but mostly, I hope it will be brief.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that the fact that I am objecting to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) not being here to introduce the Bill is not meant to reflect on his parliamentary assistant who, I am sure, is a very capable Member of the House. We were glad to listen to his introductory remarks.

The Department of External Affairs in this country now has three Ministers, not just one Minister, Mr. Speaker. We no longer have just the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but a triumvirate. Last January the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) changed that Department so that now there is the Secretary of State for External Affairs, and the Minister of State (External Relations) (Mr. Lapointe). The gentleman who was the Secretary of State (External Relations) is now here. There is a third part of this triumvirate, the Minister of State (International Trade) (Mr. Regan). The former Minister is also here tonight. There are three Ministers now in the Department of External Affairs.

When an important piece of legislation involving the whole development assistance program of the Department of External Affairs comes before this House, I say that it is an insult to the House and to the people of Canada and, indeed, to the whole development community in Canada, that the Secretary of State for External Affairs shows such little care for this whole area, that he is not present to introduce the Bill.

He is already a fugitive, of course. He had to flee from the Department of Finance to the Department of External Affairs where he thinks he is going to have an easy row to hoe for the next two or three years. He is going to slack off on his oars, but he was never really tugging on his oars anyway. As Minister of Finance he was a disaster. We are lucky that he was not more active in that Department, because the damage he did cannot even be calculated. He now thinks he can go to External Affairs and need bother no more with this House; that we are just going to pass through. He has to know that this Party does not object in principle to this legislation, so the Minister thinks he can ignore it and have his parliamentary assistant come here to speak to us, even though he has two other Ministers with him.

What is the function of the Minister of State for External Relations? We are told that he is to look after the "Francophonie." We are told that he is to look after cultural matters. We are told he is to look after humanitarian matters. What is there left for the Secretary of State for External Affairs to do? Tonight, none of these gentlemen has come to this House to give us an adequate explanation of what this is all about.

Hon. Members opposite can chatter away, but the people of Canada want to understand why they are being asked to vote moneys like this $442,000 and $117,040,000. These are moneys that the people of Canada are being asked to provide for development assistance at a time when they are suffering more than they have suffered since the depression of the early 1930s, at a time when the winds are not very favourable to development assistance and external aid, when the public is fed up with it, when there is not any constituency for it except in the churches and the minority of people interested in helping the Third World. The Minister shows his contempt for the people of Canada by not coming to this House and giving a reasoned explanation why we should continue to assist outside countries when we have unemployment amounting to 1,400,000 people. The Minister does not deign to come while we are sitting in this House to explain why this is necessary or why 1,400,000 people are unemployed. He asks, through his parliamentary assistant, that we pass on the $117 million plus the $442,000 to be spent in the Third World, or loaned to the Third World, or to go to international agencies, without a word of explanation to the Canadian people.

People in the Minister's district in Cape Breton want to know why they have to contribute. People at the heavy water plants in Cape Breton want to know why they have to contribute to the Third World. The people of this country want to know where the great Prime Minister is, the great figure who went to Cancun, to the North South, where he towered over the whole world with largess of his heart, and his propaganda, to help the Third World. Where is he tonight? Where are his Ministers who are asking this House to pass this kind of money? He has fled to France. He was so shocked at the reception he got at the Liberal Convention that he has fled to France. He is over at Vimy Ridge.

• (1950)

Mr. Crosbie: I am not smiling. I have nothing to smile about with this Government. You are not funny, you are not even laughable; you are sad.

Mr. Rossi: You were not there long enough to know.

Mr. Crosbie: I was there long enough to know how little you are doing to help the problems of the country. You jackals who guffawed and defeated a real budget are now on the hot seat. We know what you are attempting to do. I am prepared to talk all night. The more interjections I get, the more I get excited and the longer I will talk. This Bill is not sliding through. They thought this Bill would slide through. Well, they are not going to treat us with contempt and slide anything through. The Secretary of State for External Affairs better get through his head that we are not being taken in by him in that guise.

Let me remind you, Mr. Speaker, of a promise which the Government made. Of course it has made hundreds and thousands of promises which have been broken. There was another broken promise.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. Members opposite never stop to listen with their ears. If they would only listen, perhaps they would have some influence in their caucus; perhaps they would have some influence in getting things changed in Canada; perhaps they could do something to help the 1,400,000 who are unemployed. All they are interested in is rolling around in their own patronage pools while the country suffers.

In July 1981 the then secretary of state for external affairs, the Hon. Member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), promised during a debate in the House that the Government would soon present a new development strategy to indicate the priorities and directions for Canadian policy over the next few years in the field of development. That is what he said then, but the Government does not have any strategy. It had a five-year strategy which was announced in 1975, and in 1981 the then secretary of state for external affairs promised a new strategy. When will we have the new strategy for development assistance? He made that promise in July 1981. That was a year and four or five months ago. At that time he said that they hoped to have it available within a few months. Where is it?

What is happening in the interstices of that gigantic mob of the Department of External Affairs on which we had a Royal Commission report last December? It reported the Department to be in a shambles administratively; a horror, a nightmare. That was the condition of the Department as found by that Commission. Since then we have had two more Ministers added to it. We have had the International Trade and Commerce people moved down to External Affairs. We have had all the confusion in the Department. Now we ask: What is the strategy which we were promised over a year ago? Where is it?

This was a perfect opportunity for the Government to come in and tell the House what the development strategy is. In a time of economic hardship for Canadians, and in a time of economic hardships around the world, what is the new development strategy of the Government? Does it mean what it says about the Third World? Is this the same Prime Minister who supervised two reductions in the budget for CIDA in the last several months; who went to Cancun; who was to lead the western world; who was to persuade President Reagan to do the right thing for the Third World? Is this the same Prime Minister who just supervised two reductions in the amount the Government promised and voted for development assistance?

How can the Government, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and this parliamentary assistant expect Canadians to support contributions to foreign aid and development assistance, which this year will amount to almost $1.5 billion, when they are not prepared to come to the House to justify it? How long did the Parliamentary Secretary speak in introducing the legislation to the House? Was it three minutes, four minutes or five minutes? It certainly was not six or eight minutes. He gave us no information. He told us nothing new.

I would like to refer to a Canadian Press story which went out a few days ago. It read:

> Finance Department officials say the U.S. Government's reneging on foreign aid commitments to the world's poorest countries will add $200 million to Canada's foreign aid ill over the next three years.

There was no mention of that by the Parliamentary Secretary why is that? Our Government says that the United States Government is reneging on its foreign aid commitments, and we are having to pick up another $200 million because it is reneging. Is it not time that we heard about that? I do not think it was mentioned in the earlier debate on Bill C-129.

An Hon. Member: It was mentioned.

Mr. Crosbie: It has been mentioned that they are picking up the hot potatoes which President Reagan left behind? Let us have some more information on that. How much more will we have to pick up, if that is the case? What is the Government's strategy to deal with it?

Now that the Prime Minister has found President Reagan to be on an equal level with Winston Churchill, and heart to heart and of equal calibre to Franklin D. Roosevelt, can he not persuade President Reagan to go back and support the benefit assistance? Can we not have a few words? What efforts have been made to talk the United States into increasing or maintaining its contribution?

What happened at the conference in Toronto just a few months ago? Is there not a minister who will come before us now, with these two important bills, and tell us what went on at the World Bank and IMF meeting or what went on at the meetings of development assistance groups; what position the Government took; what shape they found the world to be in? Will they not express any concern about the huge indebtedness which the Third World now faces and the fact that it cannot meet its obligations any longer? Will they not tell us what steps will have to be taken to meet that, and why we should be concerned in Canada? Is it not the job of the Government to explain to people why we should be concerned; why it is in our interests to give development assistance to other countries; why it is in our interests to be able to sell our products to their markets, or why it is in the interests of us all to help one another? Will there not be a minister who will come to explain to the House why this is all necessary?

Mr. Thacker: No. Send the kids.

Mr. Crosbie: No, no, send the young fellow along. We were delighted to see the Parliamentary Secretary get some experience, but we think this is a topic big enough to require an explanation, and the Minister should be here himself.

I will indicate the comments which I hear about the country. I do not agree with them, but the people of the country do not understand why it is necessary for Canada to be spending $1.5 billion, or $1 billion, or any dollars on assistance to Third World countries. They do not understand. They look around at unemployment. In my Province of Newfoundland the unemployment rate is over 19 per cent. We saw some genuine concern about that today. We have the Minister of Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy), a sleeveen who uses money for political purposes. He directs the funds to create jobs and to be spent only in Liberal districts. This is the only kind of concern we have seen expressed by the Government opposite about job creation in Newfoundland. A fifth of the work force in Newfoundland—and this is the official number—is unemployed. It is really 40 per cent.

Mr. Rossi: Do you read your mail?

Mr. Crosbie: The Minister concocted a letter and backdated it. It is not in my office yet. That is about where the mail is. The Minister is a sleeveen, a trimmer and a deliverer of falsehoods.

Mr. Rossi: Go to your office. There are some letters there.

Mr. Crosbie: I say to the Canadian people who are watching tonight that if my speech is interrupted it is because of some jackals over there who do not want to let anyone else speak in the House; certain Liberal Members who want to catcall out while I am making a speech. They will not shut me up.

The people of Newfoundland, 20 per cent of whom are on the official unemployment rolls, want to know why Canada should spend a billion and a quarter million dollars on assistance to Third World countries when they are unemployed. The ones who are running out of unemployment insurance want to know why this is being done and why the money cannot be used to put them to work.

Just because I support the Bill does not mean that I will explain why tonight. It is the job of the Government which introduced this legislation to explain it, rather than present the half-hearted, stultified, feeble introduction of the Bill we have seen tonight. No, we will not accept or buy that. Canadians have to be convinced again.

The only reason this Bill is here is because the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) caught the Government in another piece of sharp practice, attempting to get funds through for these purposes in the estimates without legislative authority. The Speaker ruled that legislation had to be introduced; that the Government did not have the authority to make these expenditures; that it required Parliamentary approval. But did the Government learn anything from that? Did the Government learn to respect the rights of Members of the House of Commons when it was caught out in that matter by the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre; not at all. Why? What is the Government proposing in this Bill? What is the Government proposing in Clause 4 of Bill C-130? The Government wants us to give it the power to amend the Schedule. The Schedule lists the international financial institutions to which the Government can give money or can provide funds for. They are the African Development Fund, the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Fund, the Asian Development Bank, the InterAmerican Development Bank, the Fund for Special Operations, the Caribbean Development Bank, the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Common Fund for Commodities. When we look at Clause 4 the Government wants us to agree that it should have the power to add the names of any other international financial institution that the Government recognizes as an institution to which the Government should be empowered to give assistance. We should give the Government the power to delete from this list the names of any financial institutions to which the Government no longer wishes to give money to. Who do these people in the Government think they are? Who are these emperors to whom we are supposed to surrender our right in the House of Commons to decide to approve or not approve which international institutions should receive financial assistance? The Government will just pass an Order in Council in the hereafter and add whoever it likes to the list of international financial institutions to whom the Government can give money, without coming back to this House, except through the estimates, to get money. We will not accept that, Mr. Speaker. We do not accept that. We are not going to accept the Bill with that Clause there.

This Bill provides authority for the Government to make payments on an ongoing basis. It provides authority to make transitional payments. I have already given the amounts. The payments are in the form of demand notes to be cashed over a period of years. These will appear in our estimates in the future once they are encashed. It means that we are authorizing these to be cashed or encashed, and the Government does not have to come back to us any longer for that authority.

That is how I understand the position, and my learned friend here from Edmonton South (Mr. Roche)—the public recognizes him more properly under his name, Doug Roche, who is an authority, renowned throughout the world for his interest in the Third World and development assistance—can better correct me if I err. However, I understand this is one of the first steps that has ever been taken to bring CIDA or the multilateral institutions to which we contribute under the legislative control of Parliament at all. They have never been under our wing except through the estimates. Any Member who knows how the estimates are dealt with knows that the estimates go to Standing Committees on which we have a majority of Liberal sheep. They sit there and say "Baa, baa, baa" to whatever the Government asks its members to do. No one else on the Committee has a chance to dig in, to get information through the iniquitous committee system we have here.

For the first time we have in the House a chance to debate CIDA and the whole development assistance program. Do we have a Minister here to answer questions about it or to pay any attention to the debate? We do not. We have a former minister. We have the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané) here tonight. He does not like to be here during the Question Period. He was reprimanded last week and he has finally shown up for the Question Period.

Mr. De Bané: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wish to point out that my hon. friend is unfairly giving only one side of the story. I do not have his ambiguity. I cannot at the same time be meeting with fishermen in Prince Edward Island and be in the House of Commons. In a few days I will be in the Hon. Member's Province visiting St. John's. Obviously, he cannot criticize in such a fashion. I would gladly compare my attendance in the House with his.

Mr. Nielsen: You would lose.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: The loud noise made by the seal flippers as demonstrated here tonight shows that those gentlemen really know how to put their flippers together.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Rossi: You know you are never around.

Mr. Crosbie: If the Hon. Minister of Fisheries is out of the House on business visiting other parts of this country, I say, "Hail and farewell" to him.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: But, Mr. Speaker, does he have the speed of light? Last week he was here Monday night to vote. He was over there just like the rest of the trained sheep bobbing up, bowing and being counted. He was not in the Question Period on Monday afternoon. He was not in the Question Period on Tuesday afternoon. But Tuesday night when the vote came—and Members over there are all scared of any vote that might defeat them—there he was again bowing to the House.

Mr. Rossi: There were 24 missing on your side, John.

Mr. Crosbie: On Wednesday the Minister came in at twenty minutes to three. I have news for the Minister of Fisheries. Question Period starts at 2:15 p.m. The Minister snuck in at twenty to three. He sat down quietly, hoping that nobody would ask him a question. So much for the Minister of Fisheries.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Here is a letter that has just been delivered.

Some Hon. Members: Read it, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I wrote to the Minister on September 13. I wrote to him on October 7 and he would not answer me. He is too busy. He is running around the country doing something or other. But when I asked him a question today, suddenly a letter appears dated yesterday.

Mr. Nielsen: It was not delivered by the Post Office.

Mr. Crosbie: I have not even received it yet, except that one of his own Members has just sent it over. That is how quick an answer you get. When I am through with that Minister, he will not be a little penknife, he will not be an axe.

Mr. Rossi: $900,000 to your riding.

Mr. Crosbie: Hon. Members over there believe their Ministers; I do not. I do not believe the Minister. He is not capable of telling the truth.

This is significant legislation because for the first time we are being given a chance in this House to have something to say legislatively with respect to CIDA. As far as I know, CIDA itself was not established through an Act of Parliament. I am correct because my colleague, who is our critic in the area of CIDA, one of the world-wide experts in this area, confirms that the whole organization of CIDA which supervises spending in excess of $1 billion a year in the Third World was never established here through a legislative act of this Parliament. We say that CIDA is not sufficiently accountable to this House. We say it is not sufficiently accountable to the people of Canada. Although we support the spirit and principle of the program, CIDA and this Government will have to do a lot of communicating with the people of Canada if it hopes to have the support of the Canadian people in its program of increasing our assistance to the Third World in the next few years.

There is another anomaly I want to point out. The Bill that we dealt with just before this one, I believe it was Bill C-129, the Bretton Woods Agreements Act, is handled by the Department of Finance. And now here is this Bill C-130, allied to Bill C-129, which deals with development assistance through these multinational associations. It is dealt with through the Department of External Affairs. Surely, all this kind of legislation should be dealt with by the Department of External Affairs. Why does the Government still have the Department of Finance handle a certain aspect of international development assistance and the Department of External Affairs handle the other?

When that question was brought up in this House on July 2, 1981, the then Secretary of State for External Affairs, the Hon. Member for Windsor-Walkerville (Mr. MacGuigan), the predecessor to the present fugitive from finance the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen), said that these matters should be consolidated within the jurisdiction of his department. We know that the Government never pays the slightest attention to poor old MacGuigan. He was not even an acceptable messenger boy. When he woke up in the morning he had to turn on the early news to hear what new foreign policy the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) had laid out the night before. Now, of course, we have the Hon. Member for Cape Breton Highlands-Canso there—the wily old fox of the Liberal Party, laid in his lair at last. He does not even bother to turn on the radio because he does not care what foreign policy Canada has. He is quite satisfied just to have the Prime Minister announce it at any time. He is only going to bafflegab anyway. If you ask him a question, you will not get an answer, primarily because he does not have an answer.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: Such is life here in Canada in the twentieth century under the regime of Emperor Trudeau the First. So the then secretary of state for external affairs said, yes, he agreed these matters should be consolidated. This is now a year and—August, September, October, November—four months later. Are they consolidated? They are not consolidated. Is he the Minister? He is not the Minister. Is anyone the Minister? None of them is the Minister. Why? There is just a Royal Commission appointed to study the economic situation, the finances of Canada. Did the Minister know about it? No Minister knew of it. Why, apparently the Deputy Prime Minister (Mr. MacEachen) knew of it. Apparently he must have bumped into the Prime Minister somewhere, as he stumbled about the building looking for another refuge from the financial winds and tides, and the Prime Minister must have said to him, "Why, Allan, you will be glad to hear that I am just appointing one of the old loophole makers to head up a Royal Commission on Canada's economic prospects". Why, it was the Deputy Prime Minister who brought in the budget last November to tie off all the loopholes inserted in the tax laws by Mr. Macdonald, Thumper to bumper, who is now chairing the Royal Commission, who will settle what Canada's prospects are for the future. Yes, not to mention the loopholes which were inserted by the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) who was Minister of Justice, who was Minister of Finance, who was Minister of this, that and the other thing. He is the regular trash bin of the Government. He gets portfolios and they are sloughed off by someone else. He has sloughed into them. So, we do not have any Ministers.

However, in any event, the then secretary of state for external affairs said this, and mark my words, Mr. Speaker, "I think I am meeting success within the government". Yes, he is now Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan). He was extremely successful with those suggestions in External Affairs. Why, they took him and put him in Justice, and he said that he was very lucky to be in Justice. "There is no money left now", he said, "and we can have a great time now. It will not cost any money to reform the sex laws", or whatever it is he is interested in. No, I do not think he is interested in sex.

Mr. Nielsen: Sports laws.

Mr. Crosbie: Support laws. If his laws and suggestions in the Department of Justice are as successful as they were in the Department of External Affairs, we will be in no danger of reforming the justice system in the next two or three years.

I hope I am not annoying any of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They have enough problems and enough on their minds. How will they cadge favour with the voters again in a couple of years' time? How can they pull the wool over their eyes as they go "baa-baaing" about their respective districts in two years' time, with the people, the 1,400,000 unemployed, who will ask them, "Why did you authorize all these extra hundreds of millions of dollars for development assistance? Why are you more interested in helping the Third World countries than you are in helping us?" Because the Minister would not come to the House to tell the Hon. Members. They do not even know the answers. Hon. Liberal Members opposite should be interested in getting the answers, because their electorates will want to know the answer to the question, "Why did you approve all this assistance, externally, when you were doing nothing to help us here at home?" They are not helping the 19 per cent unemployed down in Newfoundland. It is the first time in history that a bunch of sheep have ever been busy at the troughs. Well, that is where they are being busy.

Mr. Nielsen: It is usually donkeys at the trough.

Mr. Crosbie: Now, concerning this Bill before the House, we want to affirm the commitment of our party to assisting development of the Third World. We know that Canada is not a fortress of itself. We are even prepared to admit that the outside world plays a large part in our economic affairs. We say, however, that had we a Government which had any guts, gumption, principles or policies, our economy would be much stronger than it is. However, even were we there and the situation 100 per cent better, as it would be, the outside world, because of its depressed condition, would still be depressing the Canadian economy today. We know that we are dependent on the outside world; 30 per cent of our GNP depends on external trade. We know that in this country we cannot plan on having a rich or rewarding future unless the rest of the world is in a position to trade with us. We know that we do not want to be dependent on the United States of America as our one and only market. We know that 70 per cent of our exports now go there. We know that we must develop our markets with South America. We must develop our markets with Asia. We must develop our markets with Africa. We know that none of them can buy our products if they are not in a financial position to do so. We know that they need to be assisted, not just for humanitarian reasons, but for reasons of self-interest as well. That is why we are prepared to support the Bill in principle, despite the shabby treatment demonstrated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs toward Hon. Members in the House by his not being present here tonight. How many times are External Affairs the subject of debate in this House? Why, one can count on one hand the occasions since I have been in the House. I look at some of our veteran Members. I do not think there have been six debates on matters of External Affairs.

Mr. Roche: Three in ten years.

Mr. Crosbie: There have been three in ten years my hon. friend, the Hon. Member for Edmonton South tells me. Only three. Here is an occasion now. The Government, having been caught improperly trying to get these funds through by means of the estimates, had to come to the House to ask us to support the assistance it wishes to give the international institutions.

Is the Secretary of State for External Affairs here to present the Government's program, its plans for the future, the way it will help in the North-South relationship? What is the future course of the North-South dialogue? We have not heard about that since Cancun, Mexico. Could not one of these three Ministers come here tonight to explain matters to the House, taking 40 minutes or an hour to outline for us why we should support the Bill and why their own Members should vote for it, despite the suffering and unemployment which is now present in the country? No, they do not want to debate External Affairs. They do not want to debate development assistance. They do not want to debate the world outside. They do not want to debate what is happening in Canada. They do not want to lay it on the line. There is no sense of responsibility.

I think it is a very black mark against the man who just became Secretary of State for External Affairs a few months ago, and I have forgotten just when the change-around occurred, but not that long ago, when he does not take the opportunity to come to the House and explain his philosophy. He is supposed to be one of the great supporters, we have always heard, of the Third World development assistance and the World Bank. Well, where is he tonight? We do not know where he is tonight. I suppose he is ashamed to come before the Canadian people after the record he has in the Department of Finance. Perhaps in this debate we will hear the development strategy.

The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans is here. He was Minister of State for External Relations. What did he do during the months that he lallygagged around the Department? What were his assignments? What did he learn, apart from travelling to French Africa, speaking there and tripping the light fantastic or tippling at the diplomatic cocktail parties, or whatever went on? Does he know anything about the development plan and development assistance, what the plan is for the future?

In the budget of June 28, the last of the fantastic MacEachen budgets, there was an announced reduction in official aid of $175 million over two years. In the economic statement of the new Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on October 27, it was supposedly reduced by a further $245 million over the next two and a half years. Does Your Honnour not think we are due an explanation as to where these reductions are, how they will be met and from what aspects of development assistance those large amounts will be reduced? Is the development community not owed that? Are the Third World countries not owed it? Are these Ministers appointed just to make statements, and is no one entitled to find out what is behind them or what they in actual fact mean? The reduction of $245 million plus $175 million amounts to over $400 million which, it has been announced, will be reduced from development assistance in the next two or three years. How? How will the Government do this without hurting the guts and essentials of the program? Will it be reduced from the multilateral or bilateral assistance program? Are we not owed an explanation?

I am glad to see that Hon. Members opposite are here now. I remember that last November, not a year ago, they all clapped every time the Minister announced he was cutting off another tax loophole. They clapped and cried, "Oh, marvellous, wonderful!" Then, 11 months later, with the same Government and Cabinet, another Minister of Finance stands up to announce that he is reversing these changes. What was unfair 11 months ago, and everyone clapped because it was unfair and would be changed, becomes fair 11 months later. What is unjust 11 months ago becomes just 11 months later, and the same people are there, clapping the same way with great enthusiasm. Such an exhibition of hypocrisy has never been seen by the Canadian people before.

Mr. Crosbie: Such an exhibition of hypocrisy has never been seen by the Canadian people before. I say that it is enough to make any person in this country who watches public affairs throw up in disgust at any system that permits two Ministers in the same Cabinet to forget their responsibilities, and to come here in a period of 11 months to bring down two separate and opposite budgets, one reversing the other, while the same crowd of lackies and lickspittles clap and pound their desks in approval as all those 180 degree turns are being made.

If that is what this country is coming to, thank God that I am not in a Party that will countenance that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: I am sorry to be rough on you gentlemen, but you deserve it.

We want to know from the Minister of Finance, the minister responsible for this Bill, or from the Parliamentary Secretary what are the details of the $245 million that the economic statement of October 27 indicates will be reduced over the next two and a half years from the funds provided for development and assistance. How does it affect this Bill? Do you not think that we should be told? What institutions will it affect? Will it be the Caribbean Development Bank that will get less, or the International Fund for Agricultural Development, or the African Development Bank, or the Asian Development Fund or the Common Fund for Commodities? Which one will have a reduction in payments made to it?

How does the amount that we are now being asked to authorize compare with those two statements that there will be over $400 million reduced in the Development Assistance Program over the next several years?

What happened to the people in the Government who were on the North-South Committee? I believe it was chaired by the Hon. Member from New Brunswick.

An Hon. Member: Gloucester.

Mr. Crosbie: The Hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau).

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): You should be here more often.

Mr. Crosbie: I am here more often than you like, my friend. If you are not careful, I will be here every day giving it to you, so just be quiet.

The Hon. Member for Gloucester was the Chairman of the North-South Committee. They performed very capable work and tabled a fine report in the House. Perhaps that Hon. Member will explain to the House tonight what the new development assistance strategy of the Government is. The Secretary of State for External Affairs in July, 1981 said that there would be a new strategy which would be given to the House in a few months. Will the Hon. Member explain from the point of view of the investigation of his Subcommittee into this whole area of North-South relations how more than $400 million will be reduced from our spending in that area in the next two or three years and we will still meet our obligations? How will we meet the recommendations of his report when this has been done?

How will we meet the target that the Government so proudly proclaimed when it came to office and proclaimed the targets it was going to achieve in assistance in the next seven or eight years? We must be sensible about this. You cannot get blood out of a turnip, Mr. Speaker. That is why most of the hon. gentlemen opposite would not bleed if you stabbed them. They are silent turnips. They are there on behalf of the chief gardener of their party. Many of them are agricultural gentlemen and they have me in their area of expertise. Turnips.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Crosbie: We have to be sensible, Mr. Speaker. If we cannot get Canada moving again, if we cannot get our economy going, if we cannot get our GNP expanding—this year it will decrease 4 per cent or 5 per cent, which means that instead of there being more to divide among Canadians this year, we will have 5 per cent less—we will obviously not be able to afford a development assistance program in the future of the size we have now, or of any size.

We know, of course, that we could be seeing some growth if we had a Government that had any economic brains or had been operating with any sense of economic principles in the last ten or 12 years.

If we are to increase our development assistance, we must recognize the fact that the Canadian economy will have to do better. We are still prepared to support the principle of this Bill that we cannot forget the rest of the world where many are far more unfortunate than us. What makes you feel better about the present state of Canada is when you travel outside the country.

An Hon. Member: Resign.

Mr. Crosbie: The present state of Canada, my friend, is deplorable. Perhaps your constituents have not drawn that to your attention. My constituents do not encourage me to think that all is rosy in Canada when they are walking the streets unemployed, when they have nothing to do, or when they are losing their homes. Things are not rosy, but something which makes you feel better about the present state of Canada is when you compare it to the outside.

This summer, I was on a trip with the parliamentary committee to the Caribbean and Latin America.

Some Hon. Members: Again!

Mr. Crosbie: Mr. Speaker, I have been on so few trips—

Mr. Dionne (Chicoutimi): What about Gabon.

Mr. Crosbie: I hope that the parliamentary secretary will take me with him to Gabon.

One of the countries I happened to visit was Peru. When you visit a country like Peru and see the fantastic problems they have in that country, they so far outweigh our own problems that things become more balanced. Of course, most Canadians will not have the opportunity to visit Peru. However, if you visit Lima you would see a city which had half a million people perhaps 20 years ago and which now has 4.5 million people. You drive through areas where two million people are living without water and sewage, living without electricity and living in the most depressing conditions. There is no garbage collection and there is a mountain of garbage 50 feet high down the centre of the street. People have nowhere to go to perform their bodily functions except on the street or some corner.

I have been to India as well but the slums in Lima are the worst that I have ever seen. Therefore, on humanitarian grounds alone, I am a strong supporter of this Bill, apart altogether from the fact that it is in our self-interest to attempt to help other countries which are attempting to help themselves.

At the moment, Peru has an elected Government. It had an election in 1980 when their President, Mr. Belaunde, was elected. Peru now has an electoral system. There are tremendous problems of poverty and development. Peru has an inflation rate of over 50 per cent. Imagine trying to deal with an inflation rate of over 50 per cent when you have to look to an electorate to vote for you in two years' time. How would you correct a problem like that without ensuring that you will never see the inside of an elected assembly again?

Countries which are attempting to do something for themselves in a democratic way with the consent of the people in spite of all these obstacles, I think it behooves us to assist them as best we can. Of course, it may be very helpful for us in the future to develop trade with Peru. We already have non-government organizations which are very strong in their assistance there, particularly the Roman Catholic church and other church organizations which are attempting to help.

We flew to Tarapota, a town in the Amazon part of Peru on the other side of the Andes, which was celebrating its two-hundredth anniversary. We visited an agricultural technical college which Canada was supporting. It is obviously the right thing to support in that part of the world which must improve its agriculture and productivity. I have not seen many projects that Canada has helped finance in the Third World. I was proud of the fact that Canada helped to finance those projects.

We know, of course, that funds have been applied improperly. I will leave that subject to a more knowledgeable Member for our party, the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche). We realize that projects could be administered better. We have suggestions for changes to the strategy and tactics. But we would like the Government to bring before the House an outline of how it will tackle these problems today. The Government has had sufficient time to do that now. It has had the north-south report for some time. It will have a report from the Subcommittee on the Caribbean and Latin America in a week or ten days. I think it was delivered today to the full Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. There has been a lot of time. When is the Government going to take this whole area seriously, not pay lip service, not keep saying it is going to hit the objective of 0.7 per cent of the GNP by 1990 and then cut the estimates for the next two years by over $400 million in this area? They come into this House reluctantly and only because they were caught by an alert Member on our side, the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), and the Speaker when they attempted to slip through spending in the estimates never authorized by this House. They are now before the House very reluctantly.

We say that we are prepared to be co-operative. We agree with this Bill in principle. There is one clause we want changed, the one I mentioned in my earlier remarks, but we are not going to be pushed around. We do not want the Government to think we are not to be taken seriously just because we are supportive of continuing development assistance, that we are just going to lie around in this House and allow the Minister to ignore his responsibility.

The Minister should be glad to get his teeth into this area. He should be glad to have a chance to show the House of Commons his stuff in the field of External Affairs. It is not as if he were a new Minister. He was there before. He was there several years before the man who is now Secretary of State for External Affairs. Perhaps he has some legitimate reason for not being here tonight. If he could not be here, the legislative timetable should have been changed so that it coincided with his presence in Ottawa.

Do not let me hear any spurious excuses or some Member opposite stand up later and say that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is not in Ottawa today, he is in Timbucto, Afghanistan, Cape Breton or wherever he might be. My answer to that is, fine, but his Bills should have awaited his return before being proceeded with.

Suppose the Secretary of State for External Affairs is going to be away for ten months. What does the Minister of State for External Relations do? Why is he not here tonight demonstrating his stuff? The Member who is now that Minister is a former diplomat. I do not know if he was a diplomat. He was in External Affairs. He might have been one of the few undiplomatic ones that were in External Affairs, although from what I have seen of him in the House, I believe he is one of the diplomatic ones. Why is he not here tonight making his maiden speech as Secretary of State for External Affairs? Where is the garrulous former secretary of state, Gerry Regan, in case those in Nova Scotia have forgotten? Where is he tonight? He is the Minister of State for International Trade. Could he not take it over? Surely any Department that has three ministers—

Mr. Rossi: Is his time not up, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. Crosbie: They are asking whether my time is up. My time is never up. I have unlimited time. I can go all night. I can go on until tomorrow. If Hon. Members are going to aggravate me, I will set a record. I will go on for a month, cruel punishment that that might be.

Any Department which has three ministers should have a Minister here to speak on an important bill, unless they do not consider it important. Perhaps Bill C-130 is not considered important by this Government. Perhaps development assistance is not considered of the first importance by this Government. Perhaps the Third World is not considered important by the Government. Perhaps the North-South relationship is not considered important by this Government. Perhaps this Government just considers the North-South to be a public relations exercise like the six-five program and the Royal Commission headed by "Thumper" Macdonald. It will be the Government that gets the thump if it ever gets the gumption to call an election. They do not consider this to be very important. There are three Ministers and not one of them is in this House tonight. We have a parliamentary assistant, a fine young man from the Province of Quebec. We foresee for him a great future back in his own Province; no future federally but in his own Province. This is a serious—

Mr. Rossi: Don't tell me you are going to get serious for a change?

Mr. Crosbie: This is serious. I have been serious all night. The Member opposite does not know the difference between being serious and making a point. In order to get Members opposite to pay attention, you have to jolly them up a bit. This is extraordinary. We have three, six, ten, thirteen, seventeen or 21 Members on the Liberal benches here to listen to me. This is an honour, an honour, 21 Members opposite and on this side of the House 102.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: That's my little PR device. That is the way they made their six-five program. The public cannot really see what is happening.

I am coming to a conclusion, Mr. Speaker, because I want to see whether the Government is going to bring in one of its Ministers. I have something that I came across tonight. It is something we should all remember. I want to quote the Chairman of the Bank of Montreal, Mr. Mulholland, as reported in the Halifax paper of November 5. He said:

> The western world would face "a very real possibility of a depression" if credit was suddenly cut off to debt-ridden developing nations—

There is so much truth in that. Mr. Mulholland said:

> —there is so much economic interdependence in the world that if the more affluent countries interrupted the extension of credit to poorer nations international trade would immediately be adversely affected. This would produce a severe backlash damaging to western economies.

That, of course, is 100 per cent true. The western world has extended so much credit to these countries that we cannot now stop supplying them with credit, even though many of them are no longer credit worthy in the sense that they cannot pay back their present debts because none of them anticipated the horrendous level of interest rates they would be faced with. I believe that in South America on the average countries spend over 40 per cent of their total export earnings for interest on their international debt. There is no way they can prosper under those kinds of circumstances. If they cannot prosper, we cannot prosper. The United States, West Germany and Japan cannot prosper.

That is why we had to resist the siren call of protectionism, increasing tariffs and increasing ways of avoiding importing goods. That way for Canada is dead. Thirty per cent of our whole GNP depends on external trade for this country. We cannot afford to be one of those who attempt to protect themselves. It could lead to disaster. Again I quote Mr. Mulholland as follows:

"When you cut those financial links to developing nations you close factories—"

He means that you close factories here in Canada. If we cannot sell our stuff abroad, the factories here cannot operate. We have seen that in the mineral industry in Schefferville and in other mining towns. He further said:

"We sure don't need a decline from where we are today" ... "You cut your own throat if you do that." It is in the interest of no country or banking system, he said, to force the developing world to balance its accounts through a reduction in imports—and without credit those nations cannot buy goods and services from Canadians who depend upon international trade for 30 per cent of their incomes.

This is the kind of thing our Minister should be explaining here tonight. Why should we have to explain this? If we are not prepared to help the outside world, and we are one of the world's wealthier countries even though we have gone back very far in the last four or five years, the whole international system of trade and assistance may collapse. Canadians could stand to lose 30 per cent of their income, by becoming an island unto ourselves. That is something for Canadians to keep in mind when we say we have to continue to do what we can to assist the outside world. Do these Ministers think that Canadians are going to support blindly any program they might want to institute in the field of international aid? They are not.

An Hon. Member: That's repetition.

Mr. Crosbie: Yes it is repetition, but I am trying to make a point. If I make this point often enough it might sink into some of the craniums of the Ministers who are here. I see the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Cosgrove) is now here. I watched him earlier over television when he dealt with Bill C-129. I was hoping he would explain the Government's program and the whole scheme of things, where they are spending money and what is happening with the World Bank.

• (2040)

What does the Government think the World Bank is going to do? Is the World Bank in a strong enough position now to avoid the interruption and disruptions in world credit? What do they think of the present situation? How are they going to handle the huge credits we have with Poland, the $1.25 billion that Poland now owes Canada under its grain agreement which is in arrears month after month. How are some of these problems going to be dealt with? What is the role of the World Bank? Why should we give any support to the World Bank at all, or any credit to it? What should be the criteria for loans by the World Bank and other development associations?

Another burning issue of the day about which I get many letters from Canadians is the suggestion we should not have the Inter-American Bank give a loan to Guatemala because of what is happening there. Then I get a letter saying we should not have one of those agencies give a loan to El Salvador, or Cuba, or else we hear, Mr. Speaker, that the World Bank should not provide financing credit for South Africa, and on and on it goes. What is the answer to that? Surely, it is in the Government's interest to explain to the Canadian people what their policy is in those areas. This is a debate on this whole area. What is the Government's policy if one of the agencies we are now giving assistance to wants to make a loan to Cuba? Does the Government take the position that no, Cuba should not have a loan because we do not approve of its system? If the Inter-American Development Bank wants to make a loan to Guatemala, are we taking the position now that we should say to them, through our representative in the Bank, no, you should not make a loan to Guatemala? If that is not our position, why is it not our position? Why do we have a different position? Do we take the position, as I assume we do, that these banks are there to help countries develop, and that these international agencies cannot set themselves up as judges of their own internal system, that they cannot make decisions as to what country should have a loan and what country should not have a loan under some kind of criteria which it is up to the individual to make a decision by? After all, Mr. Speaker, if we cut off relations with countries in this world of whose régimes we do not approve because of their human rights record, or whatever, we would have relations with very few countries in this world. We would not have relations with the U.S.S.R. or Poland or Czechoslovakia, El Salvador, Guatemala, Cuba, and so on. We would be pretty well isolated in the world if that was our policy. Therefore, we need a clear statement of what the policy of the Government is.

This is a Bill which authorizes us over the next few years to provide funds for the development associations and banks, and I have already read them so I will not repeat myself. Surely we should have a responsible Minister to tell us what are criteria that Canada advises these banks they should use when they make development loans. Do we tell them there are any conditions at all? What conditions do we tell them there should be? Is it not likely that we are going to get letters, as I get them continually now, asking why we authorized money to go to those banks? We are making loans to "X", "Y" and "Z" with whom these particular individuals do not agree. What is the Government's policy? Are we not entitled to know? I say, yes, Mr. Speaker, we are entitled to know.

I assume this legislation is going to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence: is that right, Mr. Government House Leader? We can get answers, hopefully, to some of these questions there.

Mr. Pinard: Yes.

Mr. Crosbie: Good. Can I ask the Parliamentary Secretary then whether he could ask his Minister to prepare some kind of statement that deals with these points I am raising now when this goes to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence, because while some of my speech might be put in a fashion that is calculated to arouse some amusement, these are serious points on which we wanted information, to which the public is entitled.

The situation of the developing world, Mr. Speaker, is pretty bleak today. The World Bank itself has had to slash its own assistance program by quite a considerable amount. The Third World countries have to import oil and are in what you can only call desperate shape. Their total debt has gone from $96.8 billion in 1973 to $500 billion this year. We know that Canada cannot continue to devote increasing amounts to this area if its own economy does not grow. The principal objective, therefore, of the Canadian Government has to be to get our own economy going again, and our own economic system growing, so we can do more.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I say to you that the Government has lost a great opportunity today. It has had two Bills, Bill C-129 and Bill C-130, which we are now considering. If the Government considers External Affairs and international assistance to be important, and it is one of the few occasions where we have had a chance to even touch on this subject in the House, it should have added to each of those Bills a major statement from the Minister of Finance or Secretary of State for External Affairs, and anyone else in the Government particularly concerned with these issues. The Prime Minister should have been here in this House discussing these issues. It is not good enough for him to go flying to Cancun when the eyes of the world are on Cancun, making noble statements to other world leaders, and I should not say "other" world leaders. I do not consider our Prime Minister to be a world leader. He is not in the class of the least of them. He is not in the class of the leaders of the Third World countries. They do a better job of solving their problems than this Prime Minister has done.

Our Prime Minister had these world leaders here a few months ago, but what has he done to follow up on the publicity he was then getting? He was going to insist that the United States and these other countries devote more time and attention to the North-South and to development assistance. He should be here tonight. If he could not be here tonight because he is in France, then he could have asked his House Leader to bring the Bill on when he got back because this is a subject close to his heart. "I am supposed to be renowned as an international statesman," he could have said, "and I want to be here in the House of Commons when the subject is discussed to outline my program for the future, how these world problems are going to be overcome and what Canada is going to do to meet them, how I am going to get Canada up again so it can do more." That is what should be happening to this legislation. Instead of that, we do not have the Prime Minister here, or the Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, or the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Regan) or the former minister of industry, and they were only changed several months ago. We have a new Parliamentary Secretary who addressed himself to this Bill and a neophyte Minister of State for Finance who has only been in that portfolio for several months and obviously has not got much of a grasp on the situation either. That shows how important this area is to the Government, Mr. Speaker, and it is not good enough. Because we believe in helping others and because we believe helping others helps us in Canada, we are going to support the principle of this bill, but it is a terrible show, a mean show, a dispirited show. It is an insincere show. It is show that should disgust anyone in this country who is interested in the field of international development assistance. It is a rotten way to introduce this legislation to the House. It is dispiriting, and I hope the message is passed on to the Prime Minister.

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I hope the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) will be grateful to me, since not only do I agree with much of what he just said, particularly about the shortcomings of the Government, but it was as a result of my request that the Bill is now going to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence so that we can give it the kind of examination that the Government hoped to avoid. It is also for this reason, Mr. Speaker, that I shall not take more than a few minutes tonight. We will have a much better opportunity to discuss this Bill in very great detail when it comes before the Standing Committee.

Like the Hon. Member who just spoke, I was surprised that the Parliamentary Secretary did not have something more to say about the activities of the international financial institutions that this Bill addresses. Perhaps the subject matter of the previous Bill was more familiar to most of us because it concerned the World Bank and IDA, and I think most of us do have a fair bit of knowledge about what they do and about the per capita income of the countries assisted by the IDA. In fact, 80 per cent of those countries have a per capita income of less than $410 a year. However, I do feel, and the Minister should have been aware of this, that there is not as much familiarity, either on the Government side or on the opposition side, with the African Development Fund, the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Fund, the Asian Development Bank, even the InterAmerican Development Bank and its fund for special operations, the Caribbean Development Bank and the Special Development Fund, the International Fund for Agricultural Development or the Common Fund for Commodities.

Canada is putting a great deal of money into all these banks and funds, as the Bill indicates, and perhaps it is because the Government has just become so used to introducing measures privately through order in council or estimates and sort of sneaking them in that it does not realize that when it is obliged to come before the House, it is surely expected to give a fairly detailed account and some judgment about the operation of these agencies. Are we to conclude that the Government has not studied the operation of these agencies and that it is simply granting the funds without any study about how they operate or the criteria they use for the granting of loans? Are we to assume it is not interested or that it just simply does not know or think it is important? I really cannot believe that. I know many members of the Department of External Affairs and CIDA are interested, concerned and knowledgeable, but the Government seems to have no wish to share that knowledge with us in the House of Commons. Indeed, it appears that it hopes even not to have to go to the Standing Committee on this and thereby deprive us of an opportunity to get the kind of information we want.

So I want to take my few minutes tonight to tell the Parliamentary Secretary in the Minister's absence—and like the Hon. Member who just spoke, I do think it is amazing that he would not have arranged for this Bill to be presented when he was present—to outline some of the main concerns I have so that when the Minister does come to the committee, and of course we will expect the Minister, the leading Minister before the committee, he will have some idea at least of the kind of concerns I have. Some of them have already been expressed by the Hon. Member for St. John's West so I will not repeat those; I will focuss on the other concerns I have.

Now, it has already been said that we cannot be entirely certain about what are the criteria for the granting of loans in these various institutions. In fact, as I understand it, they are fairly specific criteria, which include the IMF as well, and they are criteria that I think we as a country should very seriously re-examine. In a letter I wrote to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) on October 12, 1982, to which I received a reply dated October 28, I asked specifically about the desirability of Canada's supporting the granting by the InterAmerican Development Bank, an institution mentioned in the schedule to this Bill, of a loan to Guatemala. I gave the various reasons that many people give, that the chief purpose of this loan is to finance a rural telephone project. I said in my letter:

> It is very questionable that such a telephone system will be serving basic human needs or benefiting low income groups in rural Guatemala. Rural Guatemala is already served by an efficient and cheap telegraph system. It is more likely that such a communication system will be used mostly for the benefit of the government's security forces. The loan should be opposed by Canada for those reasons.

In his reply the Minister said:

> As you may know, Canadian policy continues to be that the introduction of political considerations into the decision-making processes of international financial institutions is contrary to their charter provisions and would seriously endanger their viability over the long term, to the detriment of all their members and of the international community as a whole.

In short, he said that there could not be introduced something that he called political considerations. The fact remains, however, that political considerations have in fact been introduced many times, both in the IDB, the InterAmerican Development Bank, and in the IMF whose charter has a similar provision. For example, when the United States pushed the IMF to make a loan of $85 million to El Salvador—which, by the way, all European countries except Italy opposed and which was approved one year after it was introduced with a further $300 million now under consideration—an investigation was carried out in the United States. That was reported in the Toronto Star on September 12, which said that the Dutch Executive Director had remarked that El Salvador's loan application differed from the usual in two respects. I should preface this by saying that most of those loans are to help countries out of balance of payments difficulties. First, this does not establish the existence, let alone the size, of a balance of payments shortfall. Secondly, it does not contain a staff proposal to the board. Yet this was granted. It was a political loan. They did not even establish the existence of a balance of payments shortfall which was supposed to be the reason for the loan being granted.

There is no doubt that Argentina's request for a loan has strong political implications. The loan request is a direct result of the Falklands war, which in turn, of course, affects the economic situation. Indeed, at this moment in time—and the Hon. Member for St. John's West will be interested to know this—Argentina pays out 100 per cent of its export earnings to finance its foreign debt. One hundred per cent. Clearly there is something very political about that need of Argentina's, and the same, as I have already indicated, is true of El Salvador in its request. I have already suggested that Guatemala does not have in mind the kind of economic considerations that the InterAmerican Development Bank, like the IMF, is supposed to be guided by, according to the Minister's letter.

So we need to have clarification not only of what the guidelines are but some discussions of whether or not Canada should be looking into broader or different guidelines. In that connection, it really came as a great shock to a lot of Canadians to discover that the loan to South Africa recently granted by the IMF of $1.7 billion U.S. is about the same amount as the increase in South Africa's military expenditures for the fiscal year 1981-82. To be more specific, the $689 million U.S. requested from the IMF Compensatory Financing Facility is the largest ever loan request made through that facility, and, coupled with the $394 million U.S. standby credit, approximates the 30 per cent increase in South Africa's defence expenditures for fiscal 1981-82, reaching almost $3 billion.

There are other examples, apart from South Africa, where it is clear that countries are spending massively on military equipment that, I think we all would agree, can be and usually is destabilizing or oppressive or repressive for the region in question. In the case of South Africa, gold devaluation substantially reduced its export earnings, so it asks for and receives a loan from the IMF which is about the same amount as its massive increase in military expenditures.

This is one of the things that I think we should talk about in the committee. If we are genuinely concerned about making international financing institutions viable particularly for the developing countries, surely there should be some direct link between the degree to which they can have a loan or grant and the degree to which they reduce these massive military expenditures that, copying the western world, many Third World countries are undertaking.

That is the first different criteria that the Standing Committee should examine. I hope when the Minister comes before it with his officials, he will already have examined the question pretty closely. It means that there must be some review of the loans granted over the years to the countries that have applied for and secured them from the various financial institutions we are talking about tonight, and also, I might add, from the IMF.

The second area at which we might look more closely was hinted at by the Hon. Member for York North (Mr. Gamble). And, Mr. Speaker, I never in this world thought that I would agree with him. He spoke about the many countries that are the recipients of bilateral and multilateral grants and loans, and how some of the money does not percolate down to the population but that a great deal seems to be expended by the elite in those countries, rather than by the ordinary people. I am sure that all Members who sit on the Latin American Subcommittee have thought about this; indeed, we could not help but think about it. It causes one to wonder whether the granting of loans should be related in some way to the development of land reform in the recipient country, for example, or should be linked in some way to the efforts made by the recipient country to see to a more equitable distribution of income. Many countries that we visited are certainly trying to do that, and I am not saying it could be done overnight. It should be looked at, however, and like the matter of military expenditures, should be built into our criteria.

The third and final matter that it would be desirable to examine in committee is whether, in a country that is engaging in massive human rights violations—all countries have engaged in some, unfortunately, but some engage in massive human rights violations and Guatemala is a case in point—the money is going to end up causing greater human rights violations and oppression by that particular Government.

This is a difficult question, because we want to help people with basic human needs with development assistance programs and we want these financial institutions to do that. It may be, however, that we should be looking more closely at massive human rights violations as well as at the degree of distribution of income and the growth in military expenditures.

I hope the Minister and his officials will come to the committee prepared to look at the questions that I am sure other Hon. Members will raise tonight, and that they will have thought about them and be able to give a somewhat more satisfactory answer than the one I received in the letter from the Minister. In order to give a more satisfactory answer they will have to study the oepration of the financial institutions and give a report on the financial operation of each and go through some of the more recent and questionable loan applications that have been approved.

Although the IMF is not included in the Bill before us, I would be grateful if it could be included in the review that I ask the Minister and the Department to do for the Standing Committee.

The need for full discussion and more information has been pointed out by other Hon. Members. I can only emphasize that if we, as Members of the Canadian House of Commons, are to talk reasonably with our constituents on the long-term benefits of development assistance; if in the face of massive unemployment and lay-offs and the numbers of exhaustees in our ridings, we are going to be understood by them, then we have to make sure we know how the money is being expended. We have to know what the record of the multilateral institution is, along the lines that I have been requesting, and what results have been achieved from loans already granted. I have some knowledge of this and I am sure other Hon. Members have even more, but generally it is not sufficiently known. If we are to do our duty as MPs we must have more information, more illumination.

I agree that long ago we should have had a statement from the Government on its development assistance policy, but apparently that is not going to be forthcoming. With the week or so that is available, perhaps the Government could address the long-run objectives, as it sees them in this period of economic recession, of its development assistance policy, both bilaterally and through these multilateral institutions.

Mr. Douglas Roche (Edmonton South): Mr. Speaker, I do not think the Government nor the officials of CIDA are sufficiently aware of the gravity of the present situation of trying to maintain public support or policies of international development assistance when, as my colleague said in reference to Bill C-129, we are living in extraordinary times in this country.

The Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) dwelled, in his inimitable and illuminating way, on the shortcomings of the Government Ministers in not being present tonight to introduce this legislation. I will not repeat those comments although I certainly agree with them.

We are facing a situation in which there are two competing elements. The first is the domestic crisis of the country. Then there is unemployment, inflation, bankruptcies and fears which were never in the minds of Canadians before. I know of people in Alberta and in Edmonton South who are going bankrupt, just as Hon. Members from Ontario know of similar cases in their constituencies.

It is true that the number of hungry and malnourished people in the world is growing and that there is insufficient health, education and shelter facilities to provide even basic needs for growing numbers of people, now estimated by the World Bank, which is the subject of our discussions tonight, at 800 million people, or one-quarter of humanity.

What is the issue here tonight? What is the issue that this absent and derelict Government does not address? The issue is how we will meet a double responsibility to Canadians and to the dispossessed of the world. How will we do this at a time when we live in extraordinary times which are calling into question the future of international development programs?

It is a tribute to the Progressive Conservative Party and its sense of responsibility that the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) spoke for us on Bill C-129 which dealt with millions of dollars for the World Bank and that the Hon. Member for St. John's West addressed comments on Bill C-130 which is now before us. Both these spokesmen committed our Party to supporting these bills, even though the Ministers would not give us the backs, let alone the fronts of their hands.

I do not want to be too hard on the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Cosgrove). After all, he was here and was asked legitimate questions tonight, especially in Committee of the Whole. He was asked the kinds of questions which Canadians are asking—where is the money going, why should we support the World Bank, why should we support international institutions at this moment when there are such pressing needs at home? I would have thought that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) would have been present. I do not know where he is. It is his Bill. Even with his briefings, I would have thought the Minister of State for Finance would have referred the House, in answer to some of the key questions about where the money for IDA goes, to the World Bank's own report on where it was going. Mr. Clausen, the President of the World Bank, told an international development meeting in Tokyo two weeks ago why he was asking for support. I attended that meeting at which Mr. Clausen used the case of India, the second largest country in the world, with more than 700 million people. With its rate of growth it will probably become the largest country in the world by the year 2020. He said that India had become self-sufficient in food. What does this mean?

I should like to refer to one of the projects of IDA which was paid for by funds contributed by various nations. It was worth $220 million and, according to The World Bank Annual Report 1982:

> The project—including construction work on six dams, expansion and remodeling of 217 kilometers of canal systems, and the construction or improvement of 672 kilometers of rural roads—will assist the ongoing development of two major irrigation schemes in Madhya Pradesh state and help increase agricultural production and raise the standard of living of local farmers. Total cost: $439.2 million.

I could quote many examples to show how the money used by the World Bank goes to help people become self-reliant. Why do we want them to become self-reliant? We want them to become self-reliant for humanitarian grounds, so that the world will be a more decent place and so that they can plug into the modern world and trading systems. Also we want them to become self-reliant because there is a mutual interest today between developed and developing countries, between the North and the South. There is a mutual interest in restoring the credit base of Third World countries and in reviving world production to serve as an engine of growth in both the North and the South. This is the basic rationale which the Progressive Conservative Party is supporting.

I hope the CIDA officials who have been monitoring this debate for the last several hours will carry back to their organization some of my comments tonight about the jeopardy in which they themselves are with respect to trying to maintain programs of international development. The Minister was not here to present his own Bill, and the Government refuses to produce a new strategy for international development.

There was a strategy for international development from 1975 to 1980. It contained 21 points. The North-South Institute, which is an independent professional organization, examined all 21 points and reported, at the conclusion of the five years, that the Government had failed in 16 of the 21 points. As bad as that failure was, the Government does not even produce a strategy for the years 1980 to 1985. No wonder we ask where the Government is going and what is happening in the entire area of international development assistance.

In the course of my remarks tonight I want to indicate—and I should note parenthetically what a rare occasion it is to have the opportunity to debate this subject matter—that we spent a lot of time, as the Hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) knows, studying very seriously the North-South question in the North-South Task Force. We made many recommendations as well, but I think that in all objectivity he will recognize that they have not been fully implemented or even implemented in the way we thought they should have been. I will be glad to hear his comments in the course of this debate, but he knows that the study was a serious one.

The situation to which Canada is relating is extremely serious, not just on humanitarian grounds, but in connection with our ability to have trading relationships with increasing numbers of people who want to come onstream with self-reliance. He knows, as well as I, that Canada is far behind the United States, Japan and the European community in terms of maintaining trading relationships, with developing countries on both the import and export sides. The trade levels of these three countries which I have just named compared with developing countries are around 25 to 35 per cent, whereas Canada is only at between the 12 and 15 per cent level. We have a long way to go. The North-South issue presents an access for us or a way to increasing trade, the kind of trade which many Canadian businessmen today, such as the 2,500 who have contracts with CIDA, have begun to discover.

How many times do we have to say and underline the fact that it is in our interests as a nation trying to relate to the conditions of interdependence in the modern world for us to maintain our development assistance programs in such a way that we are serving the needs of humanity and the needs of Canada? That is what this issue is all about. That is why this whole debate tonight should have been launched with a major paper by the Government to tell us what is happening with respect to Government policy. How do the officials at CIDA expect to know where they are going to go? I know the question marks and the morale question that CIDA has. I shall come back to CIDA in a few minutes.

Let me talk for a moment about a question that is often raised, that if we have had development assistance for the last 25 years, how come we still have these terrible problems of poverty—that the whole thing does not work? To begin with, in one quarter of a century we have had a lot of declarations, global reports, international conferences, new institutions and new concepts. It would be a whole speech in itself just to relate everything that has gone on. But what it has done for us is to have given us an understanding of how our planet works, how the training, the energy and the environmental interdependent systems of our planet work. Out of that momentum of ideas and activity, we have to ask ourselves, why has the development problem not been solved? Why do the experts keep telling us that 800 million people live in absolute poverty? This figure will rise to one billion by the end of the century. Why do 40,000 infants and small children die every day from malnutrition, disease and inattention in the developing world? The short answer to those questions is that although a great deal has been done to achieve self-reliance in the developing countries, the problem is worsening at a faster rate than the implementation of solutions.

I have had the opportunity of seeing at first hand what the situation is. I have seen areas where food production has tripled with the use of fertilizers and machinery. A few moments ago I referred to India with reference to the IDA appropriation that we put through this House earlier tonight through Bill C-129. India has become self-sufficient in food as a result of this kind of development. I have seen vast co-operative networks for marketing, long rows of new industrial plants, a rising middle-class, clean and well dressed children in schools. I have also seen the bodies of children who died from dysentry. I have seen filthy, stinking slums stretched out as far as the eye can see. I have seen village after village with no electricity, no water and the evening supper heated on a fire of cow dung.

Out of all this, what have I learned? I have learned that the development problem can be solved. The situation is not hopeless. There are enough resources. Economic progress in the bottom sectors of the economy is possible. It is not facts, theories, money or strategies that we are short of; it is the political will. The political will among us in the North must as well be in those leaders in the South. We must understand that it is not just good ethics but it is also good economics to support development partnerships in this modern world.

We have used the word crisis so often in connection with the developing countries, but the word seems to have lost its meaning and serves no one. Yet what other word can be used to describe the mounting number of children who are dying because development programs in their countries have been cut back because the balance of payments have become unmanageable as a result of the higher price developing countries pay for imports of such things as oil together with the lower prices they receive for the export of their commodities. You see, Mr. Speaker, how these questions are interlinked. I have traced it right back to the village level. I have spoken to doctors in Kenya, one of the better off countries in Africa. I have spoken to the flying doctors, as they are called, who go into the bush country. They showed me that children were dying because the development programs were cut back. Why did this happen? Because Kenya reduced its own development program as a result of the cash crisis, the deficit that country accumulated as a result of the higher prices of imports, namely oil and manufactured goods which came from the north, which passed on inflation, whereas the export of Kenya's goods through the manufacturing countries was not subject to inflation and so Kenya got a lesser return. That is the principal reason the gap is widening between the North and the South. That is a question that has to be dealt with.

Too often I think we tend to deal with it in negative or pessimistic terms as if the whole thing were terrible. I have said that the problem is out-running the solutions because of the deficits involved. We have made references earlier tonight to the cumulated deficit exceeding $500 billion in the least developed oil-importing countries. What about the progress that has been made? I think we ought to recognize that as a result of the participation of countries like Canada in economic assistance programs which the developing countries of the South have, since all this got started two decades ago, they have doubled their average income, they have halved their rates of infant mortality, and they have almost doubled their average literacy rate—to over 50 per cent. These efforts during the first two development decades have produced some positive results. However, the situation continues to get worse. Even though the situation is worsening, the developing world can at least take credit for the fact that 150 million hectares of new land have gone into production, which is more than all of the present crop land in North America, western Europe and Japan combined. Add to that the doubling of land under irrigation, and we have the reason why only one-tenth the number of people died from famine between 1950 and 1975 as were estimated to have perished from starvation in the much less populaced world of 1875 to 1900.

In these years development has too often been measured by the size of new airports rather than the number of years a child can stay in school. However, the experts—and here again we should recognize the World Bank, the subject of our concern tonight—have led the way in coming to what I would call a latter day understanding of the needs and values of community development that if you put money into servicing the needs of people at the village level, that has a far greater economic impact than even some of the mega-projects that have been funded in the name of foreign aid. We are now seeing that the number of years a child can stay in school, the number of projects that will help to fund health, nutrition and education, all of that is not just humanitarian but it has made a major contribution to economic growth.

The fact that the development process is now getting down to the poorest in some areas has given rise to a new ray of hope. Just as this moment of hope arrived, the cost of oil and other manufactured goods for the developing countries went out of sight for them and set back all the development programs, with the result that both the south and the north have fallen into situations of real concern.

I am not going to take the time of the House tonight to trace what Robert McNamara calls the reverse circuits of interdependence by which nations such as Brazil, Mexico and many other developing countries that are so-called better off and have grown the fastest have become in great danger of going bankrupt as a result of their inability to pay the interest or repay capital on increasing amounts of loans which they have acquired. That is one aspect of the situation that the World Bank and the IMF, the International Monetary Fund, have had to address, and which they did address at their meetings in Toronto. Some people are quite critical of the World Bank and the IMF, but I am not one of them because I think that both institutions, as the North-South task force recommended, are employing modernization programs and expanding their bases. The World Bank expanded its base, doubling its base of capital, and is now able to secure more money on the commercial markets which it then loans to developing countries, and particularly, to the least developed through the IDA section of the World Bank. It is able to do these things because these institutions are adjusting themselves. That is the fundamental reason these two Bills tonight, which address themselves to a certain expansion of the operating facilities of both CIDA and the inter-regional banks and the World Bank, ought to be supported.

However, there is a certain anomaly here. Those who have watched the debate may be under the impression, with the many figures hurled around, that there is some sort of gigantic expansion taking place in Canada's official development assistance program, but such is certainly not the case. First, we must recall that only a few days ago the Minister of Finance took $245 million out of the forthcoming CIDA budget. The percentage of Canada's official development assistance is now only 0.43 per cent of the gross national product. It is a long way from the 0.5 per cent which the Government has committed by 1985, and it is certainly that much farther from the 0.57 per cent which the North-South task force recommended be achieved by 1985. The enlargement of official development assistance is simply not taking place. There is a certain transfer over to some increase in multilateral assistance, but that will be at the expense of some bilateral programs.

That brings me to some suggestions I want to make to the officials of CIDA and to the Government for their consideration as to how they will maintain a program which is responsive to the needs of the South today and which conjoins the situation in which Canada finds itself, this extraordinary situation wherein all development assistance is questioned. In short, I think it is time we woke up to the fact that the new era in North-South relations has arrived and that it is time to recognize that all the arguments of self-interest, global stability and human justice now converge on the new reality of the interdependent world, namely, that the present global crisis of the international economic system affects both North and South. It is certainly time we gave some recognition to a basic fact that in 1981, three quarters of the total increase in international trade of manufactured goods was represented by imports by developing countries from the North. I say to Your Honour and Hon. Members in the House that we must realize what the statistic is telling us. We are in a recession in the north. We are in a crisis. We are living in extraordinary times. A way out of that crisis is to increase our sales and our exports of goods to that vast section of humanity which is now trying to come onstream called "the developing countries". Here, even in the midst of this crisis, in 1981, and I want to repeat this, three quarters of the total increase in international trade of manufactured goods was represented by imports by developing countries from the North. That is the signal which ought to encourage us to take some realistic steps, even recognizing that the steps we are taking are less than half of 1 per cent of our gross national product. In the interests of global stability, in the interests of Canada enlarging its own trading relationships in the world, and certainly in the interest of pure human justice, I think we must maintain strong programs and have a strategy for them and an explanation for the Canadian people.

I would propose that CIDA recognize that one of its problems, I would even say its chief problem, is that it has mixed up its motivation as to what it is attempting to do. It is not explaining it. Moreover, its 1,106 projects reach into no fewer than 89 countries on the ground that this provides an entry for Canadian business. We must recognize that Sweden, which is the best aid deliverer in the world, operates in only 20 countries. The development community of Canada is appalled by this misdirection of aid money into so many countries that it loses its effectiveness, and the business community of Canada is simply unimpressed because the figures are far too small to make any kind of imprint in a serious way on Canadian business. Even for all the tied aid that is under so much discussion, the value of it to Canadian business under the bilateral program, according to the last study I saw a couple of years ago, and even in the study which the Government would not release, was that tied aid was equivalent to only 0.23 per cent of our gross national product, so business still is not impressed by the argument.

Rather than carrying on in the way we are, with so many projects in so many countries, I think the time has come when the Government might act quickly with two moves to save CIDA, its reputation and its support. The first of these would be to cut at least in half the number of projects and countries and switch bilateral aid to lines of credit. Under a line of credit, a designated country would be able to use those Canadian goods and services that it really needs, rather than having unwanted projects foisted on it by Canadian officials instructed to move specific Canadian goods, even if the country involved does not need it and it does not fit into its priorities. I have seen many such examples.

If the Government took that first step and moved to lines of credit for most of its bilateral assistance, that would enable a second step to be taken, namely the reduction of the oversized bureaucracy of CIDA. CIDA has more than 1,000 employees in its headquarters here. I guess my friends up there in the gallery will not be happy to hear this, but I think that figure should be cut at least in half, and I hope you do not think I am exaggerating here tonight. If you want to save the support of the Canadian public for international development assistance, you must get rid of that oversized bureaucracy in Hull. The administrative costs of CIDA amounts to $47.73 million—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I call the Hon. Member's attention to the fact that remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Roche: I certainly heed your admonition, Mr. Speaker, but I was so intent on communicating my message to these officials, who I know want to take it back to CIDA, that I inadvertently looked up at them in the gallery. They are such handsome fellows and I know they are trying to do a good job, and I will let it go at that.

In any event, before Your Honour kindly interrupted me, I said that the administrative costs of CIDA amount to $47.73 million. This could be cut in half without damaging the proper implementation of aid. By switching bilateral aid to lines of credit, we would eliminate the need for Canadian bureaucrats to trip over themselves in supervising Canadian projects to Third World countries, those countries which have become quite capable of planning and supervising their own affairs.

We do not have a strategy because the Government refuses to give us one. It is no wonder we are asking questions concerning the value of all this. However, I will tell you what the strategy ought to be, Mr. Speaker. Here is the strategy: to go to lines of credit for bilateral assistance, to cut the bureaucracy there, which we would not then need so much, to put more emphasis on the concept of self-reliance in our aid program, to increase our participation in multilateral aid development programs and to provide more matching funds to non-governmental organizations. That is only 7 per cent or 8 per cent of the total CIDA budget now. Dollar for dollar, the non-governmental organizations, of which there are about 100 that are drawing $89 billion of CIDA funds in matching grants, do a better job in getting into community assistance. I have seen it with my own eyes. The non-government organizations of this country are getting short-changed. I would suggest that there is not one party or even one Member of the House who is not in support of the basic recommendations that was made by the North-South task force, that the non-governmental organizations of this country which are doing such a great job should get a better share. Many of those organizations consist of volunteers who go directly into the communities.

I would like to discuss a major part of our strategy. If CIDA is to be turned around, if international Government assistance is to be turned around, there must be the independent study and analysis which was recommended by our Party in 1979. That study would have lead to a proper strategy which would have taken us through these 20 years, to the end of the century. That independent study would have helped to answer these legitimate questions which are being put on the floor of the House of Commons as to whether aid actually does help the poorest people whom CIDA and we all wish to help.

Another part of the strategy that I will put forward deals with measures to encourage greater private investment in developing countries. We have to encourage Canadian business to enter into joint partnerships and invest in those countries where there is future business waiting, particularly in the energy fields. I would point out very clearly that as part of our strategy as well, no aid whatsoever would go to countries that are themselves conducting military operations in other countries.

These are constructive comments on a positive strategy which I have outlined here today. Since I do not have the responsibility for running a $1.5 billion program—I wish I did—I only hope that members in the Government who have that responsibility will say why it will not lay out a program and strategy that will make some sense and develop some support from all sides of the House.

I want this to be regarded as a serious intervention, Mr. Speaker. I have tried to make my remarks as free of rhetorical exposition as possible, but I think that the time has come to make some serious suggestions with respect to immediate Government policies on the international financial crisis that both of these Bills are trying to address. I would like to put these suggestions before the House in point form so that the Government will take note of them. I hope it will consider these suggestions I wish to make with respect to addressing ourselves to the international crisis of liquidity, to the deficits that are impairing the development of programs and to those international deficits that the World Bank and the IMF in Toronto are trying to address.

I would like to address myself to those deficits that are themselves having an impact, or rebound, on countries such as Canada which are, as part of the North, unable to find the markets and produce goods for those expanding markets because people are unable to become sufficiently self-reliant.

These are some of the steps I wish to suggest. First, there should be urgent action in setting up an international energy financing facility either within or without the World Bank. This would be an energy affiliate of the World Bank, or some such step that has been advocated before, that will not interfere in private investment in energy sources in developing countries. However, that international energy financing facility would help to finance energy investment for the oil importing countries that are prone to these high deficits and that are throwing the international financial community into such disarray.

Second, there should be more interaction with the Governments of these countries requiring them to have regional national energy plans. There should be established an energy nexus with food, so that we may see the relationships much more clearly.

Third, the developing countries should establish, with our co-operation and our export of sufficient food, a reserve of nine million to 10 million tonnes to provide food security as a safety net for those populations that do get caught in crisis that cannot be managed by themselves domestically.

Fourth, we should strengthen the developing countries' capacity to feed themselves through domestic food production expansion programs.

Fifth, we should use effectively the forthcoming GATT meeting. Not much has been said tonight about the forthcoming ministerial meeting of GATT. I believe that the Canadian Government ought to lead the way at that meeting to suggest that there ought to be a firm declaration on the standstill of further protectionism, that the GATT nations at the ministers' meeting would employ a standstill on further protectionism. As well, they should finish the Tokyo round of the safeguard clause. We should go for a long-term program for trade liberalization. Those are things to which the ministers should address themselves at the GATT meeting.

Sixth, there should be a doubling of the IMF quotas, just as the capital base of the World Bank has been doubled.

Seventh, there should be a revised policy of conditionality for IMF lending and an automatic provision for refinancing, a consolidation of fund facilities and greater pressure on surplus countries to adjust.

Eighth, a special facility should be established in the IMF for the orderly refinancing of the accumulated debts of the worse-off countries so that they would be recognized as suffering from what I would call debts of duress caused by the failure of the international system to adjust to their needs and problems, which are not caused by internal mismanagement but by the failure of the international financial system to address itself to questions of liquidity that are caused by high imports, low exports and the resulting deficit crisis that infringes upon the lives of people.

Ninth, there should be a new agreement on SDRs to the surplus countries that are unwilling to adjust. They would lose their SDRs to those deficit countries willing to carry the burden.

Tenth, there should be a special concessionary window in the World Bank to supplement IDA Seven. We have talked tonight about the supplement for IDA Six. If the United States maintains its hesitancy to proceed into further growth of international financial institutions, then a supplementary window for IDA Seven, which is almost upon us now, will have to be considered.

Eleventh, there should again be a doubling by us or by the World Bank, which has already doubled its base, with a paid-in contribution of cost-free capital to allow the Bank to function better.

I will conclude with my last point which is that the World Bank should set up a group of thinkers to advise it independently so that the future of international development assistance, the World Bank and international institutions can be modernized and harmonized for the needs of the modern world.

[Translation]

Mr. Herb Breau (Gloucester): Mr. Chairman, this evening I intend to be brief because I know that other Members want to speak on this bill which, at first glance, does not appear to be either complicated or very long, but which is still quite significant.

[English]

There are many things I would like to say during this debate. While this Bill is not a very complex one and only provides appropriations for Canadian contributions to some international banks or financial institutions, it does open up the whole question of Canada's commitment to official development assistance.

Many comments have been made with regard to our commitment. I believe that it is a commitment that is respected throughout the world. There is no time this evening to respond in an intelligent way to all of the questions that have been raised because there are some points which have been made that I believe deserve to be answered.

I am very happy that in this time of recession there seems to be widespread consensus, at least expressed in this Parliament, that Canada should continue to have a strong and sincere commitment to official development assistance, not only because we are human beings and therefore for humanitarian reasons, but because it is to the practical advantage of Canada to develop relationships, whether they are economic, political, social or cultural.

I believe it is important for us to discuss with the Canadian public these issues. I was very happy to hear the comments this evening by the Official Opposition External Affairs critic, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche). They were positive in nature, to the effect that they want Canada to do more. I agree that Canada should do more. Even though these are hard times, there are many people whu would be glad to trade their good times for our hard times.

While the Canadian Government appropriates about $1.5 billion for development assistance, Canadians generally spend a lot of money on things that are less important. For example, we spend about $5.5 billion on liquor and over $6 billion a year on cultural entertainment. To suggest that we have to reduce our activity because of economics is to forget that we have a lot of things we can share with the rest of the world.

I hope the fact that I am not speaking for very long will not be construed as a lack of interest in this issue or with regard to this Bill. I know there are other Members who will want to say a few words. I do not want to delay passage of this Bill.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I certainly want to say more than a few words on Bill C-130, an Act to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions.

I have had considerable experience with CIDA and foreign aid, going back to 1975 when the Liberal Government tried to conceal information regarding loans to Cuba. They provided public information that the loans were being made at interest rates of 6 per cent and higher. However, I obtained internal documents which showed that they were concealing the interest rate being charged on loans to Cuba, which was zero per cent and 3 per cent.

Also we are well aware of the low interest loans to Russia for the building of their gas pipeline. This Liberal Government is borrowing money at 17 and 18 per cent and lending it to Russia at 12 per cent. This is a great loss to the Canadian people. In addition, loans are being made for the building of statues in other countries.

In 1975 I presented a motion to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence calling for a full-scale investigation into foreign aid. I did this because of all the secret documents which had come into my hands with regard to hidden loans and hidden percentage with regard to Cuba. This, of course, was defeated by the Liberal Members on the committee. The last thing they wanted was an investigation into CIDA. I certainly commend you, Mr. Speaker, because you were the lone Liberal to vote with the Conservatives in that committee calling for a full-scale investigation into CIDA. I guess I also have to give a little credit—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: With all respect to the Hon. Member, I call to his attention the position of the Chair. The kind of allusions he has made are usually not made in this House.

Mr. McKenzie: It is too late, Mr. Speaker, I have already made them. I will contratulate you once again on speaking up for the Canadian people instead of following the old Liberal Party line.

I want to speak briefly on the growth of international financial institutions. We have already alluded to the mounting debt problem which is confronting the developing nations.

The World Bank and the other IFIs are merely adding to the problem of mounting Third World debt by ever-expanding lending programs. In fact, World Bank lending to developing nations has increased to about $12 billion a year, which is 12 times what it was in 1968. On top of this already explosive growth, the pending general capital increase for the World Bank will allow lending to double in the 1980s.

The United States' share of this increase will be $8.8 billion, beginning in fiscal year 1982, if the Reagan administration decides to go forward with this initiative as negotiated by the Carter administration. This is something the Government should be studying.

This doubling of the World Bank lending capacity represents about a 2,000 per cent increase in growth within two decades. This is not something we can just slough through this Chamber tonight and into committee without proper debate. The reason I am talking tonight, and I will call it ten o'clock, is that other Members will want to go into this in more detail next week.

A troubling aspect concerning this enormous growth in lending by the IFIs is the mounting criticism that the need for ensuring that quality projects are supported is being sacrificed by a desire to achieve increased quantity of lending.

The May 26, 1980 edition of Forbes Magazine contained an article on World Bank President Robert McNamara and his bank. In his article, Forbes states:

> Somewhat like a go-go banker who pushes his subordinates to create impressive numbers rather than sound loans, McNamara sets high loan quotas and insists that they be met. It's not that poorer nations don't have plenty of unfilled needs. The question is: How effective are the banks projects in helping generate the income and the foreign exchange needed to pay back their costs?

I go back to 1975. The Liberal Government had negotiated a loan with the Kenyan Government to build a school. The Canadian Government was going to contribute $2 million. Therefore a $2 million cheque was sent to Kenya. When it arrived in Kenya, no one knew what to do with it. They did not want it as they were not ready to build the school. The cheque floated around before finally coming back to North America ending up in a bank in New York, drawing no interest. We can see the importance of having a full-scale debate and allowing Members to discuss the foreign aid problem, how CIDA works, and $2 million cheques floating around the world.

Forbes quotes one World Bank manager as having said:

> We're like a Soviet factory. The push is to maximize lending. The quantity-control mechanism means that in May and June (before the end of the fiscal year) the pressures to lend are enormous and a lot of people spend sleepless nights wondering how they can unload projects. Our ability to influence projects in a way that makes sense is completely undermined.

That is the problem we had with CIDA. Of course a lot of this was corrected, but not all of it because unfortunately we were in government only nine months. The Conservative Minister in charge of CIDA did a lot of tightening up with proper accounting controls.

The United States Treasury officials frequently maintain that these criticisms are overstated. It appears to us that there is a growing body of evidence and a growing number of knowledgeable voices stating that in fact these institutions are expanding too rapidly and wasting resources in the process. May I call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Nielsen: Before you see the clock, Mr. Speaker, there have been some discussions with respect to the business of tomorrow and next week. I understand that perhaps the House Leader for the New Democratic Party will be able to bring us up to date on his feelings with respect to these discussions.

Mr. Deans: Thank you very much. I certainly do appreciate the opportunity to bring everyone up to date on my feelings. I have been waiting to do this for some time. I have been having discussions with my caucus who are somewhat divided on a matter of great principle. Unfortunately, it would appear as if the deliberations, the discussions we had, will not bear fruit tonight.

Adjournment Debate

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

NATIONAL DEFENCE—GOVERNMENT DECISION ON MOVEMENT OF NAVAL RESERVE HEADQUARTERS. (B) REQUEST THAT PRIME MINISTER ACT ON ISSUE

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, on July 30, 1982, my colleague, the Hon. Member for Victoria (Mr. McKinnon) and myself made a startling revelation in the House of Commons, namely, that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) would announce the transfer of the Canadian Naval Reserve Headquarters from Halifax on the Atlantic coast to Quebec City on the St. Lawrence River, 1,000 miles inland from international waters. The public reaction was swift, and outside the Minister's own constituency of Langelier in the province of Quebec, virtually unanimous. That is to say, Canadians in the east, centre and west condemned the transfer as both inefficient and ineffective and, more importantly, unfair and unjustified on grounds of national defence and our commitment to NATO. Nonetheless, Mr. Speaker, the transfer was confirmed a few days later by the Minister of National Defence.

What can you expect from a Minister of National Defence who promotes the expenditure of $3 billion on a first-class air fighter interceptor used for coastal protection, then moves the base for the F-18 fighters 500 miles inland to a base at Bagotville, Quebec. The economic havoc the closure of Chatham base will wreak in northern New Brunswick might have been justified if our air defence was strengthened. Instead, it was weakened. The Minister's error is now underlined by the fact that United States authorities have expressed serious concern over the shortened range of the F-18 fighter and its reduced refuelling capability.

The brutal fact is that Canada's national defence is in a chaotic state and the minister must bear both the blame and the shame. The National Defence budget was cut by $200 million in the June budget. Then in October, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) announced a further reduction of $230 million. These reductions must be added to the $200 million that will be contributed by the Armed Forces and National Defence personnel to the Government's six and five wage restraint program. That is over $600 million taken away from National Defence expenditures.

Let me consider the state of our national defence program. Can we defend ourselves from attack, and are we honouring our NATO commitments and our international responsibilities, not to mention our duty to our own defence personnel? Here are some practical matters to think about: if a foreign naval force mined Halifax Harbour and approaches, we would have to call upon the United States to provide a mine-sweeping vessel. When our destroyers do make it out of the Halifax Harbour for NATO exercises, they often have to return because of problems like cracks in their aging boilers. The Sea King helicopters are hardly safe on the ground, let alone on air patrol and must undergo continuous inspection because of mechanical failures.

Let me speak just briefly, Mr. Speaker, about our commitment to NATO. Canada has committed itself to a 3 per cent real growth in NATO expenditures. Instead, we have seen the NATO force diminish in size and capacity over the decade from 1971 to 1981. I want to speak particularly about the effect of cutbacks in defence expenditures and the lack of interest in the matter of national defence as it affects our naval force. Our Navy is left with vessels which are obsolete and outdated. The only hope for the future is the replacement vessel program which centres around the Canadian patrol frigate program. We fear today those cuts in defence expenditures will affect that program and that one ray of hope will be lost to our naval forces. Other elements of the Canadian Forces have suffered harm, Mr. Speaker, but none more than the Navy.

Let me return very briefly to the decision of the Minister of National Defence to transfer the Naval Reserve Headquarters from Halifax to Quebec. His justification was that the Francophone element should have greater participation in the Naval Force, and that the Navy itself should have a greater presence in the province of Quebec. I, for one, sympathize with the legitimate desires of the Francophone population of Canada, but that should not be mixed in with serious considerations of National Defence. At the present moment enlistment is at an all-time low; people are staying in the Armed Forces. So there is no point in transferring the Naval presence to the province of Quebec for an enlistment program which will be nonexistent over the next few years as Canada attempts to get out of this dreadful recession.

What is more important, and what lies at the heart of this subject, is our concern for national defence and our defence forces. We as a nation have to recognize that there are real threats in this world to our country, in fact, to any democratic country. If I may repeat almost 20 years later the words of President John F. Kennedy: Let those who think that there is no threat in this world travel to Berlin and see the situation which exists in that great city. There is indeed, Mr. Speaker, a threat to all democratic nations and our only defence is to have capable Armed Forces, and there is no element more important in our Armed Forces than our naval element.

It is important that the Minister of National Defence not play politics with our Navy and National Defence. It is important that all Parliamentarians stand up and be counted on the issue of national defence and ensure proper financing for our Armed Forces, proper protection for the people of Canada, so that they can live with the assurance that we are taking our place in the nations of the world and that we are concerned with our future and the future generations of Canadians who will be affected by any attempt to destroy our way of life.

Let me conclude on a positive note, Mr. Speaker. It is our sincere hope that the Government will see its way clear to give proper support to the Canadian Armed Forces, particularly to the Canadian Navy, that it will no longer deal with the matter on a political basis, but will recognize the responsibility of Canada and Canadians to national defence.

Mr. Garnet M. Bloomfield (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, it is unfortunate that such comments as those of the Hon. Member's with respect to the move of the Naval Reserve Headquarters from Halifax to Quebec City have resulted in such a negative perception among some members of the public, such that we are moving virtually the entire Navy up the St. Lawrence. Clearly, nothing could be further from the truth.

For quite some time, and as recently as two years ago, Vice-Admiral Allan, then Maritime Commander, expressed his concern with regard to the low level of Francophone representation in the Navy. Within the Naval Element of the Armed Forces, only 13.8 per cent of the non-commissioned and 9.7 per cent of the officer ranks are Francophones.

The Chief of the Defence Staff agreed with the concerns expressed by the Commander of Maritime Command and gave direction to try to identify ways and locations in which the profile or presence of the Navy could be heightened in the province of Quebec in such a way that Francophones would consider the Navy as a viable career alternative. After careful study several specific recommendations were brought forward by our military advisers. The ultimate aim was to increase the participation of Francophones in the naval service by providing an opportunity for some to live and to serve in a truly Francophone environment, rather than the then current policy of establishing French language units in Halifax, which are little more than Francophone enclaves in an Anglophone world.

To achieve these goals, the Department of National Defence identified the Naval Reserve Headquarters, a small unit within Maritime Command, as a relatively high profile unit that could be moved into Quebec with little or no direct impact on the over-all operations of the naval element. This unit is responsible for the co-ordination and control of the training procedures of the 18 Naval Reserve Units across Canada. It has been located in Hamilton and in Ottawa; before the move to Halifax. The move will not result in any loss of operational efficiency for Maritime Command. If it does in fact result in an improvement in the representation, recruitment and retention of Francophones in the naval service, then it will be deemed a success. Clearly, the initiative is essential if Francophones are to assume their rightful part in Canada's naval service.

I think it is important to point out to you, and it is unfortunate that most media observers missed this point, that the decision to relocate the Naval Reserve Headquarters to Quebec City was openly endorsed by the Presidents of the Maritime Defence Association of Canada, the Naval Officers' Association of Canada and the Navy League of Canada. These organizations were made aware of this proposal some time ago as a result of a series of visits to reserve units and supporting organizations by Naval officers. Their support of this initiative has been a significant source of encouragement to us. In addition, the Minister informs me that he has received correspondence from former Chief of Defence Staff, Admiral Falls, who also fully endorses this decision.

I hope that the foregoing will place this decision in the appropriate perspective.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS—LEGAL COSTS FACED BY ENGLISH SCHOOL APPLICANTS IN QUEBEC

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East): Mr. Speaker, on August 4, before the House adjourned for the summer, I put the following question to the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau):

> Madam Speaker, since 1978 the federal government has helped citizens and groups finance legal actions against provincial legislation which contravened Sections 93 and 133 of the Constitution. With the new Charter of Rights and the Canada clause, will the government now provide financial assistance to individuals in Quebec who are seeking admittance to English schools this fall under the Canada clause? The Prime Minister understands that, if the Charter is to be effective and meaningful, citizens must have means to enforce these rights in the courts, even to the Supreme Court of Canada.

In August, parents wanted an answer to that question because they were preparing to enroll their children in schools in Quebec. They were not sure whether they could enroll them in English schools under the Canada Clause in the new Charter or whether they would be subject to the provisions of Bill 101. Fortunately, several weeks later the Quebec Superior Court ruled that the Canada Clause prevailed over Bill 101.

Everything looked bright for a few days but soon after that the Quebec Government announced it was going to appeal the case to the Quebec Court of Appeal, and I am sure that after that it will go to the Supreme Court of Canada. My question stands.

In answer to my question the Prime Minister said he could not "give a blanket guarantee" that the Government would advance legal costs in all cases, but that he would see whether something could be done in particular cases. I was not asking that the Government fund all cases of this nature, Mr. Speaker. What I wanted was a statement from the Government that it would fund those cases which would set precedents of interpretation for the Charter of Rights, especially the Canada Clause, and that it would assist those citizens and citizens' groups that would otherwise not go to court.

If we look at the history in Manitoba, where repressive and discriminatory legislation was enacted against Francophones at the turn of the century, but where action was not taken to the Supreme Court until a few years ago by Mr. Forest in that province, we will see that if that action had been taken at the right time in Manitoba, its history would have been very different.

At the turn of the century the Francophone population in that province was 50 per cent, but because of that discriminatory and restrictive legislation the Francophone population declined to the point where it is a very small minority in that province today. Although Mr. Forest won his case with the help of funding from the federal Government, one could say that it was too late. Eighty years had passed since the wrongdoing of the provincial Government of the day. We do not want that to happen again.

If the Charter of Rights is to be meaningful, and if we are to get the interpretations by the courts that are necessary, then the citizens of this country must have the means to go not only before the courts of first instance, but also before the courts of appeal and the Supreme Court. Otherwise, the Charter becomes a meaningless document.

I repeat that I am not asking for assistance in every case. I am asking for assistance in cases which would be precedent-setting.

This past week we had a very successful Liberal convention at which resolution 272 was passed by the plenary session. It read; "Be it resolved that the Federal Government take such measures that may be necessary to fully implement the Canada Clause in the Charter of Rights". That resolution was passed with almost unanimity by the plenary.

Another resolution which was passed by the workshop on the Constitution and language rights, but was not sent on to the plenary because it was not designated as a priority by the workshop—it was a unanimous decision as well and I was present—reads; "Be it resolved that the Government ensure that minority language rights are fully respected since there is sufficient evidence to demonstrate that federal public servants are not complying with the official languages law". That was also fully supported by the convention. These two resolutions were fully supported by the Liberal Party, asking its Government to give support to its citizens, not only in Quebec but the Francophone minority throughout the country.

I pointed out in my question to the Prime Minister that in 1978 the Cabinet adopted a policy to assist legal actions under Section 93 and Section 133, which were the principal ones guaranteeing language rights at that time before the Charter. Certain cases have been funded in Quebec. There were three. One was taken by the Protestant School Board of Greater Montreal, another by the Quebec Home and School Association and another by three small shop owners with respect to signs. The amounts given in those cases averaged between $10,000 and $20,000. Of course Mr. Forest was helped in Manitoba under that policy. Right now there is another citizen in the west who is of the Francophone minority and is being helped. But what is being done there has not been extended, so far, to the enlarged or extended rights given under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

As I said earlier in my remarks, if those rights are to be meaningful to citizens, they must have the means to go to court to have them interpreted in a proper manner. I ask the Government to come out in favour of what the Liberal Party has asked.

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I would like to reply to the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce (Mr. Allmand) in his mother tongue.

[English]

I cannot more fully agree with him.

[Translation]

Indeed, when the Hon. Member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) asked the same question only a week ago, emphasizing at that time the special situation in which Franco-Ontarians find themselves concerning application of Section 23 of the Canada Clause in the case of language minorities in Ontario, I rose in the House to tell him that he had my full support. I was at the workshop at the same time as the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce last saturday. I was also there Sunday morning when the resolution received unanimous support of the assembly, and I must say, Mr. Speaker, that since then, I have discussed the matter with my colleague, the Hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. MacGuigan), and that we have assessed the conditions under which some assistance might be granted. I note that many of the views expressed by the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce are shared by the Hon. Minister of Justice and myself. With your permission I should like to give you a very brief summary of the conditions under which financial assistance could be extended to certain groups of citizens in relation to the application of Section 23 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, namely the right for official language minorities to attend English schools in Quebec and French schools in other provinces. Mr. Speaker, these conditions would be subject to the following criteria. First, it would have to be a prima facie case with a valid legal basis, supported with serious arguments. The second criteria for offering financial assistance is that the result would have to benefit not an individual, but a group of citizens so that the advantage sought would not be an individual benefit, but a collective one.

A third criterion was mentioned by the Hon. Member in the course of his speech, namely, a case or cases that would set precedents of interpretation for the concepts contained in Section 23 of the Charter, which are still somewhat vague. For instance, the concept and I quote:

When the number warrants—

What does that mean: where the number warrants? Does it mean twenty-two or eighteen parents claiming their right to have a French school, or twelve parents in an isolated community? The concept remains vague, and I think the courts would do well to study the matter and provide a specific answer.

Another example, still in the same area, is the concept of educational facilities referred to in Section 23. What is an educational facility? This is another concept that could usefully be examined by the courts. Other criteria that could also be applied include that of non-duplication in a bill on the same subject that might be debated in a provincial legislative assembly. For instance, I do not think it would make sense to take legal action at a time when a province is about to enact the objectives of Section 23 in its own legislature. Another criterion is that such action should basically be concerned with the objectives of Section 23 and should not be used as a delaying tactic or otherwise affect the credibility of the courts.

These are a few criteria which could be considered basic criteria. I can inform you, Mr. Speaker, and I am saying this also for the benefit of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East (Mr. Almond), that I have promised the House to report on the subject, at the request of the Hon. Member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce-Lachine East and especially of the member for Ottawa-Vanier (Mr. Gauthier), by the end of this year, so that the problems encountered in Manitoba will not recur elsewhere in the years to come. Consequently, I can give the Hon. Member the assurance that his request is being given careful consideration by the government, and by the end of this year, I shall be in a position to report to the Hon. Member and to the House on the Government's decision, which I hope will be favourable.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the minister, but his time has expired.

CANADA POST CORPORATION—LETTER CARRIER WALK SERVICES

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, on June 17, 1982, I put a question to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet) who is responsible for the Post Office. My question reads:

> In view of the statement earlier this year by the president of the Canada Post Corporation with regard to providing improved postal service, including new letter carrier walks across the country, can the minister advise when these additional letter carrier walks will be provided to rapidly-growing communities such as Elliot Lake, Ontario—

In the Minister's reply he said he would bring the matter to the attention of the President of the Corporation. I hope he has made that representation on my behalf, but so far we have seen no action.

The present situation in Elliot Lake is that of a very rapidly growing community of some 18,000 people. A whole now town is being constructed. Over 1,000 homes have been built in the new town and another 800 or so will be built during the coming year. However, over 1,000 householders have to drive to a postal office and line up at a wicket to receive their mail through the general delivery system. This is most inefficient and it is a very cumbersome manner in which to handle the situation. I am told that some 625 people line up at the wicket at the Elliot Lake post office each day. This requires a lot of staff to serve the customers.

There are nine full-time letter carriers and one part-time letter carrier. I am told that if their work was re-organized with only one additional half-person year of work, they would be able to provide a full letter carrier walk service to the new town at its present size. All the work has been carried out. The routes have been measured. The preparations have been made but the President of Canada Post just cannot get around to designating one additional half-person year of work to carry this out.

The president just raised the price of postage by another two cents and earlier this year there was a massive increase. At that time he referred to better service, better morale among the postal workers and more productivity, but he certainly has not achieved these goals as far as the patrons in Elliot Lake are concerned, and certainly not in that part of the community which is growing very rapidly.

I would like to suggest to the Parliamentary Secretary, who is responding for the Minister, that these recommendations be taken into account in view of his statements earlier this year about improved service, increased postal costs and so on, because the present system is very costly to patrons; to some 600 or 700 people who must get into their cars each day and drive several miles to the Post Office to line up at the wicket, all for the sake of one half man-year of work. It must be the most inefficient system for the Post Office and the people working there. It is certainly non-productive for the postal workers, simply because the Government cannot get around to providing this additional half person year of work so that the letter carrier walk service could be put into place.

It seems to me that if the President of Canada Post wants to stand and make these glowing speeches about how he will improve the postal service, he should look at places like Elliot Lake instead of sitting in his ivory tower out at Confederation Heights designing grand schemes. He should get busy and provide the additional finances for the service to be improved. Certainly, the present system is a shame, a disgrace and is totally unacceptable. I simply hope that the Post Office, the President of Canada Post Corporation and the Government will take some action on this situation and correct it immediately.

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for Algoma (Mr. Foster) for his additional comments on this subject.

I am pleased to report that Canada Post Corporation is aware of the need for expanding letter carrier service in growing communities across Canada, such as Elliot Lake, and is taking action on the matter. A few months ago the President of the Corporation announced that 75,600 new homes and businesses across Canada would be served by 170 additional letter carriers. Delivery to most of these addresses became effective on April 1, but it seems that this has not yet benefited Elliott Lake. This particular expansion represented a $5.5 million investment in provision of faster and more accessible mail services.

Another matter which perhaps may be more relevant to Elliott Lake, according to the notes I have been given, is a collective agreement with the Letter Carriers Union which provides for productivity sharing on mail routes. The increased productivity will free up a substantial number of new person years which will be allocated to the expansion of letter carrier services. This agreement applies to grade seven staff offices across the country. Elliott Lake has such an office, and I am told could benefit from the agreement early next year. I would therefore hope that the Hon. Member's wait, and that of his constituents, will not continue much longer.

I see, Mr. Speaker, that you are indicating the time which has been allotted to me is coming to an end. I would just like to undertake to follow up on the question of the Hon. Member and on the information which I have been given, and to do anything I can to help him see a quick resolution to this problem.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.30 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

REFLECTION ON SACRIFICES

Hon. W. Bennett Campbell (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have the welcome duty of reminding Hon. Members that tomorrow is Remembrance Day. Services of commemoration will be held across our country as Canadians pause to reflect on the sacrifices that were made in their name. Also, as is traditional, a few days ago Canada held a service of commemoration at the Vimy Memorial in France. On that occasion the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) paid tribute, on behalf of all Canadians, to those soldiers who, 65 years ago, won everlasting glory at Vimy Ridge.

