A Memory.

A wail of a child at midnight,
The chime of a minster hell,
The sorrowful moan of a sorrowing
And the sound of a passing knell.

An old worn book on a corner shelf And a spray of faded yew, A locket with hair all golden and fair And a ribbon of faded blue.

A needle case, both empty and old; And a case with hidden spring, Wherein two golden watch keys lie, A heart—and a wedding ring.

A Great Event

In one's life is the discovery of a remedy for some long-standing malady. The poison of Scrofula is in your blood. You inherited it from your ancestors. Will you transmit it to your offspring? In the great majority of cases, both Consumption and Catarrh originate in Scrofula. It is supposed to be the primary source of many other derangements of the body. Begin at once to cleanse your blood with the standard alterative,

What the People Know.

MR EDITOR,-Mr Davison has again been so often described; it has to be seen appeared in print in relation to the late ununicipal election for Ward 7; and has A local paper to be first class must is about three-quarters of a mile wide have a first class patronage. First and the fall 175 feet. The mist or spray class patronage consists in all the people of the place being subscribers and paying their subscriptions in advance. Why it is that people expect to be trusted for a whole year is something we cannot understand. Why should they not pay in advance and thus trustus? Surely it is a poor plan that they not pay in advance and thus stone's throw of a rainbow. Then foltrustus? Surely it is a poor plan that

Besides this the more enterprising citizens should be frequent purchasers of Afra copies to mail to friends at a distance. This last accomplishes a three fold purpose. It shows your acquaintances that you romember them; it helps to advertise your town by spreading your logal organ; and it encourages the dittor of a paper more than to know was that the paper was circulated on Sunday." This I can prove, and I demand of Mr Davison to furnish satisfacoffice and had the fellow arrested before he handed the paper in." That would have been at least more honorable than

IN TWO PARTS.

Whether Miss-Everett was vain or not need not here be declared. She had at least the wit to perceive that the interests of an enlightened sagacity would best be served by a painting which should be good from the painter's point of view, inasmuch as these are the painting's chief end. I may add, morsover, to her great credit, that she thoroughly understoed how great an artistic merit should properly attack to a picture executed at the behest of a passion, in order that it should be anything more than a mockery—a paredy—of the duration of that passion; and that she knew instinctively that there is nothing so chilling to an artist's heat as the interference of illogical self interest, either on his own behalf or that of another.

Baxter worked firmed and rapidly, and at

Baxter worked firmed and rapidly, and at the end of a couple of hours he felt that he had begun his pleture. Mr. Everett, as he sat by, threatened to be a bore; laboring apparently under the impression that it was his duty to beguite the session with cheap casthetic small talk. But Marian good humoredly took the painter's share of the dialogue, and he was not diverted from his

anogue, and he was not diverted from his rork.

The next sitting was fixed for the morrow. Larian wore the dress which she had agreed pon with the painter, and in which, as in or position, the 'richturesque' element had sen religiously suppressed. She read in exter's eyes that she looked supremely sautiful, and she saw that his fingers tingled attack his subject. But she caused Lennox be sent for, under the pretense of obtainct his adhesion to her dress. It was black, the might object to black. He came is she read in his kindly eyes an amounted edition of the assurance averyed in Baxter's. He was enthuside for the black dress, which, in truth, caned only to confirm and enrich, like a ave maternal protest, the young girl's look undiminished youth. al protest, the young girl's look

"I expect syot," he said to Baxter, "to make a master piece."
"Nover fear," said the painter, tapping his forebead. "It's made."
On this second occasion, Mr. Everett, exhausted by the intellectual strain of the preceding day, and encouraged by his luxurious chair, sank into a tranquil sleep. His commitme remained for some time, listening to his regular breathing; Marian with her eyes patiently listed on the opposite wall, and the young man with his glance mechanically traveling between his figure and the cancer. At last he fell back several paces to mavoy his work. Marian moved her eyes, and they met his own.

he had not exerted a strong effort to make them firm.

"Well, Mr. Baxter," said the young girl. And the two exchanged a long, firm glance, which at last ended in a smile—a smile which belonged decidedly to the family of the famous laugh of the two angels behind the altar jn/the temple.

"Well, Miss Everett," said Baxter, going back to his work, "such is life!"

"So it appears," rejoined Marian. And then, after a pause of some moments: "Why didn't you come and see me?" she added.

"I came and you weren't at home."

"Why didn't you come again?"

"Why didn't you come again?"

"Why didn't you come again?"

"Why seem to have done that as it is."

"I mean "in form."

"That would have been absurd. Don't you see how true an instinct I had? What could have been easier than our meeting? I assure you that I should have found any talk about the past, and mutual assurances or apologies extremely disagreeable?"

Miss Everett raised her eyes from the floor and fixed them on her companion with a deep, half reproachful glance. "Is the past, then," she asked. "so utterly disagreeable?"

Baxter stared, half amazed. "Good heavens!" he cried, "of course it is."

Miss Everett dropped her eyes and remained silent.

Miss Everett dropped her eyes and lo nained silent.

I may as well take advantage of the mo-nont, rapidly to make plain to the reader he events to which the above conversation refers.

Miss Everett had found it expedient, all things considered, not to tell her intended bushand the whole story of her acquaintance with Stephen Baxter; and when I have reasired her omissions, the reader will probably justify her discretion.

