

CIHM Microfiche Series (Monographs)

ICMH Collection de microfiches (monographies)

Canadian Institute for Historical Microreproductions / Institut canadien de microreproductions historiques

© 1994

Technical and Bibliographic Notes / Notes techniques et bibliographiques

The Institute has attempted to obtain the best original copy available for filming. Features of this copy which may be bibliographically unique, which may alter any of the images in the reproduction, or which may significantly change the usual method of filming, are checked below.

L'Institut a microfilmé le meilleur exemplaire qu'il lui a été possible de se procurer. Les détails de cet exemplaire qui sont peut-être uniques du point de vue bibliographique, qui peuvent modifier une image reproduite, ou qui peuvent exiger une modification dans la méthode normale de filmage sont indiqués ci-dessous.

Coloured covers/Couverture de couleur

Coloured pages/
Pages de couleur

Covers damaged/Couverture endommagée

Pages damaged/
Pages endommagées

Covers restored and/or laminated/Couverture restaurée et/ou pelliculée

Pages restored and/or laminated/Pages restaurées et/ou pelliculées

Cover title missing/Le titre de couverture manque

Pages discoloured, stained or foxed/Pages décolorées, tachetées ou piquées

Coloured maps/
Cartes géographiques en couleur Pages detached/Pages détachées

Coloured ink (i.e. other than blue or black)/ Encre de couleur (i.e. autre que bleue ou noire)

Showthrough/Transparence

Coloured plates and/or illustrations/Planches et/ou illustrations en couleur

Quality of print varies/Qualité inégale de l'impression

Bound with other material/Relié avec d'autres documents

Continuous pagination/Pagination continue

Tight binding may cause shadows or distortion along interior margin/La reliure serrée peut causer de l'ombre ou de la distorsion le long de la marge intérieure

Includes index(es)/ Comprend un (des) index

Title on header taken from:/ Le titre de l'en-tête provient:

Blank leaves added during restoration may appear within the text. Whenever possible, these have been omitted from filming/Il se peut que certaines pages blanches ajoutées lors d'une restauration apparaissent dans le texte, mais, lorsque cela était possible, ces pages n'ont pas été filmées.

Title page of issue/
Page de titre de la livraison

Caption of issue/
Titre de départ de la livraison

Masthead/
Générique (périodiques) de la livraison

Additional comments:/
Commentaires supplémentaires:

This item is filmed at the reduction ratio checked below/Ce document est filmé au taux de réduction indiqué ci-dessous.

10X	12X	14X	16X	18X	20X	22X	24X	26X	28X	30X	32X
<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input checked="" type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>	<input type="checkbox"/>

The copy filmed here has been reproduced thanks to the generosity of:

National Library of Canada

The images appearing here are the best quality possible considering the condition and legibility of the original copy and in keeping with the filming contract specifications.

Original copies in printed paper covers are filmed beginning with the front cover and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression, or the back cover when appropriate. All other original copies are filmed beginning on the first page with a printed or illustrated impression, and ending on the last page with a printed or illustrated impression.

The last recorded frame on each microfiche shall contain the symbol  $\rightarrow$  (meaning "CONTINUED"), or the symbol  $\nabla$  (meaning "END"), whichever applies.

Maps, plates, charts, etc., may be filmed at different reduction ratios. Those too large to be entirely included in one exposure are filmed beginning in the upper left hand corner, left to right and top to bottom, as many frames as required. The following diagrams illustrate the method:

L'exemplaire filmé fut reproduit grâce à la générosité de:

Bibliothèque nationale du Canada

Les images suivantes ont été reproduites avec le plus grand soin, compte tenu de la condition et de la netteté de l'exemplaire filmé, et en conformité avec les conditions du contrat de filmage.

Les exemplaires originaux dont la couverture en papier est imprimée sont filmés en commençant par le premier plat et en terminant soit par la dernière page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration, soit par le second plat, selon le cas. Tous les autres exemplaires originaux sont filmés en commençant par la première page qui comporte une empreinte d'impression ou d'illustration et en terminant par la dernière page qui comporte une telle empreinte.

Un des symboles suivants apparaîtra sur la dernière image de chaque microfiche, selon le cas: le symbole  $\rightarrow$  signifie "A SUIVRE", le symbole  $\nabla$  signifie "FIN".

Les cartes, planches, tableaux, etc., peuvent être filmés à des taux de réduction différents. Lorsque le document est trop grand pour être reproduit en un seul cliché, il est filmé à partir de l'angle supérieur gauche, de gauche à droite, et de haut en bas, en prenant le nombre d'images nécessaire. Les diagrammes suivants illustrent la méthode.

MICROCOPY RESOLUTION TEST CHART

(ANSI and ISO TEST CHART No. 2)

APPLIED IMAGE Inc

1653 East Main Street
Rochester, New York 14609 USA (716) 482-0300 - Phone (716) 288-5989 - Fax

M

MRS SOLOMON SMITH LOOKING ON

PANSY

WITH SEVEN ILLUSTRATIONS.

ARCHER G. WATSON, Manager,
TORONTO WILLARD TRACT DEPOSITORY, COR. YONGE and TEMPERANCE STREETS, TORONTO, ONT.

PRICE 13 CENTS.

"ELECTRICITY IS LIFE." (TRADE MARK.)
PULVERMACHER'S

WORLD-FAMED GALVANIC BELTS,

FOR THE CURE OF NERVOUS DISEASES, HAVE RECEIVED TESTIMONIALS FROM OVER FIFTY MEMBERS OF THE ROYAL COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS OF LONDON, Including THREE PHYSICIANS TO HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN.

RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

GALVANISM v. LOCAL WEAKNESS and NERVOUS DEBILITY.
Newbury, Berks. April 7th, 1890.
Gentlemen,—I am very pleased to let you know that your applicance have quite cured my case of local weakness and nervous debility. I have every reason to believe that the cure is permanent. If you publish this kindly use initials only, and refer inquirers to me.
—Yours faithfully,
Messrs. J. L. Pulvermacher & Co., 194, Regent Street, W., London.

GALVANISM v. ACUTE NEURALGIA.
Dear Sirs,—I have been suffering for the last nine years from Acute Neuralgia in the lower jaw, and have tried a large number of without any effect, but about three months ago Dr. Treastcity, advised me to try your Galvanic Belt for Neuralgia.
I cured him of the same complaint some years ago. The d cured for me your galvanic appliance, which I have used benefit, in fact I have found such great relief from your that I shall have much pleasure in recommending it to friends who may be suffering from this complaint.—Yours W. WALLACE.

Pulvermacher & Co., 194, Regent Street, W., London.

SM v. RHEUMATISM and LOSS of MUSCULAR

3.
Pennsylvania, North America. 1st April, 1890.
—Some years ago, when living in England, I was a great rheumatism in the feet and was advised to write to so had I could not walk for nearly twelve months, and of your Chain Bands, which I wore steadily, and in his time the pain left me, and I have never had it since. ment also restored perfect use of my left arm which had weries, and this was accomplished in two weeks.—Yours (Mrs.) J. TRING.

vermacher, 194, Regent Street, W., London.

M v. SCIATICA and LUMBAGO.

39, Union Street, Tranmere, Birkenhead, 28th February, 1890.
—I feel I ought to thank you as the messes, in the hands I God, of restoring me to health and strength. For up-months I had been in a helpless condition, suffering and Lumbago, and was under three medical men; a or was called in, and he informed me that my sciatic ular muscles were contracted and the muscles of left sly-waxed for want of circulation, and my sufferings that they injected morphia to give instant ease—doctor tricity as a last resource, and I wrote in you, and from I wore your Galvanic Belt I obtained immediate relief, lay the cramps and severe pains gradually left me, and are perfectly restored again. I have now resumed busi-my cure to be permanent. I have recommended your many of my friends and neighbours who have witnessed ul cure effected in my case, and I consider your Galvanic marvellous scientific invention. One of the doctors to know the result, and asked me what I thought of your died "I don't think, but I know it has been my salva-a faithfully,
J. PHILLIPS.

ermacher, 194, Regent Street, W.

M v. NERVOUS EXHAUSTION. resulting symptoms of NERVOUS EXHAUSTION, LOSS AR POWER, RHEUMATISM, SCIATICA, PARALYSIS, etc., are speedily removed by means of PULVER-I world-famed GALVANIC BELTS, which convey the rent direct to the affected parts, gradually stimulating healing all the nerves and muscles, and speedily arresting ns of premature waste and decay.

PERSONALLY, or by LETTER, free of charge.

FOR FURTHER TESTIMONIALS, both Medical and Private, see new Pamphlet "GALVANISM: NATURE'S CHIEF RESTORER of IMPAIRED VITAL ENERGY," post free on application to

J. L. PULVERMACHER and CO., GALVANIC ESTABLISHMENT, 194, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.
Established over Forty Years.

THE HOME LIBRARY

Crown 8vo, 320 pages, Handsome Cloth Cover. Illustrations 2s. each.

BY PANSY.

Three People.      Wise and Otherwise Four Girls at Chau-      The King's Daughter tauqua.      Ruth Erskine's Cross The Chautauqua Girls      Ester Ried. at Home.      Ester Ried Yet Spe-An Endless Chain.      ing.
Mark Desborough's Vow.      }
The Better Part.      } By ANNIE S. SW The Strait Gate.      } Edith Oswald; or, Living for Others. By J M. KIPPEN. (224 pages.)

LONDON: S. W. PARTRIDGE & CO., 9, PATERNOSTER ROW.

WHELPTON'S PILLS,
THE BEST FAMILY MEDICINE.

Are one of those pure Medicines which, for their extraordinary properties, have gained an almost UNIVERSAL REPUTATION.

Recommended for Disorders of the Head, Chest, Bowels, Liver, and Kidneys.

WHELPTON'S PILLS & OINTMENT.
WHELPTON'S
HEALING OINTMENT
The best remedy for Burns, Scalds, Ulcers, and all Skin Diseases 7½, 1s. 1½d., and 2s. 6d., of all Chem-Free by Post in the United Kingdom for 8, 16, 33 Stamps.

PROPRIETORS:
G. WHELPTON & SON, 3, Crane Court, Fleet London, E.C.

[3865.]

KEATING'S POWDER
DESTROYS BUGS
FLEAS
MOTHS BEETLES
Sold in Tins 6d 1/- & 2/6

KEATING'S BEST COUGH CURE.

Sold everywhere in Tins. 11½ each.

LOZENGES

LIBRARY

h Cover. Illustratio and Otherwise King's Daughter Erskine's Cross

Ried.
Ried Yet Spe

By ANNIE S. SW

or Others. By J pages.)

PATERNOSTER ROW, I

PILLS,

CINE,
their extra-most

OINTMENT.

WHELPTON'

HEALING OINTME

remedy for Burns Scalds and all Skin Disease and is. No. of all Chem United Kingdom for 8, 10 33 Stamps.

ETCRS: Grange Court, Fleet St
E.C.

SER
S AS HS LES
-&2/6

GS

CURE.

ES

"'THAT'S FOR ALL THE WORLD LIKE SOME FOLKS!' SHE REMARKED."

[p. 5].

M

MRS. SOLOMON SMITH LOOKING ON.

BY
PANSY

AUTHOR OF "FOUR GIRLS AT CHAUTAUQUA," "CHAUTAUQUA GIRLS AT HOME," "ESTER RIED," "ESTER RIED YET SPEAKING," "LINKS IN REBECCA'S LIFE," "RUTH ERSKINE'S CROSSES," "WISE AND OTHERWISE," ETC., ETC.

ARCHER G. WATSON, MANAGER,
TORONTO WILLARD TRACT DEPOSITORY,
COR. YONGE AND TEMPERANCE STREETS, TORONTO, ONT.

PS 1019

A5

M5

fol.

MR.

SHE w glow orig
hea

list of sentor Solomon Sm
She had it th and Mary h in the grate flaming up be

"That's fo marked, med lip and starin to give them they set them she returned tioned her.

"Yes, I w didn't mean but the folks a hankering
was made su famous, you went there.

"It's a gro
—and glass d class. I'd lik they have car
organ, and ma There ain't as that school.
it's worth hav
get. It didn' they want to p

"But, Mrs
nothing better Smith, or, for witted, "wha
money for car when the Miss many good thi on for the wan

"Well, I du chance to make might be said the thing. I do own mind; and from their hand setting down or bare, dusty floo Lord. It don't better than tha thing. Some f fixed-up church at home. But depended on th there. I ain't house as this on to have; but as

MRS. SOLOMON SMITH LOOKING ON.

CHAPTER I.

A GOOD LISTENER.

SHE was just the nicest old lady. We were always glad to see her coming down the walk. "So original," we said, "so good-natured," "so large-hearted," and "so quaint." In fact, we had a long list of sentences beginning with "so" to describe Mrs. Solomon Smith. In winter she always had her knitting. She had it this afternoon. And Laura took her crochet, and Mary her braiding, while I gave the block of coal in the grate a vigorous poke, and sent the red glow flaming up before I settled myself to enjoy her.

"That's for all the world like some folks!" she remarked, meditatively, resting her knitting-needle on her lip and staring into the glow on the hearth. "You have to give them an awful poke, every now and then, before they set themselves to amounting to anything." Then she returned to the subject about which Mary had questioned her.

"Yes, I went to the Olin Park Sunday School. I didn't mean to stay over Sunday when I went to town, but the folks were real cordial, and I'll own that I've had a hankering after Sunday Schools ever since Solomon was made superintendent. The Olin Park Church is famous, you know; and so last Sunday morning I just went there.

"It's a great big room—a dozen rooms, for that matter—and glass doors shutting you up all alone with your class. I'd like that first-rate if I was a teacher. And they have carpeted floors, and cushioned seats, and an organ, and maps, and mottoes, and a bell, and everything. There ain't anything you can get with money to add to that school. I like that, too; if the work is worth doing, it's worth having the tools, and the best kind you can get. It didn't seem to me a mite too fine for the use they want to put it to."

"But, Mrs. Smith," interrupted Laura, who likes nothing better than to get into an argument with Mrs. Smith, or, for that matter, with anybody who is quick-witted, "what do you think about spending so much money for carpets, and cushions, and all such things, when the Missionary Boards need money, and when so many good things are waiting to be done, and can't move on for the want of money?"

"Well, I dunno, child," said Mrs. Smith. "There's a chance to make two sides to it, I s'pose; an' a good deal might be said both sides, I daresay. Maybe it ain't just the thing. I don't feel over and above sure about it in my own mind; and yet I'll own that I hate to see folks coming from their handsome houses in their handsome dresses and setting down on old, worn-out cushions, with their feet on bare, dusty floors, as if anything was good enough for the Lord. It don't seem quite right. If they don't have no better than that at home, most of 'em, why that's another thing. Some folks say that there oughtn't to be nice fixed-up churches, on account of poor people not feeling at home; but it always did seem to me as though that depended on the way they were treated after they got there. I ain't never had such a carpet in my whole house as this one in your setting-room, and never expect to have; but as long as you are real glad to see me, and treat me jest as well as though my house was all Brussels carpets from garret to cellar, I'll own that I kind of like to step my feet on the pretty vines and flowers, and have a good look at them. Like enough, folks feel so in handsome churches. As for the money being needed, well, it's a question that I don't understand, and it stretches out so many ways I don't know how it's ever going to be understood. Red cushions in a church ain't necessary, maybe; but, for the matter of that, neither is red worsteds. And though one don't cost as much as the other, if the idea is wrong, why it's wrong, whether it is a penny's waste or a dollar's; and the whole thing snarls itself up, you see, and who's going to find the end of it?"

Laura bent her head lower over her red worsteds and coughed, while Mary laughed outright. Then Laura, blushing and smiling, said:

"You needn't laugh, Mary, red worsteds don't cost any more than serpentine braid."

"But about the Olin Park Sunday School?" said I.

"Oh yes. Well, I liked all the pretty things; but I'd agree with Laura, here, about some of the dressing. It was too fine for the place. You see, it seems to me such a different thing from having fine churches. If my pew in church is carpeted with green Brussels and my seat covered with green velvet, or something, and stuffed with down, I can offer a piece of it to the ugliest-dressed woman that comes in, and hand her a book, and look pleasant at her, and rake her feel that she has got as much of the softness and prettiness as I have, and that she has as good a right to it, because it all belongs to the Lord. But you see, if I wear a blue silk dress trimmed with white lace, I can't go and spread a breadth of it over her, nor make her feel as if it was as much hers as mine, nohow I fix it. Don't that make a difference? Them girls stood side by side, some of 'em in blue silks, with knife pleatin's, and box pleatin's, and panniers, and ruffs, and with bright ribbons flyin', as gay as peacocks; and then one in rusty alpaca, darned here and there, and frayed at the wrists, and made like nothing is nowadays; and they felt uncomfortable—you could see it in their eyes—and it didn't look right.

"No, child, I dunno's I'd have a uniform. I don't like Sisters of Charity ways of doing it, nor I don't like the Quakers' exactly; and if I was the matron of an orphan asylum, the thing that I wouldn't do would be to have all the dresses and aprons alike. You see, it doesn't look home-like. But the way I'd manage it would be to have all the people have common sense, and then pick out their dresses for church with an eye to the best good of everybody, and it would be all right."

This brought a merry laugh from Laura.

"That is an excellent way of managing it! But how would you arrange it so that all the people would have common sense? Don't you think it is one of the scarcest things in the country?"

"Maybe so, child," with the gravest and most earnest old face imaginable; "but it's easy got, after all. If people would only put themselves under the lead of the Lord Jesus Christ, they would have common sense as well as everything else. Maybe, though, I did those young things injustice. But it seemed to me they were so busy fixing the ribbons, and shaking out the panniers, and admiring the set of their kids, that they hadn't room for much else. They didn't act like thinking beings; that was the trouble. I ain't one that expects folks sixteen years old to act as though they were sixty; but I did hate to hear them sing, 'Jesus, keep me near the Cross,' and giggle right at the end of the lines. The Cross seems such a solemn thing to me, I can't make out how the most thoughtless of them can take the word on their lips with a laugh. It can't be because they are young and frisky. It is some mistake in their bringing up. If one of 'em had lost a dear friend, and somebody was speaking of it in solemn language, they wouldn't have any trouble in keeping from laughing. I expect I'm an old fogey, but it kind of seemed to me, as I sat there, that some of the hoity-toity singing helped along the giddy feelings. 'We are soldiers for Jesus,' and 'We'll battle for the right'—that's what they sung, loud and strong, four hundred voices; and they didn't look nor act like soldiers. I'm dreadful afraid some of them didn't know the meaning of the words. 'Sound the battle cry,' one of 'em sang, right in my ears—a loud shrill voice she had—and then she whispered: 'Charlie Parks has got his hair parted in the middle! Did you ever see the like? He'll be wearing an overskirt next.' And then she came into line with the singers: 'Gird your armour on for the Lord.' Now, how could them two thoughts find place in her brain at once? It don't stand to reason, you see. And there she stood, pretending to be singing praise to Him, speaking His name; and if her heart wasn't praising, wasn't she taking His name in vain? The whole thing just made me shiver.

"I couldn't help watching that class of girls the whole blessed time. The visitors' seat ran right along behind theirs, and I never did see such restless beings since I was born. They couldn't keep still in prayer time either. They nudged each other, and passed slips of paper down the seat, and whispered a little; and this same girl who sang so loud giggled every now and then. Now, Mary, you look exactly as though you would like to say—if I wasn't so much older than you—that I couldn't have been praying myself, or I wouldn't have had time to see all this. That's just as true as you live. I was sort of distracted with the flutter and noise, and I couldn't keep my thoughts anywhere. There, again, is the question of who is to blame for them girls growing up in that way? You see, the grown-up folks didn't keep as still as they might. The four young fellows who tended to books and papers and such things, kept tiptoeing around, up this aisle and down that, and the leader of the singing turned over the leaves of his book, and, if you'll believe it, the superintendent himself seemed to be trying to find his place in his Bible while the minister was praying.

"Well, they began the lesson; I listened hard, then, for Solomon and I had been studying that lesson by spells all the fore part of the week, and I wanted to see what new ideas I could get. And you never see the beat of that teaching in all your life! 'This is a funny lesson for us,' one of them said. 'I knew all about the birth of Christ when I was a baby.' And then they went to discussing. They talked about that Star, wondering whether it was a new star, or a new look to an old star, and how it looked, and how long it shone the first time it appeared; and then they didn't know a mite more about it, you know, when they got through than they did at first; and then they tried to find out just exactly what part of the East the Wise Men came from, and how long a journey they took; and then they talked about Herod, and all the wicked things he had said and done; how he murdered his wife, you know, and his children, and how old he was, and how long he had been sick, and what year he died, and everything about him. And then they went back to the Wise Men again, and they talked about the gold they brought, and wondered how much there was, and in what shape it was; and described frankincense and myrrh, and told how one was used for putting round dead folks, and the other for burning incense; and then, if you'll believe it, the bell rang. I didn't tell you about the bell, did I? It kept ringing every few minutes. There seemed to be something that somebody ought to be warned by that bell to 'tend to most of the time. It would have distressed me if I had been a teacher. Well, it rang this time, and that lesson was done. You see they had been interrupted lots of times; the Secretary had come along, and the Librarian, and the Treasurer, and the boy with the new Lesson Papers, and I don't know what not. But I guess they wasn't disturbed; it didn't break the thread of their thought, you see, for they didn't have none to break. And that was all them girls got, that day, out of that lesson!"

"What did you and Mr. Smith get out of it?" Mary asked her, looking roguish.

"Bless you, child! it is just alive with thoughts. Them things they talked about were good enough, some of them; but the teacher didn't get to anything. I thought more than a dozen times, 'Now she is coming to the thought.' But she didn't; she slipped right round it, just as easy!"

"How do you suppose, now, she could have got rid of saying something to them young things about the trouble that the Wise Men took to find Jesus; what a long, hard journey it was, and how much they had to go through; and how it is such a simple thing to do, that it seems strange that everybody don't do it? And there they were, so sharp with their answers, and knowing so much about history, and quoting Scriptures, and all that. Why didn't she remind them how much Herod's chief priests and scribes knew about history, and prophecy, and all that, and what good did their knowledge do 'em if And when I see them a-fluttering there, and nudging each other, and having so little heart in it, I couldn't help wondering whether any of 'em professed to be a worshipper of Jesus—had their names on the Church book, you know; and was it real, or was it kind of like Herod's—not so ugly-looking, but not much more honest.

"Then that bright Star coming out and guiding them men. Dear me! how could she help reminding her girls that He Himself is the bright Morning Star, and stands all waiting for the chance to guide them home? And then the gifts; how they brought their best to Him. She didn't say a word about our gifts; how our hearts are better to Him than all the gold and silver, or the cattle on a thousand hills; nor a word about the altars where our frankincense ought to be burned every morning and evening; nor nothing at all—only just the bare facts about Herod, and the gold, and the gums.

"Will they be any likelier to find Jesus by the help of that teaching? 'Where is He?' the Wise Men asked, and my heart ached to lean over there and ask them girls if there wasn't one among 'em that would like to know where He was, and go and worship Him? To think that she had a chance to talk about finding Him, and giving Him our hearts, and giving Him our prayers, and being lighted by the Star of Bethlehem all the journey through; and she threw away her chance! It made me sick."

"I would like to go to Sunday School and be in your class, Mrs. Smith." Laura said this, and every touch of humour had gone out of her voice, and her eyes shone with tears.

"My class, child? Bless your dear heart! I'm nothing but an ignorant old woman; I don't know enough to teach a class. But if I did try to teach one, and had a lesson all about finding Jesus, and giving the best things to Him, I wouldn't leave both them ideas clean out of sight. But there! it's easier to grumble than it is to teach, I darsay."

CHAPTER II.

SHE ATTENDS A SUNDAY SCHOOL CONVENTION.

"GOOD-MORNING, Mrs. Smith," said both girls at once. "We were so glad last night," continued Laura, "to hear of your return. Here, take this armchair."

An event had happened at the little house in the Hollow. Mrs. Solomon Smith had been away from it for an entire week.

We who ever she we her return hardly less while away her eyes, a suggestions to welcome breathe a home and Then smoot untying her she began, it all in all, as I know child, I cou you know. hand but wonderful stare you i vention, an ought to k more than "Well, now I'd go the v and if they "Can't "Oh no that; it cor to the Cheo Agricultura to the Cattle "Yes," it stands m farming, an "Exactl 'tend to all superintend because you use for hoe because you wouldn't be along such a "Solomo. right still fo "Come, you go to th "I don't "That d tell me all about it tha about it. I are uncomm "Well, at nothing; bu and says I: "I thoug "I only i Solomon, he a man, you afford it," th he knows it. "Well, I it is so impo another thin "Says I: right in a lin of work alon s'pose it wou or look after garden sauce work." "Well, n stand things the time to g for the impr 'cause you c winter, and I

...t of the time. It
...en a teacher. Well,
...was done. You see
...times; the Secretary
...and the Treasurer,
...papers, and I don't
...wasn't disturbed; it
...ought, you see, for
...that was all them
...t out of it?" Mary

...ve with thoughts.
...good enough, some
...st to anything. I
...ow she is coming to
...flipped right round

...ould have got rid
...things about the
...ind Jesus; what a
...uch they had to go
...thing to do, that
...do it? And there
...s, and knowing so
...tures, and all that,
...uch Herod's chief
...ry, and prophecy,
...nowledge do 'em I
...ere, and nudging
...t in it, I couldn't
...fessed to be a
...es on the Church
...s it kind of like
...much more honest.

...and guiding them
...eminding her girls
...g Star, and stands
...home? And then
...st to Him. She
...ow our hearts are
...ilver, or the cattle
...t the altars where
...very morning and
...re bare facts about

...us by the help of
...Wise Men asked,
...and ask them girls
...ould like to know
...? To think that
...Him, and giving
...prayers, and being
...journey through;
...de me sick."

...ol and be in your
...id every touch of
...d her eyes shone

...art! I'm nothing
...know enough to
...h one, and had a
...g the best things
...less clean out of
...ble than it is to

...CONVENTION.
...said both girls
...last night," con-
...our return. Here,

...le house in the
...away from it for

We who knew her so intimately were sure that wherever she went, she would go with her eyes open; so that her return was, to her friends, an anticipated pleasure; hardly less than anything she might have enjoyed herself while away. We knew she would permit us to see with her eyes, and to hear with her ears; adding the sharp suggestions of her own mind besides. So we were glad to welcome her, and willing also to give her time to breathe a bit, and to ask all the questions concerning home and friends that her loving heart might suggest. Then smoothing down her apron with her wrinkled hands, untying her cap-strings, and settling back for a long talk, she began, "Well, I've been, and I've got back; and take it all in all, I ain't had such a spell come over me never as I know of. How did I happen to go? Bless you, child, I couldn't help it. The papers were so full of it, you know. Couldn't take one up for six weeks beforehand but something about that Convention, and the wonderful things they were going to do and say, would stare you in the face. 'What is a Sunday School Convention, anyhow?' says I to Solomon, and I thought he ought to know, 'cause he had been superintendent for more than a year, but he didn't know. Says I to him, 'Well, now, if I pretended to be a Sunday School man I'd go the whole thing; I'd find out about those things, and if they are worth going to I'd have the good of 'em.'"

"'Can't afford it,' says Solomon.
"'Oh no,' said I, 'of course not; I knew you'd say that; it comes so handy; but then, you know, you went to the Cheesemakers' Convention last year, and to the Agricultural Show, and to the Dairymen's Meeting, and to the Cattle Show, and I dunno what not.

"'Yes,' said he, 'of course I did; that's my business; it stands me in hand to know all that's going on about farming, and keep up with all the new things.'

"'Exactly,' says I. 'And you can afford money to 'tend to all such things; but Sunday School teaching and superintending is kind of a pastime; you only do it because you've got a spare hour on Sunday that you can't use for hocking or mending fence, and put it in there because you don't know what to do with yourself; but it wouldn't be the thing to go and spend money jest to help along such an amusement. Is that it?'"

"Solomon looked at me kind of sharp like, and was right still for about two minutes. Then says he:

"'Come, now, if you think it is so important, suppose you go to the meeting; I'd like to have you go first-rate.'

"'I don't belong to Sunday School,' says I.
"'That don't make no difference,' said he. 'You can tell me all about the meeting, and I shall know more about it than if I were there myself, and I'd like to hear about it. I ain't got time to go myself; you know we are uncommon busy this season.'

"Well, at first I didn't mean to go, no more than nothing; but I went on talking jest for the sake of it, and says I:

"'I thought you couldn't afford the money.'
"'I only said that for the sake of saying it, 'cause Solomon, he ain't a mite close with his money, only being a man, you know, he's got so used to saying 'I can't afford it,' that the words jest spring to his mouth before he knows it. He looked a little foolish, and says he:

"'Well, I can't afford to waste money, but if you think it is so important, and would help, you know, why, that's another thing.'

"Says I: 'I think it's important for you, 'cause it's right in a line with your work; if it's to help that kind of work along, of course it would help you; but I don't s'pose it would help me make any better butter or cheese, or look after the chickens and turkeys, or get any earlier garden sauce, than I have now, and you know that's my work.'

"'Well, now,' says he, 'you know I always did understand things better for your telling of 'em, and if I had the time to go, and there couldn't but one of us go, why, for the improvement of it, I'd rather it would be you, 'cause you could tell it off to me of evenings all the winter, and I could take it in better.'

"Well, I always was a master hand, Solomon thought, at telling things, and I knew he paid attention to what I said better than to most folks; but for all that, I hadn't the faintest notion of going to a Sunday School Convention; nor didn't give it a sober thought till we got a letter from Hannah, my sister, you know, and she told me about her Jessie being tuckered out and needing a rest, and they wished she could have a change and go somewhere for a few days before school commenced again; 'twouldn't hardly pay for her to come down to the country to see us for so short a time, and the journey was expensive, too; but they did wish she could get away somewhere; and then I looked up at Solomon, all of a sudden, and he nodded his head, and says he:

"'That Sunday School Convention is the very thing.'
"And Solomon, being a man, you know, is dreadful set in his way when he gets a notion; and he was so took up with that one that he give me no peace till I up and started, he a-counting out the money for me and for Jessie, as if he rather enjoyed it. I knew I'd have to pay Jessie's way if I took her, 'cause her pa ain't a mite forehanded—never was. He lives in a town, and has a large family, and there's always shoes and hats and gloves and things wanting, and it takes a sight more to live there than it does on a farm, and he ain't nothing to depend on but a store where they keep dry goods. That always did seem to me a dreadful uncertain way of living! Suppose folks should take a notion to go without new clothes for a spell? You can't eat the things lying there in the cases waiting to be sold. But now on a farm it's different; folks has got to have wheat, and corn, and potatoes, and even if they shouldn't want 'em, why then you can eat 'em yourself. So I always felt kind of sorry for Hannah's folks.

"Well, I went for Jessie, and her and me got started. She thought it was the funniest notion I ever took yet! Just as funny for her as for me, for she never went to Sunday School since she was a little girl, she said; she ain't a mite over seventeen this minute, and there she talked about when she was a little girl. But land! She wears trains, and all them things, and looks as old as any of them. I'll own up that I felt real queer as we began to get near the town where the meeting was.

"Well, well, I said to Jessie. 'I've always heard it said there ain't no fool like an old fool, and I believe it. The idea of my going to a Convention at my time of life! It would be bad enough if I was for woman's rights!'"

"'Auntie,' said Jessie, 'let's give it up, and go back home.'

"'Jessie,' says I, 'did you ever know your Uncle Solomon's wife to give up a thing after she once got started? I ain't one of them kind. I shall see what a Sunday School Convention is before I'm three days older; you may depend on that.'

"Well, we showed our papers, and got our street and number, and did it all up regular, and went to the nicest kind of a house, where they treated us like queens; and the next morning we went to the Convention. Land! it wasn't an overpowering place at all; just a big room, with three or four dozen folks in it, sitting as far apart as they could get, and singing, each one of 'em, a different kind of a tune—by the sound. It was very faint singing anyhow; Solomon could have beaten them all hollow.

"'My patience!' says I to the man at the door, 'I thought this was a dreadful big meeting. Why, you ain't got as many here as we get out at our country singing schools.' He smiled as pleasant as could be, and says he:

"'The people haven't got in yet; we are having devotional exercises.'

"'Oh,' says I, 'the people don't come till after they are over, and there's something important to be done, eh? Well, now, that's curious, I should think, for a Sunday School meeting; the devotional part ought to be kind of important.'

"'It's early yet,' says he.
"'Do you think so?'" says I. 'Why, the men folks where we are stopping went to the store two hours ago; and the women went to market and got back before we started. Why, it's after nine o'clock!"

"But Jessie, she was blushing like a peony—the land knows at what. She's great on blushing, Jessie is; kept at it half the time we were gone. And she kept twitching at my sleeve, and a-coaxing me in; so I went along. Of all the doleful meetings I ever was in, that one named 'Devotional Exercises' was the worst. I didn't think there was a mite of devotion about it. Now, that's the truth. Why, Solomon and I have sat down in our kitchen, with the old Psalm book, and a tallow candle, and grandfather's big Bible, and had enough sight better meeting than that was, many a time. I can't think what ailed the people. The man who prayed acted as though if he should ever get through and sit down, he was afraid that the meeting would come to an end; and so he went on and on, seeming to think that it was his duty to keep the thing going. And he prayed about things he didn't care nothing about, I believe. His voice sounded like it, but we oughtn't to judge. Anyhow, my heart felt pretty heavy, and I looked at Jessie, and I was afraid if they had many 'devotional exercises,' she wouldn't get chirked up a bit. After a spell, though, that man did get through, and somebody found out, by accident, that the time for devotional exercises was up. You can't think how glad they all acted! They was as lively as bees right away. A brisk little man hopped up and went on that platform, and says he: 'The Convention will please come to order.' And where he had kept himself, and that brisk, ringing voice of his through all them devotional exercises, I don't know. Why, his voice sounded just like a breeze from the sea. It kind of waked everybody up. But, bless you! the Convention didn't come to order, it couldn't. If they had sent a telegram all over the town, saying: 'The devotional exercises are over, you can come on,' they couldn't have crowded and squeaked and rustled in faster than they did. Such a hubbub you never did see. They came talking and laughing, too; kept up their talking—pretty loud voices at that—till they got fairly inside the door, and a little bit down the aisles. And there was that man on the platform trying to do the talking himself. I whispered to Jessie. Says I: 'Them folks appear to be so tickled to think they didn't get here to them devotional exercises that they can't stop laughing and talking.' Then Jessie, she giggled, and I was ashamed of her.

"Dear me! I wish I could tell you all about that meeting. I could talk all summer about it; and Solomon says I've got to. He is particular to hear of every little thing. Some of the things were grand. That's the trouble. There ain't much comfort in telling about it after all. You get right into the middle of it, and it comes over you how the man looked, and how he walked across the stage, and threw his arms, and how his voice sounded, and you seem to feel that that was a good deal of it, after all; and there's no use in trying to tell it. Lots of things I didn't understand.

"The next thing on the programme," said the leader, "is an exercise in chronology, by Dr. Date."

"What's that?" I said to Jessie, and she didn't seem to hear me, and I gave her a nudge. "What's that big word he says?" I asked her, and do you believe that child knew? and there's been sights of money spent on her education. She shook her head at me, and I thought she meant that I wasn't to whisper; and I didn't mean to be put off by that child, so I said it again a little louder. Her cheeks were just like peonies, and she bent forward, and says she softly:

"Auntie, I don't know."

"Then I felt real sorry that I had asked her, she seemed so kind of beat. There was a nice-looking young gentleman sat just the other side of me, and says he, very pleasantly, not laughing at me a bit:

"It is to show us about dates in the Bible; just when things happened. See, the professor is putting it on the blackboard for us."

"Sure enough, there he was dashing off a long line of figures and letters to stand for words. He made real pretty figures, and he worked most amazing fast. I watched him a spell, and then says I to my young man:

"I don't quite see what is the use of filling up one's head with all that mess of figures; it would take me half a lifetime to learn 'em, and then I should blunder; I always was dreadful at figures, and if I knew 'em all like a book, I don't see how it would make me any fitter to teach the children the way to heaven; they don't need them figures to go by."

"He smiled again; not a saucy smile, you know, but a nice pleasant one; and he leaned over to me, and says he:

"There is a fellow out West who has written a book to show that the Bible can't be true, because he thinks he has proved that the world is more than six thousand years old."

"I looked back at the blackboard, and the very first words that that Dr. Date had written there were these three, in great, big, handsome letters: 'In the beginning.'"

"Why," says I, 's posing it is? It might be a million years old, for all that the Bible says about it; that only says in the beginning. How did he find out when that was?"

"Exactly so," says he, and he laughed outright. "But you see the poor fellow has never studied Bible chronology, and he forgot anybody else had. He makes a great many statements that a careful look at Bible figures proves to be false; and one of the reasons why we study Bible chronology is to be able to correct the mistakes of just such ignorant fellows as he, so that our children won't be led astray by them."

"Well, after that I paid attention to them dates and names; and, if you'll believe it, it was quite interesting and not so terribly hard to remember. He strung some of the words together making poetry like, and a good many of 'em began with the same letters; and—well, I don't know how he did it. Jessie said she believed I was bewitched, but I got quite excited learning of them figures, and I said most of 'em off to Solomon last night. I couldn't help kind of liking it; and I thought if I was young I'd go into it with all my might, and know all about it."

CHAPTER III.

SHE HAS TRIALS AND COMPENSATIONS.

"HERE was some funny acting folks as ever I see at that Convention. They had a conference about mistakes in teaching. The man who commenced it told off a lot of mistakes, and then he called on others to give some; and, if you'll believe it, they seemed to be all used up on mistakes. Not one of them opened his lips. The man coaxed, and coaxed, and they just looked at each other, and some of them gaped and looked at their watches, and were as dumb as oysters. I had forty notions to speak out. Says I to Jessie: 'For the land's sake! what ails 'em? I should think they could talk about mistakes; why, I know two or three myself, and I've a notion to give them.' Says Jessie: 'Auntie, don't you do it; I shall sink through the floor.' 'Well, then,' says I, 'I won't; though if you sink as easy as that I wonder you are not at it half the time.' But I felt sorry for that man up on the platform, a leading people who wouldn't be led. I always did think balky horses were the most provoking critters that were ever put on a farm. He took out his handkerchief and wiped his face, and it looked red enough to blaze.

"At last the leader of the whole thing, or the conductor, they called him, came to the poor man's help. Says he: 'We have but three minutes left for the discussion of this subject.' Well, why on earth he didn't say that before, if he had any idea of the good it would do, I can't imagine. Their tongues were all loosed by it. They all wanted to talk at once, and they all wanted to say a great deal. They kept hopping up all over the room, and trying to get in their word, and the leader had to call the the world in the hour the clock, as though ready for say, "Con that the g room need ing, and to think spoils. S is that yo do while these men before it v alike."

"I didn spoken ge seat, and Well, now and that having ple

"Then for arguin three of a chance t and then talk, and wasn't so, got which because th clock, and like eight-o-out of faul about was and some difference forty, and t when the did when i because th and I must

"My sa talking like pull each o don't believ conventions

"These I talked so, b ended in a and I'm so joke. But pleasant to and turn to alike; and did? Men

"There w sha'n't ever about helpin you he did I felt like I to teach, or looked roun and I praye through her heard that le I couldn't ke so glad and the glory, an that made us any risk of n

"That wa faced young couldn't help as if I knew

"Mine ey sure of it, yo says I to my young use of filling up one's it would take me half I should blunder; I if I knew 'em all like make me any fitter to aven; they don't need smile, you know, but I over to me, and says ho has written a book e, because he thinks ore than six thousand

rd, and the very first ten there were these
's: 'In the beginning.'
It might be a million s about it; that only a find out when that ghed outright. 'But d Bible chronology, e makes a great many ble figures proves to why we study Bible mistakes of just such children won't be led to them dates and s was quite interesting

r. He strung some ry like, and a good etters; and—well, I d she believed I was learning of them Solomon last night.
I thought if I was right, and know all

NSATIONS.

g folks as ever I see had a conference

The man who commi-
mistakes, and then if you'll believe it, takes. Not one of d, and coaxed, and me of them gaped
s dumb as oysters.

I to Jessie: 'For should think they now two or three
'm.' Says Jessie:
'through the floor.'
gh if you sink as it half the time.'
platform, a-lead-always did think critters that were handkerchief and to blaze.

ing, or the con-
por man's help.
left for the dis-
earth he didn't the good it would
e all loosed by it.
ey all wanted to up all over the d the leader had to call them to order. Said I to Jessie: 'That's for all the world the way your Uncle Solomon acts when he gets in the house a little before dinner is ready. He looks at the clock, and he watches me, and he gapes, and he acts as though there was nothing in the world he was so near ready for as his dinner, till I get it all on the table, and say, "Come, Solomon!" and then he's off. He finds out that the gate isn't shut, and that the stove in the front room needs a stick of wood, and his hands need washing, and there's no end to the things that he seems to think he must do while the dinner waits there and spoils. Sometimes I say to him, "Solomon, what a pity it is that you couldn't have found some of those things to do while you sat there waiting." And so I say of these men; if they couldn't only have found their tongues before it was time to go, still, I believe men are all alike.'

"I didn't think I was talking so loud, till the pleasant-spoken gentleman began to laugh so hard he shook the seat, and then I saw that Jessie was blushing again. Well, now, wasn't it queer that they should act like that, and that man a-coaxing them for der life, and they having plenty to say all the time?

"Then you never see the beat of that Convention for arguing. They just liked it. There were two or three of 'em who sat all ready bristled, waiting for a chance to say, 'I don't agree with Brother Jones,' and then their eyes would glisten, and they would talk, and talk, and argue about whether it was so or wasn't so, till I couldn't help thinking some of 'em forgot which side they begun on, and just went on talking because they was kind of wound up, you know, like a clock, and couldn't stop till they ran down. I never did like eight-day clocks; and I'm dreadful glad they've gone out of fashion. Some of the things that they argued about was just as plain as that two and two make four; and some of them argued as though it didn't make no difference to them whether two and two make four or forty, and they went right along with just as much energy when the thing wasn't of a mite of consequence as they did when it was important. I really think they did it because they liked to, just as boys wrestle, you know; and I must say they kept their tempers first-rate.

"My sakes!" says I to Jessie, "if these were women talking like this, in about three minutes more they would pull each other's hair and scratch each other's eyes. I don't believe it would be a good idea for women to have conventions."

"These men, some of them, looked pretty fierce, and talked so, but, if you will believe me, the whole thing ended in a laugh at last. I didn't get hold of the joke, and I'm sorry for that, for Solomon does enjoy a good joke. But I laughed with the rest; it seemed so kind of pleasant to see them get good-natured, and give it all up and turn to something else, as nice as if they all thought alike; and for the matter of that, who knows but they did? Men are such queer creatures."

"There was one man who was in powerful earnest. I sha'n't ever forget him. He lectured to the teachers about helping their scholars to come to Christ, and I tell you he did make solemn work of it!—grand work, too. I felt like I would give almost anything to know enough to teach, or to be young again and learn it all. And I looked round on that young thing that I'd took there, and I prayed to the Lord to let me do some of my work through her. I can't help wishing you could all have heard that lecture. The tears just ran down my cheeks; I couldn't keep them back, I felt a solemn like, and yet so glad and happy; for he told about heaven, and about the glory, and the lasting for ever, and all that, in a way that made us feel as though we couldn't think of running any risk of missing it."

"That was in the evening, and I sat by my pleasant-faced young man again, and when we were coming out I couldn't help holding out my hand to him. I felt exactly as if I knew him, and says I:

"'Mine eyes shall see the King in His beauty. I'm sure of it, young man, and I do hope you are.' And I'm beat if there wasn't tears in his eyes too. He caught hold of my hand and shook it hard, and says he:

"I am indeed, thank the Lord. And then what did he do but turn to Jessie, and says he, 'You, too, I trust.' And Jessie's voice was all of a tremble, and her cheeks were like roses, and she said, 'Oh, I hope so.' 'Don't leave it that way,' says I. 'Make a sure thing of it, child.'

"I couldn't help it. It did seem dangerous, as well as kind of sad, not to feel certain as you were alive about it, and I knew I did. But I'll never forget that lecture; it was worth all the money we spent just to hear it, and I know it will do me good for ever. 'What is that man's name?' says I, and I gave Jessie my programme. 'You mark your pencil all round it,' says I, 'for I want to thank him when I see him in heaven for this night's work,' and I mean to.

"But I tell you, it takes all sorts of folks to make a world. Some of the people didn't like that speech. He was 'dry,' they said. I heard one woman say that two or three times; she sat right before me, and she kept wetting up her throat with candy all the evening, and giving some to the man that sat next her, and then they would whisper and giggle. She was nothing but a girl, and I told Jessie if she had been mine I should have felt like whipping her and sending her to bed; and I do think mothers ought to keep their girls by them till they learn them how to act. It does put me out of all patience to see folks whispering and laughing at a meeting; if the lecture or preaching, or whatever it was, was as dry as chips—and I won't deny but that some of those men were dry enough; and those that had the most letters at the end of their name seemed to be the driest—but I'd pretend I understood, just for the looks of the thing, and give other folks a chance to hear. It was curious, though, about them titles; they stand for learning, and the more they have of them the more learned they are. D.D.'s, you know, and LL.D.'s and Ph.D.'s and the land knows what; I didn't understand the letters, nor the men either, some of them, and says I to Jessie:

"I suppose they've got to prove that they deserve all them letters, and so they don't dare to come down and use words that we ever heard before; more's the pity."

"But for all that, if there's any one thing more than another that I do despise, it is whispering and laughing, and bringing folk's meals to the meeting-house! Why, some of those people munched candy and nuts and chewed gum the whole living time. There were two girls, and sometimes a boy, that seemed possessed to sit somewhere near me—I suppose because they aggravated me so.

"Did you ever see them Orientals? The same man showed 'em. No, they ain't pictures, they are real live folks; he took 'em right there out of the Convention. But, land, you'd never have known them in the world! They were dressed up just like the folks used to dress in Bible times, and they talked like them and acted like them. You knew it was just as they talked and acted then, because they fit right into the Bible as complete as though they had been living when it was written. The women carrying water-pots on their heads, you know, and gleaning in the fields, and gathering sticks for the fire, and wearing veils; and the bridegroom coming at midnight, and they a-going out to meet him with lamps and all that. All complete just as the Bible tells it. And, if you'll believe it, the folks out in them countries are at that same kind of life yet; veils and all. Such looking beings as they are! And such actions! I tell you what it is, we ought to do more for the heathen. I joined the Missionary Society first thing I did after I got home; and I mean to work for it, too, with all my might. I never thought much about it before, but I couldn't get them women out of my mind, nor the men either, for that matter. I believe they looked the most outlandish of the two. I know it was all natural, 'cause it fitted into the Bible, and made you understand what some of the verses meant. I tell you them folks need converting. We must set right to work and do our best for them."

"But, oh, I wish you could have seen the Holy Land! Soft, pretty paintings of the sky, and the water, and the grass, in the country where the Lord Jesus Christ was, you know. I declare it made me feel so queer, when the man was pointing out the well where He sat, and the road to Bethany, and the palm-trees, and all; I most couldn't keep the tears back.

"There was a picture of Jerusalem, lying still and pleasant there in the sunshine, and the great hills all around it, and as we sat gazing at it, the man who was showing them said suddenly, in his strong, solemn voice: "As the mountains are round about Jerusalem, so the Lord is round about His people."

"I never felt so safe before. There they were, you know, the great mountains, looking stronger than time itself; and there was the promise; and it seemed the silliest thing not to trust Him. You needn't go to thinking it is because I am old and foolish that it had such a power over me. There was Jessie, with her young face all shining, and the tears just ready to drop, and says she:

"Oh, auntie, I'd like to go there!"

"You shall, child," says I, "to His own country. He has gone to prepare a place for you, you know, and He will come back and get you; all you've got to do is to see to it that you are ready when He comes."

"I tell you the whole thing seemed more real to me than it ever did before. After that, how do you suppose we felt to hear two women say, just as we were going out:

"Why in the world do they want to spend so much time over those pictures of Palestine? They are nothing but outlines anyway, and I don't think they are interesting at all; the description of them is always so dry."

"There was quite a good many people there who were troubled with dryness. They wanted something funny the whole blessed time, but they didn't like to own it, and so when things wasn't funny they just lumped them and called 'em 'dry.' The Bible readings were dry, and the lectures on Bible History were dry, and the lessons on Bible Geography were dry, and the Normal Classes were the most dreadful dry of anything; and I'll venture to say that if them kind of folks had been willing to own it, they thought the Bible itself was as dry as dust. Oh, well, of course folks of that kind creep in; they like to get to places and see the sights and hear the funny things, and what harm does it do? Maybe now and then they get an idea; who knows?"

"The folks wasn't all of that kind, I can tell you; only here and there one thrown in. And them Convention people know enough to understand that there is no kind of use in trying to please everybody all the time. There's no trade on earth so easy to learn as grumbling, you know. I shouldn't wonder if more folks got to be head workmen in that line than any other. Why, if I had really set out for it, I could have found something to grumble at the most of the time. There was one man that most made me feel like flying out of the window. He was real smart, and I wanted to hear all he said, but when he got into about the middle of his sentence he was sure to drop his voice away down into his boots, so that I couldn't make anything out of it. I did get so provoked!

"For the land's sake," says I, "I do wish he would take breath enough once to carry him through a whole sentence so I could hear the end of it."

"But he didn't; he went on that way to the very last. I told Solomon that I could give him the first half of a good many good things, and if he had brains enough to finish them out, they might help him. But that seems to me like downright cheating. The last part of them sentences all belonged to me, and he had no right to go and mow them up, and finally swallow 'em without giving me a chance. They said he was the finest orator at the Convention."

"Well," says I, when we were at our boarding-house, eating dinner, "the first half of him is a good deal of an orator, but the last half is a dead failure, I think."

"Still, I said, and I say it yet, if I couldn't have heard the first word that he said, I wouldn't have got up and squeaked and rustled out as so many of them did. When I once commenced I'd have stuck it out if it most choked me. I do hate to see folks nipping out of church during a meeting. They kept doing it there all the time; it did seem queer to me that a few of them couldn't have made up their minds to go together, and have done with it; but no, right in the middle of somebody's speech, up would bob a woman and rustle herself out, and that would seem to give another one the notion that she would like to do the same; but mind you, she would wait until the other had got down the aisle, and opened the door and shut it, and had time to get to the foot of the stairs, and then she would start, and she would suggest the idea to another one, and so they kept it a-going by spells, all day. Says I to Jessie:

"Now, if I faint dead away, and don't appear to be coming to, after five minutes or so, why I suppose you can have me carried out; but, for anything less than that I won't go out of this house till after the benediction is pronounced!"

"And I didn't; though some of the speeches were most mortal long!"

CHAPTER IV.

WHAT SOLOMON LEARNED.

"HAD one queer time," said Mrs. Smith, after a careful pause, during which she set the heel in the grey stocking. "It worried Jessie dreadfully; but it didn't me a mite. We heard ourselves talked about. I've always heard it said that listeners never hear any good of themselves, and so far as my knowledges goes, it's true.

"There were two women walking along up the street real slow, spreading out so that you couldn't get by them. They were talking about some Convention folks. And don't you believe one of them went on and described me to the very life, dress, bonnet and all? They were to be pitied, I think; for they had the worst of it. My dress was clean if it hadn't an overskirt; and my bonnet was last year's shape to be sure, but it was paid for, in good, honest money, and so long as I didn't mind wearing it, I didn't think they had any call to worry.

"Well, they went on talking, and they said that was the way with these Conventions. A lot of people came to see the country, and to do shopping along the way, and didn't know nothing about Sunday Schools, nor care nothing about them, and didn't have brains enough to understand what was said, and wanted to get boarded for next to nothing, so they just made the meeting an excuse; and for their part they thought it was an imposition.

"Now it happened that I had seen both them women before. They set right behind me all the forenoon, and bothered me most amazing, keeping up a whispering about how they preserved plums, and canned tomatoes, all the time that man was telling us about the Holy Land. They were the ones who thought the lecture was so 'dry.' I made up my mind it was my Christian duty to help them women a little, so I spoke right up, though Jessie, she twitched at my eveva.

"See here," says I, "it's no more than right that I should let you know that I'm just behind you with the very dress on that you've been describing, only you didn't get it quite right; the side-breadths ain't cut goring at all; I always make mine straight, and it didn't cost but twenty cents a yard, instead of twenty-five, as you thought. But now I want to tell you: I do know a little bit about Sunday Schools. My husband, Solomon Smith, is the superintendent of the one at the Hollow. He couldn't come himself—at least, he thought he couldn't—so he sent me, and I've been a-listening every single minute—when I could get a chance for the whispering—and I shall tell Solomon all about it as soon as I get home. I thing I've to my day wouldn't I to buy the it cheap— know the mite of an will stop a few days v eight of th store at th I listened doing up again at t a bit dry. Sunday Sc soon as I

"Warn trying to n how they describing Jessie, she thinks I v chicken-ho concerned. them good and I told

"What night, after for an hou just as int Sunday, a next Sund as I can m will help t

"Now o Then says told you a For one th exercises c things that won't thin Long praye they wer' apt to ma now that's

At this p by laughin "I can't "I've kep too funny: "Bless "laugh aw places."