On Remembrance Day itself, thousands of Canadians will gather around the National War Memorial in our capital. This memorial has stood as a symbol of our nation's homage for over 40 years. This year, for the first time, the War Memorial bears the inscriptions 1939-45 and 1950-53, reflecting the ceremony last summer when the memorial was officially rededicated to include those who served in the Second World War and Korea.

However, the inscription I will best remember this year was the one I read during our pilgrimage to Dieppe, France, last August, to mark the fortieth anniversary of that costly raid. I had the privilege to be in the company of many of the 5,000 Canadians who landed on those Dieppe beaches in 1942, as well as distinguished representatives of the House of Commons, the Senate and veterans' organizations from across Canada. Together we attended a service at Puys where, as Hon. Members are aware, the Royal Regiment was decimated 40 years before.

A plaque on the Puys Memorial contains words that reveal the true meaning of Remembrance Day; they could be used to describe all the 100,000 Canadians who died in World War I, World War II and Korea. The plaque reads:

> You who are alive on this beach, remember that these men died far from home that others, here and everywhere, might freely enjoy life in God's mercy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Government and the Official Opposition agreed to adjourn the House of Commons after Remembrance Day eulogies, as a special tribute to our fallen comrades. I am very disappointed that the New Democratic Party refused to participate in that gesture to honour those who made the ultimate sacrifice for their country. It would have been an additional recognition on behalf of Canada's veterans.

On behalf of the Progressive Party of Canada I am proud to offer our feelings on this Remembrance Day. We join in the resounding praise of the dedication, bravery and courage which Canadian veterans gave our country. Through the many conflicts in which we, as a country, have been involved, our veterans have offered the ultimate sacrifice for freedom, their lives.

For that sacrifice we owe our veterans more than our thoughts just once a year. We owe them the security and freedom of life that they fought for and won. We owe them the day-to-day confidence which comes from knowing that, if they need it, aging, disabled veterans can count on Canada the way we counted on them. To this end, Canadians in general are very supportive of any Government action directed at guaranteeing veterans a respectable standard of living.

Much has been done through the combined efforts of veterans' organizations such as the Army, Navy and Air Force Veterans, the Royal Canadian Legion, the War Amputations of Canada, the United Veterans' Organization, and the federal Government. We must also strive to guarantee that our aging disabled veterans can look forward to even better service in the future. To this end we must be united in our efforts to act expeditiously in all matters pertaining to veterans, including their benefits, general well-being, and related services. We should use any and every means at our disposal to fulfil these responsibilities.

Members of Parliament will be travelling to their homes to join in the ceremonies at eleven o'clock on November 11. These ceremonies in local villages, towns and cities will, for a brief period, join us all in a spirit of remorse, yet pride, in the brotherhood of spirits and mind, but, most important, will join us in the renewed belief that any war cannot be tolerated, that we cannot afford the cost to life that today's wars inflict.

For the 740,000 Canadian veterans in Canada, we must all combine to pay tribute to their past and pay careful attention to their future. For those no longer with us, we can only be thankful for their contribution, and we will remember them always.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, we wish to thank you again for giving us the opportunity to have this occasion when we can speak of those who served this country in many ways over many years.

Remembrance Day

We think in particular of those who lost their lives in World War I and World War II, and in the Korean War. We are also conscious of others through the years who have lost their lives because of what has happened to them following their service. We pay them tribute for what they have done. We give them our thanks. We welcome the opportunity every time the month of November comes around to pay our tribute to them. We also express our thanks to those who have worked for us in the years gone by; we thank them for what they have done to increase the provisions of the legislation which we have now, helping to build a country which will carry on in this way.

We are also conscious of the fact, Madam Speaker, there are some veterans still alive today who, for many years, will be expressing their tribute in one way or another. Today we give them a special word of praise, and we thank the Minister for making this opportunity possible.

At the same time, there are some of us who are deeply concerned about what is ahead on the question of wars, not only for this part of the world but for all the world. We hope one of these days we can find some other way to solve some of the problems so that our nations are not completely torn apart. We are grateful for the efforts of the people of this country, and of various Governments, who are concerned about world affairs. It is indeed a very important effort. Many centuries ago some people declared that their swords should be turned into ploughshares. That is our view, also. Our main concern is to build a world of peace for all those who are in it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Maurice Dupras (Labelle): Madam Speaker, I would like to join the previous speakers in saying a few words about Remembrance Day, a time for commemorating the sacrifices made by our soldiers in the two World Wars and the Korean War, in the name of democracy. As Chairman of the Standing Committee on Veterans Affairs, I wish to pay a special tribute to those who served with me during the war from 1939 to 1945 and who lie buried in European soil. They volunteered their services and gave their lives for their country and for democracy. Madam Speaker, we must realize the price these young men and women paid so that future generations would be able to enjoy the kind of life and the democratic system of government we have today, and we should stop and think about the tremendous sacrifice these soldiers made so generously. Once again, Madam Speaker, I wish to join the previous speakers in paying tribute to these men and women.

METRIC CONVERSION

CONDEMNATION OF IMPLEMENTATION AND COST

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, the Government recently tabled Supplementary Estimates (B) for the 1982-83 period which show an increase of 105 per cent in the costs attributed to the Metric Commission's mandate, a rise in budget from $12,268,000 in 1982 to $25,996,000 in 1983. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That this House condemns the Government's continued forced implementation of metric and urges instead that the Government channel this 105 per cent increase in government spending into needed job creation programs.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

TRANSPORT

DEMAND FOR MINISTER'S RESIGNATION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) has refused to answer correspondence in connection with the Asquith-Saskatchewan Subdivision Branch Line, which is being torn up by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and further has refused to meet with the representatives of the Asquith Rail Line Retention Committee speaking on behalf of the residents of the area, who are justly concerned over the implication of the removal of their branch line.

The Minister's special assistant has publicly acknowledged that communication by the Minister has been, to say the very least, lousy. The Minister can run, but he cannot hide. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Kindersley-Lloydminster (Mr. McKnight):

That since the Minister of Transport has failed his responsibilities of office in not having the intestinal fortitude to hear representations by aggrieved citizens adversely affected by policies of the Minister's department, this House demands that the Minister resign his portfolio forthwith.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

That November 11 be made a national day to honour peace, and be declared a holiday throughout the country, so that future generations will be marking, from year to year, the desire of Canadians to live in peace.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PARTICIPATION IN EUROPEAN AIRBUS PROJECT

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, the Government's plan to join in the manufacture of the European A-320 airbus will cost Canadian taxpayers $500 million up front and, unquestionably, millions more as the project continues, especially if our national airline is forced to buy these commuter planes in violation of international agreements. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Western Arctic (Mr. Nickerson):

That, before a decision is made to join the consortium, the issue be brought before this House for full debate, and that we not jeopardize further our relations with our major trading partner and ally to the south.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Member for Oshawa (Mr. Broadbent):

That this House instruct the Minister of Justice to bring before this House amendments to the Canadian Human Rights Act to prohibit all forms of discrimination against Canada's disabled, including disabled veterans; that those amendments conform to the recommendation in the "Obstacles Report," and that this be done prior to the end of this session of Parliament.

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

TRIBUTE TO WOMEN'S PIONEER WORK

Mrs. Thérèse Killens (Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, under Standing Order 43 I seek the unanimous consent of the House to propose a very important motion which touches the lives of women in this country.

Tonight, in a ceremony at Government House, the Governor General will present the Persons Awards to Nancy Adams of Saskatchewan, Sarah Binns of Ontario, Dr. Hilda Hellaby of the Yukon, Lilliane Labelle of Québec, and Edith McLeod of Ontario, in recognition of their outstanding contribution to the lives of Canadian women. These women have worked in rural life, the union movement, the church, for the handicapped, natives, and in the voluntary sector. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier):

FORESTRY

SUGGESTED ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMUNITY ADJUSTMENT TASK FORCE IN BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Madam Speaker, whereas the restructuring and down sizing of the forest industry in B.C. has led to the loss of tens of thousands of jobs; whereas the lost jobs have occurred largely in single industry communities with the resulting wreckage of the economies of those communities; whereas forest firms such as MacMillan Bloedel have been laying off employees for the last 18 months and will probably continue to do so for the next two years, and whereas the Canadian Employment Commission has responded, after the fact, with generally hopelessly inadequate programs, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Skeena (Mr. Fulton):

That the Minister of Employment and Immigration immediately strike a community adjustment task force in the Pacific region that would consult with industry on plans for the reorganization and down scaling of industry and to develop co-ordinated plans that would be effective and specific to the communities harmed by this downturn in the forest industry economy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY

EFFECT OF FUEL TAX AND INCREASED TOLLS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, we have seen the disastrous results of federal greed in the oil and gas industry and now we see it with respect to the St. Lawrence Seaway. Thanks to ever rising Seaway tolls, a discriminatory transportation fuel tax, and the absence, still, of a coherent shipping policy, the Seaway is expected to post an $8 million deficit this year. Canadian shippers are in a neck-and-neck race with foreign shippers and other transportation modes to gain shipping contracts, and at every turn they are being tripped up by the federal Government. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Jarvis):

That the federal Government remove the discriminatory transportation fuel compensation recovery charge, reduce the 1983 toll increase to 6 per cent in keeping with the six and five formula, and initiate a shipping policy without further delay, before the St. Lawrence Seaway system joins the ranks of Maislin, Massey-Ferguson and Dome Petroleum.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION ACT

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Yesterday, the Government made a spectacular about-face in the Québecair case, thus acknowledging that Bill S-31 made no sense at all, and I therefore move, seconded by the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That the House ask the Government to withdraw this bill forthwith.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT ADMINISTRATION STUDY BROADCASTING OF DEBATES IN BOTH LANGUAGES

Mr. Gérald Laniel (Beauharnois-Salaberry): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas it is entirely unfair and unacceptable that Francophone Members of the House of Commons have no access in their offices to the French telecast of the debates, while the English telecast is available, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet), who sits on the Standing Committee on Management and Member Services:

That the Administrator of the House of Commons be authorized to examine the appropriate action to be taken in order to make the broadcasting of the House of Commons proceedings available in the offices of all Members of Parliament in both official languages, and that he report to the Speaker of the House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

An Hon. Member: The Hon. Member for Quebec East (Mr. Duquet) is not in the House.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion presented by Mr. Laniel and seconded by Mr. Gendron. Does the House agree to adopt this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

"BLACK BOOK" USED BY CROWN COUNSEL—GOVERNMENT POSITION

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Justice, but first I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate him publicly on his appointment to the portfolio. Also I would like to ask him some questions concerning where he stands on important and fundamental issues in the country.

The Minister will know that the Government has spent, or will be spending, at least $35 million in connection with the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in Canada, attempting to publicize the advantages to Canadian people of the new Charter. Yet, legislatively and in the area of policy initiatives, the Government has in many instances been diametrically opposed to the spirit and letter of the Charter of Rights. One example is the question of the "black book" which has been bank-rolled by the Government. There has been participation by the Department of Justice in the preparation of the black book to be distributed to Crown counsel across the country, in which they are instructed on how to circumvent the operation of the Charter of Rights.

Now that the Minister of Justice has had a chance to consider his position in his new portfolio, does he sanction the use of these black books across the country, or will he prohibit their use by Crown counsel on the federal side? I would at least like him to indicate whether or not he is prepared, in the spirit of freedom of information to which the Government is apparently committed, to make these black books public so that the people of Canada and parliamentarians could see precisely what instructions are given to Crown counsel.

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I thank the Hon. Member for his congratulations. I would like to tell him that the so-called black book is not a federal book at all. We began to work with provincial Attorneys General to try to work out such a common book of instruction to counsel. We found that we were not able to agree with many of the provinces on their interpretation of the Charter. Therefore, the joint project was separated into two projects—the provincial black book and the federal "white book". We have a separate set of instructions to federal prosecutors. I will certainly consider whether or not it would be appropriate to make it public. I have some doubts about that since I think the important part of the work of federal prosecutors in the courts involves a lot of discretion. I am not sure that we would want to indicate in a litigation circumstance of an adversary nature the exact tenor of the instructions they had received, which might put the federal counsel in prejudice.

• (1430)

GOVERNMENT INTERVENTION IN LEGAL PROCEEDINGS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the point I am making to the Minister is that there was more than a hint of hypocrisy in the Government's position with respect to the Charter of Rights and the rights of every individual in this country.

By way of preface to my supplementary question, I want to point out to him that, with the exception of language rights, there has not been any instance where the federal Department of Justice has intervened in the courts in support of either the Diefenbaker Bill of Rights or with respect to the new Charter of Rights. I think it is a shame that the Government is not promoting the rights of individual citizens.

Will the Minister tell the House whether or not he is now prepared, as a matter of directive and policy in his department, to consider supporting the Charter of Rights position before the courts? Also, will the Minister at least consider the suggestion that an independent institute be established to which litigants, who have worth-while cases involving constitutional matters in support of Charter of Rights matters, would be able to apply and receive either assistance by way of counsel or monetary assistance for their own counsel before the appeal courts?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member knows that in cases of this kind decisions are made on a case by case basis as to what position federal counsel should take. Very frequently there are cases where we decide not to challenge a decision of a lower court, not to intervene in any way, and those are obviously situations in which we are satisfied with the decision as it was reached, or at least are not sufficiently dissatisfied so as to take the opposite side.

I cannot honestly tell the Hon. Member whether there is any case in which we have appeared to support a litigant or not. There is such a diversity of cases. I will try to find out whether or not that is the case. But that really is not a test.

Nevertheless, in addition to what we are doing in court, Madam Speaker, we have a vast project under way involving the scrutiny of 23 volumes of federal statutes and 16,000 pages of the 1978 count of the consolidated regulations, to attempt to see in advance as far as we can, without pre-empting the decisions of the courts, clear cases of conflict between the new Bill of Rights and the Statutes or Regulations of Canada.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Madam Speaker, the only consequence of that action is that it will at least be a make-work project for lawyers.

USE OF WRITS OF ASSISTANCE

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, I have a final supplementary for the Minister of Justice. As he will know, his colleague, the Solicitor General, has been going up and down the country over the past couple of years supporting a proposition for the removal of the moratorium on the use of writs of assistance. These writs are clear intrusions into the privacy of Canadian citizens, giving unlimited right to the police of this country to break and enter into the homes of Canadians. That is clearly against the charter, the principle of unreasonable search. Has the Minister considered his position with respect to writs of assistance, and has the Minister of Justice told the Solicitor General to refrain from promoting this idea which is contrary to the Charter of Rights?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, we certainly have a dialogue in our Government with the public on what the state of the law should be. I can tell the Hon. Member that there have been no new writs of assistance issued since 1976, I think, and the ones that exist are used now only in the enforcement of the Narcotic Control Act and the Food and Drugs Act, and I understand only where reasonable cause exists on the part of an officer to believe that the premises actually contain some drugs. The matter is under further examination, but we have certainly eliminated the worst abuses in the law as it stands. We will be considering this further over the months. If the Hon. Member has any submissions to make to the Standing Committee on Justice and Legal Affairs, we will certainly be very pleased to have a dialogue with him on those.

NATIONAL SECURITY

ACTIVITIES OF FORMER ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE CORPORAL

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. It relates to a matter on which he has now been briefed concerning the security incident, apparently code named "Long Knife", details of which have been widely published in the past few days. Because this former corporal of the RCMP security service appeared in disguise last night on a national television program and virtually confessed to having sold out a double agent in Montreal to an agent of the Soviet KGB for payment of $3,500, will the Minister give an explanation of why this man was never charged but is able now to continue to profit from his apparently traitorous activities?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have indeed looked into the matter. I can report to the House that the Government was advised of the circumstances relating to this case for the first time by the RCMP in 1977. At this time it was advised there was insufficient evidence to found a prosecution either under the Official Secrets Act or under the Criminal Code.

I would also remind Hon. Members that the matter was referred to indirectly by the McDonald Commission, which was fully aware of it, but that the McDonald Commission, with all of its recommendations about prosecutions and references to Attorneys General, made no recommendation that any prosecution be launched in connection with that matter.

I have not seen Mr. Sawatsky's book yet, I do not think anybody has, but I have read the excerpts. I saw last night's television program. I have directed that the matter be referred to the Department of Justice for consideration and advice to the Attorney General.

TRIAL OF BRITISH CIPHER CLERK—POSSIBLE CONSEQUENCES TO CANADA

Hon. Allan Lawrence (Durham-Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question also relates to a security matter. This morning in a British court a British cipher clerk was convicted on seven charges of selling information to the Soviet bloc. He was sentenced to 35 years in prison. This is a great distinction from the policy of this Government, which has never yet charged a Canadian civil servant, although there have been many cases of traitorous activity over the years by civil servants in this country.

The Canadian Government uses the Cheltenham Communications Centre, not only for monitoring communications but also for the transmission of certain high level secret coded information. Would the Solicitor General assure the House that his British counterpart has assured him that there has been no breach of any Canadian security matter, and that no reforms are to take place now as a result of the revelations in a British court?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I want to answer the premise before dealing with the question. When a possible piece of betrayal or treachery comes to the attention of the Government of Canada in connection with an individual, whether a public servant or not, I would remind Hon. Members that, while it is important justice be done in the case and that the individual be brought to justice, there are other considerations. In particular, the bringing forward of the case could very well compromise some ongoing activity of the security service, some legitimate activity, which is not made public for very good reasons, and it could betray sources which have furnished useful information to the security service. The important thing in that connection is that the penetration, if there has been one, or the betrayal, if there is one, be detected, that it be stopped, and that it be countered.

So far as the matter that took place in Britain today is concerned, I would want to assure the House that there is the closest co-operation between the security service of the RCMP and friendly security services of other countries. Penetration of any of them is a matter of common interest. There are policies in place, of which my hon. friend is aware. I can assure him that they are still in place to assure that intelligence service share information which is of benefit to all of them.

IDENTITY OF INDIVIDUAL CONCERNED

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Central Nova): Madam Speaker, may I simply ask the Solicitor General why, from March 22, 1982, since presumably he had notice that these questions were on the Order Paper touching upon these very matters, including the one specifically referred to in the McDonald Commission report, the Government has not seen fit all these months, at least to name this traitor, and if the Government is not going to prosecute him, to see to it that something be done so he could at least receive the opprobrium, or otherwise, of Canadians for this treasonous act? Why is the Government protecting people such as this?

• (1440)

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I would like to remind Hon. Members at this point, since my friend has characterized conduct as a treasonous act, that the matter is now before the Department of Justice. Until a prosecutorial decision is made, I think it is very unhelpful for Members of this House, or for the media, to characterize this behaviour in a way which might even prevent a fair trial from taking place. The matter has been referred to the Department of Justice. I have nothing further to say about it. I hope that other Members will bear in mind the damage that they can do to justice by making unjustified statements prematurely, or at all.

EMPLOYMENT

NEED PROGRAM—CREATION OF JOBS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister confirmed at a press conference this morning that his new NEED Program will produce some 60,000 short run jobs over the next 18 months, which means approximately 20,000 jobs over the next six months. Considering that his own Department has estimated that there will be approximately 400,000 Canadians coming off unemployment insurance benefits in the next six months, this will mean that only one out of 20 will have a chance to get one of these new jobs which the Government has created. How does the Minister justify such a policy and such an insignificant program in terms of the need? What will he say to the other 19 out of 20 who are coming off benefits and who will not be able to get a job?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by indicating that the Program that was announced in the economic statement two weeks ago was designed as a Program to attract further money into it. I am very pleased to report to the House that, at the conclusion of discussions across the country, we obtained a commitment from every provincial Government that they would join us in this effort.

I can also indicate to the House that, as of today, a couple of provinces have already indicated that they are prepared to put money in on a matching basis, which means that we will have substantial additional funds for that Program.

Second, I would refer the Hon. Leader of the New Democratic Party to the study produced by my Department. I wish he would read it, rather than read a résumé prepared for him by a research staff which is in obvious need of some retraining. What we did point out in that particular study is that, while people are exhausting benefits, many of those who exhaust those benefits find jobs within the first seven or eight weeks after they have exhausted them. Therefore, we have used this Program to target the hardest hit cases in order to provide them with the alternative of going to work rather than welfare. That was the design of the Program. That is what the Program will meet.

Mr. Broadbent: I say to the Minister that, unlike Ministers of the Crown, people on this side of the House actually read their own reports and do not rely on résumés.

EFFECT ON UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE EXHAUSTEES

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since the Minister has referred to his own report will he confirm that, in the report that he has just alluded to, a majority of those coming off unemployment insurance benefits will get no other benefit and will not get a job from his NEED Program even if we have additions made by provincial governments. Will he confirm that? Will he have the honesty to say that in the House of Commons?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is a simple matter of record and it is in the report. When we presented the report we indicated that we are trying to identify a very serious issue. We prepared the report so that we can have a proper public discussion and share information with other levels of Government and the Opposition to develop a program that would combine the best efforts of all those who are concerned about the problem.

We indicated that about 35 per cent to 40 per cent of those who finished their benefits do find alternate employment. Another 30 per cent or 40 per cent in that category have alternative forms of income, go back to school, or are parts of families where there are other wage earners. A group of about 10 per cent are those who have no alternative but to go on welfare or find alternative employment. We have targeted our Program specifically to that group.

I point out at the same time that we are also spending close to $560 million on other employment programs that are designed to help young people and women who are not in that category. We also have training programs that are providing places for a quarter of a million Canadians. This Department and the Government are providing a wide range of alternatives for those affected by the recession, because we do care.

Mr. Broadbent: Madam Speaker, the fact remains, for all those who were listening with care to what the Minister had to say, that over half of those coming off unemployment insurance benefits will not have any specific job program allocated for them. That is the reality, if you look carefully at the implications of the statistics that the Minister was rattling off.

CALCULATIONS OF PROGRAM'S EFFECT

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, since the Minister just told the House that a number of provinces have agreed to join with the federal Government in job creation programs—a fact that all Members of the House will be pleased about—will he tell us the extent of the involvement? I have indicated that, according to our calculations, only one out of 20 coming off unemployment insurance benefits will qualify for the Program as funded by the federal Government. Can the Minister give us a figure now in regard to what he has been told by the provinces as to what that ratio will be? Will it be one in ten, or one in 15? How much improvement will that additional provincial funding make?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, it is well known in the House that we should not place any reliability on calculations made by the NDP because they never add up. We are basically saying that, after those discussions which took place over the past two weeks, we gained commitments from each of the provincial governments to join with us in beginning to discuss how we would engage in joint projects. Their specific allocation was obviously going to be determined by the amount of allocation we made as a federal government, province by province. I announced that fact this morning.

I believe Mr. Miller, for one, will be indicating in the Ontario Provincial Legislature this afternoon what his Government is prepared to offer in addition to that program. We have similar commitments from other governments in the same area.

Our notional judgment is that we could provide, in the first round, an additional $200 million for that Program, depending upon which province or region we are talking about. Therefore we will be able to extend the number of job opportunities by another 20 per cent or 30 per cent in that area. We do not say that we have to stop there.

This is the beginning of a Program. If we can demonstrate that it will work and that there is a willingness to participate and join in a partnership with provincial governments, municipalities, and the private sector, we can take the Program even further. This is just a beginning, and I ask the NDP to provide us with the kind of support which they should so we can make the Program a success instead of giving that kind of criticism before the Program even gets, started.

FINANCE

TIMING OF POSSIBLE TAX REFORM

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The outcry following the November budget and the tax reform that was involved in that budget is the clearest indication that we can have that the tax changes introduced in that budget, which had such a damaging effect for small businesses and others, will have a damaging effect on the economy as well. Obviously the possibility of future tax changes similar to those brought in under the November budget would very much undermine the ability of the private sector to function, which the Government is looking to, to lead us out of this recession.

Why did the Minister recently say that now is not the time for tax reform and that he was going to wait until just after the recession to strike again?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think it is quite obvious. I believe that across the country people in the business sector generally feel that they would rather spend all their energies trying to get the economy moving again rather than paying accountants and lawyers to advise them on brand new schemes of tax reform. I have indicated that I would be ready to discuss and examine modifications where they would appear to be justified. I was not considering embarking upon any wholesale reform of taxation at the present time. I think that would be adding to uncertainty and creating exactly the kind of environment that my hon. friend does not want.

INTRODUCTION OF TAX LEGISLATION

Hon. Michael Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): Madam Speaker, if the Minister would bring in the tax legislation from the November budget, perhaps we could ease the uncertainty that is there among those very same individuals today.

• (1450)

Surely the Minister realizes that the spectre of further tax changes similar to these which have already been withdrawn from the November budget because they were so damaging to the country, would undermine the confidence of the very people toward whom the Minister is looking to bring us out of the recession today. Will the Minister assure the House that those changes which have already been withdrawn will not be reintroduced? At the same time, will he also say that the legislation was not simply ill-timed, as he has recently said, but was also ill-advised and counterproductive?

Mr. Nielsen: The ironclad spectre.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I made a statement in the House two weeks ago, announcing a number of changes. These changes will be incorporated in the legislation which will be introduced in the House.

Mr. Nielsen: When?

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the second part of the question is concerned, I still maintain that most of those changes which were proposed by my predecessor were fair and just changes. However, the economic environment has significantly changed in the meantime, and we had to make adjustments. Those adjustments are what I have made. However, in terms of equity, I am fully behind the decisions taken by my predecessor in that respect. I think he was right in recommending them to the House. The economic situation has changed, and we must adjust.

CANADA MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

LEVEL OF INTEREST RATES CHARGED TO HOME OWNERS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The Minister will know that one of the things preventing people from buying houses, and builders from building houses, is the threat that interest rates, while relatively lower today, may be very much higher when mortgages come due a year or two years down the road. There have been press reports indicating that the Minister is considering the use of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation facilities to ensure, in some fashion, that interest rates will remain within a relatively easy ambit for people over a relatively long term. Is that action being taken or being proposed by the Minister, and would he let us in on what he is intending to do with respect to insuring interest rates over a term of CMHC approved housing?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member's question is in fact the subject of considerable discussion with the industry and within CMHC, obviously. As the Hon. Member knows, interest rates have dropped quite dramatically since the budget of last June.

However, the problem, as identified by many builders and by the officials of the Corporation, is that a number of people are hesitant to commit themselves to such an important decision because of the volatility of interest rates, or the potential return of higher interest rates. In order to overcome this problem, many experts have been considering this proposal. The industry, with which I have held meetings, has given considerable support to the idea. My people are working on it and I am sure the Department of Finance officials are also involved because there could be implications down the road. I want to make it clear, however, that if the proposal is found to be desirable and supportable, it is not at all my intention to involve it in a future budget but, rather, to try to bring it forward as quickly as possible.

REQUEST FOR COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I thank the Minister, Madam Speaker, for his answer. The Minister will recall that this Party made that very suggestion to the Government in the debate on Bill C-89, and it is one which we are happy to see the Government explore. In that light, would the Minister form a special committee of this House to inquire whether that kind of insurance would once again give people the confidence that, when they buy or build in this market, they will not wind up in a position a year or two from now where they will find they have lost their entire investment because of interest rate fluctuations? Will he have that matter brought before a committee of the House so that we can co-operate with the Government and see the fulfilment of what we consider to be a good idea? That is why we advanced it.

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I must say to the House that I have sufficient modesty to accept good ideas no matter where they originate.

On the second point, I am sure that if the proposal is supported and is proposed in whatever form it finally emerges, it should be the subject of discussion with those who are interested in housing problems, and I think that means those Hon. Members on all sides of the House.

ENERGY

PREPARATORY FUNDING FOR WEST COAST OFFSHORE DRILLING

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my first question was to be directed to the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources but it looks as though he has left the Chamber. Therefore, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Finance who, I believe, can answer it. Yesterday his colleague, the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, made it clear that the oil and gas industry has priority over aboriginal title, national parks, environmental protection and rational land use planning in the Yukon.

I wonder if the Minister of Finance knows that the question of the offshore jurisdiction in British Columbia is presently before the Supreme Court of Canada and that, despite this glaring fact, and the fact that the environmental moratorium which has been in place in British Columbia for many years is still there, a great deal of funding is going toward drilling activity in B.C. waters. In fact, funding has now gone for seismological, hydrographic, and weather and wave studies for drilling platforms. Would the Minister explain why he and his Department and other Departments can operate outside of the law in this situation, and spend millions of dollars of taxpayers' money, when there is no legal ground on which to stand? Would he also agree that full public inquiry is required to look into the environmental and safety aspects of this situation and to ensure the same kind of treatment as that now afforded to the oil industry on the West Coast?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is totally wrong both in the latter part of his question and in the first part of his question.

COST OF WAVE STUDIES

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. Could he explain why his Government has allowed $985,000 to be allocated for wave studies for offshore drilling platforms in B.C. when this jurisdictional matter, as I pointed out to the Minister of Finance, is before the Supreme Court of Canada and there is an environmental moratorium in place? Would he explain to the people in this country how he and his Government can provide such funds when there is no legal ground on which it can be done? Would he, in fact, support a full public inquiry into the matter and support funding going to public interest groups which are interested in getting a proper evaluation of the offshore question in British Columbia?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, surely my hon. friend is not opposed to having research carried out on behalf of the people of Canada in this important area. I would think that, instead of criticizing, he would support this worthy endeavour.

METRIC CONVERSION

INCREASE IN COMMISSION'S BUDGET—COST OF IMPERIAL MEASUREMENT PHOTOGRAPHS

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, given the fact that the Metric Commission's budget has risen over 100 per cent this year to a grand total of over $25 million, I want to ask why the Metric Commission has ordered eight photos of its Commissioners or Directors at a cost exceeding $2,000. These eight photos were taken by Fernand Leclair of Albert Street in Ottawa, and are to hang in the offices of the Metric Commission, for self-glorification. Would the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs please give justification to the House for the necessity of this $2,000 expense and also advise us, if he would be kind enough, why the Metric Commission requested, on the same purchase order, that each picture be of a size 16 inches by 20 inches, which is against its own mandate?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I would have preferred the Hon. Member to ask me about the program he referred to earlier in his motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43, which allow him to make statements without having to wait for answers from ministers. I can inform the Hon. Member that more money is being spent under the metrication program because we have decided to reimburse workers who have to buy new sets of tools as a result of the implementation of the metric system. The increase in expenditures clearly proves that the metrication program in Canada is a success, and these additional funds will be used to help Canadian workers do a better job.

EMPLOYMENT ON CONSULTING FIRM

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, given the fact that everyone has been asked to show restraint, and the fact that we have a Metric Commission which spends $3 million on salaries for its own employees and over $2 million in contract work, would the Minister advise the House why he has allowed the new Deputy Executive Director, Claudette Gariepy, to employ five consulting firms, of which the principal owner of one of the firms involved, Multi Resco Incorporated, is reported to be the brother-in-law of the Metric Commission's Deputy Executive Director, Claudette Gariepy?

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

PROJECTED CUTS IN PUBLIC SERVICES

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, my question relates to the question put by the Hon. Member for Peterborough and other Members with respect to Government expenditures, and particularly the statement made in the House by the Minister of Finance when he said the Government had asked the President of the Treasury Board "to look again at the departmental expenditures to ensure that no fat is left in the system and, even beyond this, that outlays are being pared down to the lowest level compatible—". That speaks to some dramatic cuts in the provision of public services.

Word is that the Minister will be reporting to the House soon. Within the framework of the Question Period, will the Minister indicate where these cuts are to take place generally, what progress he has made with respect to work that has been assigned to him by the Government, and when will he be reporting to the House?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I am actively engaged in the review in question. I hope to make a report to the House in the form of a statement sometime in the next several weeks.

SUPPLY AND SERVICES

PURCHASE OF IMPORTED GOODS BY FOREIGN-CONTROLLED FIRMS

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Supply and Services. The Minister recently spoke to the Richelieu Club. He made reference to foreign-controlled firms in Canada. He said:

> These companies have to be made to understand the needs of the Canadian economy, the need to encourage a supply system, the need to develop a domestic manufacturing infrastructure . . . We have to use whatever levers are available to us to get them to do more business with Canadian companies.

We applaud that effort on the part of the Minister, but we would like to know how he is going to accomplish this. Is it going to be by regulation, friendly persuasion, taxation, or by statute? How does the Minister propose to do this?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member ought to have identified as well the paragraph which preceded the one that he quoted, in which I pointed out that the multinational corporations were responsible for 72 per cent of total imports into Canada. Therefore, there is a huge field of action in terms of trying to encourage import replacements. I was not talking about regulations. I was talking about friendly persuasion, increasing the level of co-operation between all parties, including the multinational corporations, providing them with information relating to the impact of their own supplying process and the ability that they have to create jobs within Canada by increasing the level of industrial and manufacturing activities. In the Hon. Member's area, that is an aim I am sure he espouses and will want to encourage.

IMPORTATION OF WORD PROCESSORS AND METRIC TAPE

Mr. Bill Kempling (Burlington): Madam Speaker, I appreciate what the Minister said. Speaking of my own area, I would have to ask him now whether he is aware that the Canada Centre for Inland Waters is in the process of purchasing word processors that are made outside of Canada, when there are two excellent manufacturers in Canada which have a world reputation in the manufacture and supply of word processors. Is the Minister aware of that? Does this philosophy that he puts forth apply to Government procurement? Can he explain to the House why the Metric Commission bought and distributed a measuring tape made in Japan? How can he explain that to us?

Hon. J.-J. Blais (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, unfortunately I do not control the procurement practice of all the emanations of Government, including Crown corporations. I can assure the Hon. Gentleman that, in those areas where I do effect control, we are maximizing Canadian content to the highest possible degree. I am glad the Hon. Member has brought this matter to the attention of the public. Undoubtedly those in Crown Corporations who are listening to this Question Period will see the interest which the Hon. Member has in Canadian procurement from Canadian sources, and will want to support the efforts of my Department in securing increased Canadian value added.

REQUEST THAT GOVERNMENT INTRODUCE PRODUCTIVITY INCENTIVES

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, my question is for the new Minister of Finance. I would like to begin by congratulating him for taking on a very tough portfolio during a very difficult period, and I assure him that I wish him well.

As the OECD in its July economic survey devoted to Canada said, and I quote:

> During the 1970s, Canadian manufacturing had the poorest productivity performance of all of the 16 OECD countries with the absolute value of output per employee in 1980 some 23 per cent below the OECD weighted average.

My question to the Prime Minister is: in view of that situation, will he give serious consideration to introducing productivity incentives to be paid in direct proportion to increases in productivity in order that we may lower costs and selling prices and thereby increase sales and jobs, making it possible for people to find a job, taking them off the unemployment insurance rolls and enabling them to begin paying income tax once again? In my view, this process will make it possible to have the program start paying for itself very soon after it is initiated.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would first thank the Hon. Member for his good wishes, but he has gone a little bit too far by calling me Prime Minister in his question. I rejoice with him about the evolution of some factors in the economic indicators, particularly the fact that today the bank rate has gone down 36 points. The bank rate in Canada has gone down for 13 weeks in a row. That augurs well for interest rates in the next few months.

As far as his specific question is concerned, indeed Canada has a lot to catch up with in terms of productivity. Our record in the last few years has not been good. We have to do a lot better in the future than we have done in the past. I am certainly ready to examine his proposals in terms of a forthcoming budget. If he has some more specific way of putting his proposal into effect, I would like him either to write or talk to me. I would like to pursue this matter with him. His suggestion of increasing productivity is one that will indeed be a very high priority in any future budget, in fact in any economic step that the Government takes in the next few months.

Mr. Hees: I thank the Hon. Minister of Finance. I did not realize that I had elevated him so quickly. I thank the Minister for his constructive attitude expressed toward my question. I look forward very much to discussing this matter with him in the next few days.

TRANSPORT

TRANSPORTATION OF HAZARDOUS MATERIALS BY ROAD

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport. The Minister will no doubt be aware of the serious accident which occurred on the Queen Elizabeth Highway between Hamilton and Niagara Falls in which a transport carrying flammable and dangerous materials went off the road, not only tying up traffic but being a cause of considerable potential damage. The Minister of Transport for the Province of Ontario said that he cannot promulgate his regulations governing the transportation of hazardous materials until the federal Government brings forward its regulations. When will the federal Government put its regulations out for discussion, and when will they in fact become law?

• (1510)

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I have been in touch very recently with Mr. Snow, and the Minister of Transportation of Ontario has shown a lot of understanding of the difficulties of my department in writing these regulations. It has come to a point now where a judgment is developing in my Department that it might be a good idea to finalize the first unit of the regulations that have been Gazetted, and this may be the road I am going to take. I shall have to make my decision in the coming hours on that particular subject. As for the finalization of the whole batch of regulations, I am afraid we expect to spend another year or so before this is done.

TIME REQUIRED TO DRAFT REGULATIONS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): What is it about establishing or writing the regulations that requires such a long period of time? What will you know in two years that is not currently available by way of general knowledge as it affects the transportation of hazardous material? Does the Minister understand that on that particular highway we are looking at a disaster? One day the accident which occurs will not simply be a truck in a ditch. It will involve hundreds of other vehicles. Surely to God we do not have to wait another year or so for regulations protecting people against the transportation of hazardous materials.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Mr. Snow is obviously much better informed than my hon. friend on that subject because he does understand. There are a great many reconciliations which have to be made to regulations which exist now at the federal and provincial levels and regulations in the United States, with which we trade so much. There are regulations by international bodies which we also have to take into account. My hon. friend should get first-class information on that particular subject, and I will arrange that.

To come back to the specific accident which happened yesterday, the truck involved in it did, just by way of illustration, not have a placard, and the rules which are ready for implementation now do include those concerning placards. In other words, if that part of the Section, which is ready to go now, had been made law, it would have influenced that particular aspect of the accident. That is why I am considering dividing the package and implementing the first unit as soon as I can.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION ACT

TARGET OF PROPOSED LEGISLATION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and it relates to Bill S-31 which was introduced in the other place. The Government indicated yesterday that its target was not Quebecair. Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us who its target is?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the purpose of the Bill is contained in the provisions. It is now in the other place. When it comes to the House of Commons there will be full opportunity to debate the Bill and make all the points on that occasion.

APPLICATION OF LEGISLATION TO PRIVATE SECTOR

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us whether the Government is drafting similar legislation to prohibit private individuals or corporations from owning more than 10 per cent of the holdings in any company involved in interprovincial or international transportation? In other words, does it intend to apply the same authority against, for example, Power Corporation, as it is now attempting to apply against provinces or their emanations?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I have no information on any such drafting which is going on at the present time. I do not think any such drafting is taking place. The Minister of Transport may want to correct me, but I have no knowledge of it.

RATIONALE FOR GOVERNMENT APPROACH

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Will whatever Minister has knowledge of the matter explain to the House of Commons why it is the Government's view that ownership by a province or its emanation of more than 10 per cent of a company dealing interprovincially or internationally, is somehow more threatening than ownership by private individuals or large corporations? Why is it singling out the provinces? What is the rationale?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I think it is rather surprising that the Leader of the Opposition should ask a question that was already asked in the House a few days ago. I would invite him to consult Hansard. We explained why we wanted to act in the case of possible ownership by provincial governments, and how we could ensure that Canadian corporations are acting in the public interest.

MR. MAYER—WORK STOPPAGES AFFECTING EXPORT GRAIN MOVEMENT

Madam Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk of the House has laid upon the table the 331st Report of the Clerk of Petitions stating that he has examined the petition presented by the Hon. Member for Portage-Marquette (Mr. Mayer) on Tuesday, November 9, 1982 and finds that the petition meets the requirements of the Standing Orders as to form.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker, concerning House business. Since we will not be sitting tomorrow or Friday, could the Government House Leader, for the sake of the record, inform us as to the business for today and next week as discussed at the House Leaders' meeting last night?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: With pleasure, Madam Speaker. Today, we shall continue debate on Bill C-130, and if debate on this Bill is completed today, we shall resume debate on the report stage of Bill C-85. Monday, as I said earlier this week, is an Opposition day. Tuesday, the first item on the agenda is third reading of Bill C-90, a Bill concerning the Customs Tariff and arising from the November 1981 budget. Once this Bill has passed third reading, on Tuesday I hope, we shall resume debate on the report stage of Bill C-85, a Bill aimed at promoting the export of agricultural products. Subsequently we shall consider Bill C-131, a Bill arising from the last budget which concerns the Old Age Security Act and is aimed at limiting indexation of pensions to 6 and 5 per cent. On Wednesday, the first item on the agenda, irrespective of the progress of business on Tuesday, will be Bill C-135 which is to be referred back to the House a little later today and is another Bill arising from the last budget. The Bill specifically concerns the National Housing Act and is aimed at providing grants for home owners. So next Wednesday, that will be the first item on the agenda, and we will be considerig the report stage or third reading, depending on whether there are any notices of amendment. After passage of Bill C-135 next Wednesday, we shall proceed with debate on second reading of Bill C-95, a Bill aimed at establishing a national lottery which will also be used to help the Olympic Games in Calgary. If second reading of Bill C-95 is passed on Wednesday, the business of the House for the remainder of Wednesday and Thursday will be to continue the debate started on Tuesday. That is substantially the business of the House for the next few days, always subject to change and unless otherwise specified.

MR. TOWERS—IMPOSITION OF METRIC SYSTEM

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, to the Honourable the House of Commons in Parliament assembled, the petition of the undersigned 1,056 residents of Canada humbly sheweth that the signatories support the stand of Jack Halpert in giving the Canadian people the freedom of choice to purchase gasoline by the gallon; that the signatories oppose the mandatory imposition of metric measure; and that the signatories urge the Government of Canada to permit all people to buy and sell products in Imperial measure. And your petitioners, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

MR. BLENKARN—FINANCIAL AID TO TANZANIA

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition of residents of the Province of Ontario who are very disturbed about Canada's foreign aid to Tanzania, particularly the $200 million paid to that country by the Canadian International Development Agency over the past five years. They ask that further aid to Tanzania be halted, in view of Tanzania's Marxist collectivist policies which have contributed to the decline in agricultural productivity and to the throttling of all business, as well as the hostile acts of Tanzania in expropriation without compensation of Canadian-owned companies in that country.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,923, 2,975, 3,171, 3,172, 3,173, 3,174 and 4,319.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—OTHER TYPES OF SERVICES

Question No. 2,923—Mr. Clarke:

With reference to the Professional and Special Services recorded by the Governor General and Lieutenant-Governors at page 32.13, Volume II of the 1979-80 Public Accounts of Canada, with particular reference to Other Types of Services (a) how does the Government explain the 5,457 per cent increase in expenditure for the item over that for 1978-79 (b) what services does this entail (c) what is a list of each contract of a value more than $2,000?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): (a) The total amount spent on Professional and Special Services by the Governor General and Lieutenant Governors in 1979-80 was $249,064, representing a $15,260 or 6.5 per cent increase over 1978-79. The apparent large increase in "Other Types of Services" was due in fact to a change in the policy concerning identification of individual expenditures in the accounts. In 1978-79, individual types of service expenditures were listed whenever expenditure on a particular service exceeded $2,000. In 1979-80 this sum was raised to $25,000 and all types of services with expenditures below this level were grouped under the title "Other Types of Services".

(b) This includes clerical and office services, laundry and dry cleaning, photography and other minor contracted services.

(c) One contract was issued to the National Film Board in the sum of $47,500. All other paid contracts were for less than $2,000.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS—FILM PRODUCTION SERVICE

Question No. 2,975—Mr. Clarke:

With reference to the Professional and Special Services recorded by the Governor General and Lieutenant-Governors at page 32.13, Volume II of the 1979-80 Public Accounts of Canada, with particular reference to Film Production Service (a) what was the title and total cost of each film produced in the fiscal year 1979-80 (b) at what audience was each film aimed (c) what cost recovery is anticipated from the distribution of all the films?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): (a) One film was produced; "The Unbroken Line" (French and English), a history of Canadian Governors General. The cost in 1978-79 was $110,956 and in 1979-80, $47,500; the total cost being $158,456.

(b) It was aimed at school children and the public in general.

(c) No cost recovery is anticipated but there were also no distribution charges.

SECRETARY TO GOVERNOR GENERAL

Question No. 3,171—Mr. Cossitt:

What other benefits, in addition to salary, are received by Mr. Esmund Butler, Secretary to the Governor General, and what is the estimated value of each, including living accommodation?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Mr. Butler receives or has access to the normal benefits available to a senior official such as the Public Service superannuation scheme, paid leave and the Public Service Management Insurance Plan. These benefits are set out in Treasury Board Personnel Management Manual, Chapter 500-1, Supplement 101. The value of these benefits to an individual is very difficult to determine accurately, since it depends on the extent to which many of the provisions are utilized. Mr. Butler does not receive an accommodation benefit. He is required by his duties to live in a house on the grounds of Government House for which he pays rent.

SALARY OF GOVERNOR GENERAL

Question No. 3,172—Mr. Cossitt:

Is the annual salary of the Governor General less than the total salary and indemnities paid to a Member of Parliament and, if so, for what reason?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): No.

Question No. 3,173—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What amount is paid as an annual salary to the Governor General?

2. Does the Governor General receive a considerably smaller salary than his Secretary, Mr. Esmund Butler, and, if so (a) for what reason (b) what are all the reasons that justify paying a higher salary to the Governor General's Secretary than to the Governor General?

3. Is the salary paid to Mr. Butler in excess of $70,000 and, if so, what is it?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1, 2 and 3. The salary of the Governor General is set by the Governor General's Act at $48,666.63. Mr. Butler's position is classified at the GIC-8 level for which the salary range is $65,600-$77,200. The reasons why the salary range for Mr. Butler's position is at a higher level than the statutory salary of the Governor General are: (a) the salary of the Governor General is set by legislation with no automatic adjustment mechanism, whereas the salary of his Secretary is adjusted on the same basis as all other senior government officials; (b) the salary of the Governor General is free of tax, whereas his Secretary pays normal federal and provincial taxes; and (c) the Governor General receives other allowances, benefits and perquisites not available to his Secretary.

RETIRED GOVERNORS GENERAL

Question No. 3,174—Mr. Cossitt:

1. What provisions are made by the Government for retired Governors General, including the (a) amount of annual pension (b) details of staff assistance to be provided?

2. Is the Government giving consideration to providing more adequate retirement benefits to former Canadian Heads of State?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): 1. (a) The amount of annual pension for retired Governors General is established in accordance with the provisions of the Governor General's Retiring Annuity Act.

(b) Retired Governors General are authorized to hire up to four office personnel paid from a salary budget equivalent to that made available to Members of Parliament for staff for their Ottawa offices.

2. No. The present provisions are considered adequate.

INVESTITURE AT GOVERNMENT HOUSE

Question No. 4,319—Mr. Dinsdale:

Was an investiture held at Government House on April 21, 1982 at which 65 distinguished Canadians received the Order of Canada and, if so, was consideration given to having the Queen, the Sovereign of the Order, present the decorations on the occasion of the proclamation of the Constitution and was Her Majesty requested to do so?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): An investiture of members of the Order of Canada was held on April 21, 1982. Consideration was given to having the Queen conduct the investiture. However, plans for the ceremony, which involved the gathering of the new members of the Order from across Canada, were made several months in advance and could not be changed at the last minute. The dates on which the Queen would be in Canada were fixed only a short time before the event. Prior commitments in the United Kingdom made it impossible for the Queen to remain in Ottawa until April 21.

AUTHORIZATION OF CONTINUING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

The House resumed, from Monday, November 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove (for Mr. MacEachen) that Bill C-130, to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Mr. Speaker, I wish to complete my remarks on Bill C-130. There is a Clause which is causing considerable concern to us on this side. I am referring to Clause 4, an amendment to the schedule. Any changes will be done by Governor in Council, the Order in Council method which we do not approve of. We feel that Clause should be changed so that it will be the Parliament of Canada which will make any changes, not a Liberal Order in Council. I hope that issue is going to be dealt with in committee.

Now, I would just like to give some examples of what is happening with international banks such as the World Bank. The operational budget of the World Bank participants is combined because they share the same work force, administrative and overhead expenses. For the fiscal year 1981, the World Bank's administrative budget was $392 million. For purposes of comparison, the budget for the fiscal year 1976 was $185 million, $213 million in 1977, almost $246 million in 1978, $276 million in 1979, and for the fiscal year 1980 it was $338 million, which is a dramatic increase over the years.

What has caused some concern here and in the U.S. is that the bank has very high travel expenses, which have been the source for some critical comment. For the fiscal year 1981 the bank has a travel budget of $43.4 million. In fiscal year 1980, the comparable amount was $38.7 million. That is an exorbitant amount for the World Bank to be using for travelling and it shows another reason why the concerns of the Canadian public should be listened to more closely in regard to foreign aid and how our money is handled.

It is worthy of comment, Mr. Speaker, that never in the 35-year history of the World Bank has there been any hint of irregularity or scandal when billions of dollars have been disbursed. Such a history runs counter to the entire human experience. In fact the Bank, in its reports, deplores the lack of uniform accounting practices and competent managers among borrowing nations. The true significance is reminiscent of Sherlock Holmes' observation in Conan Doyle's "Silver Blaze", that the clue lay in the failure of the hound to bay. The purity by silence of the World Bank's operations probably exists because those in a position to learn of irregularities might be personally embarrassed by such revelations.

It is also important, Mr. Speaker, to keep in mind that the IFIs lend directly to governments. In the case of developing countries, most of these governments are repressive and dictatorial. Corruption and mismanagement of the economy are far too common. Since cash loans especially will be placed in the general revenue of these governments, the opportunity for abuse becomes far greater. So I just want to remind the House that we are going to be spending $1.7 billion on foreign aid this year and we are very concerned that a very high percentage of that amount is being wasted through mismanagement and heaven only knows what else.

I would like to pay tribute to the Citizens for Foreign Aid Committee, Mr. Speaker, which is an Ontario based organization which does excellent research into foreign aid. They have come up with a lot of horror stories on waste and mismanagement with regard to foreign aid. In one of their recent newsletters they describe a horror story in Haiti. The Haitian project was a sorry mess of wholesale waste, local corruption and featherbedding, all funded by the Canadian taxpayer. Gerald Utting of The Toronto Star reported that the project was launched in 1974 with a sociological study by the Canadian International Development Agency which cost $800,000. Since 1974 CIDA has spent $24 million on the project, and to the naked eye there is precious little to show for it. The Haitian government failed to supply land for irrigation projects despite its commitment to do so. Transportation equipment and earth-moving machinery intended to be used strictly by DRIPP was taken over by Haitians for other uses. That is an example of the waste of foreign aid. The Haitians refused to give an account of how they were spending the money supplied to them for DRIPP projects. The Canadians were not able to find out exactly how many people were actually on the DRIPP payroll. A "W-5" program, aired earlier this year, showed a small local health clinic which cost a staggering $100,000 for new roofing. This, the commentator wryly noted, in a land where $2 a day is good wages. That is an example of where the Canadian taxpayer ends up being the drip in having to pay for this sort of project.

Last year, for example, the EDC decided to put up more than $160 million to finance a pulp and paper mill in Poland. It did this despite the fact that our own pulp and paper industry is struggling to stay alive in the face of fierce competition abroad, and despite the fact that everyone, including the Government, expects the Poles to be one of our major competitors in the European pulp and paper market. EDC rationalized this decision by pointing out that Poland would buy Canadian equipment for the plant, but this just does not hold up. In a state-run society the Polish worker is paid far less than his Canadian counterpart and ultimately Poland will be able to sell paper products far below Canadian prices. Our pulp and paper industry, which is only operating at 75 per cent capacity now, will shrink even further with fewer and fewer jobs for Canadian workers. So we have legitimate concerns, Mr. Speaker, and these are just examples of why this Bill should not be rushed through the House in too big a hurry.

To carry on with the horror stories, there is another example of $47 million going to the United States. I was not aware that the United States was an impoverished country. EDC announced last summer that it would put up $47 million for a mini-steel mill in Perth Amboy, New Jersey. This brings to $100 million the amount Canadian taxpayers have loaned for steel mills in St. Paul, Minnesota; Midlothian, Texas; Sheerness, England; and now New Jersey. In the meantime our own steel industry in Ontario and Nova Scotia is encountering stiff competition and the prospect of further lay-offs in Atlantic Canada where unemployment is already alarming and threatens to erupt in street violence. We are sending $47 million down to New Jersey. I am delighted that a Canadian firm got the contract for the New Jersey plant, but surely there is plenty of financing available in the United States. Surely it is not necessary to provide low-cost loans at the expense of our own industry, which is quite literally desperate for capital funds to upgrade its facilities.

There will have to be more parliamentary scrutiny of CIDA and foreign aid programs. Clause 4 must be amended so that Parliament can make changes to Bill C-130, rather than this being done by Order in Council.

I hope that when the Bill goes to Committee Clause 4 will be dealt with, the Order in Council ruling removed and Parliament given control of further foreign aid expenditures and moneys for CIDA.

Mr. John Gamble (York North): Mr. Speaker, I had to consult my calendar today to be sure that yesterday was not Christmas and today the second day of Christmas. I suppose the public is to be spared four more days of what would be the same kind of largesse extended by this Parliament on behalf of international financial institutions. If evidence was ever needed that when this place is not functioning, taxpayers are sometimes better served, the occurrences in the last two days, including the Bill before the House today, would prove this.

Yesterday we went through the process of either extending direct financial contributions or extending demand promissory notes, which have become encumbrances upon the people of Canada to the extent that $1,703,810,000 or over $1,000 million in foreign aid.

The argument has been made and will be made now with regard to the way Bill C-130 is drafted that what we are concerned with in large measure is a small contribution in cash, followed by a demand note to be used to raise money in some way by the financial institutions listed on the schedule to this Bill. The illusion that is created that these promissory notes do not constitute a liability against the Government of Canada and accordingly imposed upon the people of Canada is just that, an illusion. Just as any promissory note executed by any Member of the House constitutes a genuine liability, so does the execution of a promissory note or the execution of a demand note as contemplated by this legislation create a liability to be discharged. Those are the issues before the House.

On October 27, upon our return from our summer or fall recess, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) made the following statement, which is found at page 20078 of Hansard:

> The world-wide recession has cut our economy to the bone. We have lost half a million jobs during the past year. Almost a million and a half among us are looking for work. Many others have temporarily given up the search for gainful employment. Virtually no Canadian has been untouched by the recession. In every region of the country, those who have been spared the worst have relatives, friends or neighbours who are struggling to cope with hardship and insecurity—be they unemployed textile workers in Quebec, grounded fishermen in the Atlantic Provinces, idle lumbermen in British Columbia, laid off miners or auto workers in Ontario.

That is a rare group of people in terms of numbers and in terms of occupation, Mr. Speaker. Compared to the calamities referred to on October 27, with what are we faced today?

Despite the clamouring of the New Democratic Party for more assistance for the unemployed, it is very interesting to find that there is not a Member of that Party present in the House at the moment ready to deal with this issue. They have run away from the frightening prospect of being accused of providing additional funds abroad, when there is not enough money in Canada to look after the needs to which reference was made by the Minister of Finance on October 27.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Of course there are NDP Members present in the House. We are waiting for a Progressive Conservative to speak on this matter.

Mr. Gamble: Mr. Speaker, I do not know the purpose of that intervention, other than to permit me to indicate that the Member who intervened was not in the House at the time I made the comment. I would point out that he is the only Member of that Party in the House ready to deal with these essential issues.

I should like to deal with the terms of the Bill before us. Clause 3 reads as follows:

> The Secretary of State for External Affairs may, for the purpose of promoting the social and economic development of developing countries, provide financial assistance to an institution by way of
> (a) direct payments to the institution;
> (b) the issuance to the institution of non-interest bearing, non-negotiable demand notes in a form determined by the Minister of Finance; and
> (c) the purchase on behalf of Her Majesty in right of Canada of shares of the institution.

The "institution" is one of a number of institutions listed in the schedule attached to the Bill. Clause 6, which is the operative Clause giving rise to the commitment of the Government, reads as follows:

> In respect of the period between the date this Act comes into force and March 31, 1983,
> (a) there is hereby appropriated for the purposes of paragraph 3(a), the sum of four hundred and forty-two thousand dollars to be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund from time to time as required; and
> (b) the amount of financial assistance provided to institutions pursuant to paragraph 3(b) shall not exceed the equivalent of one hundred and seventeen million, forty thousand dollars.

The total amount under the operative Clause is $117,482,000. It is significant that that commitment is for a relatively brief period, less than five months from the date the Bill is passed until the end of March, 1983. I do not think my mathematics are incorrect, Mr. Speaker. If we take the average, we are authorizing a commitment of $23,496,400 per month at a time when it is extremely difficult to get the Government to make any funds available for the general relief of poverty and depression in Canada.

Yesterday we had the pleasure of listening to an explanation of the way in which the astronomical sum of $1,703,810,000 was to be dealt with in terms of financial aid to foreign financial institutions. One of the arguments made by the Minister responsible for the introduction of the Bill related to the demand note nature of the commitment. The allegation made to the House was that we should not be too concerned because the vast majority of those sums, indeed 92.5 per cent, were to be secured only by demand notes. In fact, the Government of Canada was not reaching into the Consolidated Revenue Fund at this time for the purpose of extracting that substantial sum of money but was only putting up 7.5 per cent of it in cash and hopefully would never be called upon to pay the balance. However, it is significant to note that yesterday I asked the Minister, in a series of questions, what the total actual commitment of the Government of Canada was under Bill C-129, and he confirmed in the House that the total commitment was the amount referred in the Bill which, when totalled, exceeded $2 billion.

The same must be said today, having regard to the same general method employed in providing either cash or a security, which is an encumbrance upon the assets of Canada for the purpose of funding foreign aid as contemplated by this piece of legislation. It may be comforting to the Government to suggest that of the total amount of $117,482,000, the trifling, inconsequential and insignificant sum of only $442,000 is to be laid out immediately. Regardless of all the arguments which may be made on any side of the House with respect to the method of financing these commitments, to my mind $442,000 today is a substantial sum of money; but linked as it is to the further obligation to issue demand notes for $117,040,000, I think it is a frightening thing that the House does not have a full complement of Members who can direct their attention to this matter and, as the Leader of the New Democratic Party (Mr. Broadbent) urged, find in the Bill the funds they would like used for the purpose of creating jobs in Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I must admit I no longer understand the hon. member. The Official Opposition's critic says that he is supporting this bill in principle, and now the Hon. Member is criticizing the bill. Is he refusing to support his critic or is he sitting as an independent? That is my question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I may say that the Parliamentary Secretary has the right to rise and say he would like to ask a question. However, this does not seem to be a genuine point of order.

[English]

Mr. Gamble: I thank the Hon. Member for his intervention. It permits me to indicate to the House that with respect to this piece of legislation it is my personal view, as a Member of the Chamber, that this Bill ought not to be passed; it is as simple as that.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Gamble: If that kind of explanation horrifies Members of the Government Party, I can well understand why. It is because there is never any deviation there from what their masters tell them. The distinction between that Party and this Party is that there are people here who can freely express their views with respect to Government legislation, and that is exactly the position which is being taken here.

Mr. Lapierre: Talk to us about leadership.

Mr. Gamble: I am inclined to ask how the Bill fits into the financial scheme of things that appear in Part 1 of the 1982-83 Estimates. I am referring to page 33 thereof where we find that the total official development assistance established by the Government is fixed at $1,724 million. Of that amount, according to the same page, we find that the investment and advances to international financial institutions—value of cash and notes to be issued—totals only $332 million.

Yesterday we passed a Bill with respect to financial institutions for the amount of $1,703,810,000. We are now asked to pass this Bill which adds $117,482,000 to the same amount, an amount which quite frankly exceeds the amount that appears in the Estimates. But the matter does not end there. If we refer once again to the speech of the Minister of Finance on October 27, as reported at page 20083 of Hansard, we note that he has taken the unusual step of reducing the amount of development aid. He said:

> Outlays in the areas of defence and official development assistance will be reduced by $230 million and $245 million respectively from the dollar levels previously allocated.

The mathematics are simply not there to support the position. Within a period of two days the House has already approved amounts with respect to bilateral foreign aid through investment and advances to financial institutions which exceed, in their amount, the entire amount of development assistance referred to in the Estimates. Unfortunately, when the Minister delivered his non-budget speech on October 27, we did not have the benefit of an accompanying financial analysis of from where these funds were in fact to come or what the consequential results of the reduction in these various budgetary items might be.

If I may return to a rather interesting aspect of the Bill itself, there is a provision whereby the "Governor in Council may, by order, amend the schedule" by adding names thereto or deleting names therefrom. What Parliament is asked to do, accordingly, is to grant to the Government of Canada the right to spend, in essence, $117,482,000 in whatever fashion it pleases.

Having given them the right to add to the schedule or to take from the schedule—and I might say that the only power they really needed was the power to add since they had the power to allocate among those institutions referred to in the schedule—I can imagine the circumstance where one of the other financial institutions which might be added would be the special Swiss trust account of the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), because there is nothing to prevent the Government from adding any financial institution it might wish to add on using the entire amount to put into whatever financial institution it might wish. They are not only banks referred to in the schedule, but funds. Any fund which the Government might wish to create or subscribe to would qualify, and the House will have lost the opportunity to intervene and ask whether the moneys have been well spent. We do not know what one dime of these funds will be used for, not one dime. All we know is that we are asked to give authority to the Government to put the money into the fund or into the Bank.

Let me read into the record some of the institutions referred to in the Schedule: the African Development Fund, the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Fund and the Asian Development Bank. The significant issue is that without any input from Parliament, any other fund either now in existence or to be brought into existence later may be added to the list. Every dime of the $117,482,000 may be put into that fund. We are not told the purposes of the expenditures of the fund or the Bank. The whole matter is left to our imagination; I might say not to very close scrutiny in terms of the manner which this House has hitherto dealt with this Bill.

It is my submission that this House ought not to approve a financial request by Government to spend money in whatever fashion it desires, which is exactly what this Bill would permit.

My concern is that with a budgetary deficit this year projected by the Minister of Finance to exceed $23 billion, probably reaching $25 billion, with interest on the national debt to be paid this year alone in the projected amount of $16.4 billion and with the Government having borrowed over $21 billion, is it prudent for the Government to borrow money in order to give it away?

Let me ask some rather basic elementary questions. Would an individual citizen borrow money to give it away? Would Members of this House as individuals borrow money to give it away? If not, why as representatives of our constituents do we come here and authorize the disbursement freely of moneys owned, claimed by the people of Canada, in a give-away project when, at the same time, we are saddling these same Canadians with an obligation to pay their pro rata share of some $16 billion in interest? The obligation with respect to these programs is not one that will end with us. Very clearly, our children will be able to carry on the great tradition of paying for the debts that we have created and for which we are responsible.

I wonder how that whole process fits into the scheme of the just society. Is it just and reasonable for people in this place today to load our children and our grandchildren with obligations that they will have to pay for tomorrow? I hardly think so. I hardly think that is appropriate. Yet this is exactly what we are doing. No reasonable, prudent Member of this House would undertake a personal action of the kind the Government is undertaking. I think therein lies one of the great problems of the Government and of the House itself. We have not come to grasp the significance of the money in our charge.

I practise law, as some others in this House do, and we have trust accounts that we in a law practice administer. Those accounts are used for the prupose of depositing funds that do not belong to us. They are not funds to which a law firm can claim title, subject of course to the fact that we can extract funds from that account to pay for services that are rendered. But the balance of those funds, whatever they amount to, are subject to the call of the person who owns the money therein. The funds can be paid out on the individual's direction or for the individual's benefit.

Looking at the Consolidated Revenue Fund, is there any difference between that fund, for which we have a responsibility, and a normal trust fund that I have just described? The answer is that there is not. We are charged with the responsibility to attend to the interests of the people who have worked hard and have had extracted from their salaries or from the pockets of their business an amount that is contributed to this fund, from which the Government extracts all.

I had an opportunity on the weekend to have a discussion with an officer of the Department of National Revenue. He indicated to me that his responsibility was to attend at the various businesses within my riding and examine the accounts that had fallen into default, accounts of taxpayers, many of which related to trust money. We are all acquainted with the provisions of the Income Tax Act and the Canada Pension Plan which oblige employers to extract from the salaries of their employees amounts by way of a withholding tax representing weekly or monthly shares of their salary which are taxed. The tax goes into a fund and on the fifteenth of each month is paid to the Receiver General for Canada, including an amount with respect to Canada Pension Plan contributions and unemployment insurance contributions by both employer and employee. What he has found, unfortunately, and it is not unusual, is that employers have been using these trust funds to carry on their daily activities. The only reason for that is that they desperately need every dollar they can find in order to survive. There is no excuse under the law for this practice. Unfortunately, this practice is growing and it is growing in these severe economic times.

The Crown recognizes that those moneys are trust funds so-called, and many Canadians have been prosecuted for dipping in, as it were, to the trust funds. I then asked what happens when those trust funds become part of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The answer was that any semblance of their being a duty or a trust has vanished. There is no obligation upon the Government of Canada to continue to administer those funds, in the same fashion that there was an obligation upon the individual taxpayer to administer and take charge and care of those funds. I submit that we in this place should reflect upon our duties with respect to these moneys which today we are asked to lavish on financial institutions to be spent, once they are handed to these institutions, in whatever fashion they may prefer.

Let me deal with one of those institutions referred to in the Schedule, one to which I have already made reference, namely the African Development Bank. That Bank has a project for the construction of a rail link north of the Republic of South Africa to permit the produce from Zambia and other nations to be transported to the east or the west coast of the African continent without the need to transport goods over the territory of the Republic of South Africa. That is an objective which is, in the minds of those who are determined to build the line, an improvement over the existing circumstances. There is one great problem. When that line passes through Mozambique it is subject to regular guerrilla attacks. When the line passes through Angola, it is subject to regular guerrilla attacks by the UNITA movement in that country.

While I do not know if that is the purpose of the expenditure of those funds, the consequence is that the money will surely be wasted. It is a sink hole. As long as these states through which the railway is to pass cannot control their own domestic population, there is no valid reason why money should be spent on a project like that. We do not even know whether that is the project because we have not been given any information and we never will have any information. It does indicate to me, however, that without the Government coming before Parliament and identifying the purpose, the quantum and all normal ancillary information referable to this matter, Parliament should reject the request out of hand.

A petition was filed in the House today urging that no additional foreign aid be extended to Tanzania. The petition was signed by certain residents of the Province of Ontario and was submitted to the House by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). The petition referred to the dictatorial Marxist government of that country. There was reference to the expropriation without compensation of business enterprises that were owned by Canadians. What assurances does the House have that the African Development Fund or the African Development Bank will not advance funds to Tanzania, a country where some of these actions referred to by the petitioners apparently occur?

When dealing with this Bill Hon. Members should be cognizant of a number of circumstances. First, it is part of an over-all international development program for foreign aid. In light of our pressing financial circumstances, would it not be appropriate for the House to undertake an examination of the rules by which this Government would extend aid to foreign nations? Is it not now appropriate to refer this entire matter to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence for an in depth examination of the principles that should lie behind the extension of foreign aid? This is something which I recommended to the then Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister some time ago.

I am convinced that there are millions of Canadians who recognize, in view of these substantial sums of money advanced and guaranteed, that there should be some pressing issue for the benefit of Canadians that should override the natural inclination of the Government to make these funds available to create jobs and assure security for Canadians. Do we not owe them the obligation to investigate this matter in its entirety and develop some general rules?

I would like to suggest some rules that might be applied in determining how foreign aid should be extended. I do not believe that it is uncumbent upon us as a nation to engage in a type of international socialist redistribution of wealth because there are nations that are less prosperous than us. Invariably we will find that all we have done is redistribute the poverty. I heard the Hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Breau) confirm in the House yesterday that citizens in certain foreign countries would gladly exchange their good times for our bad times. I recognize that fact.

However, what is the purpose behind our foreign aid program? It should be to create a climate in the nations which receive those funds that will give rise to the creation of national wealth within their own boundaries. This will not occur until those nations have governments which are freely elected under a system which permits opposition parties to seek election in a social and judicial circumstance which grants universal human rights to all their citizens.

I realize that Members to my left have complained about the extension of any foreign aid to Guatemala. At the same time they clamour for additional foreign aid to Nicaragua. It is not a coincidence, of course, that the government they wish to receive this aid should be dominated by a Marxist leaning government and that the government to which they oppose giving aid is one which is against Marxist government in Nicaragua.

I submit to the House that the test should be an objective one without regard to ideological leanings. Countries should be asked if they grant universal human rights to their citizens and, in fact, permit opposition parties, in a free and democratic election, to form a democratic legislature which is supported by a democratically elected executive.

What is the cause of the poverty in many of these nations? My colleague the Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche) directed his attention to this issue and confirmed that people in the Third World are in worse economic circumstances today than they were before, despite all the foreign aid which has been extended in the past. What does that signal to us? Is it our obligation to increase the expenditure? Should we be engaged in a program which provides for massive injections into it from our depleted assets?

Let us examine the circumstances which exist in those countries. There are countries which have dictatorships. There are regimes which suppress the free enterprise system which has given rise to the wealth that we enjoy today, subject to the diminution to which reference has been made over recent years. Nevertheless, the system was in place but it is not now in place in those nations. Therefore, our first objective should be to tie our foreign aid to commitments by the nations receiving same to accept the principles to which I have just made reference. In the absence of those commitments, I suggest that the foreign aid should no longer be extended except in cases where there has been a natural disaster that has unexpectedly claimed lives and created havoc within the boundaries of those individual sovereign states.

As we approach the time for close consideration and a vote on these matters, I urge my colleagues on all sides of the House to consider, apart from what may have been the thrust in foreign policy and the drive to additional and excessive foreign aid grants in the past, whether it is not appropriate to consider the needs of their own constituents and Canadians generally in light of today's circumstances.

Mr. Norman Kelly (Scarborough Centre): Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to intervene in this debate but, after listening to the arguments advanced by the Hon. Member for York North (Mr. Gamble), I thought I would address this issue, if only for a short while, and put some of my ideas formally on the record.

The first thing I would like to say is that I basically approach this matter from the same perspective as the Hon. Member for York North; that is, I think that, if we will be spending such large sums of money, we should ensure that those sums will create jobs for Canadians. Therefore, I do not want to take exception to those parts of his remarks which were addressed to job creation in Canada.

What I would like to point out to him, though, is that his argument is not unlike the spurious arguments of many Canadians who ask the question: If we are to spend $1 billion, $2 billion or more, why, in Heaven's name, would the Government spend the money abroad on other people? Why, in a time of difficulty, do we not spend the money here on Canadian industry, on Canadian businessmen, to produce Canadian profits and Canadian jobs? I think that argument blithely ignores the basic reality of the Canadian economy of the 1970s and the 1980s.

The Hon. Member surely knows, and those Canadians who believe or accept his argument should know, that Canada is one of the greatest trading nations of the world today. Thirty per cent of everything we produce is sold abroad. If that is the case—if we do sell so many of our goods and services abroad, and if that market is 100 times larger than our domestic market—then surely we should be able to see that a dollar invested in the foreign market should produce results which are potentially 100 times greater than if the same dollar were invested in our domestic market. In short, I would argue, and I would want others to believe, that if we are to create jobs for Canadians, now and in the future, the best opportunity we have of creating them is in those areas which export to the foreign market.

If you accept the argument, Mr. Speaker, that it is better to spend money in developing export markets for Canadian products, then the next question is: Where would these exports markets be developed? I think most of us understand that our primary export market is in the United States. I think it takes something like two-thirds of all the goods we produce and about 80 per cent of all the manufactured goods. That means that, in part, the United States will continue to be the major focus of our export market in the near future. But where does the opportunity for significant expansion over the long term really exist? I suggest that any Hon. Member of the House who has read the minutes of the parliamentary task force on the National Trading Corporation will have discovered that Japan, West Germany and all of our major competitors among the OECD countries have concluded, after considerable research, that the market of the future lies in the developing countries of the Pacific Rim and South America and in those countries that we describe as Third World nations.

Having identified those areas as our future markets, members will have found that our trading competitors are not afraid to spend money abroad, unlike the Hon. Member for York North and many of his colleagues. Those nations are prepared to spend large sums of money on developing Third World nations for two reasons. First, they understand that, to a degree, the expenditure of funds purchases good will in those communities. Second, the expenditure of sizeable sums of money in those countries primes the pump of the national economies of those nations. As they build themselves, as they enrich their economies, they are increasingly able to purchase the sophisticated and more expensive consumer goods from the Japanese homeland and European markets.

Therefore, unlike some Hon. Members of the House and unlike many Canadians—some of them my constituents—I am not afraid to spend money in the poorer parts of the world. Despite their political systems, whatever the social arrangements they may be in the process of working out, I am not afraid to spend money in those countries because I think that ultimately, given time, proper advice and guidance from countries such as Canada and others in the western democratic industrialized world, those countries will develop into extremely prosperous recipients of Canadian primary and manufactured products. Therefore, to ignore those countries now, to turn our backs on them for whatever reason, would be to commit the ultimate folly and doom us to the slowest growth we could ever witness as a nation since the Second World War.

Finally, I would like to inform the Hon. Member who last spoke and those who may share his thoughts that Hon. Members on this side are not without critical faculties. Many of us have discussed foreign aid among ourselves and have reached certain conclusions, some of which I would like to share this afternoon.

There are three criticisms I would offer in a very general way. First, instead of spending less than we are spending now, I think we should be spending considerably more. Second, before we enrich our foreign aid program, we should have an independent committee of inquiry to find out just how efficiently the present policies are delivering our money and assistance to the recipient countries today. That committee may be the present External Affairs Committee, one of its subcommittees, or, better still, a special task force of the House, since task forces have revealed an ability to work quickly and with considerable insight, two characteristics which would lend themselves to this sort of inquiry.

Finally, I hope that before too long the Government of Canada, by itself, in co-operation with the business community or with provincial Governments, will create institutions or shape attitudes which will allow Canadian businessmen to exploit more aggressively foreign markets than at present. For every dollar that we contribute to foreign aid, Canadian businessmen receive roughly 15 or 16 cents back by way of foreign contracts. Compare that with the Japanese who get back roughly $2.40 for every dollar they invest in foreign aid. One can see there is a desperate need for Canadian business and for Canadian Governments at both levels to generate one strategy or another to ensure that any money we invest, aside from the humanitarian result that we all accept and honour in the expenditure of taxpayers' money, will generates the highest return for our businessmen and the highest number of jobs for our workers.

Mr. Robert Wenman (Fraser Valley West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend the previous speaker. One thing about debate in the House of Commons on a subject such as Canadian relations with the world, foreign aid and human aid, is that it encourages people who do not normally participate in external affairs and such issues to come forward with common sense and good ideas which might in fact be new to them but perhaps are not new to the House of Commons. I invite that Hon. Member to join the External Affairs Committee. He shows a positive human interest. He will find that we have had a considerable number of studies in the House of Commons and in committee on the North-South dialogue and other related issues. His contribution would be appreciated there and I look forward to seeing him in the future.

It does not matter from which corner of the House one comes, it is my opinion that all Members of the House of Commons start from the same basic premise that all men and all nations of good conscience want to improve the human condition, particularly as it relates to the poorest of the poor wherever they may be found in the world and regardless of their national boundary.

The spirit and will of Canadians to be generous, caring and giving is a matter of historical record. The method of assisting all individuals in the world first to survive and then to maximize their individual potential through development is where the separation of concepts begins to widen among all factions of the weak who have the need to receive and the strong who have the capacity and will to give.

This Bill is all about international financial institutions created by governments to tackle the problems of millions of individuals and governments who have proven not competent to survive and compete under current world inter-relationships and conditions. Unfortunately, the methods that the financial institutions that we currently strive to uphold in this Bill employ, as well-intentioned as they are and will be in the future, have to be assessed very carefully, because these institutions to which we will now be giving more money have failed in the world. In spite of these institutions the poor have become poorer and the numbers of poor have grown larger and larger.

The Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) and others have talked in this House about the physical and spiritual starvation existing throughout the world. Like many other Members, I stand here today and bear witness to man's inhumanity to man. I could stand in judgment against many nations of the world. In my speech today, I do not want to do that. I want to recognize that the world is not poor by nation, the world is poor by individuals. You can see poverty here in Canada, material poverty and hunger. You can also see spiritual poverty here in Canada. As I stand in the House today to illustrate, I will not be paternalistic.

About three years ago one of my constituents, at the time when Canada was open to a group of refugees, opened his home to a young refugee. This constituent is a very close friend of mine. In addition to opening his home, he found a job and a place in the community for this young person. Unfortunately, about a year ago this young person was killed in an automobile accident. He grieved for him as one of his own.

This man tried again. He took in another of the poor people from another nation and provided him with a home and opportunity in our economy. Last weekend two young Canadians on motorcycles saw this young man who was trying to make his way in Canada walking along the road. They got off their motorcycles, punched this young man, a young Vietnamese, into unconsciousness, threw him into the middle of the road, a car ran over him and he died.

What kind of poverty is that? It is the worst kind of poverty one can imagine. We have to attack that poverty of spirit. We have to stand behind the spirit of generosity that says: "I will take one of the poor of the world and give him an opportunity in Canada". I feel just terrible for my country and in particular my own riding about the truth of that reality.

Poverty is not alone in this nation or any nation. No one has a monopoly on poverty or greed. Let us look at it in a world context. Poverty, wherever it is found, can be materialistic or of the spirit. If we are to change these things, we must generate a new ethic that stands on the basic value of production. The philosophy of the current institutions have failed to stop the slide of the world into further and further poverty. They have not stopped the poor from becoming poorer and poorer and larger in number. They will fail further unless they change their direction and basic philosophies. Their intention has been good, but their capacity has not been either efficient or competent to address the problem.

Current United Nations and international financial institutions to a great degree are mired in the philosophy of the redistribution of existing wealth and power. The method of redistribution of this existing wealth and power is seen to come through collectivism, instead of recognizing that the solution lies in the philosophy of creation and distribution of new wealth and new power, through the creation of new opportunities for individuals to generate growth and prosperity from within their individual being.

The redistribution ethic starts from the concept of the limits to growth. Assuming that wealth and power are finite and depleting, we must live basically—I realize there are degrees—within the existing parameters of wealth and power. The problem is not the creation of new wealth and power, but rather the redistribution of that wealth in the world today. This is a valid ethic. It is valid intellectually. It has value from a humanist point of view. It is all tied nicely together in the concept of consumption and environment. It recognizes that the world must control its consumption in some way, otherwise we will destroy the environment. It ties together, the no-growth theory very nicely with another broad theory, and that is the theory of socialism, the redistribution of existing wealth and power rather than the creation of new.

Another one of the problems is that this theory is unfortunately carried by the leaders of the world today. It comes out of older thought, from perhaps the London School of Economics and other such institutions where the leaders of the current world, of the new emerging worlds like Africa, obtained their education, values and ethics. I am not judging and saying it is wrong. There are many good things about it. It is just that that way of implementation is not going to work. The world is getting poorer and poorer under it. And that is a fact, not just a statement of opinion.

To solve the problem, the theory is we should begin with relief, and then we must provide development through the transfer of resources and technology, specifically, the layering on first of basic food, because a man that is hungry cannot work. Then the man with no shelter must have some form of basic shelter. He gets his food and shelter, but he cannot participate in the world until he is educated and has proper health care. We must first set up a basic welfare program which will bring the people of the poor nations to a condition where they may begin to work to build their economy.

There is somehow an idea that social reform must precede economic development or economic reform. Unfortunately, it has been demonstrated that when social reform runs too far ahead rather than parallel with economic development, the latter in fact does not and will not occur, because the incentive to make it occur has been taken from the machinery of administration and from the basic value structure. This vertical development concept will never work because it ignores the basic elements of parallel value development which establishes, in conjunction with, or even prior to, programs which demonstrate opportunities for individual initiative and incentive which, in turn, ensure upward mobility through work, profit and individual enterprise.

North-South dialogue starts with the premise that wealthy nations of the North have all the resources and technology, all the wealth and power. The South, on the other hand, has all the poverty and lack of human and physical resources. The North-South dialogue which is bogged down now, is bound to be bogged down in failure because it was initiated on a false premise. Many of us have visited in the South. I wonder if any members of the committee of the House of Commons who travelled to Latin America, or anyone who saw that poverty, went hungry on their visit. I do not think any Member of this House of Commons, including myself, has ever really gone hungry, certainly not when we have visited the South, because as well as gross and abject poverty, there is also amongst these nations and their communities, opulent wealth and abundant unexploited resource potential.

There is in this world, Mr. Speaker, substantial wealth and power that remains untouched and undeveloped in the South. The poor exist in the North as the wealthy exist in the South. The poor exist as individuals in all nations, including our own. We must stop addressing poor nations, in our programs and start addressing poor individuals. We must attempt to create new opportunities for poor individuals wherever they are found. We need to identify nations which accept the values of the work ethic, individual initiative, and incentive, the profit motive, and enterprise and freedom. These values are the motors of productivity regardless of where they are found. This is the model which has proven successful and has generated the basic economy, not only for our nation but for all of the Western nations, and in fact, the greatest giving nations in the world.

Miss Jewett: So why are we in a recession?

Mr. Wenman: We are in a recession, Mr. Speaker, to answer my friend from New Westminster, because we, too, in this nation, have lost the concept of the work ethic, individual initiative, and incentive, and we also put down the profit motive and free entreprise which have created this nation. While we want to protect our humanistic values, we must still support that economy, and this is the system which is successful throughout the world and the system we should be passing on to the Third World. We should not just be passing along material goods; we should be passing along the value system behind the aspect of real production. It used to be thought that in order to get production, you took a raw resource, added labour, then capital and technology, and you had production. But we have applied these things in many parts of the world and we did not get production because we forgot to apply one element. There will not be production if there is not incentive and profit. Therefore, we must get back to that reality. We must find nations that recognize the fact that in order to develop, or have development, they must face that reality. We should not keep pumping good money after bad into those nations that choose the collectivist socialist route, which has not and is not working. It has not and is not working anywhere in the world. Certainly, as humanists we must give basic relief, but if we want to move from relief to development, perhaps we had better choose those nations that want to move with the basic values which have generated the creative production of our society.

Miss Jewett: Like who?

Mr. Wenman: The Hon. Member asks like who. I did not ask her to ask these questions resulting from my speech, but I appreciate it. That is my next answer. Like who? If we take areas of the world where we look at the situation and say it is hopeless, there is no way that this nation can develop, and then we put the enterprise ethic there, that is where the success story is. There is no development aid provided to Singapore, South Korea, Taiwan. In fact, the ones we have isolated and not provided development aid to have demonstrated the way to organize their society for greater success for the poorest of their poor.

Miss Jewett: You are talking about American aid.

Mr. Wenman: Well, there are different kinds of aid. There is a relief package and there is a development package, which is really just an extended relief package. It is just a redistribution.

Miss Jewett: Are you really talking about U.S. aid in Taiwan?

Mr. Wenman: Certainly, U.S. aid in Taiwan, U.S. economic development aid. I am in favour of it because that is what stimulates the economy and raises the poor up. Exactly. On this basis, Mr. Speaker, we are not going to have to go to committee, because the message is getting through to the other side.

Miss Jewett: They said they did it on their own.

• (1640)

Mr. Wenman: They did it on their own, that is right, with economic development aid in the form of enterprise. And I am for developing that enterprise in all nations of the world. If we would do that and export it to the developing countries, then we would start in fact to help them on the road to recovery.

There are those who claim that somehow those of the redistribution philosophy have some corner on humanism, human rights, freedom, liberation, democracy and free choice, and that somehow these values are the opposite of enterprise and the profit motive. There certainly seems to be that indication, because those who support the capitalist mode are in fact condemned and it is assumed that they could not possibly be humanists. Human rights, humanism, relief and development, in fact free democracies, are not the opposite of free markets and individual enterprise systems; they are the byproduct of these systems. A system which produces exists in a society with the greatest human rights. The society with the greatest humanists is that of a giving nation. They have relief, development and free democracy with free choice, and those come from the generation of wealth in a free market, the individual enterprise system.

What we have to do for Third World countries, Mr. Speaker, is to help them take their own potential wealth and make it grow so that they can meet their own needs as well as the needs of the poorest nations of the Third World. We can keep pouring more and more money into financial institutions in an attempt to redistribute it, but if redistribution is the value thrust rather than creation, the hole gets bigger and bigger and the poor grow poorer and poorer and more and more in numbers.

My constituents would want me to support this Bill, as I intend to, but they would feel more confident about the support I give this Bill if they felt somehow assured that in its passage the world would somehow be less poor, that there would in fact be success in putting a dent in international poverty. I wish I could believe, as I support this Bill, that this would be the case, but it will not happen until the institutions themselves rebuild from a new philosophy emphasizing the creation of wealth rather than redistribution. Wealth and power are not limited; they are as infinite as the capacity of the individual to live, grow and develop his own unlimited potential. Canada cannot survive and continue to grow unless we are a part of world institutions, striving to stabilize and lift international economic order. We have no choice with this Bill because without stability and economic order, even if it is wrongly oriented or directed, we have no world at all with no standard of living for anyone.

Aiding these institutions, Mr. Speaker, need not be based upon altruism and humanism alone. The poorest nations have no capacity to consume, to buy, to trade. Canada's standard of living is directly proportional to our capacity to trade. Our own economic welfare is sustained in uplifting the poor in the poorest regions of the world. There are many motivations for international aid, and while the loftiest of these might well be humanism, enlightened self-interest and mutual interest can be found in the establishment of development as equal reasons. For those on either side, whether they support foreign aid because of humanism or self interest, the reasons for supporting this Bill appear self-evident on that basis.

There are many things that we do not like about this Bill. We are becoming accustomed to finding in every Bill something which says: write me a blank cheque. Let the Government which knows better expand where it will. Let it have no accountability. That is what this Bill does, and that is an unfortunate part which will have to be removed. I as a Member of Parliament cannot grant to the Government of Canada the unlimited right to spend more. We are going to give the Government a right to a limit here, a limit which in itself we are stretching to reach. I cannot give beyond that limit. If Hon. Members opposite want my support on the Bill, they will have to consider that in committee and they will have to remove that order in council clause.

My good friend and colleague from the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence said he hoped that I would give a good, progressive speech. I hope my speech is progressive because it talks about creation of new wealth and power which can in fact lift the developing world. Canadians accept that the Government, on their behalf, should contribute a portion of their tax dollars to relief and development. Their greatest concern, however, is that their tax dollars are being wasted through poor administration, poor management and corruptive redistribution of wealth from our country to the corporate Government and the elite of poorer nations.

There are many ways that we as Canadians can help poor people and poor nations lift themselves into self-sufficiency and from there, hopefully, toward surplus production. Canada can give abundantly of its human resources. In our nation we keep cutting back our educational productivity. For example, school boards are not hiring teachers, they are laying off teachers, competent teachers. Health care facilities are cutting back and laying off nurses. They are laying off competent human resources. Instead of putting that human resource on unemployment insurance, why can we not take it and offer it to the developing world? This does not just apply to the teaching and health care areas. Even productive enterprise in our economy is cutting back, which has created a surplus of both management and labour. Instead of keeping this resource on hold, why not find a way of providing human resources which could help to build elsewhere? Not only would we be helping by taking this human resource to assist in the Third World, but in addition to that we would be providing a mutual benefit to a resource which has been put on hold through unemployment insurance in Canada. These people would gain a new benefit in the form of a second language, a second culture and new economic ideas. Therefore, it could be again a mutual interest in the sharing of the pool of human resources.

We talk constantly in terms of limiting production. We establish marketing boards which are supposed to sell, but they also limit. They maintain certain price levels. Why should we not encourage our people to produce as much as they can, sell as much of that production in the market and use the excess—excess production because we do not have an excess of capital? I know the Hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Whelan) tries to do that, and we are great givers of food in the world from our surplus, and I think that is the kind of thing Canadians can and should do. That is what we are best equipped to do. But I have to say that I do have some concern about giving more capital when we are in fact a capital-poor country ourselves. We are a developing country which needs that capital here, to develop and produce here, to teach the world to produce in a similar way and give them the excess of that production. Capital and credit have limits, Mr. Speaker. We are limited in the amount of capital and credit that this nation can extend, because we are overextended now. As people listen to this debate and hear us grant additional money and additional financial support to these international institutions and giving additional multilateral aid in the form of capital and credit, they will realize that we have reached a limit.

International institutions must recognize that further capitalization such as this has its limits. If there has been some acrimony in this debate, it will show the world the concern that is being expressed as we come near to that limit.

Before we become recipients of aid, rather than contributors to the institutions that we attempt to uphold today, we must stabilize our economy rather than further destabilize the economy of the world. It is difficult to balance things so as to know when to give and when not to give. When do we stabilize world economics and when do we stabilize our own? That balance must be found, Mr. Speaker, before Canadians become poorer and poorer and a larger part of the problem.

The North-South dialogue which expressed the problems of the North and South has become too much an "us" and "them" problem. It was wrong to divide things North and South rather than just poor people wherever they are found throughout the world, as individuals. In the dialogue of North-South, the object of the South seems to have been to try to put a guilt trip on the North. The North seems to feel guilty about the wealth it has generated and guilty for being successful in a material way. When we enter a dialogue we almost have to apologize for materialistic success.

I think we must stop having an inferiority complex regarding our own values. Why put down materialistic values when they are what generates economic development? Why assume that our social and cultural values are inferior? Let us not approach this subject with guilt; instead, let us uphold the values that have created this society.

It often happens that when we travel in older parts of the world we are told that we are good at making money, creating wealth, or creating production. People want to know how it is done. We have to show them how it is done, Mr. Speaker, and must transmit a different set of values as well as our concept of production, Mr. Speaker.

What I am about to say is not a statement that is new to this House, Mr. Speaker, and it has already been made all around the world. At the Cancun Conference President Reagan started talking along this line of thought, saying that it is time to stop developmental assistance coming in the guise of little more than the subsidization of social revolutions. We have to look at development in its correct context. We must give it a very practical and hard look. I hope that hard look will begin again when the Bill reaches committee. I look forward to that active discussion over the next few weeks, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour for me to take part in this debate on Bill C-130, an Act to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, namely, the African Development Fund, the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Fund, the Asian Development Bank, the InterAmerican Development Bank, the Fund for Special Operations (InterAmerican Development Bank), the Caribbean Development Bank and the Special Development Fund, the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Common Fund for Commodities.

If I am not mistaken, Mr. Speaker, this is the first such debate to be held in this House. I am very much in favour of it and I congratulate the government for giving us the opportunity to have a debate on this issue.

[English]

May I begin this part of my speech, Mr. Speaker, with a reference to something I read a long time ago. I will paraphrase it, but essentially it was to the effect that if you give a man or woman a fish, they will eat it and then it is gone. But if you help a man or woman to learn how to fish they will fish long afterwards. The theory of economic development is that they will then buy nets, hooks and cans from you. Then their economy will eventually hit what economists call the "take-off point", and they will soon join or surpass those of us who live in industrialized democracies.

At a United Nations Congress on crime prevention, of all things, a delegate from what we call the south part of the North-South dialogue said that the greatest crime he could think of was that the industrialized countries—he did not say Canada, but he might have—were out beating the Third World countries for what was, at the time, very scarce oil in the spot markets of the world. I remember feeling very guilty when he said that, because, as Hon. Members will know, Canada has subsidized the consumption of oil in this country in the last few years by about $17 billion. That seems to me—and I am sure it also seems to many other Members—to be an obscenely, unfair way of dealing with countries that have trouble feeding their people or providing oil for their people from the spot markets.

It has been said that Canada lives by trade that accounts for about 30 per cent of our gross national product. I would like to add some other reasons why I support Bill C-130, Mr. Speaker, and these relate to trade. It seems that the new trade policy, which we hope the Government will soon propose, will have a consensus in provincial governments, business, labour, and many other groups across the country. I think it should include the premises which follow.

First, Canada is dependent on international trade and there is the probability that that dependence will continue, if not increase. I suggest that it will probably increase. Second, we should review the strong and weak sectors of our economy and identify foreign trade barriers that constrain the growth in the strong sectors. Third, Canada needs a negotiated and improved access on a multination trade basis, to export markets. Fourth, there is an additional need to negotiate reductions in foreign barriers that constrain the further processing in Canada of resource-based products prior to export. Fifth, the case is strong that the improvement and preservation of that access can best be done on a multilateral trading basis. Sixth, Canada's adjustment process to freer trade is a matter of importance for all levels of government in Canada.

I have with me a book, which I would commend to Hon. Members, entitled "Trade, Inflation, and the Dollar"—

—by Mr. Thibault de Saint Phalle, which was published in 1981 and which I find an excellent review of the present situation.

• (1700)

I would like to summarize some of the points made by Mr. Thibault de Saint Phalle primarily in connection with the United States where he lives, and I would like to apply them to our own country in reference to this Bill. With respect to some of the agencies included in the Bill before us today, his book reads:

> As it has turned out, the activities of the MDBs, have proved beneficial to both the poorer and richer nations. They are criticized, it sometimes seems, only because they have not found a way to help those who are not willing to help themselves. All in all, the creation of the MDBs must surely be considered one of the successful steps taken by the community of nations since the end of World War II to ensure that gradual economic development and an accompanying growth in trade could indeed be accomplished. The MDBs have performed their roles admirably, with few exceptions, ignoring politics in favour of economics and substituting active loan programs in place of empty rhetoric.

He went on to indicate that in his view the expansion of the MDBs, such as the ones about which we are talking today, are essential to the continued development of newly industrialized nations and to the continued expansion of world trade. It is hardly necessary to say that Canada is a prime player in world trade. I simply say, "Amen" to his comments.

To put it another way, the best way to help Canada find new markets for its products would be to encourage countries which have difficulties financing the purchases of products to buy them through credit facilities of institutions with which the Bill deals. I enthusiastically support the concept of these institutions, as should any Canadian interested in the long-term future of the country?

An important point, which cannot be made strongly enough, is that we should increase our exports—and which one of us in this room thinks that the Canadian economy is not strong enough to grow and thrive primarily by increasing our exports—to countries such as India, Indonesia, Brazil, Mexico, Philippines, Korea, Thailand, Colombia, Bangladesh, Yugoslavia—which perhaps is in a different category—Argentina, Morocco, Egypt, Turkey, Pakistan, Kenya, Peru, Malaysia and the Dominican Republic, all of which are prime participants through these various regional development agencies in terms of financing exports from places such as our own country.

Many of the countries which I have just mentioned do not have the cash nor the necessary credit available to purchase Canadian products or the products of other industrialized countries without having an increased ability to finance them through institutions such as the ones included in the Bill. If we do not help these agencies to finance these countries, we will not have the free flow of commerce, which I believe the world very much needs. The expression "trade, not aid" has been used often, but it is more true today than ever before in world history that it is one of the ways the brotherhood of men and women will be realized on this planet.

It was suggested today in the House that these agencies are engaged in redistributing wealth from the so-called rich countries to the poor ones, to the detriment of working men and women in the former. Mr. de Saint Phalle dealt with that notion very well. I should say that this man has spent most of his life dealing with the matter of foreign trade. On the evidence available to him, he indicated that this view could not be supported and that these institutions were not taking advantage of the people in countries providing funds to them, and I agree with him.