Justify her discretion.

She had, as she said, met this young man for the first time at Rome, and there in the course of two interviews had made a deep impression upon his heart. He had felt that he would give a great deal to meet Miss Everett again. Their reunion in Switzerland was therefore not entirely fortuitous; and it had been the more easy for Baxter to make it possible. he would give a great deal to meet Miss Everett again. Their reunion in Switzerland was therefore not entirely fortuitous; and it had been the more easy for Baxter to make it possible, for the reason that he was able to claim a kind of roundabout relationship with Mrs. Denbigh, Marian's companion. With this lady's permission he had attached himself to their party. He had made their route of travel his own, he had stopped when they stopped and been prodigal of attentions and civilities. Before a week was over Mrs. Denbigh, who was the soul of confiding good nature, exulted in the discovery of an invaluable kinsman. Thanks not only to her naturally unexacting disposition but to the apathetic and inactive habits induced by constant physical suffering, she proved a very insignificant third in her companions spending of the hours. Haxter had still a week at his disposal, and Marian made it a very happy one. Mrs. Denbigh was tired; they had come to a halt, and there was no interruption to their being together. They talked a great deal of the iong future, which, on getting beyond the sound of the cataract, they had expeditiously agreed to pursue in common.

It was their misfortune@both to be poor. They determined, in view of this circumstance, to say nothing of their engagement until Baxter, by dint of hard work, should have at least quadrupled his income. This was cruel, but it was imperative, and Marian made no complaint. Her residence in Europe had enlarged her conception of the material needs of a pretty woman, and it was quite natural that she should not, close upon the heels of this experience, desire to rush into marriage with a poor artist. At the end of some days Baxter started for Germany and Holland, portions of which he wished to visit for purposes of study. Mrs. Denbigh and her young friend repaired to Paris for the winter. Here, in the middle of February, they were rejoined by Baxter, who had achieved his German tour. He had received, while absent, five little letters from Marian, full of affection. The number was small, but the young man detected in the very temperance of his mistress a certain delicious flavor of implicit constancy. She received him with all the frankness and sweetness that he had a right to expect, and listened with great interest to his account of the improvement in his prospects. He had sold three of his Italian pictures and had made an Invaluable collection of sketches. He was on the high road to wealth and fame, and there was no reason their engagement should not be announced. But to this latter proposition Marian demured—demurred so strongly, and yet on grounds so arbitrary, that a somewhat painful scene ensued. Stephen left her, irritated and perplexed. The next day when he called, she was, unwell and unable to see him; and the next, and the next on their falls, which they were taking no pains to kee l'ame, and on the following day called again on Mrs. Denbigh. Marian was still in her room, but the former lady received hum. Stephen was in a great trouble, but his mind was lucid, and he addressed himself to the task of interrogating his hostess. Mrs. Denbigh, with her habitual indolence, had remained unsuspicious of the terms on which the young people skood.

"I'm sorry to say," Baxter began, "that I heard Miss Everett accused last' evening of very sad conduct."

"Ah, for heaven's sake, Stephen," returned his kinswoman, "don't go back to that. I'vo done nothing all winter but defend and paliate her conduct. It's hard/swork. Don't make me do it for you. You know her as well as I do. She was indiscreet, but I know she is penitent, and for "shat matter she is well out of it. He was by no meaffs a desirable young man."

"The lady whom I heard talking about the matter," said Stephen, "spoke of him in the highest terms. To be sure, as it turned out, she was his mother."

aighest terms. To be sure, as it turned out, she was his mother."

"His mother! You're mistaken. His mother died ten years ago."
Baxter folded his arms with a feeling that he needed to sit firm. "Allons," said he, "of whom do you speak?"

"OX young Mr. King."

"Godd heavens," cried Stephen. "So there are two of them?"

are two of them?"
"Pray, of whom do you spéak?"
"Of a certain Mr. Young. The mother is a handsome old woman, with white curls."
"You don't mean to say that there has been anything between Marian and Frederic Vennes?"

You anything between Marian and Frederic Young?

"Voila! I only repeat what I hear. It is seems to me, my dear Mrs. Denbigh, that you ought to know."

Mrs. Denbigh shook her head with a melancholy movement. "I'm sure I don't," she said. "I give it up. I don't pretond to judge. The manners of young people to each other are very different to what they were in my lay. One doesn't know whether they mean nothing or everything."

"You know, at least, whether Mr. Young man been in your drawing room?"

"Oh, yes, frequently. I am very sorry that Marian is talked about. It's very'timpleasant for ma. But what can a sick woman do?"

"Well, "aid Stephen, "so much for Mr. Young. And now for Mr. King."

"Mr. King is gone home. It's a pity he sever came away."

"In what sense."

"Oh, he's a silly fellow. He doesn't understand young girlis?"

"Upon my word," said Stephen, "with expression," as the music sheets say, "he might be very wise and not do that."

"Not but that Marian was injudicious. She meant only to be amiable, but she went too far. She became adorable. The first thing she knew he was holding her to an account."

thing she knew he was holding her to an account,"

"Is he good looking?"

"Well enough."

"And rich?"

"Very rich, I believe,"

"And the other?"

"What other?"

"No, no; your friend Young."

"res, he's quite handsome."

"And rich, too!"

Baxter was silent a moment. "And there's no doubt," he resumed, "that they were both far gone?"