Then Ma again, by a "Why, I said, in th you're righ mind I'd m and says I atop when folks wou then they c closing th folk's tim of encourag Now, Solo and then u to the teac you can st living bein then you c them heav; tending to up the less that was ti

I couldn't have heard
n't have got up and y of them did. When out if it most choked out of church during e all the time; it did n couldn't have made I have done with it;
nobody's speech, up myself out, and that motion that she would she would wait until and opened the door
the foot of the stairs, ould suggest the idea a-going by spells, all

I don't appear to be why I suppose you anything less than that er the benediction is e speeches were most

NED.

id Mrs. Smith, after hich she set the heel
"It worried Jessie
t me a mite.
I always heard it said f themselves, and so along up the street ouldn't get by them.

vention folks. And n and described me
? They were to be rst of it. My dress and my bonnet was as paid for, in good,
t mind wearing it,
rry.

they said that was lot of people came ing along the way,
y Schools, nor care
e brains enough to
to get boarded for e the meeting an ght it was an in-both them women the forenoon, and up a whispering canned tomatoes, as about the Holy ght the lecture was my Christian duty te right up, though than right that I hind you with the scribing, only you readths ain't cut right, and it didn't of twenty-five, as you: I do know a husband, Solomon

e at the Hollow.
he thought he a listening every e for the whisper-it as soon as I get home. I didn't come to do no shopping. Every living thing I've bought since I left home is a tin-horse to send to my daughter's baby, and it stands to reason that I wouldn't have come a hundred and thirty-two miles just to buy that. As for getting my board cheap, I have got it cheap—good board, too—and I'm thankful for it. I know the folks I'm stopping with ain't grugged me a mite of anything. They've about promised me that they will stop next fall on their way out West, and spend a few days with me, and if they do I sha'n't grudge them a sight of the country, and they may go a-shopping to the store at the Corners if they want to. I'm glad I come. I listened to every word of that lecture, when you were doing up your plums, and canning your tomatoes over again at the Hall this morning. I didn't think it was a bit dry. And I mean to help Solomon along in his Sunday School work by that, and some other things, as soon as I get home.

"Warn't they beat, though! They went to work trying to apologise. 'Didn't mean me,' they said, though how their consciences would let them say that, after describing of me to my face and eyes, I don't know. Jessie, she cried a little about it, and Solomon says he thinks I was rather hard on them. Solomon is sort o' chicken-hearted, you know, where people's feelings is concerned. But I really shouldn't wonder if it done them good. I didn't bear them no malice, not a speck, and I told them so.

"What do you think Solomon said to me the other night, after I had been talking about that meeting to him for an hour on the 'retch? 'Maria,' says he, 'it's all just as interesting as it can be. But it's getting near to Sunday, and what I want to know is: What am I to do next Sunday that will make our school better? As near as I can make out, you ain't told me anything yet that will help the school along.'

"Now do you know for about a minute I was beat. Then says I: 'Why, Solomon, yes I have. Haven't I told you a dozen things that you want to stop doing? For one thing, you are never to go and have devotional exercises on purpose to fill up—making a prayer about things that you ain't thought of before in a month, and won't think of again in another month. It's disgraceful. Long prayers ain't devotional, anyhow; I always thought they weren't, and now I know they ain't; and you are apt to make just a trifle too long prayers, Solomon, now that's the truth.'

At this point Laura broke the spell which had held us by laughing immoderately.

"I can't help it," she said, when I shook my head. "I've kept it bottled up all the afternoon; but this is too funny."

"Bless your heart, child!" said dear Mrs. Smith, "laugh away; I like to hear folks laugh in the right places."

Then Mary called us to order, and started Mrs. Smith again, by asking what Solomon said.

"Why, he thought about it for a spell, and then he said, in that thoughtful way of his, 'Well, I dunno but you're right.' So while I was about it, I made up my mind I'd mention a matter that has bothered me a little, and says I: 'There's another thing, Solomon, you can stop when you get through.' Some of the Convention folks would say, 'But my time is up and I must close,' then they would move along, without any more idea of closing than a clock has of not ticking. Stealing other folk's time, and easing up their consciences, and kind of encouraging folks by owning of it every few minutes. Now, Solomon,' says I, 'I have thought that you now and then used up some of the time that rightly belonged to the teachers, and, if I was you, I wouldn't do it. Then you can stop picking out a tune every little while that no living being but you and Job Simmons can sing. And then you can give up that habit you have of squeaking them heavy boots of yours up and down the aisles, attending to some business while Mr. Brown is summing up the lesson; I never knew how kind of aggravating that was till the men and women, especially the women, squeaked through that Hall times when I wanted to hear. Not but that I wouldn't most as soon hear your boots squeak as to hear Mr. Brown sum up the lesson. But that's neither here nor there; it don't look like the right thing.

"'Why, Solomon,' says I, 'I could keep on all night. There's hundreds and hundreds of interesting things in the Bible and about the Bible that you never dreamed of, and you ought to know them. History and dates and all them things. It proves that you can't be mistaken; it makes you feel as sure of there being such a place as Bethany as that there is such a place as the Hollow and the Four Corners. And 'Peter' and 'John' and all them as real as Job Simmons and John Stackhouse; and heaven itself seems more real than the solid earth. There's no use in saying that such things don't save souls; neither do sermons. But they make things look plainer and seem truer; leastways they ought to. There ought to be a lot of Bible studying done by anybody that undertakes to superintend a Sunday School; and a great deal of praying too. Nothing ever seemed more certain than that. 'Solomon,' says I, 'if you could have been at that closing meeting, and heard them pray for the Sunday School superintendents and teachers and scholars, that they might all work just as the Lord Jesus Christ would have them work, you would have gone to Sunday School next Sunday holding your head steadier than you ever did before in your life; because you would know that it was being held up for you with that kind of praying, and you'd have been a better superintendent than you ever were before, because, after joining in them prayers, you would know that now you had promised before the Lord to do your best, and you would have gone to work to get ready for it. I tell you it's solemn business! That's one of the things I learned, anyhow.'

"The long and short of it is, said Solomon, after thinking of it over, 'you've learned at the Convention that a Sunday School man must study the Bible a great deal, and pray a great deal, and think about his work a great deal, and do the very topmost that he can, every time.'

"'Yes,' says I, 'that's about it.'

"'Well,' says he, getting up and going over for the big Bible, 'I think that is about enough to learn in a week, especially as it'll last a lifetime.'

"'I've learned another thing,' says I, 'and that is that you're to go to the next Sunday School meeting that comes along, if I have to wear my old grey dress year in and year out, and have to sell my speckled calf in the bargain. It's all very nice as far as it goes to tell you about it, but it won't do; you ought to be there to feel it. 'What about Jessie?' Well, now, do you know that's the cream of the whole thing! I can't think of her without the tears coming. That child's woke up. She heard the voice of the Lord Himself speaking to her, right there in them meetings.

"Says she to me: 'Anntie, I do thank you for bringing me here; and I'm going home to work; I can do it.' And I knew she could.

"The other night I had a letter from my sister Hannah—her mother, you know—and in it she says: 'What did you do to bewitch our Jessie? The child has gone to work as if all the children in town were dependent on her. She has even taken a class in Sunday School; dreadful little scamps, who never behaved in their lives till last Sunday; but some way, nobody knows how, she contrived to bewitch them.'

"It was just before family worship that we were reading the letter, and Solomon he wiped his glasses a good deal while I was reading of it; Solomon sets great store by Jessie. I wish you could have heard him pray for her! My! I knew then, just as well as could be, that them boys of hers would behave the next day. I'm waiting to hear that they did.

"Yes, I've joined a class at the Hollow. Never too old to learn, you know. We had a real good time yesterday; and Solomon didn't pray but four minutes by the clock, and he never squeaked them dreadful boots of his round ones; and the singing was nice old tunes. I never did see such a master hand as Solomon is for taking a hint.'

CHAPTER V.

"SOME THINGS IS QUEER."

"SOLOMON can't go," said Mrs. Smith, musing in her knitting, and looking meditatively into the fire.

"And he is dreadful set on my going. Jonas is the only kin he has left; they ain't been much like brothers, so far as visiting goes; it must be nearly twenty years since they've laid eyes on each other, and as for writing letters, Solomon is no hand to write; but he has a very warm heart towards Jonas and all his family, and he thinks a wedding is something uncommon, that ought to bring the family together, and the long and short of it is, he wants me to go."

"Of course you ought to go," my Mary said, speaking in the first pause; "I shouldn't think you would miss it for anything; a city wedding is a grand affair. I hope you will go if it is for nothing but to tell me about it when you get home. I suppose it will be ever so splendid; they are rich people, aren't they?"

"As to that I don't believe they've any too much to spend on flummories, child," Mrs. Smith said, looking with such loving eyes on Mary, that, while the child blushed and laughed over the searching glance that went up and down the "flummories" on her dress, she was in no wise displeased. Mary never was annoyed by Mrs. Smith's plain speaking.

"I don't know much about them; never was there in my life. Jonas I know when he was a young man, and Sarah, his wife, walked over from Deenville to see me once; she was dressed plain enough then, and was a meek and quiet body. They've lived in the city for more than twenty years, but I guess they've had hard rowing. Solomon has a note of his brother's that there ain't been no interest paid on for more than five years now; and Solomon thinks he wouldn't have done so, if he had been forehanded. If I go I shall take the child a nice little present, to show them that we feel all right about the interest, as of course we do; for when a man can't pay, why, he can't."

A singular combination of circumstances had made us, or rather was about to make us, what Laura called "almost related" to dear old Mrs. Smith. I had a gay young nephew in a distant city, a motherless, fatherless boy, whom, in his quite early life, I had mothered as well as he would let me. He had been, however, for ten years so independent of us that he rarely visited us, and more rarely wrote. Last week he had surprised us by a cordial invitation to his wedding, and the lady whom he was to marry was Solomon Smith's niece, Lida, or "Elizabeth," as Mrs. Smith called her—Jonas Smith's only daughter. Irving, my boy, had been very eager in his urgings that we—uncle, aunt, and cousins—should come to see him made into a "grave old man," but his uncle could not get away from business, neither did Solomon Smith believe that he could. So, after many talks and numberless plans, it was finally settled that Mary should stay at home to care for her father, while Mrs. Smith and Laura and I represented the two families at the wedding. In view of the fact that our boy Irving had no home, our invitation to stop with the Smiths was most cordial, and made it very much "nicer" for our old friend.

So imagine us one winter morning, duly packed, lunched, and with the usual number of bundles, seated in the eight-o'clock express, ready for whatever experiences the next three or four days might have to furnish.

Laura began the journey by looking volumes of indignation at those who dared to smile over Mrs. Smith's appearance; but really I did not blame them: the dear old lady certainly had the faculty for getting herself up in a unique fashion. Her trim black dress was completely hidden by a long heavy cloak of dark-green cloth, an old-fashioned cloth, such as I fancy our grandmothers might have worn—I think it was called camel, and nothing like it, so far as I know, can be found in the stores of to-day.

The shape in which it was fashioned was as quaint as the material. The bonnet which accompanied it was of velvet, and in its better days the pile on it had been heavy; even now the velvet was of a rich, glossy black—not a thread of cotton about it; but the shape of the bonnet suggested at least ten winters of duty, I don't know but many more. The sweet old face looking out from the old-fashioned frill that gathered full about the old-fashioned bonnet, was beautiful to us, but those who did not know her were apt to smile. Laura, with her flashing eyes and cheeks aglow over what she felt was disloyalty to a noble soul, had no idea what a pretty contrast she was. She had finished her dark-green travelling-suit but the day before, and it became her wonderfully; she had taken counsel of the dear old lady's taste somewhat, I fancy, for there were no "furbelows" of any sort about it. She turned a seat and made herself comfortable, sitting backwards, establishing Mrs. Smith beside me, for protection from "giggles and simpletons generally," she whispered, as she leaned over to arrange my valise as a footstool.

But before the day was done, many who had smiled learned to respect the figure in the dark-green cloak and large bonnet. It was a curious study to watch her, so quiet and unobtrusive was she, yet so alert; nothing escaped her keen grey eyes.

To begin with, of course there was a baby on the car, and of course it demanded more than its share of attention. Now a sweet-faced, cooing baby, arrayed in fine white embroidered garments, with bright eyes and dimpled chin, and mouth that breaks into radiant smiles whenever one looks that way, is an exquisite bit of enjoyment for anybody. I have seen Laura go into raptures over such a one, and borrow it of a dotting mother, and kiss it and coo to it by the hour together; but this baby was not over-clean, bearing about on its coarse dress the marks of a long journey. At his best, he was not pretty, for he was wide-mouthed and tow-headed, and had dull, unresponsive eyes; besides, he was tired and sleepy, and yet would not sleep; hungry, too, and the bill of fare spread out before him in the shape of watery-looking milk in a cinder-covered bottle, and a molasses cookie, seemed to disgust him; on the whole, he was undeniably cross. He threw away the cookie, and tried to send the bottle after it; he pulled at his tired, discouraged mother's nose, and at her hair, which was in such disorder that it did not need this touch to add to the dreariness of her appearance; by turns he whined piteously or yelled outright. The mother lifted him from one tired arm to the other, and coaxed and petted as well as she knew how, and scolded a little, especially at the four-year-old tow head who clung to her shawl, and was in every way dirtier, uglier, and more objectionable looking than the baby. This group sat nearly opposite us, the father absorbed, most of the time, in a newspaper. Laura watched them furtively, annoyed by their close proximity, annoyed by the molasses cookie on the floor, surrounded with puddles of tobacco juice which the father from time to time poured upon it; annoyed, apparently, that so forlorn a specimen of baby should turn all the poetry connected with childhood into disagreeable prose. Mrs. Smith watched them, too, but with an entirely different face. Intense sympathy with both mother and baby was so strongly written on it that I was not in the least surprised, presently, to see her give a brisk little spring forward and come back with the angry baby. His irritation was, however, held in check by astonishment; I am sure he was not used to motherly old arms.

"Poor little fellow!" murmured his new friend; "how tired he looks. Cinders in his eyes and cookie in his mouth and nose; no wonder he cries. Laura, if you would just wet my handkerchief for me, I could make him more comfortable in a minute, and rest his poor mother a bit."

Very gravely Laura arose, very slowly she drew off the dark kid glove that matched her suit, and prepared to go to the water-tank and wet the capacious clean handkerchief which was intended to cleanse baby's face. The deed was done, however, in process of time, and baby, far from re-entire perfmouth was dwells in a Then he n-little tow h-crooned to time, must look of an-presently w-tired," had all the clo-

were soiled and she w-lay him on quite a nap

"Poor th-
ately at t-lay him dow-him roll o-strength in children an-behind us,
the other li-there's a biglop down an-

"Johnny volumes of
"He's awfumagnetised.
little handkerchief that then he leas-
to a quaint, naughty pu-
myself by w-
and natural, let his moth-
her all throagain: "On boy, who sta-and took a st-no, indeed I mother's arm little boy did and listened into Egypt beauty, and was curled in cloak wrapp-Evidently the many questio-
at thoughts thoughts wh-Who knows t-
and moulding

Presently paper suffice
sibility in life

The distin-
call it breath-
that she was The father se-affairs, and c-
of our seat an-

"My youn-
"Not a mi-been a joy to tire me; and as gold, and has heard a n-

Johnny noc-
"He's a fir-Smith, and a-
himself up tout, she add-to have heard real wonderfu-

ed was as quaint as the panied it was of velvet, t had been heavy; even assy black—not a thread of the bonnet suggested t know but many more.
from the old-fashioned old-fashioned bonnet, did not know her wor shing eyes and cheeks yally to a noble soul, at she was. She had quit but the day before, e had taken counsel of at, I fancy, for there about it. She turned ble, sitting backwards, e, for protection from y," she whispered, as e as a footstool.

as a baby on the car, n its share of atten-only, arrayed in fine right eyes and dimpled liant smiles whenever bit of enjoyment for o raptures over such other, and kiss it and at this baby was not e dress the marks of is not so pretty, for he and had dull, unre-and sleepy, and yet the bill of fare spread ry-looking milk in a es cooky, seemed to ndeniably cross. He end the bottle after d mother's nose, and rder that it did not iness of her appear-o yelled outright.
d arm to the other,
she knew how, and
-year-old tow head
every way dirtier,
ing than the baby.
he father absorbed, Laura watched them ximity, annoyed by unded with puddles time to time poured forlorn a specimen nnected with child-
nished watched them, ace. Intense sym-so strongly written ried, presently, to ard and come back was, however, held he was not used to new friend; "how and cooky in his

es. Laura, if you me, I could make and rest his poor

y she drew off the
and, prepared to scious clean hand-baby's face. The
of time, and baby,

far from resenting, seemed soothed and pleased with the entire performance. He actually smiled, and though his mouth was undeniably large, that lovely mystery which dwells in a baby's smile came instantly to glorify this one. Then he nestled in the comfortable arms, and laid his little tow head against the motherly bosom, and was softly crooned to sleep. The look on the mother's face, meantime, must have said Mrs. Smith; I know it softened the look of annoyance in Laura's eyes. The mother came presently with grateful, homely words; she was "dead tired," had been travelling three days and two nights; all the clothes she had brought with her for the children were soiled, and they were both as cross as two sticks, and she was clean discouraged. She would take baby and lay him on the seat beside her, maybe he would take quite a nap.

"Poor thing!" Mrs. Smith said, looking compassionately at the mother, and cuddling the baby; she would lay him down herself, and sit beside him. "I won't let him roll off," she said, with delightful assurance of strength in her voice; "I've done the same thing for my children and grandchildren; here's an empty seat right behind us, I'll make a nice bed for him, and I'll coax the other little fellow to me, and keep him comfortable; there's a big apple in my satchel he'll like; then you just lay down and take a nap; it will do you good."

"Johnny won't come," said the mother, looking volumes of thanks that she did not know how to express. "He's awful bashful." But Johnny did come. He was magnetised. He had his face washed, too, and his dirty little hands, with another corner of the capacious handkerchief that Laura obediently wetted for the purpose, then he leaned against the old green cloak, and listened to a quaint, sweet story, beginning about a kitty and a naughty puppy, and changing, I hardly understand myself by what transition, only I know it seemed sweet and natural, to the story of a nice little unselfish boy, who let his mother take a nap, and was a help and comfort to her all through a long journey. Then the story branched again: "Once there was a little boy, a beautiful baby boy, who started with his father and mother in the night and took a long, dangerous journey—not on the cars—oh no, indeed! but sometimes on foot, and sometimes in his mother's arms, on a donkey's back, and all the way that little boy did not once do a naughty thing." And I sat and listened, and heard the old, old story of the flight into Egypt grow into marvellously vivid power and beauty, and the four-year-old Johnny, who by this time was curled into a corner of the seat with a bit of the green cloak wrapped about him, listened as one spellbound. Evidently the old story was a new one to him. He had many questions to ask; wise little questions, that hinted at thoughts hid away beneath that shock of yellow hair; thoughts which might some day grow into deep ones. Who knows to what extent our dear old lady was shaping and moulding them that day?

Presently the father roused from his tobacco and his paper sufficiently to remember that he had some responsibility in life, and looked about him for his family.

The distinct, steady breathing—if I should by courtesy call it breathing—of his tired wife, told all her neighbours that she was making the most of her much-needed rest. The father seemed greatly astonished at the condition of affairs, and came presently and leaned against the back of our seat and talked with Mrs. Smith.

"My youngster there will tire you all out."

"Not a mite," spoken in a hearty way that might have been a joy to any father's heart. "Nice little boys don't tire me; and he is a nice little boy; he has been as good as gold, and let his mother and little brother sleep. He has heard a nice story, too. Haven't you, Johnny?"

Johnny nodded.

"He's a first-rate listener, Johnny is," continued Mrs. Smith, and as the boy slipped away from her and gave himself up to staring at Laura, who had her watch out, she added: "He did more than listen. You ought to have heard his wise little questions. I think they were real wonderful! in such a little fellow."

"Johnny is a cute enough chap," said the gratified father, and the fatherly look that came into his eyes began to reconcile me somewhat to his appearance.

Up to this time I had not liked him at all.

"He is as bright as a button," was Mrs. Smith's emphatic statement. "Two nice boys you've got; the baby is uncommon strong with his hands and feet. In just a little while you'll have them trotting about after you, copying every single thing you do. Boys are almost certain to copy their fathers; that's one reason I was sorry that mine were all girls. I wanted them to copy Solomon; he's my husband; and Solomon hasn't a habit about him hardly, that a boy wouldn't be the better for copying. I think fathers ought to look out for that; specially if they've got bright boys."

The father in question looked down at his boots and said nothing. I was glad he could not see Laura's curling lip. She evidently was thinking of ways in which he might be copied that would not improve his boys. Mrs. Smith was silent only a moment, then she returned to the charge.

"I was thinking of that when I sat looking at your baby's fat little face and clean, sweet mouth, after he had gone to sleep; what a dreadful pity it would be to have it all stained up with tobacco. They'll go to chewing before long, I suppose; time flies fast, and boys begin uncommon early nowadays; but doesn't it seem most too bad to think of it?"

He might have been an uninterested third person, to judge by the innocent tones of Mrs. Smith's voice. It was certainly a bold experiment. I watched him curiously to see how he would take it. His dark, reddish skin grew a shade redder, and his eyes flashed a little; but the wrinkled old face was so kind, and the large old hand patted his sleeping baby so tenderly, that, apparently without knowing it, his face softened. He moved uneasily, as one unwilling to leave the subject, yet unwilling to talk about it.

"I don't know as I care about my young ones taking to chewing," he said at last; "not while they are boys, anyhow. I calculate to bring 'em up about right; and smoking and chewing is no kind of business for a boy."

"Well, I dunno. Don't it seem a kind of a pity that a boy couldn't be allowed to copy his father? It seems so natural like, they begin it before they get their first boots, and they're always at it; trying to walk like father, and eat like father, and talk like father; that is, if they have good fathers. It seems almost as if it was what the Heavenly Father intended—one of the ways to teach them. Don't you think so?"

He shifted uneasily from one foot to the other. This was evidently a new idea, and suggested other serious thoughts to him.

"There's no particular harm in chewing that I know of," he said at last in a dogged sort of tone.

"Well," said Mrs. Smith, tucking the plaid shawl carefully about the baby, "I always thought that depended on what you chewed. Tobacco, now, brings a good deal of harm along with it. Besides spoiling of the breath, and making things untidy all around"—and whether she meant it or not, her eyes wandered to the baby's cooky still swimming in the river of tobacco—"it's injurious to health, and expensive; I know all about it, you see. I had a cousin, once, who smoked and chewed up a whole farm, well stocked."

"A farm!" repeated the father, his voice expressing astonishment and incredulity; "not a very large one, I guess."

"Well, as to that, it was a pretty considerable farm for them times. Forty acres or so, all in good order, and cows and horses, and farming utensils, all complete, and he just made away with the whole thing."

"Smoking and chewing!"

"Well, that was the beginning. You see his father took to smoking soon after he was married; then he went to chewing, and the boy when he was a little fellow liked the smell of tobacco, seemed to kind of hanker after it; inherited the taste from his own father, you see. He wasn't to blame, poor fellow; he wasn't fourteen when he could smoke a cigar with the best of them, and it worked just as it often does; by-and-by tobacco didn't satisfy him; nothing that he could smoke or chow was strong enough for the craving he felt. It was born in him, poor boy. He'd tried beer, and then brandy; and after a while he couldn't seem to live at all without having a bottle in one pocket and a chunk of tobacco in the other. Of course, he chewed up and swallowed down the whole of that farm; didn't leave enough of it to buy him a coffin, or bury him; so the town buried him. The father's money was all gone, of course; but he is living yet, the father is, and manages to get enough money to keep him puffing and spitting. He's a queer father, now, ain't he, when he looked on and saw all that, and just chewed and puffed away? He never drank a drop in his life, so far as I know; the tobacco satisfies him; but when the next generation took the disease, they took it stronger, just as they're apt to, and tobacco didn't do. Some things is queer."

Thus concluded Mrs. Smith, rubbing her chin meditatively with her disengaged hand, while with the other she patted the baby. I studied her quiet face, and tried to decide whether she really knew that she had been reading the father the sharpest kind of a lecture on parental responsibility and inherited tendencies.

"Wall," the father said at last, after turning quite to one side to eject a quid of tobacco, "wall," he continued, "I've known boys who didn't anoke or chew, though their fathers did."

"That's true," said Mrs. Smith pleasantly; "oh yes, that's true. If there wasn't a sign of a chance for the children it would be awful; but then the chances are against 'em, dreadfully against 'em, and the curious part of it is, if they have nice, good fathers who do about right in other things, the chances against 'em are a great deal worse, because you see they can't help kind o' wanting to follow father and be like him, and they can't see no harm in what he does. It seems a dreadful pity for a father to keep doing what he wouldn't have his boy do for a good deal. That's an uncommon fine-shaped head of your Johnny's. He is great on mimicking, isn't he? You ought to have heard him tell me how the engine went. He had it complete."

This sudden transition from tobacco to Johnny surprised me, but the father answered with a gratified nod: "He mimics everything and everybody like a monkey."

Then immediately that dark-red streak rolled up into his face again. He plainly saw that he had caught himself in the meshes of his own admission. He went back to his sleeping wife, and if I am a judge of faces, he revolved two thoughts:

"What if the old lady is right, and the little monkey should go to mimicking me?" and "I don't want the little scamp to smoke or chew. I don't see the harm in it for me, but it is different with him. I'd just as soon he wouldn't."

CHAPTER VI.

"I THINK OF THINGS TO DO, AND MRS. SMITH DOES THEM."

"I COULDN'T do such things, mamma," Laura had said to me earnestly, as she watched Mrs. Smith cuddling the baby. "Nice sweet children I can fondle, but these are so disagreeable-looking; and the father and mother are disagreeable. Besides, what is the use? She will wash their faces, but how long will they stay clean, and when will they be washed again, and what does it matter anyway?"

As she had poured these questions out on me, seemingly irritated over her own thoughts, they amused me so much that I could only laugh in answer, and wonder who was arguing with Laura, to convince her that she ought to be as benevolent as Mrs. Smith. But while the conversation between the father and his new friend was in progress, I noticed that Laura had drawn the boy Johnny to her side; had shown him the machinery of her watch, and the queer little picture set in the charm; had allowed him to finger the chain, and then to count the bright buttons on her cloak, and finally seated him beside her, and was in full tide of earnest talk.

"He really is an interesting little fellow," she explained to me with a slight blush and laugh, as she saw me watching her.

The baby took a long nap, and awoke in peace, was straightened out and kissed, and made comfortable by Mrs. Smith before the mother roused from what had evidently been her first rest since the journey began. I had noticed with interest that, after the father took his seat again, he had carefully drawn his wife's head from an uncomfortable position, and rested it on his shoulder; after which he sat in perfect quiet, neither spitting nor reading until the nap was concluded. The tired woman awoke with a start, as if she had stolen time from duty, and her cheeks grew hot over the condition of things. I either saw, or fancied I saw, a shy sort of smile quiver for an instant on her face, as she observed where her head was resting. If I am not mistaken, such care for her comfort was new, and was born of the example set by our old lady. She came with hasty and thanks over to her smiling baby.

"He is as good as gold," said Mrs. Smith, and she made room for the mother to sit beside her, asking a question that detained her.

There was some earnest talking after that; baby accepted of his cleansed and newly filled bottle with a smile of satisfaction, and absorbed himself with its contents, while the two women talked. Of course I did not hear the words, but the change on the younger woman's face was so rapid and so marked that there was a sort of fascination in watching it. She ceased speaking presently, dropping into the rôle of a listener, and occasionally lifted an ungloved hand, seamed with many days of hard work, and wiped away a tear. Suddenly there was a commotion. Sooner than they had expected, the station at which they were to stop was called out, and it took us all, working rapidly, to robe the baby and Johnny, and see that no bundles or baskets were left behind. There was little time for farewells, though both mother and father managed to grasp Mrs. Smith's hand, and I am sure I heard the mother murmur low: "God bless you; I'll not forget." As for Laura, she kissed Johnny heartily, and bought an apple and a bag of nuts for his comfort.

"Poor thing!" said Mrs. Smith, as the cars having filled up, Laura established her once more in the seat beside me.

"Poor mother! there she is, trying to bring up them two babies without any of His help."

The pronoun was so reverently spoken that I acknowledge my stupidity and absent-mindedness in asking:

"Who? her husband?"

"No," spoken meditatively; "I didn't mean her husband; though the Lord does use that name to make us feel how tender He is of us. I do know as I ever thought of it that way before; queer I didn't, too, when I have Solomon. 'Thy Maker is thy husband;' them are His very words; and then, when He is calling on His people to turn away from their follies and do right, He says, 'For I am married unto you.' Shouldn't you think that the young men and women would take right good care how they made the wedding promises, when they saw from that how much they ought to mean?"

"Thy Maker is thy husband!" I ain't that wonderful, now! I suppose Solomon has thought about that verse a good deal, but it never came to me just like this before. No, child, I was thinking of her trying to get along without the Lord's help. Think of trying to bring up children in this wicked world without asking the Lord about it all! Boys at that! Satan seems to have a special spite against boys; I've often wondered whether it wasn't because they were apt to be out and out something. Girls, now, can slip along somehow, and be six of one, and half a dozen of the other, and not much of anything; but boys are either downright good or do go to shaki care which just about sickens fol water won't things that

"And ar
"Oh, not more apt t which was be sur mischiev you know j
and you ca way one yo to have hi him he ain' and gone l how, that baby's hear asking the
to keep him running to
He is willi band could I had thou it right ou done a sigh I winced mind ran so complete to
"Still," I had; the w refined ide
figure woul
Mrs. Smi
"Yes, she trials, she —to show n
was as good for the fami
trouble is sh Lord all the city, too; I Him for tak safe for her beside their was leaning a-whispering I'll carry th the dark pla
If the sun s any such th enough; but shines, it bo At this p modern trav and book b packages of
"I thought plained Lau
the cars alw
"There's the bright-fa in every s Whereat I
"A prize unless they is!"

"A great

hey?"

"Ay, that them a chan

"So they

"I've heard

meddling wi

they'd mind

drawn the boy Johnny machinery of her watch, the charm; had allowed n to count the bright seated him beside her,
"fellow," she explained laugh, as she saw me

I awoke in peace, was made comfortable by coused from what had the journey began. I er the father took his his wife's head from ted it on his shoulder;
t, neither spitting nor nd. The tired woman tolen time from duty, condition of things.
y sort of smile quiver o observed where her mistaken, such care for e of the example set aste and thanks over

Mrs. Smith, and she beside her, asking a ng after that; baby filled bottle with a himself with its con-

Of course I did not the younger woman's at there was a sort of nd speaking presently, nd occasionally lifted
y days of hard work, ere was a commotion.
station at which they took us all, working ny, and see that no d.
d. There was little r and father managed m sure I heard the ou; I'll not forget."
rtly, and bought an

as the cars having se more in the seat

ng to bring up them

ken that I acknowl-edness in asking:

didn't mean her hust name to make us no as I ever thought t, too, when I have nd; 'them are His alling on His people
o right, He says, didn't you think that ake right good care when they saw from
"Thy Maker is thy I suppose Solomon deal, but it never child, I was thinking Lord's help. Think wicked world without boys; I've often they were apt to be an slip along some-on of the other, and e either downright good or downright bad. That's true, Laura, you needn't go to shaking your pretty head at it; Satan don't much care which side you are on, so long as he can keep you just about milk-warm. That's the kind that sort o' sickens folks; bilin' hot water won't do it, and ice-cold water won't do it; I tell you it's the halfway between things that do the mischief."

"And are girls always halfway between, auntie?"
"Oh, not all of them, bless the Lord! But then they're more apt than boys not to know what they think, nor which way they may happen to turn; so you can never be sure of them. That's the reason they do so much mischief; a downright wicked man you can look out for;
you know just about where he will stand on all questions, and you can plan accordingly; but a slippery sort of halfway one you may coax into a corner where you would like to have him stay awhile; and when you go to look for him he ain't there; he has slipped out at some knot-hole and gone! They were uncommon interesting folks somehow, that family, weren't they? When I felt that little baby's heart beating away, close to mine, I couldn't help asking the Lord to keep him safe; there's such a lot of evil to keep him from! How that mother can stand it without running to Him every few minutes I don't see. And there He is willing to be as interested in it all as even her husband could be! 'Thy Maker is thy husband.' I wish I had thought of that verse to tell her; if you had said it right out when you were thinking of it, you might have done a sight of good."

I winced under this unintentional rebuke. Mrs. Smith's mind ran so much on Bible words that the connection was complete to her, but I had not thought of the verse.

"Still," I said, "it might not have done any good if I had; the woman did not impress me as one who had very refined ideas of the marriage relation. I doubt if the figure would have helped her."

Mrs. Smith shook her head emphatically.
"Yes, she had; real true ideas; when she talked of her trials, she took great pains—went out of her way, in fact —to show me that her husband wasn't no ways to blame; was as good a man as ever lived, and provided all he could for the family. She's true enough to them promises; the trouble is she hasn't thought much of anything about the Lord all these years. Sent two babies to live in the other city, too; I asked her if she didn't feel grateful like to Him for taking care of them for her and keeping of 'em safe for her. I told her I didn't see how she ever stood beside their graves and had 'em covered up, unless she was leaning on Him all the while, and hearing His voice a-whispering, 'I've got them in My arms this minute, and I'll carry them in My bosom.' How do folks get through the dark places without the Lord? I don't understand it.
If the sun shone, year in and year out, and there wasn't any such thing as trouble, seems to me it would be hard enough; but when the clouds are thicker than the sunshine, it beats me."

At this point there came one of those nuisances of modern travel, a peanut and candy and apple and orange and book boy, making his way through the car, pitching packages of prize candy right and left.

"I thought there was a law against gambling," complained Laura, in a somewhat fretful tone; newsagents on the cars always troubled her.

"There's no gambling about these, ma'am," explained the bright-faced young man respectfully; "there's a prize in every single package."

Whereat Laura laughed; but Mrs. Smith said:
"A prize in every one, eh? Nobody need go without unless they choose. Why, what a good illustration that is!"

"A great many folks choose to go without, don't they?"

"Ay, that they do; and complain of you for offering them a chance," he said significantly.

"So they do about the other prize," she said gravely.
"I've heard 'em, many a time. They think folks are meddling with what don't concern them, and they wish they'd mind their own business; and all in life you are after is to get them to take a prize that's ready and waiting for them."

The flush on the young man's face led me to think that he understood the illustration; but he moved on without making any answer, and Mrs. Smith fingered the paper of candy curiously, read the statements concerning it carefully, then got out her old fashioned leather purse that had belonged to Solomon since he was a young man, and counted out ten cents ready for the agent's return.

"I've decided to buy a prize," she said, looking up at him with a smiling face; "though my prize that I'm talking about is without money and without price. Not that it didn't cost enough, but a rich friend paid for it."

It is impossible to give you an idea of the sweet earnestness on her face as she said these words. The young man seemed by no means displeased, yet he had no answer other than to say:

"You'll find the candy fresh and good. I deal in honest articles."

Then Mrs. Smith fumbled for her key, and unlocked with some trouble the old-fashioned satchel at her feet, and got out and studied over carefully certain little paper-covered books, selecting one presently whose title was "The Great Prize," and underneath was printed in black letters, with a hand pointing to it, "So Run that you may Obtain."

In the course of the next hour the busy young agent whisked through the car again, and was stopped by a winning beckon from Mrs. Smith's hand.

"I tried your prize," she said briskly, "and it's real good, too; nice, fresh candy, the kind I like. Now I want you to look into the prize I was telling you about; if you'll read this little book, it will give you the whole story. Will you do it?"

"Turn about is fair play," he said, laughing, albeit the colour deepened in his cheeks; "how much is to pay?"

"Not a cent. Didn't I tell you the prize was free?
You will be sure to read it? Remember, you promised an old woman."

"I'll read it," he said, and went his way.

"I hope I'll meet that young man in the Father's house," was Mrs. Smith's simple comment. "I wish I had asked him his name; but then, I'll remember the face."

In due course of time we spread out our lunch and dined. Mary had pleased herself in preparing a sumptuous one, which Laura arranged on the seat in as dainty a fashion as her limits would allow, bewailing meantime the fact that there was no palace car with its portable tables on this train. Mrs. Smith had also a capacious basket, from which she produced generous slices of bread-and-butter sandwiched with baked beans. I think we never told Mary how delicious those sandwiches were, nor how we neglected the cream biscuit and cold chicken to enjoy them. A ruddy-faced German family, seated a few seats forward of us, had claimed our attention more than once. They were neat, and clean, and quiet-looking. Two of the children had petitioned with hungry eyes for fruits and candies from the passing baskets; their appeals, however, being always denied by wise shakes of the head from father or mother.

"I believe those children are hungry," Laura said, as we were spreading our meal. "See how wistfully they watch us."

Mrs. Smith said nothing. I had not thought that she heard; but she suddenly laid down her own sandwich, dived into the bottom of her basket for three others, large, thick, substantial, and went toward the German group.
Eager words followed in a jargon that the old lady did not in the least understand, noddings of heads, smiles, German thanks, and she came back richer with the gratitude of warm hearts.

While she was absent Laura made this brief comment:
"I think of things to do, and Mrs. Smith does them.
I was just wishing I had the courage to give those people some of our lunch."

"The courage! Did the act call for any special grace in that direction?"

"Oh, I don't know. Suppose they had been indignant—thought I was offering them charity—and refused it?"

"Wouldn't that have been dreadful!" I said. "I don't think you could have survived such an affliction."

Laura laughed. The child is a little inclined to moral cowardice in these minor directions.

Mrs. Smith trotted back presently with some bright-looking cards, illuminated texts in the German language.

"There are so many little Germans live in that lane back of our house," she explained to me half-apologetically, as I watched her selecting them with care; "I keep a lot of these on hand. The children like them, and seeing they are the Lord's own words, there's no reason why He can't use them for His glory if He thinks best."

"Laura," said I, as she trotted away with them, "Mrs. Smith gives more than lunches. They are only to prepare the way for that which she believes the Lord will use."

"Yes'm," Laura said, looking at me with laughing eyes in which there shone tears; "I couldn't do that part, but I might have helped to prepare the way. I wonder if some of this cake would have any influence in that direction?" Then, after a moment of silence: "Mamma, there is another thing that keeps me back quite as much as the danger of being misunderstood and harshly repulsed; I'm afraid of ridicule. See how that elegantly dressed lady, sitting just behind those Germans, is watching her, and whispering to the gentleman at her side. They are enjoying themselves at her expense. When they get home to-night they will tell how she looked and acted, and repeat all the queer things she said, and make their audience shout with laughter. Now, I'm afraid of ridicule; it shrivels me all up, and it makes me indignant to think that she is the subject of their fun."

"You draw on your imagination for facts," I said. "Remember you are by no means certain that they are ridiculing her."

But Laura gave her head a positive shake.

"Yes, I am; as sure of it as though I heard what they were saying. They look like people of that class."

Mrs. Smith came back to us presently; but her ministrations were not over. The elegantly dressed lady and gentleman had by no means escaped her sharp eyes. She had designs on them.

"While I was up there," she began, addressing herself to Laura, "I heard that lady in a silk cloak say she was so thirsty that it made her head ache; and that she would give anything for a bunch of grapes; he tried to get her some, but grapes ain't plenty this time of year, you know. I was thinking, dear, that if you would take her a few of that great big bunch you've got left, it might do a sight of good. Poor thing! she looks tired out."

Poor Laura flushed to the temples. Her moral cowardice, or whatever it is that holds her back, came to the front at once.

"I couldn't do it," she said in a distressed tone; "they would consider it an impertinence. She might have the grapes and welcome, if she would come after them; but I can't get up courage to offer them."

"I don't believe she will come," said Mrs. Smith dryly. "Maybe you could get up courage to give 'em to me, then, and I'll run the risk of her thinking me impertinent."

Of course Laura was lavish at once with her grapes, and Mrs. Smith hurried away, not without stopping, however, to hunt over her package of little books.

"I like to slip in one of His messages for the thirsty soul whenever the Lord gives me a chance," she said, by way of explanation.

"Mamma, I wish she wouldn't," Laura said, twisting nervously on her seat; "the idea of offering a tract to such a stylishly dressed lady as that! Seems to me it is just another instance of 'casting pearls before swine.'"

CHAPTER VII.

"WHOM HAVE WE HERE?"

"THEY seem to receive her advances in a good spirit," I said, as Laura and I watched to see what the elegantly dressed lady would say. "Oh, of course," Laura answered, "they are too well-bred to be other than courteous to her face."

There were some, however, who proved to be less "well-bred." There had entered the car at one of the stations a lady whose description, in brief, might have been, that she was over-dressed; at least, that was the main impression which she left on one's mind. No, I mistake; she was also loud-voiced, conversing with her travelling companion in so distinct a tone that we on the opposite side of the car had often the benefit.

Presently she began to leeward the fact that she had left behind her silver drinking-cup, and was "wretchingly thirsty," yet she would rather "die of thirst," than drink from that "horrid cup fastened to a chain." Face and feature expressed intense disgust. Mrs. Smith looked her sympathy, looked significantly at Laura's silver cup that lay exposed to view; but Laura, her cheeks aglow, refused to take the hint. At last—the grumblings continuing—the dear old lady plunged into her satchel once more, and drew therefrom a little old-fashioned tumbler of rare glass—a choice souvenir of the past century. I fancied that it might be designed as part of the young bride's outfit. It had laid unused, carefully wrapped up in a fine linen towel. She wiped off the possible dust with great care, and went with benevolent face to her neighbour opposite.

The cars were again stationary, and we heard her pleasant voice in explanation:

"Will you borrow my little glass to drink from? I haven't used it at all, and you're welcome to it."

It is almost a pity that I cannot photograph the expression on the stranger's face. In its extreme hatefulness it might have served as a warning to that class of travellers. For what seemed a full minute she continued her ill-bred stare, then said with all the haughtiness of an insulted princess:

"No, indeed! thank you!"

After the retreating old lady she shot these words:

"The idea! the perfect idea!"

Laura's face was aflame. But when I ventured presently to steal a glance at Mrs. Smith, her eyes were as quiet as ever, and her mouth wore its placid smile. She was turning the leaves of one of her little books, and seemed to find peaceful words in its pages. Laura studied her curiously. Presently she leaned forward for a talk.

"Auntie, how do you feel when you meet such people, and they treat you that way?"

"Feel as though the poor things had had very bad bringing up, child," with a twinkle in her eyes and a little twitching at the corners of her mouth.

"I know, of course; but don't you feel the least bit in the world provoked; as though it was no use trying to be kind to some people, and you wouldn't any more?"

I was not prepared for the sudden gravity that overspread the worn face, and the dimness, like that of tears, coming into her eyes. For a moment she was silent, then she said with quiet voice:

"I don't mean to be irreverent, Laura, nor impertinent to Him. I think He understands all about it. But I can't help when such things happen, now and then, like being a trifle glad in my heart—not for their sin, you know, but because I remember just how the people treated Him, and how He said 'the servant is not above his lord,' and it makes me feel kind of sure that I'm His servant. Do you understand, dear?"

"No," said Laura bluntly, "I don't understand anything about it. I know I should feel like telling that woman over there that she had shown herself to be lacking in the first principles of common politeness, and I'm not sure but it would do her good. Whether it would submit

"An
as a she
His mo

It was the trea which longed, Laura
curious noyance tion vi
face.

I oft it durin how mu Laura w naird, seemed

Jesus could al been on Yet she of His d not kno
that she been t ningling with people.

that she
borne th was hea nor end licity of even His
"He is self."

I knew face so could thoughts
It was old frie believed taken. I hear he

"It will ma may Smith m
the worl
as long do with the maj
world is must kee ourselves ridiculed There rustle do

been the
She was betokene

by no me
car; yet represent have furn
"I beg
I wante
where you

It express for a frien
The des
"You l
"Indee

would or not, I couldn't help it. I could never tamely submit to such insulting ways."

"And yet, He was led as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before his shearers is dumb, so He opened not His mouth."

It was a sermon; that one text and the manner in which it was repeated. It seemed to flash before us a sense of the tremendous difference between the poor little trials, which we are fond of calling "crosses," and the prolonged, far-reaching, thorny cross which He bore for us. Laura had no answer to make. She sat back with an curious mixture of annoyance and admiration visible on her face. I often thought of it during those days, how much my daughter Laura would have admired, yea, and it seemed to me, loved Jesus of Nazareth, could she and He have been on earth together. Yet she was not one of His disciples. I do not know; it may be that she would have been tried by His mingling too much with the common people. I am not sure that she could have borne the ridicule that was heaped upon Him, nor endured the publicity of the scene when even His friends said, "He is beside Himself."

I knew my daughter's face so well that I could study her thoughts as I looked. It was evident that while she admired her old friend, she still believed her to be mistaken. I could almost hear her thoughts: "It will not do. Mama may talk, and Mrs. Smith may act, but the world will sneer; as long as we have to do with the stuff that the majority of the world is made of, we must keep ourselves to ourselves, or else be ridiculed or insulted."

There was a little rustle down the centre, and the elegant lady who had been the recipient of the grapes paused at our seat. She was elegant in the extreme. Everything about her betokened wealth and refinement. A quiet dress enough, by no means so noticeable as our neighbour's across the car; yet the long silk circle, with its rich fur-linings, represented in itself more money than possibly would have furnished the other's entire wardrobe.

"I beg pardon," she said in a clear musical voice, "but I wanted to speak with you. Will you tell me, please, where you found that delightful little book you gave me? It expresses exactly what I have wished put into language for a friend of mine, and have not been able to find."

The desired information was given with a beaming face.

"You like it, then?" said Mrs. Smith in great delight.

"Indeed I do! How beautiful it is! And so simply and plainly told! Nothing could more clearly explain our Heavenly Father's loving dealing with us. I thank you for bringing the book to me. It was a very sweet thought."

"You are one of His daughters, then?"

I think I have mentioned before what a peculiar way Mrs. Smith had of speaking those personal pronouns. A sort of lingering tenderness, mingled with something very like awe—an indescribable way, indeed, but it left its impress.

"I have that great honour," the lady said, with a happy look shining over her face; "and I am very glad to meet you, one of His saints, so much farther along on your pilgrimage than I. You will reach home sooner, perhaps; if you do, give the Elder Brother my greeting, and tell Him I am following on."

"The Lord bless and keep you," was Mrs. Smith's tenderly spoken answer.

Then, the two clasped hands, as though they were relatives, and, indeed, now that I think of it, they were; "He that doeth the will of My Father, the same is My brother, and sister, and mother."

I glanced at Laura to see what she thought of this development from the one whom she had planned was to give an entertainment to her home friends, by turning Mrs. Smith into ridicule; but she kept her eyes persistently turned away, and refused to give me the benefit of her thoughts.

It was curious to watch human nature in our car after that.

A party sitting two or three seats ahead of us sent a plate of very rich cake, with their compliments, to "grandma." Our German friends hunted among their treasures and produced a book, not a word of which Mrs. Smith could read, but on being told of the contents her face was radiant. The newsagent, on one of his rushes through the train, paused long enough at our seat to drop a particularly fine-looking orange into her lap, with the words: "There, grandma, that's a sweet fellow." The ambition to show attention to our friend spread through the entire car, men, women, and children making special efforts for her comfort. The lady who had scorned a drink of water from the pretty, old-fashioned tumbler, watched these developments in perplexed astonishment for some time; then, seeming to conclude that she had made a mistake, and that this was some royal personage in disguise, she resolved on making amends, in a direct line with her selfishness, of course, which is the way in which this class of persons always make amends,—

"AND THIS IS—LAURA, I DECLARE!" (p. 18).

"On the whole," she said, leaning across and speaking with careless condescension, "I don't care if I do borrow your queer little glass for a few minutes. I am excessively thirsty."

"It is packed up now," said grandma, regarding her in utmost good humour. "I wrapped it all up in the towel, and put it in the inside pocket of the satchel; but here is a bright tin cup I bought for the baby; that you can take, and welcome."

So my lady, at whom Laura could not help laughing a little, accepted the bright tin cup with what grace she could, and went for her drink of water—quieter, certainly, if not wiser. There was not a particle of triumph in Mrs. Smith's calm old face; she had simply done what seemed to her entirely reasonable and proper.

There was a good deal of confusion attendant upon our change of cars. For every one acted just as everybody always does act on such occasions; as if breathless haste were the necessity of the moment, and it really made no difference how many baskets and bundles and persons you upset in your transit, so that you reached the other train first. Each one seems to have an absorbing ambition to be first. Laura, who is apt to be nervous when her father is not of the party, looked about her somewhat wildly on emerging from the train, and repeated, "Where is our car? where is our car?" very much as if she were owner of an entire line. Nobody answered, or indeed, heeded her question, and the babel of voices grew every moment more confusing.

"Here is the man to ask," said Mrs. Smith's cheery voice, and she elbowed her way to the side of a policeman.

"Your train hasn't come in yet, grandma," was his prompt answer. "Stand right where you are until this one starts, then yours will run in on that track, the first train in, after this one is out of the way, on the track nearest you. I'll see that you get on all right."

Another tribute to the kind old face. Burly fellow though he was, his voice took a gentle, protective tone as he talked to her; I fancy he may have thought of his old mother. Mrs. Smith, alert though she was to give attention to his directions, seemed also to be thinking of something else. Her eyes had that earnest, far-away look in them, that I had often observed when she became interested in a new thought. Presently she gave expression to it,—

"Here you are day after day always a-pointing out the way for people! It must be kind of nice to be everlastingly helping folks out of muddles, and starting of 'em off in the right direction."

The policeman laughed; this evidently struck him as a new idea. He had not the appearance of a person who ever wasted any sentiment on his work. But Mrs. Smith had not yet finished; before he could make answer, if such had been his intention, she said:

"I wonder if you could point out the way to heaven, and see folks started on the right train to get there? Have you learned that road yet?"

He looked at her for a moment in blank astonishment, then shook his head:

"I'm afraid that road ain't on my beat, ma'am."

The words were spoken respectfully, and with a tinge of what might have been regret in his voice.

"Look to it," she said with energy. "Look to it right away. Death is on your beat, you may be sure of that, and it ain't safe to wait till he comes after you, before thinking of the right road. I wonder if you wouldn't read my little book?"

Whereupon, without fumbling, she produced from somewhere, as if it had been carefully thought of, and laid aside for this particular man, a little paper-covered volume, entitled "The Right Road." I learned afterwards that it was a book, or tract, designed especially for railroad men, policemen, and other public servants; and that Mrs. Smith kept a peckage on hand, ready to use as opportunity offered; but at the time the appropriateness of the title amazed me.

It was just as the winter day was settling into early twilight that the train rolled in at the city depôt, which was our stopping-place, and we joined the hurrying, crowding throngs once more. In just as much haste they were as though the train were to thunder on the next minute, instead of having reached its terminus, as most of the passengers, at least, must have known was the case. Irving was to meet us at the depôt, and looking eagerly for him though we were, we had almost missed him because we failed to remember how much, at a certain period of life, five years count. How the boy had changed! In fact, he was not a boy at all; it seemed absurd to apply the old name to him. A bearded man, tall, slightly built, it is true, yet with an air of manliness about his very overcoat. It was of the latest pattern and finest quality. That, at least, was natural; Irving had always been elegant: his uncle used to say of him, "Whether Irving has a roof to cover him or not, or any money to pay his board bill, he will be sure to have the latest fashion in boots, and the best-fitting gloves." I remember what a sore feeling it used to give my heart, because I realized the truth of the criticism; and Irving had been so nearly my own that I shrank from recognizing about him that which was not perfect.

He looked very handsome to me as I caught sight of him, moving patiently up and down the crowded platform, peering into strange faces, in search of one familiar.

"Ha! auntie at last," he exclaimed, as I motioned him toward us. "I thought I was to be disappointed. How did you happen to be the last ones out? What a distracting, pushing, irritating crowd this is! They have too many elbows. And this is—Laura, I declare!" This last after a slight hesitation. "I should not have known you if you had not been with auntie. You are wonderfully changed. She looks a little like Mary, and yet she doesn't. Who is it that she resembles? I believe it is uncle. What a cruel thing it was in uncle to desert me at such a trying time as this! Checks, please, auntie or Laura, whichever is manager-in-chief."

How fast Irving could talk! There was a good deal of the old dash about him, accompanied with a certain man-of-the-world ease and freedom. Evidently he admired his cousin; while he hurried off these and kindred eager nothings, he cast approving glances on the trim, graceful figure, and his face took a satisfied expression which I remembered well on a beardless face. Laura suited his aesthetic taste. He was so eager, and so voluble, and in such haste about checks and trunks, and so determined to secure the best carriage for us, that up to this moment Mrs. Smith had been overlooked. In his haste he jostled against her, just as I was saying:

"Irving, my boy, you have not welcomed one of our party."

"Ha!" he said—that indescribable little interjection; Irving used it often—"whom have we here? Your attendant, auntie?"

His face was genuinely puzzled; either he had heard nothing about the old aunt, or had forgotten her; he thought Mrs. Smith was a servant, yet evidently he considered the situation a strange one, for two American ladies, of moderate income and quiet tastes, to be accompanied by a servant, when on so brief a trip as ours! Especially by one so old as Mrs. Smith.

"Irving!" said Laura, cheeks and eyes aflame, "is it possible you do not recognise our old neighbour Mrs. Solomon Smith?"

CHAPTER VIII.

"I'M GLAD THAT SOLOMON AIN'T ALONG."