One such institution is the InterAmerican Development Bank which was established in 1959 to aid Latin American nations in their development roles. It is true that American influence has been strong—and perhaps excessively strong—in that bank, but it is also true the bank has attempted to ensure that each country in Latin American obtained its share of the pie. Also I would like to say that IDB is directing more and more of its resources toward industrial and infrastructure products. Perhaps some part of the IDB might be merged in the future with the World Bank, but on balance it seems that the IDB has been a success. We are quite rightly proposing to increase our capital funding to the InterAmerican Development Bank.

The next institution to which I would like to refer is the Asian Development Bank. It has 41 members from Asia, Europe and North America. It was created to help Asian countries stabilize their domestic economies so that they might better resist external pressures and bring stability to their areas. Most of its loans are what they call hard loans to develop infrastructure. I think all of us should support that fully. It is a fact of life that Japan, being such a strong economy, would have the strong influence in that bank as it appears to have. That bank is working, and I submit that Canada should support it, as proposed in the Bill.

The third and last institution about which I would like to say a word or two is the African Development Fund which is a concessional lending Affiliate of the African Development Bank. It allows only African nations to be members, but the fund allows non-African countries to be members.

It is true the question can be raised as to whether we should have regional banks such as the ones mentioned in the Bill or whether perhaps it would be better to have a less regional and more world conscious or world-oriented organization, but the reality of the matter is that these regional banks have grown up. It would seem to me that we should try to help them become more effective rather than make them less effective or even terminate some of them.

Since I have essentially said everything I hoped to say, perhaps it would be a very good time to end my remarks. But before doing so, I should like to mention that I feel as strongly as the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) in terms of the amendment we will be moving with respect to Clause 4 which would require Parliament to approve deletions or substitutions to the list of institutions named in the Bill rather than let the Governor in Council do it. I am sure that you will appreciate, Mr. Speaker, that it is Parliament not the Governor in Council that should be doing these things, especially when dealing with the expenditure of taxpayer's money. Apart from that caveat, I strongly urge other Members, both on this side of the House and on the other side, to approve the Bill in short order.

• (1710)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bloomfield): I see the Hon. Member for Lisgar (Mr. Murta) is rising. I am a little lost because my notes indicate that the next speaker is the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly), unless there has been some agreement to the contrary.

Mr. Skelly: There has been a slight change, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Bloomfield): I recognize the Hon. Member for Lisgar.

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Mr. Speaker, I will not take up too much time of the House this afternoon because I understand that when I complete my remarks we may be able to call it six o'clock and be able to head back to our ridings for a very important day tomorrow, it being Remembrance Day.

With respect to Bill C-130, basically what we are dealing with in this legislation are two age old conflicting arguments. They come into very sharp, clear focus at this particular time because of the economic situation in which we find ourselves in Canada. The age old argument which this Parliament has had to grapple with, and I would expect any democratic country in the world has had to grapple with, is whether or not, in our total Government spending, all our money in tough economic times should be spent right here in Canada or whether even in tough economic times part of our money, our Gross National Product, the money generated in the country, should be sent abroad to help those less fortunate than ourselves, those countries that we have targeted for assistance. That debate has gone on for a great length of time. It will continue for longer than many of us who are here today will be around.

How do we meet our double responsibility to this very serious problem? Economically, Canada is in trouble. We have heard other members talk about that this afternoon. We have people living on unemployment insurance benefits. We have people living on welfare. We have people who have problems meeting payments at the end of the month. We have a serious problem with our native people in terms of straight, outright poverty. If Canada has a problem, can you imagine the kind of problem that some of the countries that are considered to be Third World countries have to deal with? That is the other side of the equation. When things are really tough in Canada, they are tough because we are not trading because of the world-wide recession, but they are tougher for other countries in the world.

How do we deal with this particular problem in these very difficult economic times? I support Bill C-130 and its intent. I am happy to say also that my party supports the whole intent of making sure that the international aid that we give to other countries will be maintained and the money will flow into other countries. We should support international development and we should support international aid. First and foremost what I consider to be the most important area is in the non-government organization sector.

As a Member of this House, together with some other Members of Parliament, I have spent the last 18 months carrying out a fairly detailed study into the whole question of Canada's relations with Latin America, the Caribbean and South America. It has been one of the most exhilarating experience I have had in the 12 years that I have been here as a Member of Parliament. This committee was largely nonpartisan. We tried to do a job that Canadians like to see us do, which was to take a non-partisan, objective approach in looking at the problem of Canada's relationship in the area of trade, aid and humanitarianism, in fact, in all of the facets in which Canada interacts with regions that are developing such as South America, Latin America and the Caribbean. We visited such countries as Haiti, Nicaragua, El Salvador, Brazil and Colombia. Canada contributes to international aid and development assistance in these countries. We do so in some cases to a fairly large extent. It is good to be able to stand in the House of Commons and say, for the most part, that that aid is being properly directed. It is reaching its goal, the people to whom it is intended to reach. Obviously it is not always the case, but for the most part it does.

This aid primarily is done through CIDA, our international agency. Canada gets a large measure of benefit from the kind of aid it gives. Canada is viewed as an objective country. In other words, Canada is a country that does not have any axe to grind with most of the countries with which we deal. Canada is viewed as being concerned with human rights. Part of that is attributed to the fact that we deal not in arms or military might or whether countries should do what we think they should do. We are perceived as a country that tries to do things for the good of the people in those countries. Our aid from that point of view is helpful.

In a number of cases the aid we give substantially helps the people to whom it is directed. But it is interesting to note that for the most part the aid that we give is best used when it has gone through non-government organization sectors. I am a firm believer that the best way Canada can provide aid to the developing world is through self-help groups. If I were in charge, I would try to keep the money we spend away from governments at all levels, both ours and the countries with which we deal. I think that is important. If that can be achieved, then the greatest dollar value is gained within the particular country.

If we take a look at the number of people who are starving within the Third World, the most accurate figure or the most up-to-date figure that we have at the present time shows that at least 800 million people are suffering. This situation is getting worse, not better. These figures are rising.

I do not know how we as a Parliament or a country can turn our back on that kind of situation. From a humanitarian point of view alone, we have to participate. We are a country that trades on an international basis. The quid pro quo, if you like, is the fact that if we expect to trade with other countries, we then have to give something in return.

Some Hon. Members have indicated that we are spending too much money on international trade. Of course, I do not agree with that opinion. I think it is wrong. In fact, our total budget for CIDA is down some $245 million. Presently, Canada gives approximately 0.43 per cent of its GNP to our international trade. That is down, and it will probably be down from the long range objectives stated by the Government of approximately 0.5 per cent of our GNP by 1985. We will probably fall short of that objective. I believe that is a crime, which possibly says something about our country. The North-South task force, which, I believe, rightly spent a great deal of time looking into this question, is possibly one of the more authoritative works on the whole question of Canada's aid and trade. That task force discussed the target of approximately 0.75 per cent of our GNP by 1985. We will fall substantially short of that goal. The amount which we give falls short in comparison to what is given by United States and Japan for international aid.

We have a long way to go, Mr. Speaker. Whether we like it or not, there is a new era emerging. Hundreds of millions of people who are disadvantaged in the Third World want greater participation in what is happening in the world. We cannot turn the clock back to the 1950s or the 1960s. We must deal with the 1980s. If the reality that confronts us is the fact that more countries will not be satisfied with what they consider to be the status quo, we will have to change and enter into a more realistic era in the decade of the eighties. This means that while we may suffer problems in our own economic and social situation from time to time, brought on either by poor government policy or a world-wide recession in the developed countries, the flow of money going to the Third World will have to be maintained not only for humanitarian reasons but for self-interest reasons as well. It would be in our self interest to establish links with countries such as South America and Central America because our reputation would be enhanced and our trade made easier. This would make it more beneficial and profitable for all countries concerned.

Therefore, this question of aid is a very important one. At the present time we should be targeting our money toward self-help projects at the grassroots level, which help people directly, and agricultural oriented projects.

When our committee was in Colombia, we spent some time with an organization that I consider one of the better organizations that we have working in various parts of the world. It is the International Development Research Council. It is conducting agricultural based projects throughout the Third World, and certainly throughout Latin America. Canadians are benefiting from that work. Our reputation is being enhanced because Canadians are contributing to that area. That organization is spending its money wisely. As well, we are establishing that self-interest link which I have mentioned.

In conclusion, I would suggest that it would be a folly for us Canadians, regardless from what walk of life, to allow ourselves to become so narrow in our vision that even over the short term we will move toward reducing aid to the Third World. It may be argued that there is never a good time to spend money on a developing country. We could always find a sector of our country which is experiencing difficulties. We can always argue that we should not give further consideration to foreign aid until the next year. Of course this state of affairs would continue and that consideration would never take place.

I recently heard a report on the CBC news which indicated how desperately international aid is needed. It concerns approximately 200 Vietnamese who committed suicide. I wondered how this could happen in today's world. The reason they did this was that the children who were with this particular group in Vietnam would have starved. Therefore, they sacrificed themselves for the children. This same report indicated that there are about 8,000 people in this particular region who will starve to death in a very short time if agricultural and food aid is not sent to that area.

When I was preparing a few notes for this debate I was reflecting on the fact that incidents like these should not be allowed to happen in a world where, for example, North American countries have an abundance of agricultural products. In fact, we have so much that prices are depressed and farmers are in serious trouble. If these incidents do happen, we should strive with all our might and power never to let it happen again. That is the goal we should work toward. We can achieve it by developing a more realistic aid program which will meet, at least in part, the very desperate needs of the Third World.

Mr. Jarvis: Mr. Speaker, because of a personal interest and a riding interest, I wanted to participate in this second reading debate of Bill C-130. I am quite prepared to make that contribution now, or protect my right to do so when the Bill is called before us again. Without suggesting that I speak about form, I believe that your predecessor in the chair indicated that the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) wished to do the same at second reading. I am quite prepared to go ahead. The only problem is that I understand that Members on both sides of the House have a logistics problem. In order to get to their ridings they must be at the airport at or before seven o'clock. I have some reason to believe that there would likely not be strenuous objection if I were to ask that we call it six o'clock.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, that suggestion is agreeable to this side of the House.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It appears there is agreement to calling it six o'clock. In that event, it being six o'clock, pursuant to order made on Wednesday, November 3, 1982, this House stands adjourned until Monday, November 15, at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

[Translation]

I would like to wish a good weekend to everyone!

At 5.30 p.m., the House adjourned, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 43

[English]

MEDICAL CARE

CALL FOR RE-OPENING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL NEGOTIATIONS

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43 on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. Inasmuch as negotiations on the content of the proposed Canada Health Act between the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Miss Bégin) and the provincial Ministers of Health have broken down, and the Minister is now going to recommend unilateral action to the Cabinet, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That this House call upon the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in the spirit of co-operative federalism, to re-open negotiations with the provincial Ministers of Health on the subject of the Canada Health Act.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN DAIRY COMMISSION

SUGGESTED PLACEMENT UNDER TRUSTEESHIP

Mr. Gordon Towers (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, my motion under Standing Order 43 deals with a most serious accusation of alleged irregularities within the Canadian Dairy Commission which has prompted an inquiry by the RCMP. The CDC currently has liabilities of $287.7 million from a drawing account of $300 million, and it annually collects millions in special levies against dairy producers. In view of this RCMP investigation and of the appearance, as witnesses, of senior officials of CDC before the Public Accounts Committee, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That, until the Canadian Dairy Commission is out from under the dark cloud hovering over it, direction of its day-to-day operations be removed from the Minister, and its Chairman, and placed under trusteeship to protect the huge financial investment of the federal Government and the financial contributions of dairy producers across Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

THE PRESS

TRIBUTE TO DECEASED JOURNALISTS

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it was with sadness that we learned on the weekend of the death of two distinguished parliamentary journalists—

[Translation]

—Mr. Jean-Marc Poliquin of the CBC French network, who is mourned by all his colleagues—

[English]

—and Mr. Steve Scott, a long-time reporter with the Canadian Press. I therefor move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That this House pay tribute to the services rendered by Monsieur Poliquin and Mr. Scott.

Madam Speaker: Does the House agree to pay this tribute?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

THE LAW OF THE SEA

PROPOSED SIGNING BY CANADA

Mr. Thomas Siddon (Richmond-South Delta): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that Canada will be sending a high level delegation of Government officials to an exclusive resort in Montego Bay, Jamaica, between December 6 and December 10, where they will sign the Law of the Sea Convention on behalf of Canada, and whereas the Treaty should properly be signed at the United Nations, were it not for the fact that the United States and several other nations have refused to sign the Accord because it establishes a world socialist régime to control sea-bed mining, and given that Canada's position on the Law of the Sea has never been fully debated in the Parliament of Canada, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Carleton-Charlotte (Mr. McCain):

S.O. 43

That, upon the Prime Minister's return from Russia, he immediately cancel the plan to send a delegation of Canadian bureaucrats to a luxurious resort in Jamaica to sign the Law of the Sea Treaty, and that Canada hereby reserves its support for the Treaty until Members of Parliament have had an opportunity to debate thoroughly the implications of the proposed new sea-bed authority in this House.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

MARINE TRANSPORT

SERVICE BETWEEN MAINLAND AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that Atlantic Container Service has terminated its marine container service from the Mainland to Corner Brook and the West Coast of Newfoundland as of November 5 because it cannot compete with the heavily subsidized CN rail service, thereby leaving the West Coast of Newfoundland with only one mode of transportation; and in view of the fact that Atlantic Container Service requested the Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin), by letter of October 4, to grant special emergency assistance and there has been no response; and in view of the fact that the City Council of Corner Brook and other organizations have sought assistance but have received no clarification on the status of the service, or any information from the Minister, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of Transport meet his responsibilities for the provision of adequate transportation services to and from Newfoundland by acting immediately to deal with the requests of Atlantic Container Service and the City Council of Corner Brook, rather than continuing simply to ignore all requests for action or information, and that the Minister report to the House of Commons by November 17 as to what action he has taken or what solutions he has put forward.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

CANCELLATION OF MEDICAL ALLOWANCE REBATES TO EMPLOYEES IN MANITOBA

Mr. Laverne Lewycky (Dauphin): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas CNR and CPR employees have been rebated a medical allowance since their 1971 collective agreement because the Manitoba Government provides universal medical coverage, and considering that both CN and CP have cancelled this rebate as a result of the Manitoba Government's decision to impose a 1.5 per cent levy for health and post-secondary education in the form of a payroll tax, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Minister of Transport request that CN and CP return to their workers the cancelled rebates which amount to some $1.5 million at this time, which they have taken out of the pockets of their own employees.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

PURCHASE OF TORONTO APARTMENTS BY SAUDI ARABIAN INTERESTS

Mr. Jesse P. Flis (Parkdale-High Park): Madam Speaker, I rise to seek the attention of all Members of this House on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that there has been a public outcry in Toronto by the Federation of Metro Tenants Association, Toronto City Council, and by thousands of affected constituents in my riding of Parkdale-High Park against the foreign takeover of Cadillac Fairview apartments which had been initially, supposedly, sold to Greymac Credit Corporation, then to Kilderkin Investments Limited, and fearing that this takeover by some 60 Saudi Arabian investors could lead to outrageously excessive rent increases beyond the 6 per cent guidelines, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Gatineau (Mr. Cousineau):

That FIRA not allow the transaction to take place until a complete investigation is carried out by FIRA, or by a special task force involving the three levels of government, municipal, provincial and federal.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

LABOUR RELATIONS

NORDAIR STRIKE—DEPARTMENT'S POSITION

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth): Madam Speaker, given the fact that Nordair has faced a work stoppage for more than four months, severely disrupting passenger traffic and the economies of many cities on Nordair's routes west of Montreal, and since there appears to be deliberate stalling by Nordair and the Government of Canada on resolving this costly dispute, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That the Minister of Transport make a full statement to this House on the Government's policy of negotiation by starvation in this strike, and admit that his Department has absolutely no intention of getting Nordair's planes back in the skies until the company's employees submit to a merger between Québecair and Nordair.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

EDUCATIONAL ASSISTANCE FOR OFF-RESERVE STUDENTS

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, the withdrawal of educational assistance to off-reserve elementary and secondary school students of treaty Indian status by the Department of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, is clearly most retrogressive and is bound to discourage many treaty Indian children from pursuing their education. Whereas it is clearly the responsibility and duty of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development to encourage Indian children to pursue their education, I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway):

That the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development be directed by this House to exercise his responsibilities and use his ministerial powers to restore educational assistance immediately to off-reserve elementary and secondary school students.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

VIA RAIL

DEMAND FOR RESTORATION OF CANCELLED SERVICES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that today is the first anniversary of the Minister of Transport's Via Rail passenger cutbacks which he predicted would save $100 million annually, and whereas the Supplementary Estimates contain a $134 million increase in subsidy because the cancellations included two of the most popular trains in Canada, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the Minister of Transport restore the train services he abandoned one year ago and apologize to the taxpayers for his $134 million mistake.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

DEMAND FOR STUDY OF FIRE RELATED DEATHS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, on November 5, five young native children died in a house fire on the Deadman's Creek Reserve near Kamloops, B.C. In addition, two children, both under ten years of age, are now in the burn unit of Vancouver General Hospital as a result of this tragic incident. In light of these most recent deaths, and in view of a death by fire rate that far exceeds the national level, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields):

That the Government immediately initiate a region by region study of native fire related deaths with a view towards eliminating the conditions that resulted in this most recent tragedy.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MACDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

COMPOSITION OF MEMBERSHIP

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the Royal Commission that has been established by the Prime Minister in connection with Canada's economic union and future economic course. In the press release issued by the Prime Minister to announce this Royal Commission, he said that the terms of reference of the Commission are "perhaps the most important and far-reaching that have ever been assigned to any commission" in this country. We have been awaiting the announcement of the composition of this Commission, which was to come within ten days of the announcement of the appointment of the Commission itself on November 5.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance if he is now in a position to tell who the other members of this Commission are, or has he not been advised of this? Has he not received any word from Senator Keith Davey or Jim Coutts on who will be the other members of this Commission?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, consultations are practically completed. The announcement should be made soon, but certainly not before the return of the Prime Minister, since the Commission itself, appointed by the Cabinet of Canada, is appointed upon the recommendation of the Prime Minister.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Having spent some days in his constituency during the past short recess, Madam Speaker, the Minister will know that one of the major concerns about the Commission is the question of credibility. It is perceived to be a partisan, political Commission headed by a man who seeks the Liberal leadership.

CHAIRMAN'S DIRECTORSHIPS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, the terms of reference provide that the Commission will look into the appropriate national goals and policies for economic development of our country. Mr. Macdonald is a director of a number of multinational corporations and large Canadian corporations which include Boise Cascade Corp. Ltd., McDonnell Douglas Corp. Ltd., the Bank of Nova Scotia, and other corporations. In order that there will be no perception of conflict of interest in the carrying out of his responsibilities, will the Minister of Finance obtain from Mr. Macdonald his undertaking to resign from these corporate boards, in order for him to be perceived as being independent in his assessments?

• (1420)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I hope when the names of the Commissioners are announced and the Hon. Member sees a few well-known Canadians with strong Conservative affiliations that he will not conclude they have immediate leadership ambitions in the Conservative Party.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Lalonde: I can assure him that the Hon. Member for St. John's West is not on that list, however.

Mr. Crosbie: That's a relief!

Mr. Lalonde: As far as the question itself is concerned, surely my friend should rejoice over the fact that we have a man to head this Commission who has extensive experience, not only in public administration but also one with a good knowledge of the private sector of the Canadian economy. As far as the directorships are concerned, I will certainly raise the issue with the Prime Minister when he returns so that he can raise it with Mr. Macdonald.

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Unlike the Hon. Minister of Finance, we on this side of the House are not desperate for new leadership in our Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hnatyshyn: The Liberals can take this matter as humorous, the economic future of the country, but it is most serious.

PRESENTATION OF RECOMMENDATIONS

Hon. Ray Hnatyshyn (Saskatoon West): Madam Speaker, there were reports over the weekend on the 40 per cent increase in bankruptcies in the country and unprecedented unemployment, with more people on the dole this winter season than ever before in the history of Canada. To use a well-known Conservative statement, the people of Canada do not want to wait for spring; they want to do it now, and they want the Government to do it now.

Will any of the results or recommendations of the Commission be available to the Government before the end of the term of inquiry, that is, three years, because it is apparent to me that the Government is completely bankrupt of any new ideas in terms of economic direction?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I never said that the Conservatives were desperate about their leadership. I only implied that they were terribly scared, and from listening to the Hon. Member this is what I would have to conclude.

I want to tell him that the Royal Commission itself will examine the immediate and long-term prospects of the Canadian economic union. The Government is not waiting for the report of that Commission before taking action to deal with the very serious recession we are experiencing at the present time. The Commission is no substitute for decisions which will have an immediate impact.

I announced a number of decisions in my economic statement of October 27, and subsequently the Minister of Employment and Immigration arrived at agreements with the provinces whereby the provinces will add certainly well over $100 million to the $500 million we are putting into direct job creation. The Hon. Member also knows about the $1.5 billion of direct and indirect job creation which we have in operation at the present time.

The Government is taking appropriate steps; there will be more steps taken in the months to come. The Royal Commission will examine the future of Canada in terms of the economic union and of the future prosperity of the country over the next two decades.

TERMS OF CHAIRMAN'S APPOINTMENT

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Finance. In accepting the chairmanship of the Commission, Donald Macdonald specifically stated that, with the Government's agreement, the option was open to him to resign and run for the leadership of the Liberal Party. In that event, my question is twofold. First, if this is the most important and far reaching Commission in the history of the country, do the people of Canada not have the right to expect that its Chairman will stay and finish the job? Second, how can the Chairman be properly critical of present and past government policies when such criticism would erode confidence in the party which he hopes to lead, and irritate delegates he hopes to attract?

• (1425)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have already indicated to the Hon. Member that I was not aware of any decision to the effect that Mr. Macdonald would not conclude the work of the Commission. I hope this Commission will work speedily and effectively and bring forward a report that will be of benefit to the whole of Canada.

Second, this Commission is not going to spend its time examining the last 50 years. I hope it will spend its time examining the next 20 to 30 years, that it will provide Canada with the framework and plans for action that will be of benefit to the whole of Canada—

Mr. Hnatyshyn: Self-sufficiency by 2020—

Mr. Lalonde: —and that will bring about a better economic union in this country and better prosperity for all Canadians.

QUERY RESPECTING COMMISSION MEMBERSHIP

Mr. Chris Speyer (Cambridge): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance who indicated in a previous answer that he seems to know who the members of this Commission are going to be. I ask the Minister whether or not Ian Stewart is going to be a member of this Commission?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to tell the Hon. Member what the exact composition of the Commission will be.

Mr. Nielsen: Just answer the question.

Mr. Lalonde: As I indicated, the Prime Minister will make recommendations to Cabinet on his return after the consultations have been concluded.

Oral Questions

FOREIGN INVESTMENT REVIEW AGENCY

TORONTO APARTMENTS TAKEOVER—REQUEST FOR INVESTIGATION

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Minister is no doubt aware that, through a series of transactions during the course of the last week, some hundreds of millions of dollars changed hands in Toronto. The end result is that approximately 10 per cent of the rental units available in that city are now owned, or will shortly be owned, by Saudi Arabian investors.

It is very difficult to see what significant benefit will flow to Canada from this takeover. I have looked at all of the criteria set out under FIRA, and I cannot find a single criterion under which this particular transaction will provide a benefit and therefore qualify. Will the Minister order that this transaction be stopped until such time as FIRA has an opportunity to review it?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): I agree with the Hon. Member, Madam Speaker, if the allegations are proved to be correct, as reported in the media this past week, with respect to this transaction or series of transactions. I can tell the Hon. Member at this time that my officials are looking into the situation to see if this case can be reviewed under FIRA.

JURISDICTION OF AGENCY

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, it is quite clear that the transaction is the takeover of a business operating in Canada that provides not only a profit for those who own the shares but also accommodation for tens of thousands of Canadians, many of whom cannot afford to absorb the cost that will be passed through to them as a result of this transaction. What possible question could there be as to whether or not this transaction falls under the terms that caused FIRA to be set up to protect Canadians from unfair takeovers of Canadian industry?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, counsel for some of the participants in the transaction advised us that this transaction was not reviewable under the Act. Consequently, the Minister, under Section 8 of the Act, as I recall, has the power to have the case reviewed if he finds reasonable and probable grounds to have it reviewed. This is a very complex situation and that is why our officials are taking the time, together with officials of the Department of Justice, to look into the situation.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER HALT TAKEOVER

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I go back to the Minister again because it is clear, on the face of it, that there will be significant numbers of Canadians who will be asked to absorb what is now quite clearly an inflated price, the result of some backroom shenanigans undertaken by persons who have for years represented the Tory Party in Ontario.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Miss Jewett: That is why they are not asking any questions.

Mr. Deans: Quite pointedly, in order to assure that those tenants will not be forced to carry that burden, and in order to assure that this kind of thing will not be allowed to happen in other centres in Canada—in Vancouver, in Hamilton, in Montreal and in Ottawa—will the Minister step in and say that this transaction cannot be completed until he has reviewed it? And, upon review, if the facts are borne out as they are presented today, will the Minister stop it?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, if there has been a circumvention of the Ontario Rent Review Act, that is obviously under the jurisdiction of the Province of Ontario, not the Government of Canada. If there is reasonable and probable grounds to have this case reviewed, I will take every step that I can under the law to review it.

MULTICULTURALISM

HANDBOOK ON ETHNIC ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. On November 2 he condemned outright a list of ethnic groups and leaders that was drawn up by the Government of Quebec. He said flatly that the Government of Canada would not engage in such activity. My question, however, arises from a 1974 document called "A Revised Handbook of Selected Ethnic Organizations in Canada", of which I understand the Minister is aware. It contains profiles of a number of ethnic organizations in Canada and, in some cases, it mentions ethnic leaders. In many cases the descriptions are very unflattering, accusing them of being neo-Nazi, of being communist, of being racist, of being extremist, and so on.

• (1430)

Why was this document drawn up? Why was it strictly confidential? For what purpose was it used? Will the minister undertake to have this document released so that groups and individuals who were profiled in it will see how they are viewed by the Government of Canada and will have a chance to respond to the very serious allegations that are made in it?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, as I said at the time I was questioned by, I believe, the Hon. Member for Saint Denis, I had checked with my officials. There was no comparable list to the list put out by the Quebec Minister of Cultural Affairs. That list gave political affiliation in domestic terms, political biases or slants. In some cases it listed criminal backgrounds or activities.

A newsman and a newswoman came to me in the past seven days and brought to my attention a book which was last produced in 1974, that listed organizations, the purpose of the organizations, and a definition of the political goals in the sense of old country politics. The officials who lead my directorate, and I, have been unaware of the book. It has not been in circulation or used, to the best of my knowledge or their knowledge, since 1974. I can hardly answer questions by the Hon. Member on why it was done at that time, except, that upon asking my officials if they could recall—because they did not know of the existence of the book—the explanation given was that, as the multiculturalism directorate focused with the Minister of State, it was important, when people or organizations came forward for funding, to know what the goals of those organizations were. Incidentally, I have ordered the book destroyed although it was quite different from the list prepared in Quebec, as I tried to point out earlier, and my previous answer is quite consistent with my answer today.

DISTRIBUTION OF HANDBOOK

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, included on this limited distribution list, with 52 numbered copies, was the Minister of State for Multiculturalism. I might add as well that individuals are mentioned, such as Mr. Andreas Papandreou, who is the present Prime Minister of Greece and who is described as being the head of an extreme left world-wide political movement. He was in Toronto. The domestic activities of these groups were profiled in these profiles as well. Therefore, the Minister has misinformed the House.

With respect to the distribution list of some 52 numbered copies, why were the Prime Minister's office, the Privy Council office, the I Directorate of the RCMP, which is part of the security wing of the RCMP, the Deputy Minister of Manpower and Immigration, the Eastern European Division of the Department of External Affairs, and the Deputy Solicitor General, included? What use was made of this list?

Did the Minister not even go to the trouble, when he saw that distribution list, to inquire what purpose it was used for and how entitlements to individuals or organizations could be affected, whether it has affected people's rights to enter into Canada, whether it has affected their employment in the Public Service, and whether it has affected funding of these organizations as a result of the very extreme statements that are made in some cases?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I think that the Hon. Member is quite irresponsible in suggesting that there were any judgments on individual personalities in the Canadian political context. It was an identification of political activities in the sense of old country politics, right wing, left wing, and what the source or goal was, if there was a political goal, in the sense of old country politics.

I can hardly answer the questions which the Hon. Member asks since that was clearly seven or eight years before I became Minister. It has not been in circulation. That is the assurance which has been given to me by all of the officials in the Citizenship and Multiculturalism Branch. I did originally seek the assurance of the Solicitor General that no such lists were in use by the Royal Canadian Mounted Police based on ethnicity and political affiliation in Canadian terms, and I was given that assurance.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUNDS FOR HOUSING AND ECONOMIC DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. It concerns the ongoing search for the elusive Western Development Fund. In last November's 1981 budget the Minister of Finance told the House that there was $345 million of the Western Development Fund allocated for native housing and economic development. We heard in the June budget that $85 million of this had been deferred. Could the Minister tell us what is occurring with the remaining $260 million if, in fact, this money is still earmarked for Indian housing and development? When can we expect distribution of these funds?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member is aware, the last announcement was with respect to the Native Economic Development Fund remaining the same, at $343 million, but spread over a longer period of time. The Government commitment for the remaining part of this fiscal year is still in place. When the system has been put in place for its delivery it will be announced in the House.

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ADMINISTRATION

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. Could he tell us who is in charge of this fund at the present time? We hear from the other place that it is the Prime Minister. I cannot understand why the Prime Minister would be in charge of a fund for native housing and economic development.

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, in answer to the Hon. Member, there are several ministries involved. For instance, my own Department is involved because of the responsibility for status Indians. There is the Secretary of State's Department, it being responsible for non-status and Métis people, in the sense that it deals with them as opposed to my Department. There is a business component to this. So there are several Departments involved. That is why the Prime Minister's Office is involved, simply from the point of view of allocating the responsibility either singularly to one Department or to joint departmental responsibility.

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

MICHAEL PITFIELD, C.V.O.

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister, the Minister of Transport. According to the "Court Circular" published in The Times of London on November 10, Mr. Michael Pitfield, Clerk of the Privy Council of Canada, has been received by Her Majesty the Queen of Great Britain. It would appear that Her Majesty has invested Mr. Pitfield with the Insignia of a Commander of the Royal Victorian Order.

Does the acceptance of this award by the Clerk of the Privy Council mean that the Government of Canada has changed the rules prohibiting Canadian citizens from accepting titles from foreign countries; did the Prime Minister and/or the Government give permission to Mr. Pitfield to accept this award from the Queen of Great Britain and, if so, what was the rationale used by the Government to justify this exceptional decision?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Acting Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I am sure that the Secretary of the Privy Council would not violate a law. I do not think that he would violate a convention either. Therefore, in this instance, this is either one of those honours that Canadians are not excluded from receiving, or he has received proper authorization to accept it.

Mr. Clark: From whom?

Mr. Pepin: I will find out from the Prime Minister as soon as he comes back. I am sure that he will deliver a full answer to this question, if asked on Wednesday.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

DEVELOPMENT OF HIGH TECHNOLOGY STRATEGY

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Economic Development. According to a press report this morning, the Minister is working on a high technology strategy. In view of the fact that our research and development in Canada is among the lowest in developed countries and that we have serious unemployment problems, what specific advanced technology strategy is the Government proposing to increase our research and development in Canada to at least the level of other industrialized countries?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, it is true that my colleagues and I are working on a technology strategy for Canada. We have been doing so for some time and we will continue to do so. When recommendations are brought forth and adopted by Cabinet, announcements will then be made at that time.

I would point out to the Hon. Member that industrial R and D increased by 26 per cent in 1982. I would hope that our strategy will be able to build and reinforce that success.

Mr. Nystrom: Surely the Minister can give us some idea of when we can have that report made public, because of the tremendous unemployment and the need for some kind of strategy for where we are heading.

CANADIAN OWNERSHIP, CONTENT AND CONTROL

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question arises from the fact that many of the key sectors of our economy are foreign owned and there is very little product innovation in these areas. Can the Minister answer a specific question as to what strategy the Government is planning in terms of increasing Canadian ownership and content and control in the advanced technology area? How does he reconcile this with the Government's recent retreat on FIRA?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any retreat from FIRA. Perhaps that question might more appropriately be addressed to my colleague, the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

As I mentioned a moment ago, we are working on a high technology strategy. Clearly, the Government has been very committed to a policy in this domain for many years. We are building upon the successes of the past. I have no announcements to make specifically today until my colleagues accept the recommendations that we will be bringing forward. An appropriate announcement will be made then.

EMPLOYMENT

FUNDING FOR CANADA COMMUNITY DEVELOPMENT PROJECTS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. He is in danger of creating a situation where we have potential jobs but no money to fund them and, on the other hand, he has job creation funds but no jobs in place. We are in the ridiculous position of having to lay off workers in some cases in order to hire other people. For instance, in my riding of Vancouver Centre I have $3 million worth of job applications under the Canadian Community Development Program and only $200,000 in available funds. At the same time the regional office will be receiving millions of dollars of job creation funds, but no qualifying job applications to fund. The suggestion I have made to the Minister is that if he is really concerned about having jobs funded immediately, why does he not fund more of the Canada Community Development Program job applications which we have on hand, rather than wait two or three months until we have new make-work programs in place.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, in trying to follow the somewhat tortuous syntax of the Hon. Member, I think she is saying that she believes, job applications which have come under the Canada Community Development Program might be eligible for funding under NEED. Certainly, if a community has developed a useful project, then such projects are eligible for funding under the NEED Program. They can be entertained under that particular Program, provided they meet the criteria that we set forth.

However, I want to point out to the Hon. Member that, in addition to the money whichg has been allocated at the constituency level in a variety of areas across Canada, including the City of Vancouver, a special allotment has also been set aside for CCDP under the special response features. I believe $2 million has been allocated in the case of Vancouver. She would be working with other Members of Parliament in the area to determine an allocation. Therefore, additional money is being directed under that Program between now and Christmas which will help to deal with some of the additional applications she has received.

Miss Carney: If my syntax is tortuous, it is because it is his Department which has brought in the CCDP program, the SRF program, the Special Response Program, the needy NEED Program, and all these fancy acronyms. What we want is money for jobs that people can work at now, not money for jobs that they can work at in the spring, and I am sorry that the Minister is unable to respond to that reality.

LOCAL ADVISORY BOARDS

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question deals with local advisory boards. In this last program, the Minister has abandoned the concept of local advisory boards helping to sort out some of these applications. The advantage to every M.P. in having the power to set up local advisory boards would be that they could draw on all the resources of their commuinities. Therefore, at a time when we must stretch every dollar until it squeaks, why has the Minister abandoned the use of local advisory boards which are important community resources?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I greatly appreciate the fact that the Hon. Member both recognizes and applauds the various job creation efforts we have undertaken. The question that she raises, however, is why we did not have local advisory boards. That was purely the option of local Members of Parliament. If they wanted to establish local advisory boards to give them advice on job creation efforts, it was within their power to do so. However, what we did say was that we would not pay the extra costs because, frankly, we wanted to put that money toward creating jobs, to help people, which is what we have done.

HOUSING

REQUEST THAT MINISTER ACT TO PROTECT TORONTO TENANTS

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed toward the Minister of Public Works, who is also responsible for housing. The question pertains to the takeover by Saudi Arabian interests of some 11,000 rental housing units in Metropolitan Toronto. It is a matter which has been occurring for the last number of weeks, and there is indeed great danger of there being other such examples. Can the Minister tell us what consideration he has given to the matter and whether or not he is willing to make some intervention to protect the interests of tenants in Metropolitan Toronto?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, obviously I would not try to pre-empt the very important and key role of the provincial government in this issue. On the other hand, I recognize that there is a very serious potential for disruption of rental patterns there and in other parts of the country, if this example is followed. For this reason I have asked officials of CMHC to consider the matter immediately, including the involvement of the Corporation, if any. My preliminary information is that it is a very limited involvement and would appear to be in the field of limited dividend projects, and very limited. The rest of the information concerns how the Corporation sees this and what advice it would give me. I hope to have information from the Corporation very soon. I recognize this as a potentially serious problem.

FUNDING FOR CO-OP HOUSING

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Minister understands that one of the reasons we are being taken over by foreign interests and, indeed, why there is a continuing problem, is because the vacancy rate is about .41 per cent in Metropolitan Toronto. Therefore it makes us sitting ducks for takeover. Surely one of the responsibilities of the federal Government is to create an investment environment for housing which would allow us to ease the vacancy rate. Therefore, I would like to ask the Minister two specific questions. First, is he willing to provide more financial opportunity for the construction of co-op housing? Second, will he meet with the provincial minister, concerning that matter and other housing matters, in order to deal with the problem on a long term basis, so that we will not be running into it again?

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works): Madam Speaker, I recognize that Toronto has one of the tight markets in the country, although a look at the arithmetic indicates that in the rental unit plans which were granted over the last year, Toronto has fared quite well. That having been said, however, I recognize the difficulty and I hope to meet with the Ontario Minister of Housing very soon.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

PROPOSALS FOR HIGH TECHNOLOGY STRATEGY

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of State for Economic and Regional Development a question arising out of the matter which he addressed just a few moments ago with respect to high technology. A newspaper report indicates that one federal official has characterized the documents as containing nothing terribly new, in that they do not incorporate measures to promote venture capital, export marketing and corporate structures, which, if such is the case, indicates that there is nothing new in the proposals, at least those seen by the journalist. Would the Minister indicate what his proposals do contain, in broad terms, aside from the usual method of throwing money at the problem, and whether or not those three items which I have mentioned are included for discussion with his Cabinet colleagues?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I will not comment upon a leaked document. I may have seen the specific document, but I am not aware of which specific document the journalist may or may not have been perusing. There are a number of documents in the system with respect to high technology, obviously, arising from many sources. The proposals which I will bring forward to my Cabinet colleagues have not yet reached the Cabinet. After they have been brought forward and after they have been discussed, and if they are adopted, then appropriate announcements will be made by Ministers responsible.

REQUEST THAT DISCUSSION PAPER BE TABLED

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, the Minister obviously does not know the answer today, but would he check to see whether, among any of the documents to which he is referring, there is a discussion paper, in the full meaning of that term? If there is, would he see that that document is tabled in the House of Commons in accordance with the freedom of information legislation which his Government has so recently embraced?

Hon. Donald J. Johnston (Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I am not aware of any discussion papers which are to be tabled in the House of Commons before they are considered by Cabinet. I migth say that I appreciate the interest of the Hon. Member representing Nepean-Carleton, because it is clear that Ottawa is one of the areas which has benefited greatly from the technological strategy of the Government in the past.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Johnston: As I mentioned a short time ago, the strategy that we intend to bring forward will build upon and reinforce the kind of success which Ottawa itself has enjoyed.

INDIAN AFFAIRS

FUNDING FOR CONNE RIVER INDIANS IN NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development. As of last week there has been a complete breakdown in negotiations with the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador over federal moneys voted for the unregistered Indians of that province. Considering that all band services and programs for the Micmacs of Conne River have now been cut off, can the Minister tell the House how he plans to fulfil his earlier commitment that, if necessary, he would take unilateral action to ensure that the Conne River Indians have the necessary funding?

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I would advise the Hon. Member that I did meet with the Indian leaders from Conne River approximately a week ago. I indicated to them that I could go through with an agreement with the Province of Newfoundland. The terms of the agreement would be such that the money due to them, or a good deal of it, would start to flow as stipulated under the agreement. They quite clearly indicated that the terms of the agreement as insisted upon by the Province of Newfoundland were not satisfactory to them. They were in contravention of the understanding reached between the federal Government and the Province and were prejudicial to the Indian communities, and they would not accept the money under those circumstances. I therefore do not see any point in pursuing that avenue any further and, as a result, I am going to my Cabinet colleagues for a determination on what further course to take. Of course the other option, if we do not flow the money through that agreement, is by doing it unilaterally, as the Hon. Member suggests.

REGISTRATION OF CONNE RIVER BAND

Mr. Jim Manly (Cowichan-Malahat-The Islands): Madam Speaker, this problem has been dragging on for several months and the people of the Conne River Band are in desperate straits. In view of the continuing difficulties with the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, involving the transfer of these funds, is the Minister now prepared to proceed with registration of the Conne River Band so that funds can be provided directly to them as they are to other Indian people across the country?

• (1450)

Hon. John C. Munro (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, that aspect of the matter, as the Hon. Member may be aware, is before the courts and of course, therefore, I am precluded from commenting on it.

CORPORATE AFFAIRS

INVESTIGATION OF CANADIAN JAVELIN LIMITED

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. The Minister will know that there is an investigation by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission into the firm known as Canadian Javelin Limited, a federally-incorporated company, and into the activities of John C. Doyle who is the dominant shareholder in that company, and who has had control of it for some 20 to 25 years.

Would the Minister explain to the House why he has directed the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to send a commission to take evidence in Panama from Mr. John C. Doyle in connection with their investigation, when Mr. John C. Doyle refuses to come to Ottawa to give testimony to the inquiry; and particularly in view of the fact that he is a fugitive from justice in Canada who is on bail, charged with very serious offences in Newfoundland in 1972, in connection with federal laws? He left the country after putting up bail, and refused to return. He is also a fugitive from justice in the United States. Why is the Minister giving this fugitive from justice these kinds of facilities to give his evidence to a Canadian agency, when he should be required to come to Ottawa to give evidence, the same as everyone else?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is unfortunate that the Hon. Member should need such a long preamble for a single question, namely, whether or not there is going to be a rogatory commission in Panama. The rest is merely the Hon. Member's own interpretation and personal opinion. I can inform the House that, at the request of Mr. Balestreri, whose conduct is being investigated by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission, this gentleman's lawyers have asked for a rogatory commission, alleging that Mr. Doyle's refusal to come to Canada would deprive Mr. Balestreri of a full and complete defence and that he had reason to believe that if there were a rogatory commission in Panama, Mr. Doyle would agree to be questioned by the commission and would testify in Panama. Thus, the Department of Justice decided that in order to protect Mr. Balestreri's right to a full and complete defence, a rogatory commission could take evidence in Panama.

[English]

REASONS FOR SENDING COMMISSION TO PANAMA

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I want to remind the Minister that there are no charges and there is no trial. There is an investigation by the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission into the affairs of Canadian Javelin Limited, not of Mr. Balestreri nor of Mr. John C. Doyle, nor anyone else.

My question to the Minister is this. Why is this special arrangement and facility being given to Mr. John Christopher Doyle, who refuses to come to this country? No law bars him from entering this country, but, if he returns to this country, he will have to face trial on serious fraud charges in connection with that company.

Why then is the Minister going out of his way by an act of discretion to order the Restrictive Trade Practices Commission to send people to Panama to take his evidence, when that gentleman should be coming to Canada to give his evidence, if he has evidence to give? He is not the accused; there is no trial; there is an investigation ordered by the Minister's predecessor. Why is he taking this unusual step to facilitate a fugitive from justice in Canada?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): I think the Hon. Member may not have understood my answer. I will repeat it, and I hope this time he will understand.

We did not authorize this procedure for the benefit of Mr. Doyle, since it has nothing to do with his status. We are responding in the affirmative to a request submitted by Mr. Balestreri's lawyers, and the decision was made after consultation with representatives of the Department of Justice, to find out whether it was customary to authorize a rogatory commission in these circumstances. Now, of course, the question is whether or not there will be a rogatory commission, and the Hon. Member is asking a hypothetical question, since in any case, it is not certain that a rogatory commission will sit in Panama.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL OF LIFE INSURANCE TAX

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance who has very properly seen fit to do away with many of the ill-conceived tax changes that were brought in by his predecessor in the budget of November 12 last year. He has corrected a number of them, but he has not gone far enough. I would ask the magnanimous Minister if he would take another step in that direction and withdraw the regressive and unfair tax that his misguided colleague imposed on whole life insurance which is used for investment purposes.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I have had meetings, as a matter of fact this morning, with the Life Insurance Association. My colleague, the Minister of State for Finance, has had extensive discussions with representatives of the insurance industry. I have indicated that I intend to table a draft bill sometime in December, which I hope will be the subject of discussion. The Hon. Member will have an opportunity then to examine what conclusions I will have reached on the numerous points having to do with the taxation of insurance policies.

Miss MacDonald: The Minister has done a very nice job of dancing around the subject, but he has not answered my question. What I would like to know is whether or not he will withdraw this regressive tax. Surely he realizes that it hurts people; surely he realizes that it prevents them from planning for their retirement years.

I ask him this question. Does he not realize that what this tax measure does is make people more, not less, dependent on government in their retirement years?

[Translation]

Mr. Lalonde: Madam Speaker, I heard every word of the Hon. Member's comments and her recommendations in support of her point of view. I informed her that the matter was now being examined within my department and with my colleague, the Minister of State for Finance. As soon as my conclusions have been finalized, I shall be glad to address these to the Hon. Member and to her colleagues in the House, when I introduce draft legislation for consideration. However, I may remind the Hon. Member that our taxation system cannot afford to provide exclusive privileges for certain financial or savings instruments, which is the issue I am examining at the present time, and I soon hope to conclude consideration of this matter.

MACDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

REQUEST THAT REPORTING DATE BE ADVANCED

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): Madam Speaker, in order to remove the studies and conclusions of the Royal Commission on the Economy from Fantasyland and the Land of the Never-never, particularly in view of the serious economic situation confronting the country, including the highest unemployment since the Great Depression, can the Government accelerate the reporting date of the Commission from its present three-year period to 18 months, so that the report will address itself to conclusions that will have some relevance to the economic situation that confronts us today, and in the solution of current problems?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I believe that the Chairman of the Commission has indicated that he hoped to have the report concluded well within the mandate. As a matter of fact I think I read somewhere he indicated he hoped to have the report ready within two years, so that is pretty close to the figure mentioned by the Hon. Member.

I want to point out that the Government is not going to wait for the report of the Commission to take steps. We have already taken steps on October 27 and we will continue to take steps to attack the present situation that we are facing. The Commission, as I indicated, is going to study the medium and long-term problems that the country is facing in the economic field.

In the meantime we have indicated that the Government is ready to assume the leadership required in the current difficult circumstances, and will continue to do so in the months to come.

• (1500)

POSSIBLE FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Hon. Erik Nielsen (Yukon): As a supplementary question, at least can the Government assure us that this Commission of doubtful usefulness will be appointed before Christmas? If it is appointed before Christmas, can the Government say whether the Chairman, Mr. MacDonald, will be convening a conference of the First Ministers, which has so long been refused by this Government, to discuss the financial problems of the country?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): I indicated, surely, that the full membership of the Commission would be known soon, well before Christmas. As far as a conference of First Ministers is concerned, obviously, it would be a matter for the Prime Minister to call, not for the Chairman of the Royal Commission, even if it is "Royal".

THE LATE HON. HUGUES LAPOINTE

TRIBUTES TO FORMER LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF QUEBEC

Hon. J. Gilles Lamontagne (Minister of National Defence): Madam Speaker, with your permission, on behalf of the Government of Canada I would like to rise on a point of order to place on record our feelings at the news of the death over the weekend of the former Lieutenant-Governor of the Province of Quebec, the Hon. Hugues Lapointe.

[Translation]

I am very proud, and I trust the House will allow me a few minutes, to pay tribute to a man who served his country with great distinction in a number of impressive functions. His military career, like that of thousands of other Canadians—he served overseas with the Chaudière Regiment—was a symbol of the great respect he had for traditional values, and he was driven by the will to defend the rights and freedoms Canadians have acquired in the course of our short but eventful history. As a young man, he saw politics as a challenge and never hesitated to defend his ideals. He was a worthy representative of all Canadians and was proud to represent his fellow Canadians from Quebec. In his riding of Lotbinière, he was both respected and loved for his innate understanding of the democratic way of doing things and for his readiness to share in the joys and sorrows, the successes and disappointments of others. He served with valor as a soldier and with integrity as an elected representative. He was a competent minister and a Canadian in every sense of the word, at all times.

We shall remember him as we remember so many other Canadians who never lost confidence in the future of this great country and thought it worthwhile to defend it in every way.

[English]

To his family and friends, on behalf of all Quebecers and all Canadians, I extend the heartfelt wishes of this House. Hugues Lapointe will be greatly missed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the members of the Official Opposition, I wish to join the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) and the Government in offering my sincerest condolences to the wife and family of Mr. Lapointe.

Mr. Hughes Lapointe was a great Canadian and a distinguished Quebecer. He started his impressive political career when he was first elected in the riding of Lotbinière. Later he was appointed Solicitor General, Minister of Veterans Affairs and Postmaster General under Prime Minister St-Laurent. His participation in federal politics came to an end when he was defeated in 1957, but after leaving the federal scene, in 1966 he was appointed Lieutenant-Governor of Quebec a position he occupied for an unprecedented twelve years. His reputation as a man who has served his country with distinction is an honour to his family and to his native province.

Our sincerest sympathy goes out to his wife, his family and his friends.

[English]

Hon. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Madam Speaker, may I say that those of us formerly of the CCF, and more recently of the NDP, are also happy to join in the tribute to our friend on this occasion. I happened to have the privilege of knowing Hugues Lapointe when he first came to Parliament about 40 years ago. After that, he served the country in many ways in the Government of the day. In due course he became the Lieutenant Governor of his province. We are happy to recall the service which this man rendered to this country over the years and to join today in this tribute to him.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, before answering questions on the Order Paper, there is a matter relating to House business of which I would like to advise the House, and that is a change in the business for tomorrow. I have already advised both Opposition Parties, but for the record there will be a change from the business indicated by the Government House Leader on November 10; the first item of business tomorrow will be second reading of Bill C-130. The balance will be as set out by the Government House Leader in his statement on November 10.

Mr. Nielsen: On the House business, Madam Speaker, I am surprised that the Parliamentary Secretary at this last minute would be changing the business of the House from that which was set forth last week. He has now said we will be proceeding with Bill C-130 instead of Bill C-90, which was the plan. I would like to know why that change has come about. This is very short notice.

Second, he has not yet made it clear that if we proceed with Bill C-130 tomorrow, will it be followed by Bill C-90 or Bill C-85 or Bill C-131? Would he please outline the business so we have some idea what we are dealing with tomorrow, instead of all this vagueness? I would like an explanation as to why this last-minute change.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not believe my comments were vague at all. I said the sequence of events would be as set out by the Government House Leader in a statement to the House on November 10, and that is the case. The sequence which he set out was Bill C-90, Bill C-85 and Bill C-131. Following second reading of Bill C-130 that would be the sequence of business dealt with by the Government. As to why, it is not necessary for the Government to give explanations as to the order of business. That is something which falls within the purview of the Government as set out in Standing Order 18(2):

Government Orders shall be called and considered in such sequence as the government determines.

What I have tried to do is give Hon. Members opposite the courtesy of being advised at the earliest possible opportunity, and I have done exactly that.

Mr. Nielsen: I take it, then, it is confirmed that tomorrow we will be dealing first with Bill C-130. Following that, if Bill C-130 is completed tomorrow at second reading, we will then proceed to Bill C-90. Following Bill C-90, if completed, we will proceed to Bill C-85; and if that is completed, we will proceed to Bill C-131. If there is any doubt about that—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: If the yappers to my left would keep quiet.

An Hon. Member: It's the Liberal Party West.

Mr. Nielsen: If there is any doubt about that, I wish the Parliamentary Secretary would correct that impression. With respect to explanations, I suggest, Madam Speaker, there are no explanations except one—that the Government was afraid to have a vote on that measure tomorrow.

• (1510)

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, the sequence is as I set out the first time, the second time, and I will now confirm it for the Opposition House Leader for the third time. I am delighted he finally got it on the third try.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 2,932 and 4,386.

[Text]

CATERING AND HOUSEKEEPING SERVICES

Question No. 2,932—Mr. Clarke:

With reference to the Professional and Special Services recorded by the Department of National Revenue under the Customs and Excise Program at page 32.23, Volume II of the 1979-80 Public Accounts of Canada, with particular reference to Catering and Housekeeping Services (a) how does the Department account for the increase in expenditure for the item over that for 1978-79 (b) for what reason does the Department require these services?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): (a) There were no expenditures reported, under the category of "Catering and Housekeeping Services", by this Department in the 1978-79 Public Accounts.

When the Department embarked on its Central Training Program it did not possess a residence for employees who participated in college programs and thus participants were lodged and obtained their meals from commercial establishments. As travel expenses, these costs were charged to the travel budget and as such were not reported in the Public Accounts as a separate item.

In February 1979, the Department moved its training program to the Heron Road training facilities where a residence was available and students obtained their meals on the campus. Public Works Canada administered a contract for maid and catering services and this Department used the same contractor for provision of these services.

(b) The Department operates a centrally located college for training of its Customs Inspectors, Excise Officers, and other departmental employees.

HEALTH OF GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES IN INUVIK REGION

Question No. 4,386—Mr. Nickerson:

Did Mr. Neil Taylor, Mental Health co-ordinator at the Inuvik General Hospital, tell the 1982 Annual Conference of the Canadian Public Health Association that 179 out of the 584 government employees in the Inuvik Region had received psychotherapy during the preceding twelve-month period and, if so, is the Secretary of State, as Minister responsible for the Public Service Commission, satisfied that public services are being properly rendered when 30 per cent of the staff in a particular region are suffering from marital problems, alcohol or drug abuse, anxiety, manic depression or paranoia and, if not, what action does he intend to take?

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Under the PSEA, the PSC is responsible for the recruitment and referral of potential candidates for vacancies in government departments. It is the department's responsibility to select and appoint employees and to assess the performance of employees against expected results such as services to the public.

Should there be a necessity to release an employee from the Public Service as a result of that employee becoming incompetent or incapable of performing the duties of his or her position, it is the responsibility of the Department to make such an assessment and recommend release action to the Commission. The Commission will then make a decision on such a recommendation depending on whether the employee appeals the recommendation, and if that option is chosen, on the nature of the appeal board's findings.

Consequently, in order to ascertain the quality of public services in the Inuvik area, the responsible Departments are in a better position to comment. The PSC has, however, contacted two Departments, with large operations in Inuvik, namely MOT and NHW. Both Departments commented that staff problems were not worse in Inuvik than in other northern locations. Inuvik being a larger centre, it offered better facilities and services than most northern sites. However, NHW mentioned that its turnover rate was relatively high which they felt reflected the "transient nature" of the area, brought about by the number of workers seeking employment or actually employed with the Beaufort Sea and Norman Wells drilling projects. Inuvik serves as the base centre for Arctic explorations.

Both Departments claimed to have no special employee assistance programs in Inuvik to provide counselling to employees with personal problems.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 58—INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

Hon. Sinclair Stevens (York-Peel) moved:

That this House condemns the Government for its failure to introduce its promised comprehensive industrial strategy to rebuild the Canadian economy in the 1980's and for its failure to produce specific strategies to harness the potential of Canadian industry, to promote the advantageous utilization of Canada's human and natural resources, to increase exports of Canadian manufactured goods, and to provide incentives for training opportunities and to the private sector for new, and increased levels of research and development in Canada.

He said: Madam Speaker, in rising to speak to the motion now before the House, I do so with an unexpected assist from today's Globe and Mail which has extensive references to this subject. I refer, of course, to the fact that we find a leaked story on page B1 of The Globe and Mail setting out that: "Industrial strategy begins with talks".

I mention this because I think it is interesting that the first point we make in our motion is to condemn the Government for its failure to introduce its promised comprehensive industrial strategy to rebuild the Canadian economy in the 1980s. We are dead on, Mr. Speaker, because here we have a report in today's Globe and Mail setting out that the talks with respect to an industrial strategy are going to begin in November, 1982 at a time when there is no one in this country with any uncertainty in their minds concerning the inadequancy of this Government's programs to get our country prosperous again. In short, I am saying that this motion, on its first point, has to be one which most Members of this House will agree with because this Government has no industrial strategy, by its own admission. In fact, if one believes the report in The Globe and Mail, the Government is only beginning to talk today about an industrial strategy for the 1980s, notwithstanding the fact that almost 20 per cent of this decade is already behind us.

In our motion today, Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that certainly myself and most of our speakers are going to dwell on the positive aspects of what can be done to get Canada moving once again. I say that because I think most Canadians feel a great sense of frustration with the fact that they know we can do better, but they sense, for reasons they cannot clearly perceive, that we are failing to increase our national wealth, the real growth of our economy, that in fact we are poorer today on an average basis than we were six or seven years ago. I dwell on that, Mr. Speaker, because I think we must never forget that Canadians are a very inventive people. Historically we have shown that, given the proper atmosphere, the proper break if you like, we can be among the world's leaders in inventions.

On that point, if I may, I would like to just remind Members of some of the things which have been invented in Canada. For example, back in 1857 James Miller Williams brought in the first commercial oil well in North America at Oil Springs near Sarnia. I was thinking just last week, when that fact was drawn to my attention once again, what a strange transition we have here. In the last century, in 1857, Canada was a pioneer in bringing in commercial oil wells in North America. A Canadian was the first.

Today we have a Government which devotes its efforts in the oil and gas field to bringing in a National Energy Program which is generally credited with hamstringing that industry in this country. Not only has the Government brought in such a program to hamstring other sectors of the energy field, but it has, of course, introduced us to a thing called Petro-Canada. That company has now cost us some $3 billion, Mr. Speaker. I am going to touch on that later because I would like us all to consider what that $3 billion could have been used for other than simply buying out the oil and gas interests of foreign concerns in Canada, a buy-out which did not create one more barrel of oil, one new invention, or add one nickel to the wealth of this country.

Let me go on, though, to touch on some of the great inventions which Canada has had over the years. I do not have to remind the House that 1874 was the year Dr. Alexander Graham Bell invented the principle of the telephone in Brantford, Ontario, and we now find that Canada in truth is one of the pioneers with regard to communication, especially telephone communication, around the world. In 1884, almost 100 years ago, we find that Sir Sandford Fleming invented standard time. It was subsequently adopted by all the railways in North America and became the standard around the world as far as timekeeping is concerned. In 1887 we have Sir William Osler, who at the age of 39 was chosen to head the medical school at the newly-formed John Hopkins University in the United States. He is generally credited with having revolutionalized the treatment of patients in hospitals, not just in Canada or North America, but throughout the world. Given the chance, Mr. Speaker, this is the type of innovative and inventive person we have had in Canada over the decades Canada has been in existence.

As you know, three types of sports all began or were invented in Canada. Basketball, football and hockey all started in this country. We find, for example, that Sir Frederick Banting, who discovered the beneficial effects of insulin on diabetes, was given a Nobel prize for his invention and was also generally regarded as one of the greatest medical achievers of our century. Sir Charles Saunders, back in 1904, developed the Marquis strain of wheat, and later developed the Ruby, Garnet and Reward strains of wheat which were very suitable to Canadian prairie conditions. On his death a London newspaper said that he contributed more to the wealth of this country than any other man.

In short, Mr. Speaker, we have a list of people who in past years have been inventive, who have brought, if you like, real wealth to Canada, second to none in the world. Then, Mr. Speaker, at a time when the world economy is still flourishing, still prospering, why do we find that we are lagging? Why has the spark for research and development in this country started to lag? Why do we now find that, rather than keeping up with world trade, we are falling behind?

There may be some on the Government side who will say "Show us why we are falling behind". In anticipation of that, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer them to the fourth Report of the Special Committee on the National Trading Corporation which was presented to this House and sets out the exact position that Canada is in today with respect to world trade. I mention this because I think it is interesting to read the morning press and find that we are still talking about having further discussions concerning what we might do to turn trade around to our advantage in Canada.

The time for talking has ended. We know what the problems are and we know what some of the solutions are. It is time for the Government to have the courage to put in place a program that will start rebuilding Canada, especially with respect to our manufacturing and trade position for the 1980s. I say this because the Special Committee stated that it met with 450 witnesses in Canada and nine other countries. In other words, Mr. Speaker, it heard from people in ten countries, including Canada. It held 270 meetings. It presented an extensive report that, first of all, dramatizes what it believes is the true nature of our deficit in world trade and then it offers solutions.

With that kind of background—the background that I will refer to shortly that the Science Council of Canada has been giving to the Government day after day and year after year—why does the Government have to tell us it is still time to have discussions and hear from more people? It is time for decision, Mr. Speaker. We do not need more discussion and bafflegab from the Government.

On page 3 of its report the Special Committee stated:

> —trade deficit in the end product category, which in 1980 accounted for a staggering trade imbalance of $18 billion.

It goes on to point out that the share of total world trade Canada enjoyed in 1972 was 4.9 per cent and that by 1980 that percentage had fallen to 3.2 per cent.

I would remind Hon. Members that this is not some outside think-tank group which is speculating about the facts; it is a Special Committee of this House that pointed out that our trade in manufactured products has fallen so far behind that we now have a deficit of $18 billion, and only 3.2 per cent of total world trade compared to 4.9 per cent in 1972.

On page 5 the report goes on to say:

> Between 1969 and 1979 Canada suffered a 33 per cent decline in its overall share of world exports. This performance was the worst among industrialized countries during this period. Nor do we fare any better in comparisons with the major developing countries. In the period 1969-79, Canada's average annual export growth rate was 15.1 per cent; the developing countries averaged 23.1 per cent. Canada pays a very high price for this lost market share—a price that this country can no longer afford.

The report goes on to mention that if one uses the assumptions it has been able to come up with in its research data, $8 billion to $12 billion of opportunity in additional exports is being lost to Canadians at the present time. It also points out that if foreign sales could be improved by only 10 per cent on average, that would mean Canadians would have an additional $6 billion in sales of manufactured goods, creating new customers around the world. But here is the crunch, Mr. Speaker. Having demonstrated the imbalance, especially in end-products trade, the report goes on to say:

> Exports also have the potential to increase employment. At present, small and medium business account for 70 per cent of all manufacturing jobs; efforts that result in more sales will add impressively to employment totals. Committee research indicates that $1 billion in additional exports can generate 42,700 jobs. Thus, the export potential we identify could mean somewhere between 300,000 and 500,000 additional jobs for Canadians.

I should like to stress that this is the first point that we hope to make today. It is not just a question of statistics; it is Canadian jobs that we are talking about. If we can do a better job of exporting to world markets, then the employment situation in this country is bound to improve. Before we can do that, we have to accept some of the harsh realities, however. For example, we have allowed ourselves, largely through the efforts of this Government, to drift into a position where today we are taxed on average, 20 per cent higher in Canada than are our cousins in the United States. That is a load that Canadians must carry, be they in business or the employees of those businesses, that our cousins do not have to cover when they are getting ready to compete with us in world markets.

Compared to our main trading partner, the United States, we have a deficit on a per capita basis which is twice the size of theirs. Oddly enough, in the United States the government is worried about the deficit, while in Canada we have a Government that tries to rationalize the deficit that is a burden on every Canadian, not just on those living today, but on future generations as well.

Is it not odd, in this connection, that we have a Government so totally out of step that it sends the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Regan) to the United States to sell, as he says, "not goods, but goodwill"? It is not goodwill that we should primarily be trying to export to the United States, Mr. Speaker, but goods. If we can sell the Americans more Canadian-made goods, presumably the goodwill is there, else they would not buy.

While the Minister of State for International Trade is in the United States selling, not goods but goodwill, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) is in France seeing the only remaining socialist government that he can make friends with, among major countries, on the basis that he wants to have an alternative deal to counteract the United States market in North America. Talk about spitting and sucking at the same time, Mr. Speaker. One Minister goes to the United States saying "let's have goodwill, let's do more business with you," while the Prime Minister goes to socialist France to try to curry favour with his only remaining friend among the Big Seven, the only socialist government he can find to talk to.

Let me go back, Mr. Speaker. Having this high deficit, this high taxation phenomenon in Canada, is it any wonder that we now find that we have the highest unemployment level of any of the major industrial nations and almost double the level of inflation that they are currently experiencing in the United States or in the United Kingdom? The short answer is that the 15-year program that this NDP-Liberal Government alliance has thrust on the Canadian economy has not worked.

The golden rule which we in the House can accept when we are looking for a new direction is that the socialist model has not worked and certainly will not work in the future. I say this because I believe we must come to grips with the real problem facing Canada today. We must allow the free enterprise system, the private sector, once again to get on with the job of creating wealth in the country and leave it to government to decide how, if necessary, it wants to redistribute that wealth. Also we must ensure that government, instead of intervening more, will intervene less as far as the economy is concerned.

I say this on three levels. First, if this Government wants to map out a new industrial strategy for Canada, it should deregulate rather than regulate further and generally have less control of the private sector than has been the experience over the past ten to 15 years. Second, it should consider less government spending, less give-aways and less bail-outs than has been its custom over that ten to 15 year period, encouraged as it has been by the socialists to our left. Finally, it must reharness the personal initiative and inventive spirit in Canada and give Canadians a chance to be free once again to participate in the prosperity upon which the country can build and grow, compared with the dull, dull performance of recent years. I say "dull performance" because we are absolutely last among major industrial countries in the area of productivity. As far as research and development are concerned, we are virtually at last spot. In short, we are not devoting ourselves to the rebuilding of Canada in the 1980s which we should be getting on with.

If I may, I should like to stress three points. I believe that Canada can rebuild in the 1980s. I believe it can regain some of the momentum which it lost if we promote exports in a more aggressive manner than we have been doing. Only this weekend I spoke with a chap who has extensive knowledge of world markets. He said that the word he hears wherever he goes in the world is that Canada does not so much sell its goods abroad; the world buys our goods. In truth, we are not out there selling the way Canada could and should be selling.

The second point is that we must get on with capitalizing our industry. We must hit dead the bogey that somehow profits are wrong and that we must almost be ashamed to use the word. Another word for profits is jobs. To the degree that we can create the wherewithal through profits, we create the investment funds needed to build up productivity and job opportunities lacking in Canada at the present time.

We must process our resources to a much greater extent than we have been doing in recent years. Surely we must learn our lesson, as the Science Council of Canada pointed out so effectively in its November, 1981 booklet entitled "Hard Times—Hard Choices". Surely we have learned the lesson that we cannot expect employment in Canada if we systematically ship resources to some other country, allow them to manufacture the goods and only import manufactured goods. As was mentioned by the Science Council, we are the most open country in the world as far as such trade is concerned.

For those who have perhaps forgotten what the Science Council pointed out a year ago, let me read into the record what appears on page 15 of the booklet:

> —Canada already stands unduly exposed. As recent studies have shown, few countries are as willing to allow ready access to their domestic markets as Canada is, and it is debatable whether we have gained significantly from this exposure. Canada already imports more duty free, finished manufactured goods—even excluding automotive goods—than do the U.S., Japan and the European Economic Community combined.

Surely that is a startling statement—a country of 24 million people importing more manufactured goods than those three large common markets combined, Japan, the European Common Market and the United States common market.

Let me continue. Accepting that we have to process our resources to a greater extent than we do at present, let me touch upon the entire area of research and development and its potential if we started diverting some of the money spent in the country and investing in the future. As far as our resources are concerned, let us think not only of what we have to dig out of the ground, mine or extract from an oil well. Let us think of our potential in water which has not perhaps been exploited to the present time. When we look at the lights above us, we should remember that that electricity was literally generated a few seconds ago; but because we have not learned how to store it, the electricity not instantly used is either never generated or lost for all time. Why cannot we set upon a research and development program whereby we will learn how to store water power we generate, hydroelectric power, so that it may be used, not instantly, as is our habit, but over a prolonged period? This is one of our challenges.

We hear in energy debates about oil and gas expenditures, Petro-Canada and whatnot. We should take a look at the glass of water sitting upon my desk and think about the energy which is in it, in the form of hydrogen and oxygen, which makes up water, H_2O. In short, some day a way to harness the hydrogen will be discovered, and we will have one of the greatest forces the world has ever seen. Why cannot Canada be a pioneer in that type of inventive work? If we could hand some funds over to those who are almost begging for funding to allow them to get on with such research, we would not have to worry about energy shortages. A country which has 25 per cent of the fresh water supply in the world should never have to say to the rest of the world that it is short of energy. We would not have to do so if we set our minds to research and development which would unearth the secret and allow us to harness this potential.

Let me go into some other fields. At the present time research and development takes roughly $900 million of federal funds. That seems a huge amount of money until we start identifying where the Government spends other amounts of money. For example, we have in Supplementary Estimates before the House a request to spend $200 million for further capitalization of Canadair and a further $200 million capitalization for de Havilland. Those two amounts, making a total of $400 million, will be coupled to the $1.7 billion that we have already committed to help out those two firms. In short, that is $2 billion for two companies, and for those two companies alone it is twice the total Federal Government commitment to be made this year for research and development for the entire nation.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that if we could take a portion of those funds and use it for research and development, we would find a much greater reward down the road than by leaving that money to be invested in those two enterprises.

The United Way Appeal in Canada, much to its credit, has raised or hopes to raise $110 million this year. That is 55 per cent of the amount of capital that we are being asked to put into Canadair alone. For example, the Heart Foundation, the Cancer Fund, the Terry Fox Marathon of Hope, have each raised or hope to raise about $25 million this year. That amount, which is for research, is a small amount compared to what this Government dishes out for some of its favourite projects in the form of bail-outs for various corporations, both private and public.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but the time allotted to him has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House? Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, we should accept that it is no longer a question of identifying the problem or a question of saying what should we do in Canada, because the solutions are there. It is time for the Government to get on with the job. The Government should say that what it is going to do is create the atmosphere in this country that will allow our potential to be reharnessed once again. I suggest that it begin not by apologizing for the free enterprise system but by saying that the free enterprise system is the solution and not the problem. It is the Government that is the problem.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the Hon. Member entertain a question?

Mr. Stevens: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Blackburn: Mr. Speaker, for the past 30 minutes I have listened intently to the Hon. Member's speech. I was waiting and waiting for him to give this House and the nation the Conservative Party's definitive industrial strategy. The Hon. Member has not given one example. Could he very briefly give us a few specifics of the Conservative Party's industrial strategy that for two and a half years we, in this House and the nation, have been waiting for?

Mr. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): What about yours?

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that we have the attention of the Hon. Member for Brant (Mr. Blackburn). As he probably knows, we have six other speakers to follow me. They will fill in exactly the industrial strategy that he is looking for. However, let me outline three things that he will hear if he is just a little patient.

First, we think there is room to insure, much as NHA mortgages are insured, business loans in this country. Second, we think there is room to introduce industrial revenue bonds for small businesses in this country, similar to what one finds in many of the states in the United States of America, but greatly needed in Canada if we want to get small businesses reharnessed and people back to work. Again, we are going to suggest that it is time that the precedent, if you like, set by the Ontario Government be endorsed by the Federal Government. The Ontario Government in its Small Business Development Act has a program which raises money for small businesses. It facilitates the raising of that money by making grants available up to 30 per cent. This program should be endorsed by the federal Government and added to, instead of frustrated by the federal Government, something which has been going on in this country.

We have many other points like that, Mr. Speaker, but I do not want to take away the making of those points from my colleagues who will be speaking during the course of this debate.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us today gives us the opportunity to speak to a very important issue that is facing the country, namely the need for an industrial or an economic development strategy that I believe has been sadly lacking for the past 30 years or 40 years.

I suppose we could have an agreement in this House that the most important priority and the most important question to solve is that of providing jobs for about 1.5 million Canadians who do not have jobs today. That is the most important priority. There is nothing that is as difficult for a person or for a family than to be faced with unemployment, to be able to work but not have a job because of the state of Canada's economy. If we look to other countries in the world we find that the unemployment statistics in Canada are among the worst, if not the worst, of the industrialized states. We also find that the long-term situation looks very bad from all the reports that we see.

In this country we have an economy that is disintegrating before our very eyes. Why is that happening? What is the difference between Canada and the United States, Canada and Japan, or Canada and Europe? Why do we have unemployment problems that are much higher here than in other countries? Why does the long-term look so much worse in Canada than in other countries?

I think there is an answer to that question. There is a major difference between us and other countries. Other countries decided a long time ago that they would control, own and direct their own economies. We in Canada do not do that. We have more foreign ownership, foreign control and foreign investment in the equity stance than any other industrialized country in the world. As a result of that, we are now reaping the benefits of a very truncated branch-line economy where we export capital and import unemployment from other countries around the world.

I think the time has come for this country to have a new vision of what we are about and where we are going. As I listened to members of the Conservative Party today, and as I have listened to them over the last few months when they talk about the whole question of foreign investment and economic direction in this country, I think they have picked up the mantle of the late C. D. Howe. They have picked up his mantle of unfettered continentalism. I wonder what John Diefenbaker or Sir John A. Macdonald would think of this Party to my right today if they heard the talk about removing FIRA, getting rid of all the inhibitions of foreign investment and, in effect, becoming the fifty-first state of the United States of America?

Mr. Blenkarn: That is nonsense.

Mr. Nystrom: That Party has played the tune of Ronald Reagan in this country. It has taken FIRA and what really is a mouse and created a monster out of it.

An Hon. Member: You are wrong.

Mr. Nystrom: At one time that Party, under the leadership of people like Sir John A. Macdonald up to John Diefenbaker, did have a bit of respect for Canadian economic nationalism and for creating a Canada owned by Canadians. But we see the same thing across the way. I am glad to hear a Liberal interjecting at this point. In my opinion, what we are seeing is a massive retreat concerning FIRA, a massive retreat in trying to own Canada.

I remember the 1980 election campaign very well. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) was the Leader of the Opposition at that time. He travelled across this country promising that if he were re-elected, he would not only maintain FIRA but would strengthen it and make it into an agency with teeth on behalf of Canadians. He said in Toronto on February 13 that, if elected, the Liberal Party would "make sure that FIRA's mandate will be broadened to include the periodic review of all foreign firms of large size to assess the performance of these companies in such areas as export promotion and research and development". He also said in the Throne Speech a few months later, in April:

The new government wants to expand the opportunities for independent Canadian-owned enterprise, especially in highgrowth areas like advanced technology.

The government's commitment is to ensuring that foreigh-owned companies operate in accordance with Canadian industrial goals.

He also said in the Throne Speech:

—the Foreign Investment Review Act will be amended to provide for performance reviews of how large foreign firms are meeting the test of bringing substantial benefits to Canada. As well, amendments will be introduced to ensure that major acquisition proposals by foreign companies will be publicized prior to a government decision on their acceptability. The Government will assist Canadian companies wishing to repatriate assets or to bid for ownership or control of companies subject to takeover offers by non-Canadians.

What do we see some two months later? We see a tremendous retreat by the Liberal Government opposite. Not only does it not try to strengthen FIRA; it wants to make it weaker in response to pressure from the administration of President Reagan in the United States. I suggest that this Government is once again opening up our doors to unregulated and uncontrolled foreign investment that is stealing jobs from Canadians, moving billions of Canadian dollars to the United States, Japan or western Europe in the form of profits or dividends to foreign investors.

This is what Governments in this country have done in the past. In fact, in 1981 our deficit in the balance of payments was $9.1 billion. That money could have been used to create jobs for Canadians, to develop an economic strategy which would strengthen the nation and make it more productive and cost competitive internationally. Instead, our banks are lending money to foreign investors who are investing in Canada, creating unemployment in Canada while creating employment in other countries of the world.

One only needs to review the statistics. According to Statistics Canada, the branch plants of foreign-owned firms import nearly five times as many foreign goods in the manufacturing sector as Canadian firms. Much of this is done from the branch plant to the parent in the United States or elsewhere in the world. Many of these goods are imported despite the fact that it has no real bearing in terms of a company's efficiency or competitiveness.

There is very little research and development conducted in this country. Research and development is not carried out in this country because so much of our economy is foreign owned. To illustrate this, I have figures that show that in 1973 only 2.7 per cent of Canadian manufacturing firms had R and D facilities operating in this country. If you look at the figures for research and development for 1975, Canada is probably at the bottom of the list of developed countries, certainly at the bottom of the list of all the OECD nations. Research and development expenditure should be doubled in this country.

One reason for the lack of research and development is that many of our firms in key industries are foreign owned and involve very little product innovation. In the United States, for example, 1.84 per cent of sales in all industries went back into R and D. In Canada, only 0.78 per cent, less than half, went into research and development. Domestically, Canadian firms put up 0.86 per cent of their sales for research and development while foreign controlled firms in this country only put up 0.71 per cent of their sales. This proves once again that foreign controlled firms are less likely to put money into research and development, the creation of jobs in Canada and the creation of products that are more cost efficient, which would create world trade and provide Canadians with more jobs.

In addition, we find that approximately 58 per cent of our exports are in the resource sector, which provides little in terms of employment because they are capital-intensive industries. On the import side, however, we find that 60 per cent of our imports are in the area of highly finished goods and products. I maintain that as long as we do not control our economy as Canadians we will not be involved in the processing and development that should be done in this country.

In 1970 we had a manufacturing deficit of some $2.5 billion. That had escalated to some $17.8 billion by 1980. By 1981 it was around $21 billion. In the automobile sector—despite the auto pact with the United States—we see an accumulating deficit that is skyrocketing. The deficit in 1980 was approximately $10 billion. It is probably reaching closer to $15 billion in 1982 despite the fact that we have an agreement with the United States which is supposed to give Canadians a fair share of production jobs in accordance with the sale of cars in this country. In 1976, for example, our share of car purchases was 8.9 per cent and our share of production was only 7 per cent. Despite the agreement, we are getting short changed and, as a result, we are exporting jobs to the United States of America.

This same situation is true for almost any industry one wishes to consider. We can consider machinery, which is labour-intensive and innovative. It is important in terms of new technology. Our trade imbalance in machinery for 1980 was $6.9 billion. If Canadians were to overcome this tremendous deficit in our balance of trade in machinery, we could create some 69,000 production jobs alone in Canada.

Let us consider machinery with respect to each sector. Canada is a major agricultural producer. However, we have a deficit in agricultural equipment of $1.3 billion. We have a deficit of $1 billion in the mining and construction industries despite our resources. We have a deficit of $563 million in powered generation equipment for the year 1980. The deficit with respect to industrial machinery is $898 million. We have a $1 billion deficit in rolling equipment and machine tools. Many of these deficits involve sectors in which we should be specializing and leading the world. We should have surpluses in our products such as agriculture, mines and hydro. These resources are in abundance in Canada. If the Europeans, Japanese or Americans had this abundance of resources they would be producing in abundance, exporting around the world and creating thousands of jobs, many of which would be highly paid and highly skilled. However, because of lack of imagination and the chicken mentality of governments over the years, we do not have the nerve to control our own economy as the Americans, the Europeans and the Japanese have always done.

In the area of high technology we already have a deficit in computer and office products in 1981 of some $1.77 billion. At that rate, some 60,000 jobs will be lost between now and 1985. Yet we have a Government that is just now beginning to think of developing a strategy in Canada for advanced technology. That type of approach is just not acceptable.

Despite those statistics which show the massive deficits in the balance of payments, the export of jobs and the lack of control over our economy, I am amazed that the Government is now retreating on such a small agency as FIRA. The Conservative Party has turned aside its traditions and is now almost unpatriotic in terms of what is once stood for and what it is now calling for—more unfettered foreign investment and the dismantling or the pulling of the teeth of the Foreign Investment Review Act.

It is beyond me why we as Canadians do not have more imagination or fortitude than we have seen in the past. I have an interesting quote about how Canadians lose jobs from a United States Senate Committee hearing on July 8, 1981. Mr. Harvey Bale is assistant trade representative for investment policy in the U.S. I think we should very carefully listen to his words. He said:

• (1600)

> We believe that U.S. foreign direct investment has also made a contribution to employment in the United States through the link between exports and investment. Much of our trade with foreign countries originates with orders placed by the subsidiaries of U.S. companies located overseas. For example 75 per cent of our exports to the 300 largest companies in Canada originates from the subsidiaries of U.S. firms.

The purpose of much of the foreign investment in our country is to create jobs in other countries around the world. I maintain that the time has come when we as Canadians should do as other developed countries have done, namely, take control of our economy and ensure that key sectors are developed and owned by Canadians through an application of public ownership, social ownership, private ownership, co-operative ownership and the like.

Petro-Canada controls or dominates only 12 per cent or 14 per cent of the market, but is only the fifth largest company. We should ensure that Petro-Canada becomes the largest company in the country and controls over 50 per cent of the market. These are examples of what we will have to do. We must also ensure that foreign companies operating in Canada, in proportion to their sales, will ensure the same proportion of research and development, expansion of their plants and creation of jobs. Many countries in the world have those kinds of rules and regulations. France, Germany and Japan were virtually destroyed during the Second World War. Those countries decided that they would rebuild their economies by ensuring that their nationals, their people, were in control so that they could make decisions and provide employment. Today, all three of those countries are doing better than our country.

Since 1960 we have seen our standard of living, which was formerly second in the world, plummet to tenth place or even worse, depending upon how one reads the statistics, in terms of standard of living, or average income, around the world.

Therefore, it has become imperative that we have a national industrial strategy which will deal with certain key sectors which we should be developing, sectors which are of natural advantage to us, such as agricultural products and other resources. We must specialize in those areas and process those resources and food products much more than we do now before export. We must develop machinery, agricultural or mining, to provide our own market and to supply markets around the world. We must do things like that if we are to create jobs for Canadians.

Then we must consider other areas of natural benefit to Canada, such as transportation and communications. We are a big country and we must develop ways of moving quickly and communicating quickly and efficiently. We should specialize in trains and communications equipment. It should be ourselves, for example, rather than the French and the Japanese who have the fastest trains in the world. It should be ourselves who are exporting technology to other parts of the world, rather than the French and the Japanese. The same is true in the communications sector where we do have some technology, some Canadian know-how which is very good. We are a world leader in that sector and we should develop other sectors more quickly.

I would very briefly like to refer to the area of advanced technology. We have heard many reports which state that we are lagging behind. We have an industry which is being run down, an industrial sector which is disintegrating very rapidly. Unless we make some changes very quickly we will be in even more serious trouble in the years that lie ahead.

Mr. Speaker, I see that you are about to stand, and if I may have two or three more minutes, I will wind up my remarks.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous agreement that the time allotted to the Hon. Member may be extended?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nystrom: I wanted to wind up my remarks by making an appeal to the House to consider what is happening to our various sectors, industrial, steel, footwear, textiles, and to many industries which have provided jobs in the past. In almost all cases we find that technology is moving very rapidly, but unless we change and innovate we will lose even more jobs in these sectors. In the future it will be very important to innovate here in Canada, to ensure that development of hardware, computers, new gadgets and technology occurs right here in this country. It will also be equally important to ensure that we control the technological revolution. We as Canadian people must introduce it in a planned and sensible way as a result of consultation with ordinary working people, the Provinces, the farmers, women and people who will be most affected by micro-chip technology, new hardware or new software.

It is very important that we start training our young people for the new society which is already with us. It is startling to me to find that there are 40 times more people in electrical engineering schools in Japan than in this country. The Japanese are preparing for the society which is already with us. Twice as many people graduate from their schools than in the United States, even though they have half the population of the United States. We are moving into an era of robotics and fully automated factories, yet we are not producing and planning for the future which is lying ahead.

As my last comment in this particular debate, I suggest it would be constructive if all three Parties in the House were to establish a special committee on the social and economic impact of advanced technology which would provide some input from elected parliamentarians as to how we want the country to evolve and develop in the next 20 or 30 years. If we do not do it, it will arrive from other places. Technology will be imported from Japan, western Europe and the United States. Once again, it will not be Canadian owned and controlled and perhaps will not even be developed in this country as much as in the past. Because of growing perfectionism in the world, we will be importing much more than we imported in the past. So I think it is important in this Parliament that we form a special committee to study the impact, socially and economically, of the new technology. That would be a part, I would hope, of a new industrial and economic strategy that we need very badly. Its priority must be, as I said, to ensure that industrial and economic activity in this country is owned, controlled and developed by Canadians for Canadians.

We have the resources and we have the people. All we need is the dream, the goal, the vision; and I am sure that, with the goodwill of the Canadian people, we could create a country that is second to none in the twenty-first century.

Mr. René Cousineau (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I am honoured to be participating in the debate this afternoon on a motion by the Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens), and I would ask the Members opposite to be patient as the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Lumley) will be rising in the House later today.

I listened very carefully to the comments made by the Member for York-Peel just now, when he talked about promoting our goods and increasing exports, but I did not hear him making any suggestions on how our exports should be increased.

[English]

The Hon. Member talked about frustration. Well, there is frustration in Canada, everyone knows that, and 1.3 million are unemployed. There are different areas of frustration. He says Canadians know we can do better. We all know that. We had a lesson on inventions in the nineteenth century. We had a talk about pioneers. We even had a lesson in history and one in chemistry, but not one word about how to increase productivity or exportation.

The Hon. Member for York-Peel talked about regularization. I think he felt like talking about privatization, but the fact is that whenever he starts talking about that, Petro-Canada comes into his speeches, and that is kaput as far as the Tory party is concerned. Tories are not supposed to talk about Petro-Canada.

[Translation]

If I take the last part of the Hon. Member's motion, Mr. Speaker, it says, and I quote:

—and to provide incentives for training opportunities and to the private sector for new, and increased levels of research and development in Canada.

I wonder where the Hon. Member was on October 28 of this year when we had first reading of Bill C-136, a bill that is concerned with small businesses and will help small businesses contracting loans between June 28, 1982 and March 31, 1983, to finance acquisition of new depreciable assets or to finance research and development. That he did not mention. Did he mention the day, Monday, November 8, when the bill was passed on second reading and referred to committee? No, he did not. Are the Progressive Conservatives afraid to mention certain measures this government has brought before Parliament? Mr. Speaker, I think they are more interested in talking about bringing down this government and about their leadership than in providing constructive criticism aimed at helping Canadians to break through the present economic impasse.

Mr. Speaker, it was indeed very appropriate that Bill C-136 should be introduced on October 28, during the third annual small business week. This event is sponsored by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Federal Development Bank for the purpose of bringing to the attention of the general public and business people in particular the various ways in which the federal, provincial and municipal governments can help with their administrative operations. We had exhibits with information booths across Canada.

At the end of a full week here in the Outaouais region, prizes were awarded to various individuals for outstanding accomplishment in business during the past year. When the prizes were being awarded, the Outaouais was visited by one of the ministers in the Quebec government, who was eager to satisfy the separatists and decided to shoot off a few arrows from the other side of the river. He was in Hull at the Université du Québec, and I would like to make it clear to Minister Biron that the whole week dedicated to small business was apolitical and had been organized by the Outaouais Development Corporation, the Federal Development Bank, and business people. Instead of making political remarks that certainly did nothing to enhance the well-being of the people or small businesses, if the minister had told people: Listen, we are going to help you, we are going to reduce income taxes since you are paying the highest taxes in Canada, we are going to reduce income taxes so that you can live as well as your counterparts in Ontario and the United States. That would have helped business people. Or he might have told people involved in the transport business: Listen, we are going to reduce the tax on gas so that you will be able to compete with other people instead of paying $5, $6, $7 and sometimes $10 more to fill the tank in your car or bus.

Were these people going to get a refund from the provincial government? No, Mr. Speaker, the minister did not mention that. He criticized the federal government as if the latter were still largely responsible for the slump Quebec is experiencing at the present time. I know there are separatists who are going to say that if Quebec had its own resources, in other words, if Quebec alone had the authority to levy taxes, it might be possible. I simply cannot believe that some separatists are still using this argument, namely, that if they had control over all their resources, in other words, if they were independent, they could afford more or less the same standard of living and the same taxation levels as other provinces.

In an article that appeared in Le Droit on April 16, and I am going back that far because it is important and we tend to forget, it was said, and I quote:

Ottawa is giving more than it is taking away from Quebec.

In 1980, the federal government spent $14.9 billion in Quebec and collected only $10.5 billion in revenue and taxes—

That is what independence will mean: more taxes. Our people pay the highest taxes in Canada, and if we have to pay four billion dollars more, where are we going to raise it? I feel this has to be said, Mr. Speaker, because certain leaders and certain ministers in the provincial government are making bold accusations without being able to substantiate them, in order to confuse people and perhaps smooth the way for some of our separatist friends.

To get back to Bill C-136, Mr. Speaker, I said earlier that this legislation would help businesses finance acquisition of new depreciable assets or finance research and development, between June 29, 1982 and March 31, 1983, by making them eligible for an interest subsidy, provided by the Canadian government, of up to 4 per cent of the amount borrowed from the bank. The federal government will pay directly into the account of the borrower a sum representing up to 4 per cent of the amount borrowed. It is understood that as soon as the interest rate is down to 12 per cent, the subsidy is reduced accordingly. That is a concrete example of what this government has done to promote small business research and development.

The Hon. Member talked about increasing exports of Canadian manufactured goods. He does not seem to be familiar with the 6 and 5 program. The program is not an end in itself but provides the means, that is, by reducing salaries, Canadians will be able to bring down the rate of inflation and consequently interest rates, and thus increase investment and the number of jobs available, so that in the final analysis, we will be reducing the unemployment rate. In fact, increasing productivity was the purpose of the 6 and 5 program, and this is extremely important in the present economic situation, if we are to become at all competitive and compete with other countries who are producing the same goods we are.

Mr. Speaker, perhaps we should discuss some of the measures this government has taken since 1980 with respect to industry. This governemnt has made an effort to create a climate that is favourable to investment, whatever the members opposite care to think. The government has taken measures aimed at ensuring that funds will be available for viable projects and provided loan guarantees for both small and certain larger companies. I will have more to say about that later on. I take the liberty of speaking in such a way that my friends opposite will remember. We are not all mean Liberals, we are not all mean Government members. There are certain things which ought to be appreciated. Michelin tires, for instance. The Canadian Government will award $42 million in grants to promote a program which will eventually trigger a $400 million-plus investment by Michelin. Mr. Speaker, I believe that will be in the Atlantic Provinces—I cannot recall which one, but in any event it does show that the federal government has taken the initiative in that field. Some people raised hell and said all kinds of things about the Chrysler deal, but the fact remains that it was not an outright grant but a loan guarantee. Unfortunately, they are now talking about going on strike. That made it possible for the workers to keep their jobs and there is the possibility of a $150 million loan guarantee. Massey-Ferguson and their $126 million loan guarantee was a similar case and again the purpose was to keep people working.

We now have a program which has been implemented to modernize the textile industry so that it will be competitive with other countries marketing similar products. Modernization is the order of the day in the forest industry as well because one out of ten workers depends on it for a living, which makes it a key sector in Canada. Gatineau's CIP in my riding was awarded $6 million by the central government under a federal-provincial agreement and the MacLaren Company was also granted $6 or $7 million to update its facilities. Mr. Speaker, millions of dollars have been spent for a newsprint industry in Amos. I do not know how many millions were spent by the companies which own the plants, but still the federal government has done its share to launch that industry.

This government has also approved the five-year program of the National Research Council of Canada. Mention was made of research earlier. An amount of $48 million has been allocated to promote research and development, provide information to small businesses and encourage the private sector to use advanced technology. I could go on, Mr. Speaker, but I see that my time is going quickly. But it must be kept in mind that it is the private sector which will get us out of this difficult situation. We shall be called all sorts of names, such as socialists and the right or left arm of the New Democratic Party, and so on, but that does not bother me. More important, it still remains that the Liberal Party now believes that the private sector will get us out of this fix. The federal government wants to play an active part in support of the private sector and help small and medium-size businesses and the private sector as a whole to become self-sufficient.

We have taken some measures and we shall continue to do so, but we are willing to act in a spirit of consultation, co-operation and harmony. And when I say harmony, Mr. Speaker, I think you know what I mean. There is nothing you cannot do with the people behind you and when all three levels of government and everyone else put up a common front. Then, you can do anything. Someone said earlier that the Canadian people know they can do better, but in this spirit of harmony, co-operation and collaboration, the results can only be positive.

Mutual trust is essential, Mr. Speaker, to economic recovery. No federal or provincial policy or program and no management or labour initiative can get Canada out of the recession unless everyone works together, and this includes the members of the Conservative Party and the NDP. It is only with their co-operation that we can succeed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY S.O. 58—INDUSTRIAL STRATEGY

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Stevens:

That this House condemns the Government for its failure to introduce its promised comprehensive industrial strategy to rebuild the Canadian economy in the 1980's and for its failure to produce specific strategies to harness the potential of Canadian industry, to promote the advantageous utilization of Canada's human and natural resources, to increase exports of Canadian manufactured goods, and to provide incentives for training opportunities and to the private sector for new, and increased levels of research and development in Canada.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, the C.D. Howe Institute in its regular report of July, 1982 entitled "Canada's Economic Predicament", commenting on the June 28 budget, had this to say and I quote:

Canada's primary problem has been mismanagement of its economic affairs since the early 1970s by its federal leadership. The latest budget message is an abysmal stewardship report on the results of past economic policy for which the federal government must take responsibility.

The report goes on to say that this kind of leadership has placed Canada in a very serious economic predicament. It was rather interesting to hear the previous speaker pleading for the private sector to respond, asking the business community to trust them, after the damage they have inflicted upon the economy. I mention this simply to lay the background for the economic debate in which we are involved today, because in order to move ahead, to propose and advocate anything, one cannot forget about the past sins of this administration. That is primarily what the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) wanted to do in his three-part television presentation. Some of the things he had to say were correct, but we know from previous experience that a lot of the problem has been in fact created by the man himself and by the people who support him.

While the C.D. Howe Institute talks about the mismanagement of the seventies, we have to look at what happened in the last two years, since 1980. Clearly our economic fortunes have dipped very badly. As a matter of fact, they have been eroded disastrously. Why? First of all, the National Energy Program was a major contributing factor to the economic collapse of this country. Second is the prolonged and protracted negotiations with the producing Provinces over energy pricing, created primarily as a result of the irresponsible position which the Liberal Party took during the election of 1980. The effect of the NEP and the energy pricing agreement has imposed a very crippling federal tax upon the industry and upon consumers.

I can also mention the uncertainties and the confusion arising out of the number of budgets and economic statements which have been made. What was the effect? Primarily it has destroyed investor and consumer confidence in this country. The other problem we have is the unrelenting move of this Government towards greater state control and state intervention. The Government still does not believe that is one of the major problems in this country. Ask the business people. I will have more to say about that a little later.

While the economic problems were materializing and we could have taken some measures over the course of the last two years, this country was engaged in, perhaps, one of the most bitter debates of all time, the debate on constitutional reform. In his frustration the Prime Minister said that federalism is dead, that there is no more co-operation. Well, Mr. Speaker, we certainly have confidence in the future of this country. We have confidence that Governments can work together and address the real problems of the country. What his statement implies is that there is no political co-operation; therefore, there can be no economic co-operation. The division and bitterness created during the debate over energy and the Constitution has not subsided. It is going to take more than time, it is going to take action by the Government to ensure that those wounds are healed.

