MORE TROUBLE IN FRANCE.

There is trouble brewing in France For some time past the emissaries of the dethroned Emperor have been busy at work in the interests of their, master, and it is evident that a secret and wide-spread movement has been going on for the re-establishment of the Empire. One of the Paris jourmils asserts that a conspiracy has been discovered, in which the gener als under the late Emperor are lead ers. This plan was to disperse the Assembly by force, and take possession of the Government, when they were to be supported by a large num ber of ex-officers and soldiers of the Empire from the north. The monarchists are also ac tively at work, and have prepared a manifesto which they intend to present to the Assembly. Evidently matters are again nearing a crisis in that unfortunate country, and we would not be surprised any day to hear of the overthrow of the present Govern-

A TALE OF THE CLYDE. CHAPTER XVII.

MRS. ALLERTON'S STORY.

Ah, yes, that was what his sparkling eyes and flushed joyous face meant, but I knew it not then, and the sudden cloud that came so black and terrible,made me forget the look he at first wore.

To our inquiries as to where he had been, and what he had been doing, he returnd laughing and evasive answers, saying that all would soon be explained, only he wanted his present object secured first, and that was to obtain for occupation one of the farms on the estate then vacant, since he meant to settle down to agricultural pursuits, and lead a quiet industrious life as a farmer. Percival and I were in the room when he preferred the request to the Squire, and I shall never forget the amazed, contemptuous look of his father's face as he listened to it.

"A farmer!" he cohoed. "An Allerton of Allerton Hall tilling a portion of the estate, like a boor and a clod-hopper. Upon my word, young man, your notions have become quite on a par with the wagabond existence you have been leading. Now, sir, not a word more about this, but listen to me, and answer me. Have you come to your proper senses? Are you ready to propose for the hand of the lady—of whom I formerly spoke to you?

Have you come to your proper senses? Are you ready to propose for the hand of the lady of whom I formerly spoke to you?"

"That, father, is impossible," he replied, "I am—"

And there he was stopped, just as—I believe—he was going to tell us he was married. Most certainly he meant to say more, but with a sudden and terrible burst of fury the Squire thundered—

"Impossible, sir! You dare to tell me it is impossible. You mean still to thwart and disobey me. Now harken. Your choice is between this marriage and beggary, for here I swear that unless you obey me in this, and make the daughter of Sir Ralsham Mowat your wife, you will from henceforth and for ever be as much a stranger to me as you have been for the last fifteen months."

"Father," burst out Edwin, "you do not, you cannot mean that," and there was a look of astonished horror, indignation, and dismay in his face—inexplicable to me then—but ah, I understand it now too well.

"Ido not mean it!" echoed the Squire. "You think I do not mean it, though you heard me swear it. Well, let experience convince you."

And as he spoke, he went to the window, which opened to the ground and gave access to the lawn, and threw it back.

"I order you to quit the Hall by that open window." he said, in tones most stern and cold. "Quit it, and do not dare to return to it till you are ready to obey me. If you do, your expulsion shall not be, as now, in the presence of your family only; but I shall order the servants to publicly eject you. Go, and return when you are ready to do so on my terms; but till then—never!"

I turned a mute and imploring look on Percival, which asked him, as plainly as if I had nuttered words, to intercede between his father and brother; but he answered by a warning glance and a gesture intimating that it would then be useless. But, indeed, ere he could have time to speak, Edwin—his face flushed with pride and anger—stalked across the room, and, without uttering a word more passed through the window, out upon the lawn, and disappeared among the bushes.

At the same moment the Squire left he room by a private door leading to the

My husband, as if animated by the same spirit, sprang through the window as I spoke. I learned later that he overtook Edwin in the park, and obtained from him an address in London, where communications could be sent to him should the Squire be brought to relent. Alas! we found the latter to be as hard and impeneitable as a rock of adamant. Percival and I entreated him day after day, but he turned a deaf ear to our imploring words, and I saw that nothing set time—if even that—would move him. Weeke passed, and still Percival had it not in his power to write to Edwin anything of hope or comfort. I had by this time enlisted my father in our cause, and he, too, used what arguments he could to induce the Equire to alter his determination, but he was as unsuccessful as the rest of us.

One day my father appeared at the Hall with a look of trouble and annoyance, and as this was very unusual with him, I asked if anything had occurred to discomboso him.

and as this was very unusual with him, I seked ifanything hadoceurred to discompose him.

"Yes, there has," he replied in aruffled ione. "Some secondrel has forged a bank bill on me for ive hundred pounds, and the bank has paid away the money. But the police are on the fellow's track, and I hope they'll soon catch him. I don't expect to get the money back, though, but it will be some satisfaction to bring such a rasen! to his well-merited punishment."

"Oh, Helen, had he known—had any of-us known therf—what we learned on the fellowing day, my father would have lost every farthing he had ere giving the matter in to the police. But, oh, we mover guessel—we never dreamed the truth. Next day at noon a detective arrived from London, with the intimation that the forger had been secured, and that he was no other than Edwin Allerton.

The snew blockade on the Pacific Railway exceeds enything ever before known of such difficulties. It has now lasted for about a month, and as yet shows no sign of abatement. There are now on the read, snow bound at various points, from twenty to thirty passenger trains with more than a thousand passengers, who at times appear to have been reduced almost to the verge of starvation. Over a thousand freight cars, laden with valuable merchandise, are also caught in the storm. also caught in the storm.