"MA!" he said again, whetting quickly, and bestowing a searching, peculiar glance on Mrs. Solomon Smith. He had not known her very well; it was not strange, perhaps, that he had forgotten her existence. Yet he did not lose his self-possession in the least. "Mrs. Smith, how do you do?" he said, lifting his hat with grace. "If I ought to remember you, I beg pardon for my delinquency. Laura,

remember you know h was guilty o Vell, Jake, i coated driv ouching his do anything Whereupon to come her
"He decea to Laura's an not! How s saw him la elf doesn't haven't seen
of pink ginch
"Elizabeth
ment; eviden
"Yes, Eliz
mostly, I gu good Christi
"Lida!"

It is impos in which the legant young
Mrs. Solomon
"I beg par
him. "I ha was therefore no doubt. A bundles and b
man. Still, t here was a
"Here, Jake,
New, auntie,
gallantly offer
"I will take not having fo steps are icy;
He did it, p his face deeper
The Smith
carriage stopp widely open, r with every jet A glow of tri ng, and a trif faultless home greeting was w same astonish
Mrs. Solomon
to her relatives
"Why, Jon last, a touch o years isn't such all trace of wh know you in Jo
"Is it possib and somewhat and there was a barrasment.

"That's exac
so he sent me.
you outgrew y you'll never out were about the blue as a piece
ing as though th
They were pr delicate bit of p heartly, old-fash passable grace, trapezy to do w Altogether, it parties. The S ance with what overwhelm Lau
the momentary

joined the hurrying, as if as much haste they could find as thunder on the next day's terminus, as most of the known was the case. He, and looking eagerly at almost missed him how much, at a certain point. How the boy had been at all; it seemed to him. A bearded man, with an air of manliness, the latest pattern and natural; Irving had used to say of him, "I'm sure to have the best-fitting gloves." I tried to give my heart, criticism; and Irving came from recognising as.

"As I caught sight of the crowded platform, as I motioned him disappointed. How? What a distract- is! They have too, I declare!" This could not have known. You are wonder- Mary, and yet she? I believe it is uncle to desert me at a, please, auntie or

There was a good deal of with a certain man- nently he admired and kindred eager in the trim, graceful expression which Laura suited his so voluble, and in and so determined up to this moment his haste he jostled blommed one of our little interjection; we here? Your ther he had heard forgotten her; he yet evidently he for two American tastes, to be accom- def a trip as ours! eyes aflame, "is our old neighbour quickly, and be- rance on Mrs. Not known her very chaps, that he had not lose his self- how do you do?" "If I ought to nquency. Laura.

"T ALONG."

remember those eyes; you look more natural now. Do you know how they used to flash at me, auntie, when I was guilty of any special wickedness, in her estimation? Well, Jake, is your carriage ready?" This last to a grey-coated driver who appeared before us at that moment, touching his cap. "Then we will go. Mrs. Smith, can do anything for you before we depart?"

Whereupon the good lady seemed to consider it time to come herself to the rescue.

"He doesn't remember me, Laura," addressing herself to Laura's angry eyes rather than to Irving. "Of course not! How should he? He was just a slip of a boy when I saw him last. Why, bless your heart! Elizabeth herself doesn't know me, though I am her old aunt. I haven't seen her since she wore long-sleeved aprons made of pink gingham."

"Elizabeth!" repeated Irving, still in utmost bewilderment; evidently the name was unfamiliar to him.

"Yes, Elizabeth Smith, my niece; Lida, they call her mostly, I guess; though it seems a pity, when she has a good Christian name."

"Lida!"

It is impossible to convey to you an idea of the tones in which these brief words were exploded from our elegant young man's lips. But he understood at last who Mrs. Solomon Smith was.

"I beg pardon," he said in the easy tone common to him. "I had not heard of your expected arrival, and was therefore in a fog. Your relatives will be delighted, no doubt. Allow me." And he helped himself to her bundles and boxes with the speed and grace of a gentleman. Still, the colour on his face was heightened, and there was a slight cloud over the former sunniness. "Here, Jake," he said to that official, "take these. Now, auntie, we are ready at last, I believe," and he gallantly offered me his arm; but Laura interposed:

"I will take care of mamma," she said, coldly, evidently not having forgotten his greeting to her friend; "the steps are icy; please give your arm to Mrs. Smith."

He did it, promptly and courteously; but the frown on his face deepened.

The Smith mansion was a blaze of light. As our carriage stopped before the steps, the door was thrown widely open, revealing a large and richly furnished hall, with every jet in the handsome chandelier sending forth a glow of welcome. A lady and gentleman stood in waiting, and a trifle in the background was a pretty girl in faultless home attire. This was evidently Lida. Our greeting was warm, even profuse in its cordiality; yet the same astonishment that Irving had shown at the cars met Mrs. Solomon Smith. We actually had to introduce her to her relatives.

"Why, Jonas, you certainly know me," she said at last, a touch of asperity in her voice; "fifteen or twenty years isn't such an awful while, to people of our age, that all trace of what there was of us has disappeared. I should know you in Joppa."

"Is it possible that it is Solomon's wife?" the dignified and somewhat portly Mr. Smith managed at last to say; and there was added to his astonishment a touch of embarrassment.

"That's exactly who I am. Solomon couldn't come, so he sent me. And this is Elizabeth, is it? Dear child! you outgrew your pink gingham aprons long ago, but you'll never outgrow your eyes. I remember them; they were about the prettiest baby eyes I ever looked at; as blue as a piece of the sky, and the outsides of them looking as though they were made of the finest kind of china."

They were pretty eyes yet, and they sparkled over this delicate bit of praise, their small owner submitting to the hearty, old-fashioned kiss which her aunt gave her with passable grace, though she had much smooching out of drapery to do when the old arms were withdrawn.

Altogether, it was a somewhat embarrassing time to all parties. The Smiths covered their surprise and annoyance with what grace they could, and seemed anxious to overwhelm Laura and me with attentions, to atone for the momentary bewilderment. It transpired that it was genuine bewilderment. The country brother, Solomon, and Solomon's wife, had been duly invited to the approaching wedding, "Jonas" having insisted on so much respect being paid, either out of regard for the brother, or in memory of the note on which "interest had not been paid for five years." But it had not seemed to occur to any member of the family that the country relatives could by any possibility accept the invitation. Mrs. Smith's carefully written letter, apprising them of her coming, was brought in with the evening mail, about two hours after our arrival. Our note to Irving had been more prompt—not having travelled first in the wrong direction, as Mrs. Smith's evidently had—but we had neglected, naturally enough, to mention our travelling companions, and to make the bewilderment more complete, none of the party knew, until we told them, that we came from the same village. As for Irving, despite Laura's indignation, he was not to blame. The Smiths had not moved to the little place near us until more than a year after he was gone; and if he ever knew that the old lady from the farm, where we got butter and eggs, was named Smith, all knowledge of it, and of her, had certainly departed from him.

We were shown to our room, Laura's and mine, a front one on the second floor, arranged with every detail of modern elegance that could be imagined—warmed by furnace, lighted by gas, Brussels carpet on the floor, rich and expensive curtains at the windows; mirrors, long, and wide, and clear, reflecting our figures whichever way we turned; delicately embroidered, lace finished pillow shams on the exquisitely made bed, and every bright and tasteful toilet appliance that we could, by any stretch of luxurious tastes, contrive to want; in short, the guest chamber par excellence of the house. Of course we were to receive special honour at their hands, for were we not the aunt and cousin of the prospective bridegroom? We recognised the naturalness of all this, yet I think Laura and I had the same unspoken anxiety as to how it fared with the dear, tired old lady who had borne so cheerily the fatigues of the all-day journey.

"I wish I knew which was her room, mamma; I would like to go and straighten her cap for her, and brush her dress, and coax her to leave her knitting upstairs for this one evening. I am afraid that the pretty bride that is to be, would faint if she should appear in the parlour with one of those grey socks she is always knitting. Oh, mamma, I hope they are not all shams, Irving and all!"

The seven o'clock dinner was got through with at last, though it was an ordeal more or less trying to every one of us. Mrs. Smith in her round-waisted and short-waisted dress, and her very old-fashioned cap, looked unlike anything that the city ladies had probably ever seen at their own table before. Moreover, she ate with her knife, and did not use her napkin, and poured her tea into a saucer, and swooped up the last drop of soup from her plate with a distinct sound for each swallow—common enough mistakes in an old lady; entirely pardonable if the people surrounding her had loved her, or if she had been a stranger to them; but to have to acknowledge her as a relative was, I suppose, more of a trial to them than we were able to appreciate.

We were discussing the situation in our room the next morning. Laura was in a bubble of indignation.

"Mamma, her hand was as cold as ice when I touched it on our way downstairs. If they have put an old lady like her in a cold room, I think it is a shame!"

I tried to comfort her with the reminder that she was merely surmising again; that perhaps Mrs. Smith was quite comfortable. I tried also to excuse our hostess, by recalling the number of guests to be entertained, and the improbability that they had many such sumptuous apartments as our own. It was all to no purpose. Laura refused to be charitable.

"I don't care if there are a hundred guests, mamma. They ought not to have invited more people than they could treat decently. She is the only old lady among them, and should have had special consideration. Sending her up two flights of stairs! I am sure they do that, for she was quite out of breath when I met her, and her teeth were chattering with the cold. I am certain she dressed in a room without a fire. I don't suppose she has done such a thing before, at this season, for forty years. I meant to go up with her, and see how she was situated, but she slipped away while that silly little Lida was talking to me. How Irving can—"

The sentence was left unfinished, as though words had failed her. Somebody fumbled at our door-knob in an uncertain manner, turned it hesitatingly, then apparently repented, then gained courage, and at last pushed the door open an inch or two and peeped in. It was Mrs. Solomon Smith.

"For the land's sake!" she said, pushing wide the door, as she caught sight of familiar faces. "I've found you at last. I thought I never should. I believe I've peeped into twenty rooms since I started. A body could get lost in this house as well as in the street. Where's that black hole that you stand over to get warm? My feet are all but froze off."

"Auntie," exclaimed Laura, "haven't you any 'hole in the floor' in your room, nor a stove, nor any means of warming you?"

"Not a sign of a hole, child. I guess all the holes that were made to order gave out before they got as high as my room, and they had to take them that come by chance. Ain't you fine, though! This is a pretty room. I guess it is the prettiest one in the house, and I peeped into some nice ones. I declare, I'm beat a little at the way they live. Must cost something to pay the rent for this place, and get all the fixings put into it. I'm glad they're so much better off than Solomon reckoned; but I don't understand it for all that; I declare I don't."

Meantime Laura had drawn the easiest chair in the room to the register's side, and gently seated her old lady in it. "You look completely tired out," she said, still speaking indignantly; "I don't believe you feel as well as you did last night."

"Well, the fact is, child, I didn't get more than a dozen winks of sleep. I had the sociablest kind of bed you ever see in your life; I couldn't even turn my elbow, but it would squeak out something or other at me. I kind o' got witched with the thing after awhile; it seemed to me it squeaked every time I breathed; so I just opened my eyes wide, and gave myself up to the business of lying awake, and keeping that thing still. I felt worse about it, because them two hard-working creatures that tugged up and downstairs with satchels and towels, and then waited on the table, and tended door, and flew two ways at once all the evening, was right next to me, and it did seem a pity that that squeaky thing should keep them awake. I'm going to borrow the oil-can to-day, and put an end to its tongue; I peeped into a room that had a sewing-machine in it, so I s'pose they've got an oil-can."

Laura looked volumes at me before she spoke:

"Auntie Smith, did they send you up to the fourth floor to sleep?"

"I don't know how many floors there are, my dear, but I guess I'm about as high up as they can get, unless they swing a bed out on the roof. I don't think it would be a bad place of a summer night; but I guess nobody sleeps there now."

"Auntie Smith, I think it is a perfect outrage! I just don't mean to endure it. The idea of sending an old lady, their own aunt, too, upstairs to sleep with the servants!"

"Bless your heart, child! I don't mind being along with the servants; they're clean-looking girls, and they are not in the same room anyhow; it seemed kind of comfortable to have them there; I believe I'd a-felt skeery like without them. My door wouldn't lock—that is to say, there wasn't any key there to try whether it would or not; and though I've slept along with Solomon year in and year out, and never thought of locking the door, I'm just that foolish that the minute I get away from him I go to hunting around for locks and keys, as if all the evil-disposed folks in the world was bound to get hold of me."

"I think it is a perfect shame!" repeated Laura. "I wonder what your husband would say to it all, Mrs. Smith?"

I had been wondering the same thing. I had a vision just at the moment of the slow-spoken, oftentimes silent Solomon Smith; an old man whom people called common-place, who yet had shielded and cared for this plain old woman during all the years of their married life as tenderly as he could possibly have done it on her wedding day.

She laughed a little at Laura's question, and a tender light came into her eyes as she answered:

"I dunno what he would say, exactly; but there's some things here he would think kind of queer. I tell you what it is, for the first time in all the forty years that we've lived together, I'm glad that Solomon ain't along! Now that's just as true as you live. Solomon is kind of slow about some things, especially things that he ought to be slow about; and he is gentle and long-suffering, if ever a body was; but when he is riled it means something, and the folks that rile him are apt to know it. I'm most amazing glad he didn't come."

"I'm not," muttered Laura; "a 'riled' person would be a decided relief to my nerves at this present time."

Mrs. Smith paid no attention to her; already she had passed from these minor matters to a thought of more importance.

"Mrs. Leonard," turning suddenly to me with an anxious look on her wrinkled face, "Irving was a good boy when he lived with you, but, as near as I can remember, he wasn't a Christian. Do you believe he can have got to be a man without paying any attention to that?"

"I am afraid he has," I said, and I felt my voice trembling; it was a sore subject with me. I had tried to do my duty, yet I seemed to have failed, both with my own and with Irving. "I have never seen anything in his letters, nor heard anything about him that would lead me to suppose him a Christian."

"And he is going to set up a family—take a young thing like my niece Elizabeth, and play at living, without having that matter fixed."

The dismay in Mrs. Smith's voice might have been ludicrous to some, to me it gave a sense of solemnity. Laura, too, looked grave.

"Do you think it is wicked for people to marry unless they are Christians?"

She asked the question with perfect gravity, and without a suspicion of a sneer on her face. Mrs. Smith turned toward her, and regarded her steadily for a moment, while she seemed to be revolving the question.

"Do I think it is wicked, child?" she repeated slowly.

"Why, when was it anything but wicked to live along in this world neglecting the Lord Jesus, and His call to come and follow Him? Getting married and settling down in life, without asking Him anything about it, just piles up the wickedness; of course it doesn't begin there, but it makes another long step the wrong way, and piles up the responsibility, too. Besides, it always did seem to me a kind of mockery. He had the 'twain become one flesh' in the first place just for a kind of continual picture to us of the love that there ought to be between Him and us, and if we snatch at the picture, and are satisfied with it, and let the real thing go, it seems to me we are kind of tossing up our heads at Him, and saying, 'Aha! Aha! just as them wretches did round the cross. But there that's just an old woman's notion. I'm afraid there's two of 'em. I ain't heard the child say a word, but I seem to kind of feel it in my bones that she ain't a Christian either. I guess Jonas ain't much of a one nowadays; he used to be a church-member, but it don't look like it now. I tell you, Laura, you flash them bright eyes of yours like stars over my going up three pairs of stairs, and sleeping next to the servants, and breaking the ice in my pitcher in the morning, and all that, but the whole of it ain't nothing to me, I find I'm going to bed without having a word read in the Bible, and kneeling down together at family worship. I could most have cried last night to think of Solomon kneeling down with me, and Mrs. Smith

"repeated Laura. "I could say to it all, Mrs. I had a vision of people called common. I cared for this plain old of their married life as I had done it on her wedding alone, and me doing the same. A great big household like this breaking up and going to bed without family prayer! Laura, don't you never marry a man who can't set down on his knees and pray for you, as your father has done all his life; mark my words, you'll be most awful homesick if you do."

CHAPTER IX.

"POOR LIDA AND THE REST."

THE next three days were trying ones. The Smiths were undoubtedly much annoyed by their relative. Very well-meaning people they attention, I really don't consider it strange that the country aunt was sent to the fourth floor to sleep. Not that they intended any indignity thereby; they knew the room was clean, the bed ordinarily comfortable, and that the necessary conveniences were at hand; they knew, also, that people in the country were not accustomed to gas or furnaces, nor many of the luxurious appliances of modern city life. They believed, no doubt, that they were giving Mrs. Solomon every whit as good accommodation as she had at home. How could they know that the grave and common-place Solomon regarded her as the apple of his eye, studied day and night her comfort, would not for all the worth of his little farm let a breath of adverse wind touch her if he could help it!

's question, and a tender answered: "I'm afraid there's something queer. I tell me in all the forty years I've lived that Solomon ain't as you live. Solomon's ways, especially things that he is gentle and long-tempered, but when he is riled it's a different story. I don't think that riled him are apt to be a 'riled' person would be at this present time."

Do you believe he was paying any attention to me with an eye, "Irving was a good fellow, but as near as I can tell, he was just looking at me. Do you believe he was paying any attention to me with an eye, "Irving was a good fellow, but as near as I can tell, he was just looking at me. Do you believe he was paying any attention to me with an eye, "Irving was a good fellow, but as near as I can tell, he was just looking at me.

family—take a young man to play at living, without a sense of solemnity. people to marry unless fect gravity, and with a stern face. Mrs. Smith looked at her steadily for a moment, involving the question. "she repeated slowly, "I don't think I can live along in this way, and His call to come and settling down in the country about it, just piles up the mountains 't begin there, but it's a different story. I don't think that riled him are apt to be a 'riled' person would be at this present time."

I'm afraid there's something queer. I tell me in all the forty years I've lived that Solomon ain't as you live. Solomon's ways, especially things that he is gentle and long-tempered, but when he is riled it's a different story. I don't think that riled him are apt to be a 'riled' person would be at this present time."

"THE SEVEN O'CLOCK DINNER WAS GOT THROUGH WITH AT LAST." (p. 19).

were, and, in the main, warm-hearted. Had it been an ordinary occasion, and the house free from other guests, I think they would have bestowed every courteous attention on Mrs. Solomon. But as it was, her unexpected advent at a time when many stylish guests, dear particular, fashionable friends of Miss Lida, gay young men, college intimates of the son Harris—whom, by the way, I find I have not mentioned at all; possibly because at that time I thought there was little or nothing about him to mention—and a dignified aristocratic aunt or two on Mrs. Smith's side, were all at hand to demand special

How could they know that before the sunrise of each winter morning he was moving round the room, stepping as if shod in velvet, not to disturb her last nap, while he raked out the coals and set the bits of wood in the old stove to burning, so that the atmosphere when she awoke would be that of summer? Comparatively few wives, after forty years of travelling together, receive such care as this. Mrs. Jonas Smith, in her elegant home, had no such experience; perhaps she may be pardoned for not understanding what the loss of it was to her more favoured sister-in-law.

Some of the guests were rude enough to amuse themselves at the old lady's expense, even before her face, trusting to a supposed obtuseness, which did not exist, that her feelings would not be hurt thereby; others of the guests were foolishly annoyed by her country ways and home-spun language. I occupied that most embarrassing position—a sort of confidant of all parties.

"Poor Lida," Mrs. Jonas Smith would say to me, half laughing, half sighing, "it is really a great trial to her to have her Aunt Maria here; she is as good a soul as ever lived, of course—we all recognise that—but she is queer, both in looks and actions, there is no denying it; and Lida is young and sensitive; she declares she can never have her in the parlours during the ceremony, and her father assures her that she must, as of course she must—there is nothing else to do; and then poor Lida cries; I hate to have her last days of girlhood made miserable. What a pity the dear old soul chose this time for a visit! We could have made her so comfortable when we were quite alone, and her little peculiarities would have passed unnoticed. My dear Mrs. Leonard, you are so very kind to care for the old lady as you do, and keep her comfortable in your own room so much; I assure you we appreciate it. Lida was speaking, only this morning, of your and your daughter's thoughtfulness."

She had talked on, like a smooth-flowing stream, up to this point, giving no chance for a counter current; but now common honesty demanded that I should interpose, to assure her that there was no unselfish thoughtfulness about our action; that we respected and loved Mrs. Solomon Smith; that she was an honoured guest at our home, and that we delighted in her quaint ways and keen-sighted observations. I might as well have let the stream flow on.

"Indeed!" Mrs. Jonas said, and "I want to know!" and "Oh, to be sure; she is as good as gold; my husband always said that; he has great respect for his brother's character, too;" then she purred on about our "thoughtfulness," and their "appreciation," and "Lida's trial," and the general mortification it was, until I gave myself up to rejoicing over the fact that Laura was not there to grow hopelessly angry at her. One little hint I ventured: "I am afraid she is careless about her fire, and will take cold; I notice her hands are very cold in the mornings, and she seems quite in a shiver."

Mrs. Smith gave me in return what I suppose might be called an evasive answer. She bemoaned the fact that the house was so unexpectedly full; it was impossible to make every one as comfortable as she would like; Harris had brought home with him two more friends than he had written about, and that called for an extra room, of course; then one of Lida's dearest friends had a cousin visiting her, and could not come without her. "That's made still another unexpected one," she explained. "And do you know, poor Lida had to give up her own pretty little room, and occupy a lounge in my dressing-room? I feel so sorry that the dear child should be turned out just at this time."

All this meant, of course, that she had no spot for Mrs. Solomon Smith save the attic room, which there was no means of warming. I really suppose this was true, and that she had done the best she knew how; but it was only out of respect for Mrs. Solomon Smith's own feelings, that Laura did not give up her place in our luxurious room, and herself mount to the fourth floor; indeed, it was not until the old lady had pleaded earnestly, that she secured a promise from my daughter to do no such thing.

"I shall feel hurt if you do," Mrs. Solomon had said. "A great deal more hurt than I am about getting my clothes on in the cold a few mornings; it won't last long."

Irving, too, seemed to consider me the proper person to express his mind before.

"Isn't she a queer sort of party, auntie? How came you to pick her up?"

"Are you speaking of the aunt of your prospective wife?" I asked him, and his handsome face flushed a little; then he laughed.

"Well, now, auntie, one isn't to blame for having queer relatives, I suppose. I don't care, of course, but it is rather hard on poor Lida and the rest. I've no doubt she is the salt of the earth, as my dear cousin Laura hints out of angry mouth and flashing eyes, whenever I cross her path; but if she would wear a little less startling cap and spectacles, and look a little less like a guy generally I think I should recognise her worth fully as soon."

I was nearly as vexed with him as Laura could have been, and spoke very coldly about the appreciation that depended on the style of dress being hardly worth striving for; and then I went away without having a word of the talk which I had longed to have with Irving, and which I fancied he might have planned for, in seeking me. Laura, too, poured out the vials of her indignation before me; she continued to be exasperated with the entire family, guests included; she hardly saw me alone that she had not some new grievance, a special slight of some sort that her dear old lady had endured at their hands.

"It humiliates me, mamma!" she would exclaim, tossing her head and leaving the bright-coloured wools with which she was working. "The idea that because they have a little more money than she, and dress a little better, and all that sort of thing, they should presume to look down on a woman of her worth! It is such a shoddy state of society to make money the all-important factor in friendships, even!"

"How do you know that they have much more money than she? Solomon Smith is considered a pretty well-to-do farmer, you know; and you remember she herself told us that these city friends were 'not a mite forward.'" Laura's sensitive lip curled.

"That makes me all the more vexed, mamma, when ever I think of it. The idea of their cheating Solomon Smith out of his lawful interest on hard-earned money and then trimming even their pillow shams with such lace as that! I tell you, mamma, there are a great many kinds of shams! Money is at the root of it all. Suppose, for a moment, that dear old Auntie Smith had fifty thousand dollars to leave to that simpering little bride downstairs, do you suppose she would sleep in the attic? Not a bit of it; and they would just dote on her 'eccentricities'—that is the name they would call them, then. I hate it all; I'm sorry I came."

I was sorry that circumstances had seemed to call for so long a stay; it had been a special petition of Irving's that we should spend a few days with them before the wedding; Monday had been the unusual day chosen for the ceremony, because Irving's official vacation commenced on that day, and as he held an office under the Government, he was obliged to be rigid in his dates; the young people coveted the entire time to themselves, hence a Monday wedding.

If Mrs. Smith had been a meek and quiet little woman, with eyes less keen, it would have been much less embarrassing; as it was, she saw everything, heard everything, and was painfully given to speaking her mind. She was overwhelmed with astonishment at the idea of a rehearsal of the marriage ceremony, which was to take place in the back parlour on Saturday evening.

"A rehearsal!" she repeated in a mystified tone; "what might that be?"

Two of the elegant guests giggled together, one of the aristocratic aunts frowned, and Laura explained.

"But what do they want to do it for? They surely know how to stand up in a room together, and promise to love each other, without saying it over beforehand, like children do their school pieces! I should think they would want to do the repeating of it just to each other, and let the outsiders have their turn once for all."

The little bride blushed at this, and Laura further explained that they wanted to go through with the ceremony once, with the attendants, lest some one might make a mistake, and that would be embarrassing in public. But the dear old lady shook her grey head emphatically over this.

"Too late to correct mistakes. If there has been one made, it's my opinion it will have to be corrected before it comes and I wer were abou mistakes and clear, and I've n I was sorr from now

But Eliz
words had reason to turmoil, a late that that horri wouldn't b they would

The rehel of the hou fectly love
and expres

"I don't and flower mean that to be seen great eyes to be anytl rehearsing
if they hav
the words

"But, I
don't rehen
to see if th
arranged,
made."

"Well," to fix earn
some way,
the senten
It may be I wouldn't whether So winked ju heart! wh
right or wh pronounce to ask the do nowada
have done

My room doors were tained by of rehearsal
I went over the marria
tence, "un Irving and Monday ev from the fr
day evening

Modern
new device rehearsing
the hour f may be all her last c curiously w service if o Sunday n
tiful a wint
"I was r Jonas to m room in co Maria to-da that she d aunt's bonn will go to know."

Query: J

are, of course, but it is the rest. I've no doubt my dear cousin Laura hitting my eyes, whenever I cross a little less startling call less like a guy generally worth fully as soon."

him as Laura could have out the appreciation that in hardly worth striving out having a word of that with Irving, and which ed for, in seeking me of her indignation before operated with the entirely ardly saw me alone that a special slight of some adured at their hands.

she would exclaim, tossed wools with which because they have dress a little better, and I presume to look down such a shoddy state of important factor in friend have much more money, considered a pretty well-remember she herself were 'not a mite forevexed, mamma, when their cheating Solomon on hard-earned money, pillow shams with such there are a great many e root of it all. Sup-Auntie Smith had fifty sumpering little bride could sleep in the attic and stote on her 'eccen-would call them, then had seemed to call for a petition of Irving's with them before the unusual day chosen for official vacation com- an office under the rigid in his dates; the time to themselves, and quiet little woman, been much less embar- ing, heard everything, g her mind. She was the idea of a rehearsal as to take place in the

in a mystified tone;

together, one of the explained. it for? They surely together, and promise over beforehand, like I should think they it just to each other, once for all." and, and Laura further rough with the cere- est some one might be embarrassing in k her grey head em-f there has been one be corrected before it comes time to make the promises. When Solomon and I were married, we were sure enough of what we were about; we weren't in the least afraid of making any mistakes. I was only too glad to speak out 'I do!' loud and clear, so all the folks in the church could hear me; and I've never seen the minute in all the forty years that I was sorry I said it. I hope, Elizabeth, that forty years from now you can say as much."

But Elizabeth was pouting. Something in her aunt's words had jarred on her sensitive nerves, and I have reason to know that she threw the Smith family into a turmoil, and made her mother miserable, by declaring, late that evening, that she didn't care; she wouldn't have that horrid old thing at her wedding, so, now; she wouldn't be married at all if she had got to be there, and they would see what a horrid fuss that would make.

The rehearsal, however, took place, the younger portion of the household attending, and pronouncing it all "perfectly lovely," while Mrs. Smith sat upstairs with me, and expressed her views:

"I don't like it. I can't help thinking it is all satin, and flowers, and frosting, and make believe. I don't mean that she don't love him, poor young thing, it is plain to be seen that she does; and he watches her with them great eyes of his wherever she turns, but there don't seem to be anything solemn and earnest about it. The idea of rehearsing such solemn promises as them are! I wonder if they have the prayer and all said over, for fear some of the words won't be in the right place? I don't like it."

"But, Mrs. Smith," I hastened to explain, "they don't rehearse the ceremony exactly; the idea is simply to see if their positions are understood, and are pleasantly arranged, and if all understand about the moves to be made."

"Well," she said, after having paused in her knitting to fix earnest grey eyes on me while I talked—eyes, which, some way, embarrassed me so much I could hardly finish the sentence, "I'm an ignorant old fogley, I darsay. It may be all right, but I don't see how they can do it. I wouldn't have liked folks a-peeking round to see whether Solomon and I stood just in the right place, and winked just when we should, and all that. Bless your heart! what do you suppose we cared whether we stood right or wrong, so long as we heard the minister say, 'I pronounce you husband and wife,' and joined with him to ask the Lord's blessing? I darsay it is the thing to do nowadays, times change, but I don't believe I could have done it."

My room was directly over the parlours, and the hall doors were open; so from time to time we were entertained by outbursts of merriment from below. A marriage rehearsal certainly seemed to be a very amusing thing. I went over, in memory, the solemn and tender words of the marriage ceremony, with its terribly suggestive sentence, "until Death us do part," and I wondered whether Irving and Lida, when they repeated the formula on Monday evening, would be able to hold their minds away from the frolic in which they had been repeated on Saturday evening.

Modern fashionable society is a curious thing, full of new devices; perhaps one of the most innocent is the rehearsing of solemn vows in a kind of pantomime, before the hour for the real thing. As Mrs. Smith says, "It may be all right," yet I confess myself in sympathy with her last century views. I found myself wondering curiously whether they would have rehearsed the funeral service if one of the bridal party lay dead in the house.

Sunday morning dawned upon us; as bright and beautiful a winter morning as could well be imagined.

"I was really in hopes it would rain," murmured Mrs. Jonas to me confidentially, as we went to the breakfast-room in company. "I don't know what to do with aunt Maria to-day. Poor Lida's nerves are in such a twitter that she declares herself not equal to the thought of aunt's bonnet in our pew; and I suppose of course she will go to church; that class of people always do, you know."

Query: Just what class of people did Mrs. Jonas mean?

At the breakfast-table the matter of church-going came up. It transpired that a small number of the guests were going out; indeed, the hour was so late that those who, like ourselves, had not prudently made their church toilets already, could not have done so if they would. Mrs. Jonas Smith declared herself too much worn with excitement and nervousness to think of doing anything but resting.

"I was so glad this morning to remember that it was a day of rest," she said, looking around upon us with a benevolent smile. "I don't know what I should do if it were not for the regularly occurring Sabbaths to make a break in the week's excitements and responsibilities."

"Yes," her sister-in-law said with sweet seriousness; "Sunday is a blessed day of rest, and to think that the Lord gives a wonderful promise to them that keep it! 'If thou turn away thy foot from the Sabbath, from doing thy pleasure on My holy day: and call the Sabbath a delight, the holy of the Lord, honourable; and shalt honour Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure, nor speaking thine own words; then shalt thou delight thyself in the Lord; and I will cause thee to ride upon the high places of the earth, and feed thee with the heritage of Jacob thy father: for the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.'"

There was something exceedingly pleasant in Mrs. Smith's way of repeating Bible verses; a sort of exclamatory style over some portions, her face beaming the while as if she were telling good news, and such astounding news as could hardly be believed at all, but for that last fact, "the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it."

My daughter Mary said to me once, that she always marked a verse of Mrs. Smith's repeating as something new that had just been put into her Bible, for, however familiar, she was sure to see it in a new way after hearing the old lady recite it.

No one responded to the verse this morning. Almost nothing had been said about the manner of resting; yet each person present seemed to feel an incongruity between Mrs. Jonas Smith's way and the way which the mouth of the Lord had indicated. That lady proceeded somewhat sharply with her investigation as to who was going to church. The host signified his willingness to escort such of his guests as chose to attend. Laura and I were going; also one of the aristocratic aunts, and two of the young ladies thought they should if they were dressed in time. This induced a young gentleman to promise to attend them. So, despite the doubtful beginning, our party bade fair to be quite large.

"I suppose it is too cold for you to venture out, Maria?" insinuated her sister-in-law, but she received a brisk denial.

"Bless your heart! I haven't seen the weather in more than fifty years that was too cold for me to go to church. I can wrap up warm; my cloak is as warm as toast; just right for such weather."

I confess to being very sorry that it was such a queer-looking cloak.

Then came the question of distance. Laura asked about that. Oh, the distance was a trifle, the host said; not more than five minutes' ride on the cars; the red line at the corner passed their church.

"The cars!" repeated Mrs. Solomon Smith in tones of dismay; "I wonder now if they keep the cars a-going on Sunday?"

CHAPTER X.

" 'PERHAPS SHE IS NEARER RIGHT THAN SOME OF US.' "

"Of course," said Mr. Jonas Smith, in a shorter tone than a gentleman should use toward an old lady, and added, while two of the young people indulged in their inevitable giggle, "how would people get to and from church in large cities, if the street cars didn't run?"

"Oh, then they only run them just about church time?" said the old lady, in a relieved tone. "Well, I dunno but that's a good plan. Why not, as well as for folks to get out their own horses, and a good deal better for them that hasn't got any horses to get out! And do any considerable number of the drivers go to church?"

Whereupon the laugh became general among the younger portion, somewhat to Mr. Jonas' discomfiture; he had a dim idea that part of it might belong to him.

"Not much they don't!" volunteered one of the young men. "Why, madam, Sunday is their busiest day; they don't have time even to eat their dinners like Christians, but munch a cold bite as they drive along."

"But there isn't a meeting beginning all the time!" said Mrs. Smith aghast. She was in thorough earnest; having fully believed that the cars were run solely for the accommodation of church-goers, there had been no covert sneer in her words.

"Meeting! No, that is the smallest part of their Sunday work; if they only took people to and from church, they could have half the day for whistling or sleeping; I'm inclined to think they would spend it that way; for they have to begin work early and quit late; but they put on a double line of cars on some of the routes for Sunday, and keep them going steadily from morning till night."

"And where do all the people go to?"

"I don't know; everywhere. Half of them go visiting, and some go to the Park, if it is pleasant enough, and some go to distant parts of the town on errands that they haven't time for on other days; lots of people go house-hunting on Sunday; stare up at the houses that they think they would like, and mark them for next day's use; for that matter, hundreds of them get the keys and survey premises without any scruples about it. Then a great army of hard-working people, boys and girls—factory hands, you know, and people of that class—ride for the pure fun of taking a ride, going somewhere, and having things a little different from other days; there are places enough to go to, and people enough to keep every carman as busy as a bee in a hive; that I know."

"Upon my word, Erskine," lisped one of the young ladies, "you would make a good lecturer on moral reform; I had no idea you felt so deeply on the Sabbath question!"

The young man flushed, and laughed lightly as he said:

"You had no idea that I felt deeply on any subject, I presume. I am not surprised at that; but as to feeling, I am merely stating facts for Mrs. Smith's benefit; each person has a right to draw his own inferences."

"They are solemn facts," said Mrs. Smith simply. "And shalt honour Him, not doing thine own ways, nor finding thine own pleasure." That's the direction; and it seems a great many people are paying no attention to it; though 'the mouth of the Lord hath spoken it.' There's one plain thing, a Christian has no business on them cars on the Sabbath day."

Then one of the aristocratic aunts came to the front: "My dear madam, you are not used to argument, I take it; you ignore the important fact that these rude pleasure-seekers, who, as a rule, belong to the lower classes, have nothing in common with us; and that because they choose to use the street-cars for purposes of their own, is no reason why we, who are on our way to the house of God, should not use the same conveyance in the cause of worship."

But Mrs. Smith shook her head.

"That won't do. 'Ye bring wrath on Israel by profaning the Sabbath,' that is what the Lord will have to say, one of these days, to them Christians that uphold such wrongdoing, and help along with their money. Besides, I reckon the folks who go to church don't go labelled, and the drivers and other lookers-on have no means of telling whether they are going to church or visiting."

"That is of very little consequence," declared the aristocratic aunt. "What difference do you suppose it makes to me what people think? 'To his own master he standeth or falleth.' That is Scripture, too, I believe."

And she sat back with a severely complacent smile, as if much gratified with herself for having vindicated her side, and produced a Bible verse to sustain her.

"That's true," said Mrs. Smith, in no wise quenched. "That's true enough, so far as the judging of other folks is concerned; the Lord wants to do that Himself, because He understands all the little hidden things that we know nothing about; but I guess it don't apply to folks not caring what other people think of 'em, because the same Lord told us to be careful about that. 'Let not your good be evil spoken of,' says He, and then He reminded us that we had got to be known by our fruits; and He says He set us here to be lights, so that folks who looked at us, and saw how we lived, would glorify Him for it. I guess it makes a sight of difference what the street-car drivers think of us. I guess like enough the Lord will ask us why we let our going to church on His day be evil spoken of, by using evil means to get there."

"I was not aware that I had pronounced the means evil," said the aristocratic aunt, and her voice was several degrees haughtier.

"Oh, well, that don't need any 'pronouncing' from human lips; it stands right over against the command, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy, not doing thine own ways, not finding thine own pleasure.' Of course anybody can see that them poor street-car drivers and conductors ain't keeping the Sabbath day holy; and they're doing their own ways, though like enough they don't see any other way to earn their bread; poor fellows, I suppose they ain't learned to trust the Lord; they don't have time to think about Him. The trouble is when a Christian man or woman gets on them cars on the holy Sabbath day and rides a little while, they say to 'em, 'You car-drivers ain't of no account; we've nothing to do with your souls; it is your business to take us to church, we're going to worship God; whether you have any chance to worship Him or not, is nothing to us.' Now, you see, the Lord said He had made of one blood all the nations of the earth, and He told us to love our neighbours as well as we did ourselves, and He made it pretty plain that even them drivers are our neighbours, whether they are on their way to Jericho or somewhere else. There's no getting away from our duty to them."

I could not determine whether Erskine was really interested, or whether Mrs. Smith's quaint ways amused him, and he wanted to draw her out by interposing an objection at this point:

"But, Mrs. Smith, the cars would run on the Sabbath all the same, if none of the church people patronised them; not one-tenth part of their revenue comes from church-goers, I presume."

"That may all be true," said the old lady with assured tone; "but don't you see, young man, 'To his own master he standeth or falleth'? The Lord isn't going to ask me why some people helped rob Him of His day by making the cars take them visiting on Sunday; them that go visiting will have to tell Him their own story and answer for their doings as best they can; whatever they say won't alter the fact that He will say to me, 'Mrs. Solomon Smith, why did you help shut them poor fellows out of heaven, by putting in your example to help them break My laws? Didn't you know that to obey was better than sacrifice?'"

It was worthy of thought that, quaint and strange as this way of putting it was, something in the tone, or the words, or the influence of the Spirit whose breathings they were, hushed the group around the breakfast-table into decorous attention.

The questioner seemed satisfied; at least he pursued that portion of the subject no farther, but after a moment or so of silence asked:

"But what would you have people do? The fact remains that a great many ladies at least, cannot get to church at all unless they ride on the cars. Do you think it would be right for them to habitually stay at home from church, when the street-cars pass their door every five minutes about 'str wouldn't th Mrs. Sm penetrative said:

"Suppos the Lo and that I without 'er to, stay at

In the n provoked, "You see church on the Sabbath a church, bu what to do course it i Sabbath da sacrifice." ment as no

Even the but had a t

"Mrs. S telling us al For my pa horses and

"Yes," s ner saucer, We got up to the critt usual, becau in the bask with coals, white meeti the sheds a out their ba dinner, and They always know it was day of rest; set, stepping the Corners over had to you say, de that and rid

If the "I saw it now, followed at k Altogether come off wi ments were t them.

"She is a and he ling just as shar a fellow has worsted. Pe too."

The most b been Mrs. Jo expression o way in whic following out agreed with t

"Bible ve this mornin remember on when he was good, and d applies equal then do them is not used to be expected t

Whether M approve of S did not quite

"To his own master he picture, too, I believe."
ely complacent smile, as or having vindicated her to sustain her.
h, in no wise quenched, he judging of other folks to do that Himself, little hidden things that guess it don't apply to e think of 'em, because eful about that. "Let
's says He, and then He e known by our fruits;
ights, so that folks who ved, would glorify Him of difference what the guess like enough the going to church on His I means to get there."
pronounced the means d her voice was several y 'pronouncing' from against the command, keep it holy, not doing own pleasure.' Of poor street-car drivers abbath day holy; and ugh like enough they read; poor fellows, trust the Lord; they Him. The trouble is h, on them cars on the hile, they say to 'em,

'; we've nothing to do
to take us to church, r you have any chance to us. Now, you see, blood all the nations ve our neighbours as le it pretty plain that urs, whether they are here else. There's no

Erskine was really quaint ways amused it by interposing an run on the Sabbath people patronised evenue comes from ld lady with assured man, 'To his own Lord isn't going to Him of His day by Sunday; them that eir own story and can; whatever they I say to me, 'Mrs.
t them poor fellows mple to help them that to obey was aint and strange as in the tone, or the whose breathings

the breakfast-table
least he pursued ut after a moment e do? The fact ast, cannot get to
rs. Do you think ally stay at home their door every ve minutes? Seems to me I have heard a Bible verse about 'straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel;' ouldn't that apply?"

Mrs. Smith laid down her knife and fork, and fixed penetrative grey eyes on the young man's face as she aid:

"Suppose I hadn't a pair of shoes to my name, and suppose the Lord knew that I hadn't no way of earning any, and that I couldn't, no way that I could fix it, go to church without 'em, which do you suppose He would tell me to to, stay at home or steal your shoes and go?"

In the midst of the general laugh which this sentence provoked, she added:

"You see, I believe that the folks who can't get to a church on Sunday without helping somebody to break the Sabbath, and can't find any other places to live near to a church, better tell the Lord all about it, and ask Him what to do; seeing there's them two bars of His, that of course it ain't right to break down, 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' and 'To obey is better than sacrifice.' I don't believe He looks upon His commandments as no bigger than gnats."

Even then, one of the sillier misses was not quenched, but had a tart question to put:

"Mrs. Smith, when you lived on that farm you were telling us about the other day, didn't you ride to church?
For my part, I can't see the distinction between car-horses and farm-horses."

"Yes," said Mrs. Smith, taking a swallow of tea from her saucer, "I rode to church every Sunday of my life.
We got up early and did the necessary work and tended to the critters. We give them a better breakfast than usual, because it was the Sabbath, and packed our dinner in the basket to eat at noon, and filled the foot-stove with coals, and started, and when we got to the little white meeting house, Solomon would drive into one of the sheds and tie the horses; and at noon he would get out their bag of oats, and set them to eating their Sunday dinner, and there they would stand and rest and eat.
They always had an extra mess of oats, and if they didn't know it was Sunday, it wasn't because they didn't have a day of rest; other days they worked from sunrise to sunset, stepping spry, but Sundays it was only to take us to the Corners and back again; and neither Solomon nor I ever had to stay away from church on their account. Did you say, dear, that you didn't see no difference between that and riding on the street-cars?"

If the "dear" really hadn't seen the difference, she saw it now, and had wit enough to join in the laugh that followed at her expense.

Altogether, Laura was satisfied. Her old friend had come off with flying colours; whether or not her arguments were unanswerable, certainly no one had answered them.

"She is sharp," said Erskine, as we left the table, and he lingered beside Lida and her mother. "She is just as sharp as steel. It is fun to talk with her, but a fellow has to keep all his wits at work, and then get worsted. Perhaps she is nearer right than some of us, too."

The most complacent listener at the breakfast table had been Mrs. Jonas Smith. I could but watch the satisfied expression of her face, and wonder a little over the kind way in which she declared that she believed in people following out their convictions of right, whether others agreed with them or not.

"Bible verses seem to be our chief bill of fare here this morning," she said, with a pleasant laugh; "I remember one that brother Solomon was fond of quoting when he was a young man, 'To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.' I suppose it applies equally to those who think things are wrong, and then do them." "I, for one, respect Maria's scruples. She is not used to the lawless ways of a great city, and cannot be expected to approve of them."

Whether Mrs. Solomon Smith was to be expected to approve of Sabbath-breaking after she became used to it, did not quite appear.

When we reached the parlours, the reason for her tolerance came to the surface:

"You must take possession of the back parlour this morning, Maria. It will be deserted, and you can have a nice, cosy time all to yourself. Harris, move the large green chair from the front parlour over here by the register —the morning is unusually cold. I don't know whether there are any books down here that you will care to read, but Lida shall bring you a number from the library, and you can select for yourself."

The picture must have looked inviting; Mrs. Solomon Smith was fond of reading. She turned beaming eyes on her sister-in-law, but answered without hesitation:

"I don't believe I shall have any time this morning.
I've got a little bit of fixing to do, and it must be most time to start for church."

"Oh!" If you have studied intonation very much, you will be able to imagine how much that "oh" expressed, without my trying to tell you. "I did not suppose you would go to church this morning, after all I have heard. You would have to ride on the street-cars, you know."

"Bless your heart! no, I wouldn't; Jonas said it wasn't more than five minutes' ride in the cars, and I can walk as far as that would be without any trouble.
Oh, I shall go to church; a nice, bright morning like this, and me feeling well and strong; I couldn't think of staying away! Besides, I promised Solomon I'd hear for him to-day; he is uncommon fond of good solid preaching."

The easy-chair and the cosy corner and the tempting books were of no avail; the strong-hearted old lady came downstairs, presently, shod in arctic rubbers, which made her feet look nearly as large again as usual, her long dark-green camelot cloak securely buttoned from throat to feet, her neat black velvet bonnet of a pattern that might almost have dated back into her youth, and a strong cotton umbrella to serve in lieu of a cane. It was still early, so none of the street-car party were visible.
Several loungers who had chosen not to go to church at all, stood in parlour and hall, ready for any amusement that offered. Laura, in her handsome winter suit of velvet and silk, looked like a young princess beside her old friend. We had had but little talk together since breakfast.

"Mamma," she had said, with the little ring of determination which girls at nineteen like to put into their voices, "I am going to walk to church with Auntie Smith."

"Are you?" I said quietly; "then there will be three of us."

She came and wound both arms about me in a caressing way that she had, as she said:

"You dear mamma, you always do such nice things!
And you do them so quietly, without any of the high pressure that I have to get up. I wish I could be more like you. Mamma, I was afraid you would go in the car; and after all that had been said, I could not endure to have you."

"Thank you, daughter," I said, and I could not help laughing a little.

The town in which we live does not boast of street-cars, and it so happens that the question of Sabbath-riding had never come up before her.

"I had not the slightest idea of riding to church.
Your father and I settled that matter long ago, as inconsistent for us, at least; and you know that even Mrs.
Jonas Smith's decision was, 'To him that knoweth to do good, and doeth it not, to him it is sin.'"

"Mamma, why didn't you join in the discussion?"

"My dear, did you think our old friend stood in special need of help?"

She laughed brightly and said no more. Then we went downstairs to wait for our old lady.

CHAPTER XI.

"SAYS I: 'I THINK THERE WAS AN UNBELIEVER ABOUT.'"

I THINK it must have been a long five minutes' ride on the street-cars, for it took us nearly half an hour to walk it; but the church was reached at last. A trifle late we were, and the Smith pew was full with the gay party who had come thither by the "red line."

We met Irving at the door, looking excessively annoyed. We learned afterward that he had called to escort us to church, and Mrs. Johns, in her vexation, had expressed herself more plainly than had been agreeable to him.

"Upon my word!" he said, addressing himself to Laura, I suppose because he did not dare to scold me, "I think this is carrying philanthropy a little too far. You are making yourself ridiculously conspicuous by this proceeding."

Laura was not in the mood to be scolded; sensitive to ridicule as she was, it had taken considerable moral courage to enable her to decide on her course of action that morning. Once decided, however, she was, like all persons who have to pass through a struggle, nerved for the occasion; so it was a very haughty cousin who drew her arm away from his detaining hand and said:

"We will not render you conspicuous, Irving, by obliging you to accompany us. The sexton will show us to a seat." And, before he could control himself to reply, she had obeyed the motion of the usher, and was moving down the long aisle, Mrs. Smith and I meekly following. What became of Irving I do not know. I was sorry for the boy. Why will young people be so hard on each other?

It seemed to me a singular circumstance that the usher should choose to give us a sitting in the pew which was directly in front of Jonas Smith's own. But a stranger circumstance followed. The lady occupying the corner, who looked up with pleasant face at our entrance, was none other than she of the fur-lined circle, who had rejoiced over the gift of the little book. She instantly recognised us. How could she help it, with that green camel cloak in the foreground? Her face became radiant; and as Laura had drawn back to let Mrs. Smith precede her, it was the old lady's hand that she grasped with delight, and a whispered welcome—church though it was. That she was a woman of distinction, was at once apparent from the look on Jonas Smith's face. I caught it as I turned to accept an offered book from one of his party—astonishment, incredulity, perplexity, and a touch of dismay.

Perhaps I am, like Laura, growing uncharitable, when I attribute the sudden, careful attention to his sister-in-law's comfort, which he gave after service, to the fact that one who was among the wealthiest patrons of the wealthy church had welcomed her as a friend. He tried to overcome Mrs. Solomon's scruples to the street-car.

"You ought not to walk," he said in a voice of extreme solicitude as we reached the hall. "The wind has risen, and I'm really afraid for the consequences if you undertake to walk against it."

"I'd be afraid for the consequences if I undertook to walk against the Lord's express command," she said, with a good-humoured smile. "Don't you worry about me. My umbrella's stout, and so is my heart. I'll get home all right."

And she did, for our car acquaintance came toward us just then, holding out a hand to me as if I, too, were an old friend. She would be so glad to have us occupy the vacant seats in her carriage; she came alone; it would be no trouble at all; she passed within a square of Mr. Smith's house; nothing would give her greater pleasure than to serve her dear old friend, whom she recognised as of royal blood. So it transpired that Mr. Jonas Smith had the pleasure of seating his sister-in-law in the back seat of one of the finest carriages that drew up before the sanctuary, and tucking round her a brilliant, furry robe that represented much money—an all-important feature in his eyes. Then he and his waiting party betook themselves to the street-cars, while we rolled rapidly away.

Fairly at home in our own room, where we had escaped until the late dinner was served, Laura arranged us to her own satisfaction; Mrs. Smith in one easy-chair, I in another, then curled herself among the pillows of the bed, prepared for comfort, and began:

"Well, Auntie Smith, how did you like the church?"

"Why, it was beautiful," said Mrs. Solomon, with animation. "I liked it. I always do like nice churches, just as nice as folks can afford. I ain't one of them kind that think the days when we used foot-stoves for warming or for freezing, and had no cushions on the seats, and had high, old-fashioned pulpits without any pretty fixings, were better than these days or ought to come back again. In them days we didn't carpet our own floors, nor cushion our chairs. Times are changed, and I like the Lord's house to keep pace with our own, at least. Look how they did with the Temple. The Lord had the best use for that. It came first, and I suppose if the people had anything left, they could put some of the pretty into their own homes, but not before the Temple had all it needed. That ought to be the rule now. I liked the church, child. The carpet wasn't thick enough to hurt my feelings. I believe in making the church the very handsomest place there is to go to; acting as though you loved it so, you couldn't do too much for it. I liked the big organ, too. The louder it rolled the better I was pleased. It made me think of the 'ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands,' and the 'sound of many waters.'"

"But, auntie, I meant the sermon; how did you like that?"

Silence for a minute, then a meditative "I dunno, child. Was it a sermon? You see a sermon means more than just to stand up in a pulpit and talk. Solomon and I got to arguing about that once, and we didn't agree. He was kind of criticising—Solomon is tempted that way a good deal—and says he to me: 'Well, now, Maria, I'll look in the dictionary and see what's what.' We've got one of them great big dictionaries that knows most everything; I never did see a book like it! We had a little one, but my! it don't begin with this. Jessie, she sent it to us for a Thanksgiving present. That's what she said. It wasn't Thanksgiving, and I dunno what she was thankful for just then; but she called it that. Solomon got up and went over to the stand, and hunted out the word sermon, and read it off to me; quite a long explanation, but this was part of it: that it was for the purpose of religious instruction. That's where Solomon and I didn't agree. I thought a talk about a verse of Scripture was a sermon, anyhow; but Solomon said there must be religious instruction in it. Now, Laura, I leave it to you. Was there any religious instruction in what we heard this morning?"

"Why, auntie," said Laura, greatly amused, "I thought it was all instruction from beginning to end. Don't you remember how many 'original readings' he gave us, and how learnedly he described what a miracle was, from a scientific standpoint, and the physical, and mental, and moral, and I don't know how many more kinds of impossibility that there could be miracles at the present day? I think it was as full of instruction as any sermon I have heard this long while."

Mrs. Smith sat back among the cushions, and gave a little sigh.

"Yes," she said, "there was instruction, but was there religion? I don't know; I'm only an ignorant old woman, and of course I haven't any right to pass my opinion on a scholar like him; but I can't help thinking that there might have been a different kind of a sermon preached out of that text, somehow; one that would have helped me, you know. I ain't far enough along to understand it; and like enough there were a good many in the same fix."

"I don't doubt it in the least," observed Laura. "I never expect to be far enough along to understand it."