All of these things, Mr. Speaker, have led us further into the depths of recession. As I said earlier, we do have an economic crisis in which there is no investor or consumer confidence; there is no confidence in the economic leadership provided by this Government. In fairness, sir, I have to acknowledge that there at least seems to be lip service being paid and some gestures being made towards improving the situation. The Government has started to recognize that it has made serious and grave errors, and at least there is more perception that it is mending its ways and changing direction.

We have had the game of musical chairs being played in the cabinet and I think from the business point of view there is some measure of optimism. I am pleased the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Lumley) is in the House because, while I do not want to commend him too loudly or in any prolonged fashion, it is fair to say, however, that it was a right move to put the Hon. Member in that position because I think he understands business and will do an excellent job. However, as my colleague, the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) pointed out, he is only one.

I wonder where he was when the Government imposed the devastating National Energy Program or the disastrous budget of November, 1981. That budget has had 44 changes and it is all but dead, but where was he then? He stood up and supported it. It was the most anti-business, anti-growth budget ever inflicted on Canadian business and the Canadian people, yet he stood there applauding the then Minister of Finance. I suppose he expects to make a name for himself by reversing the effects of that crippling budget. I hope he does, in the interests of Canada and the Canadian economy, Mr. Speaker.

Some Members across the way, Mr. Speaker, when I mentioned the National Energy Program was a disaster, said "nonsense". That is rather strange when we have had two major changes to the NEP. That in itself is a recognition that it was wrong in the first place. Unfortunately the damage was done, just like the budget. I cannot imagine how Members across the way can live with themselves after having voted in support of that November, 1981 budget.

The fact of the matter is that over a one-year period we have had confusion, chaos and uncertainty in the business community, but Members across the way stood up and applauded the Minister of Finance and supported him. They should hang their heads in shame. Now the Government is trying to cater to the United States. We have the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Regan) journeying to the United States to try and get them back onside. We have the Prime Minister sort of giving the U.S. the back of his hand in his appeal for more trade with France. Of course, he is visiting other countries in Europe which are basically socialistic or communistic, so we still have that tendency toward kicking the U.S. in the teeth. The U.S. is our major trading partner, and if we can patch up the differences and work together to our mutual advantage in terms of trade, technology and jobs, I think we can make progress on this continent.

The Hon. Member who spoke just before me made a great pitch for the private sector, as did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde), suggesting that it will fuel economic growth. That is really hypocritical, Mr. Speaker. We need more than words to revitalize the private sector because there has been no Government in Canada, whether it be NDP, Liberal or Conservative, which has done more to stifle, frustrate and harass the private sector than this Government. Its whole economic thrust is based on more, not less, Government intervention. It wants to use grants and subsidies to force business to march to the tune of a board or army of bureaucrats. It is promoting the greater use and multiplicity of Crown corporations to get involved in business where the private sector could do the job. The Government is using leverage to achieve certain goals and objectives, leverage such as taxation, spending, procurement and regulation policies. It even uses confiscation to achieve its goals and objectives. So we have this assortment of sticks and carrots to manipulate business, to manipulate Canadians, to fine-tune them to produce the desired results. The bureaucrats are doing the fine-tuning, and of course the result is increased frustration, harassment and an increase in the army of non-productive bureaucrats. It is penetrating the whole marketing system, Mr. Speaker.

There is a myth within this Government that the bureaucracy can outperform and outwit the marketplace. In my view, there is no bureaucratic mechanism, regardless of computers, satellites, flow charts, or the armies of people, which can outperform the expertise of the private sector in the marketplace. One only has to look at the failings of Russia, particularly in its agricultural sector. Russia is now the world's largest importer of grain and meat. In the year 1970 it was a net exporter of grain. In the last ten years the U.S. has doubled the Russian output of grains. Russia has a centrally controlled and interventionist economy. They know how much fertilizer they are going to use in 1984 because it is all programmed. That kind of approach, Mr. Speaker, does not work there and it is not working here. As far as I am concerned, the invisible hand of the marketplace is far more effective than the visible hand of the Government.

The NDP, Mr. Speaker, simply want more of this kind of intervention. As I understand their industrial strategy, they really want to turn Canada's economic program into a National Energy Program. They want more centralized control and more intervention, the kind of control and intervention which frightened away the oil companies and destroyed the oil industry in this country. As far as I am concerned, the most important and constructive suggestion I can make is for the federal Government to make a clear commitment to return to a more market-oriented economy. This would do more to restore investor and consumer confidence than anything that has occurred in the last two years. We must concentrate on providing the best product at the best possible price. That is basic and fundamental to business.

Secondly, we must remove the impediments which discourage the spirit of enterprise in Canadians. We must encourage individual initiative and ownership. We must provide incentives to build, to restore the profit motive and revitalize the private sector in order to encourage growth and development, particularly in those areas where we have a natural advantage. I believe Canadians want to develop their own abilities and ambitions without excessive Government intervention. They want to own their own homes and businesses, to be active partners in the growth and development of this country.

We can do that, Mr. Speaker. We can remove those impediments by simplifying our tax system, one so complex and counterproductive that even accountants and tax lawyers cannot understand it. This has created, again, a huge and non-productive bureaucracy. It is not producing wealth, it is discriminatory, it militates against productivity, efficiency, price competitiveness, and it stifles innovation and creativity.

• (1640)

Things like the capital gains tax destroy the incentive to invest. We must consider instruments like the agri-bond, the Small Business Investment Bond, municipal bonds and Industrial Revenue Bonds which will provide pools of capital and the impetus to grow, to build, and to produce wealth in this country. The tax system can be used to encourage productivity, to improve our competitiveness, to revitalize and retool the manufacturing sector, to improve research and development and to stimulate innovation and advanced technology. But we need more positive signs and not simply rhetoric, Mr. Speaker.

We must also engage in a major regulatory housecleaning in this country. Canadians of all stripes and in all walks of life are hampered by the bureaucratic web. We must reduce duplication, establish greater uniformity and remove the barriers which stifle innovation, competition and efficiency.

I support the call of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association for a two-year moratorium on regulation that does not contribute directly to the economic growth of the country. The utopian ideal that in this country we can plan and regulate everything to perfection has clearly been discredited. We must face reality and make a clear commitment to scaling down the regulatory burden that has been imposed on the country. We must get on with the job and let the enterprising spirit of the people develop and flourish. We have regulatory agencies that have clearly outlived their usefulness. Some could be dismantled completely and some could be scaled down, but all regulation and regulatory agencies should be reviewed.

We must reduce the burden of government spending, Mr. Speaker. The combined total of government spending in the country is approaching 50 per cent at the federal, provincial and municipal level. It is close to $160 billion. We cannot afford the present system relative to our economic production. The Auditor General has said that $5 billion could be scaled down in federal and provincial government expenditures each year, for a three-year period. That is a good starting point and we should try to do that. We should reduce duplication, reduce waste and inefficiency. In concert with the provincial governments, I am sure we could do this, but no serious thought has been given to it by the Government. It does not seem to be serious about reducing its expenditures.

I think it would help to take a leaf out of the book of the new Saskatchewan Government. After it won a very resouding victory in April, it made a declaration to the nation and to the world that it is open for business and is going to remove every obstacle and impediment within its jurisdiction in order to ensure that business is done. The federal Government should do the same thing. We should declare that we are open for business in this country and remove obstacles to investment at the foreign and domestic levels. We need investment in this country, and investment means jobs. At present, the country has $29 billion in personal savings. A good portion of that should be directed towards investment activities that will generate wealth. The country cannot afford a repeat of conditions in 1981 when $10.2 billion in investment capital left the country.

There is an urgent problem in the country at the moment, Mr. Speaker, with 1.5 million people unemployed. UIC benefits are being paid out at the rate of $10 billion annually and there is nothing to show for that. We must see what we can do immediately to create jobs and to save jobs. We need more than the temporary make-work projects advanced by the Minister who is responsible for employment.

One way that we could create some lasting and productive work in the country is by recognizing that we have an opportunity to turn our energy advantage into an economic advantage. We must scarp the NEP and commit ourselves to moving toward oil self-sufficiency as quickly as possible. This would create permanent jobs, new wealth, renewed economic activity and an improvement in our balance of payments position. Along with industry and the producing Provinces we must examine the possibility of bringing on the Alsands, the heavy oil upgrader, or Cold Lake, even on a smaller scale. We must consider revitalizing exploration in consultation with industry and the Provinces.

There are about a dozen projects on hold in the petrochemical industry at the moment, worth about $3.5 or $ 4 billion. These are job-creating activities but they are on hold, primarily because of the federal tax that has been imposed upon the feedstock. This puts the end product in a non-competitive position.

A task force has been created to look into this situation, Mr. Speaker, but we do not need a task force. I invite the Minister to call in representatives of Union Carbide, Dow, Nova and many other companies. They will tell him what the problem is. There is a little firm in Alberta called Alberta Gas Chemicals which plans to establish its next plant in New Zealand because that country does not impose a damaging tax upon feedstocks. This tax makes companies non-competitive in world markets.

Mr. Clifford Mort, Chairman of Dow Chemical, has said that taxes have added 50 per cent to the variable cost of natural gas based ethane and a staggering 20 per cent increase in the total cost of ethylene.

Mr. Lapalme of Union Carbide has said that "Canada is now alone in the petrochemical world, marching to the beat of its own drum on a path that ultimately leads to pricing itself out of the petrochemical business".

We all recognize that the capacity of the rail transportation system in this country needs to be improved, Mr. Speaker. This project is also on hold, until economic recovery is restored. Surely there must be ways and means for the Government to sit down with the industry and the Provinces to get it going right away. Something like $12, $14 or $15 billion is to be spent on this, but if we wait we may not have the opportunity to exploit the opportunities that will occur when recovery comes about.

We are also importing far too much of our food budget, Mr. Speaker. At present it stands at roughly 30 per cent, which I believe could be reduced by at least $1 billion. That would improve our balance of payments position and encourage development of the agricultural industry. We could be doing better in our penetration of the grain markets of the world. Over the last 19 years our share of the export grain market has dropped from 35 per cent to 17 per cent.

In the small business sector there are also lots of opportunities. I have already outlined a few incentives and policies that would go a long way toward enhancing and revitalizing that very important job-creating sector of our economy.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, we must renew our economic and political partnerships and get governments working together for the common good, rather than competing with one another and against the private sector. The role of government should be to facilitate, not to obstruct. They should be advancing a mood of harmony and co-operation rather than one of frustration through confrontation.

I believe, as I am sure all Members of the House believe, that Canada can once again be a proud and vibrant nation if only we harness the creative and enterprising spirit of our people. The major component of that aspiration, I contend, is that governments allow people to be free and allow them to grow. We must have governments serving the people rather than people serving governments. In this way, I think we can truly become a very dynamic, prosperous and caring society once again.

• (1650)

Miss Aideen Nicholson (Trinity): Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the mover of the motion on his discovery that the Government has a role to play in our mixed market economy. Today's motion is perhaps an interesting change from some of the cries we hear from the Party opposite, which admittedly does not speak with one voice on the difficulties of government "interference" in the private sector.

The term "industrial strategy" is perhaps less useful than to think in terms of a set of credible, consistent and coherent policies designed both to adapt to current world difficulties and to overcome the structural obstacles to long-term growth within the economy. At Strasbourg last month, Mr. Van Lennep, Executive Director of OECD, said:

> It has been another difficult year for the world economy. No one had thought that the task of defeating inflation and adjusting to the massive oil price shocks of the 1970s would be easy or rapid. But the process of adjustment has indeed been painfully long, and those of us in the business of economic forecasting have again predicted for 1982 an upturn that has not yet come.

Mr. Van Lennep went on to say that he believed there would be an upturn, but went on to say:

> At the same time, we are to an important extent in unchartered territory, both as regards the strength of the conflicting forces of inflation and deflation at work, and the complexities arising from an unprecedented degree of international interdependence.

Recent developments in Europe have not been encouraging. Unemployment has risen more than expected. Demand and output have been weaker than expected. Demand is also weaker than expected in Japan. What does all this mean for Canada?

We face increased competition in our traditional markets and it becomes ever harder to penetrate new markets. We face competition from newly industrialized countries at the same time as less developed countries are finding it harder to purchase our goods, and we face competition from reindustrialized countries such as France and Japan. Canada is fortunate in having considerable natural advantages, including a well-educated work force, advanced technology and abundant resources; but expansion of our industrial sector has been constrained in many respects by a small domestic market. There is now a growing awareness of the need to improve productivity in order to protect and enhance our competitive position. We are the only industrialized country in the world which does not have access to a domestic market of 100 million or more. Our population is only about 25 million, dispersed over a large and difficult terrain.

We trade to live. Exports alone account for one-third of our gross national product, and 20 per cent of our work force is directly involved in producing goods for export. Because of our small domestic market and our heavy dependence upon exports, Canada has a disproportionately high stake in the health of the trading system. Therefore, it is clearly in Canada's interests to contribute to managing world trade in ways that avoid conflict and harsh beggar—my—neighbour approaches to trade.

We are one of the largest trading nations on a per capita basis. As I said, trade amounts to more than one-third of our GNP. Leaving aside services, something in excess of 50 per cent of what we produce is exported. We import a similar amount. Therefore, it is vital to our economy and standard of living to maintain a world trading environment which will enable this trade to continue to flourish.

Where does this trade lie? Trade in excess of $100 billion a year, or almost 70 per cent of our trade, is with the United States, which takes about 60 per cent of its imports from Canada in goods that have either been manufactured or processed. About 14 per cent of our trade is with Europe and about 7 per cent of it is with Japan. This means that about 90 per cent of the huge amount of trading that Canada does involving both imports and exports is conducted with the industrialized western world, particularly with Europe, the United States and Japan. We are in a disadvantaged state because of our small numbers and our small domestic market.

When the last round of the GATT is implemented in 1987, we will see visible tariffs reduced to levels which will not provide the protection for the Canadian manufacturing sector that has allowed it to grow over the years. As we move into a freer trading mode our manufacturing sector, which is not as competitive as it should be in world terms, will have to undergo serious restructuring.

Apart from Australia and to some extent the United States, we are alone in having a huge percentage of our economy and trading produce in resources. In the resource sector a higher proportion of our exports goes to Europe and Japan than to the United States. During the GATT negotiations we hoped to find support from our trading partners for the sectoral support which we suggested would lead to a reduction in tariffs and higher levels of additional value in some of our resource industries. However, our trading partners to date have been unable to go along with that approach, and we continue to be faced with the problem of running into restrictions when we add value to our resources before shipping them from our shores. There is a continued determination on the part of the Government of Canada to endeavour to upgrade our resources before we ship them abroad, and the Government will continue to press for this.

Our merchandise trade figures are in fact very good if looked at as a whole. Currently we have a substantial surplus in our balance of merchandise trade. Over the last few months the value of goods we exported was in excess of that which we imported by almost $4.5 billion, but this surplus stems from large net earnings from our trade in food products, crude materials and semi-finished goods. We still run a persistently large deficit in finished goods.

It is generally considered that the manufactured or finished product sector tends to provide for more job creation than resource development. Therefore, it seems clear that we must seek out opportunities and methods to develop our manufacturing capacity. At the same time we must continue our international marketing efforts both to improve our current market share and to identify additional markets where Canada can be competitive.

The question of research and development has been mentioned by previous speakers today. Canada's emphasis upon R and D has been low in comparison with other OECD countries. In 1979 our research and development expenditures were only 1 per cent of our gross domestic product as compared with 2.4 per cent in the United States, 1.8 per cent in France and 2 per cent in Japan. However, we have been increasing this somewhat, and our R and D expenditures are now at 1.3 per cent of the gross domestic product. The Government has formulated and is vigorously implementing a policy in support of our scientific development, with specific targets for 1985. Certainly the need is well recognized to establish a more comprehensive base for science and technology work in Canada.

Some of the building blocks of an industrialized strategy have been mentioned by previous speakers today. Apart from research and development, there is industrial restructuring, particularly to accommodate the microelectronic communications revolution. There are productivity measures which include job training. Here one must mention the National Training Act, which was recently passed precisely to deal with that. There are measures to deal with international trade, competition and promotion.

Last fall a document entitled "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s" was tabled in this House. In that paper the Government addressed a number of essential building blocks for Canada's long-term economic vitality. These included a $60 billion commitment to developmental spending to 1986, including over a quarter of that sum for energy development expenditures.

The Government stated in that paper that priority would be given to industrial resource and regional development, transportation, export promotion and human resources. Innovation was mentioned as a major factor in enhancing productivity. A series of new initiatives was proposed in five key resource-based sectors—energy, agrifood, fisheries, forest-based industries and mining. The question, then, is not whether we have a long-term economic development plan or a set of industrial strategies, but rather whether the broad themes are understood and are being communicated effectively.

Finally, the question of foreign ownership has been addressed by two members opposite in two different ways. One suggested that the Government is not being vigorous enough. The other Member suggested that the Government was overactive in this area. This perhaps merely points out the difficulty of the issue.

I think we would all agree that Canada needs and welcomes foreign investment. The Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) mentioned that we cannot afford to see capital leave this country. We would all agree with that. But also we cannot afford to see jobs leave this country. While nobody wants to be unwelcoming to foreign investment—and we on this side would not like to see the extent of state control which the New Democratic Party advocates—surely there must be some sensible, prudent measures to assure that foreign investment benefits Canada.

What we now see is that our manufacturing sector, which is very heavily controlled by foreign owners, does most of its research and development offshore. There is, therefore, no benefit to Canada in the creation of new jobs and new products. We also see that foreign-owned businesses in the manufacturing sector import much more than similar Canadian-owned firms. I might just mention some figures. I say, not in any sense of being hostile to foreign investment but in order to emphasize the point, that however much we want and welcome foreign investment, surely we must be prudent when looking at our own long-term interests.

In 1978, foreign-controlled firms accounted for 72 per cent of our imports. Canadian-controlled firms imported only to the value of 4.3 per cent of their sales, while the value of imports for foreign-controlled firms, when looked at as a proportion of their sales, was 22 per cent. In the manufacturing sector the differences in import behaviour were even more pronounced. Foreign-controlled firms imported to a value of 29 per cent of sales, while Canadian firms had a ratio of only 8 per cent. When one also considers that Canada has a higher proportion of its industry under foreign ownership and control than any other industrial country in the world, we have to consider this rather seriously.

I mentioned earlier that research and development is generally done by foreign-owned companies outside of Canada. Our future high standard of living in Canada will depend more upon our mastering of industrial technology than on our accessibility to our natural resources. We must be keenly sensitive to the fact that science and technology are areas of enormously rapid evolution. If firms are doing their research and development offshore, we are losing a tremendous possibility for job creation within Canada.

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Mr. Speaker, just a couple of weeks ago I celebrated my tenth anniversary on being elected a Member of this House. I remember during that election campaign the promise made by the Liberal Party that an industrial strategy was actively being developed and would be ready to take Canada to a new nirvana.

Mr. Blenkarn: It is still coming.

Mr. Andre: The Minister of Transport (Mr. Pepin) was then Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. He assured Canadians that the Liberal Party had things well in hand, that the final touches were being put on an industrial strategy and as a result of its sheer brilliance would lead Canada into unthought of horizons for growth, wealth, jobs and opportunities, things we could only heretofore dream of. That Minister did not manage to survive that election, but unfortunately the Liberal Party did. He was replaced by the Hon. Alastair Gillespie. He said: "I have picked up the baton and I am running with it; just hold on, folks, soon we will have an industrial strategy that will address resources, technology, manufacturing. It will look after Canada's needs for the next century."

Were we ever lucky to have a Minister like that! Well, months and then years passed. The Minister was asked from time to time how things were coming. He said "We are on to it". At some point in time, though, something happened, because this magic answer, this industrial strategy, this answer to Canada, suddenly got replaced by a sectoral strategy. There were 19 sectoral groups identified by the Minister and his brave minions, I believe.

Mr. Lumley: There are 23.

Mr. Andre: Twenty-three, I am sorry. I am corrected by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Lumley). These groups worked laboriously. We were promised that these documents were coming. Eventually, 23 sophomoric, thin documents, written in second year economic language, were produced dealing with these 23 sectors. Those sectorial studies disappeared into oblivion about 15 minutes after they were published, because that is what they were worth. It was a totally worthless production.

• (1710)

The Hon. Alastair Gillespie moved on to his reward as the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The gurus in the Prime Minister's office and the Privy Council office, finding that this sectorial strategy would not work, decided that it must be a structural problem; it cannot be the fault of the Liberal Party. Therefore, they created the Economic Development Board and the position of Minister of State for Economic Development. The present occupant of that post is in the House today. Since the creation of that position, which was the new answer to our lack of industrial or economic strategy, absolutely nothing of value has been produced to this time.

However, over at the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, Alastair Gillespie discovered the Holy Grail. He found an industrial strategy, one based on megaprojects. I recall the First Ministers' meeting of 1978 when he proudly produced that list of 40, 60 or 120 projects. It was a magnificent list. What it was, though, was a list of every project that was planned, considered or even dreamed of by every business, government, entrepreneur and wishful thinker in the country. It was mostly pure fiction. There was one part which was real. That was the megaprojects dealing with energy development, particularly oil and gas development.

With the election of a Progressive Conservative Government in 1979 these megaprojects got under way. Work had activly begun and there was even a great shortage of engineers because of the work and planning that was going into these megaprojects. Some of those projects are mentioned on page 94 of the National Energy Program. They include the Suncor expansion, the Syncrude expansion, the Cold Lake project, the Alsands project, the Canwest project, the Saskatchewan heavy oil tertiary project, the Judy Creek light oil tertiary project, and Hibernia. It is an impressive list. Each project was actively being pursued in 1979 and work was under way in 1980.

Before I deal with what happened to those projects I would also like to mention some gas-based projects which collectively represent megaprojects in that field. They are an ethylene plant by Alberta Gas Ethylene; an ethylene plant by Esso, Alberta Energy and Hudson's Bay Oil and Gas; a polyethylene plant by CIL and Trimac; a polyethylene plant by DuPont and Alberta Energy Company; a benzene plant by Esso and Alberta Energy; a styrene plant by Esso and Alberta Energy; an acetic acid plant by Celanese Canada; a vinyl acetate plant by Celanese Canada; an MTBE plant by Alberta Natural Gas; two Dow Chemical plants at Fort Saskatchewan; and an Alberta Gas chemicals methanol plant. They number 12 in all.

What is interesting about those oil and gas projects is that every single one has gone down the tube. The energy projects that were left from the mythical industrial strategy based on megaprojects produced by the Liberal Government were all destroyed by the National Energy Program. What is really galling is the audacity or stupidity, or perhaps both, of the content of this National Energy Program. I quote from page 94 where these oil projects were listed. It says:

> The positive impact of the Program—

Referring to the National Energy Program:

> —on oil sands development can be illustrated by its effect on the commercial viability of the Alsands project—

Can you believe the audacity, dishonesty or perhaps plain ignorance of someone to write such trash when, in fact, it destroyed those projects? The Alsands project was under construction in early 1980. Men and machinery were on site moving earth.

I do not want once again to go over all of the reasons the National Energy Program is wrong and discuss its disaster. There is no honest person in this country who does not recognize the disaster of the National Energy Program. Why was it such a disaster? One has to acknowledge that part of it is a result of the uncertainty. The newly elected Liberal Government argued, fought and disputed with the Provinces for two years before reaching some reasonable accord. It was an incredible display of mismanagement and stupidity. No industry, entrepreneur or investor can tolerate such a delay.

Second, the Government simply took too much money. It dipped in for a huge amount of money by way of tax increases which were justified on the basis of projections on revenue flow which were pure fiction. In that respect, Mr. Speaker, if you have not read Peter Foster's book called "The Sorcerer's Apprentice", subtitled "The Super Bureaucrats of the Energy Disaster", I highly recommend it. Those geniuses—one of whom is now in Paris at our expense to the tune of $200,000 a year—projected revenues that were pure fiction. They were calculations of the kind you would learn to do when taking a Ph.D in economics at the University of Toronto. They certainly bore no relationship to reality. These bureaucrats divvied up these fictitious numbers. The share of these fictitious numbers were certainly fair but they bore no relationship to reality. The Government simply took too much money. There was not enough left to keep people interested and provide the economic activity from which jobs and spin-off effects come.

In addition, a terrible precedent was set. For the first time in our history, the Government retroactively changed the rules in a highly pejorative way. The world being what it is, we expect that kind of behaviour, unfortunately, from a banana republic, dictatorship or some of the less stable Third World countries. No one expected that kind of behaviour from Canada. Canada was considered to be a stable, democratic country with a long history of fair play. If we made mistakes in the past, we lived with them and changed the rules in the future. We did not change the rules retroactively until this Liberal Government and this Minister did so.

• (1720)

The impact of all of that has caused the demise of all the energy projects which I have outlined, including oil and gas projects. If those projects were in place today, the jobs which would have been generated would not be in the thousands or the tens of thousands, but rather in the hundreds of thousands. In Canada today there are hundreds of thousands of families whose income earners are unemployed because of the National Energy Program and the demise of the only kind of industrial strategy left, the megaproject strategy.

I would refer Your Honour and the rest of the House to the seventeenth annual review of the Economic Council of Canada. Its predictions as to what disasters would befall this country if those megaprojects did not go ahead are turning out to be exactly on target. It was all there. Those were predictions of three years ago. Probably none of the Hon. Members opposite have read it because they would not like the message. However, we do not need a Royal Commission headed by Donald Macdonald and we do not need some fresh new insight. All we need is for someone opposite to read what has been done by this permanent Royal Commission, the Economic Council of Canada, and to heed its lessons.

I want to refer to what can be done and what needs to be done now. Clearly the most terrible and crucial problem facing Canada is the question of jobs. I had the misfortune of living in a home where the father was unemployed for a number of years and I know what devastation that can cause a family. The numbers involving the unemployed are so large that we sometimes do not comprehend them. We say that 12.2 per cent, 12.7 per cent or 1.5 million people are unemployed. They are numbers, but behind every one of those numbers is a family and I know, firsthand, what that means to a family. It is not enough that we say we will have a Royal Commission to look into the matter and report back in three years. It is not enough that we put together a committee of economists and say that from now on the Minister will listen to some outside advice. It is not enough that we reward the perpetrators of this tragedy by giving them year-long vacations in Paris at our expense. We must take action.

Let me speak in terms of what can be done. It has been noted by apologists on the Liberal side that there is not much we can do about world markets, and that is accepted. There is not much Canada can do now about the fact that the world has an oversupply of nickel, steel, copper, lumber, things that we produce in abundance, and therefore we cannot supply the world. We are unfortunately trapped in terms of those circumstances, but that is not true of our energy. The market is here in Canada. We can displace imports.

So there is no reason for us to blame the rest of the world or wring our hands and say there is nothing we can do, because we can, and we can in the area of energy. I am not referring to jobs in Alberta, Saskatchewan or British Columbia when I am referring to energy development. A recent study by the consulting firm, Foster Consultants (Calgary), on behalf of the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada illustrated that when money is spent for oil and gas in Alberta, when one dollar is spent, 40 cents ends up being spent in Ontario because that is where the pipe is produced as well as the valves, the machinery, equipment, trucks, cars and everything else used by the industry. some 16 per cent is spent in Quebec, with 28 per cent or 29 per cent actually ending up in Alberta and the remainder in the rest of the country. Therefore, we are not referring to something which benefits only one region but, rather, something which benefits the entire country.

The netbacks must be adjusted. During question period the other day, someone asked the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) a question about lowering taxes. He replied by asking, "How can I lower taxes when we have such a terrible deficit? One cannot do both". I will give an example of where lowering taxes would decrease the deficit because it would produce more revenue for the Government than the current tax load. I will quote from a speech by the chairman of the board of Dow Chemical (Canada) Limited. He referred to the experience with the company's ethylene plant in Red Deer. In 1982 the company estimated that the ethylene plant would operate at 100 per cent capacity and, as a result, would create $60 million in income tax obligations, $45 million of which would go to the federal government and $15 million to the provincial government. However, the Feds put on an up front tax, the natural gas and gas liquids tax, which would supposedly gain $60 million a year from that plant, or double the the anticipated income tax revenue. Therefore, the Feds would be receiving in excess of $100 million, $105 million, and the Province would receive $15 million from income tax and, of course, would receive an additional $37 million from royalties on gas.

As a result of the natural gas and gas liquids tax, there was just enough of a marginal on the feedstocks to make it impossible for that plant to sell all its products. Therefore, instead of producing at 100 per cent capacity as planned and anticipated and for which markets were available before the federal tax was imposed, the plant was producing at 50 per cent, or half capacity. What was the result? The federal Government, instead of receiving $105 million as planned, instead of receiving the $45 million from income taxes that it would have received before it imposed the tax, will receive $20 million this year. The Province lost some $34 million in taxes and royalties. Therefore, the federal Government not only lost the extra $60 million in tax which it tried to collect but, in addition, cost themselves and the rest of Canada an additional $140 million. That is plain, stupid taxation. All the Government need do is reverse that stupid tax and it would reduce the deficit and put people back to work.

Second, the Government must cut red tape. Historically, for every three geologists working in the energy industry—those are the people who find the oil—one needed one paper shuffler. As a result of the National Energy Program, and goodness knows how many other things those geniuses in EMR have invented, the ratio is now reversed. Every geologist requires three paper shufflers to handle the red tape so he can do his job. We gnash our teeth about productivity and ask why we are so non-productive in this country. It is no wonder. All we do is produce work for paper shufflers. They do not produce anything but simply satisfy the bureaucrats in Ottawa, Edmonton, Regina and other capitals. Let us not blame it all on the Feds.

An Hon. Member: And Alberta.

Mr. Andre: I referred to Edmonton. That is in Alberta, in case the Hon. Member did not know.

Finally, we must restore trust. I want to quote from an article in The Calgary Herald. Francis Reinhardt of the New York investment house, Carl H. Pforzheimer & Co., in reference to Canadian oil stocks stated:

> The mood has improved and some institutions are investing in Canada again. But more who have been long-term investors, and made money here in the past, are staying out because they don't trust Pierre Trudeau not to double-cross them again.

There is the problem, lack of trust.

• (1730)

The best solution is a change of Government. I recognize we are not going to get volunteers for that but at least let us hear a mea culpa, at least let them admit that that was a mistake in the National Energy Program, the 25 per cent back-in, that retroactive confiscation of private property was a mistake. Blame it on Ed Clark; blame it on Ian Stewart; blame it on Michael Pitfield, blame it on somebody, I do not care, but say a mea culpa and show the world that yes, Canada does recognize the retroactive confiscation of private assets is foreign to the policy of this country, and that we will not do that again in the future.

If we do those three things, Mr. Speaker, cut red tape, reduce the net-back and admit the error so as to try to restore some confidence, we can get this sector back to work and generate not a few jobs, not a few hundred jobs, not a few thousand jobs, but tens of thousands of jobs, and restore some sense of future to the many families in this country.

Mr. Maurice Harquail (Restigouche): Mr. Speaker, I wish to begin my remarks by expressing appreciation to the Official Opposition for providing this opportunity to speak to this motion today. As has been acknowledged by one or two previous speakers, none of the Official Opposition speakers have brought themselves around to discussing their motion or laying out in specific terms for the Canadian taxpayer what they would do. They have failed to identify themselves with the question of industrial development in the country.

The Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) talked about, in a critical way, moneys that are going to be made available to de Havilland and to Canadair. I find that very strange that an Hon. Member from Metro Toronto would speak critically of assisting that all-important aircraft manufacturing industry.

As was asked of him by one of the Hon. Members of the New Democratic Party, when will he identify what his Party might do if it ever has the opportunity to be a Government in this country? He said not to worry, there were other speakers following him and they would flesh this thing out as they went along.

The last speaker, the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre) spent his time talking about the only subject that he seems able to speak about, namely, oil and gas. He ridiculed the Government, went on in the most non-productive, negative way, and finally closed wth his usual attack on the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau). What is new about that?

Since they have not bothered to address the subject they have brought to the House today, as I started to say, I appreciate the opportunity of having a few moments of debate in the House to bring the other side of the story.

In industrial policy initiatives since 1980 the Government has, through capital investment, created a favourable investment climate, assured capital availability, set up viable projects in slow-growth areas, and, in exceptional circumstances, it has guaranteed loans. The question of support to high productivity manufacturing, such as Michelin, Chrysler, White Motor Corporation, Massey-Ferguson, Ford—

Mr. Blenkarn: Bail-out.

Mr. Harquail: The Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn) wants to oppose and criticize the system to protect those jobs in Ontario, and now attempts to interrupt my remarks. That is fine. All Canadian taxpayers will take note and good count of this performance. When there is an election and they go into that voting booth, that is when we see the results as to their appreciation of the position of Members from Ontario with respect to serious decisions that are taken to assist plants to ensure and protect those all-important jobs.

Reference was made to the amounts of moneys that have been spent on research and development. In spite of the ridicule and negative talk, the number of dollars that have been assigned by the federal Government to this all-important work is very substantial.

I want to tell Canadians about the dollars that are allocated for ITC and DREE. The new Minister for Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lumley) has the responsibility for something in the order of $3 billion through current budget expenditures to aid industry and small business. The Opposition Members talk about paper, they talk about negative things, but never do they acknowledge the fact that this type of commitment is made. In those areas where decisions are taken we see positive results from the expenditure of those dollars. When you look at small business, FDB, ILAP, STEP, tourism, and other areas of expenditures, current expenditures are over $2 billion.

Opposition Members talk of training people. I do not know of any other country in the world that is doing as much as this Government in providing funds for proper training of men and women in preparation for the work force. That program is not in an idle position. There is greater emphasis being put upon this important aspect of having men and women ready to go into the new high-technology jobs.

In so far as National Defence is concerned, again the Opposition claims that not a nickel is being spent by this Government. When the figures are considered, they are quite impressive, at $7.5 billion for the current budget, for the year-to-year operating expenses, not to mention the Aurora Program, the Leopard tank, the F-18, and the frigate program. In the next 12 years or so in excess of $20 billion is budgeted. The spin-off benefits, the ripple effects and the jobs that will be created by the Government's commitment to these important programs have been spelled out by the Minister of Supply and Services (Mr. Blais) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne).

When we reach the stage of carrying out the commitment we will take the opportunity to highlight the need for directing some of the construction of the frigate program to the dry-docks at Saint John, New Brunswick. They have proven their competence, efficiency and ability to produce an excellent product at that facility. I want to support my colleague who represents that area as well as the other Hon. Members who have identified that need. We know that very shortly hard decisions will be taken as to the location, and successful bidders, with respect to these major projects, and the expenditure to construct these new frigates for National Defence. I certainly want to express my appreciation to the Opposition for this opportunity to highlight the support for the all-important location of those contracts and jobs when we arrive at the final decision to go ahead with the actual construction of the frigates, which are under design at the present moment.

I want to take this opportunity also to flag a very important project in northern New Brunswick, the much talked about zinc refinery which is to be constructed by Brunswick Mining and Smelting, a subsidiary of the Noranda group out of Toronto. We all recall the great enthusiasm when the announcement was made in the course of a budget debate in this House that the plant was going ahead and it was going to create 1,500 person-years of work during the construction stage, and in excess of 500 permanent jobs once completed. I will not take a lot of time to talk about the positive benefits of this type of project when Canadians must find jobs.

Notwithstanding the fact that we have the downturn in the economy of Canada and the United States, not much has been said about the fact that we have three pulp and paper mills under construction in northern New Brunswick, with a total capital expenditure in excess of $700 million. You will not find anyone in the media, CBC or anywhere else, who wants to talk about it for the strange reason that it is too positive, has an upbeat to it. It is good news. Something is happening to create jobs. At the pulp mill at Atholville, New Brunswick, alone, there are over 700 construction workers employed during the modernization stage. That plant will cost in excess of $200 million. The CIP newsprint mill at Dalhousie will have expenditures in excess of $200 million. The Bathurst Consolidated Mill at Bathurst, New Brunswick, will have expenditures in excess of $200 million. These are not projects which are just in the discussion or planning stage. The construction is under way now. The jobs have been created. The money is being spent. All the very positive economic ripple effects from these projects are under way now. But you cannot find anyone, certainly not in the Opposition or in the news media, who wants to tell Canadians the goods news about what is happening at a time when there are difficulties with the economy.

We are very proud of the fact, certainly I am, that we have been successful in convincing these companies to take advantage of the incentive grants provided by the Government through DREE and other attractive programs such as the 50 per cent tax credit, special investment on capitalization, which was brought in. This brings me right back to the urgency of co-ordinating and providing leadership from within the Government, the various Ministries, to ensure that the captains of the industry, one of the largest corporations in Canada, Noranda, continue with their plan to construct this zinc plant at Belledune, New Brunswick.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) has just announced the special allocation of $500 million for job creation, which was well received, and we congratulate him on this initiative, all the time knowing that it is temporary job creation. However, the project I have referred to, of course, results in permanent jobs. I have had meetings as recently as August of this year with officials of the Noranda Group who have stated they want to proceed with this plant, that they will need the plant when the economy turns around.

What I would like to stress today is that we must make sure all the various interested Ministries are very well attuned to the urgency of going ahead with this project in northern New Brunswick because of all of the jobs which will be provided during the construction stage, and, equally important, the permanent jobs which will result upon completion. While I remain optimistic because of the fact that the senior officers of the Noranda Group have stated on more than one occasion their need, desire and interest in going ahead, because of the soft market and the high cost of money in the early part of 1982, the project appears to have been moved to the back burner, certainly it is in the position of just idling at the moment.

What I would dearly love to achieve this afternoon is to focus on this project, bring some attention to it, to stress and underline the urgency of this project. I would also like to take this opportunity to make an urgent request of the various Ministries concerned and responsible for the co-ordination of such a massive program as the construction of this $360-million plant, and to offer, of course, my energy and assistance in continuing the co-ordination of the work that has already gone into this project.

I had occasion to have some discussion with the people in my area during the recent Remembrance Day observances and have found that there is, of course, a continuing concern as to whether in fact the plant will ever be brought into reality, notwithstanding the jobs that are already in place in the mines there, as well as in the operation of the other smelter, constructed some years ago, which provides more than 500 permanent jobs today. With the current unemployment situation in Canada and, certainly, in that part of Atlantic Canada, I need not take the time of the House to underline how much this project means to the economy and to that area. We must continue to keep the project on the rails, to keep that pressure on the officials of the Noranda Group as well as on the Government Ministries involved so we can see that important project brought to reality.

As I mentioned earlier, when I listen to some of the contributions which were made with respect to what is happening in this country, I came to the conclusion that there is simply gloom and doom, that nothing is happening, nothing is being done. I have been given the opportunity to put some of the figures on record, and they are not miserly or conservative figures; they are substantial figures. These figures are not only in the millions, they are in the billions of dollars, and they are not only being talked about, they are in place. They are being expended now within the economy of the country. Those areas which are represented by Members who are able to show initiative in carrying out the work to create jobs in a positive sense, are the areas which will be able to take advantage of the benefits of those dollars which have been allocated, and they will not have to whine or cry about the situation in the country. We must appreciate and deal with the dynamic entrepreneurial skills which Canadians have proved in the past they have.

I invite, implore and urge all Hon. Members to take a very positive look at these excellent opportunities, certainly now with the interest rates coming down and with the upturn in the economy, according to the Conference Board and the Chambers of Commerce. The new Chairman of the Chamber of Commerce, who is from Moncton, New Brunswick, was talking about his optimism with regard to opportunities to create new industry and jobs. This, if we are sincere at all, is what we should be talking about and addressing ourselves to, in a collective and co-operative way, not in a negative way at all.

My purpose this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, is to make a positive contribution to this aspect of parliamentary procedure where the Opposition has a day to have a go at the Government and bring on a resolution. However, I must say that certainly this motion has been a feeble effort, as shown by its wording which is rather convoluted. Certainly the Opposition Members have demonstrated that they are not really prepared to discuss the issues. They have not brought any concrete recommendations or suggestions to the Government.

• (1750)

I would like to conclude by quoting the Prime Minister's speech of October of this year when he said:

> If we cannot fully employ ourselves in production, we must employ ourselves in preparation to produce and transport and complete and sell when the world is ready to buy.
> And if we are to be ready when the world is ready we must recognize another reality, the nature of the competition we now face. Recession has driven other countries, because they are determined or because they are desperate to compete harder to keep their share of a shrinking world market. We face a world, as I have said, where the survival of the fittest nations has become the rule of life.

That certainly will be true for Canada. I certainly hope, Mr. Speaker, that this afternoon I have been able to contribute once again toward the realization of that major project to which I made reference, one which will see the expenditure of millions of dollars and the creation of hundreds of permanent jobs, namely the zinc refinery at Belledune, New Brunswick.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in the attitude of the Hon. Member for Restigouche (Mr. Harquail) when he questioned the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) and asked how a Member can possibly attack an investment by the Government in a business in or near his community. I want to say to the Hon. Member that Members on this side of the House were not elected to come to Government with a big pot of money to bail out their constituents, regardless of how it affected the economy of Canada. They were elected to do a job. That is what is wrong with the Government the Hon. Member is with. Members opposite have the idea that somehow they were elected to come here with the attitude that Government has lots of money, let's get some for my riding because that will make me a somebody. A bail-out by the Government, a free-lunch society, and that is what is wrong. Industry is developed by entrepreneurs, not by handouts. In the handouts we have made to the Hon. Member's riding over the many years of this Government have we created prosperity? Have we put people to work? Have we made that riding a viable place where people are going and business is prospering? What have we done with one DREE program, one handout program, one bail-out program after another? Is that an industrial strategy, or is that a strategy of welfare, unemployment and lack of prosperity? I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that is the kind of strategy the Hon. Member for Restigouche has advocated, that is this Government's strategy, and that is a strategy we must now defeat.

Let us speak positively, Mr. Speaker, about where we must go as a country. First of all, I say to Hon. Members opposite that we must have an industrial strategy of freedom. We have to remove the shackles of regulation and red tape from business. If you want to make people think, you have to make them free. Look at the restrictions in the oil and gas industry. They are not increasing production in this country one iota. Look at the restrictions on farmers. Can you really say that we are producing farm products as cheap as we can? Are you really helping the young farmer get organized and build and create and grow in this country with the restrictions of marketing boards, regulations and red tape? Are you really improving transportation rates, making it cheaper to move goods, with one regulation after another which tells you what you must charge to move a certain product or person from one place to another? Are you really doing anything by not letting the competitive marketplace work? Are you really improving culture and the expression of opinion by one regulation after another, promulgated by the CRTC and the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox)? Are you really improving the productivity of Canada with those regulations concerning the Post Office now before the Cabinet which will prevent municipalities having their employees reading the meter and delivering the bill at the same time, thus cutting the cost of delivering utility bills? Are you really doing something, or are you really trying to preserve a vested interest here, protect a vested interest there, and make Canada less productive, less profitable and with more people shuffling more pieces of paper than are really needed? Is it not the job of Government to be involved only where the vast public interest is at stake, not the minor public interest of some individuals who might want to be protected and maintain the status quo? Should Government not get out of these areas and give the entrepreneurial spirit of Canada freedom? Do we not need a strategy of freedom? I say to the Government, that is the strategy we need and that is the strategy we should start with.

Let us go on to another strategy. Let us talk about the strategy for investment. My friends from the New Democratic Party mentioned the Foreign Investment Review Act. It was brought up in Question Period today. There was concern that certain investors had bought certain buildings in Toronto and the rents would automatically go up because of it. What utter nonsense. Rent control is handled by the Province of Ontario. This Government should not be involved, and Members need not raise that issue in this Parliament. But what are we really concerned about? Let us look at foreign investment. The test now is whether that investment is of significant benefit to Canada. I say, Mr. Speaker, that almost every investment in Canada is of benefit to Canada. We need money to build, grow, to create plants and equipment.

We do not need to turn it off. What we should be looking at is whether the investment is likely to do significant harm to Canadians. The test should not be significant benefit, it should be: is this investment likely to do harm? Well, if it is going to do harm, then let us stop it. But almost always new investment, new technology, new people and new ideas create new opportunities for Canadians and new jobs. What we must do as part of our industrial strategy is to remove the shackles put on foreign investment.

We need to have another strategy, Mr. Speaker, the strategy of hands off. When I began my remarks I was speaking about the attitude of the Hon. Member for Restigouche. His attitude was that these Government programs were great because here he could, with his political influence, maybe get his constituents a dip in the pot.

I see it is six o'clock, Mr. Speaker. May I call it six o'clock and return after dinner?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 6 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

Mr. Blenkarn: Mr. Speaker, prior to the dinner break I was talking about Government programs and about the strategy of "hands off". We have a Government policy that creates one program after another; a total alphabet soup list. Earlier this year I received a phone book, which was roughly one and a quarter inches thick, listing Government programs. Yet we heard the Hon. Member for Restigouche say that his job as a Member of Parliament is to make sure that his constituents can take advantage of these politically oriented programs. Surely, Mr. Speaker, his job is to do something for Canada, not to worry about the political orientation of Government programs.

That is the first problem with these programs, that they are politically oriented. They require someone to submit a brief; they require someone to examine that brief, and they require a grant or decision by the Cabinet, or whoever, that it is going to be of some benefit to someone for something. That is not the way to encourage business. It is not the way to build Canada. You do not build Canada with a bureaucratic nightmare of programs, but that is what we have today. What we have to do now is to eliminate as many of these programs as we can. We have to look at the programs and realize that we can get things moving in the country without this enormous expense list, this enormous bureaucracy, this enormous political influence in the economic activities of the country.

The number of civil servants required to administer the briefs, the payments made out of the envelope of the Department of Industry, Trade and Commerce, the extent of the applications and the quality of the applications, are staggering.

I should like to relate the story of a man who has some political affiliation and who came to my office one day. He told me that he was going to incorporate a company. He said that he knew his way around Ottawa, and he told me that he thought he should call the company "Rip Off Canada Limited". He said that if you know how to write a brief, you could get a grant or loan or something, and that was what his business pattern was going to be. He said "I will only take half the benefit from the businessman. He will get the grant and I will get half the grant, because I got it for him." The concept was "Rip Off Canada Limited", and that was going to be his modus operandi. That is exactly what is happening in the country today. That kind of thing cannot be part of building a nation.

My friend from Restigouche mentioned the fact that $5 billion was going out in this type of program, through regional expansion grants, EDP grants, loans and guarantees. Where are we going with this alphabet soup of programs? In this country have we developed the goal and growth we want? The answer is no, we have not. We would not have nearly 2 million people unemployed if we had developed them.

Just the other day the Hon. Member for York-Peel remarked to me that the unemployment rate is really 20 per cent if you take the Government out of the statistics. Twenty per cent of the people of Canada work for Government one way or another, and they are not laid off. The lay-offs are taking place amongst people who produce real goods and services in the country. That is where the unemployment is, Mr. Speaker.

Statistics show that there is 12.7 per cent unemployment, but statistics do not show that the number of people allegedly in the work force has been reduced by over half a million in a year. The fact is that we have massive unemployment, yet we have this myriad of programs that are supposed to do something. They are politically oriented programs and will not take us anywhere. When John Bulloch appeared before a Committee of this Parliament he told it that over 50 per cent of programs were of absolutely no use to small business and should be abolished. We should get rid of the burden, get rid of the people and get going. We should give business an opportunity to work.

We must have a tax strategy, Mr. Speaker, to encourage growth, not consumption. What have we got from the Government so far? On November 12 we had a budget that discouraged growth, discouraged innovation and new productive machinery by increasing the length of time it takes to amortize the cost of that machinery. In these times is it not appropriate to allow 100 per cent capital cost write-offs for new productive machinery? If you really wanted to increase productivity, is that not what you would do? Would you not tell a manufacturer to buy a piece of machinery that would make things faster and better or to buy robotics or tools that would make him more productive and efficient and able to compete and that he would be allowed to write off the cost in the year of purchase? Is that not what we should do? That is not what we get from a government which is greedy for more money, greedy for money to supply its programs and to feed its amazing bureaucracy. What we want is growth and productivity, but we have not had them.

Should we not have a tax policy in terms of economic development in the poorer regions of the country that ought to provide for tax allowances well in excess of capital costs in the normal sense? Rather than grants, the Government should say to people that they will have a 200 per cent write-off if they invest in depressed areas of the country. They should be told that if they make a profit, they can go home, put it in their pockets and not pay taxes. This is the way things should be done. It should be done by encouragement and by using the tax policy of the country to create productivity, not discourage it; to create savings, not discourage them.

What kind of tax policy was presented last November? The other day the Hon. Member for Etobicoke Centre (Mr. Wilson) asked the Minister some questions with respect to the November 12 budget. He suggested that the Government should rip up that budget, and the Minister said, as reported at page 20615 of Hansard:

> —I still maintain that most of those changes which were proposed by my predecessor were fair and just changes. However, the economic environment has significantly changed in the meantime, and we had to make adjustments. Those adjustments are what I have made. However, in terms of equity, I am fully behind the decisions taken by my predecessor in that respect. I think he was right in recommending them to the House.

The answer is clear, that the Government does not believe in growth, in savings or in productivity, but in something called bureaucratic equity. We will not build a country on bureaucratic equity. We build a country by giving entrepreneurs a challenge, a hope of profit or the sizzle of return. We do not build it by regulations or tax positions which are somehow related to something called bureaucratic equity.

Time is running short. The next strategy we must have is one of fairness. The taxpayers of the country are entitled to feel that when they pay their taxes to the Government they will be fairly treated. What is fair about a manufacturer paying his share of taxes only to find some Government Department giving an interest-free loan to his competitor? What is fair about guaranteeing, as the Government did in the Maislin case, the loans of one transport company when there are 15,000 in the country, as if it were a necessity, as if some other transport or truck driver or someone else could not have picked up the Maislin licences and served the public just as well? It is a question of fairness. The bail-outs by the Government have not been fair because they have tended to assist the losers at the expense of the winners. What sense of fairness is this to the business community when a person who is successful is penalized to support the person who has proven management incompetence? Did they improve the farm machinery business by bailing out Massey? To take a look at what happened to Versatile tractor, to White or to International Harvester, did they really create jobs and improve the farm machinery business? Did they really accomplish anything for Canada, or did they just blow $125 million of taxpayers' money down the sewer?

Mr. MacKay: What about Consolidated Computer?

Mr. Blenkarn: Yes, what about Consolidated Computer, as my friend says? Let us take a look at some of the other Crown corporations.

Mr. Towers: Canadair.

Mr. Blenkarn: We will have an opportunity tomorrow in committee to take a look at Canadair. We must have a strategy of confidence. People have to be confident when they deal with the Government or any government of Canada that they will have a fair shake, that when they invest in something, the Government will not unilaterally and by retroactive taxation take it away from them. When people purchase Canada Savings Bonds and the Government of Canada says that those people can accumulate interest on them for the eight or nine years, is it fair to then say that in three years they will have to pay income tax on the accumulation?

This year the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) sold cumulative bonds. At the same time he did not tell the purchaser of Canada Savings Bonds, who bought them on a cumulative basis, that in 1985 they will have to pay tax on their earned interest. That is what the budget indicates, that is what he did.

How can one have confidence in a Government which lies, misrepresents, seizes assets retroactively or changes the tax treatment of a business expense? How can one have confidence in a government which says to a public servant who has paid a 1.5 per cent extra premium for an indexed pension that somewhere along the line it does not have to honour that guarantee?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I regret to interrupt the Hon. Member but his allotted time has expired. He may continue with the unanimous consent of the House. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: I thank the House; I will try to be exceptionally brief.

I should like to speak of the attitude of the Government toward co-operation with other elements in the governmental system. Over a very short period we have had a Government which has said that co-operative federalism is dead. Unfortunately or fortunately, as one looks at it, we have a system of government in Canada which essentially depends upon two levels—the Provinces and the Federal Governement. When we wind up in a continual conflict between one element of Government and another, we wind up with a situation where taxpayers, entrepreneurs, business persons and people in every walk of life do not know where they stand. It is essential to have a federal-provincial conference of First Ministers on the economy. The situation in the country in terms of employment is desperate.

The other day in the Senate of Canada the Government introduced Bill S-31. It was designed for no other purpose than to cause a war between the federal Government and provincial governments. If we are to have a strategy on which to build the country and put people to work, we must get rid of the confrontational concept of government. I say seriously that we must be finished with the idea that governments are opposed to each other. Surely we elect provincial governments and we elect federal governments. Surely it is the same voter. Surely the voter's interest is to make things work efficiently. The concept of confrontation must cease. Bill S-31 must be withdrawn. A federal-provincial conference must be called.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I should like to indicate to the Hon. Member that Bill S-31 is not before the House. I invite him to keep his remarks to the subject before us.

• (2020)

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to participate in this debate for several reasons. First, as Hon. Members who have sat through this debate will understand, we have heard only a couple of constructive suggestions tonight. However, by and large what have we really heard? We heard some Hon. Members in the Opposition say, cut the deficit. Others said, spend more money; give more money to industry; create more jobs. Other Hon. Members said, strengthen FIRA, while others have said that we must let more investment into the country and that we should relax FIRA procedures. One Hon. Member from one Party was up endorsing the report of—

Miss Jewett: You don't even know which Party.

Mr. Lumley: —the Special Committee on the National Trading Corporation. That Hon. Member will recall that there was a split among the Parties in the House with respect to the National Trading Corporation, and the Government decided for the time being not to go ahead with it. Yet, at the same time, the Hon. Member's Party advocates that the private sector should be left alone. There is one sure thing we can see from the debate tonight, that is that there is no unanimity in the Opposition with respect to the motion before us. Let me quote one part of the Opposition motion. It reads:

> That this House condemns the Government for its failure to increase exports of Canadian manufactured goods—

It is rather ironic that on this very day the largest export contract in the manufacturing sector in the history of Canada was signed this afternoon.

Mr. Stevens: It was a gift, a $300-million gift.

Mr. Lumley: If my colleague, the Minister of State for International Trade (Mr. Regan) were here tonight, he would be talking about what has happened to the economy of Canada with respect to exports in the last couple of years. Since I have had some small part to play in this activity, I would like to cite a few figures for my colleagues. The latest StatsCan figures are for September, 1982. In these figures we find the following:

> The Canadian trade balance on manufactured goods (using the proxy of inedible fabricated materials plus inedible end products) improved dramatically in September and in the first nine months of this year when compared with the position of a year earlier. In the first nine months of 1982 there was an estimated surplus of $3,837 million in Canada's trade in all manufactured goods compared with a deficit of $2,627 million in the comparable period of last year—an improvement of some $6.5 billion.

How the Opposition can condemn the Government for not increasing exports in Canadian manufactured goods when this year we will have the largest merchandise trade surplus in Canadian history is beyond my comprehension.

Mr. Stevens: How about manufactured goods?

Mr. Lumley: Let us take a look at several other aspects of our international trade figures. First, in the last couple of years our trade as a percentage of GNP has increased from the historic level of 25 per cent to almost 33 per cent.

Second, one of the Government's priorities, and I am sure the Opposition's, is the diversification of our trading markets. Of our total trade the U.S. has fallen from the 70 per cent mark to around 65 or 66 per cent. In other words, our trade is more diversified now than at any other time in Canada's history.

One of the other areas the Government has been concentrating on during the past couple of years is with respect to its trade strategy. I say trade strategy because the Government in essence adopted a trade development strategy for the first time in modern history with its focus on major capital projects. For example, the Bombardier contract which was announced today will create 25,500 person years of work in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lewis: That is a campaign team clap.

Mr. Lumley: The main reason for concentrating on capital projects is the sale of capital goods. I am sure all Hon. Members will join with me in praising the Canadian manufacturing industry as well as the Canadian consulting engineering industry, as a matter of fact, all Canadian business, because it has maximized trade potential in these major capital projects during the last two years, far more than at any other time in Canada's history. For instance, there is the General Motors contract with the U.S. worth over $1 billion in the sale of armoured personnel carriers. Our largest World Bank financed contract was the Suralya Power Project, obtained by Babcock and Wilcox. I might indicate that there was some insinuation from one Hon. Member that we assist only those constituencies that are represented by those on the Government side of the House. This project happens to be in the constituency of an Hon. Member on the other side of the House, the Hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. Speyer).

There is one important aspect to our trade which very few people in this House realize, and that is that over 70 per cent of Canada's total trade is in some form of manufacturing. We are not the hewers of wood and drawers of water that some Members of this House and some members of the public would like to make us out to be. In terms of manufactured goods in the export market, what has also happened over the last couple of years? What are some of the other constructive measures this Government has taken?

In the first place, the Government of Canada, two and a half years ago, decided to get into the matching export subsidy business. This increase of manufactured goods in export markets is not just by coincidence. For example, we started to make better use of parallel financing in the countries where CIDA assistance was available. We introduced a new financing facility called Credit Mixte to provide Canadian industry with competitive financing to enter into those middle-income markets which did not have a facility before. The PEMD Program is a program for export market development. Companies all across Canada, especially small and medium-sized firms, have been involved in this Program. The Program was expanded from $7 million to $21 million.

In only 20 minutes Mr. Speaker, we do not have too much time to get into all the specific aspects of the Hon. Member's motion. With respect to the portion on providing incentives for training opportunities, if my seatmate, the Minister for Employment and Immigration (Mr. Axworthy) were here tonight and had the opportunity to speak, I am sure that he would talk about the new National Training Act. Over $1 billion from the federal Government this year has been allocated to it. That, I might add, was with the full co-operation of all the Provinces and all the Parties in the House of Commons. Over 250,000 people will be trained under the new National Training Act.

One part of this program that I think addresses the question raised by several Members concerning high technology is the major skilled growth fund. This provides financial assistance to employers, provinces and non-profit groups to help modernize training facilities and to help adjust our labour force to the high technology industries of the future. Most important are our human resources. The Minister of Employment and Immigration over the past two and a half years has more than addressed himself to this particular aspect.

In the motion of the Hon. Member for York-Peel there is mention of an industrial strategy. I would like to call his attention to the November 1981 budget, wherein a special document was produced by the then minister of finance, "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s". The Government of Canada did not just introduce an industrial strategy, it produced an economic strategy. I would suggest that the Hon. Member for York-Peel and his colleagues read this particular document. If they look at the contents of the document, they will find that the priorities are set out clearly for all to read. There are five major priorities. They are: developing industry, developing natural resources, developing transportation, developing exports, developing human resources—

Miss MacDonald: When are you going to do it?

Mr. Lumley: One can also find the Government's policy direction on ownership of private industry—the Government and the private sector; federal-provincial relations; the international competitive environment, etc. The Government more than produced an industrial strategy. This document sets out a guideline for each and every economic department to follow during the course of its daily operation.

Miss MacDonald: When will it begin?

Mr. Lumley: Let us take a look at the section on industry, Mr. Speaker. One can read our objective for industrial and regional benefits from major projects; industrial investment and innovation; and industrial adjustment obviously. I do not have the time to indicate the details of the specific document—

Mr. Stevens: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Would the Hon. Member entertain a question? It is very simple. I know the program he is referring to, but when is it to be executed?

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, most of it is being implemented since the document was introduced in 1981.

For example, let us consider a couple of programs which the Government has introduced. I will deal with the industrial side. I think I have already addressed the trade component. If the Hon. Member would like to go through the document, I am sure this can be verified. In October, 1981, just prior to the publication of the document entitled "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s", the Canadian Industrial Renewal Board was created. It is responsible to our Department. The Board consisted mainly of businessmen from the private sector. Its mandate was, first, to promote the revitalization of the textile, clothing and footwear industry; second, to promote the strength and diversification of the economic base of regions which are heavily dependent on these industries; and third, to assist workers misplaced as a result of industrial adjustment in these sectors. This program, worth about $267 million, as I recall, was initiated around the same time as the economic development strategy was put forward by the then minister of finance. The Industry and Labour Adjustment Program—the ILAP Program—is a $350 million program which includes subsequent designations of communities for benefits under the program and designation of the major appliance sector and the autoparts sector for aid under the industry specific restructuring program portion of the ILAP.

• (2030)

The Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) asked when some of these programs will be implemented. As I recall his opening comments, he said that the time for talk is over. He obviously has not been paying attention to my colleagues and me in the House during the past two and a half years, otherwise, he would be aware of the number of programs that have been initiated by this Government. I do not know how much time I have left, Mr. Speaker, but my officials have provided me with about 50 pages containing the programs and projects that have been initiated by this Government. I have only outlined a couple of them.

Mr. Stevens: Look at the results.

Mr. McDermid: I am sure they have.

Mr. Lumley: Obviously the Opposition does not want to hear about what has been done. That is fair game. The Opposition wants to indicate to the Canadian public that the Government has done nothing.

Miss MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lumley: Yet they do not want to listen to the Government's response. The Opposition wants to indicate that the Government has been in competition with the private sector. They say to let the private sector do its own thing, as I understood one Hon. Member to say. In the area of trade, the Government has been an active partner, in a complementary sense, with the private sector. I would suggest to Hon. Members in the House that if they do not believe that the private sector has been happy with what we have done with respect to international trade, they should look at the statements emanating from the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Exporters Associations or the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. I am sure the indication is that we have been both an active and a complementary partner with the private sector.

Let me deal briefly with the sectorial strategies. In the last two or three weeks I have undertaken discussions with several individuals in the private sector, including both labour and management, regarding the possible implementation of task forces in the automobile and the aerospace sectors to report within a maximum of four months. The House knows that the Government has undertaken to set up a task force with respect to the fisheries sector and that we are looking at petrochemicals as well. We have already undertaken a review of the shipbuilding sector, and that report will soon be announced.

In establishing the sectorial task forces in this way—

Miss MacDonald: Again.

Mr. Lumley: It is not again. I would like to say to the Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) that it was this Government in 1977-78 that established the 23 sectorial task forces which included business, labour and Government. I think the results were very beneficial to the Canadian economy.

Mr. Stevens: What did you need the Macdonald Commission for?

Mr. Lumley: When the Hon. Member's Government took office in 1979 I do not recall their restoring those industrial task forces or taking advantage of the input which the private sector made at that time.

Mr. Lewis: I love the results.

Mr. Stevens: What about the Macdonald Commission?

Mr. Mazankowski: Go to confession.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Minister has the floor.

Mr. Lumley: Mr. Speaker, one of the Hon. Members opposite talked about too many programs. I happen to agree with him. One of the priorities of our Department is to scrunch those programs. Right now, we have approximately 87 major programs. We will try to reduce this to about thirty, and we are down to about 50 at the present time. We are not doing this for reasons alluded to by the Hon. Member. The main reason is that this Government has a sincere desire to develop the economy in every region of this country. We also have a desire to encourage more small and medium sized businesses across Canada to take advantage of the Federal programs that are available to them. The difficulty is that the majority of the programs are just too complicated, and they are mostly delivered here in Ottawa. Thus one of our major priorities is to diversify the decision-making and delivery mechanism of all these programs. In the next couple of months I hope to be able to make an announcement in this regard.

Mr. McDermid: Is Industry, Trade and Commerce moving to Stephenville, Newfoundland?

Mr. Lumley: You are right, Stephenville, Newfoundland and Sydney, Nova Scotia. There are two of our priorities, Mr. Speaker.

In the remaining minutes that I have, I want to make some comments about productivity. There is no doubt that improving Canada's productivity must be the priority concern of both the Government and the private sector as Canada evolves from the current recession, a concerted and national effort is needed on the part of Government, business and labour in order to bring down inflation and undertake productive investments, which will, in turn, strengthen the competitive position of Canadian firms in domestic and, more important, export markets. In this context, our Department will be focusing its policies and programs on the promotion of productive investments in areas of strategic importance to Canada from an industrial and regional development and adjustment viewpoint.

Mr. Lewis: Like Maislin.

Mr. Lumley: Policies to support both the development and the utilization of advanced technologies will be an important aspect of the strategy. I will be consulting extensively with the private sector and with labour to ensure a strategic focus in a co-operative manner for our Department's activities, and to ensure that the Department's initiatives are carried out in a co-operative manner with the private sector.

While I was talking about productivity I heard a comment from the Opposition with respect to bail-outs and a few companies.

Mr. McDermid: Tell us about Maislin.

Mr. Lumley: I would like to ask those Hon. Members if they would have let Chrysler Corporation—

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lumley: —and Massey-Ferguson go down the drain?

Some Hon. Members: Yes.

Mr. Lumley: The Opposition would have let all those jobs go down the drain. I find that incredible, Mr. Speaker, when I hear Hon. Members talking, on the one hand, about job creation, high technology, exports, and then saying that they would let the Canadairs, the de Havillands, the Massey-Fergusons and the Chryslers of this world go down the drain.

I think the Chrysler Corporation story is one of the great success stories in the past couple of years.

Mr. Lewis: How many cars are coming off the line today?

Mr. Lumley: I am surprised at these Hon. Members who talk about job creation—

Mr. McDermid: What about Coca-Cola?

Mr. Lewis: Bail it out.

Mr. Lumley: The Chryler Corporation guarantee has not cost the Government of Canada one single cent to this day.

Mr. Lewis: Yet.

Mr. Lumley: If we had lost the Chrysler Corporation, 40,000 people would have been added to the unemployment rolls in this country on the first day. If you go back two years, that is 40,000 people who have been employed for two years in the private sector without the cost of one cent to the people of Canada.

Mr. Mazankowski: Tell us about some of the people you threw out of work with the National Energy Program.

Mr. Lumley: I do not know how the Opposition considers return on investment. In my opinion, when the Government of Canada, by undertaking a guarantee, can keep 40,000 people working for two solid years, that seems to me to be a good return to the country's taxpayers.

I see that my time is coming to an end, and I can tell by the animation shown on the opposite side that they have at least heard my speech tonight. That is a welcome change.

I would like, Mr. Speaker, to reiterate the three main goals of our Department. First and foremost, and I believe that all Members will agree, is the goal to create jobs. The second goal is to help provide a stable economic environment for the private sector in this country. The third goal is to pursue balanced industrial growth in support of Canadian regional development objectives.

I would conclude by saying that I agree with the Hon. Members who have said that what we need in this country is more co-operation and less confrontation. I believe that, with the help of all Members in the House, we will achieve those goals.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina East): Mr. Speaker, there is much in the motion introduced by the Conservative Party with which I concur. I condemn the Government also for not having introduced its promised comprehensive industrial strategy, its failure to produce specific strategies to harness the potential of Canadian industry and to promote the advantageous utilization of Canada's human and natural resources and for its low level of research and development in Canada. Indeed, there is much in the motion that I think any fair-minded Canadian would have to agree with and say that what is lacking is a sense of direction and purpose and an effective national strategy to restore our economy and put the country back on its feet. This would offer some hope to the unemployed and particularly to the young men and women who are graduating from the universities without any prospect of meaningful employment.

The record of the Liberal Government during the 1970s and even during the 1960s in the area of research and development is appalling. I think much is already contained in various commissions and studies, to which the Hon. Member referred, regarding the low level of research and development in Canada during the seventies. The percentage of R and D as a percentage of the gross national product dropped to 0.9 per cent. That was around the same level as the expenditure of research and development in countries such as Ireland and Portugal. What happened during the seventies, the years, the decade of Liberal neglect, was that our university research facilities have deteriorated. Studies have shown the deplorable condition of the equipment in our universities. There is no immediate prospect of funding to modernize the equipment which is so badly needed by the research community in Canada. Indeed, if the Government were really committeed to having a strong research and development sector in Canada, I would suggest it would immediately introduce emergency funding to update the existing equipment in our universities. It would be a significant and also a symbolic gesture to show the Government's commitment to improved R and D in this country.

During the seventies also, under the leadership of the Liberals in Government, we saw a massive brain drain. In fact, the projections are that even if we do accomplish our 1.5 per cent of GNP toward R and D, the goal which was read to us during the Speech from the Throne which opened this Parliament, there is grave doubt that there will be enough trained manpower to fill all the scientific positions because of the starving of funds for the scientific community.

Much has been done to blame workers in this country. It is a favourite pastime of our Conservative friends and the Liberal Government to blame Canadian labour. They say Canadian labour is not productive. I would suggest that the fault lies in part with the Government opposite, because during the 1970s, when industry should have been reinvesting in research and development and in more modern plants and equipment, it did not do so. There was a dismally low level of research and development in Canada, below 0.9 per cent of the GNP. In part, both Government and private industry are to blame. The fact that major industries in this country are branch plants of larger multinationals has meant that very little research and development has occurred in the Canadian subsiduaries. It has meant that very little capital has been reinvested in new equipment. In other words, the cream was taken off. Dividends were distributed to shareholders all over the world without the desirable amounts of money being returned for new equipment. Both industry and Government, and industry's lackeys, the Conservatives, have the gall to put the blame on Canadian workers.

To me, productivity is very simple. It is the difference between a person who saws 24 hours a day with a handsaw and another who spends three hours sawing with an electric saw. The person with the electric saw, of course, will be more productive than the person with the handsaw, and it does not matter how motivated they are in their work. The person with the handsaw can have the highest motivation and put in 24 hours a day, yet he will produce less than the person with the electric saw, with some new equipment, with the means to produce more.

Yes, indeed, there is a need for an industrial strategy and, in fact, I would say there is also a need for a social industrial strategy.

The underfunding of the social sciences was another area of Liberal neglect during the seventies. It consisted of the starving of funds for social sciences in this country and the squeeze on the universities. Surely the Government opposite must share a fair amount of the blame for that. We in the New Democratic Party have been calling for an industrial and social strategy for years. In fact, it is a major tenet of our philosophy that one must have some national strategies and establish some national goals in order to bring together industry, science and government into a cohesive whole. If one does not have these strategies, and if one relies upon the blind mechanism of the "market", one will essentially have economic and social anarchy and, indeed, that is occurring today.

I therefore find it somewhat amusing that the Conservatives, in their Opposition motion, should be calling for an industrial strategy, yet most of the speeches I have heard today suggest that that strategy should be one of letting the marketplace take care of things. They suggest that we should just let Government back off, and let the captains of industry, banking, finance, et cetera, make those decisions which will drive the engine of industry and create new science, new research and new developments. I find it just amazing that, on the one hand, they are calling for an industrial strategy and yet, on the other hand, they are saying that the public has no influence or important part to play in the economic life of this country or in the degree of research and development we will have in the future. I find it amazing, especially when I hear people in the Conservative Party who should know better mouthing that line. In this age of rapid scientific discovery and innovation, the public sector has a tremendous need. In the areas of protecting public health and the environment, there is a tremendous need for Government regulation, and concern. However, my Conservative friends say we should do away with all these regulations.

Mr. Stevens: No, we do not.

Mr. de Jong: Yet they are the first ones to complain when private industry has failed to live up to its public responsibilities or when the Government has failed to enforce the public interest. May I take as an example, the case of urea formaldehyde, a new technological innovation which has been proven dangerous to human health. Are the Conservatives suggesting that we should have even less public regulation and have more urea formaldehyde type of situations occurring?

Mr. Stevens: Who led business into it?

Mr. de Jong: Is this the case? However, when the accident occurs, they insist that Government should solve the problem and fix up the mess.

Mr. Lewis: Welcome to the issue!

Mr. Blenkarn: If you had not had Government in it in the first place, you would not have had the problem.

Mr. de Jong: My Conservative friend suggests that if we had not the Government in the first place, we would not have had the problem.

Mr. Blenkarn: Of course not.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, it is this kind of thinking that really has me puzzled about my Conservative friends. The problem with the Conservatives is that they are trying to ride both sides of the fence, and I am sorry, but it does not add up.

In the area of rapid technological innovation, there is a tremendous need for public concern and interests to be protected, particularly—

Mr. Blenkarn: Who is going to do that? The policeman?

Mr. de Jong: My friend asks who will do that. There is only one body which has the ultimate responsibility for the public, and that is this institution.

Mr. Blenkarn: More policemen.

Mr. de Jong: That means Governments and that means the strong public sector. If the Conservatives cannot intellectually understand that, they could at least be honest and stand up and say so.

Mr. Blenkarn: We understand it.

Miss Jewett: They are on both sides of the issue.

Mr. de Jong: The history of this country has always dictated an important role for, the public sector—economically, as in the development of the CPR, and culturally, in the development of institutions like the CBC. It has been recognized most in this country that if matters are simply left to the market forces, our provinces would have become additional States in the Union.

Mr. Blenkarn: Nonsense!

Mr. de Jong: A conscious public effort is needed to withstand that pull south. The same is true in the area of research and development. While the Conservatives call for more research and development, and I totally agree with them, how do they propose to get more research and development?

• (2050)

Every major study has indicated that the main problem with research and development in this country is that the private sector in Canada does not invest in R and D as they do in the United States, Japan, Germany, and Great Britain.

An Hon. Member: How do you know that?

Mr. de Jong: Because every study on the subject has indicated that the branch plant economy, the nature of our economy, dictates against the development of our industry in this country. That is the result of studies of economists, sociologists and accountants. These are not ideological figures; they are not political figures; this is the bare-bones reality of where we are at in this country.

Where are the solutions and how are we going to come to these solutions? Unfortunately, the solutions are not alluded to in the motion and the speeches we have heard today.

There is a tremendous need for an industrial-social strategy. Many countries in the Western world are experiencing unemployment at significant levels. There is no immediate hope that that situation will change in the next couple of years. It seems that the economies of the Western world have reached a certain plateau. Many governments now are making a mad dash, hoping to gain some leadership in the only growth area in most economies, the high-tech industries.

The interesting contradiction is that most of those technologies will cause increased unemployment. The new microtechnologies will mean the massive lay-off of hundreds of thousands of clerks. What is missing is a national, social and economic strategy because we are going into the twenty-first century, whether we like it or not. We have essentially two choices. One is to proceed in an unplanned way, in a reactive way, trying to solve the problems as they are created. The alternative is to plan for the changes; to develope some strategies in order to control the pace and direction of these changes so they will have a minimum negative effect on Canadians. Those are the two choices we have.

To me a national economic and social strategy will bring together members of industry, labour, universities and the scientific community. There should be a give-and-take and some co-operation. The only way we are going to survive as a society is through that co-operation because these new technologies will be coming and they will have both a positive and a negative impact upon our society. Yet what I see from the Liberals is just continuing blunder after blunder after blunder. We are going to blunder into the twenty-first century.

Mr. Stevens: They are following your policies.

Mr. de Jong: My Hon. friend from the Conservative Party says that they are following our policies. May I suggest that what the Liberals have done is to give Government a bad name. Years of mismanagement have brought disrespect to the public sector, and I blame the Liberals for that. The Liberals like the Conservatives, they have never believed in a strong public role in managing the economy. That is why it is an ongoing program of blunder and blunder.

We are going to go into the twenty-first century and we are going to have technological innovation, whether it comes from within Canada or without, or whether other countries are going to take the lead. In fact, many other countries now are investing huge sums of money into R and D. I refer to France where agreements between labour, industry and government have meant a massive increase in their R and D expenditure. They are going to take a massive leap, especially in the fields of microtechnology and bio-engineering. Telidon, or their version of this technology, is being introduced on a massive scale. Whether we like it or not, the twenty-first century is going to come to Canada. It is just a question of how prepared we are going to be for it.

There are certain questions I believe we should ask in discussing R and D. We should also be concerned about the qualitative and not the quantitative aspect of R and D. Research and development for whom? Who will benefit? Who will pay what price? Perhaps we should also look at other forms of technologies. There is a whole other field rarely discussed called appropriate technology. These are the technologies like the innovation of new airtight wood stoves that allow massive decreases in fuel consumption, that reduce the cost of living of average Canadians, make us as a society more self-sufficient and less dependent upon non-renewable resources like the fossil fuels.

Perhaps there are other innovations that will reduce the cost of living that Canadians have to face every year. Those would be technologies and innovations that would reduce the cost of living, that would make it easier for Canadian men and women to live and would require less income on their part.

There are new technologies in alternate energy. Perhaps we can develop new technologies in home construction. I estimate that the Canadian family has to spend up to $750,000 in their lifetime to pay for their housing. Perhaps we can develop new forms, new technologies and new means by which housing can be supplied so that it is no longer necessary for an average family to earn $750,000 just to pay for their housing, therefore, making it less necessary to earn that income.

Perhaps we will never again have full employment. If that is the case, how can those who are unemployed, through no fault of their own, gain the income to buy life's necessities, how can they survive? Are they, as victims, to be blamed, to be called lazy and parasites on society? I do not think so.

I think there are possibilities for Canadian ingenuity to develop other social forms, to develop appropriate technologies that would allow a meaningful existence to all people. We have the brain power, we have the resources. I know there is a natural will in the country to come together and work toward some collective goals. What we need is some leadership. We have not seen that leadership.

In conclusion I thank the movers of the motion for presenting this resolution. It is an important motion. I think it should be debated in terms of its full meaning. Perhaps out of such debates we can begin to come to some understanding as to what an industrial and social strategy really should include, if we are to survive as a society.

• (2100)

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker at the beginning of my remarks tonight I think it is important that we take a look again at this motion which the Tories put on the Order Paper for today, and to look at all the imagined failures for which the Opposition is condemning the Government, for failure to introduce a comprehensive industrial strategy to rebuild the Canadian economy, for failure to produce specific strategies to harness the potential of Canadian industry to promote the advantageous utilization of Canada's human and natural resources, for failure to increase exports of Canadian-manufactured goods, and for failure to provide incentives for training opportunities and to the private sector for new and increased levels of research and development in Canada.

Miss MacDonald: Hear, hear!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The Hon. Member for Kingston and the Islands (Miss MacDonald) is applauding that. The only thing, Mr. Speaker, they did not condemn this Government for failing to do was moving the Canadian embassy from Tel Aviv to Jerusalem. They will probably get around to that one of these days also.

Let us look at that motion and at some of the speeches the Opposition has made here in this House today, and we will start with the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens). He started off by saying he was going to be positive, then proceeded to be negative once he finished listing some of the great inventors of Canada. And when it comes to inventing and being a great inventor, the Tory Party will probably go down in history as being one of the greatest inventors of political scams in history. The Hon. Member says this Government is still trying to turn trade around, and he went on to talk about some of the trade deficits which the country had. He chose, of course, the year 1979 when he said the trade deficit was $18 billion. Naturally, the Hon. Member went back in history, as Tories always do, because he did not want to talk about the last three years in which the trade surplus for Canada has been the largest of any three years in our history. In fact, for the first three-quarters of this year, the trade surplus is over $14 billion, while in the third quarter, the U.S. trade deficit was over $13 billion. These are the great free enterprisers and entrepreneurs which the Tories opposite hold up to us as an example when they want us to increase our trade.

It is odd, Mr. Speaker, that the Hon. Member conveniently forgot the three latest years which have been the best trade years in our history. He then spoke about the deficit and he compared it to the U.S. deficit and said our deficit is twice as high on a per capita basis, and the U.S. is, of course, more worried about their deficit than this Government is. I do not argue with that, Mr. Speaker, but the U.S. Government is a whole lot less worried about their poor and their ill than this Government is, because this Government believes in protecting the people of this country from forces over which they have no control, like unemployment and illness, and that is what the Tories conveniently forget to put on the record.

The Hon. Member then condemned the Government, and the very Minister at whose Department this motion is aimed, for giving additional capital funding to de Havilland and Canadair. I would like to hear him explain that to his constituents in the Toronto area, because he says it would have been better spent in providing research and development. Apparently, we are to follow the example of the Diefenbaker Government in cancelling the Avro Arrow. But the Hon. Member fails to mention, of course, at the same time, how much of that capital money de Havilland and Canadair have put into research and development in this country to keep aerospace workers employed, and to develop new aircraft, some of the best aircraft in the world for the purposes for which they were developed.

An Hon. Member: What about the Challenger?

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The Hon. Member opposite wants to talk about the Challenger. I would be glad to talk about the Challenger because it is the finest executive jet aircraft built to date. And that is what bothers the Hon. Members opposite. When they see a company which happens to be owned by the people of Canada doing a good job, they become very upset about it. de Havilland has developed two of the best short take-off and landing aircraft in the world. Yet the Hon. Member for York-Peel would have that go down the drain, for some odd reason. He was not the only Hon. Member who spoke about these companies. There was one other Tory member, and that was the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn), who conveniently left out de Havilland. He only talked about Canadair because that happens to be in Montreal and not Toronto. A good deal of the money which has gone to these two companies, Mr. Speaker, has in fact gone into research and development, the kind of research for which this country is richer.

I am not going to say much about the New Democratic Party because, generally speaking, their remarks were much more positive than those of the Tories. I might just comment on the remarks of the Hon. Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong), the last speaker for the NDP. He said we were going to blunder into the twenty-first century. He is probably right. Then we heard from the Hon. Member for Vegreville (Mr. Mazankowski) who has a pretty good reputation in this House. He was making a great plea to give private sector a free hand. I do not mind that at all, Mr. Speaker. I think it is good to have a private sector. But the Iron Ore Company of Canada had a pretty free hand, and there is a rather famous Tory who has been promoted on his great management skills in that company, and it is not doing so hot these days. They are walking away from a community which will be dead if they do, along with several other ancillary communities which are dependent on that mine and that production.

An Hon. Member: Talk about Uranium City.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Yes, I will talk about Uranium City. That is a tragedy also, but I do not go around bragging about it as the Tories do. If an operation in which the Government is involved fails it is a great tragedy, but when a whole town may be devastated by private industry walking away from it, that is fair game. Let us be consistent in our logic and not continually use Tory logic, which does not seem to be any logic at all.

An Hon. Member: You are still smarting over the New Brunswick election.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I am not smarting a bit over the New Brunswick election because I was not part of the New Brunswick election. I did not have to be elected in that election, and I will worry only about the next election in New Brunswick.

An Hon. Member: You told me what was going to happen. You were 180 degrees out.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I might have been. I will not argue that. But the voters have spoken and I accept it, and that is something the Tories have never done. They have never accepted the verdict of the voters unless, of course, it is one of those rare occasions when they happen to be victorious.

We had the plea from the Hon. Member for Vegreville to give private enterprise a free hand. We did that with Hawker Siddeley in Nova Scotia and with Clairtone and Brickland, and Massey-Ferguson, Admiral, Chrysler and Maislin, a whole list of them. They were all great exponents of private enterprise, until they got into trouble and made their pilgrimage to Ottawa to get money from the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce (Mr. Lumley), then hightailed it back home to condemn the Government for being involved in private enterprise. You cannot have it both ways, Mr. Speaker. It is either fish or fowl, it cannot be both.

The most obnoxious speech, Mr. Speaker, we heard today from the Opposition was the speech of the Hon. Member for Mississauga South. Well, he is the right winger of all right wingers. He would have let Chrysler go down, he said. He did not say it in his speech, but he said it from behind the curtain when the Minister was speaking. He says you build a country by the sizzle of the return of private investment. That is all very well, but at the same time he said that if you reduce taxes, Government gets out of the businessman's hair and lets him have a free hand, then everything is going to be fine. I would say that is a prime example, Mr. Speaker, of a brain in neutral and a mouth in overdrive.

He told us about somebody coming to his office who called the Government incentive programs, "Rip-off Canada". This individual was supposed to have some connection with this Government. From the way the Hon. Member recounted the story, if that gentleman had any connection with this Government, it should have been with the correctional services part of the Solicitor General's Department, and only with that. It is reprehensible, Mr. Speaker, for the Hon. Member to make statements like that in this House, and I suggest to him that he should not make statements like that unless he is prepared to back them up with facts.

Mr. Blenkarn: I ran out of time and you know it.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): The Hon. Member says he was running out of time. He was given extra time and used it to talk about something else.

The Opposition, of course, is always making those kinds of demands on the Government. They are always demanding new programs, new incentives and new spending. On the other hand, they also want a smaller budget, a leaner Government, fewer taxes, less regulation and less interference with business.

Mr. Shields: And less Grits.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Well, I guess that is one of the luxuries you have when you are in opposition. You can have your cake and eat it, too. We heard, again from the Hon. Member for Mississauga South, and some of his colleagues still sitting in the House, that they would let Massey-Ferguson and Chrysler go down. But that was not the stance they took in Question Period day after day when those companies were originally in trouble. They were up on their hind legs demanding of this Government that we provide incentives to assist those companies to save jobs. Now that the jobs have been saved they are condemning the whole effort.

Mr. Mazankowski: What did you do with Alsands and Cold Lake?

Mr. Kempling: Tell us about Maislin.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): I mentioned Maislin in my remarks. As far as I am concerned, it fits in the same category with Massey-Ferguson, Chrysler and all the others that you are opposed to. Alsands and Cold Lake were private enterprise as far as I am concerned.

Mr. Shields: Yes!

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Nothing has been done, they say. Let us take a look at the record, Mr. Speaker. The record is long but I will not go into it in a lot of detail. The Opposition Members do not believe, of course, in assisting the underdeveloped areas of this country either. From what we heard this afternoon we can assume that there should be no tax incentives for the underdeveloped areas, there should be no grants, and yet we have the Hon. Member for Fundy Royal (Mr. Corbett) getting up here in the House, crying crocodile tears over the situation at Chatham where not one job has been lost because of this Government's action, and where I am determined not one job will be lost. Yet they do not want any incentives for areas like that.

Let us look at some of the money the Government has put into the various regions of this country. I am talking about the time since 1980, and this is only part of the list. The Winnipeg core, for instance, $32 million; Northern Ontario, $10 million; Îles-de-la-Madeleine, $13.7 million; southeast New Brunswick, $10 million; P.E.I. development plan, $80 million; Strait of Canso Development, $3.2 million; Sault Ste. Marie infrastructure, $21 million; Manitoba northland, $4.5 million; coast of Labrador, $47.3 million. The list goes on and on and on. I will not read any more, it is available for anyone who wants it, but I do want to talk for another minute or two about the situation in New Brunswick, and Northumberland-Miramichi in particular. We in New Brunswick are very much dependent on the incentives devised by this Government and provided by all taxpayers of Canada for the development of our area. We have the problem of Chatham, and it is a very serious problem indeed. I reiterate, not one job has yet been lost.

Mr. McDermid: Yet.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): And we have today from the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lamontagne) a commitment to the maintenance and operation of the runway, to the maintenance of the third field training and technical unit, and to the maintenance of the infrastructure there so long as it has to be maintained until other uses are found for it. Apart from that, he is committed to transferring to Chatham the pay directorate of the Department of National Defence and some 350 jobs, with a capital investment of $6 million or $7 million.

That is a good start but it is not a solution, it is only the beginning of the solution. We had to have a full solution. I have said time and again that four areas cannot be tampered with: the economic benefits must be maintained; the level of jobs must be maintained; the infrastructure, including the runway, must be maintained; and the accrued rights and benefits of the civilian employees must be protected. That is not a very small undertaking, Mr. Speaker. I suppose if you were losing that many jobs in Toronto there would be all kinds of Tory Members up on their hind legs yelling and screaming that the Government had to provide incentives to retain those jobs. Once the jobs were retained, of course, they would then be up on their feet yelling and screaming that the Government should not be involved. Just like the Hon. Member for Fundy Royal who never had any interest in the Miramichi until the announcement was made with regard to the stand-down of 416 Squadron at Chatham, and then all of a sudden his heart started to bleed. Well, that has not impressed a lot of people in the Miramichi, and I doubt that it will.

Mr. Lewis: Neither have you.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): Instead of crocodile tears, our interest is in action. But we must solve problems like that, and I say, Mr. Speaker, that private industry alone will not solve them because private industry, if left to itself, will do exactly what the Tory Members over there want it to do; it will locate in the Edmontons, the Torontos, the Montreals, the Calgarys, the Windsors and Halifaxes, but it will not locate in the small rural areas of this country without incentive from Government, without grants to assist in the development. If anyone here can convince me, for instance, that Mitel would have gone to Buctouche without Government incentives, I am prepared to listen. But I say it would never have happened, and we will never have that type of industry or development on the Miramichi of New Brunswick without Government incentives and grants, and without persuading business to put their industries where the labour is. The Tories, of course, would have us move those workers to their part of the country, to the metropolitan areas of the country, rather than to provide the jobs and opportunities where the people are, where they have grown up, and where they want their families to live and grow up.

Thank you very much, Mr. Speaker.

[Translation]

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few comments about this motion which is quite relevant in the present economic context. I shall try to do so quickly since other Members also want to speak. I wish to congratulate the mover of this motion which, and I quote:

—condemns the Government for its failure to introduce its promised comprehensive industrial strategy—

—for which we have been waiting I do not know how many years. Mr. Speaker, I shall not go over some remarks about partisanship that I was somewhat shocked to hear in such an important debate. I listened closely to the criticisms which the last spokesman for the New Democratic Party levelled at the Progressive Conservative Party, but I think that the Canadian people realize that it was his own party that made it possible for this Government to return to power. It is not the first time that the New Democrats have sold out to the Liberal Party. I am thinking about 1974 and the following years. If one party should be held responsible for the loss of 400,000 to 500,000 jobs in Canada jointly with this Government that refused to maintain our tax credit on mortgage interests, which would have really given a new impetus to the building industry, it is certainly the New Democratic Party. It should be held as fully responsible as the present Government. There are limits! I shall not say too much about the NDP because we in Quebec are not very familiar with it, not even with the meaning of those three letters. I remember the candidate who opposed me in my constituency and the billboards that said: "NDP means No Drawing Power." This party is therefore not our main concern in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to go quickly over the comments made by the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion (Mr. Lumley), who referred to the efforts made by this Government since 1981. It is obvious that the Government is making some effort; it is also obvious that it has acted as a fireman must act when a fire breaks out. Today's motion condemns the Government, and I think everyone will agree that it was not the Progressive Conservative Party that has wasted the time of this House during the last 20 years, considering the length of time it stayed in power. We are all well aware that in the last 20 years, except for a very brief period, we have had a Liberal administration which is responsible for our present problems.

Is there any need to refer to the thousands of bankruptcies, to unemployment which has increased tenfold in the last ten years or to the present situation? The Liberal Member who spoke before me stated that the private sector could not manage its own affairs effectively without the co-operation of the Government. Mr. Speaker, we are well aware that within the framework of an industrial strategy, the Government will obviously have to develop an attractive climate for investment, that it must provide medium and long-term directions to private industry if it is willing to make room for private business, and that it must also provide additional assistance to certain disadvantaged sectors or regions. There is no doubt about that, but it must be within the framework of an industrial strategy and a medium and long-term economic policy. As concerns this economic policy and industrial strategy, Mr. Speaker, I shall not be able to devise solutions this evening, but common sense requires that I point out to the House that the government has not made every effort possible to develop such a strategy, which would mean, first of all, bringing together industry, namely investors, businessmen as well as unions—and if productivity is our goal, this is important—and, of course, the Government itself and the Departments concerned. To my knowledge, a real industrial strategy has not been brought before this House in the last 15 or 20 years. In my opinion, we have had no real industrial strategy. Of course, the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has a clearly socialist view of the economy as a whole.

Anyway, our liberal friends know where the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) came from before leading the Liberal party. This is of significance, and I am serious about this, Mr. Speaker, because the NDP often complains about liberal policy. Well, the Prime Minister has a socialist approach and the liberals do not realize where the Prime Minister has led them. He has done such a bad job of implementing his socialist policy that the socialists will no longer support him, they can not vote in support. This is astounding. And it is a fact that the whole government approach is now distorted by the Prime Ministers' views. Well, the Liberal party was not leaning that way not so long ago, before the last fifteen years. I would simply ask honorable members to ponder seriously and honestly over the prevailing situation. There is no doubt that the outlook is bleak. Canadians are worried.

Canadian youth is losing hope, and why, Mr. Speaker? Because there has not been a genuine industrial strategy. What would have happened? The minister referred earlier to the aid extended for instance to Canadair and de Havilland. Is that creating one single new job right now? Not at all. This is another government effort to salvage what may be left. If we had had a genuine industrial policy or strategy, would the shoe or textile industries have gone through the hardships they have over these last few years? Of course, they will argue they have spent millions. The minister said so earlier. In the textile industry, there was a recommendation to grant millions of dollars, but to what end? To promote early retirement at age 50. Clearly, they have given up hope in the future of the textile industry. They are going to help other industries. How long did we have to wait for the minister to reinstate quotas in the footwear industry? Five or six months, and in this House, Hon. Members opposite would invite me to put questions, because it was getting embarrassing for them to challenge the minister. Finally, the minister caught on, and I do not blame him too much for his efforts. He has been talking about it since 1981, but we know that an industrial strategy should have been established 20 years ago, and I feel I have to call to account a government that has been in power for 99 per cent of those last 20 years.

So, Mr. Speaker, there is ample justification for blaming the government for the lack of any industrial policy, and this is why it is difficult for Canada, an industrialized nation, to match many other countries at this point. So, here we are, Mr. Speaker, coming with band-aids to salvage what can be saved, and this is unfortunate. A genuine industrial strategy would have enabled a number of industries to stick it out. Those industries would have been forewarned. Union co-operation could have been obtained. The importance of what is called productivity could have been foreseen, to meet international competition. There has been no strategy, there has been no concern for the future, there has been a lack of foresight, although to govern means to be able to anticipate future developments. I submit we have every justification to blame the government for not establishing the industrial strategy that was of vital importance for Canada's future. They failed to do so, and today they resent our blaming the government's failure to create such an industrial strategy. Clearly the government must accept not a part of, but the total responsibility for the want of such a strategy, and therefore the responsibility for the growing misery in this country where Canadians are greatly concerned about the ability of their administrators.

This is the long and the short of it, Mr. Speaker. I doubt there is any government Member who is not embarrassed at having to defend the current economic conditions we are going through, because of the lack of a long-term strategy.

Mr. Speaker, this is not to say that the government must get involved daily in industry or the private affairs of individuals.

The duty of the state is to propose major trends and policies which will be of interest to the private sector, for example, incentives to invest in the country, and therefore it must be in a position to provide this additional assistance which is often required. And the state also has the power to steer those industries toward sensitive sectors and regions which the unemployment rate has made vulnerable. The state can do that, but without substituting for private companies. That is all we are asking for. But again that is part of a well-orchestrated industrial policy and strategy. I repeat—and I have said it before—the situation will remain unchanged until such time as the Government agrees to meet with union and industry spokesmen and spells out its mid- and long-term outlook. But that is not being done in the energy sector.

Everyone knows that investments of $40-odd million will be required because the Government undertook to substitute for private industries. That is what happened because the Government decided to substitute for private industries instead of giving them free rein to do what they can do better than the state. And the same is true in other areas. It has therefore become urgent to introduce an industrial strategy, and we would be remiss if we did not take the Government to task for failing to do anything about it during the past 20 years. As a result, thousands of Canadians are now deeply concerned. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) did say that a hard winter is ahead of us, and other agencies have confirmed that the unemployment rate will remain at 12 per cent. Of course, nothing has been done to solve that problem.

The Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion brags about the $1 billion recently earmarked by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) for a number of new projects which will make it possible for thousands of Canadians to work for 20 or 26 weeks before going back to the unemployment insurance counters. That is not the way to build our country and give Canadians renewed confidence.

I could recite long lists of figures and talk about the huge bankruptcies we had in 1982; 40 per cent of those 8,074 bankruptcies occurred in my province. And God knows, Mr. Speaker, as you do, that the people of my province are worried as well about the lack of any industrial strategy which they deplore. So we are amply justified in blaming the Government today. I am quite certain that some Liberal members are also extremely disappointed because they were unable to influence the Cabinet which has refused to meet urgent needs and introduce that industrial strategy for the future of our country. We are now demanding it in stronger terms than ever. It has never been so urgent, but the harm has been done and the Government must assume full responsibility for that. With respect to the lack of industrial strategy, the Government will not get off the hook as easily as that, even though its advice is that we should forget the past.

How can anyone ask Canadians to have faith in this Government, responsible as it is for the mess we are in? That is impossible, Mr. Speaker. That is why of course we are again trying today to convince the Government to accept a proposal which has to be implemented, namely the introduction of an industrial strategy. I would hope that this time the government will realize its importance as a key solution for many years to come. Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, it is too late, much too late, and you cannot ask starving Canadians to tighten their belts further. But Canadians will certainly remember that the blame for this belt tightening is to be laid not on this side but on members on the other side who would take no heed of them. Although I still have a lot more to say, Mr. Speaker, I prefer to let other Hon. Members speak.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Speaker, would the Hon. Member for Joliette answer a question?

Mr. La Salle: Very quickly, though, because I want to let other Hon. Members speak.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please! The Hon. Member has asked the Hon. Member for Joliette whether he would answer a question. And the Hon. Member for Joliette has clearly indicated that he would rather let other Hon. Members speak.

Mr. La Salle: I have agreed to give a very short reply to the Hon. Member's question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Agreed! The Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion.

Mr. Maltais: I will be brief, Mr. Speaker. I would have liked the Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle) to be more specific about asbestos and iron. I would like to know what would have been the effect of an industrial strategy considering that markets depend on international conditions?

Mr. La Salle: I said that if an industrial strategy had been developed 15 or 20 years ago, the closing down of plants could have been anticipated and prepared, but as there has been no industrial strategy, those conditions were unexpected and the poor people of those areas are now facing a recession and they are concerned because the government has not drawn up any industrial strategy which would have enabled industries to train them and perhaps direct them to another sector.

Mr. Maltais: I would like to ask another brief question. With regard to iron, if we consider private entreprise.

Mr. La Salle: I regret Mr. Speaker, but as I promised I would like to allow some of my time to my other colleagues.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State for Economic Development and Minister of State for Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I take this opportunity to discuss this matter with Hon. Members here in the house tonight, especially since I have not heard anyone on the other side of the House mention the hard facts, the real data on what we have done to establish science and technology here in Canada.

[English]

It is true that Canadian manufacturers, producers and exporters face incredible challenges. This is for a number of reasons. The inflation rate in Canada is not at the level we would like to see, nor is Canadian productivity as high as it should be by international comparison. Our international markets have gone soft as the world recession has taken a real hold. Other countries are suffering much more than we are because of these circumstances.

In this spirit of diminishing world markets, we see many countries resorting to non-tariff barriers and to a spate of other mechanisms designed to stop our exports, and we are an exporting nation. The way to overcome these problems will not be easy. We have never pretended that it would be, but certainly the cutting edge of our economic strategy for the future must be the encouragement of technological research and development. It is through this approach that we will be able to compete in international markets in the days, years and decades ahead.

The paper released last year entitled, "Economic Development for Canada in the 1980s" recognized the important contribution research and innovation has made in the past and will make in the future to economic growth. Its single most important message was that we must concentrate our efforts on various industries in Canada, including resource and industrial development, export promotion, transportation and communication infrastructure, and the development of manpower skills. A solid research base is fundamental to success in all these areas.

In January 1981 the federal Government committed itself to a major increase in the level of research and development, namely, that we would go up to 1.5 per cent of the gross national product by the year 1985. I believe the way we are doing this is the correct approach. Approximately 50 per cent of this increase will come from industry itself, one-third will come from the federal Government and the remaining one-sixth will come from a combination of provincial governments, universities and private institutions. This ambitious target is one which I believe we have to meet if we are to acquire the newly emerging technologies we need badly in order to create jobs in the country.

What progress have we made in less than two years since the program of 1.5 per cent of GNP devoted to research and development was entered into? One might argue that we have not gone far enough, but the results are most encouraging. In less than two years we have gone up from less than 0.9 per cent of gross national product to over 1.2 per cent. It shows what we can do when we have the collective will, when we set those targets and we set our priorities. This has been no mean accomplishment, particularly in the period of recession that we have faced.

Another thing that happened, which I think is significant, is that during this period we have attempted to achieve more research and development by a co-operative relationship between industry and government. In the first two years covered by the framework, the federal expenditures on research and development rose by nearly $435 million. The main estimates for 1982-1983 will increase R and D expenditures even further by an additional $250 million. It is important to note that this increase is going primarily to industrial research and development where it will have the best opportunity to create more jobs for Canadians. The R and D activities financed by the federal Government but which are performed by industry will have almost doubled in three years.

Federal assistance to industry in support of research and innovation takes a number of forms. We are all familiar with the Industrial Research Assistance Program administered by the National Research Centre; the Enterprise Development Program and the Defence Industry Productivity Program. These are programs of the federal Government aimed at providing technological information services and creating new centres for advanced technology. We have developed two university innovation centres, and we are developing ten universities with the capability of doing electronic research right across this country in every one of our Provinces. In addition, we have used the federal procurement and contracting out policies to support increased R and D of Canadian industry. Twenty two per cent of the federal Government's 1982-1983 budget for research and development in the natural sciences is directly targeted to industry. All of these efforts and accomplishments to date, in spite of the tough economic times we face, are in addition to the tax incentives granted for innovation and development for new research.

As many Members in this House are probably aware, we have the 100 per cent write-off. In addition to that, we have an additional 50 per cent write-off for new research and development. On top of that, we have a generous tax credit, all of it aimed at increasing the ability of the private sector to go out and invest in new technology and do new research. When you take into consideration these tax incentives that are being offered, you find that they provide up to 80 cents on each dollar of new investment in research and development. That is a fairly generous program. In addition, we are undertaking discussions with the private sector to see if these approaches can be better honed, if they can be better developed, if there are new ways to channel more private sector funds in a more advantageous manner so they can flow into research and development. We have seen some innovations from the private sector, such as the scientific research investment certificate whereby investment firms have been able to raise money from people who might not otherwise be prepared to invest in science and in research and development. These innovations have come hand in hand with the programs that we have been introducing to try to encourage far greater research and development in Canada.

I mentioned that the approach we have been adopting has been one of co-operation between industry and government. I have outlined briefly a few of the Government programs. In terms of what industry itself has done, it has been one of the strongest contributors in the past and, of course, under our new program will be the strongest contributor, contributing at least half of the new expenditure on research and development. In terms of what industry has done, in 1979 industry's contribution to R and D rose 26 per cent. In 1980 it was 18 per cent. In 1981, it was 26 per cent, and for 1982 it is again estimated that it will reach 26 per cent. These are the highest rates of growth in research and development ever achieved in Canada.

One of the problems which I do not think has been completely documented, and I would not want to go overboard in making the case, is the whole role of foreign-controlled firms contributing to Canadian research and development. A study done in 1980 in terms of the electrical products industry indicated that while the foreign controlled firms enjoyed 65 per cent of the Canadian market, they contributed only 40 per cent of the research and development. I am not here to criticize foreign firms. I am here to say that I think every Canadian, every firm operating in Canada, whether Canadian-controlled or foreign-controlled, has an obligation to contribute to the future industrial strength of our country, to job creation, to the strengthening of Canada's capabilities and know-how by doing research here in Canada in fair proportion. By doing that in Canada and being able to export it we will as well be able to gain the royalties for selling the know-how. Research will feed upon itself. It is synergistic. The more you have, the more you will create, the better the atmosphere will be in Canada for creating the type of innovation we need. As I said, this will be the cutting edge of our new technological development.

We have had some tremendous examples of what can happen from this type of government and private sector co-operation when it comes to R and D. Northern Telecom is, I think, a signal example of what has happened in Canadian industry. It highlights the role of our high tech. I am pleased that Northern Telecom announced just recently that over the next five years it will spend an additional $1.2 billion on an R and D program in high technology digital communications systems. It estimated revenues from this new technology will be at least $13 billion, and it will create hundreds, even thousands of new jobs here in Canada. This is just one example of how Canadian industry, the Canadian private sector, has responded to this call we have put out for more R and D, is taking the risks and is working with Government, because people did come to Government to get assistance for these programs.

What we have accomplished is encouraging, and the Government is determined to use this solid basis to help develop technologies that we as Canadians need to adjust to changing world realities, the rapidly changing realities where in certain industries, such as computers, one seems to have a new generation coming out almost every year.

[Translation]

However, Canada is facing a shortage of highly qualified scientific manpower in certain sectors. We now need practical experts who are capable of guiding and directing the new technologies that are being created in communications, information and biotechnology, while at the same time renewing our traditional resource-based industries.

Young people today are aware of these trends and more and more, they are opting for courses in applied science and commerce at our universities. The latter are starting to adapt their training programs to the demands of the eighties, but are having to cope with financial constraints. Engineering, computer science and commerce departments are finding it difficult to recruit staff and are losing experienced teachers to the lure of higher salaries offered by the private sector. Furthermore, excellent labour market conditions for students with a bachelor's degree in fields where the demand is high prevent those students from doing graduate work. For instance, the Ministry of State for Science and Technology examined the outlook for engineering graduates and found that between 1979 and 1985, the demand for engineers would exceed the national supply. The shortage will be particularly acute at the postgraduate level. There will not be enough engineering specialists to fill teaching and research positions in industry, government and the universities. The ministry also found that industry was very concerned about the availability of highly qualified research staff and the problems that universities were experiencing in meeting demand. We are glad to see, however, that the industrial and commercial sectors are approaching this problem in a very constructive and innovative fashion.

Some industries are entering into co-operative agreements with the universities, which is another way of meeting their requirements for human resources. Similarly, during the past year, a number of companies have entered into direct aid agreements with universities in Canada. For instance, the Bank of Montreal is subsidizing studies on international finance, IBM is supporting marine sciences and Mitel and Systemhouse are encouraging studies on office automation.

[English]

The federal Government has recognized that Canada's supply of skilled human resources is critical to our technological development and has taken major steps to strengthen university research and training capacity in Canada.

I would like to summarize some of these measures that we have taken in recent years. First, the three federal research granting councils, the Medical Research Council, the Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council, were reorganized to focus on training research manpower and maintaining a basic university research capacity in respective fields of study and on orienting more of their research support toward issues of national concern. These Councils have prepared five-year plans and have reassessed their programs in light of past experience and future priorities.

The Natural Sciences and Engineering Research Council supports university research and research training in areas directly related to industrial growth. It has greatly expanded its highly qualified manpower programs by increasing the number and the value of graduate scholarships, providing long-term research associateships, both at the universities and in the private sector, and by establishing undergraduate summer research bursary programs so that more students can be attracted to postgraduate studies in the scientific and technological areas.

We also have direct federal support of university research and research training. It now totals $477 million. Since 1979 the budgets of the granting Councils have been increased by $170 million, or 75 per cent. These figures demonstrate our Government's commitment to doing something about research and development to manpower training in Canada.

The impact of these measures has indeed been encouraging. The strategic research grants are attracting some of the best researchers. We have seen the emergence of fibre optics, video techs, radio relay systems and many other products of the future through our co-operative programs. We stand in the forefront with the Canadarm and with satellites such as the one Canadians proudly saw launched, recently. Our domestic communication satellite system is the best in the world.

I understand that I am running out of time. I would not want to strain the indulgence of the House, which has always been courteous in the past. Perhaps I could ask for one more minute in order to get these important facts on the record.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Peterson: I thank Hon. Members for their indulgence. These are areas where we have become world leaders in technological development. We have shown that we can do it.

Most important, the challenge in the days ahead is to ensure that we have not only technological development and manpower development but that the public and private sector, business, including those which are foreign controlled, labour, our universities and academics and governments at all levels, lock arms to increase further our ability to compete. This can be done by working together in our collective will and effort, our collective ability united in a consensus for action, a consensus for action based on new research and new ideas for the 1980s.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank Hon. Members for allowing me to participate in this debate, however short it might be. I was particularly interested to hear the Hon. Member for Willowdale (Mr. Peterson) because he made a statement which I believe is very appropriate to the remarks I wish to make this evening. He stated that research feeds on itself.

I would like to remind all Hon. Members that 15 years ago Great Canadian Oil Sands, 100 per cent owned by the Sun Oil Company of the United States, ventured into the tar sands in northeastern Alberta to conduct a giant research and development project. Today, that project produces 145,000 barrels of oil each and every day. This has contributed at least $20 billion to the Canadian balance of payments picture over the life of that one giant research project. It was not done, as the NDP says, with Government intervention. It was not accomplished by the Government saying that it will prop the company up if it tries to develop these oil sands. This was accomplished by foreign private enterprise, without one nickle of the Canadian taxpayers' money either at the provincial or federal level.

I remind Hon. Members of that fact. We heard the NDP Member for Regina East (Mr. de Jong) who said that what the development strategy in Canada needs today is more Government regulations, more Government input, more Government control and more Government ownership. I simply want to ask how much more government the Canadian people must suffer before the Socialists realize the destruction they have wrought upon our country.

When I talk about Socialists, I am talking about the NDP who have propped up the Liberals during the 1970s. The NDP is saying that development strategy of the 1970s was not there. It was the New Democratic Party that propped up the present Government.

I would like to return to the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Willowdale who said that research feeds on itself. I would point out that from the original investment at the Sun plant of Great Canadian Oil Sands, which is now Suncor at Fort McMurray, a town of 30,000 people developed. From there, the next plant, Syncrude Canada, came on stream. Once again, this was a result of private investors with no Government subisidies, loans or guarantees. It was only with the lack of Government intervention that they started another plant, Syncrude of Canada.

Before you call it ten o'clock, Mr. Speaker, could I ask the indulgence of the House for a further ten minutes? If the House would agree, I would forgo my time on the "Late Show".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think the Chair should seek the unanimous consent of the House. The Hon. Member is proposing to give up time available to him during the late show this evening in return for the House not seeing the clock for the same length of time, that is, ten minutes. Is there unanimous agreement?

• (2200)

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): There is not.

It being ten o'clock, pursuant to—

Mr. Flis: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Ordinarily, I cannot recognize a point of order after ten o'clock.

Mr. Flis: Mr. Speaker, since one minute was kindly extended to the Hon. Member from this side of the House, I think it would be only fair if an additional minute could be granted to the Hon. Member speaking at present.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): It being ten o'clock, it is my duty to inform the House that, pursuant to Standing Order 58(11), proceedings on the motion have expired.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 40 deemed to have been moved.

MINES AND MINING—MAP DISTRIBUTION COSTS

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Mr. Speaker, the issue I want to address tonight is a good example of what I call government waste. It might not involve a very large amount of money, but the whole scenario is pretty wretched.

It was first drawn to my attention early last July by the editor of the Bridge River-Lillooet News, who received this package by courier; actually, on July 4 or July 5. This package was sent out by the Minister of State for Mines (Mrs. Erola) and was to be in the hands of 576 community newspapers across Canada by or in advance of July 1 for use during the Dominion Day celebrations. This particular editor was incensed because it had come by courier and he wanted me to check into the matter. I therefore put a question on the order paper and asked what was the purpose of the package and what it contained. The answer was that the package contained a photograph of the Minister of State for Mines and the Governor General of Canada. There was also a "Canada Then and Now" map package and a news release from the Minister's office for use in conjunction with Dominion Day. It was distributed by Prestige Mailing Systems Limited and sent by courier service to 576 members of the Canadian Community Newspaper Association. As I said, this package was supposed to have arrived in advance of July 1.

I then asked, whether any packages were mailed through Canada Post Corporation and, if not, for what reason, and the answer was, "No". Technical problems with printing and packing the maps had resulted in an unforeseen delay of the availability date for mailing the package. Therefore, courier service was utilized in order that the package would reach recipients as close to Dominion Day as possible. These packages were sent out on June 30. There was no possible way they could reach their destinations by July 1.

I then asked what the cost of production of the package was and the total cost of delivery. The answer was that the cost of producing these 576 packages amounted to $1,783 and the cost of the courier service was close to $6,000. This cost of production bears some scrutiny because we found out that the three maps alone contained in the package itself sell for $5.95. We thought that because there were 576 maps, perhaps the Government might have received a discount on the bulk sale. That was not the case, sir. We telephoned the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources, the Canada Map Office, and were informed that there was no discount given and that they cost $5.95 per package. If one multiplies this amount by the 576 sent out, one arrives at a figure of $3,427. We therefore see a discrepancy of $1,650 just in the production of the package.

If that were not bad enough, even though these packages were put into shape too late to be sent out to arrive at their destinations by July 1, a courier service was employed and $6,000 was spent to get these packages to their destinations. All of them arrived too late for their purpose.

When I asked the Minister of State for Mines last week whether she could justify this expense, she said that the cost of distribution was completely justified in the national interest. What kind of national interest is served by a clear waste of $6,000? I would ask for a more complete answer. I would like to have the whole situation explained to me and to the taxpayers. I hope the Auditor General will consider the matter at some point.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, responding to the Hon. Member for Cariboo-Chilcotin (Mr. Greenaway), I must say that his concern is one which ought to be placed before Parliament. Perhaps, as he said in his closing remarks, it ought to be reviewed by the Auditor General and we should have the pleasure of his comments at some point in time so that we can pursue the debate even further. However, let me just say a few words with regard to the national atlas of Canada to which the maps in question belong.

Canada has had a national atlas since 1906 and five editions have been produced over 75 years under both Liberal and Conservative governments. Granted, the Conservative government was only short-lived. These atlases contain maps which reflect and summarize our national resources, growth and achievement. They parallel the evolution of Canada since almost the beginning of this century. The lastest Fifth edition is especially significant this year. It portrays Canada as we were in 1867, the complex evolution of our lands and territories and the make-up of the modern nation.

The medium of maps is a very effective way in which to inform Canadians about national development and to celebrate our progress as a nation since Confederation in this our constitutional year. For this reason, it was appropriate to make the maps available as near as possible to Canada Week.

Furthermore, while it is usually not very difficult for large newspapers and the major media organizations to obtain rapid access and awareness of new publications, that is not always so easy for the hundreds of relatively smaller weekly newspapers in this country. These grassroots community papers are read by many Canadians outside the major cities and they were our target group in this particular mail-out.

Technical difficulties in completing the maps reduced the time available for distribution by Canada Post. Courier service was chosen in order to ensure delivery as reasonably close as possible to Canada Week. The first Canadian to receive a copy of the maps was His Excellency the Governor General of Canada, and rightly so. A photograph of this presentation was provided with the package of maps for possible use by recipient newspapers thus informing their readers of the existence of the maps. The approximate cost of this was $3,000.

In view of the significance of the subject matter of the maps and our wish to let all Canadians know about them, this was very low-cost advertising in the marketing of these national maps.

ENERGY—COLD LAKE PROJECT—LOAN MADE TO IMPERIAL OIL. NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR WITHDRAWAL

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, on June 30 I rose in the House and asked the then minister of energy, mines and resources the state of the $40 million loan to Imperial Oil in an attempt to salvage the Cold Lake project. The Minister did advise the House that the loan was lost forever, that the loan would not have to be repaid on July 1 because there was the agreement in place that if the project did not proceed at Cold Lake by July 1, 1982 these funds would be lost forever.

I then asked the Minister if he did not now recognize that the most destructive piece of legislation to hit Canada in a number of years was the National Energy Program, that it was the single instrument that was deterring investment in Canada, particularly in the oil and gas sector. The Minister totally ignored that question; he did not answer.

I would like to point out something to the Parliamentary Secretary who has been chosen to answer this question. The investment in Alsands and the Cold Lake Project in northeastern Alberta, both giant research and development projects, particularly the one in Cold Lake where the very first commercial in situ extraction was to take place, was approximately $10 billion, producing 140,000 barrels of oil a day. That would contribute approximately $2 billion a year or more to Canada's balance of payments. Over 25 years it would have produced 1.3 to 1.5 billion barrels of oil and would have employed, at peak construction, 10,000 people. Ongoing employment for the life of the project would have been between 3,000 and 4,000 people; indirect employment would have been approximately 6,500 people; total engineering man-hours would have been approximately 50 million. Those figures apply to the one project only, the project at Cold Lake. Having regard to Alsands, which went down the tube, you could double all those figures. The amount of money to have been spent on facilities, which would have tremendous impact on the Canadian economy, was $9 billion for one plant; on facilities, $1 billion; infrastructure, another $1 billion; sustaining investment for the life of the project, $20 billion; operating expenses for the one project, and I am talking about Cold Lake, over its 25-year life, approximately $60 billion. This is a total of $90 billion of a direct investment into the economy of Canada at a time when jobs are needed and when the engines of the economy are winding down.

If you use the normal multiplier to determine the injection into the Canadian economy over that 25-year period, we would be looking at $250 billion to $350 billion as a result of the investment in that one plant at Cold Lake in northeastern Alberta. Can you imagine, Mr. Speaker; $500 billion to $700 billion if two plants, the Alsands and the Cold Lake, were allowed to proceed.

Why did they not proceed? We talk about research and development. The Alsands consortium and Imperial Oil at Cold Lake were ready to proceed. Because of the lack of foresight on the part of this Government, which would rather import oil from offshore, we lost $2 billion a year per plant. That represents a drain on our balance or payments. This money has to come from somewhere. When you drain off money for the purchase of off-shore oil, you affect interest rates and the money markets, and you hit jobs in Canada. I am not talking of just jobs created in northeastern Alberta, or in one province, I am talking about jobs in the steel industry, the automotive industry—jobs clear across this country. It was estimated that not one province would fail to benefit from the development of the Cold Lake project. Not one province would fail to benefit from the development of the Alsands project.

• (2215)

Eighteen months ago, Mr. Speaker, a number of Members of Parliament visited the Cold Lake and Alsands plants. The Hon. Member for Cape Breton-East Richmond (Mr. Dingwall), who will be replying to this question tonight, was with us. We toured those plants. He saw the vast investment and vast potential for Canada's energy scurity. He saw the vast potential for investment in the supply of pumps, steel and manpower from right across the country. He knows, if anyone knows, exactly what I am talking about.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I normally enjoy listening to the Hon. Member for Athabasca (Mr. Shields), but I must say that tonight he has gone a bit overboard. It is correct to say that I was with him in his constituency at Fort McMurray and visited a number of the sites he referred to, but he forgets to mention in his remarks that the reason or reasons why the Alsands consortium decided against going ahead with the project was because of the economic realities of the time.

The Government of Canada and the Government of Alberta made a very, very strong proposal to the Alsands consortium; two levels of Government, Mr. Speaker, and it was the Alsands consortium decision alone not to proceed. When the Hon. Member stands in this House and points his finger at the Government of Canada, that is complete gobblydegook on his part. Those are the facts, and he ought to know better. To perpetrate that kind of thing on the Canadian people I think is intellectually dishonest.

I should remind the Hon. Member of the nature of the agreement effective February 1, 1981, whereby Imperial Oil Limited received advances to a maximum of $40 million to maintain the Cold Lake project. It was agreed that if, before the repayment date, the board of directors of Imperial Oil had passed a resolution suspending or cancelling the Cold Lake project, Imperial Oil would have no obligation to repay the amount borrowed. The effective date in this case was the latter of July 1, 1982, or the first anniversary of the full payment date. In fact, the project was suspended before July 1, 1982 and consequently the obligation for repayment was removed.

As the former Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources noted when the matter of the Cold Lake project was discussed on July 30, 1982, Mr. Speaker, the period during which the Cold Lake project operated on the basis of the $40 million advance was a productive one, during which further engineering information was developed and employment was provided for a number of people in the Cold Lake region.

The Hon. Member for Athabasca notes that these two projects did not go ahead. I remind him that other projects in other countries have not gone ahead for the same economic reasons, that of world recession. Those are the reasons, Mr. Speaker, and those are the facts which the Hon. Member refuses to acknowledge and to place before this House. In fact, Mr. Speaker, his idol, his mentor, the Premier of the province of Alberta, has stated explicitly on a number of occasions that people ought not to be using 1980 as the benchmark for reference to oil and gas activity. But somehow the Hon. Member refuses, intentionally or otherwise, to recognize the facts of a world recession which has played havoc with these projects and many others, not only in Canada but in the U.S. as well as in European countries.

ENERGY—INQUIRY RESPECTING PROGRAM CUTBACKS. (B) CHIP AND OFF-OIL PROGRAMS

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I want to pursue a question which I raised with the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) on his economic statement. The economic statement said that $616 million would be freed in the energy area by scaling back funds allocated to a number of programs, although he did not mention any specifically. He did, however, state that allocations for the Petroleum Incentives Program would remain at their existing levels.

• (2220)

If the economic statement were really serious about job creation, it would have delineated which projects were to be cut, at what loss of jobs, and for what gain in jobs in the new program, which is clearly a job creation program. Any reallocation of funds must mean a net increase in jobs. Nevertheless, nothing was specified.

Rumour has it that the CHIP program and Off Oil Program were again considered for cuts, and I asked about these. The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) gave a wholly unsatisfactory reply, not giving assurances that they would not be. What is happening, it seems to me, is that we are seeing a further erosion of the valuable parts of the National Energy Program. We are losing the energy self-sufficiency and job creating aspects of the Program, while the give-aways to the corporations are continuing. I believe this is a sorely mistaken sense of priority.

First of all, let us consider the question of conservation. It is still true that conservation is the cheapest source of new energy and that it provides the most jobs. A study by the Economic

Council of Canada estimates that adding insulation to one million existing homes would produce 27,000 person years of employment, at a cost of 7,000 person years in the oil industry or, in other words, a net gain of 20,000 person years in jobs. Estimates are that it cost nearly $1 million to create a job in the tar sands, as an extreme example, while it costs $50,000 to $100,000 in conservation or the renewables. Further, the jobs are created where they are needed; that is, where people are living. They do not require the disruption of families or starting up new, single industry towns in trailer parks. Conservation programs minimize environmental destruction. Fixing up old houses where people already live is greatly to be preferred to disrupting native communities and risking serious environmental destruction by oil spills, for which we have as yet no technological solution.

It is true that there are problems in existing CHIP programs, quite apart from the urea formaldehyde scandal. There have been abuses, as the Government was warned. It was urged to establish proper inspection procedures. The answer now is not to abandon that Program but to correct the flaw in it and to institute proper inspection procedures.

The National Energy Program, as originally set out, had some laudable principles; self-sufficiency in energy and a move to conservation and the renewables being most notable amongst them. There was a recognition of the basic facts of life in energy, that we could not achieve self-sufficiency in Canada without substantial reliance on the renewables and conservation. But what happened then, Mr. Speaker? The highminded principles were relegated to the low budget area of the Program.

Petroleum Incentives Program grants are measured in the billions, but conservation is measured in the millions. What is wrong with the Petroleum Incentives Program grants? They are give-aways to corporations which pay no taxes, or less than their fair share. They mean that the public pays for exploration and gets no equity for it, while the companies talk about risk taking. They deplete the heritage which we have been given and which we have some obligation to pass on to future generations. Petroleum Incentives Program grants mean that expensive oil will be pursued, dug out and sent south at enormous cost in money and in social terms. People will pump more gas into their gas guzzlers and let heat seep out of their non-airtight houses. The Petroleum Incentives Program grants are a slow route to Canadianization. More fundamentally, they do not address our need for long-term energy security. They are directed at a non-renewable resource and, at best, postpone the day of reckoning. Eventually, and not all that far aheard, we are going to have to switch to renewable resources. The less we use now of the non-renewables, the easier it will to be make the switch.

The Petroleum Incentives Program is also inflationary, a factor that should count nowadays. It means pursuing ever more expensive forms of energy. The same money invested in conservation measures means savings in the here and now and in the long run, for with conservation you save year after year after year. Conservation means finding cheap oil again, the equivalent of oil at $5, $10 or $20 a barrel, depending on the particular measures used. That is far less than the oil that the Petroleum Incentives Program grants are directed toward.

Conservation and the renewables happen to be matters in which we can have our cake and eat it too. We can pursue a number of worthy objectives at the same time, instead of having to play one off against the other. We can create far more jobs than would be created from conventional non-renewables. We can promote environmental protection instead of risking serious damage. We can respect native concerns and give them time to develop their priorities instead of imposing ours, from the south. We can maintain our standard of living, for alternative energy resources are rich and the technology is available. The lack has been in implementation, not in knowledge of what needs to be done. That is where the serious gap is. Meanwhile, we subsidize conventional energy sources and make the new ones "pay their own way", as they say, and make them compete unfairly.

● (2225)

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources referred to maintaining the CHIP and off-oil programs, and wanting to use them more efficiently. Naturally I would want to commend him for any greater efficiency he can manage, but I would like to hear more. What does he mean by cutting? Does he mean to cut those, and if he does not cut those two particular programs, which programs will he cut?

Finally, I would like to challenge the Government to consider the real potential of the National Energy Program, especially its job-creation aspects. If it did the necessary calculations and took a critical look, I think it would find that its priorities would be reversed.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the subject matter of the question and of the comments of the Hon. Member is not only of concern to her Party but to my Party as well.

Let me state quite clearly that the Government of Canada has no plans to abandon the Canadian Home Insulation Program and the Canada Oil Substitution Program. On the contrary, the Government is looking forward to maintaining strong support for energy conservation and substitution in the residential sector.

With respect to the Canada Oil Substitution Program, it is heartening to note that off-oil conversion activity has continued rather strongly during 1982, at a time when generally consumer spending is weak. Conversions from oil to electricity and renewable energy sources are on target. Conversions to natural gas are below target, as they were last year. From the time the Canada Oil Substitution Program was launched late in 1980 to the end of September 1982, it paid approximately 270,000 grants for a total of $183 million.

On the subject of CHIP, there existed some concern that the Program was not as effective as it might have been in helping to achieve potential saving available from home energy conservation. A large part of the problem appeared to lie in the structure of the CHIP grant which had the effect of encouraging some inflated prices and some questionable sales techniques, such as the marketing of attic and weatherstripping "specials" priced at or near the amount of the CHIP grant. To ameliorate the sitution, on November 9 the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien) announced changes in the grant formula and criteria of CHIP. These changes are intended to achieve more effective conservation activity and contribute toward the energy budget savings announced on October 27 by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde).

Briefly, the changes to CHIP include that a home owner doing his own insulation work would obtain a CHIP grant on 60 per cent of the insulation materials, up to a maximum of $500. Originally, CHIP provided 100 per cent of material costs and 33.33 per cent of labour costs. Second, for work done by a contractor, 60 per cent of the contractor's bill would earn a CHIP grant, up to a maximum of $500. However, the home owner will be required to file a copy of the contractor's billing, showing a breakdown on labour and material costs so that the several costs could be checked by CHIP administrators against acceptable standards.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m.

At 10.29 p.m. the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

AUTOMOTIVE INDUSTRY

COMPETITION FROM RUSSIAN-MADE AUTOMOBILES

Mr. Gordon Taylor (Bow River): Madam Speaker, whereas the Soviet-made car called Lada is sold in Canada below its actual cost because many of its parts are made in prison camps and it is manufactured by non-union workers, and its artificially low price is a benefit when going through customs; and whereas this constitutes unfair competition for the Canadian auto industry which is presently facing a crisis with thousands of its workers unemployed, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid):

That this House urges the Canadian Government to take all necessary steps to protect the Canadian workers from this unfair competition.

POLAND—RELEASE OF IMPRISONED SOLIDARITY LEADER, LECH WALESA

Hon. John C. Crosbie (St. John's West): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That this House commend the Government of Poland for releasing from imprisonment Lech Walesa and for restoring him to his family and to a position where he can represent the views of Solidarity as soon as the Government of Poland opens up a dialogue with Solidarity, the Church and with the Polish people as to the best way in which to deal with the many problems facing Poland and her people, and this House wishes Lech Walesa a successful re-entry into the public life of his country and expresses its support for a liberalization of conditions in Poland and the release of all other prisoners incarcerated in Poland since the imposition of martial law and for the immediate lifting of martial law in Poland.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Madam Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

AIR TRANSPORT

SURVIVAL OF QUÉBECAIR

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, under the provisions of Standing Order 43 I wish to raise a matter of urgent and pressing necessity. In view of the fact that the Quebec Government has proposed joint federal-provincial financing to maintain Québecair to see it through a difficult period and maintain an airline which could be regionally viable, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the federal Government immediately take measures to ensure the survival of Québecair and its 1,000 jobs.

CANADA PATENT ACT

DEMAND FOR REPEAL OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Gordon Gilchrist (Scarborough East): Madam Speaker, inasmuch as Bill C-102 of 1968, the amendments to the Canada Patent Act, has denied pharmaceutical companies in Canada the protections and proprietory rights available to all other kinds of businesses and has (1), impeded research and development of the Canadian drug industry (2), resulted in the loss of respected companies such as Ayerst with attendant job loss for highly trained Canadian scientists and researchers (3), stands in the way of future biotechnological development in Canada (4), reduces career opportunities for young Canadian scientists, and (5), conflicts with stated Liberal Government aims of increasing research, not diminishing it, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That Bill C-102 be repealed at once.

NATIONAL CAPITAL

ANNOUNCED CHANGE IN NAME OF RIDEAU CENTRE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa-Vanier): Madam Speaker, I seek unanimous consent under the provisions of Standing Order 43. After ten years of co-operative planning of downtown Ottawa between the private sector and all levels of Government in a joint development and construction project known as the Rideau Centre, the T. Eaton Company Limited, one of the participants, announced its intention to change the name of Rideau Centre to Rideau Eaton Centre.

Considering that the name Rideau is an important part of the cultural heritage of the National Capital; considering that, while the T. Eaton Company Limited is a welcome backer of the project, many other private companies and all levels of Government have also financed a large share of the Rideau Centre area; considering that all local officials consulted, namely, the City of Ottawa, the Regional Municipality of Ottawa-Carleton, and merchants and citizens associations have expressed their opposition to the proposed name change, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton (Mr. Baker):

That this House ask T. Eaton Company Limited to reconsider its decision and maintain the name Rideau Centre, Centre-Rideau.

REGIONAL ECONOMIC EXPANSION

SENATE COMMITTEE FINDINGS

Hon. J. Robert Howie (York-Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I too rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Whereas the report of the Standing Senate Committee on National Finance concerning government policy and regional development released in September of this year reflects the apprehension of many Canadians in a scathing indictment of the Government's plan to dismember DREE and bury it in two departments of Government, and whereas the report finds that the long and the short of the 1982 re-organization is that some basic components of the past ten years' efforts to encourage the development of Canada's least prosperous regions have been abandoned and it is not at all clear how they are to be replaced, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Central Nova (Mr. MacKay):

That the Government be directed to address the constructive criticism in the report and in particular readjust the focus of development policies so that disadvantaged regions will be stimulated by an increased, not a diminished effort.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Government's continued and ongoing kite flying about the need to end the universal payment of Family Allowances and even the Old Age Security and other Programs, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

That this House instruct Members of the Cabinet to keep their hands off these valuable and important social Programs and, if they really believe in the need to redistribute incomes to those most in need, they do so through a revised, fair, and more equitable tax structure.

Mr. Blaine A. Member for Bow River (Mr. Taylor):

That the Government, which also presided over an increase in the unemployment rate for returning students from 18.4 per cent in 1981 to 27 per cent this summer, stand condemned for increasing the cost of a university education while reducing students' oportunities to pay for such an education.

MINISTER'S VIEWS ON CANDY CIGARETTES

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, as a professional man I am not one to contradict any activity that would reduce cancer in Canadians. However, Madam Speaker, when the Minister of National Health and Welfare calls on the Confectionery Manufacturers Association of Canada to cease importing, manufacturing and distributing products that resemble pipes, cigars and cigarettes, because they may encourage children to take up smoking in later life, I feel she is going a little too far. Surely the Minister has enough to do running her Department that she need not dabble in areas where she should not. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Oxford (Mr. Halliday):

That the Minister of National Health and Welfare immediately table her medical evidence substantiating the link between candy cigarettes and adult smoking or withdraw her request to the Confectionery Manufacturers Association of Canada and apologize to that Association and to cigarette manufacturers for her totally irresponsible action.

In light of the fact that this hanging remains a black mark on Canada's record for justice and political tolerance, and continues to be an insult to the Metis people of this nation, and as the role of Louis Riel in creating the Province of Manitoba has been recognized with a statue near the Legislature of that Province, I move, seconded by the Hon. MATERNITY BENEFITS SOUGHT FOR PARENTS ADOPTING CHILDREN

Mr. Doug Lewis (Simcoe North): Madam Speaker, in July, 1981, the Task Force on Unemployment Insurance recommended that, in the interests of equity and fairness, maternity benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act should be extended to newly adoptive parents. Parents who adopt children face the same physical, mental, social and economic adjustments as natural parents, but they often have no advance notice of the date of adoption. The present system discriminates against these parents. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for York-Sunbury (Mr. Howie):

That this House urge the Minister of Employment and Immigration to extend maternity benefits to the parents of adopted children who do not now qualify.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

EMPLOYMENT

IMPLEMENTATION OF JOB-CREATION PROGRAM

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister announced that application forms for his new job-creation program will not be available until the end of December. He knows that it takes another six to eight weeks for application forms to be filled out by groups and to be processed, as we have just seen with the community development projects. This would mean that there would be no new jobs created under the program until approximately the end of February.

Given the fact that there are thousands of people who run out of unemployment benefits each week, that welfare rolls are soaring, and that 1.5 million people are out of work, why does it take three to four months of delay before a program is implemented to provide new jobs, even when it was announced in October?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is really asking several questions. The answer to them is basically that we have set the target date of January 1 for the program and that it may be possible to deliver it earlier. Because of the success of negotiations with the provincial Governments, we may be in a position to start processing proposals even before Christmas so that they will be in place in January. I think her comments about three to four months of delay are not well taken. In fact, we will be offering employment under the program before then. Also, I remind her that in the period beginning now, through to Christmas, a number of work programs are being initiated through the Canada Community Development Program which will provide close to 60,000 jobs for the very people about whom she is talking. Those are coming onstream at the moment.

Miss MacDonald: I am concerned about the urgency of the situation. The Minister's own press release indicated the end of December.

WELFARE

REQUEST FOR FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL MEETING OF MINISTERS

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Between now and February approximately 70,000 people per month will run out of unemployment insurance benefits. Some of those people will qualify for welfare, but a great many of them will not and will be in very real difficulty. Although the Minister may see this as primarily a provincial responsibility, will she consider, in this emergency situation, calling together the provincial Ministers of Welfare to see if something could be done about the increasing number of people who are running out of unemployment insurance benefits and cannot qualify for welfare?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I do not quite understand the Hon. Member's question. In Canada, people who run out of unemployment insurance benefits or who for any other reason are indigent, can qualify for welfare. That is why I do not see who could not qualify. I fail to see a problem here that would require consultation with the provincial ministers, with whom our relations are consistently very good, since we automatically refund to them the amounts they spend on welfare payments. Could the Hon. Member possibly elaborate?

[English]

NATURE OF INDIVIDUAL CASES

Hon. Flora MacDonald (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, perhaps if I exlain it to the Minister she would understand better. I am talking about the people who are falling between the safety nets, for example, a family where the husband has run out of unemployment insurance benefits and the wife has only a part-time job. The part-time job does not provide a sufficient income to look after a family of four, but it is too high to allow the husband to qualify for welfare and, as a result, they end up losing their home, car and other assets. These are the things which I feel the Minister could discuss with her provincial counterparts. I would like her to consider situations of this nature.

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I assure the Hon. Member that there are not many Canadians, not at all, who will fall between the safety nets as she suggested. The NEED Program announced by my colleague is especially conceived to employ the very people who are exhausting their UIC benefits for the time needed in order to requalify for benefits. As to the rate paid by the Provinces for welfare—and they know it very well—we are in constant discussion about the situation today, and for any Province that wants to increase its rates we would reimburse half of it immediately and automatically.

IMMEDIATE EMPLOYMENT CREATION PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR UPDATE REPORT

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration. The Minister will recall that last June a job-creation program was announced entitled the Immediate Employment Stimulation Program. This Program was allocated approximately $100 million for 1982-1983 and it was to employ in the order of 14,000 people. Unlike a lot of the other job-creation programs which the Minister has, there is very little known about this Program and it seems there is some mystery surrounding it. Would the Minister be willing to make a public statement which would give us an update on where the program is now, so that we will understand where the money has been spent and on what projects?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member for Rosedale knows, I am not reluctant to talk about the job-creation programs we have. I think it is important that Canadians understand what we are attempting to do. The particular Program he has referred to really is not a program as such, but an allocation of funds that were set aside in the June budget by the Minister of Finance. They were allocated to a number of different Departments to fund projects which were on the shelf or which could be funded directly through them. The Department of Fisheries, the Department of Public Works or others each spent proportional funds across Canada in different areas to provide for a stimulus for those projects in which jobs could be created in the light construction area. In effect, what we would have to do is find particular projects that were initiated by individual Departments. My Department was only one among several participating in that particular allocation of funds.

REQUEST FOR REPORT ON PROJECTS FUNDED

Hon. David Crombie (Rosedale): Madam Speaker, I understand the nature of the program and the allocations to the various Departments that were made at that time. Indeed, according to the Minister at the time, money was allocated for the construction of small craft harbours, local airports, and various other sorts of community-based projects. I think all Hon. Members would like to be a part of that Program and they would like to speak on behalf of their constituents for that Program. What I am asking the Minister, and I would like him to give us an undertaking now, is whether he will undertake to do what I think is normal and put out a public report indicating where the money has gone and on what projects?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, as I explained to the Hon. Member, the information concerning the projects themselves is certainly public, but they are being initiated by several Departments. Therefore we would have to get together the different Ministries and provide an over-all list of those projects. I am sure that can be done. If the Hon. Member wants to put that request on the Order Paper, we would be glad to gather that information for him.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

CULTURAL POLICY REPORT RECOMMENDATIONS—MINISTER'S POSITION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Communications. It concerns the Cultural Policy Report that was released today. My Party has supported the concept of public broadcasting for the past 50 years, and we do not intend to stand idly by and let that tradition go down the drain. We know that broadcasting really has only two choices, either support by the state or a sell-out to the United States. Does the Minister agree with the Applebaum-Hébert recommendation that the CBC's production of programs be emasculated and, in turn, go for a privatization, American-style, of CBC? If the Minister does not agree with the recommendation, what does he intend to do about it?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, I just received the final edited version of the Applebaum-Hébert Report this morning, which I intend to table in the House at the first opportunity this afternoon. As Mr. Applebaum himself indicated this morning, he thought that the general gist of the report was to have an even better CBC in the long run. I expect that the recommendations of Messrs. Applebaum and Hebert on the CBC will obviously be a matter of in-depth debate throughout the country. The Government will listen to that debate, obviously including any contributions from the Opposition and Parliament, before making up its mind.

• (1425)

I would like to say, however, that it is quite clear in the mind of the Government that, in a country like Canada, there is an important role to be played by public broadcasting.

REQUEST THAT MINISTER SUPPORT CANADIAN FILM AND TELEVISION PRODUCTION

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, that is not much of a response by the Minister since he has had the Applebaum-Hébert Report for at least two months and has been sitting on it. In fact he has already made responses to it in a leaked document, yet he gives us that kind of answer, that he is not in a position to tell us what he is going to do today, but that it is a matter for public debate.

Where does the Minister stand on this issue? What will he do about public broadcasting? It is ironic that the only two radical recommendations in the whole Report which talks about job-creation for Canadian artists—that is one of its themes—are job destruction in the CBC for approximately 6,000, and job destruction in the National Film Board.

Can the Minister assure the House that the Government will give more support and not less to Canadian film and television production, and that he will take some steps to ensure that our productions are not boycotted across the country by foreign-owned theatre chains?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, all of the areas mentioned by the Hon. Member are obviously of deep interest to the Government. I think that the Applebaum-Hébert Report does indeed call for a thrust into that direction. I believe that when one talks about broadcasting, in view of its real importance to a country like Canada, and in view of the past history of broadcasting policy in Canada which has developed with the very wide ranging support from all political parties in the House, that it would indeed be more appropriate to have public debate on the Applebaum-Hébert Report. It is an avenue that they suggested themselves. They suggest that the Report is the beginning of a public debate on the major directions of cultural policy in this country over the years to come.

All that I can add is what I have said before, that, as far as I am concerned, public broadcasting will, of course, remain an important part of the broadcasting system in Canada.

AUSTRALIAN MODEL

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, what the Report indicated to me was a concern for jobs, training, employment and culture. We want to know when the Government will stop its dilettante type of approach to our cultural industries and begin doing something more than throwing money at potential investors. Has the Government considered the Australian model which has produced such outstanding feature films recently as "Gallipoli" and "Breaker Moran"?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Yes, Madam Speaker.

CABINET COMMITTEE STUDY

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I have one supplementary question for the Minister. Not only was there an earlier leaked document on general policy, but it was a leaked document with regard to the preparation of a green paper on broadcasting policy. Will the Minister first tell the House what he plans to do with the entire Applebaum-Hébert Report and, second, is the news report of today that the Minister has asked Senator Jack Austin to head a group of Ministers to review cultural policy true? Who are the members of the group and is it intended to delay Government action on culture as the Government plans to delay action on economic affairs?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): The Hon. Member has a great deal of experience with leaked documents, Madam Speaker, but I hope that he will take the trouble to read this one as soon as I table it in the House. My first intention is to table the document in the House so that Hon. Members can then read it.

As for the other question, the Government has indeed decided to set up a special committee of Cabinet because of the importance we give to culture, to consider the Applebaum-Hébert Report and whatever measures that will develop from the Report and which will be recommended to Cabinet following wide-ranging consultations with the Canadian public.

THE ECONOMY

PREMIER'S CALL FOR HOLDING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. I am sure he is aware of the constructive speech made by the Premier of Nova Scotia before the Canadian Club in Toronto yesterday when John Buchanan, Premier of Nova Scotia, a fellow Nova Scotian and a fellow ex-Cape Bretoner, renewed the provincial call for a federal-provincial conference. Since conditions are much worse now than they were when this was first advanced in August, and knowing the Deputy Prime Minister's concern for unemployment in his own riding, let alone for the million and a half unemployed Canadians across the country, will this request of Premier John Buchanan, that the Premiers of Canada hold a federal-provincial conference to deal with problems now, receive a favourable, positive response?

• (1430)

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I cannot predict what the response will be because the matter has not yet been considered by the Government, but I do remember that following the August conference of the Premiers, which Premier Buchanan chaired, we had requested that the Premiers put some flesh on the rather vague proposals they had advanced at that time.

There were a number of very vague ideas asking for changes in this policy and that policy, without any explanation as to what all the changes were to be. At that time the Prime Minister and myself both requested the Premiers to really tell us what they proposed, as once we had that it might help us decide whether a First Ministers' conference would be useful. I have read reports of Premier Buchanan's speech, and I do not think it added a single thing to the rhetoric which came out of the Halifax conference.

Mr. Nowlan: Madam Speaker, speaking about flesh, as the Deputy Prime Minister did, the only flesh which has been advanced in this equation of conference and/or Royal Commission is the flesh of one Donald Macdonald, and that is the only new ingredient which has entered into the situation.

POSITION OF PRIME MINISTER

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley-Hants): Madam Speaker, in view of the fact that not so long ago the Prime Minister wanted Canadians to trust Canadians, so that we could start down a new road of economy recovery, does the Deputy Prime Minister not think that the best way to start that trust would be for the Prime Minister to start trusting the Premiers of the ten Provinces rather than to throw up roadblocks? Does he really think, as we go into this winter, that the diet for the million and a half unemployed Canadians is a recycled, regurgitated Big Mac who will be heavy on politics and short on any economic solution?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, I do not think it is a question of trust. It is a question of what can be expected from a First Ministers' conference.

Mr. Nowlan: Who knows until you try?

Mr. MacEachen: We had one last February, I believe, and I do not think we need a second disaster like that. Unless appropriate preparations are made, I certainly would not be one who would advocate a repetition of what happened—

Mr. Nowlan: But you are no longer there.

Mr. MacEachen: —last February, because up to the present time no preparations have been made by the Provinces and no detailed proposals have been brought forward. It is a continuation, a repetition of the same rhetoric, that we heard yesterday from the Premier of Nova Scotia in Toronto.

MULTICULTURALISM

REQUEST FOR RELEASE OF HANDBOOK ON ETHNIC ORGANIZATIONS

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Secretary of State, whose Department was responsible for drawing up the 1974 document entitled "A Revised Handbook of Selected Ethnic Organizations in Canada". In view of the fact that yesterday the Minister of State for Multiculturalism said that he had ordered his copy of the book destroyed, may I ask the Secretary of State whether he is prepared to release a copy of the handbook so that the various ethnic organizations and individuals portrayed in the handbook may see how the Government portrays them and may respond to the portrayals?

[Translation]

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): Madam Speaker, I wish to thank the Hon. Member for his question. When the existence of this document was made public, I asked officials of the Department of the Secretary of State to find out exactly when the data were compiled. According to the cover, it seems the document was updated in 1974, while according to my information, the document was originated as far back as 1960, when another government was managing the business of our country. I therefore asked that any copies that were in the department's possession be destroyed and not be made available to the public, to avoid giving Canadians the impression that the document is still being used.

[English]

USE MADE OF HANDBOOK

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, if the Minister has some difficulty locating copies, I can give him the call numbers for the Secretary of State's Library. It was there as of noon today and was consulted by an officer of P.C. Research. I would indicate as well that, if the Minister is not prepared to release the document, I am prepared to release a copy which was inherited by the Clark administration from the Liberal Government, which drew it up. Can the Minister give the assurance to the House, and to groups and individuals portrayed in the document, that no individual was denied rights and that no group was denied funding as a result of the portrayals? If he cannot do that, will he undertake to do research to determine how the document was used? For example, could he determine whether it was used by the Security Service of the RCMP and by the Immigration Department, and will he give some recourse to the groups mentioned in this document by which they may challenge the descriptions which are made of them?

[Translation]

Hon. Serge Joyal (Secretary of State): As far as I am concerned, Madam Speaker, the list of organizations and persons who received the document was drawn up by the government in power at the time, that is, in 1960. Consequently, if the information was distributed to the various government agencies whose names appear in the opening pages of the document, it was not the present government who took this initiative. I can also assure the Hon. Member that as far as I am concerned, and to the extent of my knowledge, the information contained in the document was never used for the purpose of obtaining financial contributions from, or providing grants to, any of the organizations mentioned.

[English]

POSSIBLE USE BY ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): This document was not only in use by the Liberal Government in 1979, but it is now on active file in the offices of the Secretary of State as well. Can the Solicitor General give this House of Commons a categoric assurance now that the document was never used by the Security Services of the RCMP in the course of their actions with regard to any of those groups mentioned in the document? Can he give us that categoric assurance now in this House?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I have requested the Security Service to provide me with information about any use which was made by the service of the handbook which it was given. I am not yet prepared to answer that question. I hope I will be shortly. However, I would remind Hon. Members that it is not a list of individuals, from what I understand, and I examined the copy briefly this morning. It is a list of ethnic groups and is quite different from the list which was the subject of the question asked earlier of my colleague, the Minister responsible for multiculturalism.

Miss MacDonald: Do you mean there are two lists?

REQUEST THAT RESULTS OF MINISTER'S INVESTIGATION BE MADE PUBLIC

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): I trust we are dealing with only one list. If the Solicitor General knows of other lists, I trust he will let the House of Commons know of that fact. I am asked how many were passed on to our Government. One was passed on to our Government. We will be publishing it today in the absence of this Government's courage to publish that document.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: The Solicitor General also indicated that he is conducting an investigation to determine on how many occasions this information was used by the Security Forces. I ask that he give us an undertaking now that when that information is found by him, whatever its nature, it will be made available to the House of Commons of Canada.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, I am certainly not prepared to give that assurance until I have the answers from the Security Service—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Kaplan: —and have examined them, but I am certainly prepared to say now that there are no files open and no lists collected by the Security Service of any individuals who are not legitimate targets described in the mandate of the Security Service. The preliminary examination I have made of this list of ethnic groups indicates that it is totally unrelated to the mandate of the Security Service.

USE BY IMMIGRATION AUTHORITIES

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): My supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. Can the Minister give the House a caterogic assurance now that at no time was any of the information contained in this list, which named such individuals as Mr. Papandreou and others, used in the exercise of responsibilities pertaining to the Minister or his Department?

• (1440)

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I have to remind the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that, when it comes to matters of immigration, judgment is made on the application of those abroad, not in terms of any domestic organization. Certainly as long as I have been Minister I have not known of the existence of any list nor certainly of its application in the Department. I am quite prepared to ask the Department if any such list is in existence. As other Ministers of this Government have pointed out, it is the Opposition who are probably much better informed about it, as it was their Government in 1960 who prepared the list originally.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

USE OF HANDBOOK IN SECURITY CHECKS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, one learned long ago that the Liberal Party shouts hardest when it is trying its best to cover up activities that the public of Canada should know about.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: I have two questions for the Minister of Immigration. One, he has said that he will carry out an inquiry in his Department. Will he give an undertaking now that he will publish in this House of Commons all of the details of that inquiry, whatever their content? Secondly, will he give us an undertaking, or can he tell us now whether there was any use made, in any security checks that were carried out by the Department of Employment and Immigration, of this list?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, if shouting is a criterion for someone who is covering things up, I would say that the Leader of the Opposition obviously has a great deal to cover up. No one on this side is shouting. We are simply answering the question. I will simply tell the Right Hon. Leader of the Opposition that I will ask questions, not make an investigative inquiry, but I will remind him again that the decisions on immigration are based on one's behaviour or performance abroad and the security investigations are undertaken by the Security Forces of the RCMP.

I can assure him that as long as I have been Minister I have never seen a list, I have never used a list, and I will ask the Department if they have ever used any, and of course I will make that public. I want to say to him that, as far as we are concerned, the list is of little relevance because we make decisions based on the background of the individuals involved and the advice we get from the Security Service on those individuals.

FINANCE

EXTENSION OF HOUSING TAX BENEFITS

Mrs. Ursula Appolloni (York South-Weston): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Minister of Finance. I refer to the announcement that the restrictions on soft costs rules and the undue delay test as they apply to multiple unit residential buildings, or MURBs, will not take effect until after December 31 of this year. Can the Minister indicate what effect this is likely to have on the construction industry?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I was pleased to announce yesterday that the undue delay test and the soft costs provisions for MURBs have been extended to January 1, 1983. I am advised that there is between $400 million and $500 million worth of construction projects that have been held in abeyance and I would hope that, following this decision and following the recent decline in interests rates, we will see those projects proceeding now and giving needed stimulus to the construction industry and that indeed this figure of $400 million to $500 million will be realized in the course of the next year, thanks to the changes that have taken place.

FISHERIES

MINISTER'S POSITION ON PEARSE COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. At a well-attended conference at the University of Victoria on the Pearse Report this past weekend, there was unanimous opposition to the licensing program advised by Dr. Pearse. There was equally unanimous opposition to the present advisory council procedures in the Department of Fisheries and Oceans.

In view of the necessity of co-operation, if there are changes going to be made in the fishing industry, is the Minister prepared to listen to the advice of the industry to make the Department more accountable to some of the advisory councils that the Minister appoints, and will the Minister take immediate action to look at some of the recommendations of Dr. Pearse which call for a specific fisheries council to be formulated?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to inform the Hon. Member that I will be on the Pacific Coast starting Friday of this week and will be meeting the various parties concerned. If the Hon. Member is correct in saying that there is great unanimity among the various parties, obviously this would simplify my task enormously, and I fully intend to listen very carefully to all representations that will be made to us at this first meeting I shall be having with the parties concerned.

[English]

METHOD OF APPOINTMENT TO PROPOSED FISHERIES COUNCIL

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): The Minister will be aware that Dr. Pearse has recommended a council which would be appointed by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The industry is not satisfied with that kind of a board. The present board acts in that way and simply is a rubber stamp for what the Department of Fisheries and Oceans imposes.

Would the Minister seriously consider, if indeed he does decide to have a fisheries council, having that council selected by industry and the various aspects of that industry, and have the Department of Fisheries and Oceans more accountable to that council? Also, would he provide for that fisheries council free access to the Minister so they can give him some direct advice rather than going through the Department?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am open to all the suggestions that will be made to me, but ultimately I am the person accountable, not to Mr. So-and-So, representative of that particular segment, but I am accountable to you as Member of Parliament in this Chamber.

METHOD OF IMPLEMENTING RECOMMENDATIONS

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, may I direct my supplementary to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Would he then deny that the Department has any intention of implementing provisions of the Pearse Report by Order in Council before Christmas?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am at the moment studying each of those recommendations with my officials. As you know, they are very numerous. Some of them are far-reaching, others are revolutionary, and I would not be able at this time to make a definite answer. We are still in the process of assessing each of those recommendations. The meeting that I will be having this weekend on the Pacific Coast has precisely as one of its objectives to get the reaction to this Report of the different parties involved.

Oral Questions

MEDICAL CARE

STATUS OF NEGOTIATIONS WITH PROVINCES

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. On November 9 last, as reported at page 20545 of Hansard, in responding to a question from the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill on the subject of the proposed Canada Health Act, the Minister said that she had refused to make, and I quote, "any statements to the press on a health insurance issue since negotiations are now taking place".

Will the Minister say if negotiations are still taking place at the ministerial level, or indeed at any level and, if so, precisely who is currently involved in these active negotiations and what progress is being made?

[Translation]

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Yes, Madam Speaker, I must apologize, but negotiations are still going on between ministers and officials.

[English]

PREPARATION OF DRAFT LEGISLATION

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, I trust that the state of the Minister's voice is not indicative of any slipping of our health care system. I trust that she will seek urgent consultation with the medical profession on her own personal problems.

As part of her recent negotiations, the Minister allowed all of 12 minutes for a meeting with representatives of the provincial health ministers on November 1 last after which the chairman of that group reported by telegram to his nine colleagues that, and I quote, "she advised that it was her intention to seek approval of the federal Cabinet to prepare draft legislation". May I ask the Minister whether she can confirm that she is not going to have further negotiations prior to draft legislation being prepred, and why, in view of the importance she places on health care, she has not convened a national health conference comparable to the pension conference where representatives of the Provinces, the professional groups and the consumers could be heard?

• (1450)

Hon. Monique Bégin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Because everybody wants action, not talk.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

COVERAGE OF EVENTS IN LEBANON

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Bearing in mind the very difficult situation which took place in the City of Beirut, Lebanon, this past summer, and recognizing that that situation had the potential to change the map and the history of that area, and indeed of the world, for some long time, why was it that, night after night, we listened to feeds from NBC in the United States and had hardly any coverage from CBC from that area? And why was CBC so short-staffed in that region?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, obviously, the mandate of the CBC is to give Canadians as wide a range of programming as possible in all fields, including news and public affairs. The CBC tries to run its operations efficiently and for reasons of economy, or for other reasons, which I would be very pleased to check out with the management of the CBC on behalf of the Hon. Member, it undoubtedly found it more efficient and more economical to take feeds from other networks.

COVERAGE OF EVENTS IN MEXICO AND AUSTRALIA

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Bearing in mind what the Minister has just said, Madam Speaker, I would now like to ask him, if efficiency was the cause for having so few people in a city like Beirut where history could be changed, why was it in the month just preceding, at Cancun, Mexico, when Global TV had one reporter and CTV had four, that CBC was there with 41, and just after the situation in Lebanon, in Brisbane, Australia, where Global took their feed from CBC, CTV had one reporter and CBC was there with 91. Why is it that everyone from CBC who raises his hand gets to go when the place is luxurious, opulent and plush, but we do not send people to the places where there is real news which could affect the history of the world, taking place? Could you justify that in the name of efficiency?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member does a great deal of injustice to the CBC correspondents, many of whom in the past had their lives endangered in various circumstances. The Hon. Member cannot have it both ways. He is trying to win on both sides of the question this afternoon by blaming the CBC for not being in one place, then blaming the CBC for being in another place. He also compares apples with oranges, Madam Speaker, when he speaks of networks such as Global or CTV, for he is indeed talking about one network—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Fox: The Hon. Members on the other side do not want to hear me out, but it so happens that CBC runs more than one network. It runs two radio networks in two official languages in this country, and two television networks in two official languages in this country. And it runs a CBC international service, and a Northern service. If CBC wants to give coverage over all of these networks at the same time, it obviously takes more people than to give coverage over one single-language network.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

NEW EMPLOYMENT EXPANSION AND DEVELOPMENT PROGRAM

TIMING OF FUND EXPENDITURES

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment. The economic statement of the Minister of Finance claimed that the latest job-creation program called NEED would create, and I quote, "jobs for 60,000 individuals over a period of 18 months." This time frame is crucial, given the fact that we have over one and a half million people unemployed, and given the fact that some 55,000 people, projected to reach up to 90,000, are exhausting their unemployment insurance benefits each month. Will the Minister confirm that in fact these funds will be spent over a period of two and a half to three years?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I would like to explain to the Hon. Member that the job-creation programs initiated in this fiscal year, which only has three or four months to go before the April deadline, will operate in the next fiscal year. However, because they are operating on a 12-month basis they will overlap. The entire job-creation program will run through three fiscal years, but in fact will be operative for two and a half years. I think if the Hon. Member would look at the simple calculus based upon that example, he would correct his statement.

EXPENDITURES IN QUEBEC

Mr. Cyril Keeper (Winnipeg-St. James): Madam Speaker, the prospect that Canadians are facing, to use the example of Quebec, is this: during this fiscal year there will be something like $10.5 million spent on employment in a Province which now has 23 per cent of its working population on welfare or unemployment insurance. I wonder if the Minister could confirm these statistics which we are receiving from the Provinces, that for Canada as a whole, in this fiscal year, they will be spending some $30 million, in the next fiscal year, $320 million, and in the third fiscal year as much as $150 million? And why, Madam Speaker, is the Minister saying one thing to the public through the economic statement of the Minister of Finance, and another thing to the Provinces in private?

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, again I would like to point out to the Hon. Member that his figures are dead wrong when it comes to how much is being allocated for job creation, because in the Province of Quebec alone, if one totals up what is being spent on the NEED Program, as well as the other job-creation programs, it would come closer to $100 million in this period of time, not the $10 million he talks about. I think, Madam Speaker, before we get down to answering his question, he should do his sums a little better, and then we can get down to a fair exchange.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

UNITED STATES STORAGE OF RADIOACTIVE WASTES IN NIAGARA AREA

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for the protection of the Canadian environment. Despite the fact that the Niagara area is one of the most heavily chemically-contaminated areas on the whole of this continent, it is proposed by the United States authorities that they establish a 1,000-acre dumping ground for radioactive waste, waste coming from several of the American states. This site is located within five miles of the Niagara River and there are already some 16,000 tonnes of radioactive waste stored since World War II. This should not be allowed to happen.

People's groups on both sides of the river are looking to the Canadian Government as their last hope. What action, Mr. Minister, is your Department proposing to take, or the Government of Canada, to halt this proposal which would endanger the lives of over four million Canadians who use the Niagara-Lake Ontario waterway as a source for drinking water?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, this is indeed a very serious question. The Hon. Member for Niagara Falls has already been very vigorous in his representations to me on exactly the same point. As a result of these representations, we have opened discussions with the American authorities to try to make sure they are entirely conscious of the kinds of concerns which the Hon. Member has expressed.

RADIATION LEAKAGE FROM DUMPS

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, as one of the Minister's colleagues mentioned earlier, the time is now for action, not talk. The Minister already knows there is a radiation leak from the contamination dumps already there, which is leaking into the Niagara River. With a situation like that, scientific authorities say there is no safe level for radiation. In light of the facts which his Department has in its files, what action, really, does the Minister propose to take, or is this one of the trade-off areas which he has said himself are necessary in the environmental world?

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I am not sure what the Hon. Member is referring to when he talks of "trade offs". We are not talking about trade offs in this regard. We are taking the kind of action I thought he was recommending in his original question. The action required is on the part of the American authorities. It is exactly that which we are seeking, and exactly that which is the purpose of the representations we are making.

ATOMIC ENERGY OF CANADA LIMITED

ANNOUNCED LAY-OFFS—REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ASSISTANCE

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy. I think that is his right elbow behind the curtain. He was just here.

Mr. Clark: Here he comes.

Mr. Gurbin: Port Hawkesbury and Glace Bay both stand to lose 900 heavy water nuclear jobs. The AECL in Toronto has indicated its intentions to release 600 engineers from its facility there. Indeed, 36,000 direct jobs which are related to the nuclear industry in Canada are in desperate condition. Does the Minister and Cabinet have any possible action in mind which may assist these nuclear workers?

● (1500)

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, of course it is all related to the Candu program and the possibility of selling more Candu reactors which will need heavy water and the engineering which will provide work. At this time the prospects for sales of new Candu reactors are very limited indeed, and that is why AECL was obliged to let go some 600 or 700 people last week in Toronto.

As far as the question of heavy water production in the two plants in Cape Breton is concerned, at this time there is some discussion about the level of activity there but no decision has been made by Cabinet as yet.

NUCLEAR ENERGY

QUERY RESPECTING GOVERNMENT POLICY

Mr. G. M. Gurbin (Bruce-Grey): Madam Speaker, after years of mismanagement the Government is now letting the Canadian nuclear industry go bit by bit, engineer by engineer, and technician by technician. We in this party have been asking for the last year if the Liberal Government has a nuclear energy policy. Will the Minister tell us if the Government has a nuclear energy policy?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think Atomic Energy of Canada has developed a technology which has been very useful up until now. As I said, because of the change in energy needs around the world, it is more difficult at this time to sell Candu reactors. Of course, if you are not selling in a business you have to make some cuts. That is why AECL was obliged to let some people go in Toronto last week. I do not know if the Hon. Member is arguing at this time that, if we do not sell, we should keep the people on the payroll. I do not think that is a good management policy.

PRIVILEGE

MR. FRIESEN—PRODUCTION OF PAPERS ALLEGED INCOMPLETE

Madam Speaker: I am prepared to rule today on the question of privilege raised by the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta (Mr. Friesen). This question of privilege arose from an order of the House adopted on April 1, 1982 which called for all documents relating to an Emergency Planning Order in Council to be laid before the House.

I just want to remind Hon. Members that, of course, there is no doubt in my mind that deliberate disobedience of an order of the House is contempt of the House, provided, of course, the order is made within the limits of the House's competence and jurisdiction. Criteria have been laid down stating the general principles governing notices of motions for the production of papers which have been followed since 1973, although not formally approved by the House. Those principles are to be found in Citation 390 on pages 138 and 139 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition.

The Hon. Member cited a number of precedents when raising this issue in the House. He cited, for example, a decision rendered on July 16, 1955 in which the Chair declined to rule that a prima facie case of privilege had been established in respect of non-compliance with an order of the House to produce a certain document. The Speaker pointed out on that occasion that if the Member wished to pursue his complaint, the proper course would be to move another motion. In another ruling alluded to by the Hon. Member of March 20, 1962, the Chair offered similar advice to a Member who complained that an order of the House to produce documents had not been sufficiently complied with.

The Hon. Member also referred to a decision of February 21, 1979, in relation to which he said, I believe—paraphrasing the Speaker:

> The Speaker clearly indicates that if the Hon. Member had actually said he had made application pursuant to motions for the production of documents and that the Minister subsequently refused to produce them, then it could have been brought forward within the ambit of privilege.

I have studied this particular ruling and should like to quote the two paragraphs from which the Hon. Member drew this implication:

> If I were to grant that that matter were to become a question of privilege because the minister was refusing on some grounds to produce that document to a member, I think that I would be stretching the limit of the definition of privilege beyond recognition. If I were to decide that a prima facie refusal by a minister to produce a document became privilege, I would be altering the law or privilege considerably.

> The Hon. Member does not actually say that he has made an application pursuant to motions for the production of documents and that the minister subsequently has refused to produce them. He does say in his argument that the minister has refused his other request for information, but he does not identify this particular one.

I do not think these paragraphs clearly indicate how the Speaker might have ruled in the hypothetical situation referred to by the Hon. Member. In the present case, I should also draw attention to the distinction between papers which may be ordered directly by the House and those which may be sought by an Address to the Crown.

Citation 382 at page 136 of Beauchesne's Fifth Edition states that the House may order papers directly when they relate to matters under the immediate control and direction of the different departments, or to the business of the House. The following Citation 383 lists the documents which can be sought by means of an Address to the Crown. The documents with which this question of privilege is concerned fall into this latter category. Although the distinction may be a technical one, the House did not order the direct production of documents. It resolved that an Address be presented to His Excellency praying that they be produced. Technically, therefore, the order of the House was fully complied with.

I think it is clear in terms of the precedents I have cited that the failure of the Government to produce some of the documents pursuant to the order of the House adopted April 1, 1982 does not amount to a violation of privilege. The Hon. Member in his submission drew attention to the fact that no date was attached to his motion and that the order of the House was specific in calling for all documents relevant to the Emergency Planning Order. Well, somebody has to judge which documents are relevant and I suggest that this is a matter for the Government to decide, in general. It is certainly not a matter for the Chair to decide.

I would also underline the fact that the order of the House was adopted on April 1, 1982 and that it would be reasonable to regard this date as a cut-off date. If any relevant documents became available subsequent to that date, as indeed one apparently has, and quoted by the Hon. Member, it would be open to the Hon. Member to move another motion if he wished them to be produced.

I do not think we can assume that the order of the House is open-ended as far as the date is concerned. The Hon. Member, in referring to documents, indicated the date of only one of those documents, which was after the cut-off date, and the Chair cannot take the responsibility of determining whether these documents fall within the ambit of the order of the House or not.

If the Hon. Member is still not satisifed, it would be open to him to pursue the matter by means of another motion, in accordance with the practice referred to by my predecessors in previous rulings.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey-White Rock-North Delta): Madam Speaker, I would just like to raise a point of clarification on your ruling. I respect your ruling but—

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, there cannot be any points of clarification. The ruling speaks for itself. I have thoroughly studied the precedents, and the Hon. Member knows exactly what I am talking about when I refer to documents which were dated after the order was given by the House. On that ground alone it could have been ruled out, but there were many other grounds. So I feel I cannot agree to the Hon. Member making any comment.

THE LATE HON. CLARENCE WALLACE

TRIBUTE TO FORMER LIEUTENANT-GOVERNOR OF BRITISH COLUMBIA

Mr. Bill Clarke (Vancouver Quadra): Madam Speaker, I would ask the House to join me in a tribute to Colonel the Hon. Clarence Wallace, CBE, CD, LL.D, former Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia, a great contributor to the Canadian nation, who died last Friday at the age of 88. Colonel Wallace was born in Vancouver in 1894, and after being educated in British Columbia and Ontario he embarked on a distinguished business career in shipbuilding where he spent over 60 years, the last 40 years plus as president of Burrard Drydock, until 1972.

His war service, Madam Speaker, started in 1914 when he became a private in the Fifth Canadian Battalion in the years 1914 to 1916. At the time of his death he was Honorary Colonel of the Duke of Connaught's Own Rifles of the B.C. Regiment.

• (1510)

He served as Lieutenant-Governor of British Columbia from 1950 to 1955 and was the first British Columbia born person to do so. He was a Knight of Grace in the Order of St. John of Jerusalem and was named Chief Red Cloud of the Kootenay Indians.

On behalf of this House, Madam Speaker, may I extend our sincere sympathy to the family of Col. the Hon. Clarence Wallace, his wife and two sons in Vancouver, and his brother in Victoria.

PRIVILEGE

MR. AXWORTHY—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. BLAIKIE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege relating to remarks made during the adjournment debate on November 8 by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie). I apologize for rising so late on this matter but, as Your Honour may know, I was away all last week and did not have an opportunity to read Hansard until the Remembrance Day weekend, so I raise this at the first possible opportunity.

I rise because of the language used by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill in describing events relating to supposed decisions by the CNR to move some work from Winnipeg to other parts of Canada. During the course of his remarks the Hon. Member referred to me as being a stooge for the CNR and as being a hypocrite, and he used similar language which I think goes far beyond the bounds of what is acceptable in debate in this House. This is particularly so because in this case what we were trying to do was cool down an inflammatory situation which had been caused by the Hon. Member, who had relayed false information in that city. We were trying to relate, on behalf of the CNR, what its intentions were and to provide a proper solution to the problem.

To be accused of being a stooge by the Hon. Member extends far beyond what is normally acceptable in this House.

Madam Speaker: I understand the reasons for the Hon. Member not raising this question before, but in his absence the Hon. Member for Parkdale-High Park (Mr. Flis) raised it. At the time I ruled that questions relating to unparliamentary language have to be dealt with immediately when the language is used. The reason we do not allow unparliamentary language in the House is that it is likely to create difficulties, such as a commotion in the House or noisy rebuttals and so on. If that kind of atmosphere was not created at the time and if the Speaker did not have to deal with anything, then I suppose we have to let it go by.

To satisfy the Hon. Member who is complaining about the use of the word "hypocrite", I have to say that it might please him to know that Beauchesne puts it in the list of words that are acceptable and also in the list of words that are not acceptable. I am puzzled that the word appears in both lists but I suppose Speakers have put it in both lists because it depends in what context it is used. In this particular case there seems to have been no incident which might have prompted the Speaker who was on duty at the time to intervene.

I thank the Hon. Member for raising the question. This might be a reminder to Hon. Members that, as far as I am concerned, even if the word is in both lists, I feel Members should try to use words that are not liable to give rise to objection from other Hon. Members.

MR. BOSLEY—RESPONSE OF MR. FOX DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege of which I have given notice to you and to the Minister of Communications (Mr. Fox). It arises out of an article which appeared in the November 13 issue of "TV Guide" containing an interview with the Minister. It gave substantial and lengthy quotes from the Minister's October 14 memorandum to Cabinet on broadcast policy.

You will remember, Madam Speaker, that when we released that document it contained a substantial section on the marketing plans of the Government with regard to its broadcast policy. It also indicated that its earliest plank would be an interview with "TV Guide" because it was felt that that was the way to spread the message.

Madam Speaker: Order, please. I should like the Hon. Member to tell me forthwith what his question of privilege is. His note was quite incomplete. I can perhaps accept that, but I cannot accept that the Hon. Member should start to argue the case or to expose the question before telling me exactly where he feels his privilege has been breached.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, according to the Minister's words, that interview had to have been given on or about October 2. In the House on November 2 the Minister answered a question about whether he intended to give such an interview by saying that as to communication plans there was no final decision on these matters and that obviously, from time to time, he would make speeches. The implication of that answer was that the Minister had no intention of giving such an interview or that no interview had been given.

My question of privilege is that, as a Member of Parliament, I believe that I am entitled to complete answers on these matters and I believe the Minister seriously misled the House.

Madam Speaker: I see that the Hon. Member has chosen his words. Of course, he is entitled to complete or better answers to his questions if he feels that he has not received them, but that does not constitute a question of privilege. The Hon. Member can seek satisfaction by asking further questions of the Minister until such time as he is satisfied. Perhaps he will never be satisfied with the answers, but the fact that he is not satisfied with an answer given by a Minister does not constitute a question of privilege.

Mr. Bosley: Madam Speaker, I accept what you say. The normal remedy in such circumstances is to raise the matter through the late show debate. But when the Minister has said in the House that nothing has been done and one does not find out for three weeks—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. If the Hon. Member accepts what I said, then I advise him to accept it.

INTERNATIONAL DEVELOPMENT (FINANCIAL INSTITUTIONS) CONTINUING ASSISTANCE ACT

AUTHORIZATION OF CONTINUING FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

The House resumed, from Wednesday, November 10, consideration of the motion of Mr. Cosgrove (for Mr. MacEachen) that Bill C-130, to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

Mr. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure to participate in discussion of this Bill, not only because it is one of substantial importance in terms of Canada's international policy, but also because it deals with support for international financial institutions which are of leading importance to developing countries.

On a personal note, I might say that having participated as a Canadian representative at various meetings for the International Bank for Reconstruction and Development, it is especially gratifying to me to have this occasion to contribute to the debate.

The Bill before us seeks authority for the Government to provide contributions to several leading international financial institutions. These include the four regional development banks which date from the 1960s and other more recent funds dealing with agriculture and with trade and commodities which were established as recently as 1980. All of them have one element in common, and that is the more equitable distribution of the world's resources.

In all, I am pleased to say, Canada participates. Support was evident in the remarks of other Hon. Members who have joined in in this discussion. Almost without exception, they recognized that even in difficult economic times internationally, human needs everywhere must remain our principal concern. Those needs demand of us more than simply lip service. We all know that in difficult economic times the poor suffer first and indeed the most. This is especially true in developing countries which lack the essential infrastructure of social programs which Canadians have come to regard as entitlements.

Bill C-130 now before us is proof of Canada's commitment to share internationally, as we do within Canada, with those most in need. It is no great act of imagination to extend our concern for each other beyond our own borders to encompass the deprived in other countries as well. An understanding of the need to extend our sense of mutual responsibility beyond our own borders was reflected in the remarks of speakers when this Bill was under discussion last week.

For example, the Hon. Member for St. John's West (Mr. Crosbie) spoke with some eloquence about his experiences in Peru and referred in particular to the plight of the urban poor. The External Affairs critic of the New Democratic Party raised questions of land reform and human rights in the context of her work on the Latin American Subcommittee of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. The Hon. Member for Edmonton South (Mr. Roche), as he frequently does, shared with us his thoughts, drawing upon his considerable experience. He also drew our attention to some of the disturbing observations on the North-South imbalance made by our parliamentary task force on North-South Relations. It is obvious that many members, having thought about our relations with the developing world and having made their own assessments, have indicated that they support the Bill now before us.

More important even than the Bill is the underlying support for the principle of sharing represented by the institutions in question. International financial institutions have grown out of the greater collective consciousness and indeed the will to rebuild that followed the Second World War. When the great collective effort of the Marshall Plan had run its successful course in Europe, our eyes naturally turned to other facets of world reconstruction, whether financial as in the case of the Bretton Woods Agreements which we discussed last week, or as investments in human and capital resources as represented by the Colombo Plan of Commonwealth countries of 1950.

From that basic philosophy of greater mutual concern flows the current configuration of international agencies. Those under discussion today represent an international United Way, if I may put it in those terms. Those institutions are the sharing mechanisms for development efforts beyond the scope of any one donor country alone.

I should like to take a moment to examine those institutions. Essentially the legislation before us deals with ten. These include four regional development banks for Asia, Africa, Latin America and the Caribbean for assisting the development of poorer countries in each of the four regions. Many in this House are now well acquainted with the World Bank and its concessional fund, the International Development Association, because of their high profile and world-wide activities which have met with so much success during past decades. Regional banks and their funds do similar work but involve a smaller cast of players and specialize in particular areas. While the four regional development banks cannot attempt to match the World Bank in its comprehensive grasp of global development, they have not only impressive records but certain special virtues which give them a unique role. Their strengths include intimate knowledge of their region, expertise in dealing with its main problems, and roots within the region which give them special insights into the values, cultures, traditions and attitudes of the people whom they are attempting to serve. In addition to the four regional banks, Bill C-130 deals with two other funds, perhaps even less familiar to most than those institutions upon which I have just touched. The International Fund for Agricultural Development, a specialized agency of the United Nations, was established as recommended by the World Food Conference of 1974 in response to the food crisis of the first half of the 1970s. It succeeded in mobilizing new resources notably from member countries of OPEC to help improve food production, nutritional levels and living conditions among the poorest population in developing countries. By the end of the last year, the International Fund for Agricultural Development had committed close to $1.5 billion to 90 projects in Asia, Africa and the Americas, with a focus on the needs of small farmers and landless peasants in particular.

The Common Fund is the second of the two funds upon which I want to touch for a moment. It is an even newer institution arising from a resolution of the 1976 United Nations Conference on Trade and Development which finally led to its final definition in 1980. It is a laudible attempt to bring more stability and predictability into volatile market places by creating stockpiles of certain commodities to even out fluctuations in prices, fluctuations which can disrupt even the best laid plans of commodity-dependent Third World countries.

The Common Fund also attempts to cope with the need for measures other than stockpiling, such as research and productivity improvement to benefit countries with economies which are vulnerable to volatile international commodity markets. We are hopeful that the countries involved will soon ratify the agreement in sufficient numbers to permit the Fund to undertake its vital activities which have been under discussion for many years.

These two Funds represent at least a degree of enterprise and innovation which is all too rare in tackling world problems. Canada supports the institutions and Funds which I have mentioned because we believe that co-operation among nations is the best way, indeed the only way, to cope with an international environment which seems to grow more complex and to change more quickly as each year passes. We support these institutions and Funds because they are effective in their work for world development and because our financial and human resources can help them come to grips with some of the problems of underdevelopment.

But there is another side to the equation which involves certain benefits that flow to Canada. By supporting these multilateral institutions, we achieve a number of our own foreign policy aims. We broaden our development assistance program by diversifying its geographic and sectoral reach and, through the borrowing power of the banks, our aid dollars gain a multiplier effect. Beyond this we demonstrate Canada's commitment to international co-operation, a stronger North-South collaboration and our willingness, as befits one of the industrialized world's major economies, to share the burden, to contribute some degree of leadership and to take part in shaping international assistance policy.

Our participation gives us some influence over the course of events in those institutions and well beyond. In fact, we have a Canadian executive director on the board of each institution. It is a tribute to the role Canada has played over the years that in most cases our executive director also represents a group of other countries; for instance, the Nordic group and The Netherlands in the Asian Development Bank and the Caribbean group in the World Bank. All of this allows us to work toward a goal that is vitally important to every Canadian, helping to build a world that is more stable, safe and sane because it is more just and decent.

There are also certain economic benefits that flow back to Canada through our participation in word development. Many people make the mistake of looking at our aid budget and thinking: "Those funds are sent overseas, so they are subtracted from our wealth". The truth is quite different. In reality, our development assistance program not only creates or safeguards a substantial number of jobs for Canadians today, but enables us to help Third World countries build stonger economies that will become tomorrow's markets for our goods and services and will sustain the jobs that our children will need in the future.

In light of this, I would take issue with the view that there is any reduction in the constituency for development assistance in Canada today. Now more than ever our business community is recognizing the benefits to them, their employees and their shareholders of activities linked to Canada's international development program. Never before has the imperative of overseas markets been as pronounced and Canadian businesses are recognizing, if they did not do so before, that the excellent reputation Canada enjoys in countries of the developing world is in great measure due to our development assistance. Most Hon. Members will be aware that an average 80 per cent of expenditures under our bilateral aid programs return to Canada in the form of purchases of goods and services, thereby creating jobs for Canadians.

International financial institutions, the subject of the Bill before us today, also provide opportunities for Canadian businesses to prove that Canada has competitive goods and services to offer the developing world. There are things that Canadians do particularly well—building railways, exploring for, developing and transmitting energy in various forms, developing agriculture and forestry programs, supplying telecommunications, and performing the roles of consultants and evaluators of development activities. Experience has shown that Canadians win a large proportion of the contracts for which they compete. The Government has over the years undertaken a number of initiatives to encourage Canadian businesses to seek out more opportunities in this promising field. Such efforts will certainly continue in the immediate future with all the vigour the Government can muster.

In the course of their comments on this legislation, a number of Members have expressed some legitimate concerns on a variety of subjects related to international development or to Bill C-130 itself. I should like to respond to at least some of these points now, although Hon. Members may wish to explore them in more detail later in Committee.

Canada's policy on international development is evolving to meet the changing conditions which we face in today's world. Some Hon. Members have, however, expressed concern that no formal statement of that policy, along the lines of the Strategy for International Development Co-Operation, 1975-1980, has been published. I can assure the House that the desire to have something in print, an authoritative text as a reference to help Members measure and judge the results of Canada's efforts, is a need appreciated by the Government.

At the same time, I would ask Hon. Members to consider carefully whether the current international environment of rapid, unpredictable change does not diminish the value of putting a great deal of effort into preparing a definitive strategy that would be partly outdated before it could be issued. A strategy issued during the period when the Parliamentary Task Force on North-South Relations was at work would have been ill-timed. Instead, the Government chose to wait for the report, then issue its response. We look forward with interest to the final report of the Parliamentary Subcommittee on Latin America and the Caribbean.

Understandably, Hon. Members have asked for information on the effect of the reductions in our anticipated aid expenditures announced in June and October. For the current fiscal year, these cuts can be accommodated from funds as yet unallocated, but the reductions mainly affect the coming two years. Because their scope is so substantial, it seems likely that virtually all parts of our aid program will be affected to some degree. The Government's decisions on proposed allocations for official development assistance for the next fiscal year will be announced when the Main Estimates for 1983-84 are tabled in Parliament.

In this context, I noted with interest the comments of previous speakers relating to the positive efforts and programs of the non-governmental sector.

We can all be proud of the record of our country's voluntary institutions in carrying out effective, fundamental development work that truly gets our help to those who need it, often through projects that show creativity and vision.

The proportion of our development budget dedicated to such work has been growing steadily. I am pleased to state that it rose by more than 40 per cent last year to well over $100 million. The Government hopes to see further growth of this kind, without any loss of the project quality and the human touch that have distinguished the efforts of Canada's non-governmental organizations.

We can all draw real satisfaction, too, from the knowledge that, despite these difficult times, many non-governmental organizations are meeting or surpassing their fund-raising goals, clear evidence that the people whom we represent feel that in hard times the need for aid is even greater, that the poorest people must not become the prime victims of economic problems.

In the course of his remarks, the Hon. Member for St. John's West raised the matter of the disturbing slowdown of the United States in providing share of the Sixth Replenishment of the International Development Association of the World Bank. That element of the World Bank provides concessional financing to the poorest of the developing countries. This replenishment was originally agreed upon among major donors at a level of $12 billion over the three-year period 1980 to 1983.

Due to difficulties which the International Development Association had experienced in the past in receiving contributions on time from certain members, especially the U.S.A., we co-operated with other key donors in building into the Sixth Replenishment a provision that contributions would be paid according to a predetermined schedule. If the U.S.A. as the major donor slowed its rate of contributions, other donors could pay at the same rate. This is the so-called pro rata rule.

When it was clear that the U.S. was reducing the level of its payments, we joined with other donors to encourage the U.S. to maintain the original schedule. Moreover, in September, 1981 Canada took the initiative in constructing an international agreement which recognized that the U.S.A. was somewhat late with its first contribution, but which allowed other donors to maintain their rate of payment because of our joint commitment as donors to maintain the flow of resources through the International Development Association to the poorest countries of the world.

It is true that the problem of the slowdown of U.S. payments has continued in 1982. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has received messages from a number of Third World leaders calling for action to preserve the International Development Association. They recognize that the institution was facing the serious risk of donors, other than the United States, declaring that the International Development Association had become moribund. The reason was that the fundamental principle of burden-sharing in the association was being jeopardized by the approach of the United States.

Faced with the prospect of the demise of the International Development Association and the severe consequences that this would entail for developing countries, the major donors held a series of meetings. This September in Toronto they agreed, in effect, to extend the Sixth Replenishment of the International Development Association to a fourth year. The United States is making its payments over four years while Canada and other donors are contributing to special funding arrangements in order to keep the Association afloat, thereby ensuring that the life blood of IDA assistance for the poorest countries continues to flow.

Later this month negotiations on the Seventh Replenishment of the International Development Association will commence in Washington. The institution continues to be in serious jeopardy, especially since the principle of equitable burden-sharing has been undermined by the difficulties over the Sixth Replenishment. But Canada will be at those negotiations, making its best effort to aid the poorest countries by ensuring, to the extent possible, that all major donors make solid international commitments and then live up to them. To do any less is to disregard our responsibility as a strong and active supporter of the Association since 1960 and to disregard our commitment to assist directly, through the Association, the poorest in the developing world.

Questions continue to be asked about the criteria upon which international financial institutions base their decisions about the approval of specific projects. Two basic principles of multilateral aid have an important bearing here: the prohibition of any political activity by these institutions, and collective decision-making through voting rights at the board of executive directors and governors.

The membership of these institutions is highly diverse, reflecting a broad range of political and economic viewpoints. It is a testament to institutional integrity that few votes are ever taken, and that these usually serve primarily to register a point of view rather than attempt directly to change policy. The original model for multilateral institutions was the World Bank, whose charter sets out the accepted criteria clearly. Article IV of the Bank's charter states:

> The Bank and its officers shall not interfere in the political affairs of any member; nor shall they be influenced in their decisions by the political character of the member or members concerned. Only economic considerations shall be relevant to their decisions.

I believe that this principle is fully in harmony with the recommendations of the recent report of our Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence regarding our relations with the Caribbean and Central America. As Members may recall, recommendation 7 of that report proposed:

> —the Government affirm the principle that international financial institutions encourage peaceful economic development by supporting all countries and projects that meet legitimate development criteria. Countries should not be excluded because of ideological considerations.

In the final analysis, the legislation before us today, and indeed our whole effort for world development, comes down to one question: is it working? Sometimes, in frustration and impatience, we feel that international development is like a bottomless pit into which we can pour any amount of money and effort without visible effect, so vast and profound are the problems of development. Yet the Hon. Member for Edmonton South has spoken convincingly of the solid progress that he and I have both seen toward self-reliance in India, for example. We have all heard specific examples of projects that are working well and transforming people's lives for the better.

When we go beyond the specific to the general situation, we must keep two factors in mind. One is that the situation is always changing and many problems increasing. If the work that has been done over the past 30 years had not been done, many of these problems would have grown indeed to catastrophic proportions that would dwarf today's present troubles. Instead of 800 million people living in absolute poverty, there might be a billion and a half. Instead of 40,000 children perishing each day, it might be 80,000.

Another factor that I should ask Hon. Members to consider is the time scale. There can be no instant solutions to problems as big as those of the Third World. Change takes time. But if we look at what has happened over a reasonable period of time—roughly a generation now—there is sufficient cause for hope and optimism.

Agricultural production in the Third World has grown twice as fast over the past three decades as in previous periods. For low-income countries, life expectancy rose from 42 years in 1960 to 57 years in 1980. It is at a level now in developing countries that we had reached in the 1930s. In the same 20 years, from 1960 to 1980, infant mortality dropped from 165 per thousand live births to 94, although, of course, that is still many, many times higher than in Canada. In the three decades from 1950 to 1980, adult literacy in the developing countries has increased from one-third to more than one-half.

The picture that we see, then, is still far from perfect. Our contribution to world development can still be improved in many ways. This is an observation that I can share with Members of the House based on my own experience in development programs around the world. I would ask Hon. Members to help make those improvements and to keep firmly in mind the justifiable conviction that our effort is worth making and, in the long run, will certainly be successful.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since this is one of the Bills that the Government House Leader was urging us to pass quickly, I wonder if it is the intention of Government Members to filibuster its own legislation and to talk it out. We are ready now for the question to be put and to give the Government its legislation, if that is what it wants. If that is not what it wants, it will be quite evident by Members over there rising to speak on the matter.

[Translation]

Mr. Lapierre: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order raised by the Hon. Member, a number of Government Members consider this matter so important that they would like to speak to it, and I would ask the Hon. Member's cooperation in giving two other Members an opportunity to speak.

[English]

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on the same point of order. We understood that the Bill was to go to the Standing Committee to receive a good airing and so that Members would have an opportunity to look into the matter in some detail. Like the House Leader of the Official Opposition, I expected the Bill to go there quickly. Of course, I have no objection to Members speaking; I do not think anyone has. We would like to be as co-operative as possible in order to get this Bill out of the House and to meet the Government's request that the legislation be passed as quickly as possible.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I am at a loss as to whether to believe the Government House Leader when he says that the legislation is urgent and that he wants it as quickly as possible. Since both House Leaders on the Opposition side are now prepared to give the Government its legislation, it obviously does not want it, thus making the House Leader's request to have the legislation dealt with immediately because of its urgency highly questionable. If it is urgent, he can have it. Why raise more speakers?

• (1550)

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, with regard to this point of order, I fully anticipate that the matter will be going to Committee later this afternoon; but I do not think Hon. Members on our side would very strongly feel that we should be denied the opportunity to make a few brief remarks.

Some Hon. Members: Right on!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: At my request, Hon. Members on this side are deliberately staying seated. There are many over here who want to speak on the measure but, in a spirit of co-operation with the Government, they have agreed with me to give the Government the legislation which it states is urgent and which it wants. I agree with my colleague the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain when he says that the matter should go to the Standing Committee where it can be fully aired, where witnesses can be called and where Hon. Members can speak. I strongly suggest to him that if any weight is to be given to the Government House Leader's request—and I would like to give it full weight—that the legislation pass as urgent legislation, we should get on with it and send the measure to Committee forthwith.

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East): Mr. Speaker, I did want to—

Mr. Nielsen: Filibuster your own legislation.

Mr. Collenette: —participate in the debate. I take great umbrage at the comments made by the House Leader for the Opposition, the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen), who seems to want to deny me a mere five to ten minutes to speak on this very important piece of legislation.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Collenette: I think those people viewing the proceedings of the House at home or those Hon. Members in the Chamber should perhaps look askance at what the Hon. Member for Yukon has just tried to do in preventing Hon. Members on the Government side from making a modest contribution.

Mr. Nielsen: Your House Leader asked for the Bill.

Mr. Collenette: In fact, we know that it is urgent legislation. Whether it goes to Committee at ten minutes to four or at 4.30 p.m. is really irrelevant.

Mr. Thacker: Or next week.

Mr. Collenette: The whole purpose of debate is to state one's views and to be satisfied that all Hon. Members have at least participated and made their concerns known.

I am a Member of the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence. There is a meeting taking place right now which I was to attend at 3.30 p.m., but I felt that participation in this debate was of such importance that I must speak, and I am now late for that very important meeting.

Mr. Nielsen: Tell your Government House Leader that.

Mr. Collenette: This particular piece of legislation is obviously very germane to the work of the External Affairs Committee. In fact, this morning the chairman, the Hon. Member for Saint-Denis (Mr. Prud'homme), told the Committee that we had a high degree of expectation that we would be seized of this Bill later this day. I can assure the Hon. Member on the other side, the Hon. Member for Yukon, that it is not my intention or, I am sure, the intention of any of my colleagues on this side to delay unduly the passage of this Bill.

Mr. Nielsen: You already have.

Mr. Collenette: I would like to remind the Hon. Member for Yukon that Hon. Members on the Government side have rights as well.

Mr. Nielsen: Your Government House Leader asked for the Bill.

Mr. Collenette: One particular point I wanted to address related to the origins of this Bill. If the House Leader for the—

Mr. Nielsen: So much for the urgency of it.