"Well, such a nice of lingerie their faith sins be fo

"Aunt elbow to were a m to-day, w

"Bless notions!

a text! I own I

I thought they woul

they would of studied got to see the Bible,

we talked

Solomon n

to that, ti

and says

Smith, we

Solomon

you and over what

I guess y

sermon!"

But La

any side i

"That's

"Tell us

Mrs. Sm

"Dear

got most

Sunday e o'clock, a over."

"But I

"Oh, t

see there's read it th reading, b

the book t

"Solom

to hear H

and there

"Whe

"Why

the leper,

I, 'and st

next.'

"I do

known wh

after Him

them in t

was that travelling

many frie

of mad wh

over and p

"Solom

no matter

them coals

reading, an

"This

the palsy,

What a tin

I wonder i and went a see wh

great deal

Solomon:

"Yes,

First, one and they s

the leprosy

looked at t

—an all-important feature waiting party betook themselves rolled rapidly away. om, where we had escaped. Laura arranged us with in one easy-chair, among the pillows of the begin: "Did you like the church?" said Mrs. Solomon, with says do like nice churches. I ain't one of them kind of foot-stoves for warming ous on the seats, and had out any pretty fixings ought to come back again. on their own floors, nor cushion, and I like the Lord's own, at least. Look how Lord had the best used suppose if the people had some of the pretty into e the Temple had all it rule now. I liked the 't thick enough to hurt the church the very o; acting as though you much for it. I liked the rolled the better I was he 'ten thousand times of thousands,' and the mon; how did you like meditative "I dunno, be a sermon means more and talk. Solomon and and, and we didn't agree. on is tempted that way. "Well, now, Maria, I'll at's that's what." We've got that knows most every- ke it! We had a little this. Jessie, she sent. That's what she said. no what she was thank- that. Solomon got up hunted onto the word to a long explanation, as for the purpose of e Solomon and I didn't rse of Scripture was a id there must be reli- a, I leave it to you. in what we heard this ly amused, "I thought g to end. Don't you ings" he gave us, and miracle was, from a ical, and mental, and more kinds of impos- at the present day? as any sermon I have cushions, and gave a uction, but was there ly an ignorant old my right to pass my can't help thinking one kind of a sermon ent that would have ough along to under- a good many in the observed Laura. "I so understand it."

"Well, now, you see, doesn't it seem a kind of pity, such a nice text!" She repeated the words with a sort of lingering, regretful tenderness: "'When Jesus saw their faith, He said unto the sick of the palsy, Son, thy sins be forgiven thee.'"

"Auntie," said Laura, as she raised herself on one elbow to push another pillow under her head, "if you were a minister, and had taken that text for a sermon to-day, what would you have said about it?"

"Bless your heart, child, you do have the wildest notions! The idea of me being a minister and taking a text! That would be enough if I was Solomon. But I own I had the hardest kind of a time keeping my thoughts to listening to what he was saying this morning; they would go roving off. You see, Solomon and I kind of studied over that story for a whole week, once, till it got to seeming about the wonderfullest one there was in the Bible. And I kept a-going over that Sabbath evening we talked so much about it, and a-thinking of what Solomon said, and then of what I said, and what he said to that, till I got away off from the minister in the pulpit, and says I to myself: 'Well, I declare, Mrs. Solomon Smith, won't you look pretty when you get home, and Solomon asks you about the sermon, a-saying, 'Why, you and I were the preachers that morning! I can tell over what we said, but I dunno what Dr. Barmore said; I guess you'll get sent to the city again to hear a sermon!'"

But Laura was not to be turned from her purpose by any side issues.

"That's just what I want to hear," she said earnestly.

"Tell us just what you and Mr. Smith said."

Mrs. Smith laughed a cheery, pleased laugh.

"Dear me!" she said; "it would take too long. We got most amazingly interested in that story. It was a Sunday evening, and I remember we sat up till ten o'clock, and the fire went clean out while we talked it over."

"But I don't see what you found to say."

"Oh, there's enough to say, I tell you! Why, you see there's wonderful things in it. We just happened to read it that night; it wasn't in the line of our regular reading, but I got interested in it as I was looking over the book to find the place, and says I:

"Solomon, just think of it; there came such a crowd to hear Him preach that they stood all round the door, and there wasn't room for any more."

"When was that?" says Solomon.

"Why, that time in Capernaum, after He had cured the leper, you know. I suppose they heard of that," says I, "and so came post-haste to see what would happen next."

"I don't wonder at it," says Solomon. "If they had known what they were about they would have crowded after Him so that there wouldn't have been room for them in the streets. The wonderfullest thing about it all was that they let Him go through the world as He did, travelling round, kind of homeless, and without a great many friends that amounted to much. It makes me kind of mad when I think of it," says Solomon, and he leaned over and poked the coals.

"Solomon always pokes the coals when he gets excited; no matter if the fire is burning just as bright as it can, then coals have to be poked! But I went on with my reading, and says I:

"This was the time they brought the man that had the palsy, you know; four of his friends brought him. What a time they must have had a-getting of him started! I wonder if he had a wife, and if she put in and helped and went along, or stayed at home and waited and watched to see what would come of it? I suppose there was a great deal of talk before they started," says I; and says Solomon:

"Yes, I suppose they came up to it by degrees like. First, one of 'em said, Jesus of Nazareth is here again, and they say He has been doing wonderful things, curing the leprosy, and all that. And then, like enough, he looked at the sick man and said, I wish He could see him.

And I think maybe somebody shook his head and said, Oh, there ain't no hope for him! Whoever heard of the palsy being cured?"

"Then I put in a word. Says I: 'Yes, and I dare say there was somebody to throw cold water on the idea by saying they didn't believe a word of all these doings. It was a likely story that Jesus of Nazareth could cure diseases that the learned doctors couldn't touch! Why, He was only a carpenter's Son! What advantage had He?"

"Solomon laughed, and, says he: 'You always think there's a croaker about, don't you, Maria?'"

"Says I: 'I think there was an unbeliever about. There seemed to be more of them than of any other kind of folks when He was here. But go on,' says I, 'I like to hear what you think they did.' Well, he went on to say he thought they worked up the notion, little by little, of taking the man down to the meeting. He said he hadn't much doubt that it didn't come to them on the sudden, but they kept a-wishing, and a-wishing, and hearing of wonderful things, and turning of it over in their minds, how the two could be got together, until finally one of them up and said: 'Let's take him down there on a bed! I'll carry one end, if you'll take the other.' And he said he reckoned after they had overcome all the objections and got started, and got to pretty near the door, and found they could not get in, some were for turning round and going back. Says I: 'Yes, I can hear them; they said there was no use; he couldn't be got into such a crowd as that, and it wasn't a mite likely it would do any good anyway.'"

But Solomon said he had no idea that them four men who were carrying the bed said any such thing. Says he:

"I believe their faith kept a-growing stronger with every step they took. Because, don't you see, they acted on what faith they had. And if it wasn't any bigger than a grain of mustard-seed when they started, it got a pretty good growth by the time they got to the meeting; and when the folks began to say to them that they had done all they could, and had better just take the poor fellow home as quietly as possible, I have an idea that them men shook their heads and said: He shall be got to Jesus now, if we have to tear this house down to do it. And that gives one of them a thought, and says he: Boys, this kind of roof comes off easy; let's lift it, and let him down right into the midst of them. I'll tell you what it is, I believe He can cure him. And then I think the others nodded their heads, and said: So do I, and I. Somehow I've kept feeling it stronger and stronger since we come along. Because," says Solomon, "you see it says He saw their faith; so they must have had it. I reckon, too, that the sick man looked at them and smiled all over his face. He felt the faith growing up in his heart fast. What do you s'pose them Pharisees thought when they see that bed coming down through the roof?" says Solomon; and says I:

"Why, it's easy enough to tell what they thought. Says they: If here don't come a bed, and that wretched sinner who was took with the palsy so long ago is on it. What a ridiculous thing! As if everybody didn't know that palsy couldn't be cured, and as if this miserable fellow was worth curing, anyhow. Such fanatics! That's what comes of letting this fellow preach and draw crowds round Him!"

"Now I want to tell you just what Solomon said to me then, because I remember it very particular. Says he:

"Maria"—and his voice sounded kind of strange—"Maria, don't you think it is most like being irreverent to speak of the Lord Jesus and call Him 'this fellow'?"

"For a minute I was beat; not that I thought I'd done anything wrong; but it struck me all of a sudden as being awful. Says I:

"Solomon Smith, I do. I think it was dreadful! dreadful! It was all of a piece with the crown of thorns, and the spitting in His face, and saying: Aha! aha! But don't you know they did it? As for this fellow, they said, we know not from whence he is. I was only telling you what I thought more than likely they said. Not that I would say it for ten thousand worlds. I ain't a Pharisee.' And says Solomon:

 "'That's true, Maria;' and he gave the coals a poke."

CHAPTER XII.

"I SUPPOSE LIKELY HE KNOWS WHAT HE MEANT, BUT I'M BEAT IF I DO!"

"O on, please," said Laura, as Mrs. Smith paused in meditative mood.

She laughed pleasantly.

"Well, I dunno as there is much to go on about, child; you see it was just our talk. Solomon said he'd give most anything to be there when that man hopped up and picked up his bed and walked out; he said he guessed the crowd made way for him. Thou I said I most wondered that when Jesus told him to arise and take up his bed and go home, he didn't say: 'Why, I can't walk! I've got the palsy; I ain't stirred a step for two years!' But Solomon shook his head: 'No,' he said, 'by that time the little stream of faith had got to be a river, and the man felt it plunging along all through his body, and knew he could walk.' And then says he, 'Only think, Maria, what was walking and carrying of his bed, compared with what he got! "Thy sins are forgiven thee." Oh my!' says he, 'seems to me if I could hear Him say that to me, I should jump right up and down, and shout so they could hear me down at the Corners.' Says I, 'Why, Solomon! haven't you heard Him? I can hear Him for you, just as plain! Sometimes for myself I'm kind of in doubt, but I never nuf for you.' Then Solomon he laughed a little while he says to me: 'Hast thou faith? have it to thyself,' and then we had our little joke about 'wresting Scripture,' and—why, the fact is, child, if I should keep on talking till supper time, I couldn't begin to tell you all we said; but you see it wasn't a sermon."

"I don't know," said Laura: "seems to me it was the kind of sermon that I should like to hear."

"Well, I don't deny we found it profitable to us—we are only common folks, you know. Solomon had me notice what the effect of this man's faith was on the crowd. They were all amazed, you know, and glorified God, and said, 'We never saw anything like this before in our lives.' And says he, 'I s'pose if we had growin' faith like a grain of mustard seed, that doesn't stay a grain, after it is planted, but grows up into a tree; if we were like that, we would keep amazing folks all the time; they would say they never saw the like; and they would have to glorify God whether they wanted to or not. The trouble is, we ain't mustard trees at all, but poor little dwarf plants; we don't die outright, and that's about all that can be said of us.' But I kept going back to that wife at home—I made up my mind he had a wife—and I saw her a-sitting by the window, watching with her heart in her mouth. I know just exactly how she felt. I think she had a little faith, just a shred; that kind of imitation stuff that we name faith. I think maybe she said: 'Sho! what an idiot I am for expecting that anybody can cure him! Haven't the doctors told me this long time that there wasn't any hope? It was real sily of me to consent to his going; just as like as not the excitement will make him worse. But then there was Peter's mother-in-law; she was very sick; and that very afternoon I heard of her going about the house, helping to get supper for Jesus. But then, a fever ain't the palsy.' That's the way I run on to Solomon. Of course I didn't know things were actually that way, but then they might have been, and it's more than likely they were; and it didn't do no harm anyhow; just made it all seem more real and natural to me, and Solomon said he liked it."

"So do we," said Laura, laughing, yet reaching for her handkerchief. "What did you think she said when she heard the news?"

"Why, I kind of thought that as he walked home carrying his bed, a great crowd followed him, and the boys kept shouting—there were boys along you may be sure, and it ain't no ways likely that they kept still—and I thought, maybe she looked out of the window to see what was to pay, and says she: 'What can all that crowd be for? What's happened now? They act as though they were coming here; and who is that that they are crowding around. Why, if that—it can't be!—and yet it is. I'd know him anywhere; he's walking just as straight and fast as ever he did in his life, and he's carrying his bed!' Well, then we went to arguing about her. Solomon thought like enough she fainted; but I didn't. I thought she rushed out and joined that crowd, and got hold of his arm somehow, and took one end of that bed; and the way they all got into that house again I don't believe none of 'em know to this day. After that we got to talking about which of them all we would like to have been, and Solomon said, next to being the man himself, with all his sins forgiven, he would like to have been one of the four who helped take him to Jesus. Then says he: 'Only hear us, Maria, two old simpletons! Just as if we couldn't hear His voice to-day if we wanted to—and hadn't heard it many a time for that matter—and just as though we couldn't keep bringing our friends to Him all the time; no crowd to hinder our getting in; no roof to tear down before we can get to Him, except the roof of our pride and unbelief.' 'Yes,' says I, 'and for the matter of that, we need to take ourselves to Him to get cured of the palsy. It's a kind of palsy that keeps our hands, and feet, and tongues from doing what they ought to a great deal of the time. The palsy is incurable to this day, except by that sar' Jesus of Nazareth. It is a good thing He is the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever.'"

"And yet we cannot take our friends to Him to be cured of bodily disease," Laura said, and her voice was tremulous; I knew she was thinking of a dear friend over whose case human physicians had passed adverse judgment. Mrs. Smith's eyes grew brighter and she sat erect. "I should like to know why not," she said with energy; "I can't find any place in the Bible where it says He has lost His power over the bodies, or lost His willingness to help us. According to my notion, not a body gets over a sickness or an accident 'unless He wills to have it so. If the doctors did it, they'd always do it, and there wouldn't be no use in anybody dying. Of course, He uses means; that's no more than He always did. I wonder if He didn't make clay and put it on the blind man's eyes, and tell the man with the withered hand to stretch it forth, and call on the people to roll away the stone from Lazarus' grave. I do suppose He could have rolled that stone away Himself, without any of their help, if He had wanted to, but He was willing to let them put in their means, just as He is now; folks talk as if 'means' were something that they got up for themselves without any of His help! I wonder where they got their brains, and their plants, and minerals, and the land knows what not, to work with? I suppose they all come by chance."

"But, auntie, didn't you hear Dr. Barmore say that the age of miracles was long past?"

"Yes," said Mrs. Smith, settling back among the cushions, "but I don't know how he found out; I don't find no such verse in the Bible; we talked up that very thing, Solomon and I. He asked me if I thought Jesus often cured people like that nowadays, and I said I didn't know as He often did it; that the world nowadays was very much like that country in which He couldn't do many mighty works because of their unbelief; 'but,' says I, 'we know He sometimes does such works.' Well, Solomon had just been down to the city; he went with a drove, and was coming back by the boat, and he got belated, and the boat went off and left him, and there wasn't no way but to stay in the city over Sunday, or else ride on the cars all night and get home Sunday morning; of course he couldn't do that, so he stayed; and he went to hear a D.D. preach, and, says he, 'Maria, that minister that I heard last Sunday said there wasn't any miracles nowadays.'"

"What is a miracle?" says I; and he was still for a minute, a big book definition establishe tion from large-vo difficult p

"Well, the mean it pretty thing diff something seem to more like chose? establishe know? T nature' a he had est men he ta right to t

"But I didn't u might all likely he couldn't you know unknown edifieth th that, and by the to known wh Paul kno thanked C than any rather spe my voice words in a

"But, a cured now

"Why ain't afraid always was things now to the esta ago, He is that will n would be a that there establishe woman; miracles; names. I girl name one way o relation, f kind of ge for us. W be a fact, a talking abo years! O sixteenth of her po she bore I really, unl all along a knew how her poor w port her m using ill in it, too; good and s kind of tir Smith, and feel like s It took m herself th trouble ge d followed him, and the boys along you may be that they kept still—and out of the window to see "What can all that crowd be? They act as though it is that they are crowd-cant be!—and yet it is walking just as straight he, and he's carrying his thing about her, Solomon but I didn't. I thought of that bed; and the way I don't believe none of it we got to talking about have been, and Solomon self, with all his sins forgiven one of the four who says ho: 'Only hear us, as if we couldn't hear—' and hadn't heard it and just as though we s to Him all the time; no roof to tear down t the roof of our pride for the matter of that, m to get cured of the keeps our hands, and they ought to a great incurable to this day, azerath. It is a good day, and for ever."

ends to Him to be cured her voice was tremu- of a dear friend over passed adverse judg- dnter and she sat erect. she said with energy; where it says He has most His willingness to not a body gets over e wills to have it so. says do it, and there ying. Of course, He always did. I wonder the blind man's eyes, ed hand to stretch it away the stone from ould have rolled that their help, if He had t them put in their x as if 'means' were selves without any got their brains, and and knows what not, me by chance."

Darmore say that the g back among the found out; I don't talked up that very if I thought Jesus t, and I said I didn't world nowadays was hch He couldn't do albelief; 'but, say ch works'. Well, city; he went with e boat, and he got eft him, and there ver Sunday, or else Sunday morning; ayed; and he went Maria, that minister as't any miracles he was still for a minute, and then he said he reckoned we'd better ask the big book; so he turned to it again, and we learned the definition by heart: 'An event or effect contrary to the established constitution and course of things, or a deviation from the known laws of nature.' She recited the large-worded sentence carefully, as a schoolboy recites a difficult paragraph in history.

"Well, we had to study over that answer and hunt out the meaning of two or three words, but by-and-by we got it pretty well simmered down, that a miracle was something different from what was happening all the time, and something that human beings couldn't do; but it didn't seem to me that that proved anything. Who would be more likely than God to do something different if He chose? And as to the established course of things, who established 'em; who made the laws of nature, I'd like to know? That man this morning talked about 'the laws of nature' and 'the established order of events' as though he had established them himself, or some of them scientific men he talked about had done it, and even God hadn't a right to touch 'em.

"But I ain't going to criticise him; I can't, because I didn't understand half the time what he was driving at; it might all have been true what he meant, and I suppose likely he knows what he meant, but I'm beat if I do. I couldn't help wishing he would prophesy a little; don't you know, dear, how Paul says 'he that speaketh in an unknown tongue edifieth himself; but he that prophesieth, edifieth the Church'? Well, I got to thinking about that, and I kept on. Says Paul, 'Except ye utter words by the tongue, easy to be understood, how shall it be known what is spoken?' Ye shall speak into the air! Paul knew plenty of languages; one of the things he thanked God for was that he spoke with tongues more than any of 'em; but says he: 'In the Church I had rather speak five words with my understanding, that by my voice I might teach others also, than ten thousand words in an unknown tongue.'"

"But, auntie, do you really believe that people are ever cured nowadays as suddenly as that man was?"

"Why not, child? Because it would be a miracle? I ain't afraid of that; you see, a miracle is just what it always was; if it is contrary to the established order of things now, why, it was then; and if God went contrary to the established order of things eighteen hundred years ago, He is able to do it now; and there's only one thing that will make me believe that He never does it, and that would be a Bible verse that said right out, in plain words, that there wasn't to be any more things contrary to the established order. But then, I'm only an ignorant old woman; I don't pretend to know. Maybe they ain't miracles; maybe they ought to be called by different names. But I know this: Did you ever hear about a girl named Jennie Smith? She ain't no kin of mine; one way of looking at it, and another ay she is a blood relation, for her Elder Brother is mine, too, and He has gone to get some mansions in our Father's house ready for us. Well, this that I'm going to tell you I know to be a fact, and them that dispute it don't know what they are talking about. She lay on her back for seventeen whole years! On her back! Dear me! that don't tell the sixteenth part of it; she lay on a wheeled cot, with one of her poor limbs bolted down in it, and the sufferings she bore I don't know as anybody could believe. I don't really, unless they knew her, and knew about the suffering all along as I did, and heard her sweet, patient voice, and knew how the Lord sustained her, and helped her to use her poor weak hands, and her clear, strong brain, to support her mother and sisters. Folks talk about sick people using will power to make them well—there's a good deal in it, too; I believe in the will, and I believe in using it good and strong when a body feels sick and nervous, and kind of tired of life; but when I tell any one about Jennie Smith, and then he goes to preaching will power to me, I feel like saying: Bless your poor little wizened-up heart! It took more will power for that poor young thing to get herself through one hour of pain and privation and trouble generally, without screaming all the time, and ending up in a lunatic asylum, than you ever used in all your life, or ever will use, because you ain't got the will to make the power out of. Well, how I am running on! The long and short of it is, that one night, after she had been serving Him beautifully on her back all these years, and after the very best doctors in the country had said she never could hope to sit up again, much less stand on her feet, this same Jesus of Nazareth, who cured the sick man of the palsy, and who said of Himself that He was 'the same yesterday, to-day, and for ever,' set her on her feet in a minute of time, and she has been travelling round on them ever since, working for Him with all her might; and a great many folks when they see her and hear her, and know what she was, glorify God, and say we never saw it after this fashion, and a great many others say, 'Give the doctors and the will power and anything else you can think of the praise, for as for 'this fellow,' we know not from whence He is.' It is pieces of the old stories over again. They don't mean it, you know; they haven't a notion—some of them—of dishonouring God, but they are most dreadful 'fraid the glory will be given to Him. Last summer, when I was gone to that Convention, I met a man who had heard of Jennie Smith, and when he found I knew her as well as I know you, and had been a friend for years, he went to cross-questioning of me with all his might; he was a minister, too—one of them kind that knows all there is to know, and, says he, crossing one shining boot over the other, and looking wise and benevolent:

"I haven't the least doubt, my dear madam, that every word you say is true; neither do I, like some others, doubt the sincerity of the young woman. What I think is this: she was a Christian woman, with great faith in God, and the hope that He might one day cure her kept buoying her up, and her prayers and those of her friends strengthened that hope, and on this night in particular, as she heard her friends praying, she made a tremendous effort of will, and arose to her feet, and found that she could walk! Naturally enough she attributed it to miraculous power, whereas if she had made the same resolve and the same effort long before, the result would have been the same. It is all as simple to an analytical mind as a, b, c, and can be explained, you see, without assailing the estimable young woman's character.

"Ahem," says I, 'Doctor Wisely, didn't I hear you telling, this noon, about the time you had when you were getting up from that eight months' sickness—how weak and feeble you were, and how you had forgotten how to walk, and had to learn over again, just like a child, and how the doctors wouldn't let you take but three steps in the forenoon and three steps in the afternoon for quite a spell?'

"That is all true, madam," says he, as bland as could be, and he wasn't analytical enough to see where he was bringing himself to; and says I:

"Well, could you tell us how it comes that a young woman that hadn't walked a step in seventeen years, hadn't even sat up in bed, should get up and walk across the floor as steady as you can to-day, and should get down on her knees, as natural as you can, and should go up and downstairs the next day, and go where she liked, and do what she liked, just as anybody would? Maybe you can analyse the reason why her will power worked on them muscles of hers after they had been idle for seventeen years, and your will power wasn't strong enough to help you out, in walking straight, after six months of idleness."

"Well, he put the left foot down on the floor, and put the right one over it, and got out his handkerchief and shook it, and coughed and wiped his glasses, and, at last, says he:

"That is certainly a very extraordinary statement, if it is true!"

"Says I: 'Humph! Now I should think it was a very extraordinary statement if it wasn't true! To think of me, an old woman who has been for forty years the wife of Solomon Smith, whose word is as good as his bond, everybody knows, to set up here telling lies about a woman that she has known and loved for ten years, would be pretty extraordinary, I think."

"Auntie," said Laura, sitting upright, "do you mean that this girl or woman actually walked, all in a minute, and kept on walking? I never heard of such a thing in my life!"

"Well, I mean just that. It seems a great wonder, now I think of it, that I never told you about her before; but, then, dear me! there's so many things to tell; you see it all happened before I knew you very well. I'll tell you what it is, child, you must read her books, two of 'em, then you'll know the whole wonderful story. The first one is named 'The Valley of Baca.' She wrote that when she was on her back, and always expected to be till she got wings; but when she got out of the valley, why, of course she had to tell the rest of the story, and so she wrote 'From Baca to Beulah.'"

And at that moment came the summons to the dining-room, and our remarkable after-service meeting was concluded.

CHAPTER XIII.

"I DO DISLIKE SCENES."

FROM the dinner-table nearly all of the guests lounged into the back parlour, and disposed of themselves in various attitudes indicating listless weariness. One, bolder than the rest, admitted that she did not know what to do with herself on Sundays. She did wish there was some public place to go to that wasn't wicked—with a little deprecating laugh over this last; in summer she was nearly always at some seaside resort, and of course everybody went to the beach, but papa had a notion that it wasn't quite the thing to take Sunday walks in the city; she was sure she could never see why. There was but faint response to these murmurings, most of the guests seeming really too bored to attempt reply.

Mrs. Solomon Smith had followed us with alacrity when we proposed taking seats in the parlour; but I fancy her idea of a family gathering in a Sabbath twilight was different from this. She looked around her doubtfully, as little ripples of talk started from one group and another, all frivolous, aimless, and some of it lacking in the spirit of charity. Those who had been to church seemed voluble only over certain elegant toilets, generally in disapproval of the taste displayed in colour or design.

"Wasn't there any sermon?" questioned Mrs. Smith, at last, breaking in upon Effie Van Horne's adjective-abounding description of Mrs. Germain Terry's new suit, "So ridiculously gay for a widow of less than a year!"

Miss Effie had chosen a sanctuary at a greater distance than the rest of us, and so was reporting for the benefit of her friends.

"A sermon!" she said, startled, and thrown off her course a trifle. "Why, yes, of course; there is always a sermon on Sabbath morning, unfortunately; I'm sure I wish there was not. I think a choral service once in a while would be a great improvement on the dry sermon. They are always so lengthy; at least, Dr. Dorland's are. I timed him this morning, and he preached exactly thirty-eight minutes and a half. Don't you think that is entirely too long for a sermon?"

She did not address Mrs. Smith, but Erskine.

"Depends entirely on the matter of the sermon," he answered her with a somewhat embarrassed laugh.

Miss Effie's silliness seemed to be especially trying to him that evening. But she was one of those persons who fail to discover that they are annoying people.

"Do you think so?" she said with delicious childishness. "Now I think all sermons are equally dull and stupid. Whoever heard of a minister selecting an interesting theme to preach about?"

Mrs. Smith turned kind eyes on the silly girl.

"Didn't you ever hear a sermon about heaven, my dear?" she said sympathetically. "And don't you think the story of the beautiful city where there is no night any more, and no trouble, and no tears, and no saying good-bye, and no dying, is just as interesting as it can be?"

Miss Effie toyed with the ribbons of her sash, and blushed a little as she said:

"Oh, well, heaven is nice enough to think about, I suppose, for those who like to. I never tried it much; I like this world too well to care to change. I am not one of your croakers, always crying out against the world as an awful place; that's the reason I don't like sermons; they always make out that the world is a snare and a delusion, and I think it is a perfectly lovely place."

The kind old eyes still beamed, and her voice was bright.

"I think so too, and I've lived here a good many more years than you have, and shed a good many tears, too; but I like the world; I think Jesus liked it very much. He came to redeem it, you see; so it must be beautiful to Him. But then, we can't always stay here, and our friends don't stay. One by one they go off to that other country. I've got more there than here, and much as I like the world, my heart gets all in a flutter when I think of going up to my other home."

I could but notice Erskine. He stood near Mrs. Smith, his eyes on the carpet, his hands toying with his watch-chain, but every feature of the expressive face spoke of a roused heart, or conscience, I could not be sure which. As for Miss Effie, she shivered visibly.

"Oh dear!" she said, "how perfectly doleful we are getting! Talking about dying when we are all so young, and ought to be as happy as birds. The night before a wedding, too. It is a bad omen. Lida, do play something lively and cheer us up!"

During this conversation Lida had been seated at the piano, Irving bending over her, and the two were trying snatches of song. "Sacred song," they called it, out of courtesy for the day, but to my ears, and I feel sure to Mrs. Smith's, it really sounded, some of it, more like dancing-tunes than anything sacred. At Effie's appeal she laughingly played a few gay strains, which moved one of the gentlemen to join her with a whistling accompaniment, and Miss Effie declared that she could not keep her feet still.

After that the talk drifted into even more frivolous channels than before, as if Satan, alarmed at this little rift in the cloud of worldliness in which he was enveloping us all, had redoubled his efforts to arrest anything like serious thought. Laura looked imploringly at me, and murmured her desire to escape. Poor Mrs. Solomon, I suppose, thought of her cold room, and leaned her weary old head back in her easy-chair and closed her eyes. I think she went back to the little brown house in the Hollow, and rested her hand on Solomon's chair, and listened to the music of his voice.

Watching my nephew as he hovered around the maiden of his choice, I wondered whether, when her head was grey and her face wrinkled like Mrs. Solomon Smith's, there would be that fellowship between them, that oneness of thought, and plan, and purpose, that brightened the little brown house at the Hollow.

The wonderment saddened me somewhat. There were times when these two young things seemed to me to be building their future on a very sandy foundation. The talk flowed on, the dividing line between Sabbath fitness and positive, undisguised worldliness growing dimmer and dimmer. Among other things, projects for the evening were discussed. There was a concert, but it was so far down-town, and required "too much dressing for people who were to attend a wedding" the next day. So Miss Effie said.

The statement roused Mrs. Smith, and opened her eyes. "A concert!" she repeated, in a bewildered way, as if imagining that she might be dreaming. "Why, isn't it Sunday yet?"

"Unfortunately, it is," said Miss Effie tartly. "If it were not, there would be ever so many nice things to do."

"But do th the dear, puzz
"Of course ply, since th plundered a
? What
"And do t which questio others of her came over he For almost the house, I attention to I Smith.

owned so actly on edness of young ladies
made so prom
answer:
"No. A u aria, they do
ave praying,
their so-cal
ered music
othing that y
ould recogni
y that name.

about as sac
that which ster Lida is g
g you at t
ment. Wh
they do have great deal of d
g and talki
nd flirting—w
regular Mond
ight perfor
nce, with t ame 'sacred'
ched to it
atch the you nd foolish."

"Like yourse
or instance,"
orted Miss Eff
ho was at a mes divided b
ween her desi
to receive the
sive attention
f Harris, and
tch young Er
ne to her trai
I believe yo
re a frequen ttendant. I
on come in th
st of those r
ently caught?"

"By no means
with a very lo
ow of moc
ference. "I w
well understo
ado any preten
along to the d
avo to waste an
"Harris," said
irreverent."

Whereupon H ad heretofore
"Upon my w
peak, "it is the
f irreverence to His mother cho

owned so
actly on
edness of
young ladies
made so prom
answer:
"No. A u aria, they do
ave praying,
their so-cal
ered music
othing that y
ould recogni
y that name.

about as sac
that which ster Lida is g
g you at t
ment. Wh
they do have
great deal of d
g and talki
nd flirting—w
regular Mond
ight perfor
nce, with t ame 'sacred'
ched to it
atch the you nd foolish."

"Like yourse
or instance,"
orted Miss Eff
ho was at a mes divided b
ween her desi
to receive the
sive attention
f Harris, and
tch young Er
ne to her trai
I believe yo
re a frequen
ttendant. I
on come in th
st of those r
ently caught?"

"By no means
with a very lo
ow of moc
ference. "I w
well understo
ado any preten
along to the d
avo to waste an
"Harris," said
irreverent."

Whereupon H ad heretofore
"Upon my w
peak, "it is the
f irreverence to His mother cho

owned so
actly on
edness of
young ladies
made so prom
answer:
"No. A u aria, they do
ave praying,
their so-cal
ered music
othing that y
ould recogni
y that name.

about as sac
that which ster Lida is g
g you at t
ment. Wh
they do have
great deal of d
g and talki
nd flirting—w
regular Mond
ight perfor
nce, with t ame 'sacred'
ched to it
atch the you nd foolish."

"Like yourse
or instance,"
orted Miss Eff
ho was at a mes divided b
ween her desi
to receive the
sive attention
f Harris, and
tch young Er
ne to her trai
I believe yo
re a frequen
ttendant. I
on come in th
st of those r
ently caught?"

"By no means
with a very lo
ow of moc
ference. "I w
well understo
ado any preten
along to the d
avo to waste an
"Harris," said
irreverent."

Whereupon H ad heretofore
"Upon my w
peak, "it is the
f irreverence to His mother cho

owned so
actly on
edness of
young ladies
made so prom
answer:
"No. A u aria, they do
ave praying,
their so-cal
ered music
othing that y
ould recogni
y that name.

about as sac
that which ster Lida is g
g you at t
ment. Wh
they do have
great deal of d
g and talki
nd flirting—w
regular Mond
ight perfor
nce, with t ame 'sacred'
ched to it
atch the you nd foolish."

"Like yourse
or instance,"
orted Miss Eff
ho was at a mes divided b
ween her desi
to receive the
sive attention
f Harris, and
tch young Er
ne to her trai
I believe yo
re a frequen
ttendant. I
on come in th
st of those r
ently caught?"

"By no means
with a very lo
ow of moc
ference. "I w
well understo
ado any preten
along to the d
avo to waste an
"Harris," said
irreverent."

Whereupon H ad heretofore
"Upon my w
peak, "it is the
f irreverence to His mother cho

owned so
actly on
edness of
young ladies
made so prom
answer:
"No. A u aria, they do
ave praying,
their so-cal
ered music
othing that y
ould recogni
y that name.

here there is no night tears, and no sayings interesting as it can be of her sash, and ugh to think about; I never tried it much; I change. I am not one t against the world world is a snare and a ly lovely place."

and her voice was ere a good many more ood many tears, too;
s liked it very much.
it must be beautiful ys stay here, and our go off to that other here, and much as I flutter when I think ood near Mrs. Smith, aying with his watch-essive face spoke of a I not be sure which.

ectly doleful we are we are all so young,
The night before a Lida, do play some-

l been seated at the
the two were trying they called it, out of and I feel sure to ne of it, more like At Effie's appeal s, which moved one whistling accompanicould not keep her

ven more frivolous rmed at this little he was enveloping rrest anything like orally at me, and r Mrs. Solomon, I d leaned her weary closed her eyes. I own house in the omon's chair, and around the maiden hen her head was Solomon Smith's,

on them, that one-e, that brightened what. There were emed to me to be foundation. The en Sabbath fitness owing dimmer and s for the evening
but it was so far ressing for people xt day. So Miss opened her eyes.

ldered way, as if
"Why, isn't it ie tartly. "If it any nice things

"But do they really have concerts on Sunday nights?" the dear, puzzled old lady wanted to know.
"Of course!" Miss Effie felt herself compelled to ply, since the question was directed to her, and no one plundered an answer in her place. "Why should they not? What more appropriate way of spending Sunday evening than in singing sacred music?"
"And do they have praying?" queried Mrs. Smith, which question not only convulsed Miss Effie, but several others of her stamp; and Lida's cheeks crimsoned with shame over her aunt's ignorance.

For almost the first time since we had been guests in the house, I gave attention to Har-Smith. He owned so distinctly on the edness of the young ladies and made so prompt
an answer:

"No, Aunt Maria, they don't have praying, and their so-called sacred music is nothing that you could recognise by that name. It is about as sacred as that which my sister Lida is giving you at this moment. What they do have is a great deal of dressing and talking
and flirting—why, regular Monday night performance, with the same 'sacred' attached to it to catch the young and foolish."

"Like yourself, for instance," reported Miss Effie, who was at all times divided between her desire to receive the exclusive attentions of Harris, and to attach young Erskine to her train.
I believe you are a frequent attendant. Do you come in the rest of those recently caught?"

"By no means,"
with a very low bow of mock reference. "I was referring to the lambs of the flock; it is well understood that I am nothing but a goat; never made any pretence of being anything else, and therefore belong to the devil, without being caught: he did not have to waste any special effort over me."
"Harris," said his mother reprovingly, "you are growing irreverent."

Whereupon Harris laughed immoderately; his face had heretofore been grave enough.
"Upon my word, mother," he said, when he could speak, "it is the first time I ever heard anybody accused of irreverence toward his Satanic majesty!" His mother chose to ignore this, but said:

"What is the matter with you young people to-night?
There seems to be an element of discord. I never knew you all to get on so amiable together."

"There has been an element of discord introduced into this house," muttered the bride, in what was certainly a very loud undertone. "I'm glad that I ain not to breathe the same atmosphere much longer. Irving, you are very good; I don't know how you endure her at all."

Irving laughed pleasantly, and made some gallant remark about his being able to endure anything just then; there was not enough in all the ailments which all the country towns of the world could produce to affect his happiness. The Mrs.

Smith suddenly sat upright in her chair, and, at this inopportune moment, addressed
the bride-elect:

"Elizabeth, give us some good old-fashioned hymn
tunes, won't you,
and set all these young folks to singing? I'd like to hear them sing
'Thine for the Lord hath led me on,' or something sweet and tender, like that. Come now, just to please your old auntie."

But "Elizabeth" had a naughty frown on her pretty face,
and whirled herself away from the piano with the pettish remark that she had never learned to play psalms; she didn't consider a piano suited to them, anyway.

Now it so chanced, whether from thoughtless-ness or because they supposed that a young lady from the country would not be a proficient at the piano, my Laura had not been asked to play; it also chanced that she was by far the most skillful performer in the house. We recognised quite early in her life that she had marked musical talent, and we had cultivated it as thoroughly as we could. As for her voice, it was simply remarkable. Irving must have remembered it as a boy, but he had not mentioned music to her since we came;

indeed, Irving, naturally enough, had but little thought but for his bride.

I suppose Laura had been a trifle piqued, as girls will be, by the utter indifference of her new acquaintances, and lately had kept perversely in the background whenever there was a call for music.

Indignation over Mrs. Solomon Smith's treatment, however, called her promptly to the front.

"ERSKINE SPRANG FORWARD TO ATTEND HER" (p. 32).

"Annie Smith, I will play and sing the hymn you want," she said decisively, and moved to the vacated music-stool.

Erskine sprang forward to attend her, which item seemed to annoy poor little Effie, and take from her every remnant of good breeding. Her really pretty face was spoiled by a sneer as she murmured to Harris, "Now we shall see what musical prodigies the country can produce." There was not time for more before Laura's voice filled the room:—

"Thus far the Lord hath led me on,
Thus far His power prolongs my days,
And every evening shall make known Some fresh memorial of His grace."

Were I not her mother, I might be tempted to a description of the tenderness and pathos and power with which she rendered that grand old hymn. The first line hushed the chattering groups into astonished silence. On the second verse Erskine joined her, a rich, full bass, which of course added to the charm. It was not strange that other voices than Mrs. Smith's clamoured for more when the music ceased. But Laura turned decisively away from the piano.

"I sang it for Auntie Smith," she said coldly. "I keep my voice for her and a few of my special friends."

But Mrs. Solomon Smith had a word for her: "Laura, my dear, you will not refuse to sing the gospel for any one's asking. Maybe it is the Lord Jesus Himself asking you to witness for Him. I make no doubt that He gave you your voice for that very purpose; and yours too, young man."

This last to Erskine, who answered only by a grave bow, while Laura, with subdued face, turned back to the piano.

One and another and another favourite were called for, Mrs. Jonas Smith graciously adding her voice to the appeals; a musical genius right in her home was something to be proud over. I fancy Mrs. Jonas gave some regretful sighs to the thought that it was Sabbath evening, and none of her friends who had musical daughters or nieces or guests would be likely to see her triumph.

Mrs. Solomon Smith, who, without knowing that Laura's voice was very unusual, has known for years that she greatly enjoyed it, drew out from the store-house of her memory old, long-cherished hymns, and sat back with closed eyes, and enjoyed her Sabbath at last.

Among other sweet, quaint ones that filled the gay parlour that evening was what few people sing now:

"Jesus died on Calvary's mountain, Long time ago;
Now He calls me to confess Him Before I go.

"My past life, all vile and hateful,
He saved from sin;
I should be the most ungrateful Not to own Him."

"I wonder," said Mrs. Smith, breaking the hush that for a moment filled the room at the close of this verse, "I do wonder, now, if there's any of the folks in this room that He is calling to confess Him for things He did for 'em long ago, and they don't want to do it? Seems to me as if there might be one or two. How I wish you could all make up your minds to own Him as your best friend, the lover of your souls."

I have rarely seen such silence as there was in that room then. We could fairly hear the heart-beats. Even the pretty Lida, after a first startled look to see what Irving would think, and what others of her fashionable friends thought, let the anxious look fade out somewhat from her face, and leave an almost wistful expression in its place. But it was the young man, Erskine, who broke the silence:

"I'm one," he said, in a voice that, though husky, was strong. "He did save my vile and hateful life years ago; lifted me up from the depths, and I promised then to confess Him always and everywhere; and I have shamefully broken the pledge, until now hardly any one recognises me as one who ever belonged to Him. I feel though He had justly cast me off!"

"Return unto Me, and I will return unto you, said the Lord."

It was Mrs. Smith's clear, quiet voice that broke upon the almost painful hush following this sentence. She trusted her voice to no words of hers, but poured like a healing balm upon a wound the gracious message of the Lord Himself.

I thought then, as I have often thought before since, that He stayed always very near to Mrs. Smith, and verified to her the promise:

"Thine ears shall hear a word behind thee, saying, This is the way, walk ye in it."

"If we had stayed in there three minutes more, we should have had a prayer-meeting and an anxious seat."

This was what the silly Effie said, as a summons to the dining-room for a cup of coffee broke in upon the scene.

That same silly little voice said, an hour later:

"Don't you think Mr. Erskine has gone for his horses? He has the most elegant pair, and a perfect gem of a carriage. I suppose he will not be so wicked as to go anywhere but to church, after his curious speech to-night; but I do hope he will ask me to go along. I would be willing to be good all the evening, if I could have a ride after those horses. They only came last evening."

He came back with his handsome carriage, and came into the parlour, but he walked straight to Mrs. Solomon Smith's side, with this petition:

"Mrs. Smith, will you let me take you to a church where I think you will like to go to-night? I have a pair of very gentle horses and a close carriage."

And she rode away with him.

"The idea!" said Miss Effie, referring, not to the choice of a companion, but to the episode in the parlour. "Who knew that Erskine was such an eccentric being! For the matter of that, we are all church-members, I suppose. I'm sure I am; but I do dislike scenes."

CHAPTER XIV.

"I HAVE TO STAY OUTSIDE, AND JUST WAIT."

IT was very late that night before the house settled into quiet. The temptation was evidently strong upon our hostess to do a hundred little preparatory things in view of the next day's entertainment.

"It really seems as though I could not take time to sleep to-night," she said to me, with a nervous laugh. "There are so many responsibilities resting upon me and so many last things to do! Monday is a very trying day for a wedding. Some way, Sunday makes an awkward break in all the preparations."

She certainly rested very little that night. The various bridesmaids were also in a flutter of preparation. They discussed, in not very low tones, the last changes in the arrangements of flowers and other bridal decorations, examined their gloves and laces, and I'm inclined to think Effie Van Horne even went so far as to slip into her white robe once more, to be sure that it was absolutely perfect.

Laura turned in her bed and groaned, and patted her pillow, and wished they would all try sleeping for a while and give her a chance. At last they did seem to conclude to leave the excitements until Monday, and quiet settled down upon us.

I hardly know how long it lasted, certainly not more than an hour or two, when the slamming of doors and the hurrying of feet commenced again.

"Oh dear!" Laura said sleepily. "It can't be possible that it is morning! Maama, don't you get people up so early, and make such a commotion when my wedding-day comes." Then she opened her eyes wide. "That's Auntie Smith's voice," she said.

Quiet

and comm

"Sarah

very wor

hurry up

Has Jon

"Some

in a mem

Some

bility of upon her

the gues

be somet

than ex

After an restless

awakened

ting fever

already t

incoheren

was imp determine

she knew who she w

the want

began a s paralleled

The vic

ing of bell

tracted hu

and fro

the calls for that and possi

frantic app

mother to frightened

appeared,

ther it cou

sible that dangerously

combined to most of us

lessly to be

use. It w

that Mrs.

Smith's stro

mon sense a self-control

meet the em

and served

She took o

in the sic

herself; ger firmly hel

ground again

who were crowding ro

bed; called I help her w

pillows whic

Lida was t wildly about me a bottl

the brief con

"Drop ten d

that into half

And perempt

from the room

seen a woman

Smith. I sup

preceding two greatly wrou

weight of pai

from her dar

proud of him

the marriage

think of her o

now hardly any one recog-longed to him. I feel off!"
 will return unto you, said quiet voice that broke in following this sentence words of hers, but poured and the gracious message often thought before antry near to Mrs. Smith, and behind thee, saying, "Th-three minutes more w-ng and an anxious seat." said, as a summons to the broke in upon the scene. id, an hour later:
 has gone for his horse-and a perfect gem of be so wicked as to curious speech to-night to go along. I would be ng, if I could have a ride ame last evening."
 some carriage, and came straight to Mrs. Solomon take you to a church to-night? I have a pair carriage."
 ferring, not to the choice in the parlour. "What eccentric being! For the ch-members, I suppose enes."
 IV.
 AND JUST WAIT." ght before the house temptation was evidently to do a hundred little view of the next day's ould not take time to with a nervous laugh ties resting upon me Monday is a very trying unday makes an awkat night. The various of preparation. They the last changes in the or bridal decorations.
 I'm inclined to think ar as to slip into her that it was absolutely aned, and patted her y sleeping for awhile y did seem to conclude day, and quiet settled d, certainly not more nning of doors and in.
 "It can't be possi-
 n't you get people up n when my wedding-eyes wide. "That is Quiet and clear it came up to us; a tone of decision and command:

 "Sarah, stop crying, and shut the door. That is the very worst thing you can do for her. Run down and hurry up the hot water, and send me some vinegar! Has Jonas gone himself for the doctor?"
 "Something has happened!" we both said at once, and in a moment we were dressing.

Something had happened, indeed. The nervous irritability of the fair young bride-elect, which had so grown upon her for the last day or two as to be noticed by all the guests, proved to be something more than excitement. After an hour of restless sleep she had awakened in a burning fever, and was already talking so incoherently that it was impossible to determine whether she knew in the least who she was, or what she wanted. Then began a scene of unparalleled confusion.

The violent ringing of bells, the distracted hurrying to and fro of many feet, the calls for this and that and the other possible remedy, the frantic appeals of her mother to each new frightened guest who appeared, as to whether it could be possible that Lida was dangerously sick, all combined to bewilder most of us too hopelessly to be of any use. It was here that Mrs. Solomon Smith's strong common sense and rigid self-control rose to meet the emergency, and served us well.

She took command in the sick-room herself; gently and firmly held her ground against those who were eagerly crowding round the bed; called Laura to help her with the pillows which poor Lida was tossing wildly about; gave me a bottle with the brief command: "Drop ten drops of that into half a glass of water, and hand it to me quick!" And peremptorily ordered the frightened mother away from the room until she could come quietly. I have rarely seen a woman so completely unnerved as was Mrs. Jonas Smith. I suppose she had taken but little rest during the preceding two or three weeks, and her nervous system was greatly wrought upon by the weight of care, added to the weight of pain which her mother-heart felt in parting from her darling. She was very fond of Irving, very proud of him, and seemed in every way to approve of the marriage: and yet of course it was a hard thing to think of her one little pretty daughter going out from her old home, never again to be in it, a girl, as she had been heretofore. My heart went out in sympathy for the poor mother. But she certainly was a worse than useless person in this emergency. It seemed impossible for her to get control of herself. She wrung her hands in helpless terror; one moment was sure that Lida was dying, right there, before her eyes, and nothing being done; and the next called on us fiercely to agree with her that it was nothing in the world but a severe headache, and Maria was making a great fuss about nothing. It transpired that Mrs. Solomon Smith, in groping her way downstairs in search of a glass of water, had heard Lida's groans, and gone to her relief; while her worn-out mother having but just dropped asleep, slept on unheeding.

What a day was that! I find that when I want an illustration of confusion and dismay and general bewilderment, my thoughts go back to that trying time. After what seemed like hours of waiting, the frightened father arrived with the family physician. He was one of those grave, reticent doctors, who waste as few words, and give as little information as possible; but that little in his case was to be trusted; so when I heard his verdict, given after a close and careful examination: "This is a sudden and severe attack of the fever which prevails in the southern portion of the city," my heart sank within me, for I had heard only the day before that the fever was increasing in violence. I followed the doctor into the hall, intent on learning his exact opinion. It was given me with all due gravity and reticence—rather it was drawn from him by careful cross-questioning.

"It is impossible to tell, madam, at this early stage of the disease, how it will progress or terminate."
 "Yes; the fever is certainly not abating in violence, and the number of cases is on the increase."
 "The suddenness of the attack is a feature of the disease."
 "You are right, madam. It is never so sudden as it appears to unprofessional eyes, being preceded by hours, sometimes by days, of great nervous excitement."
 "It is true that this case has commenced in an unusually violent form, and there are indications of great cerebral excitement."

"IT WAS MRS. SMITH'S CLEAR, QUIET VOICE THAT BROKE IN UPON THE ALMOST PAINFUL HUSH" (p. 32).

"It is undoubtedly a contagious fever, and it is important to expose as few persons as possible?"

"Oh yes; any person who has been near enough to the patient to get her breath, is more or less liable to the disease; still it is frequently the case that all so exposed escape. It is owing entirely to the condition of the system."

"I always have grave fears, madam, as to the result of such a fever; especially when, as in this case, the patient has a singularly delicate physical organisation."

On the whole, I turned from him with a heavy heart. I certainly had nothing very cheering to communicate to the mother; and there was in my heart a sharp pain on my own account. Had not my Laura already been several times "near enough to the patient to get her breath"?

Gradually we settled down to something like the system which prevails in a family of means, when sickness becomes a recognised fact. Yet it was in many respects the most trying day of all that we endured during this period of suffering. There were such sharp and trying contrasts. All over the house were hints, more or less apparent, of the expected festivity. Half-open doors revealed glimpses of soft, fleecy drapery, slippers, gloves, laces, flowers, perfumes. The large dining-room showed in the grey dawn of the early morning preparations for special festival; the long table was extended, while closets left open in haste, showed rows of silver and china waiting to adorn it. In one closet the bridal cake had been set, already garnished with its wreaths of green, and beside it stood a half-empty mustard jar which had been seized upon to minister to the poor little sufferer upstairs, and then set down again in haste, as a more urgent call came. This is a fair sample of the incongruous confusions that prevailed throughout the usually well-ordered house.

The guests were simply panic-stricken; the story of possible contagion had spread in the unaccountable manner in which such stories always do; and the young ladies of the party were literally tossing their wedding finery into trunks, and distracting the already bewildered servants with urgent calls for carriages to be summoned at once, that they might catch early trains.

"There is no need for us to hasten," I said to Laura—and I'm afraid my tone was a regretful one as I said—"you have already been exposed, my dear, if there is any danger."

She turned upon me eyes that were almost fierce: "Mamma," she said, "I would not go away now if I thought I should take the fever in the next hour, and could save myself by going. I think it is despicable to be in such a panic. Yesterday they were so fond of Lida that they hung round her from morning to night; to-day they think only of their precious selves!"

An indignant girl, indignant in a righteous cause, is almost a pretty sight. I did not have it in my heart to scold her for her vehement words. There was little time for mere talk.

We dropped into grooves of labour before that day was done. Constantly people were arriving from the more remote suburbs of the city, guests of the house for the day, their wedding paraphernalia following hard after in express waggons. These all had to be met, and explanations made, and exclamations of dismay and condolence listened to, and hurried returns arranged for, to say nothing of lunches that in common decency must be prepared for some. Laura stepped into this distracting gap as readily as though she had been hostess and manager-in-chief of a household for years. She seemed to know by instinct just whose name to take up to Mrs. Smith, with special messages, or offers of aid, and who on no account to allow to penetrate beyond the decorum of the parlours.

Seeing the need for a head below stairs, I took upon myself the humble office of directing the servants as to lunches, breakfasts, and the like, trying to see that in their bewilderment they did not attempt two things at once, and accomplish neither.

As for Mrs. Solomon Smith, no professional nurse could have slipped into office with the ease and speed that she established herself in the sick-room. How many times during that first day did we have occasion to be grateful for her presence there.

The poor, frightened mother did not gain better control of herself as the hours passed, and it became evident that Lida's was undoubtedly a sick-room, and there were days and nights of intense anxiety to follow; she seemed simply overwhelmed. With all her planning and preparing the thought of sickness had not once been entertained. Now that the actual fact glared upon her, and brought in its train that other awful thought of possible death, a funeral instead of a bridal, she was utterly crushed; good for nothing at Lida's bedside; she could not keep from moaning and wringing her hands.

I have not said a word about my poor boy Irving. How can I put on paper the record of his distress, the photograph of his utterly miserable face? He hovered outside the stricken chamber like a shadow. The doctor, after having the state of the case explained to him, shook his head gravely over the question of admitting Irving; counselled waiting for a day, at least, until they should see how the disease was going to develop; it might be of the utmost importance to keep him away from the room in any case it was needless exposure to probable danger. We did not tell Irving that last; the poor fellow would have rushed in, in spite of us, then, to show his contempt of all possible danger as connected with himself. "Wait for a day, at least!" the doctor said, and he said it as if he did not know that under some circumstances a day is an eternity. Before the close of this day Irving had expected to have had his wife by his side for ever. "Until death do us part." I thought of the sentence that had floated up to me amid the laughter of the marriage rehearsal. Was it possible that the dread shadow was gliding between them even then, and none of us had recognised it?