Mr. Collenette: —Opposition would be quiet, I was about to pay a compliment to a Member of his own Party—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: —one who does not receive compliments from this side of the House very often, and that is the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre (Mr. Andre), who raised a very important procedural point which resulted in Madam Speaker ruling that an item in the Estimates was out of order and that the Government had to bring in legislation to cover that particular item. Those of us who are concerned about procedure—and I assume that the Hon. Member for Yukon has some concern with parliamentary procedure—have felt for a number of years that items were being presented in the Estimates which perhaps should have been presented in statutory form, in legislative form, on the floor of the House. I think it is a tribute, in a sense, to the Hon. Member for Calgary Centre that he raised this matter and that the Speaker agreed with him. Hence, we have this particular piece of legislation.

I am glad the Hon. Member for Yukon has regained his composure, since I was complimenting one of the Members of his own Party.

Mr. Nielsen: We want to give you the Bill. Why are you holding it up?

Mr. Collenette: In essence, the ruling that Madam Speaker made was that the appropriation legislation could not be used to seek authority to establish new programs or activities. With the establishment of VIA Rail a few years ago, we saw how this particular technique was used and we now have a situation where we have a national passenger rail corporation in Canada without statutory authority. I must say in all due respect to the Government that it is taking steps to remedy the situation in its undertaking to present to the House of Commons a VIA Rail Act at some point in the near future. So that was the origin of this particular Bill.

In order to meet Canada's obligations to various international financial institutions for the fiscal year 1981-82, a separate Bill, Bill C-74, was introduced a year ago last June which closely followed the wording of the deleted votes and provided program authority. Since no ongoing statutory authority exists at present, appropriations for 1982-83 could not be included in the Main Estimates for the current fiscal year.

I would like to refer briefly to the particular institutions in question. I draw the attention of Hon. Members to the fact that we are seeking appropriations for the Caribbean Development Bank, the Asian Development Fund, the Inter-American Development Fund and the African Development Fund, among others. As vice-chairman of the House of Commons subcommittee dealing with Latin America and the Caribbean, I want to say a few words about this particular matter, because the whole question of overseas development aid from Canada at this particular time is a contentious one in this country.

There are those in Canada who believe that, with economic conditions as they are, we in this country should not be increasing our commitment or, indeed, maintaining the level of our commitment to overseas development aid and to international financial institutions. This is perhaps a logical, rational argument, but it is certainly not a humanitarian one nor a Liberal one, and Hon. Members on this side of the House will do all possible to ensure that our overseas development aid is not cut at this particular time of need. If the argument can be made that the world and Canada are in a great recession, then we must surely increase our overseas development aid, not cut it. If things are tough in this country, think how things are much tougher in some of the poorer countries in the world.

This summer I had the opportunity of leading a delegation to South America from the External Affairs Committee. We went to Brazil, Uruguay and Venezuela, and the Committee also travelled to Guyana. These are countries which, in the past, have been recipients of various financial assistance, certainly from the Inter-American Development Bank, and the Caribbean Development Bank has also given funds to a number of Caribbean basin countries. Through the course of the work of the Committee and its travels, we saw how these international agencies are literally vital to the ongoing sustenance of these poorer countries in the world. Some of them, such as Brazil, are on the threshold of becoming industrial powers. Indeed, that is a happy event for us and Canada is trying to nurture this by increasing our own trade with countries such as Brazil and Venezuela. However, there are countries such as Guyana, Colombia, Ecuador and Peru which do vitally depend on the goodwill and financial assistance of these international financial institutions.

I am extremely glad that we in this country make contributions to these funds and that, of course, is the reason we are debating this particular Bill this afternoon. We are giving statutory authority to Canada's financial commitment.

These international financial institutions constitute, as I have stated, an effective and important component of Canada's multilateral development assistance programs. For the purpose of this Act, they comprise four regional development banks, the Asian Development Bank, the African Development Bank, the Inter-American Development Bank and the Caribbean Development Bank, the various concessional funds associated with these Banks, plus the International Fund for Agricultural Development and the Common Fund for Commodities. Canada participates financially in each of these institutions by subscribing to their share capital and/or contributing to their concessional funds. Our financial payments are made either directly or through the issuance of non-interest bearing non-negotiable demand notes.

The basic rationale underlying Canada's participation in the international financial institutions is the efficiency and effectiveness of their program activities in the Third World. These regional institutions provide a particularly appropriate vehicle for promoting regional co-operation and increasing self-reliance among developing countries. The ownership structure and nature of the collective financial participation in international financial institutions serves as an excellent example of a successful partnership approach to development.

• (1600)

A significant feature of our participation in these institutions is the multiplier effect. That is, our aid dollars do, in a sense, compound the economic activity by institutional borrowing on the world's priority capital markets. They also complement other Canadian aid channels, diversify our aid both geographically and sectorally and support the multilateral institutional framework created by these financial institutions. Canada also derives foreign policy and commercial benefits from our participation in these institutions. Our participation is an important basic element of our relations with LDCs and reflects the Government's approach to multilateralism and North-South Relations. Canada's membership in these institutions allows Canadian firms to compete for certain project inputs financed by the IFIs in developing countries. We saw this summer in Brazil and in Venezuela where Canadian firms have been, in a sense, assisted by this kind of financial aid in providing services and in undertaking projects in South American countries.

The Bill is quite straightforward, and that is the reason I will not be speaking very long, contrary to the admonitions of the Member from Yukon who in his point of order spent about half as much time as I propose to spend in debate. I think it is a sad commentary on the House Leader of the Official Opposition that he would try to delay the proceedings and workings of the House in this manner.

Paragraphs 2 and 4 and the Schedule of this legislation specify the institutions covered by this Act and provide authority to the Governor in Council to add or delete institutions from the Schedule. Paragraph 3 authorizes the provision of financial assistance to these institutions by way of direct payment, demand notes and share participation. Paragraph 5 directs that the funds required for the purposes of this Act shall be appropriated by Parliament and shall be limited to the amount appropriated.

Paragraph 6 provides an interim appropriation until the submission of the Main Estimates next spring. These appropriations cover the following investments: the fourth and final payment to the fourth general capital increase of the Inter-American Development Bank. Of course, as I have pointed out, these funds are in dire need. When we see countries with a debt burden such as Brazil has, when we see the growing insolvency of countries such as Venezuela plus a myriad of other South American countries, we obviously must appreciate that this payment is crucial at this particular point in time.

It provides also the fourth instalment to the third general capital increase of the Caribbean Development Bank which, of course, is also greatly needed. The Caribbean countries have suffered extremely in the current recession. The oil price increases that they have had to swallow over the past few years, the decline of tourist revenues because so many North Americans, in particular, are staying at home as a result of the recession, have literally put these countries over the barrel. It is only with assistance from overseas financial institutions such as the Caribbean Development Bank that such countries can continue to subsist and be tied over until times become somewhat better.

This Act also provides for the fourth and final payment to the Third Replenishment of the Asian Development Fund of $56,722,000; the fourth and final payment to the Inter-American Development Bank's Fifth Replenishment to the Fund for special operations of $18,156,000; a contribution to the Special Development Fund of the Caribbean Development Bank which totals $531,000; and the first payment to the Third Replenishment of the African Development Fund which is, I think, in the neighbourhood of $34 million. With the exception of a portion of the payments due to the Caribbean Development Bank, all of the above appropriations I have mentioned will be made in notes.

In closing, it is important for the House to be aware that some of the appropriations that I have referred to in the course of this debate are required to meet immediate obligations to these institutions. Passage of this Bill will also facilitate Canada's international undertaking to increase its overseas development aid in order to reach a level of 0.5 per cent of the gross national product by 1985.

As I said earlier, Mr. Speaker, there are those in this country who argue that we should be cutting back on overseas development aid, otherwise known as foreign aid. Certainly as long as I am in politics, and I am sure I speak for many of my colleagues on this side and others in the House, not only on the Liberal benches but even on the Conservative benches, we must be vigilant in this country, this country of wealth, this country of great economic opportunity, which although suffering is not suffering nearly as much as many of those poorer countries in the world that vitally depend on the financial assistance that will be accorded them by the passage of this Bill.

This is not a partisan issue; it is an issue that crosses all Party lines. I want to thank Hon. Members on the other side for their rapt attention this afternoon, despite the House Leader for the Official Opposition who did his best to inject a note of partisanship into this highly non-partisan and technical debate.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is the House ready for the question? The Member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais).

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: A point of order, Mr. Speaker. With respect to the remarks made by the Member for York East, nothing could be lower than for him to accuse me of partisanship. They laugh over there, but the Government House Leader asked me and the Member for Hamilton Mountain, the House Leader for the New Democratic Party, for an agreement to get this legislation through.

We have both said this afternoon that we want to see it go through now, yet what is happening? We are being treated to the dubious value of departmental speeches being read by Government Members, with one Government Member after another getting up and blocking their own legislation. Surely, if we are to believe the Government House Leader that the Government wants this legislation, that it is urgent, then let us have the question put and send the legislation to Committee without any further delay on the part of Government Members.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Collenette: With all respect, Mr. Speaker, I am not sure whether the Hon. Member for Yukon was really rising on a point of order or just engaging in partisan rhetoric. But I have a point of order which is almost a question of privilege. The imputation that I would come into this House and be set up with a speech is thoroughly distasteful, and I resent this kind of accusation by a gentleman who should know better from his years in this House.

I have tried to speak from my experience with the Latin American affairs subcommittee. I have tried to speak as one who is vitally concerned with overseas development aid.

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to enter into a debate on the quality or merits of the speeches, but I do want to say to the Acting House Leader for the Government that there is a small problem that begins to develop as more and more Government Members rise, one after the other, to speak. I have asked at least two of my Members if they would allow the Bill to go straight to Committee in order that the matter could be studied there. They have said to me quite bluntly that that was fine provided we had some understanding that the Bill would be completed quickly and would go to Committee. I thought we had that understanding. Perhaps I was wrong.

I was wondering if the acting Government House Leader would consider whether it is not counterproductive at this stage to put up seriatim Members of the Government Party's backbench, knowing that it may provoke Members on the other side to want to rise—let me be quite fair about this—in order that today's Hansard not reflect that there are no Opposition Members sufficiently concerned about the matter to rise and enter the debate.

If there are other Government Members who wish to speak, then I would feel compelled to suggest to my good colleague who has already agreed not to speak that perhaps he should, in order to protect us against the possible thought that maybe we did not care about the debate which was currently going on.

At this stage, I would be happy to see the matter disposed of and go to Committee. If we have yet another speaker, without trying to create a problem—I am trying to be as non-partisan as I can in this—I feel the debate might go on for some time, which I think would not be terribly productive. I want to say to the Hon. Member who rose to speak that I am not trying to prejudge his contribution. It may well be very valuable.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. I see a number of Members rising. The Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Cosgrove) was the first to rise.

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention, either, to further engage in what has been referred to as "partisan" consideration or debate over a subject which is of serious concern to many Members on both sides of this House. I had the privilege, though, of leading off debate on the Bretton Woods Agreements Act last week which was discussing support to developing nations in a similar way. I think all Members would agree that when I, for example, restricted my remarks to a very short period of time, perhaps ten minutes of introductory debate, I was criticized, indeed, by Members on both sides, who said that the issue was an important one and needed a fullsome explanation. It had to engage the public, both their interest and, with their interest, their support, in the commitment of the Government and the support of both Parties.

I congratulate both Parties and the Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Clark), for the support given the Bretton Woods Agreements Act and this Bill. But, there was criticism from them that we have not engaged the public in the awareness of the importance of this legislation and hence their support of the expenditures of tax funds in these areas. I wish it was not cast in the light of a "partisan" discussion. Indeed it has not been that way. These Bills dealing with support and this commitment in this budget area, Mr. Speaker, has had the support of many Members. I think the public has to be engaged in this important debate.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the Minister's words ring rather hollow because surely, if his argument has any merit, we would have been treated to the privilege, which we have a right to expect in this place, of the Minister responsible for this legislation introducing it and explaining it. That comfort and privilege was not even given to us. Surely the Government cannot take the position that backbenchers on the Government side, in the absence of the Minister, are now explaining the nature and extent of the legislation.

It boils down to this. The Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader was at those House Leaders' meetings. He knows the urgency which the Government House Leader attached to this and to other pieces of legislation. He knows the Government House Leader wanted agreement to get this legislation through quickly. I have stated, as has the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans), our total co-operation in getting this legislation through second reading and to Committee right away. Yet obviously there is a deliberate intention on the part of Government Members to filibuster their own legislation, contrary to the urgency which the Parliamentary Secretary knows very well the Government House Leader stated he attached to this legislation.

All we can conclude is that in future when the Government House Leader makes the assertion that some legislation has some urgency to it, at the very least such a statement has to be taken with a grain of salt, if at all, in the light of the conduct of Government Members in attempting to talk out their own legislation.

Mr. Smith: Mr. Speaker, on the point of order, I think that if this Bill completes second reading today, the amount of time spent on second reading will be brief as compared to the average amount of time spent on second reading debate.

The contribution made by the House Leader of the New Democratic Party is a very fair one. I think he made it in a spirit of co-operation. I wish to advise Hon. Members opposite that I believe the speaker who now has the floor, the Hon. Member for Manicouagan (Mr. Maltais), will in fact be the final speaker from this side of the House. I do not think that is an unreasonable contribution from Members on this side of the House. I do not think anyone would wish to deny an Hon. Member the right to state his views on important legislation, regardless of which side of the House he sits on. If Hon. Members opposite wish to make a contribution, they are fully aware of their rights regarding that. I think we may well see second reading completed this afternoon and there will only be one further speaker from this side of the House. I am very anxious to hear his remarks because I know they will be well thought out, pertinent and worth listening to.

Mr. Yurko: Mr. Speaker. I am going to be speaking on the point of order very briefly, but I would like to say I have found the debate very refreshing and am encouraged that some Members demand the right to speak regardless of whether or not three House Leaders have agreed on something. There is the right in this House for Members to speak, apart from whether or not the House Leaders agree. Nobody asked me. I do not belong to a Party and I do not take orders from the House Leader. I do not take orders from any House Leader. I have a right as an individual Member of this House to speak, as have all Members. I find it very refreshing and, indeed, encouraging that some people have the guts to stand up and say in this House: "I have the right to speak".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Nielsen: One last effort, Mr. Speaker, in an attempt to salvage the good intentions, I am sure, of the Government House Leader, and also of the Hon. Members on this side who also want to speak and are not speaking at my request. We already have an indication that if another Government Member speaks, the NDP is going to have another Member rise, but he will not rise if the Government will let the legislation go through now. That may well happen here also; I can give no guarantee at this point. I can guarantee, as can the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain, that if the question is put now, the Government will get its legislation quickly. Obviously, that guarantee cannot be given if another Government Member speaks.

I can go further than that. In the spirit of co-operating with the Government House Leader and agreeing to the request of the Government which we have heard so often for co-operation, I can tell him that if he deals now with Bill C-130, we will deal just as expeditiously with the following piece of legislation, Bill C-90, and they are likely to get them both today; but not if the Government Members keep on talking out their own legislation.

[Translation]

Mr. André Maltais (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the Opposition for having been so anxious to let me speak. I think it is very edifying to see an Opposition that is so insistent on giving the Members of this House a chance to express their views. I may add, especially since I am on the same wave length, as it were, as the Member for Yukon, (Mr. Nielsen), the riding of Manicouagan being more or less on the same parallel as his, that on that level we should get along very well.

Mr. Speaker, I wanted to speak to this particular bill, namely Bill C-130, because I want to explain to the people of Canada, including the Members of this House, why it is important to contribute financially to international institutions, in connection with aid to Third World countries. I also would like to speak as Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Regional Economic Expansion, because often, when the subject of financial contributions by industrialized countries to Third World countries is discussed, people tend to think that exploitation is involved. That is an aspect I would like to discuss this afternoon. Furthermore, I shall be co-operative and try to be very brief and not take forty minutes just for the sake of using up my allotted time. On the other hand, I feel it is important that in a debate like this one, we should do our utmost to explain to the public, in a positive manner, what the Government can do within the framework of international co-operation with Third World countries.

Mr. Speaker, first I shall describe the direct relationship between industrialized countries and Third World countries at the technological level. When a country like Canada proceeds to invest funds in one of the regional banks, whether it is in Africa or in the Caribbean or Asia, the purpose is to provide funds for projects of a social or economic nature in countries unable to provide funding themselves. It is important, first of all, to remember when these funds are distributed, that $10 million in a regional bank in a given country can be used to implement projects worth $100 million. And in the countries receiving these funds, Canadian technology can be used to help Third World countries that need it. I would like to point out for the benefit of the House that for several years, Canadian companies have been working in partnership with Third World countries to help develop those same countries. I am thinking of Lavalin in Montreal which operates in countries all over the world. I could mention SNC and the technology exported by Bombardier, Hydro Quebec and the Science Council of Canada. These funds and services simultaneously benefit both the lending country and the receiving country. Unfortunately, this aspect of co-operation between Third World countries and industrialized countries is seldom brought up. However, Mr. Speaker, it is very important to achieve a balance, so that Third World countries are not exploited and countries like the United States and Canada or other industrialized countries do not take advantage of their knowledge to make windfall profits as a result of the very development operations that form the nucleus of international development.

Mr. Speaker, with Bill C-130, Canada will be able to continue to play its peaceful role but also educational role as a transmitter of skills to Third World countries. That is what is so important. It is not simply a matter of investing funds and exploiting countries. It is a matter of developing skills and developing minds, to help Third World countries become the architects of their own development. This is fundamental, and I want to emphasize this to the public, so that it will be better able to follow this debate, since often the terms being used seem artificial and very technical and the language rather obscure, understood only by professionals and experts. I may add that by engaging in funding at the level of regional banks in certain Third World countries, industrialized countries are contributing to the development and advancement of this entire planet. In wealthy countries such as Canada and the United States, even if we are going through difficult times as far as the economy is concerned, we must do our part to help these countries and their people. This is something we must not forget.

The second aspect I want to discuss, is that through research funds, through funds that are passed on directly to these countries, we are also contributing to international peace. It is very sad to see the total lack of proportion between the situation in some countries on this planet and other, highly developed countries. This despite the fact that the funding provided under Bill C-130 at that level involves very substantial amounts. I see the parliamentary secretary to the Secretary of State (Mr. Bossy) who explained in his speech the peaceful goals of international co-operation. Often, Hon. Members have an opportunity to travel on missions to see for themselves what is happening in these countries. I am reminded of Nepal, to give an example where Canadian money has been used to fund irrigation projects to help the people not so much expand, as actually establish new farmlands, because there had been nothing there before. Today, 3,000 people in Nepal can now make a living from a given piece of land. That is significant and it was done with Canadian funds.

Another example is the islands in the Caribbean, where much work is being done with Canadians of all origins. Technology has made it possible to reach people at home, and subsequently, industries are established which benefit both the receiving and the donor country, as I explained earlier. These are aspects of co-operation between rich countries and less developed countries that are often forgotten.

Mr. Speaker, I know time is running out, and I do not wish to dwell too long on the subject, but there is another factor I wish to emphasize and that is education, because when we talk about international development, we often refer to tangibles such as raw materials, and we tend to forget that these funds can also finance training for young people in those countries. In committee or in the House itself, we often tend to discuss general policy, but it is also important to determine what the direct and concrete impact will be of our international aid.

After all, perhaps we should be most concerned with helping minds, in the medium and long term, because if we want to achieve real development in these under-industrialized countries and establish some kind of balance on this planet, we must help Third World countries with education and training. With Bill C-130, which is a vehicle for demonstrating the generosity of the Canadian people with respect to others who are less fortunate—I should mention CIDA which is doing tremendous work in various countries—in fact we realize that notwithstanding its small population, Canada is making a real effort to help people achieve a decent standard of living, and if we compare it to our own, we realize that Canadians have a very extraordinary standard of living, that we cannot keep all this to ourselves and that we must help others to achieve it for themselves, by immediately providing certain resources to enable other countries to share the general standard of well-being we enjoy here in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, I think that what I had to say on the subject was important. However, I was disappointed just now when I saw the members opposite trying as hard as they could to limit the duration of the debate on a party basis, but I still think that in our parliamentary system, we have principles on the basis of which all members can choose to express their own particular views, and personally, I felt it was very important to stress the relationship between rich countries and Third World countries with respect to industry and trade, because it is not just a matter of sending money for the sake of sending money, it is a matter of mutual development, and we should never forget that. In discussions heard regularly on TV or in newspaper articles, the public often seems to think it is a relationship of superior to inferior, where the same side always wins and the same side always loses. Again, if we consider Bill C-130 and its international development strategy, which authorizes continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain international financial institutions, it should be pointed out that all this has a very positive impact on the economy of our own country. I feel it is an important consequence of international development which sould be given particular emphasis.

In concluding, Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Government, in the next few months, to make a list of all international projects in the Third World in which we are involved. I am sure that on both sides of the House Hon. Members will be surprised to see what Canadians have achieved abroad during the last twenty years. Tremendous work has been done everywhere in underdeveloped regions, and I think that if we could have a direct response from the countries concerned, we would be astonished at the gratitude of these people for the work done by Canada.

When it comes to international development, Canadians—French-speaking and English-speaking alike—should remember that we have been extremely generous toward Third World countries. For instance, our religious institutions did send over there an unbelievable number of Canadians to help those people; before governments got into the act, certain religious and social organizations made it possible to offer assistance to other countries and many years went by before Parliaments and governments could get organized to provide real technical and technological assistance. Those who are not fully cognizant with international relations may forget to point out that those things got under way long before 1981 or 1982 thanks to the help of people who were concerned about improving the quality of life and the standard of living of their fellow human beings. That is only one part of the picture, of course, but often those are the aspects which are forgotten or upon which too little emphasis is laid so as to shed light on the full extent of international development. There is more to it than merely adopting bills and allocating funds to realize that progress has been made.

Mr. Speaker, I conclude by pointing out the very worthwhile contribution made by various groups of Canadians who do not belong to government circles and yet did their share on the international scene to help underdeveloped countries. I also want to commend the Canadian Government for its continued assistance to underprivileged countries in technological, technical, industrial and trade matters. I hope that industrialized and underdeveloped nations will continue to co-operate, and that the opposition parties will support our efforts to promote international co-operation with developing countries.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a few minutes this afternoon to comment on Bill C-130, particularly in light of the remarks made by a number of Hon. Members opposite. On this side we had agreed to limit debate to enable us to get this important Bill into Committee and then go on with some other critical legislation, not the least of which is the Bill referred to as Canagrex.

Members on the Government side indicated that they felt very strongly about this Bill. There was an implication that Members on this side do not feel so strongly about it. I want to emphasize that we do feel very strongly about the essence of the Bill and about a number of its provisions. I do not want to spend too much time talking about it but I should like to make a couple of points that I feel have not received the emphasis they deserve.

The Bill, which is to authorize continuing financial assistance to be provided to certain financial institutions, comes at a critical time. I am not certain that Members of the Government and the various agencies concerned with foreign aid of one type and another appreciate the difficulty that Members of Parliament have in their constituencies when they try to justify the expenditures involved in efforts to assist developing countries in the Third and Fourth Worlds.

This Bill comes at a time when we Canadians face two crises. First, there is the domestic crisis of high unemployment, inflation at an extremely high level, historic levels of personal and business bankruptcies and, generally, a fear across the country of a very uncertain future. There is a fear that the Government simply is not on top of any kind of recovery program. People perceive the Government as not understanding the financial and economic forces that exists in the country today.

As well as the domestic crisis, we have the international crisis. This focuses on Third and Fourth World peoples, hundreds of millions of whom go to bed hungry and many of whom exist in various stages of malnourishment. Nearly one-quarter of the world's population lacks the basic social and economic infrastructures so desperately needed to enable them to become more self-sufficient and self-reliant.

How do we as Parliamentarians rise to this challenge, this double responsibility of assisting the global community and of ensuring that our domestic economy is adequately taken care of? In a rhetorical way I should like to explore the question of why this legislation is before us. What are some of the fundamental bases of the legislation? I think they can be boiled down to three. First, there is the humanitarian aspect of foreign aid legislation and the fact that Canadians have a long tradition of wishing to help where they can. Second, unlike this very generous ethic of humanitarianism, there is the aim of many people, to stop the threat of creeping communism. That was one of the bases of our participation in global assistance in the 1950s. One of the identifiable reasons for becoming involved with Third World countries was to stop communism. The third thing is, I suspect, that one of the bases of our support for the foreign aid package is that it actually assists many Canadians. Although it would appear that we are interested in assisting Third World countries, when one looks at the way the assistance agreements are drawn, one finds that, more often than not, Canadian business, and therefore Canadians generally, are assisted as well.

In terms of the humanitarian basis for helping those in need, when one looks at how successful we have been from the early 1950s up to the present time, one finds that our efforts have not been all that significant. Too often, our foreign aid programs have resulted in only those at the top of the socio-economic ladder being assisted, while the people who needed the assistance most received only minimal benefit.

I suspect that any effort we have made to stop communism—although that is a questionable motive—has not been very successful. Where we have made some gains is in our attempt to assist our own business sector. I do not think that is anything to be proud of, however. If we were committed to assisting the people of Third World countries as opposed to maintaining the status quo there, then if more of our aid was moved through multilateral as opposed to bilateral agreements, that would be a much more appropriate way of getting money and assistance to the people who need it most.

I should like to identify three or four areas of particular concern to the New Democratic Party in the hope that when the Bill goes to Committee for examination the Government will take some pains to present responses to these questions.

One area is the detailed accounting of how the moneys of the various financial institutions that we support are spent. Thanks to the work of the news media and certain opposition parties, one of the difficulties that Parliamentarians face is that the exceptions to the rule, those foreign aid projects that have gone awry or have not worked out, get all the publicity. They are presented as examples of why we should reduce foreign aid support.

When the Bill gets to Committee I think it behooves Members to identify the ways that the various institutions, such as the African Development Bank, the Asian Development Bank and others, have made substantial improvements on behalf of the areas in which they have been operating. Then we could start playing up more and more of the positive aspects of foreign aid which Canada supports as opposed to the negative ones. An example would be in the country of Belize. A very good friend of mine has spent time in Belize in the last number of months. He returned the other day feeling somewhat disappointed because the work which Canadians were doing there and the financial support of the Canadian Government was not recognized by the people of that country. They assumed that it was American aid and that the Americans were behind the particular project. I encourage our people in External Affairs and in CIDA to ensure that, where Canadians are involved in funding Third World projects, we receive credit for the participation.

Also I encourage Committee discussion to focus on the need for Canadian funding to move into the hands of those people for whom it is intended. When we examine our foreign aid participation over the years, we discover that too often it has simply served to maintain the status quo in many countries, a status quo which ought to be changed. If Canada is to fund these international institutions, it is imperative that every effort be made to ensure that that support gets into the hands of the people for which it is intended.

Also, if we are to fund these various institutions, more attention ought to be paid to human rights violations which exist in many countries that presently receive aid from Canada. This is something about which Canadians feel very strongly. If we are to fund projects and to assist people in Third and Fourth World countries, we should put a great deal more pressure on their governments to ensure that human rights violations are reduced.

Lastly, I mention one aspect where I feel our foreign aid over the years has fallen significantly short. Too many of us with perhaps heritages in Western Europe looked at what happened after the Second World War in countries such as West Germany. With financial assistance going to countries such as West Germany and Japan, we saw that those people were able to build up their economies very quickly. Therefore, I think many Canadians expect the same from Third and Fourth World peoples. They expect, with financial support for certain institutions, be they mines, factories, mills or various other manufacturing opportunities, the people of Third and Fourth World countries to respond as West Germany and Japan did in the past.

But this thinking fails to recognize that Japan, West Germany and other western European nations had very sophisticated social infrastructures in place on which to build. They had the long experience of assembling financial systems and the industrial workplace. Also they had the kind of social discipline which goes with the development of a manufacturing or industrial base, as well as health and educational systems. These are the subtle, sophisticated human infrastructures which Third and Fourth World countries by and large do not have. If we are serious in our commitments to assisting those in need and about our efforts to ensure that developing countries become more self-sufficient and more self-reliant, it seems to me that we should focus our attention on areas which assist in the development of sophisticated human infrastructures, avoid the white elephant syndrome upon which many developing countries are built, and concentrate on fundamental issues such as health care and education.

That is all I have to say. I am looking forward to this Bill moving very quickly to Committee stage so that a thorough examination can take place, particularly in terms of a detailed accounting of how these moneys are likely to be spent, the kinds of activities in which these various institutions participate, and a commitment to ensure that human rights violations and those most in need of aid receive adequate consideration.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I wonder whether I might now ask the Parliamentary Secretary if he and his Members will allow the question to be put on this measure.

Mr. Smith: I am shocked that the Hon. Member would need to ask that. Obviously, if no one from this side rises or no one from the other side rises, the question will be put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nielsen: On division.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence.

CUSTOMS TARIFF

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C-90, to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and do pass.

He said: Mr. Speaker, as Hon. Members of the House are aware, Bill C-90 received second reading last week. It proposes several important amendments to the Customs Tariff besides implementing a number of strictly technical or housekeeping changes.

At this time I should like to provide a few background comments on the principles behind some of the measures in the Bill and to touch briefly upon some matters which were raised by Hon. Members opposite in the Committee hearings on the Bill last week which followed second reading. I do this because obviously Hon. Members were concerned about some specific areas and about the process by which the public had been consulted. Also they were concerned as to whether certain industry representatives had an opportunity to comment upon the provisions before the House.

For example, I have the distinct recollection that the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) was concerned about a particular industry and raised questions about the consultative process with the Provinces and with industry representatives. I undertook to provide specifics in answer to those questions, and I am pleased that he is present in the House today so that I can do so.

The provisions of Bill C-90 were originally introduced in a notice of ways and means motion tabled in conjunction with the budget of November 12, 1981. Provisionally the measures took effect on November 13, which is the traditional practice. Considering the desirability of implementing the substantive tariff measures in the Bill, such as those dealing with general preferential tariffs or with the miscellaneous reductions in Schedule III of the Bill, the Government in fact consulted closely with interested parties in Canada.

I want to set out briefly the major provisions of the Bill and what the Bill involved. First is the updating of a number of tariff provisions contained in the former Canada-New Zealand-Trade Agreement of 1932 to reflect the Trade and Economic Co-operation Agreement which has replaced the old agreement. Discussion at committee stage focused almost exclusively on this provision, and I make reference to the following items because I fear the people following that limited debate might have thought that was all the Bill touched upon.

• (1650)

A second major provision of the Bill affects the introduction of a number of improvements in the general preferential tariff for developing countries. It is interesting that that provision should follow upon discussion of Bill C-130 just debated by Parliament. Many Members, I am sure, would join in support of this feature of the Bill, that is the reduction of the general preferential tariff, for the same motivation that prevailed in discussion of Bill C-130 in support of developing countries and their economies, and for many of the same reasons.

The third provisions of the Bill is the establishment of a tariff item which will provide duty-free entry for goods specially designed for the use of disabled persons.

Fourth, the Bill provides—and this is a significant area—the introduction of a new tariff schedule of goods used by dentists or dental laboratories.

Fifth, the Bill has provision for authority for the Government to convert existing units of measure in the Customs Tariff from Imperial to metric following industry practice. I would like to take the opportunity to say that is done in order to facilitate those industries that have already made the change, to metric. This change in the legislation will assist trade practices presently in place.

Sixth, there is the introduction in the Bill of a number of miscellaneous tariff changes in response to many representations received from interested parties right across the country.

In dealing with the Canada-New Zealand Trade Agreement, as Hon. Members know, there are a number of purely technical measures in the Bill relating to the new Trade and Economic Co-operation Agreement between Canada and New Zealand. This Agreement provides for the continuation of certain existing preferential rates accorded to New Zealand under the 1932 Agreement to which I have referred. Bill C-90 brings the Canadian legislation up to date by repealing the 1932 Trade Agreement and related clauses in the Customs Tariff and replacing them with new provisions to reflect the Co-operation Agreement.

I would underline the description of the Agreement, that of a Co-operation Agreement, because that was a point touched upon by Hon. Members opposite at the Committee hearing. They asked what was different between the new Agreement as opposed to the old Agreement. The significant change is the wish of both countries to accentuate and improve relationship in terms of enhancing mutual interchange and identifying potential future product areas where the two countries would find opportunities for sale in each other's country.

I would emphasize that these amendments do not involve any change in the tariff rates on goods from New Zealand but rather deal with process and improved co-operation.

Questions were raised during Committee consideration of the Bill about the extent of consultations in preparation for presentation of the legislation to the House. Indeed, I was asked what consultations had taken place and why Members opposite would support the Bill in the absence of provincial agreement or consultation with affected industries.

I would like to take the opportunity to supplement my earlier comments by advising that an interdepartmental team of officials held a series of meetings right across Canada in 1981. They met with representatives of provincial Governments and representatives of the business community concerning the Canada-New Zealand Agreement of 1932. Discussions were held at the following times with officials of all Provinces. I am advised that New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island considered discussions unnecessary. However, the following consultations took place in 1981 with the respective provincial officials: with British Columbia on February 11; with Alberta on February 12; with Saskatchewan on February 13; with Ontario on February 16; with Quebec on February 19; with Nova Scotia on February 22; with Newfoundland on February 23; and with Manitoba on February 26.

In addition to these meetings most of the Provinces had of their own initiative recently sent trade missions to New Zealand. None of the Provinces was opposed to the Government's initiatives aimed at seeking increased trade opportunities with New Zealand. In addition to consultations with the Provinces, meetings were held with some 40 industries or companies seriously interested in developing market opportunities in New Zealand. Approximately 100 briefs were entertained and considered by the Government in preparation for legislation.

Specifically, the Hon. Member for York-Peel did inquire about lamb imports. I was not able to give him the specifics of the consultation in preparation for continuation of treatment under the tariffs of that product, but I am pleased to indicate to the Hon. Member today that the lamb producers did express some concern about the continued tariff treatment. Their main worry, I understand, was that the producers group was concerned about exports to Canada of fresh-chilled lamb carcasses. The Canadian Sheep Council has met directly with the New Zealand meat producers group. They concluded a private agreement, which I understand continues until November 12, 1983, to restrict the import of that product into Canada.

I might add further that no representation subsequently has been made to the Government on this topic. Certainly none has been received since the introduction of the notice of ways and means motion which led to the introduction of Bill C-90 which is before the House today.

Hon. Members of this House are aware of the important role played by the preferential tariff systems introduced by Canada and other developed countries in assisting the growth of exports and balance of payments positions of developing countries. I mentioned that in my opening comments. This Bill provides several important improvements in Canada's general preferential tariff which will directly benefit the least developing countries as well as the Canadian business community. There is a new duty-free entry provision for goods covered by the general preferential tariff that are imported from countries designated by the Governor in Council as being least developed countries.

In addition, the Bill liberalizes the rule governing the origin of the imported goods to permit tariff-free entry of goods partially produced in the least developed countries and finished in another country that would fall into that same category.

• (1700)

As I have indicated, the purpose of these measures is to give the least developed countries the potential for new export opportunities that were not available heretofore through the removal of the duties on goods that qualify for the preferential tariff when they are imported from these countries. Roughly one-third of the items covered under this general preferential treatment system are currently dutiable. The concession in the Bill will provide to the least developed country free entry under approximately 600 specific tariff items.

There is a safeguard provision which gives authority to the Government to implement tariff rate quotas which would provide Canadian industry with temporary relief from imports from these countries which might be perceived to cause or threaten injury to Canadian production. Therefore, while this legislation provides assistance, there is a safeguard feature built into it as well.

As I have indicated, the Schedules of the general preferential tariff rate changes in the Bill include a number of reductions that will assist developing countries. This provision was based on a procedure that permitted widespread public participation. A Member from the New Democratic Party asked how the Government arrived at its decision in specifying these particular items for special treatment in the Bill. In order to determine whether access to the Canadian market of products from the developing countries could be approved, the Minister of Finance directed the Tariff Board in July, 1980, to conduct a study and report on the impact on Canadian production of providing lower rates of duty for certain products eligible for the general preferential treatment.

After consultations had taken place, Part I of the Board's order was tabled in Parliament on May 20, 1981. The broadened coverage under the general preferential treatment as well as reduced rates of duty on a range of products of interest to the least developing countries. As a result, the Board's study will improve access to the Canadian market for approximately $50 million worth of imports from these countries.

I might mention that this is an ongoing process of the Board. Part II of the Board's report was submitted to the Government in April, 1982. That report is presently being reviewed by the Government. The new tariff item in the Bill which authorizes the Government—

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. This is third reading of a measure that has had extensive discussion at the second reading stage. The Minister has now gone on for half an hour. This is an unprecedented thing for a Minister to do on third reading, in any event.

I can tell him now that the Official Opposition is prepared to have the question put on this legislation immediately, again in accordance with the specific request of the Government, through its House Leader (Mr. Pinard), that the legislation is urgent and to have it passed. We are prepared to deal with it now. That might save the Minister a good deal of time. If he rises again and continues in that fashion, it will be quite apparent that the legislation is not really urgent and that the Government does not want it as quickly as the Government House Leader led us to believe it did.

Mr. Cosgrove: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the support offered by the House Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Nielsen). I intend to conclude with two remaining points which I indicated I wanted to touch upon in my opening remarks. They will be brief.

In fairness, the House Leader of the Official Opposition (Mr. Nielsen) raised at the Committee stage a number of questions which I undertook to respond to. I want the opportunity to provide the Hon. Member with that response and it will be brief.

I think I should make the public aware that one other provision of the Bill deals with material that is imported for the assistance of disabled persons. I know that this provision enjoys the support of all Members in the House; at least, I believe so. This is a duty-free provision which provides for electronic selectoral control devices to assist people with speech impediments. This should be of immediate benefit to the handicapped people in our community who have a need for this equipment, as well as providing a cost break to them.

The last item I wish to touch upon concerns the provision covering materials used by dentists and dental laboratories which will result in the duty-free entry of a number of materials, such as dental cement, pins, posts and those other goods not manufactured in Canada and unlikely to be made here. Therefore, the Government agreed to provide duty-free entry of those goods.

The response of the Government to the request for this assistance by dentists and the dental industry parallels the action taken by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in his statement a few weeks ago when he announced that, because of the Government's concern for the provision of health and dental medical care to Canadians, it was not proceeding with the taxation of those health plans. This provision supports the Government's belief that at this time whatever help can be provided in these areas would be appreciated by Canadians generally.

In summary, the provisions in the Bill contain a number of significant improvements in the Canadian tariff. I have talked about the general preferential treatment measures which support developing countries and are appropriate at this time, in view of the discussions on the preceding legislation which dealt with support for regional banks which has been offered by Parliament to the Government. Notwithstanding the preferential treatment accorded, there is a safety provision in the Bill which permits the Government to intervene if it finds that there is an unfair impingement upon the development of a Canadian industry.

I have indicated that the Government gives priority to the question of medical dental support for Canadians and assistance to handicapped Canadians. I appreciate the support shown by Members opposite for the Bill in second reading and in Committee. I wanted the opportunity to answer the concerns raised by Members in the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party. Knowing that they supported it at those stages, I am encouraged with the comments of the House Leader of the Conservative Opposition that their support will continue.

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, we are being treated to the most amazing spectacle of the Minister responsible for the Bill striving mightily to prevent the Government's own legislation from going through the House. We have been repeatedly assured that the legislation is urgent and that the Government wants it to go through the House. If the Government is really serious about the legislation, allow the question to be put.

• (1710)

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Chair has heard the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) making the same point before.

Mr. Nielsen: Yes, and I will continue to make it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Whether it is a point of order or not remains open to some suspicion.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton-Melville): Mr. Speaker, I would like to rise and say a few words in the debate on third reading of the Bill because of the importance of the issue.

I would encourage the Government to do more than just tinker when it comes to customs tariffs and trade policy in this country. The issue of trade is one of the most important we can discuss. Trade, for example, makes up around 30 per cent of the gross national product of Canada and the livelihoods of many people depend on the fact that we are a trading nation.

However, we have some terribly difficult structural problems concerning trade. The main one is that we tend to sell much of our raw materials and resources to other countries around the world in an unrefined and unprocessed form. We tend to import a tremendous amount of fully manufactured goods. We all know we have more jobs when it comes to manufacturing than we have in the export of raw materials. We also see that the trend is growing. In 1970 we had a deficit in manufactured goods of some $2.5 billion. In 1980 it amounted to $17.8 billion, in 1981 it rose to $21 billion and it could perhaps be even higher in 1982. So that is a trend which the Government will have to do something about.

As a nation, we will have to come to grips with the problem of a disintegrating economy, and with the fact that many industries are no longer competitive on a cost basis around the world. Some of those industries are in areas of very high unemployment and we will have to restructure them and ensure that they become more competitive, innovative and technologically advanced so that we can be competitive internationally and provide jobs for Canadians. The Government does not appear to have a national economic or industrial strategy despite the fact that this was promised time and time again by the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) back in the 1980 election campaign.

It is also very curious, in referring to our trade picture, that despite the fact that we have a merchandise trade surplus year in and year out, we still usually run a deficit in our current account or else we have a small surplus on the current account. That is because we have a balance of payments problem in this country. There is a deficit. Last year I understand that the deficit in our balance of payments was around $9 billion to $12 billion. That deficit was caused because we have so much foreign investment and ownership that we are exporting a tremendous amount of capital in terms of dividends and profits going to the United States and elsewhere, to the shareholders with equity positions in their industries. As well, money is being spent by tourists and others in the rest of the world.

My argument is that we will have to restructure and modernize our industries and be more competitive in other sectors around the world. At the same time, we must Canadianize to ensure that we own our industries as other countries do, such as those in Europe, Japan and, for that matter, the United States of America, which has done so over the last 100 years. A recent Statistics Canada report indicated that the branch plants of foreign-based multinationals tended to import nearly five times as many goods in the manufacturing sector as Canadian-owned plants. I think it shows some of the costs of foreign ownership to our economy when we tend to be exporting rather than importing jobs. The net export of capital is becoming a very serious problem. Many foreign investors have been using Canadian funds in the first place, pension funds and money from Canadian banks, to become established.

When we start to discuss customs tariffs and many of the provisions in the Bill, I think we are simply tinkering. Some of them are good and some of them are bad. I think the time has come when Parliamentarians must stand up and say that we must diversify our trade, and we must start manufacturing and processing our goods from raw materials to a much greater extent in this country of ours than we are currently. We must take some of these initiatives if we hope to have our country prosper in the years ahead and ensure that decent salaries and incomes are provided for the Canadian people.

I, too, am concerned over the protectionist legislation we are starting to see in many countries around the world, because I feel that kind of legislation or rhetoric will go too far. I am concerned about what the Reagan administration is doing in the United States. It is very important that we have a good balance between uninhibited free trade on the one side and too much protectionism on the other. We must have a policy of fair trade in this country. If we have a move back to the policies of the 1930s, when there was tremendous protectionism, retaliation and trade wars, we could eventually end up with trade wars which could become real wars and the whole world will suffer as a result.

We must seriously consider our trade and economic policies. We must start to modernize and become more competitive so that we can sell more manufactured goods on the international market. We must start planning in order to conserve our resources in a more efficient and intelligent way so that all Canadians will benefit.

It is about time that we started looking at the real world of advanced technology, the newest technology available, so that we can start to produce such products as do many other countries in the world. Then we would not have to import technological goods from Japan, the United States or western Europe. We should start to produce hardware, software and computers so that Canadians will have jobs in the years ahead. I have tremendous faith in this country. We can build a tremendous Canada. We have the resources, the wealth, the people and the skills. What we have lacked in the last few years has been a national vision or the leadership to bring Canadians together for a common goal.

I cannot resist, while speaking on a customs tariff Bill, pointing out that although some tinkering may be fine, I cannot support only that type of tinkering. We must get to the fundamental cause of problems and try to solve them. We have a disintegrating economy, over 1.5 million Canadians unemployed, and we must do something about it. If the Swiss, Germans, French, Japanese and Americans can do something about it, then surely we in this country can do at least as well, if not better.

Mr. Nielsen: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the Government would now permit the question to be put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I think the Hon. Member has made that particular point on several occasions.

Mr. Nielsen: I will be doing it again, too.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Procedurally, I do not feel that the Hon. Member for Yukon is entitled to raise the same point of order again and again and again at his liberty.

Mr. Nielsen: You want to believe he can.

Mr. Ray Skelly (Comox-Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I am very disturbed by the actions of the Conservative Party in relation to the legislation before us this afternoon. Certainly we in the Opposition are concerned about the performance of the Government, but I would say that the acts of the Conservative Party here this afternoon in attempting to dismiss this Bill quickly through the House without taking a last look at the implications for Canada speak about its general approach to problems in this nation.

The former finance critic and present external affairs critic of the Conservative Party has said: "If we tell the people what we are about, they will not vote for us, so we will continue to play games with the Government in an attempt to embarrass it and will fool around rather than get down to the actual substance". I suggest that the Ayatollah from northern Canada who is making pronouncements today in the House should get down to the gut issues facing Canadians. He should stop fooling around with the kind of problems we have in this country and start putting their position on the record. He might as well start with this Bill or the previous Bill, which they persisted in fooling around with.

The issue before us again is tariff policy in Canada and it is vitally important. Tariff policy, taxation policy, industrial strategy, competition legislation are key matter that this Government is content simply to turn the knobs and pull the levers on, rather than get down to serious important planning on where we are going in Canada. This is a very vital Bill before us today and, as my colleague who spoke previously indicated, we should not be simply tampering with it. We should be looking at customs tariff policy as a mechanism for shaping our national economy and providing Canadians with an opportunity to develop industry within their own country.

I want to work for a few moments with the idea that the customs tariffs are vitally important in one particular sector, the marine industrial sector. It appears that within the provisions of Clause 3 of this legislation preferential tariffs are of concern to the Government. Hopefully some day the Official Opposition will wake up and it will become a concern to them, because many of the ridings which they represent are vitally concerned. But ultimately a marine industrial strategy is what we are talking about and the effects of customs tariffs on building and operating vessels in Canada.

At the present time we are led to believe that the Government of Canada has developed a marine industrial development strategy and that it refuses to implement it for fear of trade repercussions from trading partners around the world. It is interesting that whenever we attempt to talk about it under legislation such as the provisions in Clause 3, things such as GATT are thrown up to us, that it would violate such agreements. Under the present situation shipbuilding is not covered, which means that we could take the same advantage that other Canadians are taking.

To come back to the question of the federal Government's development of a marine industrial strategy, it is our understanding that that policy has been in place. It was promised when this Parliament first convened in 1980. It was restated time after time that this policy was going to be developed and implemented, and it would affect major regions of this country. The Pacific region would benefit; the Great Lakes region would benefit; the Hamilton-St. Catharines area; the Atlantic Provinces would benefit; Saint John, New Brunswick. So would Halifax, Nova Scotia, where the federal Government recently spent $63 million on one of the largest floating dry docks in the country. If they were to simply put in place the marine industrial strategy which they have already written, we would be able to make tremendous use of that new floating facility.

Also benefiting would be St. John's, Newfoundland and Marystown places where there are hundreds if not thousands of Canadians unemployed because the Government refuses to implement a policy it has already drafted and develop the legislation before us today in a manner which is consistent with supporting that policy.

I would just like to deal with what our understanding of this policy is at the present time. At the present time the largest opportunity for Canadians to take part in the building and operating of marine platforms lies in offshore exploration and resource development. Figures have been given, although approximate, showing that we have something in the order of 16 rigs working offshore on the East Coast, 50 offshore supply vessels and 17 over 100-foot fishing vessels. Recent figures indicate that one of those rigs was built in Canada, two of the offshore supply vessels and three of the fishing vessels.

What we are faced with is a simple task that has already been recommended, that if the customs boundary was pushed out 200 miles, all of those vessels would be built in Canada. Believe me, the statement that Canadians cannot build that equipment is an absolute myth, and so is the statement that they cannot build it competitively.

I would use one case, the Saint John, New Brunswick shipbuilding operation. It is interesting that Petro-Canada recently almost contracted with that company to build an oil-drilling rig. They had tested bids from the world shipbuilding market and it is interesting that Saint John shipbuilders won the bid. They were on their way to Calgary to sign the agreement. So here is a company that is competitive on a world-wide basis, they are prepared to sign the agreement, but what happens? Petro-Canada at the last minute backs out because the leasing of rigs drops from approximately $120,000 to $70,000 a day, and the economic justification does not exist. The point is that a Canadian company and a Canadian facility using Canadian design and engineering capability put in a competitive bid and won in the over-all market.

So clearly, against a lot of serious problems many countries in the world, in addition to having restrictive tariff protection on shipbuilding, wind up giving concessionary financing which produces interest rates on the building at roughly 6 per cent to 7 per cent, which are often forgiven until the vessel has been working for a year. In Canada, when Petro-Canada assessed the cost to the Canadian company that successfully bid, they put an interest charge on that money—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Member for Yukon is rising, on a point of order.

Mr. Nielsen: The Chair might, with respect, be able to see some relevancy of Petro-Canada and shipbuilding to the Customs Tariff, but I certainly cannot.

Mr. Skelly: The relevance is certainly this. If this Bill contained a provision that customs barriers applied in a different manner or customs provisions applied in a different manner, we could consider in this legislation and Canadians would go to work. If the Hon. Member from Yukon does not care about people working in his area, we certainly are concerned about them working in the Atlantic, the Pacific, the Great Lakes and Central Canada. Maybe if he rose more often on those questions there would be more people working in the Yukon; there would be more people in the Yukon.

What we are talking about is a marine industrial strategy that has already been drafted and contains recommendations to change these customs provisions. I am sorry that the Minister was not able to give us some insight today into why this particular Clause 3, which would be very simple to amend, put thousands of Canadians back to work in the shipbuilding industry and operating those marine vessels, was not so amended.

That is one aspect in the marine industrial strategy that the Government has already drawn up. Push the customs barrier out 200 miles off the northern coast, off the eastern coast of Canada, and thousands of people would go back to work in ships and vessels and offshore platforms built in Canada. That is already known.

The consultation process with industry has already taken place, but what we do not see is the federal Government delivering a policy by appropriate legislation here.

Let us come to contradictions. I am amazed that the Conservative Party can stand up on one day and make expressions of concern about contradictions in the customs legislation and today ignore the subject because they want to embarrass the Government by stuffing this legislation through the House in an undignified and overhasty manner. I am appalled, and I am certain that when the Canadian people become aware of this they are going to be appalled, at the inaction of the Government and the incompetence of the Official Opposition.

This Bill deals with preferential tariffs to developing nations and it is interesting to note that Commonwealth countries can deliver ships into Canada at very reduced rates in terms of the customs tariffs. Developing nations can bring ships in at a very reduced rate on those customs tariffs. What this means is that Canadian ship operators are buying vessels offshore, because not only are they faced with a very low customs tariff in Canada, but they have an opportunity for proper concessionary financing and for forgiveness of payments on those vessels. What we get is the double whammy of our Government reducing the customs barrier to facilitate entry of those vessels, and allowing totally subsidized or greatly subsidized industry to produce products which are dumped into our market. I will give you an example; at the present time Federal Commerce and Navigation is building in four major bulk areas. It would appear that this company, which is involved in the development of the coal port at Prince Rupert and in the Northeast coal project, is going to use those vessels to haul coal to the Orient. Two of those vessels are being built in South Korea, a country which is currently operating under a preferential tariff because they are a developing nation. However, South Korea is not a developing nation in terms of shipbuilding capabilities. With the amount of subsidization in that country, availability of concessionary financing, and a very low customs tariff boundary, they can drop those ships into Canada. You cannot, in some respects, blame the companies for going offshore to purchase when the Government of Canada, and the Official Opposition do not care enough to stand up and say this Bill should be amended to put in the prohibition which puts Canadian firms on an equal footing and those firms, with whom the Government has gone through a consultation process, are not asking for an advantage. They just want to be put on an equal footing with other countries so they can put Canadians back to work, and that is not happening. Commonwealth nations and developing nations should be put on an equal footing with other nations.

There is another ironic twist to the marine and shipbuilding situation. If a Canadian company, which cannot produce all the components with respect to a major vessel construction, has to import parts, they have to pay the full tariff price on those parts. When the Saint John drydock, or those along the Great Lakes or St. Lawrence, bid against those foreign countries, they are paying full customs tariff on the parts which they are bringing into the country, and still have to put together a competitive bid. We have the shipyards with the capabilities, but the Government of Canada and the Official Opposition are trying to tie one hand behind their backs. I would suggest what we need is a last minute look at this particular legislation.

The shipbuilding policy, as with the customs legislation, does shape the nature of Canadian trade. It does shape the nature of industry within the country. I would urge the Hon. Members of this House to take a look at the possibility of putting some amendments before the House which would put Canadian shipbuilders at least on an equal footing. Beyond this particular situation we have to look at improvements in those customs tariffs to provide at least the same footing by blocking the dumping, if you will, of those subsidized vessels into Canada. We should push it out 200 miles, as the Government's own advisers are already recommending.

The second thing we need is to raise the customs tariff to the equivalent of other nations and require a 25 per cent tariff on vessels brought from developing nations and from Commonwealth nations so they cannot dump vessels into the country. We should be looking seriously at removing all tariffs where a shipbuilding company is in a position to bid for a contract and they require some of the key parts brought into Canada. Our industrial development people should examine very closely the fact that these parts cannot be built in Canada, and they should be looking at ways down the road of producing them here.

We also need to look at the question of concessionary financing. If other nations are providing reduced financing on these major constructions, if our own export development nation is providing to companies offshore an opportunity to purchase, then, certainly, we should provide the Canadian ship owners and operators an opportunity to have access to concessionary financing in the shipbuilding process.

It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, that the Government has already drafted that policy. It is my understanding that it has been approved at the departmental level and at the Cabinet level, but it is frozen in place so that we are not allowed to make major changes. The Federal Government, in terms of the policy it has drafted is absolutely passive. Proper customs legislation would mean thousands of jobs. A proper marine industrial strategy would mean thousands of jobs. It is interesting though, that the Government, in its wisdom, does not want to build major vessels in Canada. They are under the mistaken impression that if Japan, Korea, Taiwan, Singapore, Belgium, Norway, Finland, can all build this equipment cheaper, and offshore, we will win a few industrial offsets rather than building the ships.

That policy has been expounded also by the Members on the other side of the House, and it would certainly pay us to hear somebody from that side stand up and tell us what they are going to do with customs tariffs in order to complement this particular industrial sector which would put thousands of people back to work. Maybe we should talk about where they would go back to work, because certainly that is important. The normal operating capacity at the Halifax shipyard runs at about 950 people. They are down to 450. There are 500 people who could go to work there. They have a brand new drydock where very large vessels could be built. Where are those vessels going to come from? They are certainly not going to pull them from the mid-Atlantic into Halifax en route to somewhere else. They are not going to get new shipbuilding contracts if the Government does not put its marine industrial strategy into place and does not make proper amendments to the customs legislation.

An Hon. Member: Your voice is giving out. Sit down.

Mr. Skelly: If the Hon. Member from Saskatoon, and the Official Opposition, do not care about 500 jobs in Halifax, why do they not stand up in the House and say so instead of sending minor aggravating bits of abuse over here? There are certainly people from Halifax who are concerned about those 500 jobs because their families do not have the income they had in the past. When Hawker Siddeley ran that yard, its capacity allowed 2,000 people to be employed. And if the Hon. Member from Saskatoon does not care about that, then he should get up and speak against the marine industrial strategy on this Bill. He has the opportunity.

An Hon. Member: After listening to you there is nothing more to be said.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, if we look at the shipyard at Saint John, New Brunswick, the capacity there is in the order of 1,700 to 2,000 people, but only 500 to 600 people are working there. There are 1,200 people out of work in Saint John, and if the Government would put in place its marine industrial strategy, those people could go back to work. It is interesting, Mr. Speaker, that when Canadian taxpayers are assisting that Company to build some of the largest and some of the most effective shipbuilding facilities on this continent, coupled with probably some of the best design and engineering opportunities, and this Company could put 1,200 Canadians back to work, the federal Government will not put that marine industrial policy in pace. It is a policy which they have already developed, yet they will not put the proper amendments into this legislation, and so 1,200 people are not working in that community, a fact which is having a terrible impact on it.

It is interesting also that Saint John has nothing more on its order book. There is not one more thing on the order book for that company unless they start getting some co-operation from the federal Government. Judging by the Official Opposition's comments, the Government will have a long wait before it gets co-operation from them. It is time they stood up and indicated where they stand on this Bill.

• (1740)

Mr. Lewis: How many Members have you down there, Ray?

Mr. Skelly: Certainly some of the Members from the Great Lakes region who are now chanting along should take a look at the communities of Hamilton and St. Catharines, and the fact that Great Lakes shippers are going to Scotland to buy their vessels. Those Members seem to be of the view that it is great that people in their communities are unemployed. If they want a debate on this issue, I invite them to stand up and comment on how they want to jam this Bill through without taking the proper amount of time to examine it. It is my intention, Mr. Speaker, to be down in the St. Catharines region, going through these Members' ridings and telling people about the need for a proper shipbuilding policy. Perhaps the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) should stand up in this House to show that the Opposition is concerned about those jobs. That is the kind of co-operation I would like. Perhaps we should get it also from the Deputy House Leader for the Conservative Party, who, I agree, makes more sense than the House Leader. I see the Hon. Member for Mississauga North (Mr. Fisher) nodding.

Mr. Lewis: He is falling asleep. You have put him to sleep.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I wanted to speak on this Bill because it was of such great importance to the people of Canada. The marine industrial strategy is vitally important. The fact is that Canadian resources are creating jobs in other countries. Other countries have moved vigorously to protect their shipbuilding and operating capability. Well, we cannot do that by just changing the Customs Act, but it is a start. Another anomaly is that the federal Government would go to such lengths to draft such a policy when it knows how important it is in the Provinces of Quebec, Ontario, British Columbia and the Atlantic Provinces. The Government has drafted it, it is my understanding that it has been approved, yet the Government will not release it or implement it. The Government has consulted with industry, it has industry's approval and support, along with that of organized labour and the communities which are dependent on this industry. I ask the Minister: where is that policy? where are the changes to this legislation?

Because the Government has failed to act, Mr. Speaker, and because the Official Opposition has concentrated on game playing rather than substance, we are faced with the situation where the people of this country are going to have to do the job themselves. Municipal leaders, operators of industry and organized labour have joined together to form a national lobbying group. It has happened on the Pacific Coast. There is total support from the Mayors of Victoria and Vancouver, from the marine industrial group and from the shipbuilders and operators. They are going to form a lobbying group and together with the Province of British Columbia they will come to Ottawa to ask the Government to co-operate by putting in place both an effective shipbuilding policy and effective customs legislation. The City Council of Halifax, the Mayor of Saint John's, New Brunswick, along with organized labour and industry people, will be in Ottawa with these other groups to pressure the Government into releasing this policy and putting thousands of people back to work. Of course, they will be joined by groups from the Great Lakes area and the Quebec region, specifically Montreal and Quebec where this is vitally important. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) has made the commitment, and it is time the Government deliver on that commitment to put Canadians back to work.

There are just a few more remarks on this topic which I would like to put on the record before I rest my voice, as has been recommended. Essentially what we have is a very passive policy which the Minister of State for Finance (Mr. Cosgrove) refuses to employ. But we should be going a step further, Mr. Speaker, and developing a full-blown marine industrial strategy in an attempt to produce the vessels and marine platforms we will need over the next two or three decades. We must look ahead rather than back. If we do not act now, if we not make a decision to develop and implement a full-blown shipbuilding policy, we simply will not be able to do it later on down the road. Without a decision now there simply will not be the opportunity later on. Other countries will have developed the technology, and it will be too expensive to put it in place here because we will not be able to amortise it over a large enough number of vessels. We are not just talking about the development of offshore hydrocarbons, we are talking about shipping our basic resources of grain, coal, base metals in Canadian bottoms so that Canadian seamen have the opportunity to work. The community of Port Hardy, on the northern end of Vancouver Island, has been the subject of a study to determine whether or not it would be in an appropriate location for processing of sea-bed resources. The question is what role will Canada play in the development of sea-bed resources. Certainly there are many opportunities to produce marine platforms and vessels, but the Government sits and does nothing. It has already developed the policy, it is ready to go, and with some very simple amendments to the customs legislation thousands of Canadians would go back to work. The order books of our shipyards would be full and we would be in business with our marine industrial development and its resulting spin-off effects.

There is one other area of concern, Mr. Speaker, involving vessel operating companies such as Canadian Pacific. CP is a Canadian company with ships registered in Britain and Hong Kong, crewed by British officers and sailors of foreign nationality. This is the proud tradition of CP. It is time the Government of Canada put in place a marine policy and customs legislation which would make sure that a company like CP not only registers those ships in Canada, but that it repairs and refits them in Canada and ensures that Canadian crews man the ships. Our trading partners have implemented or imposed the provisions of the United Nations Committee on Trade and Development which says that a trading nation should capture 40 per cent of the cartage of its trade goods, it should give the other 40 per cent to its trading partner, and allow 20 per cent to be used by ships of opportunity. That is clearly the responsibility of this Minister. He could put it in place. It would apply not only to the 40 ships of Canadian Pacific's fleet, but it would also apply to all the ships they purchase under their vessel acquisition program over the years. This Minister could recapture those vessels for Canadians. We could go a step further.

An Hon. Member: Are we pirates?

Mr. Skelly: Well, certainly this Government has perpetrated an act of piracy on the Canadian people with the loss of industrial and economic opportunities. The thousands of people in Campbell River, British Columbia, in Port Alberni, they understand this Government. They know what the Government is putting forward. This is not an act of piracy, it is an act of sanity. Even the Government's own advisers are appalled by the ignorance on that side of the House. Members opposite are not even aware that their own Cabinet has approved a policy which will put people in the Province of New Brunswick back to work and ensure that Canadians are operating Canadian vessels which are now being operated offshore. Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

• (1750)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): The Hon. Member for Kamloops-Shuswap (Mr. Riis).

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, surely we do not have to put up with a filibuster from the NDP as well as from the Government

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops-Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my comments on Bill C-90 will be extremely brief but there are two or three matters that I feel it is mandatory to raise at this stage.

Bill C-90, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof, takes us back to the very beginnings of this country when John A. Macdonald, the Prime Minister of the time, introduced the famous national policy and, of course, introduced tariffs at that time which western Canadians still have some concerns about.

We are again discussing the whole matter of tariffs. Granted, Bill C-90 will not make any significant changes in the tariff picture, but it begs the question of the context of the discussions. We are imposing tariffs on a variety of commodities, increasing a few, decreasing others, but essentially maintaining the status quo.

The debate that ought to be taking place in the House is the one that has been ongoing since 1867; it should be very thorough, comprehensive and sophisticated debate on the whole matter of tariffs.

It is difficult to discuss tariffs intelligently when we lack any kind of comprehensive industrial strategy. It was interesting that earlier this week it was the Opposition parties that were calling for an industrial strategy. We recognize that one of the reasons we are in economic difficulties today is that we do not know what we are trying to accomplish in this country. The private sector, the public sector, the federal Government, the provincial Governments, the local and regional Governments are asking what it is that we are attempting to accomplish, economically, in this country. Without an industrial strategy, it is impossible to answer that question.

Today we are again discussing whether to impose tariffs in this sector, reduce them in that sector, leave them the same in another sector, but we have no context in which to debate this in an intelligent way. One gets the impression that the Government is trying to slip something by us by means of Bill C-90. I do not expect that statement reflects the attitude of Hon. Members opposite, but some questions must be asked about what it is the Government is trying to achieve with this Bill.

Just the other day the Hon. Member for York-Peel (Mr. Stevens) raised a question about Clause 5 of the Bill. This clause gives the Governor in Council the right from time to time, to step in and change the method of measurement. He was concerned that this would enable the Government to move in the area of metrication. I, for one, have no hesitation in saying that that is the direction in which the country must move if it is to participate in the international marketplace and become a trading nation of importance. In that case, surely the move to metrication is appropriate. If it is, why do Hon. Members opposite not stand up and say that this particular Clause has been introduced to allow the rules of measurement to be changed when that is deemed appropriate? There has been no debate about that, Mr. Speaker.

When one considers the importance of the various Clauses of the Bill, I wonder if Hon. Members opposite understand what it is all about. If they do, then I cannot imagine why the Government introduced the Bill.

I will select one Clause to illustrate my point. When we refer to Schedule III of the Bill, we see that a duty is to be imposed on some very interesting items such as chairs for invalids, walking devices to assist the disabled, and various control devices to assist the disabled to become mobile. There is a long list of items that, as long as they come in from a British connection, will enter the country duty free. If the same items come in from any other country, however, a duty will be imposed on them.

Is any Hon. Member opposite who is interested in goods designed to assist the people who are disabled to move around, willing to impose an extra duty on these goods? If not, then I wonder if Hon. Members opposite have read Bill C-90. And if they have, do they understand it? If they do understand it then they are agreeing to impose a duty which will make these items, designed to assist the disabled, more expensive. I have a hard time understanding why Hon. Members opposite would be interested in imposing such a duty.

To summarize, Mr. Speaker, I think we are making a fundamental error here. There is an attitude amongst Members of the Government and, I suspect, amongst Members of the Official Opposition, which says that if we can move toward freer trade, if we can reduce tariff walls, then that will obviously be in our best interests. I am sure there is no Member of the House who does not recognize that while many other nations voice that same rhetoric, they are in fact introducing measures to keep foreign products out; they are introducing protectionist measures, not in the form of tariffs.

I think Japan prides itself on doing that. The Japanese Government, unlike the Government of Canada and most of our provincial Governments, has made it a policy to encourage its people to support Japanese industries whenever and wherever possible. There is a strong "buy Japanese" ethic in that country, and the Japanese people have rallied to the call. Whenever possible they buy from the Japanese supplier rather than from the foreign supplier. That is a subtle way of imposing a tariff without calling it a tariff or, by introducing a number of certification and testing measures, to retard the entry of foreign commodities and services into that marketplace.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I should like to suggest that as we discuss the matter of imposing or reducing or even maintaining existing tariff levels, we should do so in the context of a comprehensive, over-all economic strategy. We should be able to see what we are attempting to nurture and encourage and what we are attempting to move away from. We should identify which industries should receive our support in their formative years and which should not.

Until we articulate that in a clear way, the whole discussion of tariff and tariff walls is a rather academic one and, at best, ad hoc.

I know the sheep producers in my constituency would be very interested to see that we are taking a small step in order to reduce the imports of mutton and lamb from countries like New Zealand.

Mr. Lewis: Your argument is rather woolly!

Mr. Riis: Well, some people might say that my arguments are woolly, but I think that item serves as an example of the kind of negotiations and discussions that must take place with the private sector and the public sector in order to ensure that we have identified the industries we propose to support. We should take appropriate measures to protect those industries, particularly during their formative years.

Mr. Nielsen: Question.

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

An Hon. Member: Filibuster!

Mr. Skelly: Mr. Speaker, in order to give the Minister an opportunity to respond this evening, I should like to suggest that it is six o'clock. We would be more than prepared to give the Minister unanimous consent to comment on some of the aspects of this matter raised in the House and some of the aspects that the Tories—

• (1800)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Let us deal with them one at a time. The Hon. Member cannot have two points of order at the same time which happen to be contradictory. Shall I call it six o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Shall I put the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Skelly: Call it six o'clock.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I have an Hon. Member who wants to call it six o'clock. In order to go around that, I need only recognize for half a moment any Hon. Member who will stand on his feet.

Mr. Nielsen: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): I need an Hon. Member to stand on his feet for one moment.

Mr. Nielsen: The Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) has already spoken.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): He has spoken. The Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling).

Mr. Nielsen: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Is the House ready for the question, or shall I call it six o'clock?

Mr. Nielsen: Mr. Speaker, the Hon. Member did not rise. Put the question, put the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): That is what I am about to do. The question is as follows—is the Hon. Member for Prince Albert (Mr. Hovdebo) seeking the floor on a point or order?

Mr. Hovdebo: Mr. Speaker, since the hour is now six o'clock, I would like to call it six o'clock.

Mr. Nielsen: Filibuster.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): No. I recognized the Hon. Member for Burlington. If subsequent to my having recognized him he tells me that was an error, then I cannot put the question; I will have to call it six o'clock. If, on the other hand, the Hon. Member for Burlington rose and was duly recognized, it is now too late to call it six o'clock, and I will put the question.

An Hon. Member: He rose.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Surprise, indeed, the Hon. Member for Burlington rose. The question is as follows: Mr. Cosgrove, seconded by Miss Bégin, moves that Bill C-90—

Mr. Nystrom: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. If I know the rules correctly, the Hon. Member for Burlington (Mr. Kempling) rose to speak, but then he forgot to speak and someone elso stood up, and if someone else is standing up, then they have the right to the floor.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those issues were implicit in the problems raised by the Hon. Member for Comox-Powell River (Mr. Skelly) and by the fact that the Chair sought to understand whether any other Hon. Member sought to be recognized. Once that happened it was no longer possible to receive the motion to see the clock at six o'clock because the other proceeding called "putting the question" had then begun. I do not think it would be improper for the Chair to interrupt the current proceeding on a technicality of that order. Now I have to proceed with the putting of the question. Mr. Cosgrove, seconded by Miss Bégin, moves that Bill C-90, an Act to amend the Customs Tariff and to repeal certain Acts in consequence thereof, be now read a third time and do pass.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five Members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Call in the Members.

The House divided on the motion (Mr. Cosgrove) which was agreed to on the following division:

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Madam Speaker: It being past six o'clock, I do now leave the chair until eight o'clock this evening.

At 7.25 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 8 p.m.

● (2010)

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Order, please. Turn the bells on, please. By Order of the Chair, turn the bells on, please.

I want to warn Hon. Members that I understand it is a tradition of the House that if there is not a quorum of 20 Members by some time around now, the Chair will see that there is not a quorum and will adjourn the House until tomorrow's sitting. The bells will continue to ring until there is, in fact, a numerical quorum, but I will not allow that to go on for too much longer.

And the Clerk having taken a count:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Blaker): Hon. Members will have heard the Clerk who has indicated that there is not a quorum present, that I indicated a few moments earlier that I would take this proceeding at this time. Accordingly, there not being a quorum, the House is adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock.

Members who are present may sign the book, but the page is requested to stop the bells ringing. Those Members who are present are entitled to sign the book.

May I bring it to the attention of all Hon. Members that no one is obligated to sign the book, nor does it mean anything or have any particular interpretation, in case there may be Hon. Members who might choose to sign the book, but who, in fact, may or may not have been present at the time the quorum was called. I believe that there are no further proceedings. I wish all Members a very good evening.

And there being only 17 Members present including Mr. Speaker, the names were taken down and the House adjourned, without question put, at 8.20 p.m.

MOTIONS UNDER S.O. 43

[English]

CANADIAN ARMED FORCES

ACCIDENTAL DEATHS OF SERVICEMEN

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. I know that all Hon. Members of this House will wish to extend our deepest sympathy to the families and friends of the seven servicemen killed in the tragic accident yesterday at Canadian Forces Base Namao, in Alberta.

Madam Speaker: I am sure the House will want to express its sympathy.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

APPLEBAUM-HÉBERT REPORT—SENATOR'S ROLE IN CO-ORDINATING GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Communications announced that Senator Jack Austin, of uranium cartel fame, has been given the job of co-ordinating the Government's response to the Applebaum-Hébert Report. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Peterborough (Mr. Domm):

That this House deplores the appointment of the chief Liberal philistine as "Cultural Commissar" for Canada.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

REMEMBRANCE DAY

DESCRIPTION REPORTEDLY USED BY MEMBER FOR BURNABY

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, November 11, Remembrance Day, is a time for all Canadians to gather at local veterans' organizations to honour and respect the Canadian war dead. It is not, as the NDP Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) alleged, a "booze-up". I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver Centre (Miss Carney):

That this House condemns the rude slander made by the NDP Member for Burnaby and that the House demands that the Member make a full, public apology to the Canadian people for his inexcusable ignorance about the real significance of Remembrance Day.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

COMMUNICATIONS

CREDIT SCREENING SYSTEM INTRODUCED BY BELL CANADA

Mrs. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent concern to low income people. Bell Telephone Company has instituted a major attack on the poor through the introduction of a credit screening system which invades privacy and will deprive many pensioners, single parents, the disabled and the unemployed, of telephone services. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the Government, through the CRTC, require Ma Bell to withdraw this discriminatory screening policy, which is a dangerous national precedent, and eliminate advance payments without due cause.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

S.O. 43

SUGGESTION PRIME MINISTER SPONSOR MEETING OF AMERICAN AND RUSSIAN LEADERS

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, this country's two neighbours are the most powerful nations of all time, armed to the teeth with destructive potential. Canada is effectively the physical fulcrum between these two balances of terror. Both countries now have relatively new leaders, who are, hopefully, men of peace. Very recently the new Chancellor of Germany called for an immediate summit meeting. Our Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), one of the most senior of world leaders, has remained silent on a summit meeting. Therefore, Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans):

That the Prime Minister, with the unanimous consent and urging of this Assembly, invite both President Reagan of the U.S.A. and Chairman Andropov of the U.S.S.R. for a face-to-face summit meeting on Canadian soil to strengthen nuclear detente, and initiate the process for nuclear arms stabilization and eventual reduction. I would suggest that the meeting place be Edmonton where, several years ago, Premier Kosygin held out the hand of friendship and smoked a peace pipe.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

INDUSTRY

RECEPTION HOSTED BY CANADIAN WINE INSTITUTE

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Madam Speaker, the Canadian wine industry is one of Canada's few growing industries. Quality wines to suit a wide range of tastes have been developed. International recognition and awards are being won by many of our wineries. Their problem is winning recognition at home. I therefore move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Erie (Mr. Fretz):

That all Members support the Canadian wine industry by attending the reception hosted by the Canadian Wine Institute tonight and that all Crown corporations and Departments of Government take advantage of the many opportunities afforded them to promote and encourage the use of this fine quality Canadian product.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

STUDY OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND SATURDAY MAIL SERVICE

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, Canada Post is currently undertaking a study to determine whether unique circumstances prevail in Prince Edward Island which would warrant the continuation of Saturday mail delivery. The people of Prince Edward Island would like the opportunity to assist with this study. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Fundy-Royal (Mr. Corbett):

That the Minister responsible for Canada Post Corporation instruct the President of the Corporation to conduct public hearings in Prince Edward Island in order to obtain direct input from the people on this crucial issue.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

DELAY IN RELEASE OF KIRBY TASK FORCE REPORT

Mr. Ted Miller (Nanaimo-Alberni): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The Minister of Fisheries and Oceans has told fishermen in P.E.I. that the Report of the Kirby Task Force will not be made public until January. This decision to sit on the Report for two more months ignores the mandate given to Kirby, which was to proceed on an emergency basis, and the right of Parliament to deal with problems facing tens of thousands of Canadian families. I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver East (Mrs. Mitchell):

• (1410)

That this House instruct the Government to release immediately the now completed Report of the Kirby Task Force and all its related studies, reports and background papers, and that the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry be advised that until these materials are made public it should not vote the $1,047,000 earmarked for the Task Force.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ENERGY CONSERVATION

SUPPORT FOR CANADIAN HOME INSULATION PROGRAM

Mr. Mark Rose (Mission-Port Moody): Madam Speaker, I rise under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Earlier this week the Ministry of State for Science and Technology released a report on conservation technologies. It was pointed out that Canadians are still the worst energy wasters in the OECD, that it is still cheaper to conserve energy than it is to produce energy by any conventional form, and that Canada should finally fulfil its commitments on conservation by giving it as much financial assistance as it now gives to energy supply industries. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie):

That the Government immediately reverse its decision to cut back funding for the Canadian Home Insulation Program and start taking the advice of its own committees and increase support for demand-side solutions to any energy shortfall we might experience.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

RAILWAYS

LEVEL OF PENSIONS PAID TO FORMER EMPLOYEES

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg-Birds Hill): Madam Speaker, Canada's two national railways, CPR and CNR, have saved countless thousands of dollars as a result of the Government's six and five program, yet many thousands of CP and CN pensioners continue to exist on the basis of a pension which was inadequate long ago and has not been indexed for some time. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Mission-Port Moody (Mr. Rose):

That the Government instruct the two railways to use the money which they saved through the six and five program to index the pensions of their pensioners and finally give railway pensioners the income they deserve.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

CALL FOR APPOINTMENT OF ALBERTAN AS COMMISSIONER

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Madam Speaker, it would appear that the Government is preparing to appoint a new commissioner to the Canadian Wheat Board. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Wetaskiwin (Mr. Schellenberger):

That the Government consider appointing a new commissioner from the Province of Alberta to represent the wheat producers of that Province, as they have never been represented on the Wheat Board to my knowledge before.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

LOUIS RIEL

PLEA FOR POSTHUMOUS PARDON

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, yesterday I introduced a motion under Standing Order 43 asking that Louis Riel be pardoned, and it was turned down by Conservative Members of the House. Therefore I again move the same motion:

That, in recognition of his role as a founding member of the Province of Manitoba, this House endorse a resolution calling for the pardoning of Louis Riel.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ANTI-DUMPING TRIBUNAL

DECISION ON IMPORTATION OF ROMANIAN-MADE SHOES

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Madam Speaker, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Beaches (Mr. Young):

That the recent decision of the Anti-dumping Tribunal regarding the dumping of Romanian boots in Canada be reviewed by Cabinet.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

ENERGY

FUTURE OF ARCTIC PILOT PROJECT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, in the absence of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development, and in the absence of the Minister of State for Economic Development, I will direct my question to the Prime Minister.

On Monday the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development announced a major exploration agreement with PanArctic. On that same day, the President of PanArctic said that he would have difficulty fulfilling the terms of the agreement, in part because of the decision of the National Energy Board to postpone hearings on the Arctic Pilot Project. According to PanArctic, this delay will raise costs and put the project in jeopardy, and some of PanArctic's member companies want out. In view of this situation, what steps is the Government taking to ensure that the Acrtic Pilot Project will not join that very long list of megaprojects which have been killed by the National Energy Program?

• (1415)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not been made aware of the statement alluded to by the Hon. Member, but I am happy to take notice of it on behalf of the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources who is due in the House very shortly.

Some Hon. Members: Here he is.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: The instant minister.

REQUEST FOR ACTION TO ASSIST PROJECT

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, I see that the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is here now. Would the Minister comment on the actions he is prepared to take in view of the indications by the President of PanArctic that, because of the National Energy Board decision to delay hearings on the Arctic Pilot Project, PanArctic may not be able to fulfil the obligations of the exploration agreement that was announced the other day, and that unless action is taken by the Minister or by this Government, the Arctic Pilot Project will join the long list of casualties of the National Energy Program? Is the Minister free to do something else beyond babysitting the creation of his predecessor? If he is, what action will he take to ensure that some of the people who are now unemployed might be employed as a result of that project?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I indicated to the Press, and I am glad to have this question, that I hope the matter will be dealt with expeditiously by the National Energy Board, a body created by this House of Commons for which I am the minister who reports in the House. However, there are some problems for clarification by the National Energy Board before it can render a judgment.

I do hope the National Energy Board will be able to tell those participants in the Arctic gas project that they can export gas. I have discussed this problem with the National Energy Board. The Board has assured me that it has not put aside the request, but has just asked for a delay to get some more information. I hope the Board will be able to deal with the project as soon as possible. If we can sell some Arctic natural gas to the European market and to other nations, I will be delighted.

POSITION OF MINISTER

Mr. Harvie Andre (Calgary Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is also for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources. The President of PanArctic was quoted last week in the Montreal Gazette as saying that fundamental changes to the National Energy Program are going to be required to get his company and other companies in the energy sector back to work employing Canadians. In a Canadian Press story from New York, on November 15, the Minister is quoted as saying:

> The last thing we need is a period of uncertainty.

That statement is nearly right. That is the second last thing we need. The last thing we need is inertia from the Minister which will only guarantee that the tens of thousands of Canadians who could be employed in energy related projects will continue to be employed.

Is the Minister, within the context of the cabinet decision, able to exercise his responsibility as Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and do more than babysit the creation of his predecessor, and introduce some of these changes which would give some hope to those tens of thousands of Canadians who are unemployed today as a result of the National Energy Program?

Hon. Jean Chrétien (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I think the Hon. Member likes to utter a lot of rhetoric. I have been in touch with the industry. I have been in Calgary and in New York. People understand that we have a program in place that we want to make work. I told the industry that I would offer stability and decisiveness. That is exactly what I am doing at this time. I would like to ask the Hon. Member to check with his friends in Calgary who, I am sure, will tell him that they like this approach. They know what is the name of the game. I intend to make the program work and Hon. Members can see that the 1983 predictions for the oil and gas industry are for a much better year than 1982.

NATIONAL ENERGY PROGRAM

IMPACT ON PETROCHEMICAL PROJECTS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, I would like to direct my question to the Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce. The Minister knows, I am sure, that the National Energy Program has had a disastrous effect upon the petrochemical industry and that, if it is not salvaged soon, it will collapse in a similar manner in which the oil sands and heavy oil projects collapsed. Right now something like a dozen petrochemical projects worth $3.5 billion to $4 billion are on hold because of the heavy up front taxes caused by the National Energy Program, thus making Canadian petrochemicals non-competitive in world markets. What action is his Department taking to ensure that these projects go ahead? In other words, is he getting together with the Provinces and the industry to bring the parties together to ensure that at least some of these projects might be salvaged, in the interests of stimulating economic activity in the construction industry and thereby creating jobs?

• (1420)

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, many energy related projects all around the world, because of the industrial economic recession, are experiencing the same slowdown. My officials and I met with the petrochemical industry as late as yesterday afternoon to discuss their future plans. We have had a departmental task force for about the last four months, which was initiated by my predecessor, working with the industry. Needless to say, our goals are the same as the Hon. Member's, to increase jobs right across the country in the major capital projects we would all like undertaken.

FUTURE OF MEGAPROJECTS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the Minister and his Task Force can study this issue to death, but the fact of the matter is that it is the heavy up front taxes as a result of the National Energy Program which are making the products non-competitive in world markets. The Minister should know that and indeed does not have to study it any further.

The cancellation of the Alsands, the Cold Lake project, and other heavy oil projects, again a result of the National Energy Program, has caused the loss of tens of thousands of jobs in this country, 45,000 to 50,000 jobs in this country directly, plus the tens of thousands of indirect jobs. May I ask the Minister if he is currently undertaking any initiatives with his provincial counterparts, and with the industry, to see whether or not these projects may be advanced even on a smaller scale, given the fact that this energy source is going to be required if we are to achieve self-sufficiency? In the interests of self-sufficiency, oil security, and of creating jobs and real economic wealth, what is the Minister doing to ensure that these projects go ahead, even on a scaled down version of them?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): First of all, Madam Speaker, I do not agree with the premise of the Hon. Member's question whatsoever. As a matter of fact, if the Hon. Member would take a look at our energy cost, first of all, I think right now, even our oil as feedstock is only about 80 per cent of the world price, which gives our petrochemical companies some advantage over other countries around the world. Second, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I, have had several meetings with businessmen with regard to exciting energy related projects which the Hon. Member is not even aware of as yet.

MINISTER'S ACTIONS

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Vegreville): Madam Speaker, the Minister is quite correct when he says the feedstock at the wellhead is certainly competitive, but it is the effect of the federal Government's tax which is causing prices to be at more than the world level, and the Minister should know that and should not try to mislead the House.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: Some of these projects were onstream before the National Energy Program was thrust upon us. What action is the Minister taking specifically to see that these projects go ahead, either the projects as they were developed, or scaled down versions?

Hon. Ed Lumley (Minister of Industry, Trade and Commerce and Minister of Regional Economic Expansion): Madam Speaker, the last time I looked we were not exactly responsible for initiating all these particular projects. However, as I said in my previous answer, my colleague, the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, and I, in the last couple of weeks, have had some very fruitful discussions with consortia in the private sector with respect to some of these energy projects.

NUCLEAR ARMAMENTS

TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. In his wish to use the change of leadership at the Kremlin as a means of warming up Canada's relations with the Soviet Union, and indeed I would hope reinforcing détente, is the Prime Minister reconsidering the Government's decision to fuel the nuclear arms race by testing new weapons systems and their delivery vehicle, such as the Cruise missile, or has an ironclad understanding apparently been reached with the United States that we will do such testing in return for a much larger share of U.S. defence contracts in the nuclear weapons field?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know of no relationship between our decision to carry out, as a member of NATO, the two-track NATO decision taken in December, 1979, and increased defence contracts from the United States. Therefore, on the essence of the Hon. Member's question, I know of no relationship. It is true that when I was in Moscow, and indeed in Bonn and in Paris, I indicated to the Governments there the very serious concern of the Canadian people with the problem of nuclear escalation and our intention to make sure that both tracks, not only the re-arming track, but the negotiating towards disarmament track, be followed very sincerely by the two super powers.

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF CANADA-UNITED STATES AGREEMENT

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): The Prime Minister says that he knows of no such understanding. I asked the Secretary of State for External Affairs a few weeks ago this question which I now put to the Prime Minister: will he make available to the House, and to the Standing Committee on External Affairs, all the details relating to the framework agreement in the first instance, and any agreement which is negotiated for escalating the arms race through the Cruise missile? Will he also make available to the House and to the Standing Committee, all the details of what the quid pro quo really is in this field, and what new, further and larger defence contracts the Canadian Government is allowing Canadian firms to have with the U.S. Government, and particularly the Pentagon?

• (1425)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I would want to point out to the Hon. Member that when she prefaces her question by indicating that we are escalating the arms deal, the arms situation, I do not see it in that light. Since I proposed a strategy of suffocation in 1978, the Soviet Union has deployed some 300 SS-20s, each capable of carrying three nuclear warheads, aimed at Western Europe. That is the origin of the two-track policy adopted by NATO in 1979. I can assure the Hon. Member that this matter of testing the Cruise and the proposed understanding with the United States in the form of an umbrella agreement, has been raised several times in Cabinet and in Cabinet committees in my presence, but not once did I hear one single Minister or official indicate that this would be with a quid pro quo for any exchange or purchases with the United States. I can give the Hon. Member that absolute assurance.

Miss Jewett: It would be helpful, however, if the Prime Minister would cease being so secretive with the Canadian people and with this Parliament. I would also like to remind him that the Cruise missile is almost totally, if not totally, undetectable. That is what makes it totally different from the SS-20 or any previous generation.

Some Hon. Members: Good.

Miss Jewett: And if it is undetectable, it is hence unverifiable.

REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Miss Pauline Jewett (New Westminster-Coquitlam): I will turn to the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who will recall his reply to me on October 29 that he would look into the matter of pursuing the commitment made by his predecessor that the framework agreement would be made public. Will he now reply to my request of that day that a reference be given to the Standing Committee on External Affairs and National Defence to go into the whole matter involving both the framework agreement and the Cruise missile agreement being negotiated underneath it?

Hon. Allan J. MacEachen (Deputy Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the framework agreement has not yet been signed but, when it is signed, which may be in the next month or so, I will certainly be ready to make the details available to Hon. Members of the House and members of the public. All the matters which are covered will be made available, and there will be no effort to conceal what is a very simple arrangement to conduct weapons testing in Canada in a general way. When that is done, it will then be necessary, before any testing takes place, for discussions to occur between the Minister of National Defence and his counterparts in the United States. That arrangement would have to take place under the over-all agreement. If that occurs, we will also make the details available to the House and to the public in the fullest possible way.

MACDONALD ROYAL COMMISSION

TERMS OF CHAIRMAN'S APPOINTMENT

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my question is addressed to the Prime Minister. In his absence we have been seeking information on the Macdonald Royal Commission on Economic Union and Development Prospects, but his colleagues advised us to wait until his return for answers. Therefore, once again we ask, did Donald Macdonald receive assurances that he could be released from his duties as Chairman before the inquiry finishes its work and, if so, what credibility can a Commission have if its Chairman has an opting out clause in his contract?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to make it clear that there is no clause and no opting out provision in the contract, if that is the term the hon. lady wants to use.

An Hon. Member: You can always quit.

Mr. Trudeau: That is the point. He could always quit, and if Mr. Macdonald chooses to quit in some hypothetical situation where I would be resigning my job, then surely he is free to do that. To be quite thorough in my answer, the matter did come up. I told Mr. Macdonald that I could not bind him forever, that he was raising a hypothetical situation and he would just have to take that under consideration in deciding whether he would accept it or not.

• (1430)

I think that the same reasoning applies to the some 12 or 14 other members of the Commission whose names will be announced very soon. I do not think that they are bound forever, either. There are some former Conservatives on the list, and I suppose they too could resign to seek the leadership of the Conservative Party.

ROLE OF PROVINCES

Miss Pat Carney (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, my supplementary is also directed to the Prime Minister. I would point out that Canadians are anxious to know what it is they are paying for, and who is going to be on the Commission. One of the tasks of the Commission is to make recommendations relating to the economic aspects of federal-provincial relations. What steps has the Government taken to ensure the participation of the Provinces as full partners in the Royal Commission process?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it is a Royal Commission set up under the authority of the federal Government and it has not been envisaged that the Provinces would be full participants, to use the Hon. Member's expression, in the operation of that Commission. The Provinces set up Royal Commissions of their own without full participation of the federal Government in areas within their jurisdiction; and that is the way it should be.

This being said, Madam Speaker, I do regret that the nature of the leak which forced me to confirm the existence of the Commission before I had planned to do so precluded me from informing the Provinces, as I had planned to do before announcing the formation of the Commission and, indeed, the composition of its membership.

MULTICULTURALISM

STATEMENT BY SOLICITOR GENERAL ON ETHNIC ORGANIZATION HANDBOOK

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the Solicitor General has just issued a statement which puts into serious question statements made previously to the House by the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and by the Minister for Employment and Immigration.

In part it says:

> The Solicitor General has been informed that the handbook has been used as reference material with regard to security clearances, citizenship and immigration cases and responses to other Government Departments. It may also have been used for background or contextual information for other security reports.

Will the Solicitor General tell the House whether the individuals whose cases were affected by this document will be informed of that fact, what redress they will have, and how can he give the House the assurance that, as it says in his statement, the information contained in the document was not transferred to individual files?

Hon. Bob Kaplan (Solicitor General): Madam Speaker, as I indicated in the statement I made today, the handbook has been made available to members of the Security Service, and limited to members of the Security Service, on an open shelf, in a limited access area, in the Security Service. I certainly cannot therefore indicate how often it was used and in what particular cases it was used.

POLITICAL DESCRIPTIONS GIVEN IN HANDBOOK

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Wellington-Dufferin-Simcoe): Madam Speaker, the Minister's response will be of absolutely no solace to the individuals whose cases might have been affected by the handbook.

I want to put my supplementary question to the Minister of State for Multiculturalism who, on Monday, made the following statement to the House. He said:

> It was an identification of political activities in the sense of old country politics, right wing, left wing, and what the source or goal was, if there was a political goal, in the sense of old country politics.

The Government has continued to insist there is no identification of the Canadian political involvement of these groups. How does the Minister square that statement with the description of the activities of the Central Association of Sudeten Germans in Canada, which says:

> The political affiliation has been continued in Canada: first being CCF, now strongly NDP. All social activities as well as their publication, have a strong political undertone, advocating the principles and goals of the labour movement and the NDP.

How can the Minister expect to be believed by the House of Commons when he says that the only intention of this handbook was to describe old country politics, when in fact it tracks activities of these ethnic organizations as they relate to domestic political parties in Canada?

Hon. Jim Fleming (Minister of State (Multiculturalism)): Madam Speaker, I might point out to the Hon. Member, as was reported in The Globe and Mail after the release by the Hon. Member opposite yesterday of his copy that he or someone had been holding onto since the 1979 Clark Government, that one of 111 groups was referred to in Canadian political terms, which I believe makes my point—now he signals two of 111—which I believe makes my point that this book overwhelmingly dealt with organizations; few individuals were mentioned; and it was entirely different from the Party Québecois list which dealt with individuals overwhelmingly, their Canadian political affiliation and, in some cases, their sexual orientation. It seems to me there is quite a difference.

I would also like to remind the Hon. Member, because he said this practice was reprehensible, that I do not think it is reprehensible to list the purpose of an organization if it is coming to you for funding, but I think it should be done on a case by case basis as I have been doing for the past two and one half years. The booklet was initiated by the Diefenbaker Government in 1960, including the restricted list and sending it to the "I" Section of the RCMP, and making it confidential.

Oral Questions

CUSTOMS AND EXCISE

EVASION OF DUTIES BY AMWAY CORPORATION

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue and it concerns the financial dealings of Amway Corporation with Canada Customs. I have before me confidential company documents revealing a massive and deliberate scheme by Amway to defraud the Canadian Government of millions of dollars in customs duties. Since the Government filed civil suit in 1980 to recover these funds and penalties, Amway has not even filed a defence, while it tries to negotiate a settlement on cordial relations with the Canadian Government.

Will the Minister assure this House that this civil action which has been delayed for so long will proceed forthwith, and that no cosy, secret deals will be made to allow Amway to escape full responsibility for this unprecedented corporate rip-off?

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Bring back Rompkey.

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member knows perfectly well that yesterday, or rather towards the end of last week, the Attorney General of Ontario laid criminal charges against this corporation. The Hon. Member also informed the House that in 1980, the Government of Canada, or rather the Department of National Revenue, had filed a civil suit with the Federal Court. The Department of National Revenue does not make a practice of trying to make secret deals with respect to funds owed to the Government of Canada, and that will certainly not be the case here either.

[English]

REQUEST FOR DETAILS OF POSSIBLE SETTLEMENT

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, the Minister has still not answered the question of whether or not this civil action which has been delayed for three years is in fact going to proceed forthwith.

If the Government insists in making a deal with Amway, as they have been hoping, will the Minister in fact assure the House that all terms of such a deal will include full financial recovery of unpaid duties plus interest, plus penalties, and that the full terms of any such deal will be made available to the Canadian public?

[Translation]

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, regarding the first part of the question which I had overlooked, namely, does the government still intend to pursue its civil action—of course we do. However, as far as the date is concerned, the Hon. Member will understand that depends on the other charges laid against the same company, and we are waiting for advice from the Department of Justice as to the kind of action we shall be taking in future with respect to the civil proceedings.

As far as any deals between the Department of Revenue and the corporation are concerned, I may point out to the Hon. Member that it is not customary for the Department of Revenue to negotiate when money is owed to the government. We establish what we believe is the fair market value of goods for customs purposes. If the company or the opposing party objects to or challenges the Government's decision, they may appear before the Department to discuss any new data they may have, and if they manage to convince us that the new information alters the situation, we will change our assessment. However, we do not negotiate and there is no horse trading when money is owed to the Government of Canada.

AWARDS AND DECORATIONS

MICHAEL PITFIELD, C.V.O.

Hon. John M. Reid (Kenora-Rainy River): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. It follows upon the question I raised on Monday last. It concerns the acceptance of an award or a title by the Clerk of the Privy Council, Mr. Pitfield, given by the Queen of Great Britain. Does the acceptance of this award or title by the Clerk of the Privy Council mean that the Government has changed the rules on the acceptance of foreign titles and for awards by Canadian citizens? In this particular case, did the Prime Minister or the Government give permission for the Clerk of the Privy Council to receive this award from the hands of the Queen of Great Britain?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the question of awards, honours and titles is a very complicated one that I always have some trouble getting clear in my mind. Very often Members of Parliament and other officials get offers from various foreign countries and we are obliged to advise them to refuse the offers. I know that I have been in that situation myself on several occasions.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: I can, however, clarify this particular matter because there have been precedents in many cases during the time that I have been Prime Minister.

The Royal Victorian Order is an Order personal to the Queen. She appoints recipients of an honour under that Order on her own volition, without advice from the Prime Minister of Great Britain or, for that matter, the Prime Minister of Canada. There is sometimes information conveyed that it will happen, but never is it on a recommendation of the Prime Minister that Her Majesty awards such an honour.

I have in mind a case in 1976 when I was informed that an honour would be awarded to a very distinguished Canadian, the Right Hon. Mr. Diefenbaker. I had no power to recommend it. Indeed, I am sure that Mr. Diefenbaker himself had not recommended it when he was Prime Minister. Therefore, there are many precedents for such an award. I think the constitutional position would be that the award is made by the Queen of Canada and, therefore, she is not a foreign power awarding an award to a Canadian.

INCOME TAX

METHOD OF PAYMENT APPLICABLE TO SENIOR CITIZENS

Mr. W. C. Scott (Victoria-Haliburton): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Taxpayers are required to make periodic payments of income tax during the year. I quote from a letter to me from the Minister of National Revenue dated November 15, 1982:

> If tax is not deducted at the source from at least three-quarters of an individual's income, as in the case of self-employed and many retired persons, that person is required to pay his or her estimated tax payable for the year by equal quarterly instalments.

I ask the Minister if he will consider removing this regulation from senior citizens and other retired citizens now barely subsisting on pensions.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, if, as the Hon. Member is saying, these senior citizens are barely subsisting, they will not be paying tax under our present very generous regime in terms of income tax for senior citizens, but I will look into the specific case given by the Hon. Member. I will give it a careful examination and I will consult with the Minister of National Revenue on the subject he has raised.

CANADA POST CORPORATION

CONSIDERATION OF SATURDAY WICKET CLOSURES

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation. In his absence, I will direct it to his Parliamentary Secretary who, I am sure, is aware of the situation. I have been informed that numerous postal districts in Ontario are holding or have held meetings to consider Saturday wicket closures in Post Offices. I wonder if the Parliamentary Secretary could tell us if the Minister is aware of these closures being considered, if he was consulted, and does he support this reduction in service.

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, on behalf of the Minister may I say I believe the Minister is aware of the closure of postal stations. I believe it was done in order to reduce costs and to improve efficiency. I believe that the Minister is also considering various representations that have been made on this subject.

REQUEST FOR REFERRAL TO PARLIAMENTARY COMMITTEE

Mr. Bud Bradley (Haldimand-Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I might remind the Parliamentary Secretary we are concerned with the Saturday closure of wickets in Post Offices. I am sure the Parliamentary Secretary is aware of the reliance placed on these Saturday wickets by rural people. They come in on Saturdays to pick up their registered mail and parcels. In this time of economic hardship there are people who work in other communities and only have the opportunity to pick up their parcels and so on, on Saturdays. They do their postal work on Saturdays. The Crown Corporation was not set up to give less service at a higher rate of cost. Will the Parliamentary Secretary assure the House he will press the Minister that, before this reduction in service takes place, or any other reduction in service that Canada Post is considering, it will be referred to a special committee of the House?

Mr. David Berger (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, we have to make a distinction between rural delivery on Saturday as opposed to the question the Hon. Member seems to be raising, which is picking up mail at the wickets. I will take notice of the Hon. Member's representations. I am sure the Minister will be prepared to discuss any problems that have occurred through this effort in trying to improve the efficiency of the Post Office and to reduce costs.

THE ECONOMY

DECLINE IN PRODUCTIVITY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I would like to welcome him back and tell him that I missed my sparring partner during the last week.

As Canada's adverse balance of trade in fully manufactured products, which are the ones that produce the jobs, increased from $4.9 billion in 1972 to over $21 billion last year and during that same ten years Canada's productivity fell steadily until today it is by far the lowest of the 16 OECD countries, will the Prime Minister outline to the House what new initiatives he and his Government intend to introduce to correct this very serious situation?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member has asked this question in exactly the same form so many times that I think he should continue his shadow boxing and not worry about his sparring partner.

OPINION SOUGHT BY PRESIDENT OF LIBERAL PARTY

Hon. George Hees (Northumberland): Madam Speaker, if the Prime Minister would like to change shadow boxing into the real thing, I am willing to step into the ring at any time.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Hees: I have certainly asked this question several times. The reason I repeat it is that I have never had an answer from the Prime Minister. He has ducked, he has slid, he has slipped. He has never come up and answered the question at all.

The reason I ask the question is a very particular one. It is because I have been asked to express my opinion on this very important matter by a very important person, a close friend of the Prime Minister, and an associate. It is no less a person than the President of the Liberal Party of Canada. I received a letter from the President of the Liberal Party of Canada addressed to my own home right here in Ottawa. In that letter the President said:

As National President of the Liberal Party, I want to know what you think, and I assure you that we'll listen to you, too.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

• (1450)

Mr. Hees: Just get this: "And I assure you that we'll listen to you, too".

As I have been asked for my opinion by the President, Madam Speaker, and have been assured that I will be paid attention to, I would ask the Prime Minister if he would convey my views on this important matter to the new President and tell her that she will receive many more ideas—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know the President of the Liberal Party would be interested in knowing that she would never get an answer out of the Hon. Member, he would always ask me for the answer.

Mr. Hees: I will give her plenty of answers. I hope I will get better results than I have been able to get making suggestions to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: The Hon. Member says he will give her plenty of answers. I am sure that is what he has been doing to his own Leader once in a while.

CHARTER OF RIGHTS

ADMINISTRATION COSTS

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, it has been reported that the Minister of Justice's Department requires another $3.3 million to pay for the increased cost of administering the Charter of Rights. Apparently the Minister's Department needs to increase its staff by 50. Can the Minister give any indication of what the total cost is going to be for administrating the Charter of Rights and repatriating the Constitution? A ball park figure—how many billions?

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member, like other Members of the House, would wish to ensure that due attention is given this crucial part of our Constitution.

As I indicated to the House last week, one of the principal purposes of these additional person years is to enable the Government to scrutinize all of the statutes and regulations—thousands of pages, Madam Speaker—to attempt to ensure in advance, without having to trouble the courts for a decision on everything, that at least the more obvious conflicts which exist in our present laws would be straightened out by us. Of course, it remains for the courts to make final determinations in any case before the courts.

Mr. McKenzie: Madam Speaker, since the Minister of Justice will not give us the cost of repatriating the Constitution, I would like to direct my supplementary to the President of the Treasury Board.

THE CONSTITUTION

COST OF PATRIATION

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, has the President of the Treasury Board conducted a cost-benefit analysis of repatriating the Constitution? There has been $1.8 million spent already on the proclamation; can he give us any idea of what the total cost will be?

Hon. Herb Gray (President of Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, the question is of a nature that can best be answered in the detail my hon. friend seeks by putting it on the Order Paper. If he will do that, I would be delighted to give him as complete an answer as possible.

CANADA LABOUR CODE

APPLICATION TO BRITISH COLUMBIA TELEPHONE COMPANY LAY-OFFS

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour. Last summer the British Columbia Telephone Company announced it was laying off about 1,800 people. These people were laid off without adequate notice as required by the Canada Labour Code, on the basis that this was allowed under the Canada Labour Standards Regulations. A B.C. Supreme Court judge subsequently stuck down those regulations, but before the ink was dry on his decision the Government enacted new regulations removing this protection.

Could the Minister tell this House if it is his intention to deny organized workers the same notice of lay-off as other workers, and could he tell the House why the new regulation was passed when a B.C. Supreme Court judge had already ruled similar regulations ultra vires?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member knows, this matter is now before the B.C. Supreme Court. When a decision is announced by that Court, then of course we will proceed in light of that decision.

NECESSITY FOR NOTIFICATION

Mr. Sid Parker (Kootenay East-Revelstoke): Madam Speaker, the notification provision for lay-offs under the Canada Labour Code says that 16 weeks' notification must be given if more than 50 workers are laid off from an industrial establishment. Bell Canada in Quebec is getting around this by designating literally dozens of industrial establishments within its operation. Because of this, Bell may lay off as many as 400 people without any proper notification.

Could the Minister tell the House if it is his intention that the legislation be used in this way, that is, that 49 people would be laid off without notification in each industrial establishment? If that is not his intention, what steps will he take to prevent this from happening?

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is elaborating on the same point, and the answer I gave him a moment ago still stands.

GRAIN

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION AUTHORITY POWERS

Mr. Jack Murta (Lisgar): Madam Speaker, there has been a recent task force report which indicates that the powers of the Grain Transportation Authority should be put into legislation and its powers expanded to supervise performance guarantees and efficiency incentives in what may be a new freight rate policy. Can the Minister of Transport indicate whether or not the Government is contemplating, in its Speech from the Throne in the new year, legislating the powers of that Authority, because this is basically what most farmers and farm organizations on the Prairies are seeking?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, when the grain transportation co-ordinator was established a few years ago by the then Conservative Government, it was done in a rather hurried fashion, and I am being very charitable. Consequently, all the refinements of the law and regulations were not necessarily taken into account. Since then we have lived with some difficulty with respect to this institution.

I have refrained from looking for a major change because that is one of the issues which will be dealt with in the western transportation Bill which is coming into this House in a few months. We hope that the central co-ordinating agency, recommended by Dr. Gilson, or something of that kind, will be created, which will absorb the grain co-ordinator, particularly in its main capacity as car allocator. Other functions might also be given to this central agency. In other words, we hope to rectify the legal situation by the creation of another institution which would take it over.

FISHERIES

IMPORTATION OF MACKEREL FOR USE AS BAIT

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, Canadian fishermen were encouraged this year to sell their mackerel in over-the-side sales to the Soviets through Joint Trawlers Limited of Sweden for approximately 12 cents a pound. As a result of that, Canadian buyers were unable to compete, and today long liners in Newfoundland, indeed, in all parts of Atlantic Canada, are short of bait and are forced to buy back Canadian mackerel from European suppliers.

I ask the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans how many tons of mackerel has he authorized his Department to purchase, what is the cost to Canadian fishermen, and what increased quotas did he give the Soviets, Poland or Japan, for relinquishing Canadian mackerel for Canadians?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, it is always wiser and easier to speak after the fact. Who could have predicted what happened? I am sure my hon. friend, if he knows something about fisheries, knows that no one could have predicted this situation. I have talked with the Cuban Minister of Fisheries and he told me that what happened this year with respect to the squid was something unpredictable.

What we have done is something very, very simple, and I think very wise. We have exchanged surplus offshore mackerel, which would not have been caught by Canadian fishing vessels, in order to secure bait for the fishermen of Newfoundland. I think, in view of the circumstances, the urgency of the need of the fishermen, the decision taken by my Department was the right one.

• (1500)

ALLOCATION EXCHANGES

Mr. Lloyd R. Crouse (South Shore): Madam Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I understand that the Minister did not pay for the mackerel from the Europeans. He has made available some 4,000 tons of halibut which will go to the Soviets or to Poland, and some 2,500 tons of redfish which will go to Japan in the form of quotas, in payment for these fish.

In light of the fact that these are high-priced species which would be worth many millions of dollars if caught by Canadians and sold to European markets, what steps is the Minister taking to assist Maritime processors who will, of course, as a consequence of this swap, lose their markets for that many tons of halibut and redfish? What steps has he taken to protect Canadian producers, following this type of deal?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I think my hon. friend is distracted. What we have done is exchange allocations which were surplus in order to have bait for our fishermen. By giving that allocation to the Japanese, who have redfish, then if our industry is wise enough it will use this occasion to enter this new market and follow up what the Department has done. It will enter the new market in Japan with redfish. This is what I expect our industry to do now.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

DISTRIBUTION OF ONTARIO ELECTORAL BOUNDARY MAPS

Madam Speaker: Is the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) rising on a question or—

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, it can legitimately be categorized as House business as well.

Madam Speaker: I am sorry, but the Question Period is really over. If it is to ask a question, I do not think I can recognize the Hon. Member. I thought he was rising on business of the House.

Mr. Nielsen: Exactly, Madam Speaker. It is directed to the President of the Privy Council with respect to a matter which will be coming before the House in the form of redistribution.

Has the Electoral Boundaries Commission completed its work with respect to Ontario? Are the maps available and if they are available, have they received any distribution to enable Ontario Members to prepare adequately to meet the question of redistribution when it comes up?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, not to my knowledge, and I fail to see how this could be considered to be the business of the House. However, I can inform the Hon. Member that the Commission will be publishing its first report, I believe, at the end of this week in the Canada Gazette. Hon. Members, in fact, all parties concerned, will have 23 days to give notice of their intent to make representations. As far as I know, nothing official has been published yet.

[English]

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, privilege!

Madam Speaker: Let us have a bit of order. The Hon. Member was surprised that I asked if he was rising on Business of the House, which is usually dealt with on Thursday. The Hon. Member said he was rising on Business of the House. I do not concede that this is Business of the House. I would urge the Hon. Member to ask his question at another time. If he is rising now on Business of the House, I can allow that, but if it is to ask a further question to the one just asked, I do not think he can. I just announced that the Question Period was over.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, if electoral redistribution is not the business of the House, I do not know what legitimately is the business of the House.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: In order to allow Members to prepare for anticipated legislation redistributing boundaries of electoral districts, could the President of the Privy Council inform me whether maps for Ontario have received any distribution whatsoever?

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, it would be an insult to the ruling you just made if I were to answer this question.

PRIVILEGE

MR. ROBINSON (BURNABY)—ALLEGED UNPARLIAMENTARY LANGUAGE OF MR. McKENZIE

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege stemming from the remarks made by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine (Mr. McKenzie) during proceedings pursuant to Standing Order 43. During those proceedings it was alleged that I had made certain references to what was called a "booze-up" during the last November 11 ceremonies.

Last Thursday, on November 11, I attended Remembrance Day ceremonies in my riding, just as on previous—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. Will the Hon. Member tell me in a straightforward manner what the question of privilege is. I have the impression that he is discussing a motion which has been dealt with by the House and which he could have debated at the time it was presented.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, it certainly was not possible to deal with this matter earlier. The Hon. Member misrepresented entirely and inaccurately the remarks which I had made. In his comments—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member is debating the motion which has been dealt with by the House, and I cannot allow that.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Madam Speaker, it is my understanding that, pursuant to the rules of this House and to Beauchesne, Citations 320 and 316(f), the language of the Hon. Member during Question Period was unparliamentary. Citation 316(f) refers to making a personal charge—

Madam Speaker: Order, please. That is fine. If the point the Hon. Member is raising is about unparliamentary language, then he should tell me that. That is what I was asking him to do. He should tell me right now what his question of privilege is. As a matter of fact, it is a point of order. I will deal with it but I cannot allow the Hon. Member to debate the motion. I am sure he understands that.

Mr. Robinson (Burnaby): Certainly. I would draw to the Chair's attention that Citation 316(f) prohibits one Hon. Member from making a "personal charge" against another Member, particularly when that personal charge is completely unfounded and inaccurate.

As well, Citation 320(2) makes it very clear that the use of the word "slander" or "slanderous" is unparliamentary. Once again, it is particularly serious when the suggestion that was made by the Hon. Member is totally false and without foundation.

I would ask, therefore, Madam Speaker, that in light of the clear violation of the rules of this House as set out in Citation 316(f) referring to personal charges made against a Member, and particularly when I was misquoted entirely by the Hon. Member, and in light of Citation 320(2), which states clearly that reference to the word "slander" is unparliamentary, you call upon the Hon. Member to withdraw his completely unfounded and scurrilous accusation.

Mr. Dan McKenzie (Winnipeg-Assiniboine): Madam Speaker, I am sure the Hon. Member for Burnaby (Mr. Robinson) well knows that what I am quoting from is the Globe and Mail. If this report is false, the Hon. Member should—

Madam Speaker: Order, order. The Hon. Member is also debating the motion. I thought he was rising to withdraw some words. First of all, I believe the first citation the Hon. Member gave me related to charges that may only be made under a substantive motion. I do not believe that this applies at all. I think what the Hon. Member wants me to deal with is the matter of the unparliamentary language. I do not feel that this expression was particularly unparliamentary. I think it would be counted as one of those very strong opinions which are often expressed in the House in vigorous terms.

I would point out to the Hon. Member that he is left with just the word "scurrilous", which is also mentioned in some of the lists in Beauchesne. I expect they cancel each other out. I do not feel that the particular expression used by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Assiniboine was unparliamentary.

I know that there has been some use of the word "slandering" in different contexts with different adjectives that has not been accepted in this House, but today I did not feel that the language was unparliamentary, and I so rule.

The Late Hon. Robert Andras, P.C.

MR. McDERMID—DISTRIBUTION OF ONTARIO ELECTORAL BOUNDARY MAPS

Mr. John McDermid (Brampton-Georgetown): Madam Speaker, I have a question of privilege that I should like to raise which stems from the remarks of the Government House Leader and the Opposition House Leader regarding the new boundary maps for the electoral districts in the Province of Ontario. The statement was made that there has been no distribution of these maps, and that in fact, they will be Gazetted on Saturday. It has come to my attention—and I feel that this is my question of privilege—that certain Members of Parliament have these maps in their possession already. They are Liberal Members of Parliament, I might add. The maps have not been distributed to other Members of Parliament. Today—

• (1510)

Madam Speaker: Order. I have dealt many times with questions of privilege, or alleged questions of privilege, which have to deal with documents that were not distributed to some Members but were distributed to others. It might be a grievance which the Hon. Member will want to make at a proper time, but it is certainly not a question of privilege.

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Nielsen: Surely, if Liberal Members of Parliament, like the Hon. Member for Timmins-Chapleau (Mr. Chénier), are entitled to receive copies of the electoral redistribution maps before they are Gazetted, all Hon. Members are entitled to receive those maps—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McDermid: The newspapers have them.

Mr. Nielsen: —and not Members on the Government side simply because they happen to belong—

Madam Speaker: Order.

Mr. Nielsen: Surely we are entitled to have those maps.

Madam Speaker: I am afraid I have to interrupt the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen) because he is bringing back the same question which was dealt with in the question a while ago.

THE LATE HON. ROBERT ANDRAS, P.C.

TRIBUTES TO FORMER MINISTER OF THE CROWN

Mr. Jack Masters (Thunder Bay-Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order to bring news to the House which is very sad in nature. Today we have lost the former Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon, a great family man, a great Canadian and a very good friend. He is a man who served the country well and held many portfolios in Government. Today, after a very lengthy illness, the Hon. Bob Andras passed away. I hope the House will join in sending condolences to Fran and to other members of his family.

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I want to add my condolences to the Andras family, and to Fran in particular. I subscribe completely to what was said by the Hon. Member for Thunder Bay-Nipigon (Mr. Masters) as to the sense of duty and devotion of the former minister from that riding. As one who was in Cabinet over a period of years with Bob Andras, I want to say that he was a model of hard work and of dedication to his people. He was a man who worked very long hours, always with a sense of service, and for these reasons I am sure his memory will be treasured by all Hon. Members.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I had the privilege to know the Honourable Robert Andras as a Member of the House. I want his family to know that the Members of my Party—and many of us knew him very well—mourn his passing very deeply.

I recall him, when I was sitting in the Opposition in those days, as having been a man of great civility and kindness. He treated every person appropriately and gently. Because of a particular reponsibility that I have with respect to the Public Services of Canada, I should like to indicate that he always consulted to the fullest degree with Hon. Members of Parliament, including myself, who had an interest in Treasury Board matters and in matters affecting the Public Service. He was a model of consultation within the rules which ought to exist within the House. I share completely the words of the Right Hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) in extolling his virtues.

He met his end with great courage. Knowing that it was coming, he still persevered and carried on in the face of great adversity. The people of Ontario, the people of his old riding and indeed the people of Canada have lost a good servant. All members of the House of Commons indeed mourn his loss.

Mr. David Orlikow (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, as a Member who served in the House for many years at the same time as Mr. Andras, who worked with him and met with him frequently when he was the minister of employment and immigration, I came to realize how hard he worked and how concerned he was about the needs of the people. Among all the ministers with whom I have dealt, he was the most likely to listen to suggestions, criticisms and questions from Opposition Members and to give them fair consideration.

I know that Hon. Members of my Party join with me in expressing our regret on this occasion and in extending our best wishes to his family.

Madam Speaker: Certainly the Honourable Bob Andras was dear to Hon. Members on both sides of the House. As a colleague of his in Cabinet, I was very touched by his gentleness. By gosh, he loved life, but he knew the end had come and he faced it very, very courageously.

Of course I will transmit to his wife, Fran, the sympathies and sentiments expressed in the House.

WAYS AND MEANS

TABLING OF NOTICE

Hon. Paul J. Cosgrove (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 60(1), I wish to table in both official languages a notice of a Ways and Means motion to amend the Petroleum and Gas Revenue Tax Act, and I request the designation of an order of the day for consideration thereof.

PETITION

MR. HALLIDAY—PROPOSED SHIFT OF FEDERAL SALES TAX

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Madam Speaker, it is my privilege and duty to present to the House of Commons a petition signed by over 100 concerned citizens of Oxford County and the surrounding area who call upon the Government not to implement its proposal to shift the federal sales tax from the manufacturers level to the wholesale trade level.

The retreat of the current Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) from his predecessor's original proposal is welcome, but there has been only a delay for further consultation. The proposal still exists, and in the view of the petitioners, if implemented, this change will add to the cost of government, to the cost of distribution and to the cost of living.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): Madam Speaker, the following questions will be answered today: Nos. 3,744, 3,745, 4,093, 4,340 and 4,346.

MR. NEIL FRASER

Question No. 3,744—Mr. Cossitt:

1. Was Mr. Neil Fraser, an employee of the Department of National Revenue in Kingston, Ontario, suspended for three days and, if so (a) what is the name and job designation of the highest official who played a part in the decision (b) on what basis was the decision made (c) what specific grounds justify such a suspension?

2. Is it government policy to prohibit a public servant from expressing an opinion on any subject even if he were not involved in politics, not supporting any particular political party or not criticizing in any way his own Department?

Mr. David Smith (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Privy Council): I am informed by the Department of National Revenue and Treasury Board as follows:

1. Yes. (a) J. A. Morrison. Assistant Deputy Minister, Ontario Region. (b) Public criticism of a government policy. (c) See (b) above.

2. There is no explicit government policy to prohibit a public servant from expressing an opinion on any subject, however, it has long been accepted as a condition of employment in the Public Service that public servants should not publicly criticize government programs or policies. This general principle has been sustained in decisions by Public Service adjudicators and has also been upheld by the Federal Court.

Question No. 3,745—Mr. Cossitt:

Was Mr. Neil Fraser, an employee of the Department of National Revenue in Kingston, Ontario, suspended and was the suspension a part of a government policy to make examples of certain individuals for the purpose of scaring other public servants into remaining silent on any important subject concerning the country but not connected with their own Department and, if so, what reasons justify such a policy?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): See reply to question No. 3,744 answered this day.

Question No. 4,093—Mr. Cossitt:

What is the name and job designation of the highest-ranking official that took part directly or indirectly in the decision to fire Mr. Neil Fraser, an employee of the Department of National Revenue at the District Taxation Office in Kingston?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): See reply to question No. 3,744 answered this day.

RECYCLING OF OBSOLETE DEPARTMENTAL MATERIAL

Question No. 4,340—Mr. Scott (Hamilton-Wentworth):

Did the appropriate officials from either the Department of National Revenue or the Department of Supply and Services authorize either the destruction or recycling of approximately two tons of Government of Canada Taxation Guides and Information Booklets for the 1981 taxation year at Mills Paper Fibres Co. in Hamilton, Ontario on August 22, 1981 or thereabouts and, if so (a) what were the names of the officials (b) for what reason was the material designated for recycling (c) what was the approximate cost of printing the booklets?

Hon. Pierre Bussières (Minister of National Revenue): Yes. (a) Mr. L. Donnelly, Director, Tax Forms Division. (b) The material recycled was obsolete. It was necessary to print new source deduction booklets, effective July, 1981, for employers in three Provinces as a result of tax rate changes by those Provinces. The T2 Corporation Guide 1980 became obsolete due to changes in legislation and tax rates and a T2 Corporation Guide 1981 was printed. Form T2S-TC was reprinted because of the changes in corporation tax rates in 1981. Only 1.035 per cent of the total material printed was recycled; the balance had been used by taxpayers before it became obsolete.

(c) The cost of printing of the material was $3,008.

"HOW THE PEOPLE OF SASKATCHEWAN CAN MAKE MORE USE OF THE GOVERNMENT OF CANADA"

Question No. 4,346—Mr. Nystrom:

1. What was the total cost of the pamphlet "How The People Of Saskatchewan Can Make More Use Of The Government Of Canada", including all editorial, production and distribution costs?

2. Which printing firms were used to print the pamphlet?

3. Which private firms or government personnel were used to provide the editorial content?

4. (a) Which private firm or government personnel provided the editorial content for pages 13 to 16 of the pamphlet (b) who had the responsibility for and gave final approval for the editorial content of those pages?

5. Who in the Government sets over-all policy guidelines for determining what is partisan material in government publications?

6. Do any government statutes, regulations or guidelines guide this activity and, if so, what are they?

7. Do published guidelines exist and, if so, what are such guidelines?

Hon. Mark MacGuigan (Minister of Justice): 1. $142,500.

2. The Smith Publishing Company Limited.

3. D.J. Sullivan Consultants Inc.

4. (a) D.J. Sullivan Consultants Inc. (b) The Canadian Unity Information Office in consultation with: Agriculture Canada, DRIE—Industry Trade and Commerce, Health and Welfare Canada, Employment and Immigration Canada, Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Administration, Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women, Energy, Mines and Resources Canada, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

5, 6 and 7. While no central review body exists, the "Communications Policy Principles" approved by Cabinet in July, 1981, furnish guideliens as does the "Government Communications Guide" produced by the Privy Council Office in 1982.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Roméo LeBlanc (Minister of Public Works) moved that Bill C-135, to amend the National Housing Act (No. 2), as reported (without amendment) from the Standing Committee on National Resources and Public Works, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. LeBlanc moved that the bill be read the third time and do pass.

[English]

Mr. Dick: Madam Speaker, report stage seemed to go by quite quickly. I was attempting to get Your Honour's attention at that stage to ask the Minister a question.

Madam Speaker: There is no debate at that particular stage. Perhaps at some other time the Hon. Member might put his question.

Mr. Dick: I believe the question should be asked of the Minister at report stage.

Madam Speaker: There is no debate at that stage, and there are no questions permitted.

• (1520)

Mr. LeBlanc: Madam Speaker, in moving third reading of Bill C-135, an Act to amend the National Housing Act, I would like to take a few minutes just to remind Hon. Members of its purpose. The Bill will bring about certain changes in the Canada Mortgage Renewal Plan which were announced by the then minister of finance in his budget address of June 29. They are as follows:

First, home owners who find, on renewing their mortgages, that their monthly payments will exceed 30 per cent of their household income will be eligible for grants amounting to as much as $3,000. Guarantees that formerly were offered to help home owners defer interest payments and reduce their monthly expenses no longer apply. Everyone who qualifies now receives the grant.

Second, home owners are entitled to the grant even if their interest is reduced at the time the mortgage is renewed, as long as their payments are still over 30 per cent. Formerly the grants were available only if interest went up. Finally, the plan is extended until the end of 1983. As the legislation now stands without amendment, the plan ended on November 12. I would like to assure Hon. Members, however, that the interest of all qualified applicants is protected. No one will be denied a grant because of the temporary lapse.

Canada Mortgage and Housing officials have continued to receive and approve applications and, as soon as Parliament provides the necessary authority, the cheques will be sent out. I would like once again to express my appreciation of the forebearance which has been shown by lending institutions in helping borrowers during the unavoidable delays. I would also like to thank Hon. Members on both sides of the House who co-operated in advancing the Bill through its various stages as expeditiously as possible.

I am very gratified that these grants will be available throughout the coming year for those who are in serious difficulty in meeting their mortgage payments. I hope Hon. Members will bring the plan to the attention of those of their constituents who might benefit from it, and urge them to discuss their difficulties with their mortgage lenders who will explain the terms and help them prepare an application. If Hon. Members have any questions about the operation of the plan in particular cases, I know that CMHC officials, either at the national office or in the field, will be glad to help.

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, first I want to assure the Minister that it is our intention to support this Bill and to support its passage through the House. Consequently, we hope that, with the co-operation of the House, and without precluding any Member from the right to participate in this debate, the Bill will receive third reading later this day.

However, having said that, I think it is incumbent upon me as spokesman for the Official Opposition to express a sense of disappointment. Here we have a new Minister who has just assumed responsibilities for housing at a time when the industry is in crisis, in fact, passing through the worst crisis since the Second World War. I do not want to go over old ground and talk about the mistakes of his predecessor. I do not want to refer to the mistakes of the June budget and the November budget, although we have to allude to them, but I do want to say to the Minister, knowing him as I do, that I was surprised that he did not avail himself of this opportunity to give a general policy statement on the housing situation as he sees it, and what he sees down the road in the way of solutions to the problems we are facing today. Certainly I think it is fair to say, although these matters are in the hands of the Government, that we will not have another opportunity before this year is out to discuss housing in a meaningful way, because obviously there will be no further amendments to the National Housing Act before the end of this session, or at least before the end of this calendar year.

I am disappointed because I think we had a right to expect some indication from this new Minister as to what direction he intends to take and what steps he intends to take to correct the mistakes of the past, those of his predecessor—albeit they were honest ones, but serious—and, of course, those gross mistakes of the previous two budgets. We are being denied that opportunity and, therefore, we can only try to present to the Government the concerns that we have with respect to this most important industry.

Just a few days ago, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation released the vacancy rates for rental units in this country. While we have noticed some improvement, there is nothing in those statistics to give us any reason to be encouraged, especially when we examine the facts. We still have serious vacancy situations prevailing in some of the major metropolitan areas of the country, including this City of Ottawa. However, if you take a look at the situation, of the 61,000 units that were completed in 1981, as I understand it, 55,000 were started under the MURB Program. Now we do not have the MURB Program, we have the Canada Rental Supply Plan, to which I will refer in just a moment.

We are falling behind in terms of our requirements, and there will be another shortfall this year following the shortfall from last year, which will have a very important impact on the supply situation as well as the cost situation. I realize there are complications regarding the price of rental housing in this country which speaks to the need for some kind of federal-provincial agreement in the whole area of rent controls as they apply to the ten different provincial jurisdictions in the country. Unless we have a unified approach to rent control, I am afraid there is not very much we can do about encouraging investment in rental accommodation, the Canada Rental Supply Plan notwithstanding.

I do believe that a case could be made, and I make no apologies for this, for re-introducing the MURB Program as a short-term measure, a quick fix kind of response, because of its ability to generate starts in terms of rental units.

Let us take a look now at the Canada Rental Supply Plan. This plan was introduced by the Government as a means to make up for the phasing out of the MURB Program. The Government made provision for interest-free loans to finance up to 30,000 units. We already know that 53,900 units were started under the MURB Program last year. But under the Canada Rental Supply Plan, provision was made for interest-free loans for up to 30,000 units. The ceiling of $7,500, which was originally applied to the plan, has been lifted. We now know from experience to date that the average loan per rental unit now stands at about $12,000. Up to November 17—and these are the latest figures I could get—under the Canada Rental Supply Plan a total of 7,886 units had been started, are under way or have been approved, each representing an average loan of $12,000. As an interesting side note to the Canada Rental Supply Plan, when it was announced by the Minister's predecessor earlier this year, we find that in a press release dated March 23 the Minister said: "Up to one-third of the units assisted in this way would be made available to low income people under the federal rent supplement program."

• (1530)

That is commendable, given the cutback in the social housing commitment of the Government, but what are the actual facts, Mr. Speaker? When this Bill was going through the Standing Committee of the House, I asked, through the Minister, the Acting President of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation how many units of the 7,800 which had been committed, were under way, or applied, were designated as social units, or would fall into the category of social housing or low income housing. The response was, "Not one single unit" under the Canada Rental Supply Plan has been designated as social housing, notwithstanding the commitment made by the Minister in March.

I realize that what the Minister said in March in his press release announcing the Canada Rental Supply Plan and the position taken today are two different positions. What we were told in committee was this: up to a third of the units in a project could be designated as social housing units, not "will be" but "could be", which means, of course, that the Government has advocated the decision in this regard to the provincial authorities. This is something which concerns me greatly, considering what is happening to rental accommodation in this country today, in terms of the shortfall in supply, the increase in rental accommodation, and the increase in cost per unit of building the rental accommodation.

If we take a look at the experience to date, I can give as an example a project approved under the Canada Rental Supply Plan in the City of Toronto. This project contained 450 units. The average loan per unit under the Canada Rental Supply Plan was $15,000, and builders' cost per unit was $67,000. Rent per unit, for one bedroom, was $675 a month, and for two bedrooms was $750 a month. That, of course, by any yardstick, whether it is in Toronto or in the Minister's own constituency, cannot be considered low cost housing. That is expensive accommodation.

Where is the original commitment, made when the Canada Rental Supply Plan was first announced, to provide for social housing within this program to make up for the shortfall of the budget, because we know that last year provision was made for 30,000 units? In this year's budget, depending on which one we are talking about, but at least in the last budget which referred to social housing, provision was made for 25,000 units.

In my opinion, that is one of the more serious weaknesses in the program. This is an area where the Minister has a responsibility to take a look at the experience to date. As well, he has to take a look at the thrust of the program in terms of the impact it is having on starts in so far as it is supposed to replace the MURB Program. I think if the Minister takes a good hard look at that situation, he will find that the program is in fact not living up to expectations.

The experience across the country varies from place to place. Not one single unit has been approved or is under way in the Province of Newfoundland. In the Province of Nova Scotia there are 182 units; New Brunswick, 27 units; Prince Edward Island, no units; Quebec, 1364 units, and Ontario, 3800 units. It is interesting to note the discrepancy between Ontario and Quebec, areas which have the same kind of demographics in terms of metropolitan areas. In Manitoba there are 404 units; Saskatchewan, 352 units; Alberta, no units. I suppose that speaks to a program in place by the Alberta Government and also reflects the vacancy rate, which is interesting in terms of the economic situation in the country. In British Columbia ther are 1740 units. What these figures prove to me is something which we were told by the HUDAC people from the Atlantic Provinces, that this program would not be effective in the Atlantic Provinces because of the up front financing requirement, and they would not be able to take full advantage of it.

For these and other reasons, Mr. Speaker, I believe very strongly that the Minister would be well advised to take a look at the Canada Rental Supply Plan to see what it is doing. If it is in fact another MURB program, let us recognize it as such. At the same time, let us also recognize the responsibility which the Government has with regard to social housing, low cost housing. It is my view, shared by my colleagues and many others in this House, that the Government is not fulfilling its obligations with regard to co-op housing, because that is an area where the Government could have an immediate impact on housing starts and would be seriously addressing the problem of low cost housing.

The Minister knows full well, as do his officials in CMHC, that demand is there all across the country for co-op housing. Philosophically, the Minister is sympathetic. Co-op housing is an excellent way of beating the inflationary cycle, which has plagued the industry in the past few years, and of reducing, if not eliminating, the uncertainty in terms of rental accommodation. The experience across the country has shown that co-op housing has been more than a hedge against inflation because not only have these units been profitable in terms of meeting their commitments, their mortgages, and so on, but they have been able at the same time to keep rates well below the prevailing market. It is understandable, then, why there would be such a demand for co-op housing.

I hope that the Minister will not let too much time pass before he takes a long hard look at these proposals, and the obligation and commitment which the Government has with respect to social housing, low cost housing. This commitment is not being discharged by any of the programs which we have in place under the new policies announced in the last two budgets. The Government, indeed, has that responsibility.

Another aspect of the Government's housing policy which we would have liked to have seen addressed by the Minister today in the course of debate on third reading of these particular amendments to the National Housing Act, is the Canada Homeownership Stimulation Plan. We know that this plan was hastily put in place, indeed, without proper guidelines. It created all kinds of administrative problems all across the country. There were no standard criteria, at least none that I could determine, during the early stages of the program. I do not fault anyone for that, because of the lack of guidelines and the haste in which it was put in place, but the fact of the matter is that in many instances the $3,000 grant was a landfall to many people. I think that if the records were examined carefully instances would be found of people who received a $3,000 grant who should not have qualified. All kinds of situations occurred. Single people applied for the grant, then got married and had the advantage of receiving two grants. Houses which were well under way were able to qualify within the terms of the starting date.

However, I do not want to be unduly critical about the program because in terms of the need to provide an immediate stimulus and a quick reaction to a situation which was growing increasingly critical as a result of low housing starts, the Government had an obligation to do something, and at least it did this. However, the fact is that now the program is to be changed quite drastically because we now know, as a result of the most recent budget brought in by the most recent Minister of Finance, that grants available under the Canada Homeownership Stimulation Plan will apply to new housing only as of January. That is rather interesting because I find that to be inconsistent with the rationale given by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Lalonde) in not proceeding with the mortgage reduction program, which was the subject of a study by the Lortie Commission. Lortie recommended, and the Government accepted, that it not proceed with this because it would have a distorting effect on the marketplace in that it only applied to new houses. Now we find the same situation applying to the Canada Homeownership stimulation Plan. As of January, it will only apply to new houses. I can understand the reasoning behind that, the need to try to do something about the disastrous shortfall in housing starts.

What are the facts? We know from the records that up to November 12, 1982, under the Canada Homeownership Stimulation Plan, 83,761 Canadians received grants or were eligible for them. The breakdown of that 83,761 is as follows: 28,835 were for new housing, while 54,900 were for existing housing. In other words, the bulk of the applications which were funded went to existing houses. Now that is to be changed and is to be applied only to new houses as of January. I would like to hear the Minister, his Parliamentary Secretary or someone speaking on behalf of the Government telling us how this can be reconciled, the distorting effect of this action on the marketplace and the impact it will have on real estate sales with the Government's rationale in not proceeding with the mortgage reduction program, which was promised under the budget. I will have more to say about that in a few moments. However, let us take a look at housing starts, because that is what the Canada home stimulation program is all about. When we take a look at housing starts, we realize the magnitude of the problem. Let us take a look at what would be considered a peak period for housing starts, say, in the year 1981.

In June, 1981, there were 213,800 starts, seasonally adjusted. If we take a look at what happened in June, 1982, we found they were down to 125,000, seasonally adjusted. If we take a look at July, 1981, we see a decline from June. In July, 1981, housing starts were 180,800, and in July, 1982, there was a further decline from the previous months of that year, down to 113,000. In August of 1981 housing starts amounted to 177,000 and, of course, we know that in August, 1982, there was a disastrous drop to 89,000. Continuing on to September, 1981, housing starts took a slight increase, up to 185,000. In September, 1982, housing starts were down again from the previous month, to 86,000. These are annual seasonally adjusted starts. Just a few days ago, when the Bill was before a committee of the House, we were told that housing starts for the year are now targeted at 130,000, which, of course, would mean a very serious situation because CMHC, by its own demographic projections, estimates that we would need 220,000 housing starts for the year. So, what are we looking at? We are looking at a shortfall of 90,000 housing starts. That will drive up, and is in fact having the effect of driving up, the cost of housing in this country. It is having a serious impact on the cost of housing in the country.

Let us consider what is happening to housing costs. The national average price for a three-bedroom bungalow has risen from $37,400 in 1974 to $76,000 in 1981. Whilst there has been a slight decline in housing prices in most of the major markets in the country, we know that as a result of the shortfall, and with economic recovery and increased demand, housing prices will rise once again. If there were ever an argument that I would use to impress upon the Government the absolute necessity of providing additional funding in the area of co-op housing, it would be based on these statistics. We have a shortfall situation which will reduce supply. That will have an impact on housing costs which we will see continuing to escalate in the country, interest rates notwithstanding. That means, of course, that there are people in this country who will not be able to find affordable accommodation. I am not referring to the public housing situation. I am referring to co-op housing, where people can get together in a co-operative way and build and manage affordable accommodation.

I know that that is a proposition or philosophy which appeals to the Minister, who is a product, of course, of the Coady Institute and of St. Francis Xavier University. I would be the most surprised person in the world if he, as one of his first initiatives, did not make a very quick move in that direction.

I would like to move on to what I consider to be the Government's obligations with regard to the now defunct mortgage reduction program, if that is the proper nomenclature. It has had several different names during the brief course of its existence. There is no question but that the Government has an obligation, if not a legal obligation, a moral one. I will not repeat the statements made by his predecessor because they have already been placed on the record. I will not repeat what was said by the former minister of finance when he introduced this provision in his budget, because that, too, is already a matter of record. I will simply paraphrase all the quotes by saying that the Government made it very clear that this was a commitment of the Government of Canada and, indeed, it formed a part of the Government's advertising program. It encouraged people to go out and purchase new housing with the expectation that this program would be in place and they would be able to enjoy the advantages of a reduced mortgage. We know that under that plan, mortgage interest rates would have been reduced anywhere from 4 per cent to 6 per cent. We do not know how many people were sucked in by that as we have no figures, but we do know that there were many thousands of Canadians who took the Government at its word and either purchased homes with the expectation that they would be able to take advantage of this program, which they had every reason to expect would be coming down very shortly or, at least, they put off the decision to purchase with the understanding that that program would be in place. I know what the quick and immediate response of the Minister would be. He would say, "Well, interest rate situations have changed. Interest rates have come down substantially". That is true, but what assurance do we have that they will stay down? That is the problem. We have no assurance at all. This may be just an aberration, just another cyclical situation. Certainly if one is facing the prospect of making the most important financial transaction of one's life, and that is what the purchase of a house represents to the average Canadian, one will not be reassured by the experience of the past two years. You are not going to make any long-term commitments. That is what the Minister's predecessor had in mind when he went on national television and talked about insuring your long-term security, that the Government was going to proceed with that program, was committed to that program. It is only a short time ago that the Government withdrew the television advertising that included that particular program as part of the over-all Government package of encouraging people to move in and buy houses now.

Now we have a new scheme, and I am surprised the Minister could not take advantage of this debate to enlarge upon the remarks he made in the House a few days ago when he was replying to my colleague, the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn). This is the provision whereby you can use a part of your mortgage payments to buy insurance against fluctuations in mortgage interest rates. It is a good program. It is a program that does not require any blue chip committee. It does not require any great deal of deliberation. Indeed, the Minister himself, when he responded to my colleague in the House, said this: "I want to make it clear that if the proposal is found to be desirable and supportable it is not at all my intention to involve it in a future budget but rather to try to bring it forward as quickly as possible".

I want to say to the Minister right here and now that not only does he have a responsibility to discharge the moral obligation of this Government, as epitomized by statements made by his predecessor and the previous Minister of Finance, but he also has that responsibility in terms of providing something to put in its place, because many people were expecting, and were indeed told, that they had every right to expect that the Government would put such a program in place. It is a good idea. It is an excellent idea. I hope he does not fall into the trap, the luxury of thinking that, because interest rates are now down, we have nothing to worry about.

The fact of the matter is that until the economic situation levels out in terms of the long-term, it is going to have a serious impact upon housing starts in the country and upon people making a decision to enter into any long-term or medium-term contracts with respect to mortgages.

I see no reason why the Minister should hesitate or why the Minister did not take advantage of this opportunity, to reopen the Act to proceed with this, or at least to lay on the Table his views on it. I am sure that there are studies now well under way within Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, otherwise this would not have been leaked in the first place. Otherwise the Minister would not have confirmed in his place in the House that these studies were under way, that in fact they were thinking about them. I am sure they have advanced to the point where the Minister could tell the House that the Government is not only committed to it but is in fact prepared to move without any undue haste.

The Government has a serious obligation to get on with discharging the solemn commitment it made to thousands of Canadians, who were taken in by these commitments and who either purchased a home with all of the uncertainty of the marketplace in terms of mortgage interest rates, or who in fact put off making that very important decision.

Finally, I would like to suggest to the Government that their mortgage interest rates insurance program, or whatever they call it, is the least they can do to provide some assurance in terms of security in a very uncertain marketplace, in a very uncertain world.

Let us take a look at our proposals, the proposals contained in the budget of the Clark administration three years ago. We put in place a program whereby mortgage interest rates and property taxes were deductible in the form of a tax credit. We were going to phase that program in over a period of four years, which means of course that the program would be fully operational this year.

Let us take a look at the impact that would have. If you take a situation of a $50,000 mortgage, which is about average if you are talking about $70,000 as the average price for a three bedroom bungalow, if that program were in place today and you had an 18 per cent mortgage rate, the person with a $50,000 mortgage would be eligible for monthly benefits in terms of a tax credit of $125, or $1,500 a year, or a reduction of that 18 per cent mortgage to 14.5 per cent. That is the 18 per cent situation.

Let us take a look at the impact it would have on a 14 per cent mortgage, which is about the situation we are in right now. Again, if you are talking in terms of a $50,000 home, the monthly benefit in terms of a tax credit, if you take out a 14 per cent mortgage under the program which we put in place in our budget, would again provide $125 a month, but it would mean that that 14 per cent mortgage would be reduced to a 10.25 per cent mortgage; but that program would be permanently in place and it would ensure that there would be a buffer against fluctuations in the marketplace.

That to me is the most desirable program. It is one that the Government could proceed with. It could implement it in instalments or phase it in, as we were going to do. But I have no illusions in that score. I have no doubt that the Government would not proceed in that direction because it will be seen to be implementing a program that it in fact voted against when it voted against that budget of the Clark Government in 1979.

Certainly I would hope that the Minister—and I know he is serious about this because his reputation is on the line—will give very earnest consideration to providing the House at the earliest opportunity with some indication of the direction in which he intends to take us in terms of housing policy. I would hope that he would give us some concrete indication of just exactly what he proposes to do with respect to providing some kind of insurance program to protect Canadians against fluctuations in mortgage rates, which of course would have and could have and are having disastrous consequences on the lives of many Canadians. I am not talking about foreclosures and all that that entails in terms of human tragedy. We are talking in terms of affordability, in terms of the total concept of what it costs to provide a shelter in this country today. When we take a look at continuing increases in fuel costs, in hydro costs, all of the costs identified with providing a home, we see the importance of any program that would stabilize mortgage interest rates in this country and provide some medium-term security for those who already own homes and are faced with mortgage renewals. We have about 700,000 mortgage renewals coming up annually. Those Canadians are still hoping that the Government will make it possible for them to be able to find first, affordable rental accommodation and, eventually, as was the custom in this country until the time that this Government brought in programs that changed all that, be able to look forward to the day when they can afford to buy their own homes, and buy them with the knowledge that they are protected by some program which would provide not for their long-term security but at least their medium security, say over a period of five years.

• (1600)

That is a commendable program. It is better than nothing. Ultimately I would prefer to see the mortgage interest deductibility plan we had, but in the face of the Government's determination not to proceed with that, I hope the Government will proceed with this program.

Finally, I say to the Government how important this particular industry is in terms of its impact on the economy. When you talk about housing, you talk about a labour-intensive industry. This industry is capable of creating jobs directly and through the spin-off.

The data indicates that for every housing unit built in this country, 2.5 jobs are generated. When you consider that 1.5 million Canadians are officially unemployed and the fact that we have a 90,000 unit shortfall in housing starts in this country, it would seem to be in the interest of the Government, and certainly in the interest of Canadians, for it to make a real effort to stimulate housing starts because of the impact it would have not only on providing affordable housing to Canadians, but in creating jobs in the process.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I rise with some ambivalence about the legislation before us. It is not that it is not supportable. The legislation in itself provides some measure of relief or assistance for certain people who are currently facing and who will undoubtedly face problems in the future. I want to speak about the difficulties that we have seen arise over the course of the last two or three years and why this kind of legislation is really quite inappropriate.

The difficulty in this country has been that the Government has failed to come forward with a comprehensive housing policy. The Government has relegated housing to the level of luxury rather than elevating it to the level of necessity. The Government has not recognized that as one of the basics of life the providing of accommodation at a price that people can afford is a legitimate Government function.

The Government must not be a passive player but an active player in ensuring that all who live in this country are able to find accommodation within their ability to pay. No one should be required to lay out the kind of exorbitant sums that people are currently being asked to lay out, either in terms of rent or in terms of repaying their mortgage as a result of recent interest rate fluctuations.

I cannot help thinking back to when it all started in the late sixties. Those of us who were interested in housing at that time recognized that the move the Government made to phase itself out of regulating interest rates in mortgages was an inappropriate move, one which would work tremendous hardship over a long period of time.

I recall making that statement in 1968, standing in the Ontario Legislature and explaining the problems we were going to have in this country as a result of the removal of interest rate ceilings and the opting out by the Government of the role that had been previously played on holding the line on mortgage interest rates. I well recall the discussion I had as we looked at the potential dangers that would automatically come to many families who were not going to be able to keep pace with the rising interest rates. I must confess that at that point I did not foresee the 20 and 21 per cent interest rates that we achieved. When I use the word "achieved" I do not mean it in the sense of pride, but what was hoisted upon us by the banks and other financial institutions of this country over the course of the last 16 to 18 months. I do not think anyone could have foreseen that, not even this Government.

I think the major problem in housing is the lack of commitment by the Government. The Government is a peripheral player in the whole area. No longer is Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation involved in the building of homes. I am not talking about putting the bricks and mortar in place. I am talking about the motivating factor that gets homes built in the right areas, at a price people can afford with mortgages available under the National Housing Act, as was the way in the fifties, sixties and early seventies.

It is quite clear that the Government has, for one reason or another, opted out of the field and left it open to private initiative, the free enterprise side of the economic factor. The problem with that has been that people who build houses only for profit tend to stop building when the profit margin ceases to be at a level that they consider appropriate.

When people opt out we see happening what the Hon. Member who preceded me spoke about. He said the reason we are running 90,000 to 100,000 behind our demonstrated need is that in large part those homes were built by or under the auspices of one level of Government or another. The Government was very much involved in ensuring, in years gone by, that that percentage of the housing market now being denied the opportunity to have decent accommodation within their ability to pay is given that opportunity. The needs of that percentage were being met, partly if not totally, by a public body's initiative. That program is no longer there. To spend a lot of time speaking about these minor amendments of somewhat short duration is to do a disservice to the whole question of housing.

I am always interested in looking at the various and many housing programs that have gone before us. I listened as my colleague, the Hon. Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) was speaking. He went through some of the programs that had emerged over the course of the last two and one half years, all of which were piecemeal, all of which were aimed at trying to meet a crisis situation as it arose. None of them addressed the larger, more important problem. We are now going to see yet another attempt by the Government, or those acting on behalf of the Government, to ease the burden without addressing the problem.

We had the celebrated mortgage investment program. The Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau) stood in this House and guaranteed me personally that it would be brought in this fall. I recall that when I asked him this immediately after the June budget of the late and lamented finance minister, there was no question but that the proposal for secure mortgages would come forward. It was just a matter of the committee looking at the way in which it would be brought in. We would then have it, and people would once again be able to get mortgages for accommodation at lower interest rates within their means. That went by the board. Obviously the Prime Minister did not know what he was talking about. That is not unusual.

We now have another program being suggested. Now we are going to get mortgage interest insurance. Now, presumably, you will be able to buy insurance against increases in your mortgage interest rates. Let us examine that for a moment. What will that do? Will that encourage financial institutions to hold mortgage interest rates down to a reasonable level? Of course not. All that will do is to encourage those who are in high finance to push mortgage interest rates up again, because they will be able to claim that those people who owe them money can take out insurance against any increase in excess of what they consider reasonable, therefore, there will be no hardship. Well, that kind of program serves no useful purpose and is unacceptable. It does not begin to speak to the problems faced by a young family, single parent or retired person trying to find affordable accommodation. It does not do anything to ensure that there will in fact be accommodation built for those people. It does not guarantee in any way that those on pensions, fixed incomes, those whose incomes have been indexed by the Government at 6 per cent and 5 per cent increases over the course of the next two years, will be protected against exorbitant increases in their rents or mortgage interest rates. I cannot help but feel that the approach this Government is taking, once again, is attractive for a few people and therefore we will pass it, but overall it serves no particularly useful social purpose. Therefore, I want to address my comments to what should be done.

If ever there was a time for the Government to decide to build houses, this must be surely be the time. The need is obvious. By every single commentator's analysis there is a requirement to build about 100,000 more units than we are currently building. Those units will have to be of a wide variety of type and size in order to guarantee that they will meet the needs of society. The only way that can be done is if the Government of Canada recognizes that it has an obligation to make sure that those needed housing units are in fact built. The Government may say to me: we can't afford it, Ian. There is no way we can undertake that kind of expenditure at this time. But, Mr. Speaker, that is just not true.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that a year ago this month—I think you were in the chair on the day I raised it—we were speaking about the need to build houses, at that point it was 100,000 units, and we pointed out that if we were to start the process now we would create something in the order of 250,000 jobs. If the Government did not feel the urge to build the houses for the sake of the people who needed them, it surely must have recognized that, as an economic initiative, it might not be a bad idea to create 250,000 jobs, jobs of all types, not only building the homes themselves, laying the bricks and mortar in place or digging out the foundations, all the on-site work which takes place, but also making the bathtubs and the copper piping and shingles, flooring, all the things that are done in small factories all across the country, which would have helped to develop a new initiative in the economy. When we suggested that, the then Minister responsible for housing—since removed, thank God—was amused by it, to say the least. He was puzzled, I think in some ways, and obviously did not understand it. I was not surprised by that. But he rejected it because we could not afford it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, what would it have cost us to build those 100,000 housing units and create 250,000 jobs? It would have cost us about $5 billion. By George, that is a lot of money, I said to myself. There is no point in pretending that it is not a sizeable sum. But what do you get for $5 billion? Well, you get 100,000 houses and 250,000 jobs. You reduce UIC payments by between one and a half to $2 billion because you put those people to work. That does not sound so bad. In fact it is beginning to sound reasonable.

What else do you do? You generate perhaps around $800 million in federal, provincial and municipal taxes. On top of that, of course, you broaden the tax base in a number of municipalities. But the really interesting fact about it is that you get all the money back, every penny of it. You put in $5 billion, you get all of those benefits, and then people pay their mortgages or rent and pay the money back to you over time. I thought, how could they possibly reject that? I looked at the advisers sitting in the corner, and I asked them how could they reject that. It seems to me to be such a sensible, intelligent and reasonable thing to do. I mean, how could a housing minister, any housing minister worth his salt, sit there and say that they would rather have these piecemeal sort of programs—adhockery, as my colleague says—a sort of patchwork approach to meeting the emergency, without any overview of how to meet the real problem? I can tell, Mr. Speaker, that you, together with other Members, are just sitting on the edge of your seat, thinking: my God, if only that is brought forward we will vote for it and get on with it.

You will remember, Mr. Speaker, that when I made that suggestion one year ago this month unemployment was 9.3 per cent. We had about 960,000 people unemployed at that point. We had a deficit of less than $12 billion. But the Government said it could not take on that additional expenditure because of the size of the current deficit. Well, 12 months have passed and we do not have the houses, but we do have a deficit of $24 billion or $25 billion; we now have close to two million people unemployed, and we still need those housing units. There is no single thing that we could do in this country, there is no single initiative that we could undertake, not one, that would create the same kind of return as doing just that one thing would create. We could have had co-operative housing, we could have had homes for the aged, we could have had rental accommodation for senior citizens, we could have had single family dwellings in many centres right across this country, and we would have reduced the number of people on unemployment by about 250,000, I predict. We would have shown initiative and created momentum. The Canadian public would have seen the benefit, they would have felt better about the Government and its approach, and we would have derived significant additional spin-off benefits. But what happened? What happened was that we got a $3,000 grant instead. We got a $3,000 grant in its place. It did not generate houses in any significant numbers. The number of housing starts continued to decline, so it is with a sense of absolute frustration that I approach consideration of this legislation.

Is the situation beyond the understanding of the Government? Is there some mental block that keeps the Government from understanding its responsibility to the nation? Dammit, we have poured money down the drain in the last year. We had to go to the aid of Dome, to the aid of Chrysler and to the aid of Massey. We had to dig into our collective pockets week after week, and month after month, but what did we get in return? Not a single job.

What I am trying to get through to the Minister, who has just taken over responsibility for this portfolio, is that this should be the last time the Government comes forward with this kind of inadequate legislative proposal. Let us begin to deal with the problem as and where it exists. For the first time, let us begin to recognize the potential there is in meeting the obvious need. Let us begin to put in place the structure necessary to guarantee that on an ongoing basis, year by year, we will make sure, by whatever means necessary, including direct involvement, that there is the direction, the stimulus, the money, the planning needed to ensure that we meet our responsibility of providing accommodation to the public, while, at the same time, deriving the economic spin-off benefits.

It has been claimed that this would be inflationary. That is absolute nonsense; nothing could be further from the truth. How can building a house that will last for 50 years be inflationary? I do not believe that. It is incredible, but that is what the former Minister in this portfolio said to me. He said, "It is inflationary to spend the money". But it is not inflationary to run a deficit of $24 billion, of which $10.5 billion or $12 billion is above what we ran last year, at 20 per cent.

Let me make a prediction, Mr. Speaker, just as I predicted a year ago that unemployment would rise to 1.5 million. It has now passed that figure. Just as I predicted interest rates would continue to rise until the mid-term elections in the United States and then would start to decline, let me predict that they will go up again. They will go up again because this Government has made it quite clear that it has no responsibility for interest rates. It has said quite clearly in the House that it can do nothing about interest rates because they are controlled in Washington. If interest rates are controlled in Washington, then I urge the Minister to look at conditions south of the border. He will see with interest and alarm that as of today, interest rates are going back up in the United States. The mid-term elections are over, all of the political consequence has passed, and banking interests in the United States are attempting to recover that high level of interest that they were charging until the last three months.

If it is true that the Government will not—it is not that it cannot—exercise control over matters fiscal and financial, and if it is true that the Government is determined to allow those things to be dictated by Washington, then as certain as I stand here, interest rates in Canada will begin to rise again.

We can stop that, Mr. Speaker. We do not need this kind of program to do it. Interest rates in Canada are managed by the Bank of Canada, which sets the formula to be used to determine how the interest rate structure will be pieced together and how it will operate in the country. If it is the will of Parliament and the Government to hold interest rates down, it can be done.

I suggest to the Minister responsible for Housing that as the first step toward a rational housing policy, he should begin the process of ensuring that every single financial institution in the country makes substantial sums from its investment portfolio available for the creation of a mortgage pool at interest rates people can afford, set through Parliament by the Government. That is where he should start.

Next, if it is found there is a need beyond that to recover larger amounts of interest for distribution to shareholders through dividends and other means, that should be seen as a matter quite apart from providing money for mortgages. That is the way things used to be. That is the way things were done until 1968. That is the way the country met its obligation to provide accommodation for people until the late 1960s when the Government, under pressure from the Senate Banking Committee, made the appropriate and necessary changes to eliminate the ceiling on mortgage interest rates.

We must go back to that stage now, while interest rates are coming down. This is the time to move in that direction. I put it to the Minister that this is where he must start.

The next thing he must do is to establish the right of Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation to get back into the business of building and creating accommodation for people in this country. It should be involved in ensuring that accommodation of various types, funded in a variety of ways, is available in communities all across the country, and that people can get the accommodation they can afford.

If the Government does those two things and then meets with the agencies of the Provinces and municipalities to work out some sensible bylaws to govern the building of accommodation, then we will be able to assure people that houses will be available for them. This accommodation can be of the single family type, co-operative housing, accommodation in an apartment, or whatever, but there would be a sufficient stock of housing. This would hold the price within reason.

Not so many years ago when you bought a house, although its value rarely came down, equally, it did not rise by leaps and bounds, month by month. We have reached the point where investment in housing is more lucrative in terms of the realization of immediate capital gain than is investment in almost any other thing, except last year's issue of Canada Savings Bonds.

Those are the three steps that should be taken, Mr. Speaker. The Minister should begin with the money lenders and require that they make the necessary money available so that building can begin. He should establish a Crown agency capable of contracting out to all and sundry who are competent to build, the work that has to be done to erect the 100,000 units that are needed now and whatever units are required for the future. He should sit down with the municipalities to straighten out the bylaws that in many ways infringe on the ability of people to build within the price range they can afford.

• (1630)

If the Government did these three things, then it would have a housing policy which would last. In that event the Government would not have to constantly run back to the House of Commons asking for adjustments, amendments, minor changes, tinkering, playing around, handing out grants, taking grants away, reducing interest rates by little bits and raising them later. It would not have to go through all this because there would be a stable housing policy that builders and lenders would understand, that municipalities would be able to use and plan by, that would put people to work, that would create places for people to stay, and best of all would be within the ability of Canadians to pay. This is ultimately where the bottom line has to be drawn. People in Canada, families or singles, must be able to find accommodations within their income capabilities.

If the Minister really wants to leave his mark in his present portfolio, he should never again come forward with such legislation. It is almost offensive, considering the magnitude of the problem. He should begin now to develop a proper policy to deal with one of the three essentials of life.

This is not the deep south. People cannot sleep outdoors 12 months of the year. We must have decent accommodation in Canada; the climate demands it if nothing else. It is time the Government made a commitment. I suggest to the Minister that right now would not be too soon to start.

Mr. Jack Shields (Athabasca): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to spend much time on the consideration of Bill C-135. First I should like to congratulate the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) on his appointment to a new portfolio. I should like to draw his attention to a problem which is experienced particularly in high growth areas in northeastern Alberta, such as my home riding.

There are a large number of young families who purchase mobile homes which are located in mobile home parks. Indeed, in Fort McMurray I estimate that at least 20 per cent of the population is housed in these homes, but the nature of the homes has resulted in CMHC, through regulation, denying such home owners the programs which the Minister has brought forward. I am referring to mortgage assistance programs and the $3,000 home ownership grant, for example. They are not available to these people because their homes are not pegged into the ground or they have not been erected upon solid foundations.

I should like to make the case that indeed these homes are permanent. In my experience with the largest mobile home park in Fort McMurray, some of the homes have been there ten years and will never be moved. These are homes just as one may have a house built on a lot. They move their homes on to fully-serviced lots. The roadways are paved, the curbs and gutters have been installed. By their nature these homes must be kept off the ground in order to protect the services; there must be crawl spaces. Thus it is very difficult to erect foundations on which to set these homes.

Another point I should like to make is that a number of young families, again in high growth areas, are moving onto farms or acreages. Again for ease of construction and indeed for reasons of cost, they opt for mobile homes. It could be a double-width or a single-width model. These people are denied any assistance through these programs.

It is unfortunate that we were not able to propose an amendment to the Bill, but being a money bill, I am sure the Minister is aware that we cannot do so. I would suggest that by definition or by regulation through CMHC this injustice to many mobile home owners across the country could be rectified. I plead with the Minister to have his officials look into the matter because I think it is an injustice.

Those are the remarks which I wanted to direct to the Minister. I hope to hear from him soon on a positive note. I thank him for giving me his attention.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate today. At the outset I want to take the opportunity to extend my best wishes to the Minister in his new job, and not in any way to chide the Minister by saying that I hope his introduction of Bill C-135 today, as a fisherman, is the low water mark in his housing ministry.

I hope we come to understand housing with a much different importance and perspective than Parliament has traditionally looked at the entire question. I want to reflect upon two aspects. One is the enormous potential for job creation within the housing industry. I believe this is something which is readily recognized and acknowledged throughout the country. The other aspect for which I believe there is not nearly enough recognition is what is, by scientific study, the correlation between adequate housing and the negative social factors in place in society today. I will dwell on that point at greater length in a few moments.

I am disappointed to know that with the enormous importance we must assign to housing in Canada, a country of a northern climate where housing is not an option but a requirement, the Minister took approximately two minutes to introduce the Bill. I subscribe to the opinions expressed earlier this day that the very essence of a house, its necessity and relationship to family and a home, and the requirement to meet the needs of Canadians, are such that a Minister, in establishing himself in a new portfolio, ought to have taken the time to outline for Canadians the broad perspective of a housing policy which they could view with some confidence for a long time into the future.

Essentially the Bill before us gives us a grant. On the other hand, we have a set of conditions where interest rates, though lower, are unusually high by historical standards. Also we have an unusually high unemployment situation and what has been referred to as a depressed or recessed economy. Given this set of conditions, grants are not the answer to stimulate housing. If the economy is downpressed and if there are unusually high interest rates, holding out a carrot of a $3,000 grant to persons to build $50,000 to $100,000 homes will help people who already have available capital with which to build homes. It will not help those people who are marginally able to exist in society. They will not find a $3,000 grant to be the difference between being able to own a home or not. It is not only the cost of homes but the cost of servicing the money which stops people from building houses today. I submit to the Minister that in large measure while there is some good in this legislation, it is unfortunately biased toward helping those who need help the least.

• (1640)

If we look at what we are facing with regard to our housing situation in Canada today, we note that the shortfall in housing is extreme and excessive. In each year over the past four years we have had a shortfall in housing. In 1979 there was a shortfall of 25,000 houses, according to the projected needs. In 1980 there was a shortfall of 63,000 houses, and in 1981 there was a shortfall of 44,000 houses. This year there will be another shortfall of 87,000, for a total shortfall in the four-year period of 219,000 houses. We have had a shortfall of approximately one-quarter of a million individual houses in a four-year period.

During 1979 to 1982, though not as severe, a similar trend of numbers appears for apartment units. In 1979 we had a shortfall of 19,000 apartment units. In 1980 there was an additional shortfall of another 30,000 units, followed in 1981 by an additional shortfall of 16,000 units. This year there is a projected shortfall of 37,000 apartment units. This makes a shortfall total for that four-year period of 102,000 apartment units in Canada. It is fair to add the house and apartment shortfall together and see that over the last four years we had a shortfall total of 321,000 housing or apartment units.

That background, I believe, outlines what is a very, very serious social concern that we Parliamentarians must address. There is researched evidence to establish a correlation between adequate housing and social problems, and not just between housing and jobs. The problem trickles down to such industries as the caterpillar tractor that comes to dig the basement, the construction people who mix the cement and haul it so the basement can be constructed, all the way through to the people who do the final drapery and carpeting of the home.

The very existence of the independent detached house is a very different social environment in which to raise a family than that where a husband, a wife, two children, a parakeet and a poodle reside on the twenty-second floor of a highrise apartment. The data obtained in much of the social research done today establish that there is strong, significant correlation between the negative social behaviour that is running rampant in our society today and inadequate housing. All we have to do is take a look at the number of suicides, the number of broken homes, the health problems and the learning problems of children. Recent studies were done in Chicago and New York. A correlation was established between those people who lived in communities with higher noise levels, measured in decibels, those who live in the quieter suburban regions, and learning ability. There is also evidence that shows that causes of marriage breakdown, divorce rates, suicide and all of the rest are related to whether or not one has adequate housing.

I suggest to the Minister that he take a look at the culture of North America, the nature of detached housing, the kind of John Wayne syndrome in which we live, to see that the value of a house is simply more than just dollars and cents. It is not just the cost of the house; there is a much larger cost to society when that society is inadequately housed. While I submit that it is far more difficult to put an actual dollars and cents value on research in psychology and sociology, it is extensive enough that it requires an approach by Government to ensure adequate housing and that we should be able to guarantee to Canadians of varying income levels at least adequate housing so the family tradition can continue. As a result there will be much less demand on Government for social services.

My own Province, the Province of Alberta, has had a migration rate from the rest of Canada of more than 2,500 people per day for a period of at least four of the last five to six years. This was a tremendous boom for the Province, but the Province of Alberta today is suffering the worst of all the social problems with respect to rates of divorce and suicide, and much of this relates back to the fact that Alberta is also the area where one finds the tightest of housing markets in Canada today.

I would like to refer to another approach that I believe the Government might have been able to take that would have been more equitable and I think there is a significant public demand for the Government to undertake it. In Canada today we still have an 11 per cent building materials tax at a time when we have a 321,000 shortfall in housing and apartment units. That a Government can still afford to tax building materials at 11 per cent while at the same time claim that it is trying to stimulate housing is simply nonsense. This would not befuddle any grade three student, who would know that it is absolutely essential to do the opposite. Moreover, the fact should be underlined that the Government is collecting a building materials tax of 11 per cent; that works out to just short of $3,000 on the average Canadian home. In other words, $2,800 or $2,900 could be saved by the average home owner.

This Government is saying that it will give a grant of $3,000 to certain people while leaving in place the building materials tax for everyone else. In short, the Government has put in place an expensive additional tax, which means that when a person goes to his local hardware store to buy things needed to build a dog house or to fix up a fence, he is paying an 11 per cent tax. That tax should be removed. It would be a much more fair and equitable stimulus for the industry. It would also give a stimulus to the broadest sector of Canadian society and would not be limited to those people who spend only 30 per cent of their incomes on housing.

With that in mind, I suggest to the Government that is one of the approaches it ought to take, because it would have a broader perspective of fairness and would probably do more to stimulate housing than the present policy does.

• (1650)

Moreover, Mr. Speaker, I think it is important to note that one of the policies brought in under the Clark Government in 1979, in the budget of the Finance Minister at that time which was defeated by the Liberals and the NDP, was to allow Canadians to write off their mortgage cost for income tax purposes. To illustrate what that formula would have meant today in terms of housing, Canadians would have been much better off as far as housing affordability is concerned than they are today under the present grant of $3,000 from the Liberal Government. What it would have meant is that for the person today who buys a $50,000 house or remortgages at approximately 14 per cent at today's rate, there would have been a rebate equivalent to $125 per month, meaning that the real interest rate on the mortgage would have been in fact reduced to ten and one-quarter per cent. If a person bought a house worth $70,000 and applied their maximum rebate, again it would be $125 a month, which would have meant an 11.5 per cent interest rate for their mortgage under that Conservative formula.

That kind of policy was one that the Liberals and the NDP decided to defeat. The fact of the matter is that Canadians would have been better off, housing would have been more affordable and, therefore, more houses would have been constructed.

I would like to expand on that last statement with respect to employment, unemployment and the housing industry. The housing industry is the proper place for the Government to give encouragement because it has a filtering down effect that touches the largest portion of our society. When you build a house, trees start coming down, sawmills start working, cement plants start grinding, trucks start moving, caterpillar tractors start digging, copper mines start to provide wiring, carpet manufacturers begin to sell curtains and rugs, and appliance people go into operation—the whole scenario, right through to paints and chemicals. Not only is it a stimulus that affects such a broad sector of society, but it reaches into virtually every region of the economy. That is the proper way for Government to say it will make housing affordable, by making sure the people of Canada are not hit by interest payments at the high rate at which they are now, which affects everyone's quality of living. Stimulus to housing has an enormous effect on the economy of the country.

In 1982 700,000 Canadian families had to renew their mortgages. With more and more Canadians out of work, the need for assistance from the Government of Canada becomes even greater. In October of 1982 there were 1,450,000 Canadians unemployed. I need not tell a wise person such as yourself, Mr. Speaker, that this figure does not reflect all the unemployed people. That figure is the "official" unemployed. The statistical data do not include the over 80 per cent of our native people who are unemployed, or the people who have quit looking to Canada Manpower after six or eight months of finding no work. It would not surprise me or, I am sure, most Members of Parliament, that the real figure of unemployed in Canada, with a population of some 24 million, is more probably in the neighbourhood of two million.

By way of conclusion, may I say that housing is the largest single component in our consumer price index. Any stimulus such as inflation which causes housing costs to increase has the biggest effect on our consumer price index. In the face of that important fact, this Government tells us repeatedly that their principal concern is the reduction of inflation in Canada, a goal for which I applaud them; but it makes absolutely zero sense that it would continue with the 11 per cent building tax which affects everyone, not just some groups of Canadians who find themselves in a situation where more than 30 per cent of their income goes for housing. In effect, all Canadians must pay tax on every piece of building material they purchase. Remove the tax and the economy will receive more stimulus than any grants given out to limited numbers of Canadians.

As an economic sector, residential construction is a major industry and accounts for 6 per cent of our gross national product. That, again, should signal to us the importance of stimulating the housing industry. Six per cent is no small portion of the large volume of money which in fact would equal the gross national product. There should be an appropriate stimulus in that area. We must realize that if, as has been recognized by economists, we are in a very serious economic downturn and our gross national product is not being stimulated adequately, surely housing is one of the stimulative areas which is most important.

Finally, I would like to deal with one further fact, which is the migration patterns of Canadians today from rural to urban centres. More and more Canadians are gravitating to urban centres, to the point where the ratio is virtually reversed from the early days of our country. At that time approximately 87 per cent of the people lived in rural areas. Today it is almost that identical amount of people who live in urban centres. Most of the rural Canadians are really rural, non-farm, because actually only 5 per cent of Canadians live on farms today.

What I would like to stress, Mr. Speaker, is that there needs to be a new approach to the question of housing. There should be an approach with respect to urban centres which gets away from more and more apartments to houses which are affordable. I am not suggesting for a moment that the Government stop any of its activities in terms of encouraging the building of more affordable apartments, but rather that that is not in itself the answer. As long as the house is the largest single expenditure that the average Canadian family will ever incur, that house, in a North American clime, must be made affordable and accessible.

What we are looking at is a two-pronged concern. The desire of Canadians in general to own their own homes, at least some day, versus an economic set of conditions, an employment set of conditions and an interest rate set of conditions, is making it such that there must be some stimulus in our system.

• (1700)

The actions of the Government today amount to this. The Minister in charge of housing introduces a housing Bill, speaks for approximately two minutes, outlines no broad strategy for housing, addresses no broad concerns of housing, but simply makes some amendment with respect to a previous inequity. He leaves the Bill before us without addressing the long-term concern of housing itself.

A fundamental and root evaluation needs to take place, not just of houses, costs and dollars, but of the concept of families, the concept of family in play, the concept of family and association, the concept of the home as it relates to the structure of our society, and of all the extraneous costs attached thereto. The fact is that we live in a country which, by the standards of virtually every Canadian, provides inadequate housing at the present time.

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Mr. Speaker, I want to say how pleased I am to see the Minister of Public Works and the Minister responsible for housing (Mr. LeBlanc) in the House today. I do not intend to occupy the time of the House for long with respect to the matter, but I am pleased to see him here. I think it is an important part of the parliamentary process that when a Minister's Bill is being addressed by the House of Commons, the Minister responsible be here as much as possible.

I am also pleased to be able, on my first intervention in the debate, to extend my good wishes to the Minister as he undertakes the work in his portfolio. I note that he has sitting beside him the new Minister of Fisheries and Oceans (Mr. De Bané), and I am sure he is instructing him in the vagaries of fish and seals and other things. However, his portfolio is a very important one with respect to housing because it is a difficult problem facing the country. I think in terms of public works that his portfolio is historically significant in the development of the country and that with respect to the National Capital Commission his responsibilities have a great deal to do with the prosperity and development of a capital which reflects all of Canada.

That is the spirit in which I want to address the Minister. I want to tell him, as he already knows, that it is our intention to support the Bill because it will be of some assistance, but perhaps not enough assistance in view of the size of the problem facing housing. However, it will give some assistance and it is a piece of legislation that is worthy of support and we intend to support it.

I hope it is helpful in one problem which I would like to address through Your Honour to the Minister. It relates to the really startling evidence that Ottawa and the National Capital Region in general now has the lowest vacancy rates in the country, according to statistics released by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation. In Ottawa-Hull, as it is described, the vacancy rate is 0.3 per cent, with Ottawa at 0.2 per cent and Hull at 0.5 per cent. I think that if one translates those figures, spreading them out into the Cities of Nepean and Gloucester, one will perhaps find that the figures are about the same.

It is the lowest vacancy rate, and what that means to the people in the area is that there is the gradual development, in the rental housing area in particular, of very little choice. I hope that the Bill will advance the cause of construction and will somehow entice people to invest in owner-occupied homes, which would relieve, to an extent, the very low vacancy rate with all of its ramifications. Then it would be a very healthy move.

I do not have to tell the Minister that tenants and renters in the area are caught in a bit of a squeeze. The Government has enacted the six and five program, limiting the wages of a large group of people who work in the Public Service in Canada. The extent of their income has been limited. The economy, as poor as it is, has limited the incomes of others not within the Public Service. So there is a squeeze here. Granted, we are more fortunate than other parts of Canada in many ways, but there is still a squeeze.

However, with respect to apartment rentals in the centre of Ottawa, the outskirts of Ottawa and in Nepean, people are living with limited choices of accommodation while the rents in the area have grown. It has been brought to my attention that increases of 18 per cent, 25 per cent and 45 per cent have been approved by rent review tribunals. I must tell the Minister that there is a dreadful uncertainty among people who rent, some who rent by choice and others by necessity. Their concern is whether or not they will be able to enjoy the standards of living accommodation to which they have been accustomed.

I take it that this is a very real problem, one which Members of Parliament from this area meet every day, and I want to address it in the following terms. I know that rent review and control in the sense it is practised, at least in the Province of Ontario, is not within federal jurisdiction but, rather, is within provincial jurisdiction. In one particular case the provincial Government has moved, although some say not adequately. The Government of Ontario has moved with respect to the City of Toronto, but the problem remains. It is endemic to the system and we hear about it every day.

I want to repeat a request which I made to the Minister some time ago that he look at the situation within the National Capital Region so that he may understand that the vast number of rental units are owned by landlords, benevolent or not, in an almost monopolistic set of circumstances which leaves little room for competition. Many people feel that they have been taken advantage of as a result of high interest rates and the monopolistic conditions which exist.

The Minister himself cannot lower the rent and I am not suggesting that he can do that. I am not suggesting that he can control the rents, either. However, as a federal Minister he has some responsibilities, as had his predecessor, to take some leadership in recognizing the problem. I am now asking the hon. gentleman, who is known for his leadership with respect to fish, to take leadership with respect to tenants. I would like to suggest to the hon. gentleman, for his consideration, that he, as the Minister in charge of housing policy for the whole of Canada, should recognize that that situation exists here in the National Capital Region but that it also exists in other cities. He should get together as quickly as possible with all his provincial counterparts to see whether or not some concerted action can be taken by all the Governments. The provincial Governments should be encouraged to take action with respect to the situation, which is getting worse.

I tell Your Honour that many people have come to me and said that not only are their choices limited with respect to housing but that they do not see any light at the end of the tunnel either. I mentioned this to him during the course of a speech I made a little earlier and I would like to take these few brief moments to bring it to his attention again. I believe he could be doing a great public service. With his reputation as a conciliator, which is a reputation that has been earned—there are many in this House who would disagree with that, but I would like to say that he has that reputation—he could bring whatever powers he has, whatever influence he has, to bear on the provincial Ministers of Housing to see whether or not there is some way that there can be a joint Government effort, or a conference at least, to explore the problems to see whether both levels of Government could work together in this area.

I want to conclude by saying this. Canadians generally are not organizers, they are not marchers, they are not demonstrators. What has happened in the rental communities in the country is that the Canadian people are organizing, they are demonstrating, they are marching. They are marching because of the limited choice of housing, the high cost of housing, and a sense of despair as to what the future is.

I think that should be a signal, not just to provincial Governments, although certainly it should be a signal to them, but as well to the federal Government. I ask for that kind of intervention by the Minister. A federal-provincial conference with respect to the problems of rental housing would be something that would be welcome in the national capital and across the country.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate the Minister of Housing for being here today for this debate on his Bill, and I wish him well in his very important portfolio.

If I may, I would like in the time available to me to break down the subject by the problems as they appear to be, and then deal with some of the solutions that I believe should be considered by the new Minister.

The Member for St. John's East (Mr. McGrath) has indicated that the Party intends to vote for the Bill as it constitutes something positive in a very important area.

Let me for a moment give some indication of the housing problem as it appears across the country. I have in the Toronto Star of October 12 the heading: "Housing Collapse Feared If Help Stops". The article states:

Builders and constructions unions fear a collapse of the multi-billion-dollar housing industry this winter if Ottawa and Queen's Park don't give more help to new home buyers.

A little further down:

The industry, which has been hurting for almost two years, provides jobs directly or indirectly for one in every ten of Canada's workers, according to industry estimates.

From The Globe and Mail for October 29, 1982:

"Developers Warn Housing Industry Key To Recovery"

That is a sentiment I share profoundly. In western Canada it is the energy industry, but for the rest of the country it surely must be the housing industry. Continuing:

Governments are going to have to find ways to push mortgage interest rates down if the housing industry is to play its increasingly crucial role in pulling the country out of recession, a spokesman for a national organization . . . said yesterday.

Further down:

"Considering the state of the auto industry, housing will have to carry a lot of the burden of recovery," Mr. Galway said.

Thirdly, a quote from the Montreal Gazette of October 8, 1982 under the heading: "Housing Starts Reach 22-year Low". I quote:

The recession tightened its grip on the residential construction industry last month, as Canadian housing starts fell to their lowest level in 22 years—from a seasonally adjusted annual rate of 89,000 in August to 86,000 in September, according to statistics compiled by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corp. (CMHC).

That's the lowest level of activity recorded since March, 1960, and appears to be further confirmation the current construction slump is longer and deeper than predicted by most experts.

Another quote from a newspaper under the heading: "Ottawa Urged to Develop National Policy on Housing".

One other short quote, datelined Winnipeg:

The federal Government must stabilize Canadian real estate markets by developing a national housing policy and indexing mortgage rates—

That was said by the President of the Canadian Real Estate Association.

A quote from the October 18, 1982 Globe and Mail, headed: "Housing Sector Banks on Cheaper Money", reads:

Ewen Ferguson, president of Construction Forecasts Co. of Toronto, describes people as being "gun-shy" because of high unemployment. And he argues that mortgage rates are going to have to come down more—to the 12 to 14 per cent range for about six months—before normal activity will resume.

A quote from The Financial Times of August 23, 1982 under the heading: "Home Ownership on a Downward Track":

For the first time since the 1960s, when baby boom families distorted housing patterns, home ownership rates in most parts of Canada are declining.

Another quote from the Calgary Herald of October 15, 1982. This is just one paragraph:

The interim report by the Task Force on Affordable Housing says home ownership—long a goal for most Canadians—is now beyond the reach of a growing number of Calgarians.

You may be wondering, Mr. Speaker, why I am telling you there is a problem in housing when everybody knows there is a problem in housing. The question, of course, is: What is the Government going to do about it?

I would respectfully suggest that the real problems of housing, at least at the moment, involve interest rates. It is true that mortgage rates have dropped drastically, from a high, I see in this chart, of about 21.5 per cent to 22 per cent in April of 1981 to about 14 per cent today and, you may say, they may go down even more. They seem to be going down, and I hope they do by the end of the year.

I would respectfully submit to the Minister that what is holding back the young couple or the middle-aged couple now is not the current level of interest rates, but the fear that if they go out now and buy a home, pay $20,000 to $25,000 as a downpayment, in one year or two years from now when their term runs out on their mortgage they will lose their downpayment because they think—and a number of people have confirmed this to me—that interest rates will be back up to 21 per cent or 22 per cent.

Has the Minister considered trying to encourage lenders to provide, if not a seven, a five-year term mortgage as their service to a desperately debilitated economy? Has the Minister considered trying to persuade the larger lenders to provide at least a five-year fixed interest rate mortgage? I was sorry I was not here to hear his speech. Perhaps he spoke about that, because I think at the moment that is the crucial problem facing the housing industry. It goes without saying that a 21 per cent or 22 per cent interest rate destroys the hope of anybody of buying a home. The Minister may say the rates are down, but I think the point is that people have to be reasonably guaranteed that they will stay down for a three or five-year period.

I can think of all manner of people who have come to me in my riding, such as one young couple who bought a home and were paying about $600 a month principal, interest and taxes. They had to renegotiate their mortgage and it went to either $900 or $950 a month. They have a child, the wife cannot work, and they were literally in the position four or five months ago where they were asking how could they get out of their mortgage.

• (1720)

I am certain there are people in your riding, Mr. Speaker, and in that of the Minister who complain about this problem. They are concerned about losing their homes. If they buy a house today, will they lose it in three years when the mortgage runs out?

Another issue is the spread in what the various financial institutions pay their depositors and the rate at which they loan the money, for example, the prime rate. I recently saw an article in the Edmonton Journal published some time in October which indicated that the spread in all of the banks in 1972 was about two points. In 1982 the average spread is 4.2 per cent. The Royal Bank on October 6, 1982 had a spread of five and a quarter, the Toronto-Dominion five and a quarter, the Continental four and three quarters and the Bank of British Columbia five. It would not be unreasonable for the Government to approach these financial institutions and ask them to reduce their spread back two points in the national interest. We are all bleeding at this time. Therefore, it would not be too much to ask the banks to reduce their spread. How many couples might buy a new home at 12 per cent who would not buy a home at 14 per cent? If the banks would bring the spread down by two points as their contribution to the national crisis, it would help the housing industry across the country.

There are many other issues; I will just mention a couple. Everyone in this House knows that the capital flight last year was about $10.2 billion in direct investment and $8 billion disappeared from our national accounts. A soured investment entrepreneurial atmosphere drives up interest rates. It is a vicious circle. More money leaves Canada. Obviously some of that is mortgage money. With the exchange rate on the dollar we need more incentives to keep money in this country. A soured investment climate is our problem.

I wish to refer to a proposal made by a small builder in my riding. He has been building homes in the Edmonton area for 20 years. He points out that the unemployment rate is officially 12 per cent. In Alberta it is 8.5 per cent, which seems to surprise some people.

Let us look at housing starts. I realize I am not supposed to refer to charts. However, let us follow housing starts from 1976, when they were running at about twice what they are now, through to the present rate of about 76,000 units a year. In addition, let us look at the growth in unemployment from the beginning of 1981 to the present.

There is a definite causal relationship. The Minister may say the reason there are not more housing starts is unemployment. However, as my constituent points out, virtually everything in housing is labour-intensive. The copper is in the ground, the trees are in the forest. In fact, most products used to build houses come from the ground or our forests. It is simply a matter of taking them out of the ground and the forests and bringing them to the site of the new homes.

This contractor points out that more than two jobs are created with every housing start. I will not go through the details of his formula. However, he points out that if 200,000 homes more than are expected to be started this year were built, it would create 400,000 jobs. That is 400,000 men and women who are now drawing unemployment insurance or social assistance. Think of the saving to the Government if these people came off unemployment insurance or social assistance. The ballpark figure that a construction worker earns is $20,000 a year. An unemployed construction worker now receives about $800 maximum in unemployment insurance. If these 400,000 were taken off unemployment insurance, they would again have self-respect and there would be reduced social problems. In addition, they would be paying taxes and we would have the necessary homes provided.

I have an aunt who lives in a major city in this country. She is the widow of an artist. In fact, her husband painted the portrait of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which is in the lobby. She lives in very modest circumstances. However, she has had an indication that her rent will be increased 15 per cent next March. Unfortunately, because her husband was an artist, she does not receive a pension. I am sure there are hundreds of thousands of people in similar circumstances in this country.

To get back to the proposal by this contractor, if an additional 200,000 homes were started, this would get Canadians back to work. It would get our suppliers, lumbermen, architects and engineers back to work. People who come to western Canada from other parts of the country find they are the last to be hired and the first to be laid off because of the construction collapse.

It may be said that this is all very well in theory, but can it be done in practice? I understand that in 1948 West Germany decided that the best motor for its economy was the housing industry. Ludwig Erhardt and others in West Germany decided that they must get the construction industry going. They decided that if Helmut Schmidt, for example, would donate a portion of his wages to a government-sponsored housing bank, a certain amount of that would not be taxed. It was similar to our RRSP. As a result of that proposal, all kind of money went into the pool. This money was loaned to builders at reduced interest rates. The number of homes under construction went from 200,000 a year to in excess of 400,000. I believe it stayed at that level up to the present time.

There are many men and women in this country who would like to apply their skills and trades. At the moment a great number of them cannot do that. The Government should consider something imaginative, such as the West Germany plan. For that matter, what about something like our proposal to make mortgage interest and property taxes deductible? Possibly even shelters should be deductible up to a certain point. France does it. That country has a very imaginative scheme which provides subsidies to couples, depending on their income, number of children and that sort of thing.

• (1730)

Aside from the problems I mentioned earlier, Mr. Speaker, the problem is volatile interest rates, interest rates which are too high, and mortgages of too short a term. I respectfully ask the Minister, because he is starting a new area, why will he not look at some of these imaginative programs which have worked elsewhere and consider putting them in place in Canada?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I ask which one of us in this House would deny that housing is the most readily available motor which can get our people back to work right across the country? I think everybody accepts the truth of that. Why, then, in a situation like this, do we have a Bill which, in my respectful submission, is a positive step, yes, but one which does not get at the basic problems?

Perhaps someone on the other side will speak to some of these matters I have raised because they are the major problems right now, and the fastest way of dealing with the problem of housing would be to deal with each of the issues I have mentioned. I hope the Government will bring forward something dealing with those matters; if it does, we can get our housing industry back to work.

When I was speaking about my constituent's proposal, Mr. Speaker, I did not mention that he maintained that by getting 200,000 homes going, the federal and provincial Governments could gain a net amount of as much as $10 billion a year. If the Minister wants to know how my constituent arrives at that, I would be happy to give him the figures. My constituent mentioned that more than two full-time jobs are created for every home begun because almost all the money which goes into housing, apart from land, is for labour. In short, it is the most labour-intensive industry of all. I put it to Hon. Members that the almost Siamese-twin relationship between unemployment and housing starts is striking, and housing really does appear to be the best available domestic motor to get our entire economy going again. I would urge the Government to make some significant innovations in that area as quickly as possible.

Mr. Fred McCain (Carleton-Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this House today with a great deal of concern and without any great deal of pleasure to speak on the subject matter of this debate. I would like to reflect on the position of someone who wanted to buy a home at the time I was first married and needed a home. At that time the expectation was—it was almost a promise—that any individual who was frugal and ambitious could look forward to owning their own home in a reasonable period of time. That home would cost them roughly 20 per cent of their income. I feel that my generation and this Government have now put the would-be home owner in a position where he has to spend not less than 30 per cent of his income, and probably 35 per cent of his income, to own a home of comparable quality to that of the home which I was virtually promised by the economy of my country when I bought it.

What pleasure then, Mr. Speaker, can I get in addressing the subject of home ownership when we as a country, and the people on your right as a Government, have allowed the value of one's earnings to deteriorate to that point?

Now, one may say that yes, you can still get by at 20 per cent or 25 per cent. But I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if you spend in that range as a percentage of your income, you are going far below the standards of those people who were buying their homes when I was buying mine. We have, Mr. Speaker, by our policies put home ownership virtually out of reach of even the most frugal and most ambitious of people today. When I compare that with what I inherited from my country, it is obvious that we have been very, very sloppy in our management of the economy, particularly as it relates to housing.

The Minister and I both come from communities in which, when we were young men, it was the expectation, usually realized by 90 per cent of the people, that we would be in our own homes. Certainly it approached that percentage in the smaller towns and rural areas of the country in the 1950s or 1960s. But we have denied that opportunity to Canadians, Mr. Speaker. We have changed the ball game at various levels of Government. When I purchased my home, the street on which it sits was in and paid for by the municipality or the Province. But today, Government at the municipal level has changed that to the point where you build your own streets and supply your own services, all at the highest possible cost, which in turn has inflated the cost of home ownership. Surely we have served succeeding generations very, very poorly.

I must say to you, Mr. Speaker, that this housing crisis which exists in Canada today is a black mark on the escutcheon of the Government of this country, which is approaching the criminal in its negligence, lack of leadership and forthrightness with the people of Canada as to whither are we going. It is not that long ago that the Prime Minister (Mr. Trudeau), in seeking re-election, was able to say that this country is strong. Well, I want to say it must have suffered from malnutrition or something because it is very, very weak today.

There is no more stark and realistic example of that than the lack of attention to those who follow us and their right to own a home. And is it not reflected in our economy? We have a declining level of house construction in spite of all the incentives provided by the federal and provincial Governments in the form of non-taxable grants, interest-free loans or other incentives.

According to an article in The Globe and Mail, as late as October statistics indicated that we still did not have the upsurge in house building that would make a major contribution to the improvement of the economy. No one is confident that they will be able to sell their house and get their money out of it if they are transferred. As a matter of fact, those who bought houses in the last ten years—except in Ottawa or half a dozen or so other prosperous communities—may have had to suffer a capital loss if they were transferred. In some cases this loss was absorbed by the employer. It is an economic tragedy that we find ourselves in this position, Mr. Speaker.

I do not plan to belabour the subject or to bore the Chair or other Members of the House about this. As participants in Government, while we on this side do not have any influence on policies, I feel that we will have acted as traitors to the generation to come if we compare what we inherited from the country to what we will pass on to the young people who hope to buy a home today. What a tragedy it is.

I should like to deal now with some of the difficulties that I have with the housing program. For one thing, apparently by regulation a church cannot build a home and enjoy the benefits of this program. By virtue of some regulation, this category is excluded. A couple of congregations in my constituency have approached me about this. It is rare that such a house would be vacant or for rent. I appeal to the Minister to examine the regulations to see if church congregations cannot be made eligible for the tax-free grant if they wish to build a parsonage.

I think the regulations that apply to tenants who wish to buy the home they occupy should be amended to recognize the tenant's status, without splitting hairs. I know of a case where, by the grace of the parents, a young couple live in a home in which they have absolutely no investment. They have maintained and heated it but have not contributed to the purchase price. If they qualified for the grant they could buy the home. It was easy for me and all of my generation to do that, and I think these young people should be given some consideration so that they could buy this home. Let the churches build a home and let anyone who has no equity in a home buy it under whatever terms may apply.

It has already been stated that people living in mobile homes on rented or community lots have difficulty getting the grant. The specification that the home must sit on a basement cannot be met if one is leasing from the community or from a private entrepreneur. The regulations should take the needs of all people into consideration. I do not think we have any right to put constraints upon anyone occupying a mobile home. Many people have been stung in the sale of their property when they had to move from one community to another. Someone who owns a mobile home could at least take it along at little cost and not get stuck with a capital loss.

My own sons and daughters have experienced serious capital loss in purchasing homes and selling them in one community after another as their jobs necessitated. I rather admire those who are willing to start out in a mobile home and I do not think the regulations should preclude this type of shelter for those who want to buy it, regardless of location.