Before that first day was done, Irving had gone back to something of his old boyish manner with his aunt, turning to me instinctively for comfort as a boy would to his mother. During the intervening five years we had grown apart as mother and son seldom do; but amid all the trouble, it gave me a little thrill of joy to note that the first touch of sorrow brought him back to me.

It is not my purpose to detail all the miseries of the days that followed. I could not if I would. Of course we calmed down from the first panic, and recognised the inevitable as people always do; but still it was a strangely disorganised household.

It was a strange thing to me to note how few friends the Smiths had in their trouble; acquaintances in abundance—a perfect deluge of cards showered down upon them that first week; many came in person, expressing sympathy, sincere expressions, and as kindly put as they knew how, and yet the very dress in which they came so bright and gay, and suggestive of the society engagements they were even then on their way to meet, left the impression of something incongruous about it all. Among the hundreds there was hardly one that the mother upstairs cared to hear about, and not one that she expressed a desire to see.

This mother the doctor had taken in hand with a sort of stern courtesy; had informed her that she was a fit subject for the fever, would be almost certain to have it if she spent much time in the sick-room; that she could do no good there, she was not calm enough; indeed, her presence was a positive injury to her daughter.

After that we did what we could to keep her from Lida's room. Of course she came and went, sometimes a hundred times in a day—so it seemed to us—but it was true that she was too painfully nervous to be trusted to do much for poor Lida, who did not recognise her half the time, and therefore did not mourn her absence. Such being the state of things, Laura and I, the acquaintances of the day, slipped into our places in the household, and did not as much as mention to each other the idea of going home.

"You are so good," would the poor mother say to Laura, as from some to see all meet them circumstan came to c and the v Laura v show so m

Mrs. Sol Every one was really cheerful, of meaning of firm as a g recognised t it was only time to cor ball for adm

"You ha faculty whic of being ab that people capable of t It was tru Her notion were new. Quite appro breadth fro ability, and orders, she

The sum special frien his wedding called daily, from him. meeting any happiness. keep Irving him, as he s out to him a

"It is dif "You can g know just h you can bath stay outside, Poor boy I outside and v

"WE F

HERI reach gero in a passed, that s about her—an about herself.

Her lucid puzzled and f doctor took n he watched o apparent effe ment.

At last he t "If she ca sleep," he said him from the Her strength i Terrible wo by them that all in the roo looking haggard hovered in the ordered him t ease and speed that she room. How many times occasion to be grateful did not gain better control and it became evident that room, and there were days follow; she seemed simply planning and preparing the been entertained. Now her, and brought in its possible death, a funera utterly crushed; good fo could not keep from mou poor boy Irving. How of his distress, the photo face? He hovered out a shadow. The doctor explained to him, shoo on of admitting Irving least, until they should develop; it might be o m away from the room ure to probable danger

 ; the poor fellow woul
 n, to show his contempt d with himself. "Wait said, and he said it as i e circumstances a day f this day Irving had by his side for ever thought of the sentence the laughter of the mar that the dread shadow en, and none of us had Irving had gone back manner with his auntie comfort as a boy would ning five years we had ldom do; but amid all rill of joy to note that him back to me.
 all the miseries of the d if I would. Of course sic, and recognised that it still it was a strange note how few friend acquaintances in abund showered down upon in person, expressing as kindly put as they in which they came of the society engage way to meet, left the s about it all. Among e that the mother up one that she express on in hand with a sor ner that she was a fi most certain to have room; that she coul enough; indeed, he r daughter.
 ld to keep her from and went, sometimes to us—but it was vious to be trusted to ot recognise her hal n her absence. Such I, the acquaintance in the household, an ch other the idea of poor mother say to

Laura, as she came quietly to her side with a message from some caller requiring attention; "you are so good to see all these people and dispose of them. I cannot meet them, not one of them. Only think under what circumstances I expected to meet them all—when they came to congratulate my darling—and now she is—"

and the voice would falter and drop into sobs.

Laura was good. I have rarely seen a girl of nineteen show so much tact and wisdom and quiet tenderness.

Mrs. Solomon Smith was a perfect tower of strength. Every one, from the doctor down, deferred to her. She was really the very perfection of a nurse—quiet, calm, cheerful, quick of movement, catching at a flash the meaning of the patient, and the direction of the doctor; firm as a granite boulder when the question at issue was recognised as important, yielding to the last degree when it was only a difference of opinion. The doctor even took time to compliment her one morning as he waited in the hall for admission.

"You have a remarkable nurse in there. She has a faculty which not one nurse in a hundred possesses—that of being able to do as she is told. I have often observed that people who can do as they are told, are the only ones capable of telling others."

It was true. Mrs. Smith differed from him quite often. Her notions, some of them, were old-fashioned, and his were new. I could see it in her eyes that she did not quite approve; nevertheless, she swayed not one hair's breadth from his directions; she recognised his responsibility, and his right to lead, and like a soldier under orders, she obeyed.

The summer guests had all departed. Of Irving's special friends who had come from a distance to attend his wedding, only Erskine remained in the city. He called daily, sometimes twice a day; but Irving shrank from him. He seemed to shudder at the thought of meeting any one who had been close to him in his happiness. Not the least of my duties was the trying to keep Irving from utter despair. It was very hard for him, as he said, to know nothing except what was doled out to him at intervals from the sick-room.

"It is different with you, auntie," he said pitifully. "You can go in and out, and see her constantly. You know just how she looks, and just what she says; and you can bathe her head, and do for her; and I have to stay outside, and just wait."

"Poor boy! Is there any harder lot in life than to stay outside and wait?"

CHAPTER XV.

"WE FEARED, WE HOPED, WE TREMBLED."

HERE came a morning when anxiety and suspense reached their climax. Lida was in that dangerous state in which she recognised us all, knew, in a puzzled, excitable way, that much time had passed, that she was very sick, that people were alarmed about her—and, worse than all, she was fearfully alarmed about herself.

Her lucid moments were few, for she immediately puzzled and frightened herself back into delirium. The doctor took no pains to conceal his anxiety. For hours she watched over her, applying quieting remedies with no apparent effect, her excitement seeming to increase every moment.

At last he turned from her as if in despair.

"If she cannot in some way be quieted and put to sleep," he said, addressing her father, who had followed him from the room, "she cannot live but a few hours. Her strength is not equal to this terrible strain."

Terrible words these, when the skillful doctor admitted by them that his resources were exhausted. We were all in the room, or in the hall, near at hand. Irving, looking haggard enough to have been the patient himself, hovered in the background, the doctor having nervously ordered him to keep out of sight. It seemed to me strange and unnatural that Lida did not ask for Irving; did not mention him in any way; and yet she remembered, at intervals, about her past; for she had said to me but an hour before: "I was to have been married. I wasn't, was I? Why was it changed? Was I too sick? Oh, dear, I'm very sick! I'm going to die! I know I'm going to die!" This sentence she repeated again and again, each time her voice growing louder, until it became a wild and fearful cry. Then for a time she would be utterly lost to us in the ravings of delirium. This in turn would be followed by a sort of stupor, and then another partially lucid interval. But it was painfully noticeable that she grew momentarily weaker.

It was in one of the wisest of these prooxysms that the doctor had turned away with his despairing sentence, "I do not see that I can do anything more for her."

Indeed, the climax of her excitement seemed to have arrived. She tossed from side to side, and wailed her fearful cry: "I am going to die, and I'm afraid! oh, I'm afraid!" until her mother lost for a few blessed moments her agony in unconsciousness, and was carried from the room. I could almost have wished that the same relief might come to Irving. His face was so drawn with pain and misery that I felt my heart groaning for him. Still the agonised cries went on, and still the doctor bent over her, murmuring soothingly: "No one shall hurt you; you are not going to die. Nothing shall harm you." He might as well have talked to the wind that was roaring fiercely outside. She gave as little heed. In the hall, a short time before, the doctor had asked, turning fiercely to Mrs. Smith, whom he had called out to consult:—

"What has started her in this way? Surely we have no fanatic among us who has been cruel enough to try to talk religion to her!" his finely cut lip curving into almost a sneer as he spoke the word.

Mrs. Smith made a very quiet answer.

"I've only talked to the Lord about the poor lamb; not at all to her. I felt that she had not sense enough now to think about it, but He can think for her."

The stern-eyed doctor regarded her with a puzzled air, as if she were a creature from another world, speaking a different language from any with which he was familiar, then turned and went back to his patient without further questioning.

"Elizabeth," said the firm, quiet voice of her aunt, breaking in upon the dread wail of the child—a quiet voice, yet strong enough to rise above the shrill cry which Lida was making, "Elizabeth, I want you to be still, and listen to me! I've got something to tell you. If you'll be real still I'll tell it."

The fevered face turned toward her, and the blood-shot eyes were riveted for a moment upon her. The very name "Elizabeth," a name which she never heard from other lips, seemed to arrest her attention, and the quiet, kind old eyes bent on her held her gaze.

"Are you God?" she asked, in an awe-stricken whisper.

Not a muscle of her aunt's face changed; her eyes lost none of their calm.

"No," she said, as if answering the most natural question in the world; "but I'm His messenger. He has sent a word to you that He wants you to think about."

"Did He say I was going to die?"

Nothing more pitifully eager than her tone can be imagined.

"No; He said, 'I have loved her with an everlasting love.' Tell her this: 'Thy Maker is thy husband.' Thy husband, Elizabeth! think of it. You have thought what that word means. I daresay you have thought about it a great deal; and He sent it to you on purpose, so you would understand."

There came into the child's eyes that retrospective look which shows us that a mind is sweeping back over its past. Doubtless she had dwelt on that word "husband" with tender anticipation; she was so nearly a wife that the word had become very sweet to her. She had looked forward to saying, in fond, proud tones, "My husband!" The wild light began to die out of her eyes, which were still fixed upon her aunt, who had risen and was bending over her, holding her hand, and passing a soft, light touch over her forehead, as she said, over and over again in those low, firm tones, which conveyed a sense of strength:—

"He says He has loved you with an everlasting love; He says I am to say to you that 'Thy Maker is thy husband.'"

She was certainly listening, and the doctor, watching her with keen, professional eye, telegraphed with significant gesture that her pulse was lessening.

Presently she spoke in a perfectly natural tone.

"But, Aunt Maria, I haven't loved Him. I haven't done anything for Him."

The doctor's start of surprise to hear the low-keyed, natural voice, was so instantly followed by a frown at his own folly, and a startled glance toward Mrs. Smith, lest she too should break the soothing spell, that we realised more fully still the importance of the calm. Nothing could have been quieter or more prompt than her Aunt's voice.

"Yes, He knows all about that, my lamb, still He sends the message. He wants you to love Him; wants you to begin now."

"But I have wasted my life."

"Yes, maybe so. He knows; He is your Maker, you know, and now He bids me say that He will be your husband. Don't you think He can forgive anything after that? His love is everlasting. He wants yours now; not yesterday's, but to-day's."

"Aunt Maria, am I going to die?"

The doctor gave an emphatic start this time, and tried vigorously to arrest Mrs. Smith's attention, while he shook his head earnestly.

She did not for a moment remove her eyes from Lida's face, nor for a moment hesitate with her answer.

"I don't know, my lamb; He knows all about it; He didn't send you any word about that, only the other: 'I have loved her with an everlasting love; and then that other: 'Thy Maker is thy husband.' What He wants to know is, if you will love Him, and take Him for your husband."

How much did the fever-wasted mind understand of the solemn and tender message? Who can tell? We waited breathlessly, the doctor curiously: his professional anxiety was giving way to professional curiosity, to see how this new form of treatment would work. Two other physicians, also eminent, who had been called in council, and been unable to appear until now, tip-toed into the room, and waited, and were evidently curious; and the quiet old voice went on repeating its tender message, over and over and over, and then the tender inquiry.

"Elizabeth, He wants to know if you will take Him for your husband now."

"Yes," came in low, yet perfectly distinct tones, from the fever-parched lips. Not a note of the controlled voice changed as the dear old lady instantly answered:—

"Then tell Him so, my lamb; just shut your eyes and speak to Him; He can hear, you know, if you speak ever so low. If you only think it in your heart He will hear you; He hears you now; but He will like the word direct from you." Back and forth went the soothing hand, making its slow, regular passes; again and again the firm voice repeated the message: "I have loved thee with an everlasting love." Slowly those restless, wide-open eyes, that had been wide open all through the long night, and all through the long day, thus far, lost their distressed look, the lids drooped lower and lower, the two small, wasted hands were clasped as a child's might have been who was saying,

"Now I lay me down to sleep."

The lips moved, but no sound from them was heard this side of heaven. We stood in perfect hush around that bed—nothing to break it save that steady voice falling lower and lower, making no pause between the sentences, or repeated sentence, for she simply said those sublime words. And at last it became apparent to us all that for the first time in two weeks the child was sleeping a quiet, natural sleep, or else it was the sleep that know no waking here.

Weeks afterwards we called that day the climax; but we did not know it at the time. We hovered with Lida apparently on the very confines of another world. No, that there had not been a decided change; the fever had spent its force; the trouble was, all that it seemed to have left behind was a small pale wreck, without power to rally its scattered forces and creep back into life again. Day after day she lay there like a snow wreath, too weak to speak, too weak to move so much as her small, wasted hands; just strength enough to turn her eyes from one to another and smile. But it was a blessed relief that she smiled. The look of terror which had blanched her face during those memorable and fearful hours was gone. She was evidently at rest.

Whether it was that she was now too weak, too nearly slipped out of life to be other than at rest, we did not know; we feared, and we hoped, and we trembled.

"It is a kind of death-bed repentance," said Mrs. Solomon Smith to me, wiping her tired eyes, during one of those brief intervals in which she was off duty. "I've always been mortal 'fraid of them, and I am now. Poor little dove! she ought to have been got into the ark long ago."

"Do you think she is going to die?" Laura asked the question in an awe-stricken whisper. She thought of herself, or perhaps it might be put, she feared so; but no one, since the change, had put it into words.

"I don't know, child," in a tired, half-hopeless voice, "there is so little of her left to die; it seems as if it would be so easy, so much easier just to shut her eyes and not open them again, that I feel kind of astonished every time I see them open. She thinks herself that she is going to die," continued Mrs. Smith; "she told me so last night, in the night."

"But she is very quiet and peaceful?"

"Oh, as quiet as a lamb. She spoke about getting married, and said she thought she was going to be the bride of Christ. I wouldn't let her talk, the doctor said, I mustn't; but I was sorry afterwards; she wanted to say she had sweet things to tell me, she said; poor lamb!"

Generally Mrs. Smith was cheerful. It was only occasionally, in the privacy of my room, that she allowed herself to sigh; but I saw that she had very little hope of Lida.

Sometimes it seemed to us that this lull was almost harder to bear than the excitement of constant suffering and constant attempts to do for our sick one had been. There seemed nothing to do now but wait. What the doctor thought he kept to himself. He came and went twice, three times, occasionally four times, during the day and night; but apparently doing as little for her as the rest of us; just watching and waiting. I began to grow very anxious for Irving. His business furlough had been extended; his place temporarily supplied, in fact. It was found that even governments had hearts and there was nothing for him but to bear from hour to hour that fearful strain. It was telling on him like a flood of sickness. He had grown almost as thin as Lida; his face was quite as colourless; and now that the strange calm had come to hers, was far more haggard. Auntie Smith thought much of him; made many journeys from the chamber of watching on his account; always appeared to him with a pleasant face and an earnest—

"Keep up a good heart, my boy. The Lord reigns and He loves the child better than you do, and you know how much that means. You may be sure He will do His best for her."

She was left much alone with her patient. It was the doctor's command that the weakened brain should not be disturbed by different faces about her, and as the mother's strength had almost entirely given out since the first strain had been removed, and she had dropped into the rôle of an invalid, it had been decreed that she must not exert herself for Lida at all. So it fell to me to relieve Mrs. Solomon in her ministrations, and we two took sole charge. Laura would have liked to establish herself it was the sleep that know that day the climax; but we hovered with Lida's eyes of another world. No sudden change; the fever had been, all that it seemed to pale wreck, without power to creep back into life again. A snow wreath, too weak to turn her eyes from one to a blessed relief that which had blanched her and fearful hours was gone now too weak, too nearly than at rest, we did not and, and we trembled. "I repentance," said Mrs. over tired eyes, during one she was off duty. "I've em, and I am now. Poor been got into the ark long to die?" Laura asked the whisper. She thought she put, she feared so; but it into words. "I've tired, half-hopeless voice to die; it seems as if it's fier just to shut her eyes. I feel kind of astonished she thinks herself that she Smith; "she told me so successful?" She spoke about getting she was going to be her talk, the doctor said afterwards; she wanted to she said; poor lamb!" cheerful. It was only y room, that she allowed she had very little hope that this lull was almost our sick one had been low but wait. What the self. He came and went four times, during the doing as little for her as waiting. I began to His business furlough temporarily supplied, in governments had hearts out to bear from hour to telling on him like a fire, most as thin as Lida; his d now that the strange more haggard. Auntie made many journeys from account; always appeared in earnest—

boy. The Lord reigns, a you do, and you know be sure He will do His ner patient. It was the ner brain should not be her, and as the mother's ren out since the first e had dropped into the need that she must not it fell to me to relieve s, and we two took sole ed to establish herself there, but this I preemptory refused; the child had cares enough all around the disorganized household, without becoming nurse.

I hardly know when it was that the doctor's daily Deliverances began to change slightly. I think it was Irving who first said to me, with lips so white that I remember I thought him fainting, that he believed the doctor was a little less hopeless.

After that I watched more closely, and gradually began to detect what seemed to me hopeful signs; these I communicated to Irving, feeling that he needed them to help him keep his reason. Little by little the story grew, until we were almost prepared one morning for Lida's own words, as her aunt bent over her.

"Auntie, I'm not to go to heaven yet, after all. I've been afraid to get well, for fear I should lose this—this sweet something, I don't know the name of it; but Jesus told me last night, in the night, that He was going to take care of me down here awhile; that He could do it just as easily here as in heaven, and I suppose He can."

It was that very morning that the doctor stopped in the hall, held out his hand to Irving, and said with the nearest approach to emotion that I had ever seen in him: "I congratulate you, young man! I believe good nursing has saved her. That aunt of hers is certainly a remarkable woman."

Then we had another form of excitement for a few minutes, and the doctor another patient. Irving fainted quite away, and the grim doctor, gone back into the very depths of his grimness, worked over him in silence for several minutes.

From that time we got on steadily; not rapidly, it is true, but from day to day the gain was apparent.

Before the week had closed, it became evident that the frail girl who had so nearly crossed the dividing line between us and that other world, was coming back to the savings of this life. She asked for Irving, one morning, before the hour that the doctor allowed him to make his daily call, showed great satisfaction in his visit, and regret over his speedy departure. He came to me with a radiant face.

"It is Lida herself, auntie," he said, eagerly; "for weeks she has seemed to me like an angel who was just waiting for wings to float away out of sight; but this morning she is almost herself."

After that the improvement was noticeably rapid. Irving visited her oftener and remained longer, and gradually grew to be the thing for him to spend nearly half of the day by her side. Long talks they had together, broken frequently by admonitions from her watchful nurse to talk no more until she had slept, or eaten, or taken her nap. She was a sweet, quiet patient, ready to obey with a smile; not in the least impatient over the long waiting for strength; totally unlike her former self, though Irving joyously declared that she grew daily more like the Lida whom he had known.

"I am not like her," she said, with a quiet, confident smile, looking full in his eyes; "I'm not a bit like her, Irving, in ever so many things. When I get well you will find me changed."

Whether he understood her or not, I did not know at the time; but Auntie Smith understood; there was a satisfied look in her tired old eyes.

"It is a genuine thing," she said to me afterward. "I'm a faithless old body. I didn't seem to believe that the Lord could accept her on her sick bed, or could toll her any better than I, whether she really meant it or not; so I let her get well, to prove to me that He can take care of His own, living or dying. She means it, all through." It was impossible not to see the change. It so puzzled and troubled her mother that she felt sure Lida was not well as we thought, and worried herself into many a sleepless night, and headache over the fear that her darling was going to slip away from her after all.

There was another whom it puzzled, and that was Mrs. Smith. She did not say much, but I could see her watching, with curious eyes, the settled calm of Lida's face—so unlike the restless flutter of her life heretofore.

The sweetness that grew with returning strength, the gentle effort to give as little trouble as possible, the unselfish thoughtfulness for others!

"Mamma," she said to me one day as we came together from Lida's room, "it is almost as if she had died and come to life again."

"She has," I told her, and I quoted the familiar verse about being made alive in Christ.

But Laura shook her head.

"I cannot understand such sudden changes, mamma; and besides, I don't expect them to last. Wait until society gets hold of her again."

And I wondered when my poor Laura would understand.

CHAPTER XVI.

"AUNTIE ALWAYS SEES THINGS."

IF you like pretty home scenes, a glance into one of the upper rooms of Mr. Jonas Smith's house that winter evening would have given you pleasure. It was Lida's own pet room; a sort of sitting-room for mother and daughter, and any specially favoured guest, but called by courtesy Lida's. She was the central figure in it on the evening in question. Her plush-covered couch was drawn up before the grate, and herself in delicate blue wrapper, with soft laces at throat and wrists, looked, in the play of the firelight, like some fair bud picked from the greenhouse to blossom in mid-winter. Lida was certainly very pretty; prettier in her simple wrapper and quiet face than she had ever been before. Irving occupied a chair placed in just the right position for watching the varying expressions of her face. Her mother, but a few degrees farther removed from invalidism, luxuriated in the large, old-fashioned easy-chair, a footstool at her feet, her salts, and her fan, and other graceful appliances of convalescence on a little table at her side. Laura was in trim evening costume, her careful toilet telling as plainly as any other little thing, that the cloud of care and anxiety had lifted, and there was time to arrange her hair in crimps once more, and wear something besides the plainest of dark dresses and linen collars. She was toying also with bright-coloured wools, amid which the lights and shadows from the fire played hide-and-seek in fantastic manner.

Perhaps, after all, the central figure of our family group was the great rocking-chair, in which rested the trim form and strong, plain face of Mrs. Solomon Smith. Her knitting lay idly on her lap, for Mrs. Smith was tired. She had been out all the afternoon, intent on her own plans, asking no escort through the great city from any one. Indeed, there seemed to be no one to escort her. She did not deem it wise to have both of us away from the frail invalid. Laura still occupied her position as self-appointed hostess, and had innumerable callers to entertain, and Irving had returned to his post, and was labouring hard to atone for lost time, as well as in token of gratitude for unparelled past kindnesses. There had been talk of sending for Erskine to accompany Mrs. Smith on her tour of observation, but she had scorned the idea.

"I shouldn't know what to do with a boy at my heels," she said earnestly. "My boys were all girls, you know, and I never was used to anybody but Solomon. You needn't be afraid of my getting lost. I don't believe I could get lost if I should try. I always bring up all right."

She carried her point, and went off in triumph on the street-car, her only companion the greenish umbrella, which did duty as a cane.

She had been gone for hours, and Laura was in a flutter to hear some of her experiences.

"Auntie always sees things," she said to Lida. "She goes everywhere with her eyes open wide, and if you have been the same route a hundred times, it makes no difference; she sees a hundred things that you never thought of."

Two doors opened from the room in which we were sitting. One was Lida's own, adorned with all the hundred little prettinesses which a girl of taste and means likes to gather round her. The door was ajar, and revealed glimpses of blue-and-white carpeting, and furniture done in blue-and-white panels, blue silk and white lace curtains at the windows—a very bower of beauty. The other door opened into the guest-chamber, which was a counterpart of Laura's and my beautiful room, across the hall, save that it was finished in even more excellent shades and tints, so Laura thought; and this room was now the private property of Mrs. Solomon Smith.

On the very first night that she had consented to leave her charge in experienced hands and take an entire night's rest, Mrs. Jonas Smith had called Laura, and said,—

"My dear, will you see that aunt's room is in perfect order? Have the heat turned on, and the gas lighted, and everything. I leave it to you to see that she is entirely comfortable. You know which her room is? The one that opens to the left out of Lida's sitting-room. I have had her trunk brought there. She will naturally like to be near to Lida, and Lida will like to have her; so I took the liberty of changing her room."

It was a liberty which Laura certainly was very willing to pardon; and this was all that had been said about Auntie Smith's room. I do not know that Mrs. Jonas Smith understands to this day that we knew anything about the fireless attic-chamber.

We had arrived at the time when the whole house delighted to do honour to the country relative. It was tardy hospitality, but we took the hint from the dear old lady's own large heart, and never mentioned the attic-chamber again. The only comment that Mrs. Solomon made, when Laura escorted her to her new room, was to gaze about her with astonished eyes, and say,—

"Deary me! I wouldn't mind having Solomon see this room."

Laura said there was a little sigh at the close of the sentence. I doubt whether any of us realised what a trial it was to the loyal old heart to lie down in the midst of all this grandeur and think of Solomon in his loneliness.

"Come, Auntie," Laura said after a little impatient waiting for the clicking needles to commence. (Laura knew that when Mrs. Smith knitted, her tongue was apt to keep time with her fingers.) "Aren't you rested enough to tell us about your afternoon? Lida wants to hear of your adventures."

Then Lida's voice: "Oh, Aunt Maria, I've been waiting these two hours to hear all about it. It is so long since I have been in the street, you know."

"Bless your heart!" said Mrs. Solomon, "nothing happened to me that would be worth your listening to, I daresay. I went and I came, and I got along all right; though I must say there was more people going the same way—and the opposite way, too, for that matter—than was at all convenient. I couldn't help wishing that they had all stayed at home just for one afternoon, and given me a chance. Still, I'm back, and no bones broke; which, considering what I've been through, is something wonderful."

"You ought to have waited until Saturday, and then I could have taken care of you." This from Irving, spoken in tones of genuine anxiety. He had adopted the country aunt, with all his heart and soul.

"Oh no," she said briskly, taking up her knitting; "I got along first-rate; I didn't need a bit more care than I had. Folks were real kind, considering what a hurry they were in. I never see the beat of city people for hurrying! And the women are as bad as the men, I do say! One might have thought that every mortal woman I met to-day had left a baby at home tied in the high chair, and a mince-pie burning up in the oven, by the way they crowded and pushed and elbowed themselves along to get into places first. I thought when I got into the street-car there would be less of a crowd; but dear me! that was worse than anywhere else. Why, there wasn't even standing room left in one car, and yet the people kept pouring in, and the conductor would call out, 'Pass up to the front there, please!' when we was standing as close as pickles in a jar. I can't make out where all the folks were going to. I asked a girl if there was any great meeting or anything special going on, but she was deaf, I guess; she just tossed up her head, and made no answer."

I believe that at that moment Mrs. Jonas Smith rejoiced in the invalidism that had kept her from attending her sister-in-law. She was a wonderful nurse, and they owed her an everlasting debt of gratitude; but if I am not greatly mistaken, the stylish matron did not wish to pay it by accompanying her down town.

"Did you have to stand in the street-car, Auntie?" Laura asked.

"For a spell I did, child; most of us had to. There were two or three ladies on each side, who had fixed themselves up in such a way that they couldn't even get close to each other without danger of crushing something, so they just spread themselves out and took up pretty near all the room there was; and the gentlemen that were with them took the rest. I felt sorry for their manners for I was the only old one among 'em; and while I didn't grudge them the seats, it looked kind of mean in them to sit still and see me stand. I suppose I might have pushed in, but I thought I wouldn't. I had my revenge, though; the people kept crowding in, and claiming the seats until they was crushed up about as close as they could stand it. I stood there, a-bobbing round; first I would land on one side, right in the lap of one of the fine ladies, and I wouldn't no more than: ask her to excuse me, and get my bonnet straightened out a little, then there would come a dreadful jolt and I would bob over to the other side; I stepped right on a fine young gentleman's toe once. I felt most dreadful sorry for him. I know it must have hurt, for he had a little mincing boot on, too short and too narrow at the toes; they hurt anyhow, I know they did; and when my foot came down hard on them, it must have been awful!"

"I didn't blame him for looking savage at me, and not saying a word when I asked his pardon."

"At last a pretty child got in; she wasn't more than seventeen or eighteen, and she looked a little like you, Elizabeth, I noticed her particular on that account; she had more roses in her cheeks to be sure than you have just now; looked about as you will next summer when you and Irving come out to the Hollow, and drink new milk and hunt for fresh eggs."

Then there came roses into Lida's cheeks, and she laughed a happy little laugh. As for Irving, he both smiled and shuddered; he had so recently slipped from under the awful shadow that he still rejoiced with trembling.

"Well, she settled herself, with a good deal of pains, into the speck of a place which they made for her; she had a good many ruffles and puckers to look after, and her great fur cloak was quite a spell getting tucked into place, but by-and-by she got fixed, and had time to look about her. 'Just then the car gave one of them horrid jolts that feel as though they had driven over one end of a blacksmith's shop, and broke the irons all to smash, and I like to have tumbled down quite; I most couldn't get my breath, it took me so by surprise; and them straps that they hang on to, was so high above me that I couldn't but just get hold of the tip end. 'For the land's sake!' says I, 'I wish somebody would stop this thing for me, and let me get out. I shall be all black and blue!' Well, my pretty little lady hopped up in a twinkling, and her eyes blazed about as yours do sometimes, Laura, and says she, 'Madam, take my seat, please; I do not mind standing in the least; and I am younger than you.' Of course I told her no, and I said I couldn't take her seat away, and all that, but she just pushed me with them gentle little hands of hers. I wasn't hard to push; you see the thing joggled so that I couldn't stand steady, and I would push one way about as easy as the other; before I knew it another bounce landed me right in the seat."

"We
of ther coaxing They ca very m herself had bee how, I but the take ho
"No much be
"The
I don't think o
been po were. C down as one with how his
Our p that it her knit
"I'd l tone of "Laura,
and I fo
to listen, like a mi Then o the still afternoon on, she cough an
"Why
said Mrs. grey sto I saw a suppose good deal streets.
the horse couldn't Solomon
looking ri woman cr Thinks I with old for there'
'em, for t could all one place across sor thinking place was and so I t thicker th last: 'W to get acro be took ca
you hadn't
"I had to jump b than it di open right paying any me was a their heads it in their do? Just gentlemen
and tall en you'd thin
I'll see you
"Well, I
alongside o at once, an a piece of i anywhere else. Why, there off in one car, and yet the conductor would call out, "Please!" when we was standing. I can't make out where I asked a girl if there was a special going on, but she looked up her head, and made

Mrs. Jonas Smith rejoiced at her from attending her faithful nurse, and they owed gratitude; but if I am not mistaken did not wish to pay down.

"The street-car, Auntie?"

most of us had to. There each side, who had fixed at they couldn't even get er of crushing something, at and took up pretty near the gentlemen that were sorry for their manners,
 'em; and while I didn't kind of mean in them to pose I might have pushed had my revenge, though; claiming the seats until as they could stand it. first I would land on one first ladies, and I wouldn't me, and get my bonnet er would come a dread-the other side; I stepped
 's toe once. I felt most it must have hurt, for he short and too narrow at how they did; and when it must have been awful g savage at me, and not ardon.

she wasn't more than ooked a little like you, on that account; she be sure than you have will next summer when Hollow, and drink new

Lida's cheeks, and she as for Irving, he both recently slipped from still rejoiced with trem-

a good deal of pains, they made for her; she kers to look after, and pell getting tucked into and had time to look ve one of them horrid drive over one end of irons all to smash, and ; I most couldn't get rse; and them straps ove me that I couldn't
 'For the land's sake!
 top this thing for me, ack and blue!' Well, a twinkling, and her times, Laura, and says I do not mind stand-than you.' Of course
 't take her seat away,
 me with them gentle to push; you see the ad steady, and I would other; before I knew in the seat.

"Well, if you'll believe it, there were no less than three of them gentlemen sprang to their feet, and began acoaxing of her to take their seat. They knew her too.
 They called her Miss something or other, and they were very much in earnest; but that little thing straightened herself up, and stood as still in that tipsy car as if she had been on solid ground, and got hold of the strap somehow, I don't know how—I'm sure she was a little thing, but the strap seemed to kind of reach down for her to take hold of, and says she,—

"No, I thank you, gentlemen. I'm quite able to stand; much better able than the old lady was."

"Then they glowered at me as if I was to blame; but I don't see how I could help their setting there and not think of offering me a seat any more than if they had been posts. I never see gentlemen more beat than they were. One of them took it so hard that he wouldn't set down again at all; so I had plenty of room. It was the one with the tight boots, too, and I wanted to ask him how his foot felt now, but I thought I had better not."

Our pretty little Lida laughed so heartily over this story that it set her to coughing, and Mrs. Solomon laid down her knitting in haste, and returned to her duties as nurse.

"I'd better keep my old tongue still," she said, in a tone of self-reproach, when quiet had been restored.
 "Laura, there, always sets me going with her questions, and I forget where I am. Solomon is such a master hand to listen, that he has about spoiled me. I talk right on like a millstream, once I start."

Then did Lida protest with all her little strength against the still tongue. She wanted to hear every bit about the afternoon. It was such fun, and if Aunt Maria would go on, she would promise not to laugh any more, and not cough another speck.

"Why, there's nothing in life to go on about, child," said Mrs. Solomon, leaning forward to see to narrow her grey stockings. "I didn't have no adventures to speak of.
 I saw a great many wonderful sights, to be sure, but I suppose you've seen them a hundred times. I wasted a good deal of time trying to make up my mind to cross the streets. The way them women did rush along right into the horses' jaws, scared me 'most out of my senses. I couldn't have done it, if I hadn't got across till this time.

Solomon is always so careful in driving across a street—looking right and left first, to see that there is no child or woman crossing. I thought about it while I stood there.
 Thinks I to myself, 'It's a good thing Solomon ain't here with old Nan. He wouldn't get across the street at all, for there's a woman and a child all the time; forty of 'em, for that matter.' I'm beat yet to know where they could all be going to. I got to the very thickest of it at one place. I knew half an hour before that I must get across somehow, soon; but I kept walking along and thinking that there wasn't a good place; and the next place was worse, and every step I took the thing got thicker, and so I turned around and went back a little, and it was thicker there than it was anywhere else; and says I at last: 'Well, now, Maria, what's the use? You've got to get across; take your life in your hand and go. You'll be took care of, if it's your duty to cross, and if it isn't, you hadn't ought to be took care of.' So I started.

"I hadn't taken two steps when I was sorry. I tried to jump back, but I found it looked worse behind me than it did ahead. There was a horse with his mouth open right at my bonnet; ready to swallow it, without paying any attention to the head in it, and exactly before me was a couple of them, pawing the ground, and tossing their heads, and just aching to step on me. I could see it in their eyes. 'For the land's sake,' says I, 'what'll I do?' Just then there stepped up one of them blue-coated gentlemen with gilt buttons; a fine-looking man he was,
 and tall enough for me not to feel afraid of anything, you'd think, and says he, 'Walk right across, madam; I'll see you safely over.'

"Well, I made another dash, and sure enough he came alongside of me. But dear me! he couldn't be both sides at once, and that road seemed to stretch itself out like a piece of india-rubber; seems to me it is a mile across;

I was most awful scared. I tried to dodge back again, but it wa'n't no use; by that time the opening through which I come had closed up, and there wasn't a sign of it to be seen.

"At that minute another blue-coated, gilt-buttoned man, taller and straighter if anything, and with a bigger stick than the first, came to the other side of me, and marched along holding up his club to them horses, and they just stepped back respectful, as if they knew they had found their master now, and wouldn't be allowed to bite any heads off; and I walked along right through the jam as nice as you please. I don't know how it was done. There wasn't any place to cross; just a jam of men and women, and waggon, and horses, and more a-coming as far as you could see from both ways. But I got across.

"It's a broad road, sure enough, I said to the polic-man, 'and they all look as though they were hurrying to destruction! I hope the feet of every one of them are really and truly in the narrow way, and that they'll all get safe home at last.' I couldn't help saying it, you see.
 It seemed such a kind of solemn picture of our lives, all rushing and pushing along, not taking time to stop and think whether they are going the right way or not.

"How many of them will get home, do you suppose?" I asked the policeman, and he answered me quick and pleasantly,—

"Oh, they'll come out right. We have just such a crush as this every day, and rarely an accident."

"Yes," says I, 'but I was wondering about the other home. How many of them will get home to heaven?'

"Then he looked at me for a minute and says he,—

"That's a hard question, ma'am. I can't tell."

"I hope you'll be there," says I.

"But all he said to that was, 'Thank you!' spoken real gentle, and then he went to help some other scared body across."

CHAPTER XVII.

"SAYS I, 'YOUNG MAN, YOU ARE RIGHT, I AM A RELATION.'"

"IT makes a great difference if you see things with your own eyes," said Mrs. Smith, letting her knitting fall idly in her lap, and giving herself up to contemplation.

Laura looked up curiously; the observation was suggestive to her of all sorts of quaint ideas in her old friend's mind.

"What did you see, auntie?" she asked at last, having waited as long as her impatience would allow.

"Why, I was thinking about that great big store. I had heard about them; Jessie, she tried to make me understand. 'They keep everything, auntie,' she would say: 'everything you can think of.' But I didn't understand. 'Well,' says I, 'so does Job Turner. I was down at the Corners the other day, and I couldn't help noticing what a sight of things he had! Bars of soap enough to wash the whole town, you'd think; and spools of thread, all colours and all numbers, and calicoes, a splendid stock, and alpacas, and all that kind of goods; and then on the other side you could get molasses and herrings and eggs, and anything you wanted. He keeps everything I can think of, and a great many things that I can't think of.'
 Jessie she laughed, and said it was different from that; but she left off trying to make me understand. I thought of it to-day, and says I to myself, no wonder she stopped telling me about it; she saw that I was such an old goose that I couldn't understand! When I got into that great big store, near where I had such a time crossing the street, I was so astonished for a minute that I couldn't think of a thing I came for; I just stood there and stared. A whole village full of Job Turner's stores might have been packed in there, and you wouldn't have known it by the space they took up. Another city, that's what it was, and enough sight cleaner and quieter than the one I had just left. 'For the land's sake!' I said at last, to a clerk who came up to me and bowed politely and asked me what I wanted. 'If you had street cars in here I think it would be a great deal nicer than the city outside.' He laughed, and didn't seem to object to my admiring it. He said he had thought himself that Sedan chairs would be an improvement. I knew all about them—read about their having them at the Centennial; and I really think they would be nice in that store; I wonder they don't have them."

"Did you go all round, and see the pretty things?" Lida asked, with the eagerness of one to whom the outside world had been shut away for a long time.

"Go round! I guess I did! I believe I must have gone into every nook and corner of that store. I rode on the elevator. That's a nice invention. I've read about them, too; and I never could quite understand what they were; but I had it all explained to me to-day; and it was a real pleasure to sit there on a cushioned seat and go slipping softly and swiftly up in the air. I thought it would be a skittish kind of feeling, but it ain't a mite. 'I wonder if flying will be a little bit like this?' I said to the young man who went up with me. I don't know as I was exactly saying it to him, either; I was kind of thinking out loud; but he thought I asked him a question.

"Ma'am?" he said, kind of astonished, and then I thought I ought to explain. 'I was wondering,' I said, 'if flying through the sky, and the clouds, would be anything like this. You know we can't seem to think how we are going to get our bodies up to heaven. I can think of my soul being there, but I've been puzzled often, wondering about my old lumbering body, how it was going to get through the clouds and all, and get up there; but maybe it will be just as easy, when we come to see it and feel it, as this going up is; holding ourselves still, and being lifted, without any power of our own. I suppose that is it, and I'm glad I'm having a ride in an elevator, because it somehow makes me remember there are ways of getting me up without any of my help. It seems that just common ropes and wheels can do it, so when I get my Father's hand on the ropes that He means to use, I guess I needn't worry.' Well, that young man made a queer answer. He laughed at first, as though it struck him as something funny; then his face got dark and sort of fierce-looking, and he said if he was only sure of his soul getting through all right, he wouldn't take time to worry about his miserable body; it might go to the dogs for all he should care—it wasn't nothing but a trouble to him anyhow. Then I looked at him close, and I saw that he looked sick and miserable, and had a hollow cough. It was plain enough that his body wasn't going to trouble him long. I spoke real gentle, I felt so sorry for the poor fellow. Says I: 'If I were you, I wouldn't worry a mite about either of 'em. They're just as safe in your Father's hands as that little bit of a bundle is in yours, and worth a hundred times more to Him than all the velvets and jewels in this store. He paid a big price for them, and it's more than likely He'll take care of them. The thing for you to decide is, whether you want Him to.'

"We had got out of the elevator by that time, and were walking down one of the elegant rooms. He looked about as gloomy as ever, and he gave a real troubled sigh as he said—

"Oh, well, there's no use worrying; if a fellow is to be saved he will be; and if not, he can't help himself."

"Says I: 'The first part of that is as true as the last part is foolish. You might as well say if a fellow is to eat his dinner he will, and if he isn't he can't help himself. Now it is true enough, of course, that if he is to eat his dinner he will eat it; nobody disputes that; but if you fix up a nice dinner for him and he sets down before it, and shuts his mouth tight, and glowers at it, and refuses to swallow a crumb, you would be one of the first to say that he wouldn't get any dinner, and it was his own fault. Your Heavenly Father has spread the table for you, young man, and now it is your business to say whether you will eat the Bread of Life or push it away and go hungry.'

"Well, I hadn't a chance for another word. He sat me down before the thing I had asked to see, and said a word to the clerk to wait on me, and then he bowed to me and smiled, and said in a low voice, 'Thank you, and away he went, coughing. Poor fellow! I hope he won't insist on going hungry.'

The tears had gathered in Lida's eyes, but her face was smiling.

"Aunt Maria," she said, "how did you learn to be different from other people about these things?"

"Different, child! Why, how? I didn't have a good many of the advantages of other people when I was young; I suppose that makes a great difference."

"Oh, but I mean different in your talk about heaven, and—well, about religion. It seems so easy to you; and nearly all other people whom I have ever heard talk of these things, seemed to me to drag them in, as though they thought they ought to say them, but they didn't quite know how, and dreaded it awfully."

"Well," said Mrs. Solomon, thoughtfully seaming her stocking, "I don't know, child; I've heard folks talk that way myself; I never could understand it; I've puzzled over it a good deal, because I found them very folks could be glib enough about other things. Sometimes I've thought that the Bible explained it when it said, 'Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh.' At least I find, when I've been thinking about a thing until I'm all full of it, I kind o' want to speak to somebody. But then I'm a talkative old body, always was; Solomon is to blame for some of that; he thinks a good deal more than he talks, and he is amazing fond of hearing me talk."

Over this last explanation we all laughed; albeit I think not one of her audience but would have been willing to testify that Solomon showed excellent sense.

Mrs. Smith's thoughts had already gone back to the scenes at the store.

"I met one chap," she said, "who wasn't a bit like my nice young man that went up the elevator with me. He was one of your giggly kind; now a giggly girl is bad enough, but a boy who laughs at nothing all the time, is about as small a specimen as you can find, I think. It is just wonderful to me to think how the Lord has patience with them all. It would be so easy for Him to just stoop down and wipe them out! But then there would be the soul! Dear me! What a pity we can't always remember that! Now I come to think of it, I've been going on in my mind about that silly little chap as though he hadn't any soul; and it does seem as though his must have been a small one. I wanted to look at some lace; I kind of wanted a little bit of the real stuff. When I was a young girl I knew a woman who had worked in lace factories; she understood all about the different kinds, and she could do it beautifully; all the fine laces were after her to mend their laces. I always did like lace, and I asked her a thousand and one questions, and got to be pretty wise about it; I could tell the real from the imitation, away across a church, and can yet. Well, my chap undertook to have some fun over me. He saw I was old-fashioned, of course, and kind of queer-looking by the side of all the fine ladies; I didn't blame him for that. I got a glimpse of myself in one of them big glasses, and either I, or the rest of the women, must have looked funny to him, for we weren't a mite alike. But then he needn't have supposed that because I didn't have on a pleated dress and a hundred yards of lace puckered round it, that I didn't know lace when I saw it."

"Oh yes, grandma," says he. 'I've got just the lace you want; a very choice pattern. Is it for yourself, grandma?'

"I believe it made me feel rather cross to have him call me grandma; I ought to have been glad, instead, that he was no grandson of mine. I answered him, kind of short: 'It is for myself until I give it to somebody else,' I said."

"Just so," he said—and he was ahead of me in good ture. "Heap as di lot of con

"I told
"Real!
"I assure yo
"I hope he
"Says I
"I've
"I quite a spe
"I buff 'real
"I Spanish lac
"I with him,
"I you must g
"I shouldn't
"I would pay
"I says I: 'D
"I've minute
"I pushed a l
"I've laughi
"I've as read
"I've gglers are
"I've and in abou
"I've poke a lit
"I've to ill-will,
"I've get out of
"I've ice of almo
"I've nure were b
"I've ter, and if
"I've "Well, al
"I've erks turne
"I've very red f
"I've pretty soon
"I've in the scen
"I've ant?" It
"I've now, but g
"I've seen the cler
"I've man with
"I've ght over:
"I've ractly the o
"I've hose face b
"I've and then I t
"I've "For the
"I've ne, and his
"I've and he held
"I've as Aunt this
"I've Mrs. Leonard
"I've about a Sur
"I've took my nie
"I've hear us, and
"I've about a good
"I've his was the
"I've partners in t
"I've hilling for s
"I've got my lace
"I've took me all r
"I've begin to tell
"I've suppose you
"I've though, I mu
"I've that I never l
"I've You und
"I've great brass pi
"I've arge round a
"I've same up; in
"I've store, and I'd
"I've hem all the
"I've tile box and
"I've pipes. Away
"I've old of the it
"I've y it would
"I've range in it
"I've "Says I to
"I've Where does th
"I've oes it all, ar
"I've o show me ro
"I've ll them brass
"I've oxes they pu

of Life or push it away for another word. He sat and asked to see, and said me, and then he bowed low voice, "Thank you." Poor fellow! I hope he aida's eyes, but her face ow did you learn to be ut these things?"

? I didn't have a good her people when I was great difference."

you talk about heaven, seems so easy to you;
have ever heard talk of drag them in, as though them, but they didn't wfully."

oughtfully seaming her ve heard folks talk that stand it; I've puzzled found them very folks things. Sometimes I've I it when it said, "Out e mouth speaketh." At ing about a thing until to speak to somebody.
s, always was; Solomon thinks a good deal more g fond of hearing me all laughed; albeit I but would have been wed excellent sense.

ady gone back to the

who wasn't a bit like the elevator with me.
now a giggly girl is at nothing all the time, can find, I think. It the Lord has patience easy for Him to just But then there would pity we can't always think of it, I've been t silly little chap as does seem as though I wanted to look at a bit of the real stuff.
v a woman who had understood all about the t beautifully; all the their faces. I always and one questions, I could tell the real church, and can yet.
some fun over me,
ie, and kind of queer-ies; I didn't blame myself in one of them of the women, must weren't a mite alike.
that because I didn't ndred yards of lace ow lace when I saw

ve got just the lace Is it for yourself, ross to have him call glad, instead, that he d him kind of short:
nobody else," I said.
head of me in good

ature. 'Well, now, grandma, here's the very thing; cheap as dirt, and an elegant width.' And he showed me lot of coarse cotton lace!

"I told you I wanted the real," says I.
"Real!" says he, pretending to be astonished, 'why, assure you every thread of that is real; as much so as y we've got in the store.'

"Says I: 'I don't doubt it; real cotton, every thread of it.' Well, he bothered me in that kind of way for quite a spell, showing me cotton laces of half-a-dozen kinds, and imitation laces, calling this machine-made uff 'real valenciennes,' and this cotton imitation 'real spanish lace,' until I got out of all sort of patience with him, and says I, at last, 'Look here, young man, you must get a most enormous salary in this store; but I shouldn't think the biggest salary they could offer ould pay you for lying at the rats you have to me,' ays I: 'Do you know you have told ten lies in the last ve minutes?' I looked right at him, and the fellow ushed a little, and the clerks standing near who had been laughing in their sleeves at me all the time, were st as ready to laugh at him a little—these everlasting gglers are never particular on which side they laugh—nd in about a minute I felt kind of sorry for him; so I poke a little more softly. Says I: 'I don't bear you o ill-will, but for your own sake, if I were you, I would et out of this habit of telling lies. Now I knew real ce of almost every kind you can think of long before ou were born, and it is real lace and no other that I'm ter, and if you've got any I'd li' to see it.'

"Well, all of a sudden the giggling stopped, the idle erks turned to their counters, and my young man had very red face, and began to fumble among the boxes. retty soon I understood it. There came a new voice in the scene: 'Wilkins,' says he, 'what does the lady ant?' It wasn't exactly a stern voice, not cross, you now, but grave, and with a kind of power in it. If I'd een the clerk I wouldn't have liked to go contrary to man with such a voice as that. He asked the question ght over: 'Wilkins, what does the lady want?' In xactly the same kind of voice, looking right at the clerk, hose face by this time was as red as Laura's worsteds, and then I turned and looked at the man.

"For the land's sake!" says I, and then he looked at me, and his face lighted up as if I had been an old friend, and he held out his hand and shook mine just as if I was his aunt this minute, and he was glad of it. Laura and Mrs. Leonard, I wonder if you remember my telling you bout a Sunday School Convention where I went and ook my niece Jessie, and a nice young man who sat near us, and told me things, and seated us often, and was bout a good deal after that? Well, don't you believe his was the very young man! Here he was, one of the artners in that great big store! After that was plain alling for me. He just took charge of me himself. I ot my lace and everything else I wanted, and then he ook me all round and showed me everything. I couldn't egin to tell you in a week all I saw. But, dear me! I uppose you have been there dozens of times. One thing, ough, I must tell you about. It is very queer to me that I never heard of it before; never read a thing about
t. You understand it, Irving, I s'pose? Why, them reat brass pipes that go waandering all over that store, as age round as my arm. I saw them before Mr. Webster ame up; in fact, I saw them the minute I went into the store, and I'd been watching and kind of puzzling over hem all the time. I'd seen the clerks put money in a ittle box and chuck it up through one of them brass ipes. Away it would go out of sight, as if a spirit took old of it the minute it came near the brass; and by-andy it would come back again, and have just the right hange in it for some one who stood waiting.

"Says I to myself, 'What kind of witchcraft is this?
Where does the thing go to, and who gets it, and what oes it all, anyway?' Well, when Mr. Webster began o show me round, I asked him the first thing, 'What are all them brass pipes for, and what makes them little boxes they put in fly away and come back again?'

"Ah," says he, 'let me take you to the fountain-head and show you about it.' So we went upstairs, away up to the centre of the building, and there, in a little kind of a round office, sat a dozen clerks, or more, and those great pipes that wandered over that building and struck off in every direction, came all together up here, and those little boxes with money and accounts in were continually shooting out in front of these clerks, and they would take them about as quick as lightning, and look at the account and make the change and shoot them back. I never see anything like that in all my life! I just stood still and thought; it made me feel kind of queer. I couldn't say a word. 'What is it?' Mr. Webster asked me, after he had waited a spell, and I suppose he thought I ought to speak.

"Why," says I, 'it comes over me all of a sudden, and almost takes my breath away. It makes me think of answering prayer. They are sending up their prayers from all over the store down there, and they come up to this centre and get attended to at once, and the answer goes back in all them different directions.' Well, he understands things—he is one of them men that flashes at what you mean, even if you're as awkward as a post in telling it, and says he, 'I see. That is a fact. But then it takes a dozen clerks to attend to these pipes up here. The figure isn't quite perfect, is it?'

"Only a dozen!" says I, 'for all them pipes that travel all over this big store; and these are only young, foolish girls to do it; and yet we feel sometimes as though the Lord couldn't possibly attend to all our prayers at once!' Then he laughed again, and says he,
'I see.'"

"That must be Earle Webster?" It was Mr. Jonas Smith who made this interrogatory remark; he had come in during the talk, and was listening with as much eagerness as any of us. Yes, his sister-in-law explained, it was Earle Webster.

"He had a good many questions to ask me," she continued; "how long I had been here, and where I was stopping, and when I told him I'd come on to attend my niece's wedding he looked so kind of surprised, or queer, or something, that I said—and I don't know what made me—it isn't Jessie; it's another niece.' Then he laughed outright, and said he knew it wasn't Jessie; and then he said he had heard from her lately, and she said I was here, and he had been trying to get hold of my address.
And, well, he kind of got himself mixed up so, that at last, to get out straight, he had to tell me that I must get ready to go to Jessie's wedding in the spring. And there the sly little puss is going to marry him; and she never once hinted to me who it was!"

"Going to marry Earle Webster!" There was no mistaking the astonishment in Mr. Jonas Smith's voice.
"Well, Maria, you are to be congratulated, I declare; he is one of the finest young men in the city; one of the first in every way."

"Yes," said Mrs. Solomon, in quiet satisfaction; "I know he is as good as gold. I told him about that poor young fellow with the cough, and he was interested at once; he had me walk down the store and point him out, and said he would have a talk with him; he is a new clerk, it seems."

"One of the giggling clerks stood near where he had seated me while he went to attend to some business, and says he, 'I guess our grandmother has come, or our old aunt or somebody. Do you see how we are being escorted through the store and shown the lions?' Then the other said something I was glad to hear. 'Pshaw!' says he. 'It may be his washerwoman! Webster is the quickest rich man there is on the face of the earth.'"

"Well, I thought I would help them along, and I turned round with that. Says I, 'Young man, you are right; I am a relation; I'm more than his aunt, or his grandmother; we both belong to the royal family, and are brother and sister to the King.'"

CHAPTER XVIII.

MEDITATIONS THAT MEANT SOMETHING.

THEN due course of time we were in a sort of quiet bustle in the Smith household. Not by any means such a state of excitement as it was before sickness came into our midst, yet we were getting ready for the wedding.

Lida was still in becoming wrappers, and spent most of her time on the couch, or in the easiest chair. And yet we were all decided that the marriage ceremony should take place. There were several good reasons for this. In the first place, Irving had received intimation that business reasons would soon take him South for several weeks; and in family conclave we had each declared that nothing could be better for Lida than to accompany him. Besides, Mrs. Solomon was growing restive; she had never been so long away from Solomon since their fortunes were joined; and, bravely as she had borne it, it was plain to us all that now she was homesick.

As for the little bride, she was sure of one thing, that "Aunt Maria" must be present at her wedding. So, as I said, the bustle of preparation was upon us. All the details were as unlike as possible those others, when she had been almost a wife. The ceremony was to take place in the little sitting-room upstairs, and the bride was to be dressed in a white cashmere wrapper, instead of the white silk, with lace overdress, that lay in the drawer. The physician had given it as his decided opinion that there should be an interval of several weeks between the marriage and the departure from home, in order to allow our invalid time to recover from the first excitement, before the fatigues of travel should be upon her; and on being consulted in regard to her dress, had given this brief and peremptory direction,—

"Put her into the garment in which she can lie down the quickest, and be the most comfortable after the minister has done his part. By no means excite and exhaust her with a fussy toilet."

We prepared to obey his instructions literally. The only guests to be admitted were Erskine and Earle Webster. The latter had been a frequent caller since the day he had discovered Mrs. Solomon Smith in the store. Instead of all the pretty bridesmaids, who had so distractingly flown away when trouble came, Laura was to do duty, with Erskine as a helper. Therefore the circle of preparations was, of course, wonderfully narrowed; yet we contrived to get up a good degree of excitement. How is any one to avoid a certain amount of excitement in connection with that old story, which is yet always so new?

It was on a bright winter afternoon, when every detail was complete, and we had only to wait with what quietness we could for twelve o'clock of the next morning, that Mrs. Solomon summoned me as her attendant on an excursion.

"Earle Webster wanted to go with me, and kind of thought I'd better have him along to 'tend to things,'" she explained; "but I couldn't bring my mind to it; men are dreadful convenient sometimes, and then again they are really in the way; kind of frustrate you, you know, and make you believe that you want green, when you were sure half an hour beforehand, and will be sure for ever afterwards, that you didn't want green at all, but red. I always thought there was just about one man in life that I could stand when I went to buy anything, and that was Solomon. It's been a good thing for me that I had him and nobody else. You see, we began by understanding each other. 'Solomon,' I say to him, 'he looks it all over, and maybe he says, 'Well, no, Maria, I can't say I see it in that light at all; I think so and so would be enough sight the best.' Well, if it's about the farm, or the stock, or anything that he has a better right to know about than me, I think it over, and like enough

I see at once that I was an old dunce; and I don't mind saying so, out and out. But then again, just as likely as not, I think just exactly what I did before, and then I say, 'Go ahead, Solomon, I don't agree with you a mite, but that's for you to settle.' But mind you, if it is about the house, or the garden, or the hens, or my clothes, or the part of Solomon's clothes that I manage, he is just as quick as I, and maybe a trifle quicker; to tell me to go ahead. 'So that I don't have to wear the thing,' he will say to me, with one of them grave smiles of his, if it happens to be a dress or a bonnet that we are discussing. 'Why, it's all right.' And Solomon ain't one of them mean kind of folks that is always puckering up their mouths and saying, 'I told you so.' I don't believe he would say that, whatever I did. And that's the way we manage. To my notion, it is the only way, for two folks, who both have brains, to be of one mind."

"Take notes, Laura," I said, laughing; for Laura was looking at her with so intent a face that I was curious to know how the quaint old lady's notions impressed her. She flushed deeply and turned away making no answer. Among other matters that were going on, during this unexpectedly long visit to the city, my daughter Laura was being educated to certain views and positions that I felt sure would tell in marked ways for her future.

When we were fairly in the street, Mrs. Smith trotted along with brisk step and voluble tongue.

"I'm going after Elizabeth's wedding present," she said, "and I don't believe you can guess what it is to be."

I could not, indeed; and as it had been the subject of Laura's curious surmises, of course I was interested. I fancied that it would be something useful, and not very costly, for a wise economy governed all her personal expenses, and I did not believe she would feel justified in setting the young couple a lavish example; still she was evidently impressed with the importance of her intended purchase.

"I've laid awake nights thinking about it," she admitted, a bright flush of excitement on her dear old face. "At first I couldn't see my way clear at all, and it bothered me that I couldn't; and then, when light began to dawn, as to how it could be managed, why, I began to bother my brains for fear I had been too set in my way; and one time I give it all up, but it wouldn't stay given up. I'd no sooner get it fixed and settle down on something else, when it would come trotting back to me as though it wasn't fixed at all. Right in the middle of the night, too, it would come and stand by my bed, and wake me up all of a sudden, out of a sound sleep, and say, 'Here I am now, and I insist on being thought about; you just wake up, old woman, and 'tend to me.' I declare, I've been most beat out with it some nights."

This was so funny a way of putting the story of my own trials by sleeplessness and perplexing thought, that I'm afraid my laugh was more merry than sympathetic; but I questioned with renewed interest as to what the troublesome object was.

"I'll just tell you," said Mrs. Smith, lowering her voice, as one about to make a confidential communication; "it's a horse and waggon. Now, do you think I'm an old goose?"

Amazement almost took from me the power of answering.

"Yes," she said, nodding her head and growing more satisfied evidently with her decision every moment.

"I've been all over it fifty times; you can't think of an objection that I haven't urged with all my might, just to see what the other side could say."

"I always do argue a thing out. Solomon ain't no hand to argue out loud; he just sets down a few square sentences, and lets it go; but I don't, and I've learned to argue to myself. Specially if it is a thing that I want to do pretty bad, I make the other side of me take hold well, and I have a tough time before I get the consent of myself to do it."

"Expense! Dear me, yes. I've considered over every peck of oats that horse of theirs will ever eat; I've figured them up a hundred times if I have once, and a dundance; and I don't mind when again, just as likely as I did before, and then I don't agree with you a mite. But mind you, if it is about the hens, or my clothes, or what I manage, he is just as quick, to tell me to go to wear the thing, he will give grave smiles of his, if I let that we are discussing. Solomon ain't one of them ways puckering up their face so. I don't believe he is. And that's the way we go the only way, for two of one mind."

laughing; for Laura was face that I was curious to see her notions impressed her away making no answer. "I'm going on, during this city, my daughter Laura has views and positions that ways for her future. "I'm sorry, Mrs. Smith trotted her tongue. "The wedding present," she can guess what it is to be. "I had been the subject of a course I was interested. I'm useful, and not very kind all her personal expenses would feel justified in an example; still she was importance of her intended about it," she admitted, her dear old face. "At all, and it bothered my light began to dawn, why, I began to bother me in my way; and wouldn't stay given up, I'd back on something down to me as though the middle of the night, y bed, and wake me up, p, and say, 'Here I am about; you just wake me,' I declare, I've been getting the story of my perplexing thought, that I'm more sympathetic; interest as to what the

th, lowering her voice, communication; "it's you think I'm an old the power of answer- and growing more vision every moment. "You can't think of an all my might, just to solomon sin't no s down a few square t, and I've learned to thing that I want of me take hold well, get the consent of considered over every will ever eat; I've f I have once, and a hundred ways, for the matter of that—they never seemed willing to come out twice alike—and I suppose I've wrote aquire of paper about it to Solomon.

"But you see it is just like this: Anybody can see that that child is going to need a good deal of petting and sick care of for some time to come. She needs to get out in the fresh air every day, and stay out a good while. Now, how is she going to do it in this tuckered-up city, where everything is a whirl and a jam, and there's such an awful noise that you don't hardly know what your name is half the time?"

"There's nice, pleasant places, parks, and quiet roads, and little patches that look almost like the country, if you can only get to them; but as for racketing along in the street-cars to 'em, I'd about as soon she would stay at home. What she needs is a horse and waggon. And here's the gettin' to church. I'd like to have the child begin right, and I think she's disposed to; but how is she, in her weak state, going to get to the church where she'll think she ought to go, unless she rides on them commandment-breaking cars? To be sure, there is a church near by, but you can't expect full-grown waggons on young birds. I shouldn't expect her to see her duty clear to that, with nobody to help her.

"The more I thought about it, the more it seemed to me that she ought to have a horse and waggon of her own. Well, then I talked with Jonas, and he was just as taken with the notion as he could be; said he'd have got her one long ago if he could have afforded the money to buy it. Things don't look about the house as though he couldn't afford whatever he pleased, do they?"

"But then appearances are deceitful; he ain't forehanded at all. He talked real confidential with me about the note, and the interest not being paid up, and all. He seemed to feel real bad, and I think he did. He has some queer notions; seems to think the living in style, and all that, is necessary to his business. Maybe it is; I'm only an old woman, but I don't believe it all the same, and I advised him to pay up his debts and let the looks go. I don't think he paid much attention to me; he was thinking about the horse and waggon.

"Well, he said he had a friend who had a stable on his place, and all conveniences for keeping a horse, and didn't keep any, and had a boy who could be hired for a trifle to take care of the horse, and harness it when it was wanted; and he wouldn't be charged barn-rent, because he had done the man a kindness now and then in a business way, and he would be glad to pay for it this way. It sounds queer to hear folks talk about paying for kindnesses, don't it? But Jonas means all right, and the long and short of it is, my mind is made up.

"Erskine and Earle Webster have both been on the look out for me about a horse, and Erskine told me last night that he thought he had just the thing; so now I'm after the waggon this very afternoon. I didn't mean to put it off so long, but them two was hard to suit with a horse, and I knew a waggon could be bought in a hurry."

"But are you going to get both horse and waggon?" I said, appalled before such lavish gifts, and wondering much whether she had any idea of the prices of these articles.

"No," she answered briskly. "The waggon is to be my present, but I've just been managing the business of getting a horse. That's Solomon's present. He sets a good deal of store by Elizabeth; she's his only brother's child, you know.

"Solomon is a master hand to come to conclusions; you know I told you what great long letters I wrote to him, going over all the arguments, and being about as much on one side as t'other? Well, this is every blessed word he wrote to me about it. He never writes long letters; Solomon thinks things, but he says he ain't good at getting them on to paper; says he: 'Maria, 'pears to me you're a little mixed. If Elizabeth needs a horse for her health, and if it will help keep her out of the way of temptation to doing wrong, and if Jonas and the young man are willing to have the expense of taking care of it, I should think the whole thing was in a nutshell, and there was'n't no more use in talking.' And then he went on telling me about the school, and the new books in the library, and the present to the minister, and not another word about a horse or waggon! Did you ever see a straighter road to a conclusion than that?" and her sweet old face beamed with her pride in Solomon. Nevertheless, she proceeded to tell me what a careful and intelligent estimate she had made of the expense of keeping a horse, with stable rent, and attendance, counted out, and of the heavy expense of car-tickets to balance the other, and made it clear, at least to her own mind, that in the end the thing was an economy.

"Borrowing a stable and another man's boy won't always last," she said, with a little sniff of her practical nose. "Kindnesses that are being given as pay ain't of much account, and can't be depended on, but then who knows what may happen? Maybe Elizabeth will get strong, so she won't need a horse, and then they can sell him for a penny; or maybe the young man will prosper, and can afford to build a barn, and take time to look after his own horse; or maybe the horse will die, and so won't need to be looked after. What's the use of going ahead and borrowing trouble about it? I'm going to buy my waggon this very day, and here's one of the places Earle told me to come to."

Whereupon she halted before a six-storey building, large enough to contain "waggons" for the million, and boldly pushed her way into the elegant wareroom, lined on every side with carriages, large and small, gold-mounted and plush-lined, as well as some of the plainer sort.

Many misgivings beset me. What sort of a "waggon" did the dear old lady think her pretty city flower would ride in! I recalled the plain, old-fashioned, two-seated spring waggon in which Mr. and Mrs. Solomon Smith had rode to church ever since I had known them. Long ago all the paint had been washed from it, the wheels were large and clumsy, the box was high, and the whole appearance ungainly, yet I knew that Mrs. Smith was attached to it, and considered it comfortable and quite good enough. Did some such idea present itself to her as a part of Lida's outfit? Why had she not allowed Erskine or Earle Webster, or even Laura to accompany her, that they might have tempered her enthusiasm with their educated judgment. For myself, I felt powerless in her hands, being always aware that my influence over her was as nothing compared with Laura's.

There was one relieving thought, however, to my anxieties. The character of the establishment in which we were rendered it all but unexceptionable outfits. It would probably end in utter dismay on the benevolent old lady's part; I was sure she had not relative ideas of the prices of the "waggons" of which she so gaily talked. There were so many, and such beauties, on exhibition, that while we waited for a disengaged pilot, we wandered different ways, gazing with admiring eyes.

Presently one, who proved to be a proprietor, came to me, and looking round for Mrs. Solomon, she was nowhere to be seen; so explaining that I was merely accompanying another, I still ventured to inquire the price of the little buggy before which I stood, one of the plainest in the great room, and one which I even doubted whether Irving and Lida would feel that they could climb into. Yet I groaned inwardly over the announcement that "that was a second-hand affair, and could be sold for two hundred dollars."

Two hundred dollars! I was almost certain that Mrs. Solomon expected to get the desire of her heart for about fifty! And surely that would be a liberal wedding gift from her, if she could but content herself with a lace collar, or a diamond ring, or a set of handkerchiefs, as others did.

While we waited she came toward me, walking rapidly, her face unusually flushed. "Well, I declare!" she said, dropping into a vacant chair, and ignoring the gentleman. "I've had such a turn I'm just about beat. Did you notice that horse and waggon standing down by that south door?"

I hadn't noticed it.

"Well, now before we go, I want you just to walk down that way and look at him. Such a fiery fellow I haven't seen since Solomon had a colt twenty years ago that came near breaking our necks. There he stands, right in the room. 'For pity's sake,' says I to myself, 'if that ain't the queerest thing to let a horse come into a room like this! What in the world do they do that for?' There seemed to be a kind of a road there, though, and I thought it was the place where the horses were let in to draw out the waggons; but to stand there without being tied seemed to me a most dreadful dangerous thing. Oh, you never see a horse look more as if he would like to eat everybody up than that one does! I walked off a little way from him. Thinks I to myself, if he took a notion to kick—and he looks as if he would like nothing better—he could reach me with them heels of his. Well, I turned to look at something else, and when I looked back again, don't you believe a woman stood as close to that horse as you are to me, with her back to him at that! My heart flew right into my mouth; I expected to see her kicked to death every second. It took me more than a minute, I do believe, to pluck up courage to step back and try to warn her quietly like to move on, so as not to scare that horse. It just seemed to me that I couldn't take a step; and I don't believe I should till this time if I hadn't just happened to think, what if worse came to worst, and there was an accident, how ashamed Solomon would be of me! Then I went back. And after all that, don't you believe that horse was made of wood!"

I never heard any one give a more hearty or delighted laugh than did the gentleman who was politely awaiting our wishes.

"So our trade-mark frightened you," he said, stepping towards Mrs. Smith. "That is a compliment to his naturalness; but he ought to know better than that, the scamp! However, you are not the only one who has been cheated. The children invariably run from him, and occasionally we catch the ladies."

Mrs. Smith had already recovered from the first effects of her fright, and her eyes had assumed that thoughtful, far-away expression, which told those familiar with her that there was some curious association of ideas working in her mind.

"Did you ever read 'Pilgrim's Progress'?" she asked, apparently observing the gentleman for the first time, and addressing him suddenly. "I thought of it the minute I found out that horse was made of wood. What a time poor Fearful had over them lions, and they were nothing but stone! That made me think of the verse that the slothful man says when he wants an excuse for not doing his duty. 'There's a lion in the way,' he cries, you know. I wonder if half our crosses are made of wood? What do you think, sir? If we should step boldly up to them and try to do our best, do you suppose a good many of them would be as harmless as your horse?"

CHAPTER XIX.

LUMPS OF CLAY.

 The wooden horse in question had suddenly been endowed with life, and kicked with real earnestness, I am not sure that the face of the gentleman before us could have expressed greater astonishment. It was evidently a new experience to be faced with a direct question as to "Pilgrim's Progress" and personal crosses.

"I'm afraid I'm not posted," he said, with an embarrassed laugh.

"Oh, but I suppose you are posted as to your own crosses?" with a keen, questioning look out of her grey eyes.

"Still, I suppose people's ideas of crosses might differ. For instance, what is yours?"

"Well," she said meditatively, "my crosses are apt to be when I want to do something that the Lord thinks I had better not. I'm dreadful strong-willed nature, and He has to pull me up pretty strict sometimes to keep me from running all awry."

The gentleman laughed; yet his face flushed, and was evident that he both understood and appropriated the definition of crosses. Then we gave ourselves to the business of the hour. We were still standing before the plain second-hand buggy; but when Mrs. Smith signified her readiness to look at "waggons," she turned away from that one without a second glance.

"That doesn't look the least bit like it," she remarked confidently. "There's no use in wasting time on it."

The gentleman laughed pleasantly; he seemed to be discovered that he had an original character to deal with who was worth studying. He remarked that if he only had a photograph of the sort of "waggon" she wanted he presumed he could suit her in a much shorter time; but she paid no other attention to this broad hint that she should particularise, than to remark that she would pay it out pretty soon, then he could see the real thing, which those wakeful hours of night to good purpose, for she marched down that long, long room, gazing with keen eyes on either side of her, rejecting some with a glance as "too large," others as "fussy," and others still as "not looking a bit like" the one she meant. She asked the price of none of them. Suddenly she came to a full stop before a little gem of a phaeton. What a beauty it was! Low, light, delicately finished, upholstered in a lovely grey, which had that singular pinky tint that reminds one of a summer sunset. Nothing in all that establishment was better suited to Lida's refined taste than the phaeton. Very few, I was sure, of the simpler ones represented more money. Yet it was not showy, only tasteful. Of course I was aware that exceedingly well-made, tasteful things are more expensive, the more quiet they are; but did Mrs. Smith know it?

The proprietor was evidently astonished at her choice. He waited before her in respectful silence, while the keen-eyed old lady walked round it, felt the cushions, examined the lining, asked sharp questions about the springs and the axles, and in various other ways evinced her knowledge of carriages.

Her questions were answered, but no additional information was vouchsafed; she was evidently being studied.

"What is the very best you could do for me if I were to count you out the money for this in clean new bills?" The gentleman looked at her, looked through her apparently, while she steadily returned his gaze with those penetrative grey eyes of hers. Meanwhile I had, with a sinking heart, discovered a card hanging in an obscure corner at the back, marked six hundred dollars! What would Mrs. Solomon think of that? Meantime she waited for her answer.

"Five hundred dollars," he said at last, forcing out the words with an explosive sound as if they almost hurt him.

I remembered afterwards that the wonder as to whether he had found one of his crosses in leaving off that other hundred, occurred to me. But I had not much time for moralising.

"I'll take it," said Mrs. Smith, in a composed tone, and she dropped into a chair, took out her old-fashioned well-filled pocket-book, and began to look over her papers.

In undoubted and undisguised astonishment the owner of the carriage watched her. I was hardly less astonished.

"I promised you clean bills," she said, glancing up, "but I reckon you'll have to go to the bank for that; I forgot he told me I mustn't carry so much money about the streets. I don't see why, though; people wouldn't be likely to bother an old woman. I've got a paper here that he said would do just as well as money."

It was curious to me to note the change on the face of the man before us. The surprised and interested look faded rapidly; in its place came one of suspicion—an air that said almost as plainly as words could have done: "Oh, ho! my pious old lady, that's your dodge, is it?"

ething that the Lord this ndful strong-willed natura pretty strict sometimes to k et his face flushed, and derstood and appropriated ve gave ourselves to the bu still standing before the va t when Mrs. Smith signifi gons," she turned away fr nce.

st bit like it," she remark in wasting time on it."
santly; she seemed to ha ginal character to deal wi e remarked that if he on of "a waggon" she wante er in a much shorter tim to this broad hint that s emark that she would pla ld see the real thing, wh ure. She must have spe to good purpose, for a g room, gazing with kee ecting some with a glan y," and others still as "n e meant. She asked the ly she came to a full sto n. What a beauty it was upheld in a lovely soft pink tint that reminds on in all that established taste that in the phaeo simpler ones represente showy, only tasteful. O ingly well-made, taste more quiet they are; bu astonished at her choice silence, while the keen the cushions, examined about the springs and the advised her knowledge of ut no additional informa dently being studied.

ould do for me if I were is in clean new bills?" er, looked through her rned his gaze with those eanwhile I had, with a hanging in an obscure undred dollars! What ? Meantime she waite

id at last, forcing out as if they almost hurt e wonder as to whether leaving off that other had not much time for

, in a composed tone, out her old-fashioned
o look over her papers. tonishment the owner hardly less astonished.
he said, glancing up, the bank for that; I so much money about ugh; people wouldn't I've got a paper here money."

e change on the face d and interested look one of suspicion—an rds could have done;
as your dodge, is it?

acquainted with it; but you almost deceived me with our grey eyes." Then she passed him up the cheque. another lightning-like change of the expressive face; it as a bank cheque, and bore the name and firm of Earle Webster.

"This is as good as the cleanest bills you could bring," said with great heartiness. And immediately the minor arrangements connected with the sale were entered into.

"Cheques are interesting things," said Mrs. Solomon, with a satisfied air. She still occupied the seat into which he had dropped when she made her decision, and her mind, though alert enough for the business in hand, was still wandering off into other channels of thought. I could see it in her eyes. "I never had much to do with them," she continued. "It didn't seem to me that a piece of paper could be as good as the money. A promise to pay, Earle said it was. 'But they don't know me, nor Solomon,' I told him. Says I, 'If they knew Solomon, I could understand how a promise to pay would be all right; for everybody believes Solomon.'"

"I'll fix it," says he. 'They know me where you are going,' and he got out his bank book, and wrote this paper. And the first thing you say when you look at it is, 'It's as good as the gold.' Ain't that interesting now? Makes me think right away of my Master. Suppose I get up to the gates of heaven? Tho angels don't know me, never heard of me, most likely; but I hand them my cheque signed by the Lord Jesus Christ. 'Ha!' says the angel, 'I know Him,' and the gates swing open.
I tell you what it is, sir, we want to look out for it that we have a right to use His name, don't we?'"

The gentleman was visibly embarrassed, and at the same time singularly moved. He drew out his handkerchief suddenly, and coughed, and made vigorous use of it about his face for a moment, and said in an apologetic tone to me: "I had a good old mother once."
"I hope you've made sure of living with her by-and-by."

It was Mrs. Smith who spoke the words, in a quiet, matter-of-fact, indeed I might say, business-like tone.
Then she gave herself fully to the business of managing in the best manner about the home-coming of her carriage; looked after her receipt, and attended to all the details in a thoroughly business way. It was evident that the man's respect for her increased every moment.

As for me, I went home a good deal bewildered.
Solomon Smith's bank account must be much larger than people in his vicinity had ever imagined.

I hinted something of the feeling to his wife, and she answered me with a satisfied air to the effect that, being content with spring waggons in a place where a spring waggon would do just as well as any, had put them in a way to give a comfortable little carriage now and then to folks who needed. Which was a way of disposing of the entire subject of giving and receiving that it struck me would be more novel than agreeable to many.

What a nice little wedding it was! Not of the common sort at all. Not in the least like the one that Laura and I had come to attend. In fact, I think all the details might have been said to be unique. Nothing of the sacredness which usually hovers in the background of marriages where one party is an invalid was apparent.

As a rule in such cases, the shadow of an approaching separation that shall last as long as life, is upon the company. With us, the shadow had been and was lifted.
Lida was steadily progressing toward renewed health.
Indeed, she had hardly any drawbacks from the first.
Even the sense of parting from the old ties, the going out from the childhood home, which had been strong on the mother at least before, had lost its sting. They had so nearly parted from her for the grave, that to be making preparations for her to go to the sunny South-land for a few weeks, and to look forward to her speedy return in health, had in it nothing but joy. So we were very joyful at the wedding. An exceedingly subdued joy, however. Each member of the company was on the alert to do and say that which would least fatigue and excite the bride. Truth to tell, however, she appeared the quietest and calmest of the group—her face pale, it is true, but wonderfully reposeful, her eyes bright, but with a steady, rather than a fitful joy.

There had been no rehearsals of the ceremony, though the position of each participant was as unlike as possible to the usual one. Lida's voice, when she pronounced at last the irrevocable "I do," was as calm and self-controlled as though it was merely an outward form of what had been done long ago.

It was Irving's face that paled, and his form that trembled, as the minister spoke these solemn words:
"Until death do you part!" Death had so nearly parted them! He had hardly yet stepped shiveringly from the brink of the chasm. Still, he controlled himself, and gave a swift, anxious look down at the wife whose hand he clasped. Excitement would tell heavily on her strength.
She smiled back a reassuring answer. But his whole mind was presently absorbed in getting her comfortably settled on her sofa, and the bright-hued silk Afghan thrown over her. Then, lying there like a princess, with a delicate pink beginning to flush her cheek, we came up one by one and kissed her.

"Bless the child!" said Auntie Smith, bustling about.
"She is getting red cheeks now; a little bit too red. We had better slip away and leave her and her husband to a little quiet."

Then her cheeks flamed. It was the first time she had heard the new name. The feast was spread in an adjoining room, the doctor forbidding the invalid to descend the stairs, and even according a reluctant consent to her joining us with the coffee and cream. The feast, too, was utterly unlike the regulation wedding fare. A substantial mid-day meal, with plenty of wedding-cake and ices, to-be sure, but by no means confined to these ephemeral dishes. Lida's doctor had become something more than a professional friend; we had seen so much of him, and he had been so constant and persistent in his efforts, even after his hopes of saving his patient were faint, that every member of the family had come to look on him as a friend.
The frail little patient had evidently won a large place in his heart. He watched over her with almost fatherly care, and became preeminent, even savage, toward those who seemed to him to plan anything contrary to her best interests.

"There is just about as much strength there as there is in a cobweb!" he said sharply to Irving. "It is spirit, not strength, that keeps her up. Young man, you must remember that, and look out for her with the greatest care. Spirit will do a good deal, but somebody has to be behind it that has common sense to see that it isn't carried too far."

Whereupon Lida laughed. She had lost all fear of the grave and reticent doctor. Truth to tell, he had laid aside much of his professional reticence, though he was still grave enough.

"The doctor doesn't give me credit for a bit of common sense, Irving," she said gaily, "only spirit."

"You needn't put the 'only' before that word," he said quickly. "If it had not been for that you would have slipped away from us sure."

Then a sweet gravity, as new as it was fascinating, came into Lida's face as she gently shook her head.

"It was not that which brought me back to life, doctor."

"No," said the doctor, "that's true. It was good nursing. Your aunt here is to have credit, if you succeed in being a credit to us. I've seen a good deal of nursing in my day, but I must say this went a little ahead. I tell you what it is, madam, if you want to stay in the city, I can keep you employed without the slightest trouble.
Young man, you have her to thank for your bride today."

Irving turned an eager, grateful face toward Mrs.
Smith, but she was looking at Lida, and the two exchanged fond smiles that said how well they understood each other, and how far from the truth the doctor was.

"I guess we all did the best we could," the old lady said, fixing earnest eyes on his face. "But the fact is, there was a greater than even you in that sick-room, doctor. The Lord touched her with His hand of power, as surely as He ever touched Simon's mother-in-law that time when Simon had the sense to go to prayer-meeting and bring Jesus home with him, instead of moping at home because his folks were sick."

Everybody laughed, the doctor with the rest, but his sharp eyes had a sarcastic gleam in them as he said,— "That is a very comfortable kind of faith, hold on to it by all means. At the same time, I wouldn't have given a row of pins for Mrs. Irving Leonard's life, if you hadn't hung over her for about twenty-four hours without giving yourself time to eat, or sleep, or even think."

"You're mistaken there!" she said triumphantly. "I thought all the time and I prayed every minute. I don't suppose the Lord had that child out of His thoughts once during that day and night. I didn't give Him a chance!"

This sentence seemed to amuse the doctor again. He laughed outright, but added immediately,— "Well, all I can say is, the Lord chose excellent help to carry out His designs."

"Of course He did! Why shouldn't He, when He knows all about the ends as well as the beginnings of things? That's the reason He chose you. Don't you suppose He knew what He was about when He gave you your education, and set you to doctoring the people, and gave you a special talent for studying out what to do? I don't think He ever makes a mistake with His means any more than He did when He was on earth."

"Only, wouldn't it have been a queer thing if the lump of clay that He put on the eyes of that blind man had started up and said: 'Aha, see what I can do! I gave that blind man his sight!' I tell you what it is, the lumps of clay that He uses nowadays to help, have got tongues, and are everlastingly taking the praise to themselves. It's one of the marks of His great patience that He bears it so well. But I don't want to be one of them, doctor. I did the best I could, because I loved the child, and because my feet and hands and brain belong to Him anyhow, and I'm bound to do the best I can with His tools wherever He sets me to work; but as for claiming the honour, why, dear me, I wouldn't dare to do it. It's honour enough for a lifetime to be used. Sometimes, doctor, I'm dreadfully afraid that you don't know anything about the joy of being used by Him."

It was an aside sentence, intended only for the doctor's ears. Standing near him as I was, I heard it, and saw the sudden flush that mounted to his forehead, and noted the sudden huskiness of his voice as he said: "I wish I did, madam, I wish I did."

"Mamma," said Laura, as we packed one of the Southern-bound trunks together late that evening, "she is certainly very different; before she was so excited and nervous that it was almost impossible to do anything to please her; but she has been just as sweet as a snowdrop all through this trying time. There is a great difference; but oh, dear me! I know it won't last!"

It really seemed as though Laura was waiting with a sort of feverish anxiety for Lida to make a failure of it, in order that she might be justified in remaining as she was. It was evident that Mrs. Smith had the same thought. She turned from the closet where she was folding clothes for the trunk, and looked with those grave eyes of hers full at Laura, who seemed to have forgotten that she was in the room.

"Child," she said, the utmost earnestness in voice and manner, "whether that poor little girl downstairs makes out to live the sort of life you think she ought to or not, don't you think Jesus Christ lived it? Now, there's one thing I want to know: Did He ever say to you, 'Take Lida Smith for your pattern, and if she fails you are justified'?"

CHAPTER XX.

"MRS. SOLOMON SMITH, YOU'VE HELPED ALONG IN THE NIGHT'S WORK."

OUR next excitement was of a totally different character. It came to us in the night, the third after the marriage. We had lingered another day, and Lida's earnest petition, to enjoy a ride in the new carriage, with the new iron grey pony, who, though a wicked-looking little fellow, was said to be a model of gentleness, sagacity, and speed, and who, during the two days of our acquaintance, sustained his reputation.

What Mrs. Jonas Smith thought of the munificence present to her daughter, she seemed unable to put into words, but whatever attention she could think of, to lavish on her sister-in-law, was promptly bestowed.

As for Lida, her old auntie had come to love her so dearly, that kisses and smiles were payment enough.

"She is a grand diamond in the rough!" did Irving say, in a burst of confidence, to Laura and me. "Laura, I don't wonder that your eyes glowed at my misunderstanding of her. It is positively an astonishment that you didn't cut my acquaintance entirely. But how was it to know that she was such a splendid woman?"

"True enough," said Laura, speaking with animation, "how should you know? You seemed to have but one way of judging her, and that was by the cut of her cloak and the shape of her hat."

"I don't altogether like Irving, mamma,"—this of course after he was gone—"he is so sort of flippant in his manner about everything; he was quite endurable while Lida was sick, but now that his anxiety is over, he seems to have room for nothing but nonsense and flattery. I'll tell you what it is, mamma, if Irving doesn't take care Lida will get away ahead of him; he needs the shadow of a tremendous trouble of some sort, in the background, to keep him in anything like a dignified state of mind."

I hardly knew whether to be annoyed or to laugh over this absurd estimate of a youthful man, by a very youthful woman. Still, there was food for thought in her words.

"If Irving really does need a continuous background of shadows, in order to bring him home at last, be sure his Lord knows it; some people will not answer Christ's call, daughter, unless He makes the path on which they persist in treading full of thorns!"

I spoke with unwonted gravity, for something in her face just then led me to wonder with sudden pain whether my Laura would continue to move along the broad highway until she was driven out of it by thorns. I think she caught my meaning, for she turned away hastily, and said in a tone that was almost petulant,—

"I could never be driven into religion, mamma, and I doubt whether Irving could."

Was there defiance in the words?
The house settled early into quiet that night.

We were to leave on the following day; not early, as we must of necessity have done, if we made the trip in one day. Mr. Jonas Smith was called by business to a town located on our route, nearly halfway, and would be detained there at an hotel overnight, and the whole family urged that, instead of planning for a four o'clock train, we should go at noon with that gentleman, and remain overnight at the hotel. The decision was left to Mrs. Solomon, and I fancy more for the purpose of spending a quiet hour with her brother-in-law, to say to him a few words as opportunity offered, than for any fear of early rising, she agreed to the hotel plan.

It must have been some time after midnight, and we in our room were awakened by peculiar sounds in the hall. I think we had been all more or less inclined to wakefulness, and to listen for unusual sounds, since the midnight alarm when Lida was taken sick; so I roused without difficulty, and immediately arose to investigate.

"Laura, there is some one groaning downstairs, a man's voice. I being down

"Don't,
stant;
phantime
ery like g Mrs. Sm
nor opene
all; not a near-cut,
"Who's matter?"
Then M
voice,—
"Don't ff
ake let Sa Lida. Is oor shut t shall ha Irving. O
me! I Laura an our hurr and look ether with eces. Som cident n happened and been d orses, over mother ha more than the past w aps he rought mangled an
and the f rying to half-sick
rail daugh the news a was possib
"We can h na," said L needn't call Then we gain.
Mrs. S Smith, with quickly supp
clamation, h in the situati over it was,
quietly down moment m Laura ope floor and step
the hall.
heard Mr. voice again—
"Oh, Ma
Heaven's sa et any of the
—It is a wul with us."
Go back!
of command
ame back to
"I don't k
ook. "I ear
it is Harris;
He must be d Auntie Smit
mamma!" a weeping.
Certainly M
my child from
I blessed those

R XX.
E HELPED ALONG IN THE ORK."

s of a totally different cha in the night, the third after d lingered another day, a to enjoy a ride in the new grey pony, who, though as said to be a model of and who, during the two ed his reputation.
ought of the munificence emed unable to put into he could think of, to lavish ly bestowed.
had come to love her so re payment enough.
the rough!" did Irving Laura and me. "Laura glowed at my misunder
an astonishment that ntirely. But how was I ndid woman?"
peaking with animation omed to have but one way the cut of her cloak and mamma,"—this of course of flippant in his manner ndurable while Lida was over, he seems to have nd flattery. I'll tell you sn't take care Lida will the shadow of a tromenbackground, to keep him of mind."
enjoyed or to laugh over l man, by a very youth-od for thought in her ntinuous background of ome at last, be sure his ot answer Christ's call-h on which they persist for something in her th sudden pain whether along the broad highy thorns. I think she away hastily, and said eligion, mamma, and I t that night.
g day; not early, as we made the trip in one by business to a town fway, and would be and the whole family four o'clock train, we man, and remain overs left to Mrs. Solomon. spending a quiet hour him a few words as ar of early rising, she r midnight, and we in-r sounds in the hall.
inclined to wakefuls, since the midnight so I roused without investigate.
g downstairs, a man's oice. I think Mr. Smith or Irving must be ill; I'm ping down to see, as soon as I can."

"Don't, mamma," said Laura, springing up on the stant; "let me go," and she began rapidly dressing. meantime the strange sounds, mingled with something ery like groans, continued.
Mrs. Smith was, as usual, in advance of us; her room oor opened at this point, and her voice was heard in the all; not a loud voice; Mrs. Smith's tones were euphatic, near-cent, readily understood, but never loud.
"Who's sick? Is that you, Jonas? What is the matter?"
Then Mr. Smith's
oice,—
"Don't for Heaven's ake let Sarah hear or Lida. Is the child's oor shut? And yet shall have to call rving. Oh, God help me!" Laura and I paused
n our hurried toilets, nd looked at each ther with blanched aces. Some dreadful cident must have ppened. Harris ad been driving gay orses, over which his mother had worried more than once, in he past week. Peraps he had been brought home all mangled and bleeding, nd the father was rying to shield the half-sick wife and rill daughter from he news as long as
was possible.
"We can help, mam-na," said Laura. "He eedn't call Irving." Then we hurried
again.
Mrs. Solomon
Smith, with one brief, quickly suppressed exclamation, had taken in the situation, what-ver it was, and gone quietly downstairs. A moment more and Laura opened our floor and stepped into he hall. Then I heard Mr. Smith's
oice again,—
"Oh, Maria, for Heaven's sake don't let any of them come!
—It is awful enough,
t with us."
"Go back!" It was Mrs. Solomon's quiet, strong voice of command to Laura, and the child, her face deathly pale, came back to me.
"I don't know," she said, in answer to my questioning look. "I can't see him, only a glimpse; he seems lifeless.
It is Harris; they are carrying him into the back parlour.
He must be dead, and that is why they need no more help.
Auntie Smith had hold of his feet. Oh, mamma! mamma!" and she burst into a perfect passion of weeping.
Certainly Mrs. Smith had done well in trying to shield my child from any more unnerving sights and sounds, and I blessed those two downstairs for their thoughtfulness as I bent over Laura. I coaxed her back to bed presently, half-dressed as she was. It might be only a faint, I told her; doubtless was. Mr. Smith was terribly alarmed, of course, yet remembered the importance of keeping exciting news from Lida, or his wife; and had probably reasoned that the safest way was to keep the upper hall perfectly quiet. I listened, meantime, for sounds below, which should indicate that the doctor was being summoned, or those other terrible helpers, if indeed the young man should be past a physician's care. But the utmost silence prevailed. I could almost have imagined the whole thing a dream, but for remembering how wide-awake and strongnerved Mrs. Smith's voice had sounded.

It might have been ten minutes, or it might have been half an hour afterwards—I could not judge of the time, it seemed so long—that a low tap came at our door, and I, answering it, admitted Mrs. Solomon.
Her face was very pale, but quiet, though her eyes gleamed with a light that seemed something more than sorrow.
"Have you had a great scare here?"
she questioned. "I don't wonder; I've been shaken as I never was before. Is the child asleep?" with a glance toward Laura.
"Auntie, is he dead?" asked Laura, suddenly turning and fixing wide-open frightened eyes on her. "I saw him, I caught a glimpse of him, it was Harris is he dead?" Mrs. Smith turned toward her those grave eyes, full now with solemn meaning, and said slowly, "Yes, child, he is—dead
drunk."
"Drunk!" I repeated in dismay and a sort of terror, the very outspokenness of the word seeming to make it more terrible;
for the moment to have one lying drunk in the house seemed infinitely worse than to say, "He is intoxicated."
"Drunk!" repeated Laura with a peculiar emphasis.
I had never heard the word or the tone from her lips before.
"Yes," said Mrs. Solomon, "dead drunk. He knows just as little this minute about what is going on as his body will know when it is laid in the grave; and it is an awful sight! I never saw its like before, and I pray God I may never have to see it again. Oh! Solomon has often told me that I ought to go down on my knees and thank the Lord that ours were all girls, and kept safe from the worst temptations, but I never felt like it until this minute. Think what it was for that father to help drag

"OH, MAMMA! MAMMA!" SHE EXCLAIMED, AND BURST INTO A PERFECT PASSION OF WEEPING."

infinitely worse than to say, "He is intoxicated."
"Drunk!" repeated Laura with a peculiar emphasis.
I had never heard the word or the tone from her lips
before.
"Yes," said Mrs. Solomon, "dead drunk. He knows just as little this minute about what is going on as his body will know when it is laid in the grave; and it is an awful sight! I never saw its like before, and I pray God I may never have to see it again. Oh! Solomon has often told me that I ought to go down on my knees and thank the Lord that ours were all girls, and kept safe from the worst temptations, but I never felt like it until this minute. Think what it was for that father to help drag him in like a beast over the elegant carpet, all mud and filth he was, just from the gutter! Oh dear!"

And the poor shocked old lady buried her face in her hands.

"Is this a new shock to the father?" I asked, after a few moments of troubled silence.

Mrs. Smith shook her head. "I guess not; I guess he has had a good many just such times as this. But he promised, you see, and had reformed, so his father thought, and so poor Sarah thinks; and Jonas, he shrinks awfully from the mother knowing about it. But she will have to know; how can such things be kept from mothers? Oh dear, oh dear! Ain't that trouble, now? If that boy downstairs was mine, what could I do? Do you suppose I could bear it?"

I can never forget the drawn look, as of pain, on the old lady's face, as she waited almost appealingly for my answer.

"My dear friend," I said gently, "he is not yours, remember; the Lord gave you dear children who were at all times a comfort."

"So He did, so He did. And then He took them to His palace before me, so that I would have nothing to do but to hurry on after them as fast as I could. That is what I have always thought; but to-night I've been thinking that maybe I haven't understood the Lord. Maybe He gave me good, quiet, Christian girls, so that I would have time to help the mothers with boys; with boys who go astray; and then, maybe, when He saw that I did not understand, and would keep spending my time on my girls, that didn't really need it, He just took them into His own keeping; and even then I stupidly hurried along, the uppermost thought being that I was getting old, and that time was passing, and Solomon and I would soon be home with the children."

"Oh, Auntie Smith! I'm sure you have spent your whole life, ever since I've known you, in trying to help other people." This reproachful protest came from the bed.

"No, I haven't, child; I've done a little at it now and then, when anybody stumbled right before my face and eyes, and I had to see 'em. But that's very different from going round looking after 'em. Even when the Lord set them right before me, I couldn't seem to see more than one at a once. Here I've been in this house for weeks and weeks, and I dunno as I've thought three times about that boy downstairs. How shall I ever know what I might have said or done for him, that would have helped him? I tell you, when I see him lying there like a beast, instead of like a man made in the image of God, says I to myself: 'Mrs. Solomon Smith, you've helped along in this night's work just as like as not. There's more ways than one of helping; you've managed to give Satan a lift by just folding your hands and thanking the Lord you hadn't any boys, and made not the least move to keep this one out of the devil's clutches, just because he didn't happen to belong to you! It's my opinion that there's about as much mischief done in this world by folding our hands and thanking the Lord that our folks are not like other folks, as there is any other way.'

It was a strange time for a lecture on the universal brotherhood of the race, or on the solemnity of human responsibility, and consequent accountability to God. Yet certainly I had never heard my old friend speak with such solemnity, nor seem so moved.

"I tell you," she said with energy, as she rose up to go, "we are all asleep. Everybody is asleep. It is high time we woke up and went to work."

"Mamma," said Laura, as the door closed after her, "if she is asleep, what do you suppose can be said of all the rest of the world?" Silence for a moment, and then this: "Mamma, do you suppose, according to Auntie Smith, that I also am to blame for this trouble? For instance, I could have prevented this evening's work, I suppose. Harris asked me to ride with him, but I felt so utterly unequal to the undertaking that I declined. Am I to blame for to-night?"

I was prompt with my answer.

"No, daughter, no; that is the mistake which young people are apt to make. To ride with a young man of an evening may or may not be a wise thing to do. In the case I am decidedly of the opinion that you did right, but if it is all that a young girl can do toward looking a young man back from ruin, it amounts to very little indeed. To have been able to have exerted such a Christian influence over Harris as would have led him, possibly, to the Strong One for strength, might indeed have been his salvation. You know, dear, you did not try that."

She turned from me with manifest impatience.

"Mamma, you and Auntie Smith think that there's nothing worth doing for people unless you can talk religion to them. What are those poor mortals to do who have none to talk about?"

"I don't think you mean just that, Laura. Neither of us believe that merely talking religion to people will do much good; but I confess that I do not see how, unless one lives religion, she is going to be able to help another to the only foundation that is absolutely safe to build upon."

Soon after that we settled into quiet, and tried with what skill we could to forget the scenes of the hour, and gather a little strength from what night there was left. Both of us, I think, were troubled with visions of the sleeping son and the waking father below stairs.

We saw nothing of Harris the next morning, heard nothing of him. The father appeared much as usual, a trifle graver, perhaps, but I could not be sure, and from the smiling face of the mother I fancied that the family disgrace had been hidden from her; though much I marvelled as to how mother-eyes could be deceived. Amid hearty good-byes, and almost oppressive attentions, we left at last the house which we had entered as strangers. Especially interesting to me was Laura's parting with the child-wife. My daughter was never given to tears, but her eyes were dim when she turned away from Lida, and after a half hour of utter silence on her part I heard only this,—

"Mamma, fancy my loving the little thing, and hating to leave her! I never supposed that I could!"

Our journey was comparatively uneventful; only comparatively, however, and that word, I imagine, would not apply could we look into the future. There were quiet words dropped that day, by our alert old friend, that I doubt not will bear fruit, such as she will meet again in her Father's house. I think I have represented her to you as one strangely on the watch for opportunities, singularly ready with just the word that it seemed wisest to speak; but on this day, after her solemn declaration of the night before, that everybody was "asleep," it was more distinctly noticeable than ever that she was intent upon her Master's business. Never obtrusive, hardly ever seeming to offend, being rarely repulsed, yet deftly slipping in her quiet, telling words, where they must have been least expected.

In fact, I think she, more than any woman I ever knew, united those two peculiar characteristics of successful work: "Wise as a serpent and harmless as a dove."

Mr. Smith proved a very careful and courteous attendant. Almost too careful, indeed; he fairly oppressed us with attentions, opening and closing our windows, arranging our blinds, folding and refolding our wraps, buying the daily papers, and offering us some of every dainty that passed through the train, pop-corn and fashion-books included. There seemed, all the afternoon, a nervous unrest about the man; I could not help thinking that he was trying to get rid of his own sorrowful thoughts, by inventing wants for us, that he might busy himself in supplying. Arrived at our stopping-place for the night, we were packed into a carriage, and taken whither he would, having all resigned ourselves to the feeling—which, however much of a veteran in travelling she may be, is always a luxury to a woman—that we were being taken care of, and need not think anything about routes or stopping-places or luggage.

The hotel was one of the princely sort, Mr. Jonas with being avelling, and

avel stains, legant dining sequentially
ight select f
It was here at had, in

PRINCIPLES

ND
was pro

judge by he Jonas, look fore him and which indicate served to o
"Yes," he s at. What a Jonas, you em? In this place aining his cor
The tone wa
arest waiter
his face wh answered he
"There is n
n't you see et me send y
y committee
"Then I mu
a positive ere was too conscious of a question at iss runken from
nas. If I'd me this way.
nces, and mak
ting my napp
rum, or giv
By this time
e napkin with
r. Jonas Smi
"Don't be ab
ne, "we mus
ater, in additi

"Not for me Smith's voice, pithful for my n't do anything one of Solom re along, in a at to the Lord broken for ec at I can't eat
"What ridicu
ly angry now.
ble either help eat, Maria, f her single thi
"Maybe so,"
ould you give
?"

The father's f
? Here was the mistake which you with a young man of e thing to do. In the sion that you did right l can do toward holdin it amounts to very litt to have exerted such as would have led him r strength, might indee know, dear, you did no ifirst impatience.

Smith think that there le unless you can talk e poor mortals to do wh that, Laura. Neither o ligation to people will d do not see how, unles be able to help another absolutely safe to build o quiet, and tried with scenes of the hour, and at night there was left r with visions of the r below stairs.

the next morning, heard eared much as usual, a not be sure, and from anced that the family her; though much es could be deceived
t oppressive attentions, h we had entered as e to me was Laura's y daughter was never dim when she turned hour of utter silence

ittle thing, and hating at I could!"
ineventful; only come, I imagine, would not re. There were quiet ort old friend, that I he will meet again in y represented her to ch for opportunities, that it seemed wisest er solemn declaration y was "asleep," it was r that she was intent obtrusive, hardly ever ed, yet deftly slipping them must have been

y woman I ever knew, eristics of successful less as a dove."
eful and courteous
deed; he fairly oping and closing our olding and refolding and offering us some e the train, pop-corn seemed, all the after-n; I could not help et rid of his own ants for us, that he ived at our stopping-into a carriage, and esigned ourselves to a veteran in travel-o a woman—that we not think anything
egage.

ly sort, Mr. Jonas

Smith being evidently one who never economised in travelling, and by seven o'clock we were divested of our elegant dining-room, with well-trained waiters standing obsequiously by, ready to serve us with whatever we might select from the bill of fare.

It was here that occurred the next startling episode of that had, in the last few weeks, become an eventful life.

CHAPTER XXI.

PRINCIPLES ARE INCONVENIENT THINGS; I'LL OWN THAT."

AND what will you have, Maria?" Mr. Smith was saying, as Laura and I having stated our preference, he waited for his sister-in-law.

But "Maria" was engaged in an earnest, and, judge by her eyes, startled perusal of the bill of fare. "Jonas, look there!" she said at last, laying the paper before him and pointing with her finger to the head lines, which indicated that choice wines in every variety would be served to order.

"Yes," he said, in a low tone, "of course, they all do eat. What shall I order for you?"

"Jonas, you don't mean that? They don't all have rum? In this great city there must surely be one temperance place where a body can eat and sleep without sinning his conscience!"

The tone was low, almost pleading; still I think the nearest waiter caught it, and there was an amused smile on his face while he waited. Probably Jonas saw this, he answered hurriedly,—

"There is no time to discuss such matters now, Maria. Don't you see we are already the subject of remark? Let me send your order, it is growing late. I am to meet my committee at eight o'clock."

"Then I must just go hungry, that's all." She spoke in a positive voice, yet one couldn't call it obstinate. There was too mournful a tone in it, as if she were fully conscious of all the perplexities and annoyances that beset her at issue set in motion, and would fain have been broken from it if she could. "I'm dreadful sorry, Jonas. If I'd dreamed of such a thing, I wouldn't have come this way. I don't like to put folks in unpleasant places, and make talk, and all that, not a bit; but as for getting my supper, or sleeping under a roof where they'll rum, or giving a cent of my money towards helping along, I can't do it."

By this time the waiter was smiling broadly behind the napkin with which he vainly tried to hide his mouth. Mr. Jonas Smith was growing visibly annoyed.

"Don't be absurd!" he said, in a quick, irritable undertone, "we must have supper at once. Tea and toast, waiter, in addition to my other orders, and be quick about it."

"Not for me, Jonas." There was quietness in Mrs. Smith's voice, but there was also firmness. "Not a thoughtful for me at this table. You don't understand. I don't do anything of that kind; it simply ain't right. One of Solomon's money must go toward helping the cause along, in any way, shape, or manner. We promised at to the Lord long ago; and a promise to Him ain't to be broken for convenience, you know. I can go hungry, but I can't eat the bread of sin."

"What ridiculous nonsense!" Mr. Smith was unaffectedly angry now. "Just as if eating your supper at this table either helped or hindered the cause! I'll tell you that, Maria, fanaticism does more to hinder it than any other single thing."

"Maybe so," said Mrs. Smith quietly. "Jonas, what would you give to see Harris just such a fanatic as I am?"

The father's face paled instantly, yet what were we to do? Here we sat, waiting for our ordered dinner, and one of our party refusing to touch it. He turned toward us an appealing look, and I essayed to help.

"I should certainly much prefer a temperance house. Can we not go quietly to one?"

"And leave the supper we have ordered uncaten and unpaid for?"

There was something very like a sneer in his voice, yet he was so tried that I could excuse it. Mrs. Smith saved me the trouble of answering.

"No, we wouldn't leave it unpaid for. We've made 'em trouble in ignorance, and we'll pay 'em for it. That's principle; but they'll know just why we can't eat our suppers here; that's principle, too."

Mr. Smith looked as though it were that he hated principle, and would have nothing to do with it; but, after another moment or two of hesitation, he rose abruptly, made his way to the cashier's desk, held a hurried conversation with him, during which time certain bills changed hands, then he came back to us. And it was with haste and gloom that we retreated from the elegant hotel. A somewhat silent party rode through the streets of the city in search of a temperance house. Mr. Jonas Smith did not condescend to sit inside, but slammed the door on us as if we were all equally in disgrace, and took a seat with the driver.

The ride was not a long one, but the change, both in location and appearance, was marked when we again alighted before a hotel. Perhaps you are accustomed to being a martyr to your temperance principles, and know all about the stuffy hall, and small, not overclean, not well-kept rooms, all smelling more or less of food that had been cooked some time, into which we were presently ushered.

"I hope you like it?" Mr. Smith said to his sister-in-law, with meek voice and savage eyes.

He was speaking of the room to which the slovenly and somewhat surly waiter had brought us,—the main one, by no means immense in size, and the one opening from it, not larger than the clothes-presses in his own house. The furniture was plain, even to shabbiness; the carpet, that large-figured abomination in red-and-green; altogether, though the bedding was clean, and the necessaries to comfort were there, the air of cheapness which pervaded everything evidently tried Mr. Smith's æsthetic taste to the utmost.

"It will do," Mrs. Solomon said decisively, in answer to his insinuation. "It ain't so grand by considerable as the one we left. I suppose those folks can't afford to be grand, they don't get any help from rum. And I don't suppose they have any too much custom, either. Folks don't go out of their way, maybe, to find a temperance house. It is a good deal easier to go to the glittering places, and ask no questions for conscience's sake. Principles are inconvenient things; I'll own that. Solomon and I have been bothered with ours a great many times."

"Well," said Mr. Smith, "every one to his taste. I'm glad you like it. They say there will be some sort of a supper served for you soon. As for me, I must go without supper to-night, and hurry right back to my appointment."

It was his parting thrust, and we were alone.

"But, auntie," said Laura, as she poured water from the broken-nosed pitcher, and exclaimed over its smallness, and yellowness, and brokenness, "is there any principle involved in having things look like this? Temperance people need not necessarily be stuffy, and dusty, and shabby. If they want custom, why don't they keep such a house as people will patronise?"

"Sometimes there's a good deal of principle in that very thing, child. A man has got to have the money to make a house elegant in the first place, and keep it so afterwards; and often he's got to earn the money before he can have it, and if his principles won't let him earn it by selling rum—which I have heard is altogether the quickest and easiest way—and if you and I ain't got principles enough to stand his broken-nosed pitchers, and cracked looking-glasses, so as to help him earn money for better things, why, he won't be likely to get on very fast. I like nice things, child, but I like clean consciences better. I'm sorry for Jonas; his principles ain't skin deep, anyhow, and his conscience is tough, and his stomach is tender, and he'll likely have a hard time of it here; I'm sorry for all of us for having made an uncomfortable time all round; it is the most uncomfortable time I ever remember to have had in my life, and I'd have given my best Alderney cow to get out of it; but I was in and I didn't know no way out; as true as you live I didn't. I'm an old goose, maybe; an opinionated old foolish thing, but I couldn't no more set there and drink that tea out of a china cup, and stir it with a silver spoon, and think of that boy of Jonas' lying dead drunk in his father's parlour only last night, and mo a-sitting one side of him and his father the other a-groaning out in agony every few minutes, and me helping to pay for the rum that went to make him so, than I could fly up through that chimney-hole this minute. I couldn't do it!"

She looked worn and haggard with the weight of her trouble, and with the trouble which she had made for others, which last was at all times harder for Mrs. Smith than anything that she had to bear for herself. I could feel that as she turned away from Laura's unanswering eyes and sighed heavily—she was thinking what a blessed haven of rest that little house in the Hollow would be to her, with Solomon at the hearth-side.

I did not know what to think of Laura; for the first time since we left home, she seemed to have deserted her old friend. Her eyes flashed their vexation, and she shut her lips tightly as though she had just enough self-control left to resist to keep silence. One might have supposed that her whole heart was set in favour of the liquor traffic, instead of having been all her life an earnest temperance worker. I felt very much puzzled. I could not think that the luxuries of life had suddenly grown so important to her that she could not dispense with them for one night; for, like most sensible girls, reared in comfortable and harmonising surroundings, she had not given them such a high place that she could not cheerfully, and even gleefully, share the annoyances and discomforts of travel, or of anything that disturbed the usual routine.

Altogether, the rest of our journey was not pleasant. The breakfast did well enough; the steak was somewhat tough, to be sure, and the coffee slightly muddy, but if everything had not been made so uncomfortable by Mr. Smith's sarcasms and Laura's silence, we should have got along nicely. As it was, I was glad certainly to bid the gentleman good-bye, and Mrs. Smith curled herself into a seat in the car with a long-drawn sigh of relief, after his somewhat stiff good-bye to her.

Fancy a man saying good-bye stiffly to a woman who had been what she had in his household, for weary days and nights, week after week, simply because by her conscientious scruples she disturbed the luxury of one night's rest! I felt angry with him, and provoked with Laura, and left her much to herself.

As our train rolled into the familiar depot and Mrs. Smith, peering from the window, caught a glimpse of the high, old-fashioned waggon, plentifully besprinkled with mud, and of Solomon, in his much-too-long grey coat standing beside it, watching eagerly the moving car windows, I shall never forget the radiant face that turned to me, nor the triumphant voice that said,—

"There he is! the best sight that my old eyes have seen in a year—it seems most a year, don't it? I declare for it, I hope it won't be made my duty to trot round this world any more without Solomon; I don't like it!"

I laughed, but Laura was persistently cold and silent. The child had never tried me so much in all her life put together, as she had during this journey.

I think I showed a little of this feeling as we talked over, with her father and Mary, the episode of the hotel; for Laura, without being directly censured, arose to the defensive.

"I don't care, mamma, I still think it was very silly and selfish in Mrs. Solomon, and I shall always think so.

The idea that her money was helping along the sale of liquor, just because she was stopping at an hotel, and paying for just what she consumed, and nothing more. What had she to do with the liquor? She might as well refuse to stop in the world any longer, because there was rum-selling, and Sabbath-breaking, and I don't know what not. So long as she doesn't do it, and can't keep others from doing it, what is it to her?"

Now Laura was not usually so illogical as that; in fact her father had often playfully told her that he ought to educate her for the bar; she would make her mark as a lawyer; and I was more surprised than I can tell you. Her reasoning seemed too absurd even to require an answer; so absurd, indeed, that Mary laughed, as she said pleasantly,—

"Why, Laura! you are on exactly the opposite side from what I should have expected, and, besides, have certainly forgotten how to argue. Of course it really is countenancing the sale of liquor in hotels to patronise them; in fact, it apparently accepts the popular argument that first-class hotels cannot be kept without the sale of liquor. And so we submit to having liquor pay half of our first-classness. Doesn't it, papa?"

"Looks like it," said her father, sipping his coffee, and evidently enjoying the argument of his daughters too much to care to cut it short by helping them. But Laura was excited.

"Well, why can't," she said sharply, ignoring her father's remark. "Look at the condition of the temperance hotels; first-class indeed! I wish you could have been with us last night. Even the soaps were third-class, and the thin coating of silver all worn from the spoons, and, papa, you couldn't cut the steak with a sharp knife, even!"

"But what does that prove," persisted Mary, "save that it is a humiliating truth that we are allowing the poor fellows who drink liquor to pay part of our bills? I should think that was helping along the liquor traffic with a vengeance; and I should think that if it is really so we would better get along with third-class soaps, and take our own, and even eat tough steak once in a while, or else patronise temperance houses so exclusively, and at such good prices, that they can soon afford another state of things."

"Does Malcolm stop at temperance houses wherever he goes?" was Laura's apparently irrelevant reply, and Mary, with a slightly heightened colour, answered laughing, that she presumed not; she imagined that he had never given the matter any thought; but she would write to him about it immediately, and give him Aunt Smith's views; and she believed in his temperance principles so thoroughly that she thought him willing to give up toilet soap and tender steak altogether, if necessary, and that it was one of the advantages in having Aunt Smith's conscience in the world; it roused other people's conscience altogether too tender in some directions, and that she had shown herself to be obstinate and selfish.

"Well, I think so, mamma," she said, with a defiant little flash in her bright eyes, as she caught my reproving look. "She doesn't care for little daintinesses herself, isn't it, in fact, accustomed to them as we are, and as her brother-in-law is, and so of course there was nothing special for her to give up. She cares for just one person in this world, and that is her Solomon, and so long as her conscience doesn't touch him in any way, nor waste his money, she is willing to ride into all sorts of discomfort and take other people with her, without caring how hard it presses them. I should like to see a question of conscience come up that would affect Solomon's welfare in any way. I think she would discover that she is selfish in her crosses, and that in reality she doesn't know much about them."

I couldn't understand Laura. Her eyes were bright, her cheeks burning, and her lips were quivering. She was evidently strongly wrought upon, and had apparently gone over entirely to the enemy's side. Mary looked at her wonderingly.

"One w artisan," et scholar
you caught and!" T

But Laur
"I am ju ans," she ought to be
ide. And the man wh
all these si sciences are keep on bec anatical. I selves about ust the on amel," if th swallow; i ble." M

All day, p es, growing ame this u disturbed an were alone t
with a single
"Has Laur
is surplus fr
"No. We
ickness, and o speak of b My tone w ally, how unds? He ten believed

"In hotel s hen I unders

"AND ORMA
inte fathe mom tempt to thi
ough at vari gs, and her m out of th
s. Smith's e with his irria can should rong that No n, had failed Solomon wron
As soon as I er, though I woman's cour
The truth is ould, Norman ve chosen for should occup
friendship, science come walk from so d algebra, fri interest in each part of belong the same pur
When Norman coherent carele er father had wisc; but I aura was just helping along the sale of topping at an hotel, an umed, and nothing more quor? She might as we y longer, because there king, and I don't know n't do it, and can't keep to her?"

illogical as that; in fact told her that he ought to ould make her mark as sed than I can tell you urd even to require a t Mary laughed, as she exactly the opposite side ected, and, besides, have

. Of course it really n in hotels to patronise cepts the popular argunt be kept without the nmit to having liquor Doesn't it, papa?"

or, sipping his coffee, an t of his daughters to elping them. But Laura sharply, ignoring her condition of the temper-I wish you could have e soaps were third-class d worn from the spoons steak with a sharp knife persisted Mary, "say at we are allowing the o pay part of our bills along the liquor traffithink that if it is really third-class soaps, or h steak once in a while uses so exclusively, and can soon afford another erance houses where ly irrelevant reply, an ned colour, answered

; she imagined that he ought; but she would y, and give him Aunt n his temperance prin-ght him willing to give together, if necessary tages in having Aunt t roused other people thought Auntie Smith n some directions, an bstantiate and selfish.
he said, with a defiant e caught my reproving le daintiness herself as we are, and as he er, though I was nothing res for just one perso-on, and so long as he ny way, nor waste his all sorts of discomfort thout caring how hard see a question of con-Solomon's welfare in ver that she is selfish he doesn't know much

Her eyes were bright were quivering. She on, and had apparently side. Mary looked at

"One would think you were an anti-temperance artisan," she said, "instead of being your grandfather's set scholar in 'no-licence' arguments. Laura, I believe you caught the fever from Lida, and are out of your head!" This last with a half-laugh.

But Laura did not smile.
"I am just as strong a temperance woman as ever I was," she said firmly, "and I'm as strong as anybody ought to be. I simply try to keep common sense on my side. And I say it is the man who sells the liquor, and the man who drinks it, who are to blame, and no others.
All these side issues, wandering round to see if our con-sciences are mixed up with it, because we eat steak, and sleep on beds in hotels, is all nonsense. It is just being categorical. I believe that the people who trouble themselves about other people's consciences in this way are just the ones who will 'strain at a gnat and swallow a camel,' if the camel takes the shape that they would like to swallow; and Mrs. Smith will do it as quickly as any of them." Whereupon she abruptly left the breakfast-table.

All day, pressed upon by many cares and responsibilities, growing out of my long absence from home, there came this undertone of anxiety: "What can have so disturbed and altered Laura?" That evening, when we were alone together, my husband answered the question with a single sentence.

"Has Laura told you how Norman has at last invested his surplus funds?"

"No. We have been so excited with weddings, and sickness, and travelling, that we have had no opportunity to speak of business together. How has he?"

My tone was somewhat indifferent. What did I care, really, how Norman Eastlake had invested his surplus funds? He had money enough, too much; indeed, I had often believed that he would be more of a man if he had less.

"In hotel stock," said my husband significantly. And then I understood Laura!

CHAPTER XXII.

"AND BEHOLD, THEY WERE ENGAGED!"

NORMAN EASTLAKE was my daughter Laura's intended husband. You can readily see how her father's announcement enlightened me. In a moment I saw it all—the poor child's sensitive tempt to think that what her friend did must be right, though at variance with all her previous views and teachings, and her determination to sustain him, and argue him out of the inconsistency. I could understand how Mrs. Smith's extreme action had wrought upon her nerves with its irritating question as to why that ignorant old man should be able to reach conclusions of right and wrong that Norman, with all his culture and logical education, had failed to see. Of course he was right, and Mrs.
Solomon wrong—it should be so!

As soon as I understood my poor child I was sorry for her, though I cannot say that I was greatly astonished at Norman's course.

The truth is that, could I have had things just as I would, Norman Eastlake was not the man whom I should have chosen for my son-in-law. I had never meant that he should occupy such a position. It had been a boy and girl friendship, not so very strongly marked. They liked to walk from school together, and were rivals in rhetoric and algebra, friendly rivals always; I thought that their interest in each other was nothing more than the natural one of belonging to the same classes, and being interested in the same pursuits.

When Norman went to college, I had been foolish enough to consent carelessly to their interchange of friendly letters.
My father had shook his head, and asked me if I thought wise; but I had only laughed, and assured him that Laura was just a gay child, and would correspond with him as joyously and as innocently as she would with her brother if she had one; and I remember that I added that Norman was a sentimental boy, who thought it would be a fine thing to get letters regularly from a pretty girl; it would give him a sense of madness, which secretly I thought he needed.

So the years passed on, and before I fully realised that Laura had for ever laid aside her doll, and romped with her kitten no more, she came to me one day with glowing cheeks and speaking eyes, and a letter to show me—a special letter—she had always showed them to me, and they had been gay and careless enough, but this one was written after Laura had been spending a month with an aunt in the same town where Norman was at school, and behold, they were engaged! Norman had taken everything in his free and easy fashion. "They will be expecting it," he had said to Laura. "Of course your father and mother knew the end of all these things; they have as good as given their consent already, we need not trouble to be very formal."

Had we? Yes, I thought it all over afterwards, many a time afterwards. Norman was right; we had allowed things to drift, exactly as though we had expected they would go down just the channel that they had; and yet I had never expected it, never meant it, would have given much, very much, to have taken it all back; I had simply made the mistake that I think many mothers are making now—that of calling two young things "children," and letting them play on together, long after the childishness had been in a sense laid aside, and they were playing at man and woman, without recognising it as play.

Well, what objection had we to Norman Eastlake? We asked each other the question—her father and I—he, looking with troubled face into the coals, staring straight before him all that hour, and never by word or look hinting to me that hateful "I told you so," yet, do you think I forgot that he had! Oh, there were many objections! Norman was of good family? Yes. He was a good-hearted, well-intentioned fellow? Yes. He was a fair scholar, and would be likely to succeed fairly well in his profession? Yes. He was rich? Yes. Unhesitatingly I answered all these questions to my heart in the affirmative; and yet I did not want him for Laura's husband. Well, did I want anybody? No, I didn't. I recognised that, as in part, the trouble. Laura was a child yet; ought to have been. I resented her being defrauded of her fresh young girlhood, and being pushed thus early into the responsibilities of life. Why couldn't they at least have been content to remain boy and girl friends for a few years? Why must Norman suddenly go to imagining himself a man?

"Norman is a Christian?" said Laura's father at last, hesitatingly, with a curious upward inflection in his voice.

I answered the questioning sentence with another: "Is he?"

"Why, Mary, you know he has been a professor of religion ever since he was a little fellow!"

"I know it," I said, and if Laura had heard me I suppose she would have resented the drabness of my tone.
But therein lay one of my troubles; Norman was by no means the sort of Christian that I thought he ought to be; he was simply a free-hearted, good-natured, easy-going, social young fellow, lacking, I believed, in moral backbone. I had never seen him tried, to be sure. His tastes did not run in the line of dissipation; his friends did not happen to be of the stamp that led him astray, and his reputation was therefore exceptionally good. I believe in that word "therefore." I have put the hint of how the matter stood in my own mind. I had not unwavering confidence in Norman's self; his virtues seemed to have happened around him, creatures of circumstance, rather than of choice, based on conviction. I remember as long ago as when he united with the Church, in company with a large number of young people, just after a period of special religious interest, it seemed to me rather that he came because all the boys in his set were coming than because he had taken firm foothold on the Rock. I had all along felt that little undertone of distrust, not of his good intentions, but of the soil on which they were growing. He had been a boy who was easily persuaded to go sleigh-riding, or rowing, as the case might be, on prayer-meeting evening, if the other boys were going, and almost equally easily persuaded that it was not just the thing to do, if enough of the others thought not, which little illustration just serves to show his moral power. Imagine such an one the husband of my Laura, with her quick, keen insight into all questions, mental or moral. I had small comfort in thinking that she could lead him, for I believed that, like all weak natures, his was also an obstinate one; it could take a position and maintain it stoutly against reason and common sense, if the motive for doing so was sufficiently inviting. Besides, I felt confident that Laura was not a woman to lead her husband and live a happy life; she was too strong-willed for that, in the better sense of that word. I felt sure that, in order to respect him, she must look up to him and believe in his superior strength. Then how in the name of wonder was she to be happy with the man of her choice? Over this problem her father and I grieved much, after we settled to the mournful truth that she was unquestionably a woman at heart, and that he was unquestionably the man of her choice. At last it became apparent to us that it was to be done by shutting her eyes and assuring herself that the strength was there, and that she might lean on it. I hoped that she mercifully did not know her eyes were shut. If she could always live in a state of real blindness as to Norman's character—provided my estimate of it were correct—she might be a comparatively happy woman. But there had, in the past year, been several little episodes like this hotel affair, which had told me only too clearly that Laura sometimes saw painful things, even with closed eyes. The temperance question had been one on which I believed that Norman stood more squarely than on any other, for the reason that his father had been a pioneer in that direction in the dark days of the struggle, and Norman had admired his father; yet it will explain to you how little real confidence I had in the young man, that after the first start of surprise I asked my husband simply who it was who had succeeded in persuading Norman that very safe investments were made in hotel stock, and that morally it was all right.

After all, I don't think I have made this matter very plain. You see, you don't know Norman Eastlake; if you did you would understand. There was really no ground for complaint; look at him outwardly from any standpoint that you chose, he was unexceptionable; and I was not sure, any of the time, but that the boy was a Christian, only a limping sort of one, if he chanced among cripples; and Laura was not even that. We could not appeal to her need for a higher type of Christian manhood, we could not appeal to anything; and when we hesitated and urged, there was nothing to argue that could be put into words, save that she, and he, too, for the matter of that, were so very young.

"We shall be growing older every day," she said gravely. "People grow old fast enough. And, mamma, I know you don't like Norman—that is, you don't like him well enough to marry him—that is plain, I have seen it this long time. But there is this to be said about it; I do, and I'm the one, you know."

What could we answer?

So, for more than a year it had been an understood thing in our family that Laura was the promised wife of Norman Eastlake. He was an orphan, and was most unnecessarily wealthy.

There were always surplus funds coming in to torment him as to investment; and it was probably to escape the bore of looking any further that he had become half owner in one of the princely hotels in the city where he was studying his profession. Laura's father had heard of it through his lawyer, who had been engaged in the legal part of the business; but directly he mentioned it, I knew that Laura had heard it from Norman, and accepted it as the thing to do, or else Norman wouldn't have done it!

Because of the example of Christian life thus before her, I had been surprised that Laura had espoused Mrs. Smith's peculiar views on many subjects so heartily. My conclusion had been that she believed the difference in them to be largely one of development, and that Norman would grow into what was now Mrs. Smith's daily life.

This being the case, it was not difficult to understand what a shock the hotel enterprise had been to her. That was not development, surely! He had been pronounced enough on the entire temperance question when she saw him last; not exactly this phase of it, to be sure; and I believed that this would always be the difference between Laura's mind and Norman Eastlake's. Questions parallel to those already settled would by her be accepted as matters of course, while Norman would have to argue himself in or out of each new development, and would likely to decide negatively about one, and affirmative about the other of two phases which to Laura appeared as one and the same.

I plainly saw that the problem which she had now set herself was to convince her heart and her conscience that in this new departure Norman was right and Mrs. Smith absurdly wrong. I knew it was not yet settled, because her irritation still continued in full force. She argued at length with Mary that our dear old lady might be very good, but she was narrow-minded. Of course she was why should she not be? All her life experiences had tended to make her so. Also, this wise woman of nineteen was convinced that the woman of sixty-five did not understand herself. She had never been tried in a direction that would press home. "Her children's graves," ventured to hint; and the foolish child, who knew nothing about a mother's heart, said, Yes, but that was long ago; and she had been so busy about her energetic life that she really had not had time to miss them much, and she did not believe, anyway, that they had ever been to her what some daughters were to mothers—she had given all her heart to Solomon, and had none left for others; and certainly for twenty years at least she had not had a ripple of personal trouble to disturb her; wonder she was able to settle questions of conscience for all creation! I gave over trying to argue with Laura what was the use?

Nevertheless it was she who, one evening, after Norman in a new dressing-gown of most becoming pattern, at my slipper—the gift of a sister of one of his college friends—had lounged among us for two or three days, made a proposition that surprised me.

"Mamma, I want Norman to make the acquaintance of Mr. and Mrs. Smith. Suppose we go over there this evening for an hour? They are original characters; Norman; you will enjoy studying them."

And Norman gracefully declared that he could not conceive of himself as enjoying anything better than to sit in that easy chair, with his feet on the hearthrug, at that delightful open grate fire to stare at, to say nothing of his companions; at the same time he was ready to attend us to the ends of the earth if such was our pleasure.

Mary was at this time much absorbed in a missionary entertainment that was being got up by the Young Ladies Band of our Church, she being President of the Band. On the evening in question there was a Committee Meeting and rehearsal at the other end of the town, as her father had attended her thither, and was to await her pleasure. Therefore I was thrown upon Laura as Norman for the evening; at least, Laura chose to consider me so, not being willing that her mother should sit alone while she entertained her guest in the parlour. It was one of the pretty little ways in which my young daughter differed from many young ladies of the present day.

I glanced up surprised at her suggestion. She had not been to call on Mrs. Smith since our return home, nearly six weeks before; and though of course we had long since dropped all discussion in regard to the matter, I was aware that she had not grown reconciled to the old lady nit conder ondered w bject of t rance fans

the cour of silenced
ung man.

Whatever receive it
dly hurt t arly; and Norman th
ally did n
"I remem awl, which nder that nes, could
"I remera town on appointed in ed I was
imals. I could do for ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

I hope he was disapp
"They cou
r sole comm
"Oh, they
a long-go
we quote
rs. Leonar
them should have been r
least every ys." It too
ound a new
e days of S
I spent so
aura also sa
e expected t Laura was
ainly showe
"I think, I
most tax yo
e to say 'Mr
There was a
herent Norm
the little b

ed I was
imals. I
could do for
ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

I hope he was disapp
"They cou
r sole comm
"Oh, they
a long-go
we quote
rs. Leonar
them should have been r
least every ys." It too
ound a new
e days of S
I spent so
aura also sa
e expected t Laura was
ainly showe
"I think, I
most tax yo
e to say 'Mr
There was a
herent Norm
the little b

ed I was
imals. I
could do for
ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

I hope he was disapp
"They cou
r sole comm
"Oh, they
a long-go
we quote
rs. Leonar
them should have been r
least every ys." It too
ound a new
e days of S
I spent so
aura also sa
e expected t Laura was
ainly showe
"I think, I
most tax yo
e to say 'Mr
There was a
herent Norm
the little b

ed I was
imals. I
could do for
ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

I hope he was disapp
"They cou
r sole comm
"Oh, they
a long-go
we quote
rs. Leonar
them should have been r
least every ys." It too
ound a new
e days of S
I spent so
aura also sa
e expected t Laura was
ainly showe
"I think, I
most tax yo
e to say 'Mr
There was a
herent Norm
the little b

ed I was
imals. I
could do for
ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

I hope he was disapp
"They cou
r sole comm
"Oh, they
a long-go
we quote
rs. Leonar
them should have been r
least every ys." It too
ound a new
e days of S
I spent so
aura also sa
e expected t Laura was
ainly showe
"I think, I
most tax yo
e to say 'Mr
There was a
herent Norm
the little b

ed I was
imals. I
could do for
ould have t
e belonged
limbing over
e."

Christian life thus kept that Laura had espoused many subjects so heartily he believed the difference development, and that it was now Mrs. Smith not difficult to understand had been to her. The He had been pronounced the question when she of it, to be sure; and be the difference between ke's. Questions parallel by her be accepted an would have to argue development, and would at one, and affirmative which to Laura appear a which she had now t and her conscience that was right and Mrs. Smith not yet settled, because full force. She argued old lady might be ver Of course she was her life experiences ha this wise woman of nin ever of sixty-five did never been tried in a dire her children's graves, olish child, who kne said, Yes, but that w busy about her energ time to miss them muc that they had ever be to mothers—she ha
 , and had none left f years at least she ha ble to disturb her; r questions of conscience f to argue with Laura evening, after Norma becoming pattern, an r of one of his colle for two or three day
 me.
 take the acquaintance we go over there th are original character y them."
 red that he could ne anything better than on the hearthrug, an stare at, to say noth time he was ready earth if such was co eorbed in a missionar up by the Young Ladie President of the Ban ere was a Committe end of the town, an r, and was to await h own upon Laura an Laura chose to consid mother should sit alon in the parlour. It wa in which my young
 g ladies of the prese ggestion. She had n her return home, near ourse we had long sin to the matter, I w
 nced to the old lady cit condemnation of Norman's course. I remember I ondered whether she had in mind an argument on the bject of temperance, and temperance work, and tem perance fanaticism, to be held in my neighbour's kitchen, the course of which the neighbour should find her self silenced and convinced by the brilliant logic of the young man.

 Whatever motive provoked the suggestion, I was glad to receive it, for I knew her absence and coldness had really hurt the heart of her true old friend who loved her dearly; and with alacrity I laid aside my sewing, assuring Norman that we had a special treat in store for him if he really did not remember Solomon Smith and his wife.
 "I remember them perfectly," he said in his cultured drawl, which was growing upon him, and which I used to wonder that Laura, with her quick ways and her clear-cut ones, could endure.
 "I remember the queer old waggon in which they rode to town on market days and Sundays. It used to be associated in my juvenile mind with stories of the ark, and I was always contriving how to stow away the animals. I remember I decided that old Solomon himself could do for an ape, but I could never be sure whether I could have the old lady a species of monkey, or whether she belonged to the cat kind; she had a curious way of limbing over the wheel that suggested the feline tribe to me."
 I hope he had not expected Laura to laugh; if he had,
 he was disappointed.
 "They could not have been very old at that time," was her sole comment.
 "Oh, they were, I assure you; they were always old.
 As long ago as I can remember, they were quoted from as we quote the wise sayings of the oldest inhabitant.
 Mrs. Leonard, there is no reason why my knowledge of them should not be fresh and vivid. In the letters which I have been receiving from a certain person this winter, at least every third sentence began thus: 'Auntie Smith says.' It took me weeks to determine where she had found a new aunt; naturally I did not associate her with the days of Solomon. When light finally dawned upon me, I spent some anxious moments in wondering whether Laura also said 'Uncle Solomon,' and whether I should be expected to learn such a formidable name." Laura was still grave, and the flush on her cheeks plainly showed me that she was tried by all this banter.
 "I think, Norman," she said with dignity, "that the most tax your nerves will receive in that direction will be to say 'Mr. Smith.'" There was a somewhat marked emphasis on the "Mr.," whereat Norman laughed, and then we three proceeded to the little brown house in the Hollow.

CHAPTER XXIII.

"SHO! THAT ARGUMENT UPSETS ITSELF!"

HERE was something wonderfully pleasant about Mrs. Smith's kitchen. In the strictest sense of the word, it was not a kitchen at all, all the rougher household work having been banished, with the large cooking-stove, to a small outer room; but the Smiths liked the homely, old-fashioned name, and hung to it for this larger room.
 A wonderfully bright rag-carpet adorned the floor, a carpet that was in truth an artistic study, the colours having been arranged with the greatest care, and with a special regard to brightness. The whitewashed walls were hung with many pictures; some of them cheap prints, many of them really fine engravings, the hoarded treasures of years. They hung in cheap frames, or were merely tacked to the walls, but every one of them, whether cheap or fine, was in itself a treasure. Then the chairs were as unlike as possible to the usual kitchen furniture—in fact, as my Mary said, they were unlike themselves. No two were mates, and yet they were not an incongruous happening of different patterns. Each one was a study.

 Solomon's special property was a somewhat high, wide-seated, wooden-backed creature, with spring castors in front, and none at the back, which gave it a curious swinging motion. It was upholstered in a brilliant cushion of small and intricate patchwork, containing—so Mrs. Smith triumphantly informed me once—a bit of every woollen dress she ever wore from the time she was a year-old baby, and Solomon remembered those in which he used to draw her to school on his sleigh.
 Her chair was a low-seated, high-backed arm rocker, upholstered also with home work, but in sober hne, being decorous stripes of grey and black woollen, fashioned of strips from Solomon's worn-out coats and pantaloons.
 Then there was my special chair, a flag-bottomed rocker of the olden style, with a peculiarly easy back, and a gay cushion stuffed with feathers from Mrs. Smith's own geese, and covered with bright strips of her own knitting.
 Laura's favourite, a white-flagged, green-painted little sewing-chair, sat up pert and sparkling against the wall, one or two respectable, broad-banded, very old-fashioned "splints" keeping it company.
 The Smiths, like ourselves, were very fond of opengrate fires, and clung to them as late in the season as the weather would admit. But, unlike ourselves, they were blessed with an old-fashioned fireplace, wherein the traditional back-log could blaze and snap and sparkle as in the olden time. I never wondered over Solomon's fondness for poking the coals—he had such a royal chance in that great wide-mouthed fireplace.
 Into this cosy room, with a bed of coals and brands in just the right state for poking, we were ushered on that spring evening. The small, square stand, just large enough to hold the lamp and a book or two, besides the Bible which always lay on it, and generally open, was drawn quite near to the hearth, "just for the sake of being sociable," Mrs. Smith said. I had heard her remark that she felt sorry for the fireplace when spring grew late. It kind of seemed to her it must know that its shining was over, and that it must lie in blackness and shadow for a long, long time. "We sit close up to it as long as we can, and make its last fires as bright as the spring weather will anyways stand," she had said with a half-regretful smile.
 There they sat together; Solomon in his chair on the hearth, his feet spread out on the bright, braided mat; his wife just opposite him, not so far away but that she could lean forward, on occasion, and rest an emphatic hand on his knee; her inevitable knitting in her lap, but a book in her hand, and an Evangelist which had apparently just slipped from her lap to the floor.
 I remember thinking, as I took my special chair, that the whole bright, homely scene would make a picture for an artist. My Laura had an artist's soul, and I could see her eyes brighten and soften with the beauty of it all; but those other eyes saw a reflection of the ape and monkey caricature which he had tried to draw for us, I suppose. At least, they showed no appreciation of the sweet homeliness to which we had introduced him. I do not think I ever liked my prospective son-in-law less than I did that evening.
 We were most cordially received. Mrs. Smith's homely old face glowed genially over the sight of Laura at her hearthstone again; yet, with the rare tact which was so marked a trait in her character, she made no comment on the length of time that the child had stayed away.
 She was equally cordial in receiving Norman, and told him with a smile which should have redeemed her face from all ugliness in his eyes, that she used to know his father well, and a better man never lived in the town.
 "You've got his eyes," she said earnestly, "and I hope and trust you have his good heart." He was pleasant enough, though he thanked her with too much ceremoniousness for her good opinion of his father, and disclaimed all expectation—I had almost said all intention—of ever being so good a son as his father.
 Then Mrs. Smith, brimful of talk, as usual, went back to the subject that had evidently occupied her thoughts when we came.

"I was just taking dips into the New Version, and Solomon and I were talking over some of the changes. We haven't had it but a little while. I brought it home with me, you know." (This to Laura.) "Well, sir, and what do you think of the New Version?"

I waited somewhat anxiously for Norman's answer. I had not enough faith in his religious life to believe that he had made a very careful study of either the New or the Old Version for some time; but he was a man who always had opinions to express, whether or not he had them at hand to live by.

"I think," he said with promptness, "that it represents a great deal of time and money wasted, which might have been used to better advantage."

Mrs. Smith was evidently astonished at the answer.

"Why? Do you, now?" she said eagerly. "I can't think it. I have been waiting for that book to come out as eager as a little girl for a new dolly. Seemed to me I couldn't wait till they got it ready, though as it happened I did, and a good while after. The Lord filled my hands so full of work of one kind and another that I hadn't time for no New Versions; but when I got hold of it I was tickled. Seems to me that whatever makes the Bible a mite plainer to plain people can't be a waste of time or money, can it?"

"But has it made it any plainer?" queried Norman. "I don't know of anything in it that amounts to much in the way of plainness, I'm sure."

And again I could not help wondering whether he really knew what was in it.

"Oh, I do," the old lady said, in quiet positiveness. "We've found some things, haven't we, Solomon? When you come in we had just been talking 'bout the Lord's Prayer. Now, I's pose if there is any one thing we ought to understand pretty well, it's them verses of the prayer we've been praying ever since we got in and out of our cradles; and yet I don't think I understood it till I got hold of the New Version. I've about held my breath over that Prayer a good many times; in a kind of a scare, you know. The fact is, I've been a peppery body all my life. There's Solomon knows I could go off as quick as a lucifer match; quicker a good deal than the worthless things they make nowadays."

"Oh, now, Maria, sho!"

These were the first words that Solomon had uttered since he had given us greeting. After this effort he leaned forward and poked the firebrand so effectually that it sent up a shower of sparks.

"It's so," said his wife. "That's been my thorn in the flesh all my life, and will be something of a thorn, I'm afraid, as long as I have any flesh; and by streaks I find it most awful hard to forgive folks; mean, snakey folks, you know, that slip about doing slimy things. Not to me specially, though I've borne my share of slime in my day, but kind of general slipping about, doing of things that you hate. You know what I mean."

"Well, I've come to that before now, many a time, when I've just had to hold my breath and think: 'Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors!' Says I, 'Hold on, Mrs. Solomon Smith, do you really want that? Are you sure you want the Lord to forgive you just exactly as you've forgiven Susan Barker?'"

"She was a young woman that tried me most awful in her time; for about two years she was a regular thorn. She's been in heaven these dozen years; I've no kind of doubt of it. I was with her when she went, and I know the Lord sent His angels, and they were waiting all around there before she died. Think of me having hard work to forgive her, just because she had made some mistakes, said things here and there she had no business to, and gone quite a while without takin' of 'em back; and I acting as though I'd never done nothing wrong in my life, couldn't see my way clear to forgiving her! But that's just the kind of mean creatures we are."

"Well, many's the time she's given me a stab, right on my knees, and I'd wait, and I'd have to own up: 'No, Lord, I don't believe I can do it; I believe I want better forgiveness from you than I've given to her, feel kind of gronty this minute when I think of her and there were days at a time when I'd slip round the prayer all on account of Susan Barker. And she was the only one, either. There were times when I had quite a number of them that didn't do right, or say right, and seemed to be bothering me as sure as I got down on my knees to pray that particular prayer!"

Over this frank statement Norman roared. He was entirely capable of seeing the ludicrous side of a question. "But I'm utterly unable to see what the New Version has to do with this trouble," he said, as soon as he could command his voice.

"Why, don't you see what I did? I had just seemed enough to know that it would be an awful thing to pray to God to forgive me as I'd forgiven my botherers, if I hadn't done my part just right; and so I thought I could make it all right by slipping round the Lord's Prayer, not making up one of my own, and leaving them out of altogether, till I got ready to right down out and out for give them in the fashion that I saw plain enough the Lord must forgive me, if it was going to do me any good. But now look at the New Version: 'Forgive us our debts as we also have forgiven our debtors.' Don't you see that shows the work is all done? It is just plain sailing 'Lord, I've forgiven Susan Barker the best I know how now forgive me.'

"I don't know as I make my meaning plain; but it's most dreadful plain to me that there's no slipping round it. The Lord's Prayer don't make us ask the Lord to treat us just exactly as we have done our enemies, but it says in plain English, 'We've done our best. We forgive them before we come to our knees.'

"I dunno as you see through it. I'm not good at making other folks understand; but I know if I'd had the New Version while I was on thorns with Susan Barker, I'd have understood that leaving out the Lord's Prayer didn't do no good; that He expected us to forgive before we come to Him with any prayer at all about any thing else. And if we hadn't done it, and couldn't do it every living thing we had the right to pray about was 'Lord, give me the heart to forgive them; and let that be settled before we talked to Him about forgiving us. The I am glad, for one, that they put Satan into that prayer."

"Put Satan into it!" repeated Norman, with an astonished stare, and then going off into a perfect roar of laughter, while Laura exclaimed as to what her friend could mean.

"Why, yes, child, put him there himself in so many words: 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil: that's the way we've prayed it, you know. Now I'm an ignorant old woman and didn't understand it, and that's what I say, the New Version is good for such a man—I couldn't seem to make it mean anything but this: 'Lead us not into temptation, but if we do succeed in getting in in spite of you, why, deliver us from the evil of it. That don't sound reverent, maybe. I mean it reverent, but I didn't understand it. Now I pray: 'Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from the evil one. Him that's for ever after us, going about like a roaring lion, and liking nothing in life so much as to lead us right into the thickest temptation he can. Deliver us from him.' 'Amen,' I say with all my heart; and when I speak him right out on my knees to Christ, and recognise him as an awful enemy, I seem to understand the thing that for this purpose was the Son of man manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and I somehow feel sure that He can do it. But now there's something I want to ask you. I saw the other day in a paper that some folks thought it was a kind of triumph for the infidels and scoffers that we had got out a New Version, and I don't see how it can be. What's does that mean?"

"It is true," said Norman briskly—the young man liked to impart information as well as any person I ever saw—"you see it plainly proves what they have been saying all along, that our old Bible is full of errors, and that we have outgrown it, and are dissatisfied with it.

And, say this New Version until he gets too much trouble to think "That is the New Version a few changes about those herenaries; a infidels that have a new good that the Norman did

Smith was eager attent

who had a desire to say

"Sho! I was wise." It was said this. "That we don't can't get it. changes don't a little plain infidels been dunno how mistakes; ne popinjay just to you about in our trans scholars was part of their what have th changed a hell road to hell i in the old; to the other beginning, and was, and then see it; and it with the old that he's a f Whereupon a hitherto amou Mrs. Smith as he sat back roused out of that Solomon ape, had let s into the room Laura mov the New Vers did. It was not; though would have n believe in it, have given it repeating wor thing that had worsted in arg I thought it

"What new Solomon, ind feet.

"THEY

HY, pap

pap

rea

which made r it; I believe I want an I've given to her. e when I think of her. I'd slip round the Barker. And she was times when I had quite right, or say right, and sure as I got down on my Norman roared. He was on the other side of a question what the New Version said, as soon as he could did? I had just seen an awful thing to pray given my bothersers, if and so I thought I could the Lord's Prayer, and leaving them out of t down out and out for plain enough the Lord g to do me any good. 'Forgive us our debtors.' Don't you see that is just plain sailing r the best I know how meaning plain; but it there's no slipping round like us ask the Lord to one our enemies, but it e our best. We forgive it. I'm not good as but I know if I'd had on thorns with Susan leaving out the Lord's expected us to forgive prayer at all about any it, and couldn't do it to pray about was them; and let that be out forgiving us. Then atan into that prayer. Norman, with an as into a perfect roar of as to what her friend

o himself in so many on, but deliver us from it, you know. Now n't understand it, and n is good for such as anything but this if we do succeed in iver us from the evil e, maybe. I mean it. Now I pray: 'Lead us from the evil one about like a roaring ch as to lead us right an. Deliver us from heart; and when I Christ, and recognise understand the thing, f man manifested to I somehow feel surer something I want to a paper that some mp for the infidels New Version, and I e that mean?"

ly—the young man as any person I ever that they have been is full of errors, and dissatisfied with it.

And, say they, 'in a few years you will have outgrown this New Version, and you will need another, and another; and the thing will go on, as man increases in knowledge, until he gets a Bible to suit him.' And there is altogether too much truth in the fling to have it in any sense agreeable to thinking people.

"That is my objection. The fact is, we didn't need a New Version; the old one was good enough. There are a few changes, which, as you say, make things plainer, but those have been explained again and again by commentaries; and to put an argument into the mouths of infidels that we had outgrown our old Bible and had to have a new one made for us, has overbalanced all the good that the slight changes might have done."

Norman delivered this lecture with the air of one who had settled an important question for all time. Mrs. Smith was leaning forward in an attitude of fixed and eager attention. Her lips moved several times, as one who had a great deal to say, and was burning with the desire to say it, yet she did not interrupt him.

"Sho! that argument upsets itself! knocks it end-wise." It was the slow, grave voice of Solomon that said this. "We need a New Version to show them folks that we don't want a new Bible, and haven't got one, and can't get it. Don't you see you've said yourself that the changes don't amount to nothing, only to make things a little plainer than they were before? Here's them infidels been a-harping ever since I could read, and I dunno how much before, about our Bible being full of mistakes; not to be trusted; you couldn't meet a little popinjay just out of college but he would try to sputter to you about the 'original,' and the dreadful mistakes in our translation. Now here we've had the smartest scholars we could find in the world at work for the best part of their lives, doing the thing all over again, and what have they made out? Why, there ain't a doctrine changed a hair's breadth! The road to heaven and the road to hell is just as straight in the New Version as it is in the old; and the way to escape the one place and get to the other is the same old way, and Jesus Christ is the beginning, and middle, and end of it all, just as He always was, and there ain't an honest infidel among 'em but can see it; and if he goes to harping about not being satisfied with the old Bible, and wanting of a new one, he shows that he's a fool right on the face of his own argument."

Wherupon a perfect shower of sparks went up from the hitherto smouldering firebrand at his feet.

Mrs. Smith bestowed admiring glances on her husband as he sat back from the poking, and even Norman seemed roused out of his good-natured condescension to realise that Solomon Smith, however much he might resemble an ape, had let some sparks of good, plain, common sense out into the room.

Laura moved restlessly in her chair. She believed in the New Version, she supposed that most educated people did. It was a surprise to her to learn that Norman did not; though if she had known him as well as I did she would have understood that, for all he had said, he might believe in it, or what was more probable, he might not have given it any thought. He had just been, parrot-like, repeating words that he had heard from others. The thing that had not been pleasant to Laura was to see him worsted in argument by a plain old man.

"I thought it time for a change of subject. "What news do you find in the paper?" I asked Mrs. Solomon, indicating by a glance the Evangelist at her feet.

CHAPTER XXIV.

"THEY UP AND CALLED HIM A FANATIC."

"WHY," said Mrs. Solomon, stooping to pick up the paper, "this is old news. I didn't have my paper while I was away, you know, and I've been reading up. To-day I came across an article which made me kind of mad, and I've been reading it over again to Solomon, this evening. It is written by a man named Smyth. He ain't no relation of mine, for he spells his name with a 'y.' I'm glad enough that I don't have to claim him, for, to tell you the truth, I don't altogether like him. He writes real interesting, too, but for a smart man as he seems to be, he says rather queer things. I wonder if you've seen this? It is about most everything, and among the rest, communion wine. He says it won't greatly afflict his soul if he never sees another word on that threadbare subject. According to his notion the Lord used whatever wine happened to be handy, either good or bad, when He had the Supper with His disciples, and he does hope that the whole subject of what kind of wine to use at the Sacrament may have rest for the next thousand years. Now ain't that kind of queer talk for a smart man?"

"It is talk that is much needed," declared Norman, springing vigorously to the combat. "Our fanatical temperance friends have done what they could to injure the cause. We have need of strong words and pronounced opinions from level heads."

"But it don't appear to me that this man's head is exactly level. He is an out and out temperance man. He goes on to talk about the folly of the other side, and he makes it plain enough that the folks who try to make a principle of using the other kind of wine are idiots, and then he kind of knocks things over by saying a little against his own views."

"The strongest logicians we have," quoth Norman, "are those who can see both sides of a question. In fact, that is the foundation-stone of all true argument; any other method is fanatical ranting. Have you been troubled about that important question of what wine to use at Communion?"

There was an air of good-humoured tolerance about the self-possessed speaker, which would have been amusing, if it had not been provoking. Mrs. Smith took it meekly.

"No," she said, reaching for her knitting, and making the shining needles fly. "I've never been troubled since I settled the question. It is about thirteen years since I made up my mind that a thing which poisoned the body, and killed the soul, couldn't be a fit emblem of the life of that soul in Christ, and of His undying and purifying love, and so I refused to drink it; much as I love His Table, I'd go without the emblems from now till I could eat them anew in my Father's kingdom, before I'd take fermented stuff into my mouth. You didn't know I had a trial of it, did you?" (This sentence addressed to me.) "That time I went with Jonas to church, after Lida was sitting up. It was Communion, you know. Well, if you'll believe it, I smelled the wine before they had got within three seats of me. Do you remember our poor Mr. Marshall who went to ruin because he couldn't let wine alone? That smell just brought me face to face with him, and his dead wife, and all his awful trouble; he a-bending over her dead body and crying like a child; and his breath smelling of liquor, then, so you couldn't get away from it. There he came right along with that Communion wine down the aisle. And that made me think of the other memories that some others must have, mixed in with the smell; poor fathers, you know, and mothers, and wives, with their sons and husbands gone wrong. Do you s'pose I'd touch that cup? Not for its weight in gold. Says I to myself, 'Mrs. Solomon Smith, you need purer and holier memories than that at the Table of your Lord.' I sat up straight and let that cup pass right by me, and shook my head. My pledge reads not to touch, nor taste, nor handle, and I wasn't going to break it in the house of God. What right had they to tempt me to do it, I'd like to know?"

Norman's face wore its superior smile. "And so, my friend, you missed the Communion! What a pity! If you had read your namesake's argument on the folly of having two kinds of wine, which you say yourself is an unanswerable argument, it might have relieved you."

"No, I didn't miss my Communion, young man. The Lord can commune with His children without the help of a drop of wine, though I own it was a trial to me to have man put a bar up between my right to use the emblem of His own planning. But you don't understand what I said about this article. I suppose I muddled it; I'm a master hand at muddling things. It is all on the other side. He says if you undertake to make out that folks must use intoxicating wine at the Lord's Table, because He used it when He was on earth, then you are bound to make out that they must use bread without any yeast in it, for the same reason; and it ought to be used, even if it gave all the Christians in the land dyspepsia, for dyspepsics can go to heaven while drunkards can't. He's sharp, you see, and sharp on the right side too. I don't believe, mind you, that the Saviour used a drop of the stuff that makes drunkards, but even if He did, that don't prove that we ought to do it now, unless it proves, as this writer says, that we ought to use heavy bread."

"Oh," said Norman, sitting back discomfited. "that's his dodge, is it? I don't see but he is strongly enough on your side; why are you quarrelling with him?"

"Just because he can't seem to stay 'level-headed'; I like folks to be square and consistent; it shows they may be honest, you know, even if they are not on what you call the right side. But I never could understand how a body could be on both sides. You know I told you how he said he hoped the 'threadbare' subject would be left to rest for a 'thousand years,' and he goes on to hint that the way to do so is for each church to do as it likes, and then he says—wait, let me read the very words: 'It is a terrible fact that men have relapsed into drunkenness from taking intoxicating wine on sacramental occasions!' Now, if that is so, what business has he or anybody else who loves the Lord Jesus Christ, and the souls He died to save, to let the subject rest? It is just that which made me mad. I say a man who can write like that, and prove things as he has proved them, has no business to let the thing rest for a thousand years, or one year. If it puts one soul in peril, it ain't threadbare, and no Christian has a right to say it!"

The strong old eyes grew bright with earnestness, and the shining needles clicked very fast. Mrs. Smith had mounted one of her hobbies. A bright red spot was burning on Laura's cheek. Norman was lounging back in the splint chair she had given him, and was surveying Mrs. Smith with mild curiosity. He did not attempt to answer her; I believe he was too entirely indifferent to the whole subject to care to.

"I believe in temperance," he said pleasantly. "But I repeat, as I said before, I think that fanaticism on the subject is to be deplored and avoided; it does harm."

"Oh, I suppose so," was Mrs. Smith's meek reply. "Though I looked out the word in the dictionary the other day; there's been such a big talk lately about fanaticism in one way and another, that I wanted to know just exactly what the thing was, and it wasn't half so dreadful as I supposed. 'A very great enthusiasm for a subject,' says Webster, and I'm sure I don't see why we need care how enthusiastic folks get over a good cause. To be sure, Webster said that the schemes of fanatical folks are apt to run away with their judgment, or something of that sort; and I s'pose it's so. I s'pose some of the ways that temperance folks have worked were lacking in judgment, maybe; but then it don't seem to me that it takes a great deal of judgment to decide that when there's good, pure, unfermented wine, made on purpose for the Lord's Table, that can be had by taking a little trouble, and spending a little money, we had better have it than to have the poison stuff that some folks think is wicked. I don't see much of what you call fanatics about that. I'll tell you what I've thought sometimes, as true as you live, and that is, that 'fanatical' is a word that some people have got in a habit of using when they want to do a thing that others don't think is right; if somebody tells them of it, they up and say he is a fanatic. I daresay Herod and Herodias thought that John the Baptist was a first-class fanatic. There's another thing I think is queer, and that is the way that money will blind folk's eyes. There's that tavern down at the Corners; you know what a low-lived place it has always been, Mrs. Leonard? Well, they are trying to reform it, you know; they are getting up a stock concern, and they want Solomon to go in and take two or three shares, and he says he, 'If you will make it a temperance house, and write out the papers so it can't never be used for anything else but a temperance house, I'll take all the stock you want me to.' Do you believe they would do it? They up and called him a fanatic right away. It was that do that I looked out the meaning of the word, and I ain't liked the sound of it too well ever since."

She was as innocent as a child. She knew absolutely nothing about Norman's hotel stock. It was simply one of those strange "happenings" of which this world of ours is full. The blood flamed over poor Laura's face reaching to her very temples; but Norman laughed serenely. The second-rate "tavern" at the Corners might be very disreputable stock; he was not prepared to say that it wasn't; he was entirely willing that Solomon Smith should think it was, but his logical mind saw no connection whatever between investing a few hundred dollars in the tavern at the Corners, and having those hundreds multiplied by many thousands, invested in the St. Pierre, with its massive, many-storied walls and its aristocratic finishings.

Was it harder or easier for Laura that he was so obtuse? He seemed disinclined to pursue the subject of temperance further. There was no opportunity for displaying his powers of oratory; he was not annoyed by the narrow view which this old couple took in regard to all these matters; he was simply indifferent; they were at liberty to think exactly what they pleased, so long as they did not disturb him, and he was not easily disturbed. One further thrust which Mrs. Smith gave did actually bring a flush to his cheek. "I know you agree with me in that," she said, referring to the investment, "for you've brought up to it. Twenty years ago—don't you remember, Solomon?—they wanted his father to build a hotel here, a real good one, and let it to Timothy Doyle. And they represented to him that there was more money to be made by it than in any other way. And says he, 'Gentlemen, I don't do it; none of my money shall be spotted with rum. I'll keep it clean from that curse, whatever else I do.' That was your own father, young man, and I heard him say them very words. That's something to be proud of. You see it wasn't then as it is now, a kind of a matter of course with Christian people, he was a long way ahead of the times."

Norman laughed, albeit his face, as I said, was flushed. "The world moves," he said, "and people's views change. Then he turned entirely away from the subject, as one who thought it was worn out, and would have no more of it. And Laura looked as though she was wearied with all subjects. I was trying to determine in my mind whether a suggestion to go home would be too abrupt, when Solomon Smith, who had been utterly silent during the last discussion, and, indeed, had worn a look that indicated him as thinking gravely about something else, now made known the subject of his thoughts in slow, serious tones:

"Job Simmons is sick."

"Is that so?" questioned his wife, forgetting alike her stocking and her guests, and ready with instant sympathy in face and voice. "How did you hear? Much sick?"

"Dreadful sick, I guess. In a bad way, the doctor said; I met him when I was coming from the cross-roads."

"He had the doctor! Then they must think he's bad. What appears to be the matter?"

Solomon Smith leaned forward, reached for the tongs, carefully laid two smouldering bits of stick that had fallen apart in such close connection that a friendly blaze sprang up between them, restored the tongs to their corner, and sat back in his chair before he made slow answer:

"He's got the fever."

"Not the I expect Really," than he etched fe ple here
the city;
d me. I ur being the same dis Mrs. Smith thoroughly owing, as
But what Yes," said

Then I inqu
Why, isn't
She ain't with, not sha I undeniab ore is about a spring; I lar is damp ing; they c anybody to back about lay that she uld into sm
y do say thi k, are prett
ldren to thi
r down to J They're d

at tavern down at the w-lived place it has always they are trying to reform a stock concern, and the two or three shares, and a temperance house, and never be used for anything I'll take all the stock you they would do it? They it away. It was that day of the word, and I ain't er since.”

ld. She knew absolutely stock. It was simply one of which this world d over poor Laura's face
; but Norman laughed ern "at the Corners might was not prepared to say ly willing that Solomon his logical mind saw no investing a few hundred corners, and having those ousands, invested in the any-storied walls and its

Laura that he was se to pursue the subject of no opportunity for dis he was not annoyed by ouple took in regard to y indifferent; they were they pleased, so long as was not easily disturbed.
Smith gave did actually now you agree with me no investment, "for you y years ago—don't you ed his father to build an et it to Timothy Doyle t there was more money her way. And says he e of my money shall be clean from that curse, your own father, young m very words. That ee it wasn't then as it is e with Christian people imes.”

as I said, was flushed l people's views change. om the subject, as one nd would have no more gh she was wearied with determine in my mind e would be too abrupt, en utterly silent during had worn a look that y about something else, his thoughts in slow,

wife, forgetting alike nd ready with instant “How did you hear?”
a bad way, the doctor oming from the cross-they must think he's ter?”
reached for the tongs bits of stick that had on that a friendly blaze ed the tongs to their before he made slow

“Not the fever they are having in the city?” “I expect that's the fever.” “Really,” interrupted Norman in a more interested ne than he had used before that evening, “I hope that etched fever isn't going to break out among your poor ople here; it has been very fatal in the lower portion the city; hardly a case recovered, one of the physicians al me. I was panic-stricken, Laura, when I heard of ur being with a fever patient; I thought at first it was same disease.”
Mrs. Smith did not seem to hear him; her knitting l lay in her lap, and she was looking at her husband in thoroughly startled way that seemed singular to me, owing, as I did, how free from panic her nature was.
“But what will Job do for care?” she asked at last.
“Yes,” said Solomon, “there's the rub.”

Nobody's there, only Jim Beers, and he ain't no good in sickness, you know.”
Then there was a moment of silence, not of idleness, for we were all engaged with the fire. Solomon reached for the tongs, and poked and poked, and relaid, with skilful touches, until from the dying embers there burst a glow of beauty, and the flames shot up to the low ceiling and set all the pictures in frames of gold. When he once more laid aside the tongs he put his old worn hands on his knees and looked straight into his wife's grey eyes, and said: “Maria, I suppose I ought to go.”
It seems to me I can feel yet the stillness that there was for a moment; I can almost hear the great sigh which broke it, and the quiet words: “Solomon, I don't know but you are right.” Tho-

“MAMMA, I SUPPOSE I OUGHT TO GO.”

Then I inquired:
“Why, isn't his wife a capable woman?” “She ain't any woman at all to speak of,” said Mrs.
Smith, not sharply, but as if she were stating a recognised and undeniable fact. “What little there was of her share is about took out with the chills she's been having in spring; they live in a low, marshy place and the air is damp; and they're poor; poorer than usual this spring; they can't hire no help, and I dunno as there'd be anybody to hire if they could; folks is dreadful panic-struck about that fever; Miss Perkins was telling me yesterday that she wouldn't go into it a bit quicker than she would into small-pox. I don't know as she's to blame; I do say that folks that are over it, taking care of the children, are pretty near certain to get it, and she's got children to think about. Solomon, what are they doing down to Job's?” “They're doing just about as bad as they can.

after another moment, “Who's to stay with him tonight?”
“There's nobody to stay unless I go.” “Then did you think of going to-night?” “Well, there 'tis; there he lies alone upstairs in that uncomfortable room, and there she is downstairs, with the child, and the chills; and here I be sitting by the fire.”
“Did you tell the doctor, Solomon?” “I told him you and me would talk the thing over; and that Job would likely be took care of somehow.” I could not keep my eyes away from poor Laura's white, startled face; one might almost have supposed that Job Simmons was her dear friend, and to think of him as ill and suffering put her in mortal terror. Across my mind there flashed her, of late, often-repeated hint, or it might almost be called challenge, that she should like to see Mrs. Smith tried with anything that in the remotest degree touched her Solomon, that she might be made to realise what a cross was. I wondered if Laura thought she was being put to the test, and whether there occurred to the child the possibility that it might be in part for her sake. Had she a dim feeling that, perhaps, the Lord had said to her, "Hast thou considered my servant, Mrs. Solomon Smith, that there is none like her in the earth; a perfect and an upright woman, one that feareth God and escheweth evil?" Was she dimly conscious that in spirit she might have answered, "Doth she fear God for nought? Hast thou not made a hedge about her, and about her house, and about all that she hath on every side?"

"Solomon," said Mrs. Smith, a whole minute of silence and consideration having passed, "there's that beef broth; hadn't I better put it in a can, and you warm it in the night to hearten you up? And maybe Job can take a spoonful of it. And do you think you could manage the big blue quilt? They haven't got a comfortable spot for a watcher to lie down and rest between times."

CHAPTER XXV.

"THEM SMITHS AIN'T OF THE COMMON KIND."

THE days that followed were full of unrest. There were some things on which we settled. One was that Job Simmons was very alarmingly ill, stricken with the fever which had proved so serious in a neighbouring city; and from the first the disease took that fierce hold upon him which it is apt to on the overworked and ill-fed poor. Another fixed point was, that Solomon Smith, without talk, other than that which he may have had with his wife, took up his abode at the run-down farm where the Simmons family struggled, and did not come home at all. What little sleeping he managed to secure was done on a cot stretched by Job's bedside. His wife—Solomon's, not Job's—saw to it that he had food of the best carefully prepared.

"Well," she used to explain, with a thoughtful air, and the far-away look in her eyes, when questioned as to why her husband should have felt called upon to leave his home, and his work, to look after one who was no kin to him, "Job Simmons had to be took care of, you know; it wouldn't do to leave him there suffering, and you know what she is, she can't take care of nobody—and Solomon said there wasn't anybody to be had, for love or money, so far as he knew, and so there was nothing else to do; don't you see?"

No, they didn't see. Very few people would have seen a clear, plain, matter-of-fact duty before them, and taken it up, in the way that Solomon Smith and his wife did it.

We, his neighbours and friends, made certain efforts to help. We said to one another that he was too old a man to undergo such constant fatigue and loss of rest, and efforts were made to secure a paid substitute. But it was a sickly spring, and nurses were in demand, and it was soon discovered that Solomon Smith was right; neither love nor money could secure a watcher for Job Simmons, except that surely it was love which had already secured him a faithful and patient nurse. Not such a love as we give to our kindred; not that which grows out of similarity of tastes, and plans, and aims. Job Simmons was a good, well-meaning, plodding, unfortunate, rather stupid soul, with a genius for losing his crops in critical seasons, and making poor bargains at all seasons, and getting sick on very slight provocation. He and Solomon Smith could not really be said to have much in common; yet love held the latter steadily at the sick bedside—the love embodied in the commission: "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these, My brethren, ye have done it unto Me." Yes, Job was one of the "brethren." As the days passed, and the struggle with life and death grew fiercer, we who talked over poor Job's case at home used to say, with half-drawn sighs, that there was great comfort in remembering that if he should die, which seemed probable, he would enter into rest; and certainly his laborious life had known no earthly rest.

Meantime, one of the most restless waiters, watching as an outsider to see how all this was to end, was Mrs. Laura. She seemed shocked over the good man's going into the midst of danger, to nurse one who was nothing to him. It almost seemed as if she resented the unselfish Christian spirit which had taken him to this place of fatigue and danger. So strangely miserable was she over it all, that I think there were times when she longed to accuse Mrs. Smith of caring nothing for her husband, because she did not urge his staying away. But for one who had so persistently declared that the dear old lady's one idea in life was her husband, this mode of fault-finding would hardly do.

"He will not get the fever, mamma," she said to me one day, and she said it impatiently. We were speaking of Solomon Smith. "I am not afraid that he will get it. Such people never do. They live a charmed life; they can do wonderful things, bear fatigue, and go through trials and dangers and never get touched."

"What sort of people, Laura?"

"Oh, a few specially favoured ones. Just a very few who are shielded from all life's bitternesses."

We were quite alone, and I felt that I must speak plainly.

"Daughter," I said, "has your life been such a bitter one hitherto, that you are moved to envy Mr. and Mrs. Smith their brighter lot?"

She flushed under the question, and I think realised the folly of her words as they sounded to me; though I knew, better than she thought I did, about the real unrest of her heart.

"Dear child," I said, and I am sure I spoke with tenderness, for my heart felt very gentle with the poor young thing; "isn't it time you gave over the folly of trying to account for your old friend's strong, true, unselfish Christian character on any other ground than that of one whose life is hid with Christ in God? You have tried to change her into a narrow-minded, selfish fanatic old woman. Have you succeeded? You are waiting, apparently, to see whether poor, weak, little Lida will prove to have a strong enough hold on Christ to lead her safely through life's temptations, or whether your cousin Irving's influence will pull her down; if the latter is the case, you seem to imagine that you will thus, in some way, be relieved from personal responsibility. I used to think that you entirely believed in our poor old friend, but I see I am mistaken. Satan is tempting you to throw aside her love, and the respect you have had for her, and name her Christian life self-will and ignorance. But daughter, suppose he succeeds, and you cast aside our dear old lady's true living as worthless, and suppose poor Lida makes a failure of it, what then? Do you remember the question Mrs. Smith asked you, that evening, after Lida's marriage? Didn't she ask whether you thought the Lord Jesus Christ made a failure of life? Don't you sometimes hear His voice asking: 'What is that to thee? Follow thou Me?'"

She was weeping bitterly by this time. She interrupted me suddenly,—

"It is not that," she said; "mamma, you do not understand. I do not distrust her religion; I never said so. You know I respect her, mamma; but she may make mistakes; no one is perfect; and I—I do not want to think she is right about all questions; that is, I do not want to think her opinions and actions are the result of her Christian experience, because—well, if what she lives is Christianity, it condemns other lives too much; do not want them condemned."

How well I understood the miserable type of Christian living which that term "other lives" covered! Normal Eastlake had been gone for some days, but the shadow of his sham religion hung all over her; she could not get away from it. Constantly the old argument was being gone over in her heart: "If these two old people are right about this, about that, about a dozen things which he directly condemns by word and act, then I must condemn rest; and certainly his life as unworthy of his profession, and that I will not do!”

“I felt the necessity for treading very carefully during these days. Evidently my daughter was being called upon to make grave decisions, such as would perhaps influence all her future. I could not get away from the feeling that she was, perhaps without fully realising it, being called upon to decide between Christ and Norman Eastlake. Yet I did not dare to tell her so. In trying to influence her, I felt myself at a very great disadvantage, because she recognised my unspoken disapproval of the young man. During the conversation to which I have referred, I quoted this verse: “He that taketh not up his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me.” It was in answer to her confession that Mrs. Smith’s life ought to blush other lives, and Norman’s name had not been mentioned between us; but she instantly answered me with a burst of tears, and these words:—

“Oh, mamma, I know you do not like Norman, you never have; and I’m afraid you never will. It is very hard on him, and it is very hard on me; but I shall never give him up.”

“Has anybody asked you to do so, daughter?” I asked her, and it was all that I could trust myself to say.

Meantime the days went by, and the struggle between life and death, in that shabby farmhouse just out of town, went on. Presently, contrary to the expectations of every one, the attending physician included, it became apparent that Job Simmons—little wizened-up, half-life man that he was—was to come off victor. He was getting well. His sickly wife told me it herself, with a wan smile, and a sentence about Solomon Smith which had more energy in it than I had judged her capable of.

“Them Smiths,” she said, “ain’t of the common kind, I tell you; if there was more folks of their sort the world would be a good enough place to live in, and I’d just as soon live in it as not. But I tell you, you might go a thousand miles, in all directions, and never see their like again.”

I repeated the eulogy at our family tea-table, and drew from Laura first a laugh and then a burning blush.

“What is the matter with the child?” her father asked me that same evening. “She doesn’t seem like herself; he hasn’t, in fact, since you came home; and it has been worse since Norman went away.”

I had to confess to him that I was afraid our daughter was struggling with her own convictions of right. This belief grew upon me; for one evening, when we were alone, and I, in much fear and trembling, and I doubt not with much bungling, was trying to speak a word in answer, but should not do more harm than good, she burst forth suddenly with this:

“Mamma, I do not want to be a Christian; I cannot be one, indeed; I should be a fanatic; I should carry things to extremes, I am certain of it; and that would spoil my life. Oh, mamma! don’t you know it would?”

I had no answer ready, and she went on hurriedly:

“Almost all the time we were away I thought about it; I admired Auntie Smith, but I thought many of her views were peculiar and old-fashioned—the outgrowth of her rugged nature; and—I do not mean to be disrespectful—but I thought that both you and papa had been brought up under peculiarly strict influences, and held some views as a result that could not be expected from young people; still I thought that young Christians would develop in that direction as they grew older. I admired the development, and I used to say to myself that when I was an old woman I would be, not a gentle, low-voiced woman like you, but noisy and rugged, and pronounced in my ways. You know I cannot be like you, mamma, so then I used to think I would be like Auntie Smith; but when Lida became so changed, I could not help seeing that she was already growing like you; young as she is, mamma; she was taking up advanced questions of Christian life, and settling them as you would; not as young people do; she was not waiting to grow old; I can see it in her letters she was moving right on; and, stranger than that, she is taking rest; and certainly his life as unworthy of his profession, and that I will not do!”

“I felt the necessity for treading very carefully during these days. Evidently my daughter was being called upon to make grave decisions, such as would perhaps influence all her future. I could not get away from the feeling that she was, perhaps without fully realising it, being called upon to decide between Christ and Norman Eastlake. Yet I did not dare to tell her so. In trying to influence her, I felt myself at a very great disadvantage, because she recognised my unspoken disapproval of the young man. During the conversation to which I have referred, I quoted this verse: “He that taketh not up his cross, and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me.” It was in answer to her confession that Mrs. Smith’s life ought to blush other lives, and Norman’s name had not been mentioned between us; but she instantly answered me with a burst of tears, and these words:—

“Oh, mamma, I know you do not like Norman, you never have; and I’m afraid you never will. It is very hard on him, and it is very hard on me; but I shall never give him up.”

“Has anybody asked you to do so, daughter?” I asked her, and it was all that I could trust myself to say.

Meantime the days went by, and the struggle between life and death, in that shabby farmhouse just out of town, went on. Presently, contrary to the expectations of every one, the attending physician included, it became apparent that Job Simmons—little wizened-up, half-life man that he was—was to come off victor. He was getting well. His sickly wife told me it herself, with a wan smile, and a sentence about Solomon Smith which had more energy in it than I had judged her capable of.

“Them Smiths,” she said, “ain’t of the common kind, I tell you; if there was more folks of their sort the world would be a good enough place to live in, and I’d just as soon live in it as not. But I tell you, you might go a thousand miles, in all directions, and never see their like again.”

I repeated the eulogy at our family tea-table, and drew from Laura first a laugh and then a burning blush.

“What is the matter with the child?” her father asked me that same evening. “She doesn’t seem like herself; he hasn’t, in fact, since you came home; and it has been worse since Norman went away.”

I had to confess to him that I was afraid our daughter was struggling with her own convictions of right. This belief grew upon me; for one evening, when we were alone, and I, in much fear and trembling, and I doubt not with much bungling, was trying to speak a word in answer, but should not do more harm than good, she burst forth suddenly with this:

“Mamma, I do not want to be a Christian; I cannot be one, indeed; I should be a fanatic; I should carry things to extremes, I am certain of it; and that would spoil my life. Oh, mamma! don’t you know it would?”

I had no answer ready, and she went on hurriedly:

“Almost all the time we were away I thought about it; I admired Auntie Smith, but I thought many of her views were peculiar and old-fashioned—the outgrowth of her rugged nature; and—I do not mean to be disrespectful—but I thought that both you and papa had been brought up under peculiarly strict influences, and held some views as a result that could not be expected from young people; still I thought that young Christians would develop in that direction as they grew older. I admired the development, and I used to say to myself that when I was an old woman I would be, not a gentle, low-voiced woman like you, but noisy and rugged, and pronounced in my ways. You know I cannot be like you, mamma, so then I used to think I would be like Auntie Smith; but when Lida became so changed, I could not help seeing that she was already growing like you; young as she is, mamma; she was taking up advanced questions of Christian life, and settling them as you would; not as young people do; she was not waiting to grow old; I can see it in her letters she was moving right on; and, stranger than that, she is taking

“Besides, there was Erskine, you know, a professor of religion, and not a bit better than the rest of them, not so good, I have often thought, as many who made no profession; but all that is changed. I hear a great deal about him in one way and another, and he is actually growing like Auntie Smith! Mamma, you don’t understand it, but I cannot be such a Christian as that; it would make my life miserable; and I cannot be any other kind, for I see that it is the only right way. I know you cannot imagine what I mean, but I understand myself.”

It seemed to me there was but one answer to this question, and though with troubled voice, I gave it:

“I comprehend you, I think, daughter, fully; and I can only say to you what I have said before, ‘He that taketh not up his cross and followeth after Me, is not worthy of Me.’”

There came presently a new element of disturbance into her life. She came to me one evening with an open letter from Erskine, a long, cordial, genial letter, detailing work that he was doing, and work that he was planning, seeming to expect her approval as a matter of course; and there was such an air of breezy energy about it all, and such evident ignorance of the fact that he was doing any more or any different from what a disciple of Christ would do of course, that I understood what the child meant by telling me that he was growing like Mrs. Solomon Smith. The young man had repudiated utterly those former days of profession; he believed them to be mere profession, and felt sure that he had known nothing of the love of Christ as a renewing power, until after his meeting with Mrs. Smith. He dated his conversion from the evening in which he took her in his carriage to church. This was not Erskine’s first letter, but it was the longest and most communicative, and had that about it which made me understand why Laura sought her mother in perplexity.

“I don’t know what to do, mamma, I enjoy his letters, of course; any person of sense might; and I like him; his friendship is worth having; but—and he may mean nothing at all but friendship, probably does not; and yet, mamma, don’t you know what I mean? You always know what I mean before I say it.”

“I understand you, dear,” I said, “and if I were you, I would be entirely frank with Erskine, he is a good, sensible young man; let him know that you enjoy his sense and his letters, just as a young lady engaged to be married might enjoy the friendship of a dozen good men.”

“But how could I tell him? It would seem to him as though I was afraid he thought more of me than merely as a friend; and I have no reason to do so. I couldn’t do that, mamma!” and her cheeks flushed over it.

But I assured her that I thought she could. Erskine had been too intimately associated with us as a member of the same family, and as a special friend of Irving’s, for us to treat him other than as a valued friend; if her belief was correct, that he thought of her only as a pleasant acquaintance to whom he would like occasionally to write a friendly letter, her frank confidence reposed in him could do no harm, but frank and if, on the other hand, there was a possibility that he was growing interested in her, frankness might save much future harm.

All the time, I think, I was talking more for Laura’s sake than Erskine’s; I found myself nourishing the hope that her eyes were being opened to the contrast which his character presented beside Norman Eastlake’s.

It was not that I would have counselled her to the breaking of solemn pledges, unless, indeed, she reached the point where she herself felt it would be wrong to keep them; but if she were to realise in bitterness some day that she had made a mistake, I prayed God that the knowledge might not come too late.

I am not one of those who believe that a bad promise should be kept; nor would I ever counsel one to go to the marriage altar with solemn pledges on her lips to which her heart said nay. That is simply adding sin to sin; and the way out of sin is not to shut one’s eyes and add another. At the same time, I hold a promise as a very sacred thing, so sacred that the necessity for breaking it should be mourned, and wept, and prayed over; so sacred that, before it is made at all, every step of the way in which it leads should be looked over on one's knees. The remedy lies not in adhering to false vows and so making a mockery of life, but in being so careful, so conscientious, so earnest, that the first mistake is not made.

I turned almost with a sigh from the fact that there was no wavering about Laura; she was so sure indeed that, however unhappy Norman's peculiar views might make her, she belonged to him, that she did not even understand my probing. But as the days passed, and Job Simmons crept out among us again, and Solomon Smith came home, and life at the little brown house in the Hollow settled into its wonted calm, much of Laura's nervousness began to wear away. The period of anxiety lest our old friend should take the fever was past, and the doctor said cheerily, that his good constitution and good wife had brought him safely through; and Laura seemed satisfied to go back, in a degree, at least, to her old warm feeling for Mrs. Smith; vexing questions were dropping into the background. She seemed growing content to let Norman have his type of religion, and the Smiths theirs, and for herself, to do without any.

No Christian mother needs to be told that my heart was not at rest. Laura was the child of many prayers. I did not believe that the dear Lord would let her make such a disastrous compromise with Satan as to try to stand on neutral ground because one type of Christian life was too strongly marked for her to be willing to take up its crosses, and the other too weak to command her respect. The solemn question was: How would He lead this poor foolish lamb into His pastures?

CHAPTER XXV.

"THERE WASN'T ANYTHING ELSE TO DO."

"THINGS that folks plan for never happen." This Mrs. Smith said to me one lovely spring morning, when I had walked over to see her, and plan for more fresh eggs. She said it with a grateful smile playing round her mouth and a satisfied look in her eyes. "Now, there's Solomon, I really did think he would get the fever. I laid awake nights to get ready for it. I planned who to get to look after the house and the critters, and I hunted up the bundles of old linen and things, such as is wanted in sickness, and whenever I sent any round to Job Simmons, I laid some out for Solomon. And whenever the doctor asked for this or that about the house for Job's comfort, I set right about getting it ready for Solomon. After he come home I put things straight every night regular, without saying anything to him, you know, so that if he should be took before morning I'd know just where to lay my hand on everything. If ever I planned, and fixed, and fussed out anything, it was the way I'd do for him when he had the fever; and he ain't no signs of it about him! I must say I think it is wonderful, broke of his rest as he was, and lifting hard, and puttering all day as well as all night. Ain't it wonderful now that he escaped? It is the Lord's mercy. I wish I knew how to be grateful enough."

Poor old lady! All the time the shadows were gathering round her so softly and sweetly that she did not perceive them. At least she let none of us know it if she did.

"Solomon was kind of tired out to-night, and I coaxed him up to stay at home," she said to me one evening after prayer-meeting, as she was getting into our carriage to ride home, having walked the mile and a half thither. "He ain't quite so strong as usual, somehow. The warm weather is coming on pretty early, you see, and then he's had such a hard pull, it stands to reason it will take him a while to get over it."

One Sunday she came to church all day without him.

"Solomon ain't sick and he ain't well," she said in answer to inquiries. "I dunno exactly what ails him; worn out, I call it. He don't seem to have no strength to spare; and no wonder, he used it up a good ways ahead. I tell him that by the autumn he'll catch up if he is careful, and be all right. You see, Solomon is older than he was"—spoken in a half-confidential tone, as if it were an admission that she made reluctantly, and would like as little said about it as possible—"and of course watching and care tells on him."

It was a very unusual thing to see Solomon Smith's seat in church vacant. It gave me a strange sort of pang to look at the old lady sitting alone. If there had been a stalwart son or a cheery-faced daughter beside her, it would have been different.

Not long thereafter we went, Laura and I, to take our friend a loaf of a new kind of corn bread Mary had been learning to make. We found her in the neat kitchen, which, in its summer dress of fresh whitewash, and green, sweet-smelling boughs in the fireplace, and a pot of June roses smiling from the mantel-piece, looked in its way quite as inviting as the more glowier attire in which winter found it. Mrs. Smith had a way of her own of marking the seasons. The red curtains which glowed all the winter at her kitchen windows were replaced by plain white ones; white tidies carefully stitched into place with cord covered the wools with which the favourite chairs were upholstered. Even the floor mats were of a lighter, more subdued hue, and in various ways the mistress of the house had made her abode say, "It is summer."

On this day the door leading into the large and roomy summer sleeping-room, which generally stood open in the afternoon, revealing glimpses of a very chamber of peace, was closed. Mrs. Smith, glancing toward it, lowered her voice: "Solomon has gone to lie down. He is having a nice long nap, and he needs it. He went out in the lower field this morning for about an hour, and I never see anybody look so tired as he did when he came in. I coaxed him to lie down right away, and he did, and this afternoon he went of his own accord and laid down again. He ain't been no hand to take a nap in the daytime; but he'd ought to. When folks got to be his age they need it, I think."

I did not want to be Job's comforter, but I could not help saying:

"Do you think your husband seems as well as usual this summer?"

She laid down the seam she was sewing, and looked at me with grave, earnest eyes for a moment before she answered:

"Well, now, he don't, that's a fact; but I don't think strange of it. The doctor thinks he ain't quite right. He wants him to take a tonic. He's been talking to me about it this very morning. I was out in the yard when he rode by, and I wanted to know how that Adams boy is, so I stopped him, and then I was saying that Solomon wasn't real well, and he said he told him more than a week ago he ought to take beer, or porter, or some of them things. But land! Solomon won't. I know as well as I want to, that he won't; and I ain't the one to coax him to either."

"I don't mean," she hastened to explain, catching a glimpse of the dissent and disapproval in Laura's eyes, "that I would be opposed to it if we thought it was necessary. Solomon wouldn't either. I suppose we would about as soon take that as any other poison, if it seemed to be the thing to do; but you see, we both believe that other tonics will do just as well, and not have the same objection to 'em that these have."

"But," said Laura, belligerence in every tone, "I should suppose that you would be willing to accept a physician's opinion. You say the doctor advised it. Surely he ought to be supposed to know what should be done!"

"Well, I don't know," speaking thoughtfully. "You see, child, there's doctors and doctors, and you can't believe in 'em all for they contradict each other about every earthly thing, and if you undertake to follow one man's notions, you may comfort yourself with the thought that you are going right contrary to the notions of another of know- it but to and that; this tonic It belong everythin talked with when I w went to happened and runs enough. niece's co a great d for him to and he ca great at a when he s up and c come dow any of th system of was of th nine cases were pret wasn't th thought t gether tha minds tha take 'em. down on owned th would do more exp 'Solomon Lord ever them very talking ab and wrong "Auntie mean that some scrt, might bec "No, ch afraid of it us agains standeth t help, some I haven't both afraid folks that 'em up, wit pledges an brother per that comes Solomon as it has all t soon as the talk tonic die in spite while. I c expensive s doesn't hav about it. gutter in h just what t to take tho says he, 'It the way a r the doctor now what c forget the v great sunke I will so; say Job ain' grace; for i place with exactly what ails him ; n to have no strength to up a good way ahead.

ll catch up if he is care-Solomon is older than he al tone, as if it were an atly, and would like as and of course watching

o see Solomon Smith's a strange sort of pang
e. If there had been a laughter beside her, it

Laura and I, to take our bread Mary had been in the neat kitchen, whitewash, and green, lace, and a pot of June cece, looked in its way lowir: attire in which d a way of her own of rtains which glowed all were replaced by plain stitched into place with ch the favourite chairs mats were of a lighter, s ways the mistress of "It is summer."

to the large and roomy erally stood open in the very chamber of peace, r toward it, lowered her down. He is having a le went out in the lower ur, and I never see any-he came in. I coaxed did, and this afternoon d down again. He ain't laytime; but he'd ought they need it, I think."

inferior, but I could not ems as well as usual this is sewing, and looked at a moment before she fact; but I don't think s he ain't quite right, e's been talking to me a out in the yard when w how that Adams boy was saying that Solomon d him more than a week orter, or some of them

t. I know as well as I t the one to coax him to explain, catching a proval in Laura's eyes, if we thought it was ither. I suppose we've s any other poison, if it but you see, we both just as well, and not at these have."

ce in every tone, "I be willing to accept a he doctor advised it,
to know what should

g thoughtfully. "You doctors, and you can't adict each other about undertake to follow one rt yourself with the ontrary to the notions of another, who's just as smart, and has as good a chance of knowing as the first one. I don't see anything for it but to study up some things and decide for yourself; and that's just what we've done a good while ago about this tonic business. Fact is, you've got to study it up.

It belongs to the temperance question, and we read everything we could get hold of on both sides, and we talked with some that know a good deal, and one day when I was in New York, a year or so ago—that time I went to take care of my niece's cousin, you know—I happened across that big doctor that everybody praises and runs to consult—at least, them that can get money enough. A lady that boarded in the house where my niece's cousin lived was relation to him, and she thought a great deal of Fanny—that's the cousin—and she sent for him to come and see her when she was at the worst; and he came, and he was as good as though he hadn't been great at all. He came two or three times, and one day, when he sat waiting to go upstairs, I had a chance, and I up and asked him his opinion about tonics. Well he come down on the whole thing stronger than I thought any of them ever did. He said he believed the whole system of prescribing rum for strengthening medicine was of the devil, and brought forth the devil's fruits in nine cases out of ten. Them was his very words. They were pretty strong, I thought; but coming from him, wasn't they worth thinking about? Solomon and I thought them over, and put one thing and another together that we heard here and there, and we made up our minds that we didn't believe in rum tonics and couldn't take 'em. So you see I ain't the one to coax him to back down on that. Why, this very doctor, this morning, owned that there were other things that he supposed would do about as well, only they were harder to get, and more expensive. 'As far as that goes, doctor,' says I, 'Solomon and I agreed a good while ago to obey the Lord even if it was expensive now and then.' I said them very words. It seemed a queer thing to me to be talking about expense, when I was talking about right and wrong, and the danger of doing harm to folk's souls."

"Auntie Smith," interrupted Laura "do you really mean that you are afraid if your husband took a tonic of some sort, for a few weeks while he is ran down, he might become a drunkard?"

"No, child; I dunno as I can say I'm the least mite afraid of it; I ought to be, I suppose, for the Bible warns us against that very thing: 'Let him that thinketh he standeth take heed lest he fall,' it says. But I can't help, somehow, feeling so sure of Solomon's standing that I haven't a speck of fear; but I'll tell you what we are both afraid of, and that is his influence. There are folks that don't stand firm; it's all you can do to keep 'em up, with all the props that you can put round them; pledges and examples, and all that. 'Shall the weak brother perish for whom Christ died?' That's the verse that comes thrusting itself at me the minnte I think about Solomon swallowing a drop of the stuff. You see, child, it has all been up lately and had itself talked over. As soon as the fever left Job Simmons the doctor began to talk tonic to him; says he to Solomon: 'The man will die in spite of you, if he doesn't have brandy every little while. I don't know how he's going to get it. It's expensive stuff, but he'll slip through our fingers if he doesn't have it.' Well, Solomon went straight to Job about it. 'Poor Job, you know, was away down in the gutter in his younger days; and Solomon he told him just what the doctor said. He didn't feel that he ought to take the responsibility of doing any other way; and says he, 'It ain't the expense, Job, that needn't stand in the way a minute; what you need you're to have; and the doctor says if you don't have brandy you may die; now what do you say? And Solomon says he'll never forget the way in which Job looked at him out of them great sunken eyes. Says he: 'Then, Solomon, I'll die; I will so; not a drop of brandy for me!' Some folks say Job ain't got much spirit; but if he hasn't he's got grace; for it took some, I guess, to get him through that place with his wife a-crying over him and the doctor telling what would happen. Not a drop of brandy did he take; and the doctor himself says he never saw any one come up faster; and yet he goes and prescribes the tonic again the first thing!"

Laura arose at once; she was ready to go home. I did not know it then, but long afterwards I saw the letter that she had received that morning; one sentence was as follows:—

"I'm rather under the weather just now; nothing to signify, a little run down with irregular hours and over-exertion. The city has been pretty gay this spring; several weddings in high life, and matters of that sort have rather knocked me up; but you have no cause for anxiety; the doctor says I will be all right in a few weeks. He prescribes a glass of old ale on rising, and perhaps after each meal. I shall not need so much as that, I presume, but I am trying the prescription sparingly, with excellent results already."

I think about the time that Mrs. Smith quoted poor Job Simmons' words: "Then, Solomon, I'll die; I will so; not a drop of brandy for me!" those contrasting words stung her.

After that the shadows deepened rapidly. Solomon Smith took no tonic—at least of an alcoholic nature.
Indeed, before three more days had passed it became apparent to the doctor that he needed more than a tonic.
There came speedily a morning in which, essaying to rise with the dawn, as usual, Solomon Smith fell back with something very like a groan, and owned that he felt too weak and miserable to move. His alert wife moved skilfully, and in a very brief space of time tried to rally his strength with a little nourishing broth, while she waited for the doctor, for whom she had quietly sent a messenger.

She spoke cheerily both to him and the doctor when he came. It was an uncommon sultry kind of morning; she didn't feel near as bright as usual herself, and Solomon had overdone the day before; he would be all right in a little while she guessed, but she had thought it safest to call the doctor.

She said much the same two days later, when I spent an hour with her.

"Solomon was getting a rest. He needed it, had needed it all the spring; and folks like him couldn't rest unless the Lord took them gently and laid them on their backs. He didn't suffer any to speak of; had no pain; he was just worn out."

Her face was bright while she talked, and she kept her needle going busily, finishing a garment for her husband that she fancied would be cooler and more comfortable for him. Meantime he slept.

"He sleeps a good deal," she said brightly; "I think that shows he needs it. Being tired is a dreadful kind of feeling, and nothing will do for it so quick as sleep."

There was nothing we could do to help her; she was sufficient to the occasion. So there was no object in lingering. Cheerful, our hostess certainly was, but as certainly she was quiet; her usually busy tongue was hushed, and her brain engaged with the effort to keep all the outside world quiet, and to hear the first sound which came from that sick-room. We went away feeling that, although on the surface nothing looked like it, still it was a sick-room.

When we met the doctor and stopped to inquire as to the state of things, he shook his head gravely.

"Ycnder is a wonderful nurse, Mrs. Leonard; but she can't nurse her husband back into strength."

"Mamma, what does he mean?" said Laura, her face white. "Does he think that Mr. Smith is going to die?"

I didn't know what he meant, but I was afraid, and I told Laura so. She seemed wonderfully shaken by our fears; more so than it seemed to me her interest in our friends would account for. She talked about it a great deal, and went about with a white, anxious face.

"It will kill Auntie Smith, I think," she said to Mary.
"She is so utterly deceived, or else we are. I darsay we are the ones who are frightened, after all; she doesn't think him sick; and why shouldn't she know better than the rest of us? But if he should be really sick it will be a dreadful shock to her. She is so entirely unprepared for it. Mamma, you do not think he can be going to die; do you?"

"I did not know. I hardly knew what to think. He was not a man to give up and lie down weakly and fancy himself sick. But as the days passed, he certainly did not gain in strength; and yet he had no fever and no pain. What was the matter with him?"

"Worn out," the doctor said briefly, on being interrogated; "he was too old a man to bear the fatigue of that long watching. If he had had a son it would never have been allowed. I wonder that his wife did not use her influence. A poor exchange, to nurse Job Simmons back to life and take him instead. We could get along without Job, I suppose, but real solid honest men like Solomon Smith are scarce."

"If he only hadn't gone to take care of Job Simmons!" This Laura said to Mrs. Smith one morning when we were waiting to take a message from her to the doctor.

I was very sorry that she said it. There is nothing to make a sharper thrust in a burdened heart than that dreary "if you hadn't done so and so." But Mrs. Smith did not seem to take it in that way. She went on quietly folding the paper on which she had been writing, while she made answer:

"Well you know, child, we haven't got that to think about; and it is a mercy we haven't just now, when there is so much to attend to. There wasn't anything else to do; you see the duty stared us right straight in the face, and there wasn't nothing to decide about it. He was sick, and had to be took care of, and there was nobody to do it; and if 'whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them,' didn't mean Job Simmons and Solomon, why, then Solomon said he was sure he didn't know what it did mean; and so you know that settled it."

CHAPTER XXVII.

"DELIVERANCE."

HERE came a summer afternoon which we, who spent it in the little brown house in the Hollow, never forgot.

For in the large, pleasant room opening from the pleasant kitchen, a wonderful scene transpired; a wonderful guest held audience, taking with him when he went away one of the number, and taking us, who stayed behind, even to the gate of the city.

The room was in perfect order and neatness. No little thing had been forgotten. The white curtains were looped back enough to let in the glory of the western sky as the sun was setting. The white cloth on the little table by the bedside had the folding creases still in it, showing that thoughtful hands had made it fresh that day. The spread on the bed was as white and as carefully arranged as usual. A fresh glass of full-blown roses stood on the table by the east window, and sent ever and anon a breath of perfume through the room.

Solomon Smith's large chair, in a fresh tidy of purest white, was drawn up beside the bed, as if its owner were expected to rise pretty soon and rest in it again. But one look at the worn face, from which the white hair was brushed carefully back, would have told those wise in translating such expressions, that earthly resting places were not for him any more.

Solomon Smith was tired out; so tired that nothing on this side could rest him, and he had been sent for to go home. Beside him, sitting erect and quiet, her face illumined by a tender smile, her tender eyes fixed on his face, her warm hand clasping his, which was growing cold, sat Mrs. Solomon Smith. We had come in, Laura and I, all unprepared for the scene.

"About the same as usual," had been the message which we had received from the house in the Hollow, even that very morning; and none knew at that early hour that that day was to be the day of days in which one of the redeemed should be presented for the first time, in all the glory of his new attire, at the palace of the King! So unprepared are we for great events, when they are right at our door.

"Let us go and see how he is this afternoon," I had said to Laura as we rose from the dinner-table. "I will take him a little of this lemon jelly, it is so cold. A taste of it may refresh him."

I had no idea what refreshment they were making ready for him in his Father's house.

"Seems to me he lingers in the same condition a long time. If I were Mrs. Smith I should want to try a change of physicians. The weather is cooler now; he ought to be gaining strength a little."

This Mr. Leonard said, and I resolved, as I made ready for the walk, to give a hint to that effect to the wife, if opportunity offered. Just so unprepared as that were we.

It was the doctor who opened the door to us, and who said: "You may step inside the room. She saw you coming up the walk, and she wishes to have you."

"Mamma," Laura said, "he must be better. You go in; I will wait here."

But the doctor held open the door and motioned her on, and then in another moment we saw that face, with its strange seal of immortality.

I recognised it at once, as those do who have watched it before, but Laura stopped, startled and frightened; and Mrs. Solomon Smith glanced towards her for an instant, with a reassuring smile.

"Maria,"—it was her husband's voice, low, feeble, yet in the stillness of the room distinct to us all—"I wouldn't have gone and left you if I could have helped it. If I'd had the planning of it, it would have seemed selfish; but I couldn't help it, Maria, so it must be right, you know."

There was a wistful pleading in the tone, almost like that of one asking forgiveness for a possible wrong.

Her answer was prompt, steady, reassuring. "Yes, Solomon, it is all right. You and I know that. We can trust Him. You were never selfish in your life, husband. You have thought of me from first to last; and if you had your way you would bear it all now; but the Lord sees that His way is the best; you and the children will be looking out for me."

Then he smiled—a loving, grateful smile. "You're going to the very gate with the old man, and going to cheer him up to the last. I'll tell the children all about it."

This was his reply. Silence fell upon them for a little. The old man closed his eyes, and seemed to be resting, and the warm hand that held his cold one began to make little soothing passes down the wrinkled palm; then she laid her other hand on his forehead, and wiped tenderly the drops gathering there; and the room was still.

The door opened very softly, and the shadow of Job Simmons slipped in. I had heard how he had fairly haunted the house, longing to do, and trying to do beyond his strength; so eager to show his gratitude for one who had almost given his life for him. Laura had said, one day, that if Mr. Smith should die, she shouldn't think his wife could endure to look at Job Simmons ever again. I thought of it now, for she glanced up a moment when the shadow slipped in, and once more she smiled, and nodded her head in assent of his coming.

"You won't disturb him, I think," the doctor said in a low tone; whereupon the eyes of the sick man unclosed and rested on Job, on whose poor, sunken face there was a look as of mortal pain, and his hollow eyes were dim with unshed tears. He had not seen Solomon Smith for days, and the thought that he was actually going, I learned afterwards, had come to him almost as suddenly as it had to us. But Solomon Smith, looking at him, with the death film gathering on his eyes, still recognised the face over which he had watched so long and well, and spoke: "Ah, Job, I've got ahead of you somehow. I didn't think it, but He's sent for me first. Be faithful, and follow on."

Poor Job
"I'd give
"I'm worth
And there
bright smile

"He gav
of all I'm le Quick an
"Yes, S
Silence a
The doc
whisper:

"He wil near to his But even there had anguor of they seeme

if there mig his voice ri weakness in

"Maria!
"Yes, Sol
"Maria,
Steady an

"Ay, and far off."

It was in to catch the upon it cam
last word di

"He is gu
"Yes," sa
It would h of controlled words. The as if for a m actually gon behind! Wh behind? Sh or duty, se lives had be gone to left her!

Those who or faint, did as one dazed who was gid erect, and lo

"You are what is right alone. If I yet I am not helped."

Then she
the door.

"Mamma!
Everything
little brow mistress to c
ing Job Simm
she would ha
bered that pe
grief, and his

Laura had outburst of g who did not plainly that a scaled over by forth again an

As I say, it confession.

"Mamma,
did to-day wo
I never coul
It was no t covered; so I

"Don't you

one knew at that early day of days in which presented for the first time, at the palace of for great events, when this afternoon," I had dinner-table. "I will, it is so cold. A taste ent they were making same condition a long should want to try a her is cooler now; be olved, as I made ready t effect to the wife, if epared as that were w. e door to us, and who room. She saw you s to have you."

at be better. You go oor and motioned her ve saw that face, with do who have watched tled and frightened: towards her for an voice, low, feeble, yet to us all—"I wouldn't ave helped it. If I'd e seemed selfish; but e right, you know."

the tone, almost like possible wrong. assuring:

You and I know that or selfish in your life, e from first to last; e bear it all now; but e best; you and the l smile. With the old man, and I'll tell the children pon them for a little. eemed to be resting. d one began to make kled pain; then she d wiped tenderly oom was still. The shadow of Job how he had fairly and trying to do ow his gratitude for or him. Laura had ld die, she shouldn't t Job Simmons ever planced up a moment e more she smiled, e coming.

the doctor said in e sick man unclosed ken face there was a eyes were dim with on Smith for days, ly going, I learned suddenly as it had g at him, with the recognised the face

I well, and spoke; e somehow. I didn't Be faithful, and Poor Job!

"I'd give my life for you this minute," he murmured.
"I'm worth nothing to nobody, and you are needed."

And then there came over the face on the bed that rare bright smile.
"He gave His life for me long ago; and He'll take care of all I'm leaving; won't He, Maria!"

Quick and firm came the answer:
"Yes, Solomon, we can trust Him, you and me." Silence again, and closed eyes.

The doctor moved nearer, spoke to me in a low whisper:
"He will not speak again, I think; will you go round near to his wife?"

But even as he spoke those eyes unclosed again, and there had come over them a marvellous change. The languor of disease and weariness was gone out of them; they seemed to glow. There was a flush on his face, as if there might be the coming of health and youth; and His voice rang out and filled that room; not a note of weakness in it.

"Maria!"
"Yes, Solomon, I'm right here."
"Maria, mine eyes have seen the King in His beauty!"

Steady and true was the answer:
"Ay, and they shall behold the land that is very far off."

It was in time, I am sure, for the quickened hearing to catch the sound of the triumphant promise, and close upon it came the fulfilment, for even as the sound of the last word died away, the doctor said:

"He is gone."
"Yes," said Mrs. Smith, "and I am here."

It would be impossible for me to tell you of the depth of controlled pain revealed in those few steadily spoken words. There was even a note of astonishment in them; as if for a moment she could hardly believe that he had actually gone to that land "very far off" and left her behind! When had he ever been known to leave her behind? She had gone on journeys, errands of comfort or duty, several times; but never before, since their lives had been made one, more than forty years ago, had he gone to another town, or city, even for a night, and left her!

Those who looked to see Mrs. Solomon Smith cry out, or faint, did not understand her. She sat for a moment as one dazed. She reeled for a moment on rising, as one who was giddy; then she drew her usually straight form erect, and looked about her.

"You are all good friends," she said, "and you will do what is right, and you will let me go upstairs and be all alone. If I am bereft of my husband, I am bereft. And yet I am not alone. My heart trusted in Him, and I am helped."

Then she turned and walked slowly and steadily from the door.

"Mamma!" said Laura to me hours after that. Everything had been done that we could do in the little brown house, and after vainly urging its bereft mistress to come home with us, we had come away, leaving Job Simmons and his wife in charge. It was the way she would have it. In her earliest loneliness she remembered that poor man's broken-hearted, almost remorseful grief, and his longing desire to do something.

Laura had at first given way to such a passionate outburst of grief as seemed utterly unnatural to those who did not know her as her mother did; but it told me plainly that all the nurest of the past, which had been sealed over by a film of ice for a few weeks, had broken forth again and had her in possession.

As I say, it was hours afterwards that she made this confession.
"Mamma, to be able to endure trial as Avyatic Smith did to-day would be worth giving up everything for; but I never could do it; I never could."

It was no time in which to ask her what that "it" covered; so I said simply this:
"Don't you remember her words: 'My heart trusted in Him, and I am helped'? Do you think she bore it alone? You have never tried His strength, Laura."

What a strangely mingled thing our life is! And how surely and steadily and swiftly the Lord is working when we do not see His hand nor hear His step! I wept much over my daughter that night. I saw only too plainly that she realised that her earthly vows actually held her away from making surrender to the Lord. She understood that the sort of Christian she must be, Norman Eastlake neither was, nor would enjoy in her; and that their lives would be discordant. Yet she could not resolve to settle the great personal question first, and leave the second until she could ask Him, as her guide, to point out the way He would have her take. Did I think He would leave her stumbling in that mire until her feet were over the precipice? My faith seemed to be no stronger than that. Yet He was making the way plain even then.

It was the very next day but one, the afternoon on which we laid Solomon Smith's tired-out body to rest under the green and flowery sod, that Laura came to me with an open letter, saying simply this:
"Mamma, read that."

Then she vanished up the stairs.
It was in Norman's handwriting, and began as was usual with him: "My dear Laura!" It was the only sentence that was as usual, and yet it sounded commonplace enough; the miserable formula that has been used by dishonourable men ever since sin and sorrow began.

A series of platitudes about feeling deeply, painfully, that their tastes and aims were not in common, that he was not calculated to make her happy; that they had both been very young, and that, in short, he realised that with both of them it had been a mistake, and like an honourable man he hastened to release her from an engagement which he felt sure was becoming distasteful to her, and a great deal more in the same strain.

I did not wait to read it all. I let it drop from my hands while I clasped them, and the first words I said were, "Thank God for deliverance!" And yet I fear I almost hated the source through which it came. Too well I realised that it might be months, possibly years, before my Laura could see deliverance in it. I remember I thought confusedly of the words:

"It must needs be that offences come, but woe unto him by whom the offence cometh."

It was several days thereafter that I went alone to visit my stricken friend. I had not seen her since she laid her dead away. I had shrunk from the first call almost as much as Laura had. Indeed, I was inclined to think with the child, that the sort of exaltation in which she had borne the parting, when it passed, would leave her in the depths. It was the only condition in which Laura could conceive of her, knowing with what rare devotion she had loved her husband for almost half a century.

I remember just how pleasant the familiar room looked as I stepped into it that summer afternoon. Everything was exactly as usual. The square stand on which the Bible always rested stood in its place by Solomon's vacant chair; a fresh tidy was fastened to the chair; the mat on which his feet had always rested when his feet there was spread before it; the Bible was open, and the spectacles lay on the page.

"It is just as Solomon left it," she said quietly, following my glance, and pausing in the seat she was sewing to turn a tender look on it; "that last day he sat up, he read, and left the Bible open, and I didn't use that one. I wanted to leave it somehow, and it was open—where do you think? Why, at a verse for me: 'They looked steadfastly towards heaven as He went up.' Now, you see, I know as well as though I heard him say it, that Solomon wants me to keep my thoughts away from the grave, and keep them steadfastly toward heaven. That's where he is, and if I can keep my eyes looking there, I shall see him soon, coming in the clouds with Jesus. It don't do to look at graves."

I had gone to try and comfort, but the Master had been there before me, and instead of trying to bind up a broken old heart, I sat and told her of a young one that human folly and selfishness had brought very low. I could not get away from the thought that the Lord had given this old saint of His some work to do for my child. She heard me through without many interruptions, save to ask now and then a keen question, which showed me that she saw beyond the surface.

"Will you let the child come and stay a day or two with me?" she asked at last. "Tell her I'm lonesome, and her sweet young face will hearten me up. I would like to have her come. I love the child."

"I will go," said Laura suddenly, when I gave her the invitation.

She had been going about the house with a white, quiet face for a week or more. She had shut herself within herself, refusing to let even her mother enter into her bitterness. "Please don't mention him again, mamma," was all the answer I received when I tried once to speak to her of Norman Eastlake. I knew she shrank terribly from coming in contact with Mrs. Smith's keen eyes, and was going there because it was a cross that she meant to try to bear.

Partly by accident and partly by design I let the days pass until nearly two weeks were gone before seeing Laura again, other than as I met her riding or walking with Mrs. Smith. Company came to us in the meantime, and Laura sent to me a coaxing little note, begging that she might be excused from seeing them, and saying that she believed she was a comfort to Auntie Smith; and, anyway, the blessed old saint was a comfort to her, such as she should thank God for for ever. I took heart at this, and thanked Him on my knees that night, that He had one disciple among us who was "looking steadfastly toward heaven" all the time.

There was a sweet quiet in Laura's face and voice when at last she returned to me; and she came into the parlour of her own will to entertain the callers with which our house was full all the afternoon. It was quite dusk before we had opportunity for a word alone together. Then she came to me, and, kneeling beside me, put her lips to my cheek as she gave her sweet message:

"Mamma, He did not reject me. I have given myself to Him for time and for eternity. And oh, mamma, He has showed me joy already in His service. I am not going to be a broken-hearted little idiot. I am a servant of Christ."

"I tell you," said Mrs. Solomon, with a strong light on her grave face, "there's two kinds of idols. One kind is made of clay, and all the Lord has to do when He wants to free a child from that, is to let it crumble to pieces before her eyes; and there's some that are made of solid gold; and when He has to take them away, He makes a place for them in His temple above."

THE END.

42

6623X9C

OPT W BEE
LYC
&
CUCU
the Skin Smooth in ers are Initia Bottles, 12.
4/6
BEETH
FIRST ROW
C
the hig Bo
B
K
To be HOMES
"D" LIKE A
BY THE WHOLE 4/6
4/6
8/6
6/6
W.S. THO MADE IN Made in len

g them, and saying that to Auntie Smith; and s a comfort to her, such r ever. I took heart at nces that night, that He was "looking steadfastly ra's face and voice when he came into the parlour callers with which our
n. It was quite dusk a word alone together.
ing beside me, put her
weet message:
e. I have given myself
And oh, mamma, He His service. I am not idiot. I am a servant

, with a strong light on ds of idols. One kind rd has to do when He is to let it crumble to s some that are made o take them away, He ple above."

SOFT WHITE SKIN
BEEHAMS
GLYCERINE
(&)
CUCUMBER

This sweetly-scented Emollient Milk is superior to every other preparation for rendering

THE SKIN
SOFT, SMOOTH, and WHITE.

It entirely removes and prevents all ROUGHNESS, REDNESS, SUNBURN, CHAPS,
And all other blemishes of the Skin caused by

SUMMER'S HEAT or WINTER'S COLD.

Keeps the Skin Cool and Refreshed on the Hottest Day in Summer, and and Smooth in the Coldest Winter. Be sure to ask for "BEEHAMS," others are imitations.

Bottles, 1s., 2s. 6d. Of all Chemists and Perfumers.
Free for 3d. extra by the Sole Makers,

BEEHAM & SON, Chemists, CHELTENHAM.

FIRST—AND—FOREMOST.

BROWN AND POLSON'S
CORN FLOUR

is the longest history and highest reputation.

Borwick's
Baking Powder.

To be had of all Drapers.

HOMSON'S TRADE MARK

GLOVE-FITTING
CORSET
PERFECTION!!!
Sold by ALL DRAPERS 5000000 ALREADY SOLD

If your Draper cannot supply you write direct to 49 OLD BAILEY LONDON giving size and enclosing POO and the Corset will at once be sent you W.S. THOMSON & CO. MANUFACTURERS
LONDON

Made in lengths 13, 14, and 15 ins.

INVIGORATING
LAVENDER
SALTS.

Our readers who are in the habit of purchasing that delicious Perfume, "Crab Apple Blossoms," of the Crown Perfumery
Company, should prepare also a little of their "Invigorating Lavender Salts." By leaving the stopper out for a few moments a delightful perfume excels, which freshens and purifies the air in a most enjoyable manner.
Made only by THE CROWN PERFUMERY
COMPANY, 177, New Bond St., London.

Genuine only with Crown Monogram as shown above. SOLD EVERYWHERE.

Twelve Medals Awarded.

The Crown Perfumery Co's DELICIOUS NEW PERFUME
CRAB-APPLE
BLOSSOMS
EXTRA CONCENTRATED
"A delicate perfume
of highest quality, one of the choicest ever produced."
LONDON
177 NEW BOND ST
LONDON.

Under the title 'Crab Apple Blossoms,' the Crown Perfumery Co. are now selling one of the most fragrant and delightful perfumes ever made. Ladies' Pictorial.

THAMES CHURCH MISSION.
INSTITUTED 1844.

Chairman: W. ELLICE, Esq.
Treasurer: SAMUEL HOARE, Esq., M.P.
Bankers: "LLOYDS' BANK, Limited."

The Society's Agents visit vessels of all nations, and preach the Gospel of God to Sailors, Emigrants, Passengers, Bargemen, and others. The Society presents a copy of the New Testament to each Emigrant leaving England without a Bible.

Good sound Gospel literature is distributed. Tract distribution has become a most important branch of the work.

Services, Gospel Temperance Meetings, Bible Classes, etc., are conducted in the various Mission Rooms. Personal dealing with men on board ship is a distinctive feature of the Mission, and has been remarkably blessed in many cases.

FUNDS GREATLY NEEDED.

Any willing to hold a Drawing-room Meeting should communicate with the Secretary,

Rev. H. BLOOMER, 31, New Bridge St., Ludgate Circus, E.C.

FRY'S COCOA

PURE CONCENTRATED COCOA.

"MEDICAL TIMES."—"Eminently suitable for Invalids."

SIR C. A. CAMERON,—“I have never tasted Cocoa that I like so well.” PRESIDENT ROYAL COLLEGE OF SURGEONS, IRELAND.

OA

OA.

ke so well."