I hope the Minister will address some of the inequities that result from the classifications set out in the program. I hope the regulations will be released quickly. If they do not comply with the needs of the parsonage, the mobile home and others, I hope they are not so fixed in stone that they cannot be adjusted so as to be equitable to all who want to buy a home under the program.

With that plea to the Minister I say, let us get on with this. The Bill was introduced on June 29 but the regulations are not available as yet. That is not the fault of the Minister, of course; his predecessor was extremely lax in his duty. I hope that the present Minister is more cognizant of the needs of the people than was his predecessor, who neglected these things. I suppose the secondary role that he now occupies in Cabinet shows that this was recognized by the Government.

Mr. Bill Yurko (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to say that I hope to finish my remarks a few minutes before six so that the legislation can be passed.

Like other Members of the House, Mr. Speaker, I support this legislation, but it is still just a band-aid solution to a very difficult problem.

Before I go further, I want to congratulate the Minister on his appointment to this portfolio. I do not envy him, as it is a very difficult portfolio. Nothing he may do will be enough for the people of Canada. In the second half of the 1970s I spent several years as a Minister of Housing in a provincial Government so I know that the problems never disappear; they are always there.

The real problem today is not one of supply of housing but of affordability. Since World War II there has been no greater success story than that of the manner in which Canadians are housed. I say that with all the honesty at my disposal. At the present time we are the best housed people in the world. Indeed, the percentage of total income that goes to housing in this country is one of the lowest in the world.

In this country we have what is perhaps the greatest ratio of single family housing to multiple housing of any country in the world. We have built tremendously expensive communities which have a very low population density and extensive facilities. At some point we are going to have to pay the price for all this, and I feel that time is close upon us. A whole new policy on housing is needed. Some of us who were provincial Ministers or federal Ministers in 1978 recognized how desperate the need was.

There are basically five areas of the total housing picture that must be addressed. The first is global capital financing. Plenty of that is available in Canada today as savings have never been higher. The money is there but the cost of that money is too high when it is required for housing.

• (1750)

The second matter is the delivery process. The third matter is the approval process, and the fourth is the servicing process, which involves various utilities over expansive land areas upon which housing is built. The fifth matter is affordability, which is a critical matter in the area of housing.

How many people can afford housing today? I would ask the Minister whether this particular program of a $3,000 grant per housing unit is to help affordability, or is it an attempt to stimulate the housing industry and to create jobs? If it is both, as he gestures, that is fine; it will not do very much, anyway. What the Minister has in terms of a good program is the housing repair program.

The housing stock in the nation is such that the present occupancy rate in Canada is three persons per housing unit, and in some areas it is lower. By itself that is the lowest in the world in terms of numbers of people per housing unit, but there is some doubling up and tripling up taking place at present because of costs, particularly operating costs.

I should like to deal with the idea of a shelter allowance directly to the person, but time does not permit me to do so. I am not referring to a one-time housing grant, but to a shelter allowance directly to the person or indeed through the income tax system to provide rental rebates, as is being done in the Province of Alberta. There are many systems to assist people directly with respect to affordability of housing; many have been tried in Canada.

Again I put before the Minister the report of the provincial Housing Ministers and the then federal Minister as a result of a conference which was held between January 31 and February 1, 1978. It was literally the first sectorial conference sponsored that year and was initiated by the provincial Governments rather than the federal Government. Yesterday I heard the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. MacEachen) dwell on the fact that provincial Ministers never put meat on their programs when they come before the federal Government at a federal-provincial conference. There has never been more meat or thought given to the entire housing picture or the new direction of housing in Canada as it should evolve with respect to affordability, delivery, servicing and every other aspect of housing, than was put forth by the provincial Ministers unanimously in 1978. To a large degree they were approved by the then Minister, the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs (Mr. Ouellet).

What happened? Even the projections put forth at that time are very relevant in today's picture. They knew what was happening in terms of supply and in terms of interest rates. They outlined the situation eminently well. Their first projection was that upward pressure on interest rates would develop as a result of national and international economic influences which would affect housing affordability. We knew that in 1978 without equivocation.

Also they came forth unanimously with policies on global funding and on the extension of the capital cost allowance. There were unanimous suggestions or directions with respect to funding mechanisms for federal grants to municipalities, which is an area upon which I want to touch very briefly. There was a unanimous recommendation, not for mortgage interest rate deductibility, which was a subsequent Progressive Conservative policy, but for deductibility of property taxes from income to reduce the federal income tax and, therefore, provide some taxation breathing room to municipalities. Today the municipalities are strapped for funds and strapped in their ability to raise property taxes. They have risen by a factor of four or five over the last several years.

In regard to the entire area of infrastructure and the tremendous load of high interest rates on the capital cost of housing, I suggest that the Minister should permit the municipalities to issue tax-free bonds so that they could instal infrastructure, purchase land for social housing and become involved to a much greater degree in that area. What is wrong with municipal tax-free bonds directly associated with financing of housing and community development? I do not mean tax-free bonds for municipalities on all their other expenditures; only tax-free bonds for supplying accommodation and services to the housing they build within their respective jurisdictions.

Tax-free bonds are not a new idea. They worked in the United States remarkably well. They serve to reduce the price of housing, to provide proper utilities and proper community development. Indeed, municipalities can therefore borrow at significantly below the market level of interest rates; under today's interest rate climate, some four percentage points below the going interest rates for money.

The federal Government will have to address itself to the borrowing capabilities of Canadian municipalities in relation to having ability to provide municipal services.

I want the Bill to pass this evening, so I will not hold it up beyond six o'clock. It is an important Bill even though it is only a band-aid solution. The role of the federal Government in assisting municipalities on a selective basis across the nation will indeed have to be increased. The load on home owners because of energy price increases will have to be reduced. For example, my energy costs have risen by five times, even in Alberta, in the last four years. The cost of maintaining a home is now very high because property taxes, energy costs, utility costs and interest rates are very high. Even if interest rates come down, the cost of servicing a home, because of high energy costs, high property taxes and other ancillary cost items, will be very high. Therefore the repeated demand for housing from here on will drop significantly, and the 278,000 housing units built each year in the latter half of the 1970s will never occur again, unless our population rises explosively. This will not occur. Our population has stabilized. The average age has risen to 28 years. Indeed, the extent of immigration allowed into Canada is being curtailed.

I would have liked to speak for 30 to 40 minutes on this matter, but in the interest of passing the Bill and getting these moneys out to home owners, I will conclude my remarks at this point.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the third time and passed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Deans: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Since we have reached this stage in the business of the week, I am wondering whether the Government House Leader would be able to tell us what will be the business of the House for tomorrow and Friday.

Mr. Pinard: Mr. Speaker, first of all, tomorrow we will deal with Bill C-95, followed by Bill C-131, followed by Bill C-85. That is the business of the House for tomorrow, so there is a slight change. Rather than the second Bill being Bill C-85, it will be Bill C-131, and Bill C-85 will be the third item tomorrow.

In any case, on Friday the business will be Bill C-91 and then Bill C-98. I hope before the end of tomorrow to have a meeting with House leaders in order to clarify the business for next week.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Corbin): Order, please. It being six o'clock, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock in the afternoon, pursuant to Standing Order 2(1).

At 6.01 p.m., the House adjourned, without question put, pursuant to Standing Order.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

NORTHWEST TEL IMPENDING LAY-OFFS

Mr. Dave Nickerson (Western Arctic): Madam Speaker, whereas the employees of Northwest Tel, the federal Crown corporation which has a monopoly on telecommunications in the western Northwest Territories, Yukon and northern British Columbia, are facing severe lay-offs which they suspect are motivated by the desire of the Liberal Government to maintain high profit margins in spite of the six and five per cent guidelines applied to rates, thereby allowing the quality of the service to decline, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Yukon (Mr. Nielsen):

That the Minister of Transport provide a full explanation of the impending lay-offs at Northwest Tel for which he is responsible.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES

DISSEMINATION OF INFORMATION ON PROPOSED CHANGES

Mr. Ron Stewart (Simcoe South): Madam Speaker, this weekend proposed changes to the boundaries of federal electoral ridings are to be published in The Canada Gazette. It is my understanding that Members of the House are to be given the information on these changes tomorrow, only a day before publication. In light of the fact that a number of Members on the Government side have already been informed of such changes, that the information was distributed to the media a week ago, and that changes to my riding and its new name were conveyed to me by an outside source, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Brampton-Georgetown (Mr. McDermid):

That this House strongly condemn this underhanded and unfair practice of selected distribution of important information which directly affects Members and their constituents, and is an affront to both.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAYS

PROPOSED RENT INCREASES

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina West): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the fact that the real estate division of Canadian Pacific is raising rents in some of its apartments at double the six and five guidelines, and whereas Canadian Pacific Chairman, Ian Sinclair, sits on the Government Committee telling workers to live with six and five, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North (Mr. Orlikow):

That this House calls upon Mr. Sinclair to resign from the "black and blue ribbon" Government Committee and, failing that, that the Government dismiss him.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

AIR TRANSPORT

PROPOSAL THAT CAISSE DE DÉPÔT DU QUÉBEC TRANSFER SHARES TO QUÉBECAIR

Mr. Pierre Gimaïel (Lac-Saint-Jean): Madam Speaker, I rise on a matter of urgent and pressing necessity, under the provisions of Standing Order 43.

In view of a statement by Mr. Campeau, President of the Caisse de dépôt du Québec, to the effect that the Caisse would have $1 billion to invest in the transport sector during the next four years; and whereas Québecair and its employees are searching high and low for $30 million in order to save more than 900 jobs, I move, seconded by the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Dionne):

That it be suggested to Mr. Michel Clair, Quebec Minister of Transport, that he communicate with Mr. Campeau of the Caisse de dépôt du Québec and ask him to buy $30 million worth of capital shares in Québecair.

Madam Speaker: The House has heard the motion by the Hon. Member. Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

AIRPORTS

MIRABEL—RETURN OF EXPROPRIATED LANDS

Mr. Scott Fennell (Ontario): Madam Speaker, in light of the fact that the Commission Parlementaire de l'Assemblée Nationale du Québec is currently studying the effects of the expropriation of Mirabel lands, considering that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. LeBlanc) and the officials of the Canada Land Commission have both refused to answer an invitation to attend before the Commission, sent to them by the Province of Quebec, and as the people of Mirabel have been mistreated and have suffered over the Government's blunder for the past 13 years, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Joliette (Mr. La Salle):

That the Government commence immediately the retrocession of the 80,000 acres not required for the largest airport in the world and sell the land back to the original owners and tenants at a price which does not contemplate profit but merely recovers original cost.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

CALL FOR RECONSTITUTION OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACID RAIN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Because of new and alarming information of damage caused by acid rain to ground water in the Muskoka-Haliburton area of Ontario, and since thousands of cottages are located in that area, and it is a very serious situation, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Simcoe North (Mr. Lewis):

That the Minister of the Environment immediately reconstitute the Special Subcommittee on Acid Rain as requested by all members of that original Committee and have them look into this serious matter on a continuing basis.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

HARBOURS

SILTING AT NORTH RUSTICO, P.E.I.

Mr. Mel Gass (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Every year since 1976, the harbour at North Rustico, Prince Edward Island, requires dredging due to the movement of the sand. Every year the cost involved in dredging the harbour mounts. In 1981-1982 alone the cost was approximately three-quarters of a million dollars. Continous dredging is not the answer to this problem. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans instruct his officials to commence a study to find a permanent solution to this problem.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

DEMAND FOR WITHDRAWAL OF AMENDING BILL C-131

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In view of the Government's decision to bring forward Bill C-131, an Act to amend the Old Age Security Act, for second reading and debate in the House later today, and in view of the certainty that the effect of this Bill will place a further 100,000 poor and near poor elderly Canadians into abject poverty, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles):

That this House demand that the Government withdraw this shameful piece of legislation immediately and bring forward proposals that will provide our senior citizens with decent and adequate pensions.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

FISHERIES

SUGGESTED REFERRAL OF PEARSE REPORT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Donald W. Munro (Esquimalt-Saanich): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. In light of the equivocal answer on the Pearse Report given to me by the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans last week, as reported in Hansard for November 8 at page 20481, and in light of the rising tide of demands from the fishermen on the West Coast that the Report be more carefully examined before any implementation takes place, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Vancouver South (Mr. Fraser):

That the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans re-examine his priorities and responsibilities and have the Pearse Report referred, without further delay, to the Standing Committee on Fisheries and Forestry.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

INCOME TAX

PROVISION AFFECTING CORPORATE-OWNED LIFE INSURANCE

Mr. Walter McLean (Waterloo): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. The retention of our small private businesses and their orderly transfer to the next generation on the deaths of their owners are in the interest of the Canadian economy, rather than their forced sale to large corporate interests, often foreign-owned. However, the rollovers contained in the Income Tax Act to permit a tax-free transfer to the next generation are very limited, except in the case of farmers. Corporately owned life insurance used in conjunction with an appropriate buy-sell arrangement previously permitted a mechanism to effect a transfer without tax to the next generation. Therefore I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for Mississauga South (Mr. Blenkarn):

That the Minister of Finance reverse the Government's position, so that proceeds of corporate-owned life insurance purchased after June 28 be no longer credited to a company's capital dividend account.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

POLITICAL PARTIES

PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY POSITION ON SOCIAL SECURITY

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Prince Albert): Madam Speaker, I rise to move a motion under the provisions of Standing Order 43. Since the Conservative Premier of Saskatchewan, in an interview in Winnipeg on November 15, proclaimed his opposition to the universality of the Canada Pension Plan, I move, seconded by the Hon. Member for The Battlefords-Meadow Lake (Mr. Anguish):

That the Conservatives in this House be honest with the Canadian people, reverse their stated policy of refusing to outline their platform because they know Canadians would again reject them, and admit that the Conservative Party of Canada opposes the universality of Old Age Pensions and Family Allowances.

Madam Speaker: Is there unanimous consent for this motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

THE ECONOMY

CONTENTS OF PROPOSED NEW THRONE SPEECH

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister who will recall that he said recently:

The next Speech from the Throne will represent all that is innovative, bold and dynamic about the Liberal Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

• (1415)

Mr. Clark: I remind the Liberals who have applauded that they have applauded the introduction of 42 tax measures and have applauded the withdrawal of the same 42 tax measures from the budget.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Will there be new economic policies proposed in that Throne Speech?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): I think so, Madam Speaker.

STATEMENT MADE BY PRESIDENT OF THE PRIVY COUNCIL

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, perhaps the Prime Minister has not had time to be brought up to date on what his Government was planning in his absence, but he will know that on November 10, in a television interview, the interviewer, Pamela Wallin, asked the Government House Leader, "So, the Speech from the Throne is ready, is it?" Mr. Pinard answered, "Oh, yes. It is ready."

Since it is ready, since it will represent all that is bold and dynamic in the Liberal Party, and since the Prime Minister thinks he might do something to help Canadians who are suffering from economic hardship now, why is the Prime Minister waiting? If he has new economic measures to introduce, and if the Throne Speech is ready, why will he not introduce those measures now in order to help those Canadians in need?

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, what the Government House Leader was indicating—it must have been at some point before Parliament reconvened in October—

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Baker (Nepean-Carleton): November 10, Prime Minister.

Mr. Trudeau: The Hon. Members opposite laugh. I do not know the date of the statement to which the Leader of the Opposition is referring. Perhaps I could have him state the date and add to the hilarity of his Members.

STATE OF PREPAREDNESS OF THRONE SPEECH

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I see that the Prime Minister's sojourn in the Soviet Union has taught him a lot about the responsibility of leaders to respond in a democratic country. Let me suggest to him that, had he stayed, the country would have been better off.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Clark: Some say shame. I say that in all seriousness.

The date on which the Government House Leader said that the Throne Speech was ready was the day after the House of Commons met. The Throne Speech was ready then. Is the Throne Speech ready now?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, it was ready some time in mid October. We had envisaged the possibility of having the Throne Speech read at the end of the month of October. There was a speech ready. It can be made ready at any time. The House Leader attempted, in discussions with his opposite numbers, to see whether we would be able to make progress before the Christmas adjournment on the very important legislation which was already before the House in this session, particularly those measures relating to the last budget and the budget before.

The Leader of the Opposition knows, if he is being kept informed by his House Leader, that for the past two weeks now we have been attempting to get some agreement on a package of legislative measures which we would be able to clear away before reading the Throne Speech. I understand that there is no agreement on the package but that there has been progress on individual bills, several of which have been processed through the House.

It is still our hope that we will be able to deal with the backlog of measures arising from two or three budgets removed, before reading the Speech from the Throne. That does not mean that we have not acted on some of the measures which would have been announced in that Speech from the Throne.

REQUEST FOR ECONOMIC ACTION

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, what the Prime Minister or his colleague has been busy negotiating over the last little while is to try to get agreement in the Liberal Party on how they will vote on Bill C-133 and how they will vote on Canagrex. That is what he has been trying to negotiate over the last little while.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Clark: Let me return to what this Government will do to help Canadians who are suffering because of Liberal economic policy. The Prime Minister has promised that there will be bold and innovative action on the economy in the Throne Speech. His House Leader says that the Throne Speech is ready. Why does the Government wait for the Throne Speech to begin action to solve the economic problems of the country? Why will he not bring in economic action now to help the hundreds of thousands of Canadians who are in need and who are losing hope with each passing day?

• (1420)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): The Leader of the Opposition misses the point. The Throne Speech was ready. In view of the fact we did not begin the session with the Throne Speech, but, rather, postponed it, as I say, until we deal with this legislative backlog, we announced those measures, some by the Minister of Finance in his statement at the beginning of this part of the session. Another announcement which was to be in the Throne Speech was concerning the Royal Commission.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Trudeau: These are examples of measures taken, including one involving $1,100 million, which would have been in the Throne Speech had we proceeded with the Throne Speech. Therefore, the Leader of the Opposition really must be making great efforts not to grasp, but the instrument through which the announcements were made is secondary. The important thing is that the Government has been making announcements. It has been taking bold, innovative measures in order to deal with unemployment.

GOVERNMENT POLICY AFFECTING PRIVATE SECTOR

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. I remind the Minister that in his statement on basic economic principles of management, he said on October 27, "We must continue to rely firmly on the dynamism and the creativity of the private sector as the engine of growth in Canada".

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Blenkarn: Well, I am glad you are clapping, Doug.

He went on to say that we must improve the financial health of the private sector as well as its ability to expand and prosper. Since that time the only actions we have seen have been the allotment of $400 million to losing Crown corporations and $600 million to buy some service stations, and a further tax of $1.7 billion on employment. What further efforts have there been by the Minister of Finance to improve the health, dynamism and activity of the private sector?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, it is typical of those in the Conservative Party, I am afraid, that they would rather have a company owned by the British Government than owned by the people of Canada through their Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: However, putting that aside, I would like to remind the Hon. Member that, in the statement I made, I announced expenditures of $1.1 billion which will be directed toward job creation. I indicated that $400 million will be concentrated upon improvement of the railway system in western Canada. That will have a very significant impact on the private sector in terms of additional orders in the manufacturing sector all across Canada.

An Hon. Member: Quid pro quo.

Mr. Lalonde: In addition to the $500 million under the NEED Program, we have indicated that those funds would also be available to projects which could be sponsored in the private sector. Moreover, in my statement I announced a number of measures which were of a tax relieving nature to various sectors, small business in particular, which have made representations for relieving measures. All those measures are on the record and I would be very pleased to send a copy of my October 27 statement to the Hon. Member.

Mr. Blenkarn: The Minister will know that the cost to Canadians amounts to 47,000 person-years of employment because of his increase in unemployment insurance premiums alone. So much for his work-creating efforts.

INTEREST RATE LEVELS

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): I direct my supplementary question to the same Minister. Interest rates seem to be going up again. Unfortunately, they went up marginally again this week.

Some Hon. Members: Fortunately?

Mr. Blenkarn: Now we have a positive balance of payments at this point. Now, unfortunately, interest rates seem to be going up in the United States.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Blenkarn: In view of a more positive balance of payments condition because of decreasing imports into Canada, will he direct the Bank of Canada and the chartered banks to maintain the 13 per cent prime and a lower rate of interest in Canada so that we will not get back into the swing where Canadian interest rates run 2 per cent to 6 per cent above American rates, and so that we will be able to compete in the world market and private business will have the opportunity to finance?

• (1425)

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member made a number of statements. The first one having to do with the loss of jobs created by the increase in the unemployment insurance contributions is completely unsubstantiated and I challenge him to prove those figures. He just cannot do it. This is just taken out of thin air and he knows, or he should know, that he has no evidence whatever to support that statement.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: On the second point, Treasury Bills in the United States went up 60 points in the last month, 30 points in the last week. In Canada this week they have gone up three points, or three-tenths of 1 per cent. I am surprised that my hon. friend is expressing so much concern when I did not hear him mention the issue, for 14 weeks in a row, until this week, when we have had a significant decline in interest rates in Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: That is what we have done in the last 14 weeks.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lalonde: Finally, the answer to his direct question is no.

CORPORATE SHAREHOLDING LIMITATION ACT

EFFECT ON INVESTMENT OF QUEBEC PENSION FUNDS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. In 1965 the then Liberal Government in the Province of Québec created the Caisse de dépôt as an instrument for channelling Quebec pension funds into investments. The fund, then as now, is restricted to having no more than 30 per cent of the shares in any enterprise.

Considering that the Minister yesterday, before a Senate Committee, made the extraordinary assertion that Bill S-31 was necessary to stop the Caisse from creating socialism, I would like to ask him what does he mean by this when the Caisse cannot have more than 30 per cent of the shares in an enterprise on the one hand, and, secondly, what business is it of the federal Government to stop any duly elected provincial Government in Canada from creating as many public enterprises as it wants.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I may comment that the Hon. Member's question was preceded by a very long preamble, and that the Hon. Member is a little mixed up. Once more, and it would be useful if the Hon. Member would understand this, Bill S-31 is aimed at safeguarding federal jurisdiction over interprovincial and international transport. The purpose of the bill is not to prevent an institution such as the Caisse de dépôt or other financial institutions in Canada from investing. On the contrary, they are welcome to do so. They may invest, but these provincial institutions may not own more than 10 per cent of the shares.

In many cases, Madam Speaker, 10 per cent is a great deal, and we should also remember that the financial institution referred to by the Leader of the New Democratic Party was created for the purpose of managing funds and not with a view to taking risks and becoming an active shareholder. I think that by its actions and recent statements, the Caisse has clearly shown that it is going beyond the judicious investment of Quebec's pension fund and that it has now become a company that is taking risks and playing the market with the pension premiums of Quebecers. The risk factor is, of course, a matter that is entirely up to the Caisse. It can take risks if it wants to, but we think that in an area that falls under exclusive federal jurisdiction, that is, where interprovincial and international transport companies are concerned, it should not take more than 10 per cent of that risk.

[English]

REASONS FOR GOVERNMENT ACTION

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, there you have it, the ultimate in Liberal authoritarianism and paternalism, just what creates a lot of problems, not just in Quebec but all over the country.

• (1430)

Since the Minister is constitutionally quite correct that the federal Government has authority to regulate in this field, why does the Government not rely on regulation? If the Province of Quebec does something contrary to the national interest in terms of its activity in the transportation field, or any other Province does something that is contrary to the national interest, then take action. Why is the Government moving now to stop a provincial government from using its funds to create a public enterprise? Why is it prejudging the use of these funds?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, in my opinion we are certainly not prejudging or drawing conclusions in advance. The bill is not aimed at preventing any normal activity by companies that are controlled by provincial governments. We have clearly established the rules of the game in an area that falls under federal jurisdiction, precisely because we want to avoid coming back later with legislation that would take effect retroactively. I see the bill as a preventive measure being taken by the government that is entirely appropriate in the present circumstances. As for reactions to the bill and recent statements by the President of the Caisse, who said that he had $1 billion to invest over the next four years in transport companies—well, let him invest them. One Member in the House has suggested that the Caisse purchase Québecair. He can go right ahead. He has our permission. He can go and invest in any Canadian company he likes, but we say that he may not invest in more than 10 per cent of capital shares in companies involved in interprovincial and international transport.

[English]

FUTURE OF QUEBEC INVESTMENT PLANS

Hon. Edward Broadbent (Oshawa): Madam Speaker, what hypocrisy. Just a few minutes ago the Minister's colleague took pride in the fact that we have a publicly- and federally-owned Petro-Canada. This Minister is now saying that no Province can take similar public action. That is sheer and utter hypocrisy. It is all right for the CPR or Exxon to have more than 20 per cent, more than 10 per cent in the shares of transportation companies, but the Minister says it is not all right for the Province of Quebec. That is totally unacceptable in a democracy.

To get back to a mere matter of dollars and cents that the Minister perhaps understands, is he aware that the President of the Caisse has said that this regrettable authoritarian decision of the federal Government will possibly cost the people of the Province of Quebec some $100 million because the Caisse was planning to invest in excess of $1 billion in transportation over the next four years? Is the Minister further aware that, as a result of this reprehensible action of the federal Government, if it gets away with it, instead of investing in transportation in Canada, the Caisse may have to take its money and invest in Europe or the United States? Is that desirable?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, we should take a close look at the statement made by the President of the Caisse. I find that what he said was grossly exaggerated and without any basis in fact. Clearly, the President of the Caisse did not read the bill and did not understand it, if he is under the impression that he could lose that amount of money, since he is free to invest in any Canadian company, and can continue to do so in interprovincial and international transport companies for up to a maximum of 10 per cent of their shares. He therefore has tremendous investment opportunities, and he should take advantage of them. This threat that the Caisse will go and invest the money elsewhere is, as my hon. colleague said, blackmail, and it is typical of the series of comments we have had from two provincial politicians, Mr. Clair and Mr. Parizeau, who objected to this bill and whose erroneous statements proved to be totally unfounded. I may add that this is the third statement masterminded by the Parti Québécois government and it is as erroneous and unfounded as the others.

AIR TRANSPORT

FUTURE OF QUÉBECAIR

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. I hope the minister will ignore what the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs said about letting the Caisse de dépôt invest in Québecair. Last week, I believe the Minister of Transport had a very serious discussion with his Quebec counterpart. According to the press, there was an undertaking that within ten days, the federal Minister of Transport would be making a public statement on a proposal that, it seems, would help save Québecair. Can the minister inform the House whether this deadline will be observed and what kind of proposal he intends to make?

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): In fact, Madam Speaker, on the subject of investments by the Quebec government in Québecair, I would like to inform the House that we have exempted Québecair from the provisions of Bill S-31, and consequently, the government of Quebec may invest in Québecair as much at it likes. And why did we do that? Simply because it was clear to everyone that the purpose of this legislation is to prohibit a province from having an interest in an interprovincial carrier that might be prejudicial to the interests of another province. Since that was not the case with Québecair, there was no reason why we should not grant an exemption in this case. I think that is clear. As for my discussions with Mr. Clair, I would like to point out that Mr. Clair has given me a series of ultimatums which have changed substantially in the course of time, because the most recent one was to get him out of the mess he got himself into when, in July 1981, the Quebec government undertook to prevent a merger of the two carriers—I am referring to Nordair and Québecair—that was being planned at the time.

The Quebec government was no longer responsible at that point, but it poured $15 million into Québecair and as a result became involved, for better or for worse. For worse, as it turned out. And now, Mr. Clair's ultimatum is that I should get him out of this mess. Some ultimatum. However, I will try to—

Madam Speaker: Order, please! The Member for Joliette, with a supplementary.

INQUIRY WHETHER MINISTER INTENDS TO SAVE QUÉBECAIR

Hon. Roch La Salle (Joliette): Madam Speaker, I am very sorry to see that government Members are applauding the present situation at Québecair. My question is as follows. In my view, the minister was not clear, and he did not answer my question. Considering the policy on regional transport the minister is to announce shortly, and considering that the minister is well aware of the situation at Québecair and the rate of unemployment in Quebec, could the minister have the decency to stop attacking others and inform the House whether this policy will contain a proposal that will enable this company to take its place among air transport carriers in Canada, and will save the jobs of 900 employees? Today, that is what counts.

Hon. Jean-Luc Pepin (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that is exactly what I said in reply to the previous question. Perhaps my hon. friend failed to hear what I said then. That is exactly what I shall be bearing in mind, namely, saving as many jobs as possible for Québecair employees, in drafting the proposal I shall be making within the next few days, but of course, I do not have the kind of authority Mr. Clair has to send out ultimatums or replies to ultimatums. I am consulting my colleagues about the proposal I intend to make. I do not like the ultimatum approach at all. I think it is undignified, but I am preparing this reply, and I shall be sending it to Mr. Clair as soon as possible, which will be very shortly.

FISHERIES

PEARSE COMMISSION REPORT—RECOMMENDATIONS AFFECTING WEST COAST FISHERMEN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. It concerns the Pearse report on the West Coast fishery. On October 27 the Minister was asked by the Hon. Member for Richmond-South Delta if he was intending to recommend action to Cabinet on the Pearse Report, and he answered, "as soon as possible". On November 8, replying to the Hon. Member for Esquimalt-Saanich, the Minister said, "I hope to be starting the implementation of Pearse's recommendations in the very near future." Last week a fisheries conference held in Victoria resolved that "no policy action should be taken until the proposed Pacific Fisheries Council is in place and it has an opportunity to develop carefully considered views on each issue."

• (1440)

Because it is causing great concern on the West Coast, can the Minister give this House assurance that there will in fact be no implementation of Dr. Pearse's recommendations until the Fisheries Council can advise the Minister what recommendations, and the timing thereof, are appropriate for government action?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to inform the Hon. Member that I will be on the Pacific Coast this weekend, and will be meeting with the Fisheries Council. I have met with Dr. Pearse, the President of the Commission of Inquiry. We have done a lot of work in the Department assessing each of the over 300 recommendations which he has made, and I can tell the Hon. Member that I will be moving to implement as many of the recommendations of Dr. Pearse as possible in very close consultation with the Pacific Fisheries Council, and I hope to be able to make a statement on this matter as soon as possible.

REQUEST THAT COMMITTEE STUDY REPORT BEFORE ACTION TAKEN

Hon. John A. Fraser (Vancouver South): Madam Speaker, of course the Minister will know that the fishermen on the West Coast want a very different kind of council than the Minister is speaking of, and it is that newly formed Council which wants to discuss the matter with the Minister.

On November 16 the Hon. Member for Surrey-White Rock-North Delta asked the Minister if he could deny that he intended to implement the Pearse recommendations before Christmas. The Minister replied, "I would not be able at this time to make a definite answer." My question to the Minister, and it is a serious one, and I think a fair one, is to ask whether the Minister is prepared to hold off action until the House Fisheries Committee can consider the Pearse Report and consider the position of the fishermen and the industry.

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, on the first part of the question of the Hon. Member, the organizational body which we have at the moment to advise the Minister represents the different segments and the different regions of the fisheries industry on the Pacific Coast and, of course, if those different representatives are of the opinion that we could devise a more representative organization, I am ready to hear every suggestion in that regard.

On the question of the implementation—as you know, the 300 recommendations are very different in scope and consequence, et cetera. I think there are a good number of them which are non-contentious and I can move on these recommendations after having assured myself to what extent the different organizations support them. I do not think it would be wise on my part to say today that I will not implement any of those 300 recommendations, even those which are of the "motherhood" type, without going through the various processes. All I can tell you is that I will assume my responsibility. I know that in some particular instances, such as the licensing and the bidding points, there is a lot of contention, and, obviously, I will not be moving without very careful consultation.

KIRBY TASK FORCE RECOMMENDATIONS—MINISTER'S DISCUSSIONS WITH EAST COAST COUNTERPARTS

Hon. James A. McGrath (St. John's East): Madam Speaker, I have a related question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The Minister was in the Atlantic Provinces last week. He met with some of his counterparts. Did he discuss with them the recommendations of the Kirby Task Force? Was there a consensus arising out of these discussions? Otherwise, can the Minister tell the House what he did discuss?

Hon. Pierre De Bané (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Yes, Madam Speaker, I did have the pleasure of meeting with my counterparts in New Brunswick, P.E.I. and Newfoundland. I hope in the next few days to go to Nova Scotia also.

As for the Province which my hon. friend represents, I can tell him that I had a very positive meeting with the Minister of Fisheries, Mr. Morgan, and with Premier Peckford, and what I told them about those matters of federal jurisdiction in fisheries, was that the Prime Minister and my predecessor acted a year ago, and that a Cabinet committee is studying the report. I received the final draft of the Kirby Report about a week ago, and we have not lost time. I know there are other sectors which are of provincial jurisdiction, such as the processing plants, and there, too, I am very positive.

In a nutshell, I can tell you what I have said to Premier Peckford: I would like to integrate the Newfoundland dimension and to give it an essential part in the fisheries policy of my Department on the Atlantic. On the other hand, I expect from him understanding and co-operation with respect to the broad national perspective also. I was glad when he told me he understands it is a two-way street, and I said exactly that.

CULTURAL AFFAIRS

WOMEN'S REPRESENTATION—OMISSION FROM COMMITTEE RECOMMENDATIONS

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Communications. Many women's organizations presented briefs to the Applebaum-Hébert Committee documenting inequalities in earnings for women artists, the under-representation of women in policy making, on juries making grants, and correlation between the under-representation of women on juries and grants actually made, and the frequent rejection of women's issues and ideas in programming.

Of the 101 recommendations made in this report, not one addresses these problems. I would like to ask the Minister what he is prepared to do now to see these concerns are seriously addressed and measures are taken to remedy them?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, as the Hon. Member points out, a number of submissions were made to the Applebaum-Hébert Committee along the lines the Hon. Member has just indicated. I believe many of those statements or positions were reflected in the first report issued by Applebaum-Hébert, which was a compendium of the views presented to it. While none of the 101 recommendations addressed that particular point, I think there are passages in the Applebaum-Hébert Report where they do indeed note the fact that there is under-representation, both on boards, commissions, and within juries established within the various agencies.

As I have indicated in the House when the Applebaum-Hébert Report became public, it is our intention to review the Report. We would like to see a very important in-depth debate on the Report. Obviously there are some areas where other points of view should be made and improvements can indeed be made on parts of the Report. We will look at those suggestions with an open mind.

MINISTER'S POSITION

Ms. Lynn McDonald (Broadview-Greenwood): Madam Speaker, surely the Applebaum-Hébert Committee is not blind. They were able to read the briefs which were brought before it, and they do admit some of these problems exist. I would suggest to the Minister that the test of a commitment to equality is when some practical problem comes up. It is not enough just to put it into the Charter of Rights. I would remind the Minister there has been a commitment made very specifically in the United Nations Convention on the elimination of all forms of discrimination against women. Is the Minister going to stand with this Convention and the Charter of Rights, or is he going to continue to agree with Applebaum-Hébert that this sorry state of affairs is quite acceptable? Is he actually going to do something practical to address these questions and not merely admit they exist?

Hon. Francis Fox (Minister of Communications): Madam Speaker, the record of this Government is indeed to address practical problems in a practical way.

Mr. Clark: Name one.

Mr. Fox: If there is in the Canadian Constitution what our American colleagues refer to as an Equal Rights Amendment, that is due to the efforts of the Members on this side of the House. Obviously it is a principle to which we are committed and a principle upon which we act on a daily basis, in good part through the help of my colleague, the minister responsible for the status of women.

PUBLIC SERVICE

GOVERNMENT INTENTIONS WITH RESPECT TO INDEXED PENSIONS

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the President of the Treasury Board I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. As the Prime Minister knows, Bill C-133, which is an Act to amend the Supplementary Retirement Benefits Act, has been on the Order Paper for some time. Some Members of his Party have spoken publicly against the Bill and said they would not support it. I know there are others who have not spoken publicly. I should like to know that the intentions of the Prime Minister and the Government are with respect to that Bill. Do they intend to proceed with the Bill as part of the Government's legislative program, or do they intend to withdraw that Bill?

• (1450)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I know for a fact that this bill has been put on the list to which I referred earlier in the Question Period, that is, the list of bills on which we would like to negotiate a timetable with Opposition House Leaders. Therefore, we intend to proceed with the Bill, but at a time that we hope will be determined through discussion and negotiation.

EFFECT OF AMENDING LEGISLATION

Hon. Walter Baker (Nepean-Carleton): Madam Speaker, I take it that what the Prime Minister is saying is that the Government now intends to proceed with the Bill in its present form. If that is so, is he aware of the commitment he and the former President of the Treasury Board made that "—the federal Government remains dedicated to the principle that public servants' pensions are to be protected from inflation"? Is he not aware that this Bill is a breach of that contract and agreement, and is seen as such?

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I regret to observe that the Hon. Member does not seem to have understood, in any sense, the meaning of the six and five program which was introduced in the June budget. The Hon. Member talks of protection against inflation. It is to protect Old Age Pensions and Family Allowances against inflation that the Government introduced indexation many years ago. As we have explained many times in discussion of the six and five program, our objective is to see that inflation does reach 6 per cent next year and 5 per cent the year after. In that sense, all those who accept a reduction in advance to six and five will be contributing to something that the whole country seems to want. The whole country, except perhaps some Hon. Members opposite, seems to agree that 6 per cent inflation is better than 12 per cent, and that if Canadians want to reach 6 per cent collectively, they can do it.

THE ECONOMY

CONVENING OF FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE OF FINANCE MINISTERS

Mr. Ray Chénier (Timmins-Chapleau): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. Lately there have been suggestions that a federal-provincial conference on the economy should be held. I should like to know if the Minister of Finance could inform the House if he will be inviting his provincial counterparts to a federal-provincial conference of Finance Ministers in the near future.

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Yes, Madam Speaker, there have been suggestions to that effect. I have, indeed, been in touch with my provincial colleagues and have suggested that there be a conference of Ministers of Finance on December 17. I have received positive answers from nine Ministers, and I hope the tenth positive answer will arrive soon.

INQUIRY RESPECTING POSSIBLE FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Just the other day the Acting Prime Minister said he would not advocate a federal-provincial conference on the economy. When did the Government change its mind, and why?

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, quite clearly I have indicated that we were going to have a federal-provincial conference of Ministers of Finance. The Leader of the Opposition was asking about a conference of First Ministers, the other day. I am amazed—well, I am not amazed; it is par for the course that the Leader of the Opposition cannot make a distinction between a conference of Ministers of Finance and a conference of First Ministers.

ENVIRONMENTAL AFFAIRS

REQUEST FOR RECONSTITUTION OF SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE ON ACID RAIN

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of the Environment. I am sure the Minister is aware and that he shares with me a great concern over the serious acid rain problem. We know this is an ongoing and serious problem. I would point out to the Minister that all Members of the former Special Subcommittee on Acid Rain have recommended the reconstitution of that Committee on an ongoing basis. I would further point out that the precedent exists for this in the continuation of the Subcommittee on the Disabled. The reconstitution of the Committee on this basis would provide ongoing and very important assistance to the Minister. I therefore ask the Minister if he will take immediate steps to see that this important Subcommittee is reconstituted.

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, it is not for me to direct the Committee, but I would certainly welcome a decision by its Members to establish such a sub-committee and to continue with the work it has done in the past. The work done by the Subcommittee has been extremely valuable and helpful. Now that a new Congress has been elected in the United States I think it would be a great opportunity for Members on all sides of the House to take our important concern about acid rain to Congress. That is one of the functions that such a sub-committee might be able to pursue.

As far as I am concerned I would welcome such an event if it were to take place, but it is in the hands of the Members of that Committee if they wish to reconstitute it in that way.

Mr. Darling: Madam Speaker, I am certainly delighted to hear the comments of the Minister on this subject.

PARLIAMENTARY PHOENIX?

Mr. Stan Darling (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Madam Speaker, the Minister is aware that he has had representations from the Chairman of the Committee and all Members of the Committee. I, personally, wrote to him about this some months ago. We were under the impression that the directive would have to come from the Minister and that the Minister would probably have to seek the permission of the House.

Am I to understand that we can rise from the ashes and become an active committee again?

Mr. Lawrence: Rise from the acid!

Hon. John Roberts (Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, I do not know whether the Hon. Member can rise from the ashes.

Mr. Cullen: He will have to get his "ash in gear".

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Roberts: My hon. colleague has made a comment which I think I ought not to repeat.

All I can say is that if Members engage in that very useful activity I would welcome it. If there is some impression that I am resistant to such an idea, that impression is entirely false. It is not the Minister who directs the work of the Committee. I would suggest that the Steering Committee should meet and seek a House order for that purpose.

PUBLIC SERVICE

SUPERANNUATION FUND SURPLUS

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): Madam Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Finance. As a result of the June 1982 budget, it was announced that Bill C-133 would be implemented and that this would restrict increases in the Public Service pension plan by 6 per cent and 5 per cent for the next two years.

For the last year I have had a question on the Order Paper in an attempt to determine the amount of surplus in the Public Service superannuation fund. Would the Minister confirm that that surplus is in the neighbourhood of $14 billion? If that is true, can he explain why he is imposing the six and five program on people whose average pension is $8,000 per year, and on spouses drawing a Public Service pension whose income is only $3,000 per year?

[Translation]

Hon. Marc Lalonde (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I am not in a position to confirm the figure given by the Hon. Member, but I shall check exactly what the figures are. What I can confirm, however, is that indexing pensions of public servants is costing the Consolidated Revenue Fund—in other words, Canadian taxpayers—several hundreds of millions of dollars, and that the indexing subsidy is not taken from the contributions of public servants or the government's employer contribution but from the Government of Canada which collects taxes from all Canadians. So I would remind the Hon. Member that all Canadian taxpayers are contributing to indexing, and that what we are asking in this bill is that retired public servants share in the general effort being made throughout the country by all citizens to reduce inflation and stimulate the economy, and both pensioners and the rest of Canada will benefit.

[English]

Mr. Murphy: Of course, by separating the supplementary pension plan from the superannuation plan, the Government makes it look as if the indexing is costing taxpayers some money. That $14 billion surplus means that the Government is still ripping off retired Civil Servants.

REQUEST FOR FREE VOTE ON AMENDING LEGISLATION

Mr. Rod Murphy (Churchill): My supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister, Madam Speaker. In an earlier response to a question put by a Member of the Conservative Party he spoke about the fact that that Party did not support the six and five program. He is wrong, Madam Speaker; it did support the six and five program.

My question relates to support within the Prime Minister's own caucus. This morning the Deputy Speaker said on radio that he would not support Bill C-133. Other Liberal backbenchers have indicated the same thing. Is the Prime Minister willing to let those Members have a free vote on that legislation in the House, even though it could bring down the Government, if the Conservatives show up to vote?

• (1500)

Right Hon. P. E. Trudeau (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, the Hon. Member is misquoting what I said just a few minutes ago. I did not say that he, that Member of the NDP, does not support the six and five, nor did I even say that the Hon. Member for Nepean-Carleton did not support it. I said that I did not think he understood the philosophy and reason behind the six and five, that generally we are attempting to create a six per cent society of prosperity in Canada next year, and that a lot of people are co-operating and willing to take the risk that Canada will be at a six per cent rate of inflation. That is the object, and that is what I was saying to these Members to whom the Hon. Member referred. I am sure that is something they will understand too.

I have not been involved in the discussions which the Hon. Member seems to know about, but it is something I have been trying to explain; as a matter of fact I did three television programs on it.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, I should like to address the usual Thursday question to the Government House Leader and ask him what will be the business for today, tomorrow and as far into next week as possible.

In light of the fact that in the ten useful Government sitting days since returning we have disposed of eight pieces of legislation, I am wondering, since the Government seems to attach great urgency to Bill C-133 relating to the pensions of public servants, whether he will bring it forward tomorrow so that we could deal with it expeditiously.

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, on the last point I am surprised that my colleague did not request that permission this morning when we met. It is a surprise to me. I am open-minded to such a suggestion, as I have been since the beginning of this part of the session on October 27. This is the first time I have had a firm proposal on a specific Bill. As he knows, I have submitted a list of 17 Bills to him and I am awaiting his answer in terms of a reasonable timetable to dispose of any of those Bills, including Bill C-133. As I say, this is the first time I have heard a specific suggestion on one of those Bills, but I deplore the fact that it was not raised in time for me to establish the business for next week.

In answer to the usual Thursday question on House business for the coming days, I will take into consideration the constructive suggestion of the Hon. Member, hopefully within a reasonable length of time. Today we will be dealing with Bill C-95, which will provide some money for the Calgary Olympics, followed by Bill C-131, capping the Old Age Security Act, and tomorrow the first item of business will be Bill C-119, then Bill C-96 and Bill C-12.

[Translation]

As far as the business of the House for next week is concerned, Madam Speaker, on Monday the first item on the agenda will be Bill C-91, to amend the Public Works Act and Public Lands Grants Act. Still on Monday, this legislation will be followed by Bill C-98, to amend the Canada Agricultural Products Standards Act. This legislation will be of considerable interest to our farmers. Tuesday, will be an opposition day, and on Wednesday and Thursday we shall be considering only those bills arising from the last budget, with preference being given to bills reported back to the House by the various committees. The House is aware that two bills arising from the last budget are now at the committee stage. They concern legislation to reduce interest rates for farmers and small businesses, and so if the report is on time, priority will be given on Wednesday to third reading of these bills. Subsequently, still on Wednesday and Thursday, we shall be considering Bill C-131 and C-132, and if we should run out of items on the order paper on one of those days, I am sure the Opposition will be glad to hear that the Canagrex Bill will be kept in reserve to occupy the final minutes of the sittings of the House. For the time being, Mr. Speaker, that is the business of the House for today and up to and including next Thursday. As usual, I can inform the House, in reply to the customary question, that all this is subject to change, on reasonable notice.

[English]

Mr. Nielsen: Madam Speaker, what prompted me to suggest today dealing with Bill C-133, the capping of Public Service pensions, were the remarks of the Prime Minister and the seemingly urgent ranking which he attached to that legislation. That is the reason it was not raised this morning.

The Government House Leader has asked for agreement on a timetable, but I do not think he would quarrel with the fact that the passage of almost one Bill per day in ten days is a pretty speedy record of dealing with Government legislation and passing it, notwithstanding filibusters such as that launched by the Minister of State for Finance the other night on his own legislation; he tried to prevent it from going through.

Rather than dealing with the legislation proposed by the Government House Leader for tomorrow, namely Bill C-119, an Act to repeal certain statutes, which is housekeeping legislation at its very minimum, and Bill C-96, the Financial Administration Act, if there is that degree of urgency and if the Government is serious about Bill C-133, the capping of Public service pensions, I invite the Government to bring it forward. It has the assurance of the Official Opposition that we will deal with it extremely expeditiously.

Mr. Deans: Madam Speaker, first of all I am surprised that the House Leader of the Conservative Party has attempted to negotiate on the floor of the House after the many times he chastised me for similar kinds of things. However, I suggest that if the Government would like to call Bill C-133, of course we would be prepared to deal with it, but we certainly do not intend to deal with it expeditiously.

[Translation]

Mr. Pinard: Madam Speaker, I have taken note of the representations made by my hon. colleagues opposite, and my conclusion is that the Hon. Members would like to be able to do my job. I am afraid, however, that for the next three years they will have to let the Government decide what will be on the agenda.

PETITIONS

MR. GREENAWAY—CALL FOR INSTALLATION OF MAIL BOX IN LILLOOET, B.C.

Mr. Lorne Greenaway (Cariboo-Chilcotin): Madam Speaker, it is my duty to present a petition signed by 338 citizens of Lillooet in the Cariboo-Chilcotin riding of British Columbia.

The purpose of this petition is to cause the Canada Post Corporation to instal a street letter box at the Old Mill Shopping Plaza in Lillooet. The petitioners have been trying to obtain a letter box for the past 14 months without success. The nature of the petition is to demand that the Minister responsible for the Canada Post Corporation instruct the Chief Executive Officer to instal a letter box at the Old Mill Plaza.

• (1510)

The petitioners hope that, in your examination of the petition, you will find it in order and that you will exercise the discretionary powers vested in the office of Speaker of the House to allow discussion at the earliest possible time in order that the citizens of Lillooet may finally obtain their long sought mail box.

MR. FULTON—TESTING OF CRUISE MISSILE ON CANADIAN SOIL

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition from the residents of northern British Columbia. This petition deals with their widespread concern about the issue of disarmament and peace. These residents also request that the federal Government's plan to allow the American Cruise missile testing in Canada is contrary to their goal of disarmament and peace. Therefore, the petitioners humbly pray that the federal Government will end its agreement with the American military to test the Cruise missile on Canadian soil.

Order Paper Questions

OLD AGE SECURITY ACT

AMENDMENT TO CHANGE TITLE OF ACT

Mr. D. M. Collenette (York East) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-663, to amend the Old Age Security Act.

Some Hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Collenette: Madam Speaker, the purpose of this Bill is to change the name of the Old Age Security Act to the "Senior Citizens' Benefits Act", thereby striking from the existing Act the words "old age" which, in my view, discriminate against many senior citizens by suggesting that they, at the age of 65, are no longer capable of leading a productive life and are no longer capable of making a valuable contribution to Canadian society. This kind of change is even more important today as Canada's population rapidly gets older.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Mr. Smith: I ask, Madam Speaker, that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Stevens: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Once again I ask the Parliamentary Secretary to the President of the Privy Council to explain to the House if he can, why question No. 2,042 which was originally posed in January, 1981, with respect to the Prime Minister's December-January 1980-1981 world tour has not yet been answered. The Prime Minister has just been to Moscow. Do I have to ask a question similar to question No. 2,042 for all of the Prime Minister's trips? Perhaps the Parliamentary Secretary can tell me what the specific reason is why the Canadian people are being denied the truth as to what these trips are costing.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, there is certainly no suggestion of the Government wanting to hide the truth on this or other questions of this nature. At this point in time we have answered 82 per cent of the questions put on the Order Paper in this session. I will, of course, be delighted to look into this matter on behalf of the Hon. Member.

Mr. Murphy: Madam Speaker, I also rise on a point of order. I have a question outstanding on the Order Paper, No. 3,487, which I asked on November 26, 1981. It is with regard to the Public Service Superannuation Account and I inquired about the windfall profits which the Government realized on those accounts. I believe the Government is making these gains because it is paying only 11 per cent on the accounts while the Government would normally have to borrow money at 13 per cent. Those questions covered by Order Paper question No. 3,487 must be answered before Bill C-133 is introduced into this House; otherwise we will be unable to have any logical and clear debate on the matter. It is my understanding that the Government has in excess of $14 billion in that account at this time. We would like question No. 3,487 answered before we debate Bill C-133.

Mr. Smith: Madam Speaker, I do not recall having looked into the progress of the answers to that particular question. I would be happy to do so on behalf of the Hon. Member.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker: The questions enumerated by the Parliamentary Secretary have been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

ATHLETIC CONTESTS AND EVENTS POOLS ACT

MEASURE TO PROVIDE GOVERNMENT OPERATED POOL SYSTEMS

Hon. Gerald Regan (for the Secretary of State) moved that Bill C-95, An Act to provide for Government operated pool systems on combinations of athletic contests and events and to amend the Criminal Code and the Income Tax Act, be read the second time and referred to the Standing Committee on Communications and Culture.

He said: Madam Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate on Bill C-95, I want to urge all Hon. Members of the House to support it. The legislation has been in the House having received first reading nearly a year ago. I believe it is very important in relation to a number of worth-while causes.

May I say that the first idea of such legislation came to me at some period after a group of very bright and ambitious young men from Calgary visited my office shortly after I had assumed the office of Minister responsible for fitness and amateur sport in the spring of 1980. Their idea was for Canada to host the Winter Olympics in the west with Calgary being the site, in the same way that the east was the host of the Summer Olympics, the site being Montreal back in 1976, which was a very successful occurrence. At that time these young men outlined to me what would be necessary in relation to financing from the federal Government, from the provincial Government and from the municipality in hosting the 1988 Winter Olympics if Calgary were to be successful in its bid to have the Winter Olympics awarded to Canada.

In the course of my discussion I made it quite plain that in these times it was not possible to contemplate the amount of money necessary for this worth-while purpose being provided from tax dollars. With the levels of taxation as they have to be in a country of this type in order to provide the many public services that are demanded and with so many demands on those moneys, it was not a practical undertaking for the Government of Canada to pay, out of moneys derived from taxes, the amount of support that would be necessary if these games were to take place.

I indicated, however, that it seemed to me it was the responsibility of a national government to co-operate in a worth-while project of this type. Not only had the Summer Olympics been tremendously successful in the development of our amateur sport relating to summer sports, but this occasion would give an opportunity for the advancement of our athletes who participate in winter sports in the same way. Not only would the Winter Olympics be beneficial from the point of view of the vast improvement in facilities which would be available after the games to the general public, but also the holding of the Winter Olympics in the west would have a permanently beneficial effect on winter tourism in this country.

It is a sad comment that Canada has lagged far behind the United States in relation to being able to attract winter tourists for skiing and for other winter sports, despite the absolute excellence of our facilities and the obvious nature of our climate. This provides a great opportunity for attention to be centred in 1988 on the western Canadian Rocky Mountains and upon the advantages of that area for winter tourism.

I said that I felt that it would be possible for the Government to examine non-tax sources of revenue. I had earlier felt that it was unfortunate that the Government of Canada had given up the source of funds that had paid for a very large portion—retrospectively—of the cost of the Montreal Summer Olympics when the Government moved out of the lottery field, abandoned Loto Canada and gave it entirely to the Provinces.

However, when this Government came to office it undertook to examine that decision which had previously been made and reconsider whether the Government of Canada should go back into the lottery business. It was obvious that the Provinces were not very enthusiastic, to say the least, about the federal Government returning to the lottery field. Yet there remains a very real need for a source of funds that do not come from taxes that could be available to help the national Government meet its responsibilities in relation to sports, culture and, as this Bill provides, additional funding for the support of medical research.

If I may begin with the question of sports, I believe that it is quite clear that under the agreement which exists between the federal Government and the Provinces on the method of operation, the federal Government has the responsibility of supporting athletes at least at national and international levels of competence in the same way that the Provinces bear the responsibility of developing their excellent athletes on that level. In the same manner that Provinces have found it extremely important to have a source of revenue that is non-tax in nature to meet some of those responsibilities which they have for their portion of such undertakings, there is a very real need at the national level for the Government of Canada to find such a source of revenue.

The costs of supporting artists in the cultural area and the costs of supporting our athletes and staging events as well as sending teams to international competitions have vastly increased. It is not reasonable to call upon tax dollars as the source of greatly increased financing for those causes, no matter how worth-while they may be.

Recognizing that the Provinces had occupied the lottery field, we searched very hard and conducted a considerable amount of research to determine how the federal Government might raise funds for these causes without, if you like, stepping squarely on the toes of the Provinces. We came up with the sports pool system that exists in most countries and which has been found to be attractive to the public, a good source of entertainment and a harmless form of entertainment. When I say "harmless form of entertainment", I use the words from the Royal Commission in Britain that investigated all aspects of gaming in that country. It gave a very laudatory approval to sports pools.

We considered the use of sports pools because they were popular in other countries and we had every reason to believe that they would be popular in this country, since it involves a voluntary contribution of about $1 by those people who choose to participate and research showed that they would have little, if any, impact upon support for the provincially-run lotteries. In the interest of maintaining good relations with the Provinces, we particularly wanted to find an area that would interfere to a minimum with the field they occupied, whatever we might have felt about the rightness of the Government also to participate in the lottery field.

That is the history behind which this Bill came into existence. I do not know whether Hon. Members are aware of the fact that our research also showed that low-income groups do not, as is sometimes the general impression, participate in these pools more than others. Before establishing the program we carefully considered the involvement of lower income groups. Our studies indicated that all income groups spend approximately one-third of 1 per cent of their annual income on lottery and raffle tickets. The most basic finding is, however, that the expenditure on games comes from the entertainment component of the family budget and does not compete with the essentials.

The sports pool is not a tax, as taxes are imposed or levied on the public. Consumer participation in the sports pool is strictly voluntary and allows for conscious funding by the population of those activities which they may not otherwise decide to support. It is a question of voluntary participation. The people of this country are proud of our artists and our athletes. We are all very pleased when Steve Podborski wins the world championship in downhill skiing or when Ken Reid does so well. We are all proud of Susan Nattrass, Jerry Sorensen and the junior hockey team which won the world championship last year, and we are proud of many other Canadian artists and athletes.

Mr. Dionne (Northumberland-Miramichi): What about the University of Moncton?

Mr. Regan: We are also very proud of the team from the University of Moncton.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, during the next eighteen months Canadians will be attending a number of sports events, both national and international, and it is very important, and the Federal Government has a duty, to help Canadian athletes prepare for these events. When our athletes participate in sports events abroad, they do not do so as Ontarians, Quebecers or Newfoundlanders but as Canadians. It is therefore entirely legitimate and in the interest of our athletes that the Government of Canada should have an important role to play with respect to these events. Thousands of young Canadians will be training for and taking part in qualifying meets and many will later be competing in the events themselves.

The main events I am thinking of are the Student Games in Edmonton in 1983; the Canada Games in Quebec, in the Lac Saint-Jean area, in February 1983; and finally, the Summer Olympics in Los Angeles in 1984. To prepare for these events, we shall have to set up training centres in co-operation with the provinces, organize courses for instructors, finance travel expenses and take on a host of other responsibilities as well. The Ministry of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) conducted a survey, some time ago, on fitness in Canada. This past summer we published the preliminary results of the survey which provide basic data on fitness levels and living habits of Canadians.

Using the survey data, Fitness Canada will establish priorities and formulate policy to ensure that the needs of Canadians in the very important area of physical fitness are met. It is clear that the revenue from the sports pool system, part of which will be allocated to Canada Fitness and Amateur Sport, will help us to achieve that objective.

• (1530)

[English]

I believe that these athletes do deserve our support and this is the way we can move in that direction. I emphasize again that the nature of the sports pool is very different from that of a lottery, and that appeals to a different group of people.

Let me make a very important point on the entertainment side. If one buys a raffle ticket or a lottery ticket, one buys a number, waits, and eventually finds out whether one has won or lost. The sports pools are different. First, one applies one's skills. If one is a person who follows the games closely, a person who knows sports and is a former great athlete like the Hon. Member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski)—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Regan: —then one is in a much better position to gauge what the scores will be in the particular events than a person who perhaps does not have as much background or ability. That is the first part. One is applying an element of skill.

The other point is that, as a consequence of having participated in the choices of what the scores will be, one then follows the games more closely and watches for the outcome with interest. That is exactly the way it works in England where people watch soccer games on television and watch for the results with very keen interest. It results in a greater level of support for sport than would otherwise be the case.

In this circumstance, our legislation provides that the revenue derived from this purpose must be used in the following fields. I would refer Hon. Members to Clause 18(3)(a), (b) and (c), which states:

(3) There may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to or for the support of any one or more of

(a) activities in the following fields:

(i) the arts and culture,

(ii) fitness and amateur sport, and

(iii) medical research,

(b) the 1988 Calgary Olympic games, and

(c) worthy capital projects of national interest in the fields described in subparagraphs (a)(i) and (ii), so much of any amounts paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund pursuant to this section as is appropriate by Parliament for the purpose of this subsection.

Therefore, the revenues will be limited to those very worthwhile purposes.

I must tell Your Honour my main reason for pressing for this legislation, and I say the "main" reason because I believe there are other important causes, such as the need for funding medical research and support of our amateur athletes and our culture. However, I must be honest and say that my greatest reason for pressing forward is that I believe that, in the same way the public of Canada supported the Summer Olympics in Montreal through Loto Canada it is equally important to recognize that the people of Canada would be prepared to give real support through the Government of Canada to the magnificent undertaking of a wonderful group of people who will stage the Winter Olympics in western Canada in the Calgary region. It is for that reason that I believe it is urgent to pass the legislation quickly.

With reference to the amount of commitment which is required, Calgary calculates that it will need $200 million in 1982-83 dollars in order to stage the Olympics. By 1988, that might amount to a great deal more because of the indexing factor. The Province of Alberta, under the enthusiastic leadership of Premier Lougheed, is fully behind this project and is participating fully. The City of Calgary is also keenly committed and is enthusiastically providing its portion of support. I am sure that Members of Parliament will not want the Government of Canada to do less for Calgary.

I also want to say that this Parliament will receive an annual statement from the Crown corporation which will be established. The amount of money gained and its use will be outlined in the statement each year. The Crown corporation will operate with a very small bureaucracy. I am confident it will be successful and I therefore urge Hon. Members to support it.

Before I conclude my remarks, I want to extend my gratitude to several Hon. Members who have been very helpful in bringing the Bill to consideration. First, I mention the Hon. Member for St. Catharines (Mr. Reid) and the Hon. Member for Selkirk-Interlake (Mr. Sargeant). I would also like to make special mention of the very keen interest shown by the Hon. Member for Calgary North (Mr. Wright) for this project in the manner in which he has kept in touch with me throughout the month that we have been trying to bring it forward.

I think it is a good cause. I know that some people have concern about the question of gambling, as they call it, even when the amount of money is so small, but I do believe that this is a worthy cause. We already have many lotteries in the country and this is a very harmless one of entertainment for a worth-while cause. I urge Hon. Members to support it.

Mr. Joe Reid (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, so as to dispel any delusion which may exist in the mind of the Minister presenting the Bill, I want very quickly to tell him that I feel honoured in rising, first as the spokesperson on behalf of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition, but also as the spokesperson on behalf of those interested in fitness and amateur sport.

I rise in opposition to the Bill just presented on behalf of the Government.

Some Hon. Members: Shame!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): This is the first opportunity I have had the responsibility of speaking on a Bill directly related to fitness and amateur sport. While I welcome the opportunity, I do not particularly appreciate the occasion. Quite frankly, I really wonder at the priorities given to the Bill by the Government. It reminds one of the old adage of Nero fiddling while Rome burns. To put it into more contemporary terms, it reminds us of the situation of the Government playing with the Hockey Select while the unemployment lines continue to grow.

At the same time, I can hardly understand the priority given to the Bill when it is already under the shade of legal process and in legal doubt. Ever since the announcement of the Bill was made over a year ago or when anticipated in September of last year, there has been a raging debate with respect to the legality of the Bill. Is it or is it not in breach of the 1979 federal-provincial agreement? We have now, Mr. Minister, as Members of this House know, a ruling of a court in the Province of Quebec which says that yes, it might be in breach of that provincial-federal agreement of 1979 and it might lead to some conflict in the court down the line. Nevertheless, the Minister throws caution to the wind. He does not wait until that matter has been resolved but comes forward with the Bill at this time.

I can appreciate that fact. I can appreciate why the Government might be fearful that the Bill might be adjudged illegal, and they want to bring it before us and have it in effect because they do not want to renege. I was somewhat surprised at the Minister presenting the Bill by outlining how a bright young group from Calgary came to him and talked to him about the need for support of the Calgary Olympics, and out of this the sports pool was born. We all know that the sports pool is simply an offshoot of the Government's election promise in February of 1980 and its burning desire to get back into the lottery field as it existed before. So he is carrying on a myth both with respect to fitness and amateur sport and as to how the sports pool came into being.

The Calgary Olympics have been dependent on Government money. What about the commitment given by this Government to the Calgary Olympics? The Minister talks in fine terms about supporting this great international event, but it is a commitment made by the Government only out of non-Government revenues. He continues that argument even now, that the support must come out of non-Government revenues. This just shows how much concern the Government really has for fitness and amateur sport and for Calgary.

I am going to dwell a little bit more on that as my comments are developed, but before doing so, Mr. Speaker, I want to refute utterly, completely and totally the propaganda campaign that has been waged with respect to the relationship between Loto Canada—and I heard it expounded again today—and funding for fitness and amateur sport. We are hearing exactly the same kind of nonsense now with respect to the sports pool as we heard earlier during the existence of Loto Canada and it is high time that these facts are made public and clear to all.

Loto Canada had a mercifully short, scandal-ridden term. We have to thank the Party on this side for bringing it to a conclusion and ending the existence of Loto Canada, which had at every turn brought nothing but disgrace to the Government.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): The then Minister responsible and now President of the Liberal Party spent many a Question Period explaining away one scandal after another, why they arose and why they should be dispelled. And a shocked and outraged public were disturbed by the answers given. Millions of dollars were squandered; questionable contracts were entered into with wholesalers; jobs were doled out to friends and all the while the drum kept beating that we do this on behalf of our Canadian athletes. Little did the athlete or the Canadian public know that those holding the ticket printing contracts were receiving over twice the amount being forwarded to the Department of Fitness and Amateur Sport.

Some Hon. Members: Shame, shame!

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): I invite the House to look at the Loto Canada income and expense sheets. There are still a goodly number of people on the Loto Canada payroll. It was simply happy days and open expense accounts! Several people have indicated that Loto Canada was a victim of growing pains and I agree. Loto Canada started its first year with an RCMP investigation into the awarding of security device contracts and finished its last full year of operation by squandering $14 million on a project that was contrary to Loto Canada's own regulations. This is the kind of growing pains that we do not like to see.

Scandals aside, Mr. Speaker, how successful was Loto Canada, and how did fitness and amateur sport benefit from that lottery? From start to finish Loto Canada generated a gross total of $725 million, and a net sum of $211 million. Fitness and amateur sport received $10.6 million or an average of $2.6 million a year. Great benefit to fitness and amateur sport out of that sum of money from the taxpayers and the gamblers of Canada!

More money was spent in one year advertising the benefits that were alleged to go to fitness and amateur sport in one year than they received in four years.

An Hon. Member: Where did the money go?

Mr. Reid (St. Catharines): If fitness and amateur sport did not receive that money, where did it go? The question is properly asked. Eighty-two point five per cent of it went to discharging the Montreal 1976 Olympics debt. The Liberal Government presented to this House, and all Opposition parties agreed, that we should somehow support the taxpayers of Quebec; we should not leave them with the debt of the 1976 Olympics. Loto Canada was then born to pay off that specific deficit of the 1976 Olympics, and it was to exist for a specific term of three years.

We already have extended one invitation, Mr. Speaker; let us look at another. Should anyone doubt the spirit, if not the word, of the Liberal Government commitment in 1976 to wrap up Canada's Loto by the end of the year 1979, let us just take a look at the June, 1976 minutes of the Miscellaneous Estimates Committee. When our present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources (Mr. Chrétien), then President of the Treasury Board, protested wildly at the suggestion that his Government would renege with respect to that termination date, in full rhetorical flight the Minister revealed his soul as one abhorring the very thought that lotteries, especially state-operated lotteries, would be continued. Time after time the Minister indicated that he would sleep a whole lot better at the end of this three-year nightmare. I have always enjoyed the Minister's speeches but that performance surely must rank among his highest.

We know from those minutes and from the revenue sheets of Loto Canada that both the Opposition, the other Members of this House and fitness and amateur sport were misled by the pronouncements of the Minister. Credit must surely go to the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who saw through the theatrics of the presentation and warned that once involved in a lottery, the Liberals would never get out of it. Sure enough, in early 1979, the third year of that definite term, the Liberal Government introduced another Bill to provide an indefinite extension to Loto Canada's life.

The reaction of the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources is not recorded. Considering the comments which he had made earlier, he must have winced at that obvious contradiction. The Minister's assurances given three years before were completely discarded as this breath of new life was given to a discredited Crown corporation. It is this proposed new Loto Bill of 1979 that has led to the myth—the Minister has left but he has left the myth that he has perpetuated—that millions of dollars have gone to the sports world.

Let us look at the facts of the situation. In its first short year of operation, Loto Canada netted $28.3 million. In its first full year of operation that net was increased to a total of $74.3 million. What happened after that? The next and third year of operation it fell from $74 million to $62 million. In its last year of operation the profits were $46.3 million.

• (1550)

These figures are important, not only because they are figures, but because they are the only real guideline we have as we consider the net that might be anticipated from the sports pool. The proponents of the sports pool continue to announce in great exaggerated tones that $100,000 million will be received for the benefit of those who might be the beneficiaries. That we want to refer to as well. However, they have not substantiated how or on what figure it is based.

It is evident in the face of the stiff opposition from provincial lotteries that now exist that if Loto Canada could not make it how in the world can we expect the sports pool to draw the massive sums that are now anticipated by this Government?

Fortunately for fitness and amateur sports and arts and culture, Canadians put an end to that in 1979. One of the early acts of the Clark Government was to negotiate an agreement between the feds and the Provinces. They sold Loto Canada at a time when it had some value. It gave to the Provinces exclusive jurisdiction over lotteries in return for $24 million annually indexed to 1979 and a number of smaller considerations which would total approximately $20 million.

Not only did this agreement remove the irritant between the Province and the federal Government, which allowed the fitness and amateur sports and arts and culture communities to have a fixed sum of return and for the first time fixed sums of revenue on which to plan, build and organize programs, but it was not dependent on the number of Loto tickets sold.

The communities of arts and culture and fitness and amateur sport shared and are now sharing on a 50-50 basis the sum of approximately $30 million annually in addition to their estimates as shown in their budgets. We sold that lottery while it was still saleable. That was a good thing. If this Government had continued to hang on to Loto Canada and tried to compete with the Provinces as it was then doing, it would have been a sad state for all of us.

Let us turn to the sports pool. On the one hand, I do not subscribe to the view that the federal Government, in fact any Government, should be involved in lotteries. On the other hand, I want to say a word on behalf of fitness and amateur sport and in their interest indicate that they are being underfunded. Let us look at each of these in turn.

Canadians expect a good deal from their Government. We have the responsibility of looking after our national defence, job-creation programs, criminal law enforcement and civil law problems. I can tell you one thing. Canadians do not expect, nor do they want to see, their national Government cheapened by throwing its prestige and dignity behind projects and programs that are of dubious benefit to anyone. That is the problem we now face. The desire of the Government to get back into lotteries without a concrete figure as to what will be expended and might be realistically realized is a venture we are not prepared to support at this time.

Here we have a proposal that is based on the exploitation of the betting public. The Minister talks in terms of studies, but it should be pointed out that it is those with modest and low incomes who buy the largest number of tickets.

Has anyone recently been to a bingo game? There you see the gambling instinct at its best, or at its worst. Is that the kind of activity with which the Government of Canada wants to be associated? If it is going to go that far, why stop there? Why not get into casinos or the numbers racket? Where should we stop? Where are we really going to go?

At one time the present Solicitor General (Mr. Kaplan) and the Minister of State for Multiculturalism (Mr. Fleming) both expressed extreme concern with respect to the impact of lotteries on the poor. In fact, I was in this House on December 7, 1979 when the Hon. Member for York West rose and demanded an inquiry into the effect of lotteries in this country. How are those two Members going to vote on Bill C-95?

Setting aside the fact that the federal Government should not be associated with gaming, betting or gambling in any operation, we have to question the ability of the Government to undertake the project at all. The 1979 federal-provincial agreement on lotteries gave the Provinces exclusive jurisdiction in the field of lotteries. In order for the federal Government to operate a sports pool, it will have to demonstrate that a sports pool is not a lottery. One simply cannot accept the word of the Minister. It was nice to hear him distinguish between a lottery and a sports pool, but that is not a legal definition.

Thus far we have the opinion of one court. The Quebec Superior Court expressed the opinion that Quebec's Hockey Select, a sports pool, was not illegal because it fell within the confines of the 1979 federal-provincial lottery agreement. Hence the court in effect ruled that there is no difference between the sports pool now being proposed and the lotteries subject to that agreement.

Surely to goodness the Government would want to know what its legal base is before going further down the line and taking the action it proposes to take today. What will be the fate of the sports pool if it is eventually determined that it is illegal? I can tell you, Mr. Speaker. We will have spent millions of taxpayers' dollars on hardware, advertising and establishing this game and entering into competition with the Provinces. There will be long court cases in the Appeal Courts and eventually the Supreme Court will have to make a determination.

Taxpayers' money will determine what benefit will go to the beneficiaries of a vague and indeterminate Bill. Just to break even, the pool will have to generate enough revenue to offset the $30 million annually from the agreement as well as the start-up costs and production costs.

My point should really be clear. A sports pool is going to cost us money. I am not only talking about the overhead and mechanics; I am talking in terms of the immediate competition that will be entered into by Loto Canada or its namesake with the Provinces.

If it is limited to the number of persons who will be fans, as described by the Minister today, those who are skilled at picking the winner of a game, the numbers will not be great. It is bound to be a failure before it starts. Therefore, we have to concern ourselves with the alternatives proposed in the Bill.

Some studies have estimated the pool will not generate a net in excess of $20 million, which is $10 million less than we are now getting. The Minister predicted an annual return of $100 million. I challenge him to state the facts and figures to substantiate that.

It is not generally recognized that it was the Diefenbaker Government that established an ongoing commitment to fitness and amateur sport so as to raise the health level of Canadians. That was to come first, the health level of Canadians across this country, and thereby to go on to win international medals and credits. But over the years the winning of medals has tended to overshadow the less glamorous areas of fitness, amateur sports, and recreation, as we know recreation. This has created imbalances in the budget allocation of federal dollars.

• (1600)

As a result of this imbalance, we have a situation where amateur sport is budgeting close to the line and those on the recreation side are faced with critical funding shortages. It is a credit to the ingenuity of the great national associations that they have been able to produce athletes to the degree and quality that we have now. It is to their credit that we are able to have our existing medal winners. With their record of achievements, accomplished even with these tight budgets, it would be much better if we had those advisers in fitness and amateur sports recommend and make comments on our budget deficiencies instead of the incompetent advisers we have had in finance through three mini-budgets within the last year.

Bill C-95 is supposed to be an effort to provide money for fitness and amateur sports. But I raise the question, is it? Who is to benefit most? The Minister was good enough to read out who the beneficiaries of the Sports Pool might be. The Cabinet's choice is remarkable. It is wide-ranging. The pool could benefit fitness and amateur sport, arts and culture, medical research, the Calgary Olympics, or any other worthy capital project related to sports and culture, or it could be a combination of these things. What is it going to be? Considering the Cabinet as it is today, no one is going to be able to depend or rely on any commitment in the future.

Going back to early 1979, I read of a strong protest made by the then Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport and the then Secretary of State, the present Minister of the Environment (Mr. Roberts), at a suggestion that Loto Canada provide money for medical research. They both said: "Oh, no, something as essential as medical research should not be included in a budget which has the ups and downs that a lottery would have". That gives you some indication, Mr. Speaker, of the attitude of those Ministers at that time with respect to fitness and amateur sports funding. It was not good enough for something like medical research, but it was good enough for fitness and amateur sport, and it should now be funded by the ups and downs of a lottery.

Arts and culture might have some advantage under all of this, but just picture the competition in a Cabinet meeting, with the different Cabinet Ministers, as to which one has the clout, which one has the force of numbers behind him, which one is going to get this kind of money. There is complete vagueness and ambiguity as to who the beneficiaries of this sports Bill are. If we are intending to benefit fitness and amateur sport, why do we not set it out clearly, unequivocally, percentagewise or otherwise? Who really is to benefit from this sports pool?

We on this side of the House have no quarrel with the Calgary Olympics. We heard of the commitment and the representations which were made and how the sports pool was born. But as of this date all they have is a wishy-washy commitment in support of those games, and from non-Government resources. The money will come from Olympic stamps, Olympic coins, or any other kind of money that might come from the sports pool, if, as and when it comes into existence.

I can say that this Party is prepared to make a commitment to Calgary. In our view, the federal commitment should have been $200 million without any strings attached, an iron-clad guarantee. That is what we call a commitment. There should be a commitment that Calgary and its organizers can count on to the last dollar. But right now they still do not know what dollars they are going to get.

While we have no dispute with respect to Calgary, we do have some dispute with the worthy causes, worthy capital projects, which are referred to in the Bill. We have already seen the Government designate the Hilton Hotel as an industry in need of assistance. It well might be the Hilton Hotel that gets the benefit as a worthy project. They might put in a gymnasium to qualify. But what assurance will fitness and amateur sport have that they will get x number of dollars or a share of this commitment at all?

Before leaving the subject of beneficiaries, I want to point out again that even the term "fitness and amateur sport" is not defined in the Bill. We want to know whether the Government intends to give those moneys directly to national associations, to the Department to be divided among the beneficiaries in fitness and amateur sport, or will it thrive on the loopholes it has, as we saw with Loto Canada? We want some assurance that fitness and amateur sport as a whole will receive a fair deal on the division of the profits which will come from any sports pool that will be initiated.

Finally, on the other aspects of this Bill, Mr. Speaker, Clause 14(b) is completely unacceptable to the Members on this side of the House. This Clause opens the door to this Government's operation of any other lawful gaming operation. Can you not just picture the Cabinet determining what will be first in lawful gaming operations that should receive some share of the benefits, or what lawful gaming operation they will get into to bolster the fact that the sports pool is not going to bring in the money anticipated? They will be testing, trying to see which numbers or which game will gouge the public the most, and that is the game they will get into.

Bill C-95 leaves the question open as well to the Auditor General whether should he or should he not audit the corporation's accounts. Given the history of Loto Canada, we find it imperative that the Auditor General be charged with the responsibility of auditing this Crown corporation's books.

This is a bad Bill, Mr. Speaker, unless it is subject to a goodly number of amendments. Even with these amendments, however, it still cannot disguise the fact that the sports pool is very likely a violation of the 1979 provincial-federal lottery agreement, and as such it bodes no good for our future. This is a Bill that throws out a sure thing, a Bill that tosses away $30 million of guaranteed revenue returns, in return for a bad dream. That is too big a gamble for us on this side of the House to take.

Mr. Ian Deans (Hamilton Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I recognize that the Minister and that the two critics of the Parties had agreed to allow the Bill to pass some time this afternoon; at least, that is my understanding. Therefore, I will not take the amount of time available in order that others might have an opportunity to speak on the matter.

I want to begin by saying quite clearly that we are opposed to the Bill for somewhat different reasons from those given by the spokesman for the Conservative Party. It is not an argument whether the moneys will in fact go to the places which the Government says it will, or whether or not there will be sufficient amounts derived from the sports lottery. The argument is whether or not this is an appropriate way to fund matters which are essential in terms of the well-being of the country.

I was looking back into the record, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure you probably recall the circumstances surrounding a speech made by my hon. colleague, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in 1976. On that occasion he said, as reported at page 13336 of Hansard:

• (1610)

It is because we believe that physical fitness, amateur sport and recreation are important aspects of Canadian life that we think they should be financed out of general taxation and, therefore, paid for on the basis of the ability to pay.

He continued:

We do not believe that aspects of life as important as physical fitness, amateur sport and recreation should be financed by gambling, which calls on the poor to pay for it, instead of taxation which is levied according to ability to pay.

We also feel therefore that this proposal to put the federal government into the lottery business for all time is economic retrogression of the worst kind.

Then he made a point that I think is borne out by the legislation that is before us today, when he said:

This makes it clear that the government does not take physical fitness, amateur sport and recreation seriously, and it makes it clear that if the government gets into trouble with something else—health costs, veterans' pensions, or what have you—which it cannot afford, it will say, "We can go in for gambling again,"—

That was a prophecy and that is exactly what happened. The Government has decided that it is unable to provide, from general revenues, the facilities for amateur sports, for physical fitness or for the pursuit of excellence in amateur athletics. More important, the Government has decided that medical research is to be undertaken from the funds generated by this so-called non-gambling that the Minister has spoken about. Those funds may be generated from the sale of lottery tickets, or the ability of people to choose who will win or lose on many sporting events throughout the year. In that way they will engage in gambling.

A country cannot be run on the basis of games of chance. It may well be that as a pastime there could be provision for people to purchase a ticket and win a small prize, but essential services should not be funded on the basis of whether enough lottery tickets will be sold. Medical research should not be undertaken on the basis of getting a sufficient number of people on a given Saturday afternoon to bet on the outcome of hockey, baseball, basketball or football games.

If we are now moving toward that kind of financing of essential services, then the Government has ceased to recognize its responsibility and the time has come for it to give up the reins of Government. It is clear that if we believe the health and well-being of the people is important, then we must be prepared to make a financial commitment to that end. This goal should be pursued by encouraging people to take part in athletic events and fitness programs and to commit themselves to a higher standard of medical and physical well-being.

Over the years, many of us have argued that if we had put nearly as much money into preventive medicine as we have into other aspects of life, we would have cut down on the cost of making the nation more healthy. We would not have had to spend the hundreds of millions of dollars that we have spent on hospital care facilities. If we had spent money on preventing people from becoming ill rather than on making them well, we would have cut down on the amount of money necessary for medical care today.

This legislation offers nothing that will make the nation more healthy or encourage people to become involved in athletic endeavour. It does nothing to improve fitness in the sense of the general population becoming more aware and, therefore, more involved in physical fitness as a way of life. The intent of the legislation is quite clear; it will introduce an attitude in the country that gambling is an acceptable way for government to raise money. It is not acceptable, Mr. Speaker. I see my Conservative colleagues nodding in agreement; I am not exactly sure why.

Mr. Epp: Because we agree.

Mr. Deans: Another thing worries me about this legislation, Mr. Speaker. Of course, this may never come to pass but the possibility has crossed my mind. Let us assume that the Government musters its troops and forces this legislation down the throats of Members of the House. Let us assume that the Conservative Party and the NDP all vote against it, as will likely be the case, but that it will pass. If, then, by some weird happenstance, the Conservative Party was returned to power, would it give this power back to the Provinces?

Mr. Epp: We would eliminate it.

Mr. Deans: In other words, the Conservatives are not really opposed to gambling; they just do not think the federal Government should be involved. I hear them say they would eliminate it.

Mr. Epp: What about what happened in Manitoba? Physician, heal thyself!

Mr. Deans: What they are saying is that they are opposed to this and are going to vote against it. If they vote against it, then that means that if that Party becomes the Government, it will eliminate it.

Mr. Epp: Right on. But you will never have that option.

Mr. Kempling: Are you clear on that?

Mr. Deans: Yes, I am clear and I will remind the Conservatives about it in the future, perhaps. The last time the Conservatives spoke on legislation similar to this, they gave their rights away; they were opposed to it only to the point that they thought someone else should have it, but not the federal Government.

Mr. Epp: Be nice.

Mr. Deans: I am being nice and I am being honest.

As a matter of principle, the legislation is wrong. One problem is that the Government has attempted to sneak into it some sort of commitment to the Calgary Olympics. It implies that we will be depriving the people of Calgary and Canada of the necessary money to support the Olympics if the Bill is not passed. It is the position of this Party that if the Calgary Olympics are supportable—and they are—they should be supported out of general taxation. If we believe it is important—

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The Hon. Member for Edmonton North (Mr. Paproski) rises on a point of order.

Mr. Paproski: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say to the Hon. Member that in the area of fitness and amateur sport, the federal Government has to pay one-third of the capital cost of projects for national and international games in Canada. So in essence, we must contribute to the Calgary Olympics and to the university games in Edmonton on a one-third, one-third, one-third basis.

Mr. Deans: That is certainly a point of information, Mr. Speaker, but as a point of order it fails rather substantially. However, I am always interested in anything the Hon. Member can add to the debate.

If we as a nation believe it is important to engage in international events from time to time or to host international events, or that it is of value to the country to be involved in the Olympic Games—and I believe we all think that it is—then we must be clear that there is a concurrent commitment to provide the necessary funds. But they must not be provided by some games of chance that may or may not succeed.

As the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre said in 1976, the next thing will be that we will decide that pensions for veterans are too low so we will have to run a lottery. If it does not raise enough money, then the veterans will have to wait until the next lottery. The Government will say that that is a ridiculous suggestion. However, when the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out in 1976 that the next move of the Government would be the funding of health care out of lotteries, he was absolutely correct. This is what the Government is determined to do. When this measure passes—this game of chance or this gambling which we will approve in the House of Commons—it will then become a source of funding for medical research and therefore for health care.

I know that there are Members on both sides of the House who can see the destructiveness contained in such a measure and that there are Members on both sides of the House who would not for one moment want to see the Canadian health care system, either in whole or in part, dependent upon the whims of a few individuals or, for that matter, a significant number of individuals going out and betting on a Friday or Saturday afternoon on the outcome of sporting events. We are not running the Irish Sweepstakes here. We are not in the business of providing an essential service out of gambling. They may want to do it in some parts of the world; that is entirely up to them. But when we in Canada make a commitment to health care, health services and the provision of adequate facilities for health, whether it be in the sense of providing immediate care or research, we believe in doing it out of tax revenues. Also we believe that it should be funded in a way to allow the people charged with the responsibility of ensuring the continuation of the health care service to do some reasonable fiscal planning, to budget and to commit dollars for years down the road in order to complete the projects which they have undertaken.

This is what we in the New Democratic Party believe in. This is what the Hon. Member for Winnipeg-Birds Hill (Mr. Blaikie) has said over the years. This is what the Hon. Member for Winnipeg North Centre said in 1976. This is what we are saying again today, that there is no place in Canada for the running of a health care system funded in any way out of gambling; there is no place. I say to the Minister that if for no other reason, if the Bill contained no other flaws, that and that alone would cause us to rise to speak and vote against it.

Whoever advised the Minister to include that section in the Bill gave him bad advice. This is no time to play around with the health care system. This is no time to place in jeopardy research projects which are currently ongoing in every major medical health care centre across the country. This is no time to run risk with long-term researchers as they seek cures and solutions to many problems confronting Canadians. That is what this type of legislation begins to do.

It does not add to the funding. It substitutes dollars. Although the Minister and his colleagues may shake their heads, as sure as I stand on my feet the commitment of the Government to health care research in the next five years will be diminished proportionate to the amount of money raised by this fund. That is wrong.

The Government is already in severe financial difficulty. The Government is already having difficulty raising the necessary funds, or at least so it claims, to meet its commitment to health care. To turn around and suddenly suggest that we can encourage more people to go out and gamble on Saturday to raise more money to be put back into health care through the sale of various tickets and games of chance is simply unacceptable.

In any event, without belabouring the point, I say to the Minister that he should take that section out of the Bill, because in itself it is offensive to most people. Further I say to the Minister that if the Government is interested in funding the Calgary Olympic Games, he should bring forward legislation to the House of Commons for debate, legislation which sets out the number of dollars the Government believes it has to commit to fund the games. Let us debate the merit of it and let us pass that legislation in order that the money can be made available now. But let us not encourage the continued ongoing mood of gambling in the country. Let us not now decide that from here on and forever more we will have a sports pool system which will make the sport itself less important than the gambling that takes place as a result of the sport.

Has the Minister been to Las Vegas? Has he ever sat and watched the big board?

Mr. Cosgrove: No.

Mr. Deans: Well, I have.

Mr. Cosgrove: Shame!

Mr. Deans: I have never bet a penny, but I sat and watched the big board. I went to Las Vegas because I knew this legislation was coming up and I felt the urge to do research.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain has the floor.

Mr. Deans: Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I am not one of these people who believes that we should just read a book and think we have all the knowledge. I believe that if we are to speak about something we should go to see it first-hand. Thus, when I was speaking about offtrack betting, I went down to the track to see what was going on. When I speak against opening up gambling in Canada it is because I went to the biggest gambling casinos in the world and saw people lose their money. I saw them standing in tears at the door because they had spent every penny they had; they did not even have enough money left for a cab fare back to the airport. Is that what we want in Canada?

Some Hon. Members: No.

Mr. Deans: That is where we are going, that is where we are going. The reason I raised that point was because the interest in the game taking place was simply on the rate of return that it paid on the dollars bet. The game being played, whether it was baseball, football or horse races at the track, was not the real interest. They could not even see the event because it was not carried on television. They could not enjoy the event. All they could do was bet money and sit and agonize over whether or not they would get a return. Is that where we are going in Canada? Is that what we want? Is that the kind of system we think we should have? Is that what the Government is asking us to support?

If the Government really wants to put in place the gambling which is available in other parts of the world, gambling which does little if anything for the sport itself, does little if anything for the tens of thousands, if not hundreds of thousands, who lose their money in a year, and does little if anything for the amateur sport it is supposed to be supporting, then I say to the Government that this is not the way we should do it.

Perhaps the Minister misreads the benefits. Perhaps he does not understand the consequences. It is entirely possible that as well meaning as he is, he has not thought through the end result of this legislation. It is a move in entirely the wrong direction. It must not be allowed to pass the House in this form. If the Government wants us to deal with the Calgary Olympic Games, let us do so. But let us not put into perpetuity the gambling mentality that will undoubtedly result in serious consequences for so many people and so many families in this country.

• (1630)

Hon. Jake Epp (Provencher): Mr. Speaker, in an article in the May, 1982 edition of the Canadian Churchman, let me put on the record the opening sentence. It reads as follows:

> Canadians are forking out over $1 billion a year on something that undermines the work ethic, encourages greed and materialism, exploits the poor and distorts social priorities.

We are being asked today by this Government to accept a Bill which allows the federal Government to get back into the gaming industry. What we are debating here today is action which in 1970 was illegal. In 1970 it was prohibited by virtue of the Canadian Criminal Code. Suddenly after ten or twelve years we not only have had legalized gambling, government-sponsored—in fact, governments being beneficiaries of that gambling—but gambling has become a part of the Canadian pattern. Today we seem to say that we have to increase this new source of revenue, not because we want to justify that new source, but because the Government needs it for valid programs. It is based on this theory that the ends justifies the means.

I believe it is very bad underpinning when a government says that a program, a policy, is good because somebody down the road might benefit. Social policies should not be based on that principle alone. It is a very sad, bad and dangerous value when governments say that a policy is valid in and of itself because we will be able to transfer or redistribute money to some other group. Keep in mind, Mr. Speaker, that the Criminal Code was changed in 1970, and in 1976 for the Montreal Olympics. The Government committed itself to Loto Canada. It is true, and I am pleased to say that it was one of the actions when our Party was in government to remove the federal Government from the gaming industry.

Mr. Paproski: It wasn't making any money anyway.

Mr. Epp: The question was asked by the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain (Mr. Deans) whether we would remove the federal Government, should we be re-elected, from the gaming industry. I sincerely hope that will be our action at that time.

Mr. Keeper: What if you are Premier of Manitoba?

Mr. Epp: When I am Premier of Manitoba, if that happens, we in Manitoba will take care of you, too.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I might remind the Hon. Member that his remarks should be addressed to the Chair.

Mr. Epp: The carrot is put forward to the people, Mr. Speaker, that they might somehow get out of the economic difficulties in which they find themselves by buying one chance, one hope which somehow might extricate them from the daily living that is faced by most Canadians. It is a fantasy based on advertising, glib, glossy advertising, the kind that, if corporations used it, many of us in this House would get up and argue borders very closely on false advertising, if in fact it is not false advertising. But because governments do it, somehow there is legitimacy. I suggest that is wrong.

There might be those listening today or Members in this House who say to themselves: "Here stands someone who is still living in the past; he should get into the modern age". Does the Government sincerely believe that projects that are valid public projects are best funded through gambling?

That brings me to the Calgary Olympics. What is the background to those Olympics? When the Canadian Olympics Committee makes application to the International Olympic Committee to host either a Winter or Summer Games, there is a letter from the Government of the day supporting the application. That letter is more than support, that is, verbal or moral support. That letter clearly is an indication to the International Olympic Committee that the federal Government will back a successful hosting of those games financially.

Mr. Regan: That is not right.

Mr. Epp: When the Olympic Committee of Calgary went to make application, it had a letter from this Government and a clear understanding—and the Minister has said so in the past, if one looks at testimony given to the Standing Committee on Labour, Manpower and Immigration—that it was going to receive approximately $200 million from this Government to help host the Calgary Olympics.

Mr. Paproski: Plus the coin and stamp program.

Mr. Epp: I agree with the Hon. Member for Hamilton Mountain when he said that it is a valid project—and I personally believe it is—and that the Government should bring forward legislation and we will debate the merits of it. At no time did the Government put a condition on the Calgary Olympics Committee that the Government would only back the games if the Government got the lottery Bill.

This is very interesting. Many Canadians, and I am one of them, would like to see national institutions, such as the National Art Gallery, built and become part of the national heritage. But that question is not put to the people who want the art gallery. The question is not put about the lotteries. But when we get to the Calgary Olympics, then those conditions are put. Calgarians are being ill-served by this Government's doing that.

What is the fundamental issue relating to lotteries? I have before me a brief presented on the question of lotteries by some of Canada's so-called main line churches, for instance, the Baptist Federation of Canada, the Salvation Army and the United Church of Canada. At the beginning of my speech, I read an excerpt from the Canadian Churchman, which is from the Anglican Church. Studies show that of all people buying lottery tickets, up to 77 per cent have an annual income of less than $10,000.

Mr. Lapierre: No.

Mr. Epp: This is a regressive taxation on the poor.

Mr. Lapierre: You are wrong. Table your study.

Mr. Epp: I am not wrong, I am dead right.

Mr. Keeper: It is like user fees.

Mr. Epp: The reason is quite obvious; the advertising appeals, as I said earlier. What about two people in financial straits who think when they see lottery advertising that maybe their dream will come true? Odds are never mentioned in advertising. But what are some of the odds? The Quebec Consumer Protection Office states:

> You are twice as likely to be hit by lightning and at least 20 times as likely to be murdered in a year as you are to win $1,000,000 in a lottery—

Surely the Government should not come back to the House when we have 1.5 million people unemployed, when the Government is in serious economic straits, when it is running a deficit $24 billion plus, and say to Canadians: "Look, we believe we can finance some projects legitimately if we get back into the gaming business". Yet that is what the Government is asking us to do today. This kind of approach is wrong.

From the excerpt that I gave from the Canadian Churchman, it is obvious that there are those who are in strong opposition to the creation of lotteries, as I am. There are those who would say that the Government would get funds that it would not normally receive. If one analyses that carefully, it can be seen that one of the groups which praised the institution of these lotteries used the same terms as the Minister when calling it cheap entertainment. That was one of the terms used by the Minister in support of the Bill. In fact, I think he said that it was harmless entertainment.

He also stated that it allowed us to support worthy causes. I ask the Minister in all seriousness if that is why he wants this bill. Or is it, as the churches stated in their brief, that the various lotteries represent one of the best examples of political patronage that has ever been devised by any government? Loto Canada was wracked full of patronage and wracked full of people who knew that it was easier to get into the Loto trough than to receive legitimate funds from the Government of Canada.

Mr. Regan: Are the provincial lotteries like that?

Mr. Epp: I say the same thing about provincial lotteries. I have no doubt about that because it is a question of principle. I do not care if it is provincial or federal, the principle is the same. Do not give me this red herring by suddenly asking if the Provinces are different. They are not. I say that if the Governments have legitimate projects, whatever they might be, then come to us in the House and legitimately tell us what the project is, its costs and its benefits, and let us debate it and have the Canadian people know about it legitimately and openly.

That is not what the Minister wants. The Minister wants very definitely to have a slush fund. Then he can go to the groups and use that money very openly and say: "Here is the Government of Canada giving you a cheque for your project or your program". I am saying, if the project is legitimate, make it legitimate and do not do it this way.

The Minister may think that those are harsh words, and they are. But I sincerely believe that this is the ultimate purpose of the distribution of lottery funds. History in this country and in other countries has proven that to be the fact. If the Minister does not believe it, I will read to him from the church brief I mentioned earlier. It says:
